It can be difficult for children, families and carers to identify improper conduct when receiving health care or medical treatment. Some witnesses only came to understand the behaviour of Mr Griffin as inappropriate once they were adults. For example, Kirsty Neilly, another former Ward 4K patient, reflected on an incident where Mr Griffin had carried her from the ward shower back to her room, wrapped only in a towel: 'I now think that Jim carrying me from the shower like that is weird. I shouldn't have been so casual about it'.[149]

To further complicate matters, children and young people and their families and carers can sometimes understandably perceive inappropriate and unprofessional behaviours as the actions of dedicated and caring health workers. Kim (a pseudonym) told us that when she attended Launceston General Hospital with her daughter Paula (a pseudonym), Mr Griffin was a familiar face at a time she was feeling scared.[150] She described perceiving Mr Griffin's interest in her daughter and his 'touchy-feely' nature as him being friendly and caring.[151]

Sonja Leonard, former Nurse Unit Manager, Ward 4K, Launceston General Hospital, commented that children and parents often reacted positively to Mr Griffin's boundary breaches, such as hugging child patients, and that staff witnessing the behaviour 'did not respond negatively'.[152]

3.4.3 Rights when receiving health care

Health services have a critical role to play in promoting patients' rights, expected standards of staff behaviour and complaints pathways.

The National Standards Partnering with Consumers Standard requires that 'leaders of a health service organisation develop, implement and maintain systems to partner with consumers' in relation to 'the planning design, delivery, measurement and evaluation of care'.[153]

Under the National Standards, health services must adopt a charter of rights that is consistent with the Australian Charter of Healthcare Rights and ensure this local charter is accessible to patients, carers, families and other consumers.[154] The Australian Charter of Healthcare Rights describes what patients, families and carers should expect when receiving health care. It says that an individual has the right to:

- provide feedback or make a complaint without it affecting the way they are treated
- have concerns addressed in a transparent and timely way
- share their experience and take part in improving the quality of care and health services.[155]

The Charter on the Rights of Children and Young People in Healthcare Services in Australia also sets out 11 rights that 'aim to ensure that children and young people receive health care that is both appropriate and acceptable to them and to their families'.[156]

These include the rights of children and young people to:

- express their views, and to be heard and taken seriously
- participate in decision making and, as appropriate to their capabilities, to make decisions about their care
- be kept safe from all forms of harm.[157]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that the information given to patients, including children and young people, varies across Tasmanian public health services.[158] Information is sometimes provided through the following publications:

- Australian Charter of Health Care Rights, including the consumer booklet Understanding My Healthcare Rights (published by the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care)
- Young People's Healthcare Rights (published by Children's Healthcare Australasia)
- The Rights of Every Child in Healthcare (also published by Children's Healthcare Australasia).[159]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks also told us that the practices of different health services relevant to informing patients about their rights will align as part of the Department's ongoing reform work.[160]

In our view, the Department should ensure all health services provide consistent information to young patients and their families and carers about rights, safety and care. This information should be delivered in accessible and age-appropriate language and formats. Health workers should also receive professional development on these issues. Again, child safeguarding officers in Tasmania's four major public hospitals could help provide such information to health consumers and staff.

Recommendation 15.8

1. The Department of Health should ensure consistent information is provided to patients, including suitable age-appropriate resources for children and young people and their families and carers, across its health services. These resources should include information on:
    a. requirements and expectations of a child safe organisation
    b. patient rights when receiving health care, including the rights of children and young people

c. expected standards of behaviour for health service staff

d. processes for raising concerns and making complaints internally and externally

e. roles of health regulatory bodies in receiving complaints.

2. This information should be provided in formats that meet community needs, especially for those with less capacity to comprehend complex written text.

3.4.4 Creating a safe physical environment

The National Principles state an expectation that an organisation's physical environment must promote the safety and wellbeing of children and young people while minimising the opportunity for them to be harmed.[161] The National Standards require health services to maximise safety and quality of care for patients through the design of the health service's environment and by ensuring buildings, equipment, utilities, devices and other infrastructure are fit for purpose.[162]

In this section, we discuss physical factors that can affect the safety of children and young people in health services. We also summarise what we heard about recent efforts to improve the physical environment of Launceston General Hospital.

We make recommendations to ensure children and young people's sense of safety is monitored to inform improvements in the physical environment of health services, and that these safety considerations extend to the needs of children and young people with diverse needs and backgrounds (for example, those who are Aboriginal, come from culturally diverse backgrounds, have disability or mental illness or identify as LGBTQIA+).

3.4.5 Physical factors affecting the safety of children and young people

In our commissioned research into children's perceptions of safety, several young people said that they did not feel safe in hospitals because of their physical characteristics. These young people described:

- hospitals as 'creepy' and 'sterile'[163]
- their hospital room as dark and not having a window—'I didn't feel like I could flourish in an area like that'[164]
- feeling uncomfortable 'being in a room with strangers'[165]
- hospitals not being welcoming spaces for Aboriginal children and young people.[166]

Catherine Turnbull, Chief Child Protection Officer, SA Health, Department for Health and Wellbeing, told us about a range of physical factors that make children and young people vulnerable to abuse and harm in hospital settings. These include children and young people being kept in individual rooms that are not closely monitored by staff or CCTV, and health workers examining children and young people without a chaperone present (such as a parent, carer or other staff member).[167]

Others who shared their experiences made observations about the physical environment of Launceston General Hospital at the time of their admission and how they felt unsafe, isolated, out of view of others, or that staff could easily be alone with patients.[168]

This evidence illustrates why health services should not assume that the 'busyness' of a hospital ward, emergency department or other health service negates the risk of abuse of children and young people.

3.4.6 Efforts to improve physical safety at Launceston General Hospital

One of the Department's new Child Safety and Wellbeing Principles in its Child Safety and Wellbeing Framework focuses on providing safe health care environments (including physical and online environments), and ensuring health services that contract third-party providers have 'procurement policies that ensure the safety of children and young people'.[169]

Launceston General Hospital's paediatric ward has recently undergone an extensive redevelopment as part of broader upgrades to the hospital's Women's and Children's Services precinct.[170] This redevelopment was completed in November 2022.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks described the redevelopment as adding a 34-bed children's ward and a paediatric outpatient clinic incorporating allied health.[171] Secretary Morgan-Wicks also described that the new ward offers more single rooms with bathrooms, is divided into two age-appropriate pods for younger patients and adolescents, and meets Australian building standards.[172] Other features include a playroom, playground and outdoor courtyards.[173]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks said the redevelopment has resulted in 'improved observation of patients by staff' and provided 'room for an adult support person to stay with a child patient throughout the admission, promoting safety, advocacy and comfort for everyone'.[174] She said that in addition to providing 'a brand new, contemporary and safer layout', the redevelopment has also 'helped to trigger significant staff conversations in relation to brand new models of safer care in their new environment'.[175] Commissioner Benjamin visited the redeveloped paediatric ward on 14 March 2023.

We welcome these improvements and view them as a good start, but not an end point, for improving child safety.

The Department should seek feedback on how to ensure health spaces designed for children feel safe and welcoming. The Child Safe Governance Review recommended that children and young people be provided with the opportunity to complete a survey on their patient experience.[176] This survey should include questions about children and young people's perception of safety, including physical safety, in the hospital. Responses should inform ongoing monitoring, evaluation and improvements to the hospital's physical environment. Data obtained from this and other surveys such as the Patient Safety Culture Survey, Child Safe Organisation Survey and People Matter Survey may also inform improvements. We would like the Department to work to ensure the physical environments of all its health services are safe for children and young people. Again, the child safeguarding officers at each of Tasmania's four major public hospitals could play a role in this work.

We understand that the Department has embedded Aboriginal health liaison officers at its major hospitals. We have not, however, seen evidence of any work to ensure the paediatric ward, Launceston General Hospital or other Tasmanian health services are culturally safe spaces for Aboriginal children and young people.[177] In our view, the Department should actively consider actions in this regard.

The Department should work with relevant stakeholders to consider diverse and varied needs and backgrounds of children and young people using health services, including those who are Aboriginal, come from culturally diverse backgrounds, have disability or mental illness or identify as LGBTQIA+.

Recommendation 15.9

The Department of Health should require its health services to undertake regular and ongoing monitoring of children and young people's sense of safety in health services to inform continuous improvements to child safety, including in the safety of the physical environment.

Recommendation 15.10

The Department of Health should work with relevant stakeholders to consider the needs and backgrounds of children and young people using health services, including Aboriginal children, children from culturally diverse backgrounds, children with disability, children with mental illness and children who identify as LGBTQIA+. The Department should consult with Aboriginal communities on how it can provide culturally safe spaces for Aboriginal children across its health services.

3.5 Policies, procedures and protocols on child safety

Policies, procedures and protocols play a key role in supporting health services to reduce the risk of child sexual abuse and to appropriately respond to concerns when they arise. As our case studies in Chapter 14 show, informally assessing or responding to concerns about staff conduct with children and young people does not keep them safe. Well-drafted, targeted and up-to-date policies, procedures and protocols on child safety enable child safety to be embedded in practice and for any concerns to be quickly raised by staff and appropriately addressed by the health service.

In this section, we recommend a review and consolidation of the Department's existing policies to identify gaps in safeguarding children. Once consolidated and revised, these policies should be regularly reviewed so they reflect best practice and provide accurate, up-to-date information to staff, who rely on them to effectively perform their roles and fulfil their responsibilities. We also identify key policies in relation to child safety—such as those that explain external reporting obligations, professional conduct and chaperoning—that need revising or drafting and should be prioritised in the review of policies and procedures.

3.5.1 The importance of child safety policies

The National Principles recognise the importance of policies to safeguard children.[178] The Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care's User Guide provides that 'policies, procedures and protocols should include processes for identifying children at risk of harm from health care'.[179] The User Guide suggests several strategies to protect children's safety and privacy, including minimising non-essential exposure of children to people not authorised to provide their care, detailing requirements for mandatory reporting and balancing the promotion of children's rights to use electronic devices with the risks posed by these devices.[180]

3.5.2 Current policies and procedures

The Department has 'numerous' policies, procedures and protocols in place to reduce the risk of child sexual abuse.[181] These include those relating to pre-employment, clinical practice, behavioural standards, identifying child sexual abuse, consumer complaints, complaints and incident handling, external reporting, targeted supports, and records and information management.[182]

These policies, procedures and protocols are available to staff through the Department's Strategic Document Management System, which is accessible via the intranet.[183] Changes to key policies, procedures and protocols are communicated to staff through a communications platform called 'Reach', as well as through email, updated hardcopies and at staff meetings.[184]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that staff are made aware of the location of policies, procedures and protocols when they start in their role. She said it was her expectation that managers would draw key policies, procedures and protocols to the attention of staff and encourage them to familiarise themselves with those that are relevant to their role.[185] Secretary Morgan-Wicks also stated that volunteers are expected to comply with departmental policies, procedures and protocols.[186]

We received some evidence that the technology used to access policies needed improvement. For example, Sue McBeath, Nursing and Midwifery Director, Women's, Adolescent and Children's Services, Tasmanian Health Service South, told us the intranet site used by staff relies on outdated technology, which contributes to 'confusion and delays' in accessing relevant information.[187]

Our examination of departmental policies, procedures and protocols revealed that many were past their review date or only applicable to particular regions, areas or services. Further, many focused primarily on the risk of familial abuse of children and young people, rather than the risk of child sexual abuse being perpetrated by a health worker. There did not appear to be any policies, procedures or protocols developed specifically in response to the National Royal Commission's recommendations.[188]

Launceston General Hospital used several overarching policies and information guides covering the care of children and young people including:

- A Manual for Working with Vulnerable Children and Their Families[189]
- Child Safety Practice Framework[190]
- Reporting Concerns About the Safety and Wellbeing of Children and Young People[191]
- Charter on the Rights of Children and Young People in Healthcare Services in Australia.[192]

Again, most of these resources focused on the risk of familial abuse of children and young people rather than the risk of child sexual abuse in health settings. The Child Safe Governance Review also noted that Launceston General Hospital had been inconsistent in implementing and following statewide policies and frameworks.[193]

Ms Turnbull told us that SA Health has developed several policies, guidelines and directives that specifically address the safeguarding of children and young people in the health system, including the Child Safe Environments (Child Protection) Policy Directive and the Responding to Suspected or Alleged Offences Against a Child or Young Person Occurring at a SA Health Facility or Service Policy Guideline which are available online.[194]

In contrast with the Tasmanian Department's policies, procedures and protocols discussed above, SA Health's policies are clearly targeted at preventing and responding to child safety concerns in a health service context.

3.5.3 Efforts to improve child safety policies

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that one of the Department's recent initiatives has been to review and align its policies, procedures and protocols.[195] She described this process as 'time-consuming' and requiring 'significant change management to align disparate regional practices into a consistent and statewide protocol that is accepted by all health professional and support staff groups'.[196] She also said that the COVID-19 pandemic had slowed progression of this initiative.[197]

One of the Department's Child Safety and Wellbeing Principles in its Child Safety and Wellbeing Framework is '[a]ccessible and inclusive child safety and wellbeing policies'.[198] The framework foreshadows the development of several policies, protocols and guidelines relating to child safety, including:

- a child safety and wellbeing policy
- a protocol for interacting safely with children and young people
- a policy for safeguarding children and young people
- a protocol for safeguarding children and young people.[199]

The Child Safety and Wellbeing Framework is accompanied by practice guidance titled Recognising the Signs of Harm to Children and Young People and practice guidance titled Disclosures of Harm to Children and Young People.[200]

3.5.4 Our observations

We agree that child safeguarding policies should apply to health services statewide.

We also agree that the Department's review of policies should include specific policies for safeguarding children in health services. We discuss specific policies below.

The Department should ensure it complies with the requirements set out in Action 1.7 of the National Standards when conducting its review of policies, including to:

- set out, review and maintain the currency and effectiveness of policies, procedures and protocols
- monitor and take action to improve adherence to policies, procedures and protocols
- review compliance with legislation, regulation and jurisdictional requirements.[201]

It is also our view that children and young people be involved in the development and testing of existing and new policies that affect them, through the health services young people's advisory group we recommend above and other empowerment and engagement strategies (refer to Recommendation 15.7).

We consider that the Department should make its child safety policies and guidelines publicly available on its website, so they are easily accessible to staff, patients, families and consumers. This will promote transparency, consistency and accountability in approaches to child safety across the Department and its services. It will also assist children, young people and their parents and carers to understand how to raise a concern, and what process to expect in response. We also consider there is a potential role for child safeguarding officers in ensuring children and young people and their families and carers are aware of these policies, what they say and where to find them.

1. The Department of Health should review and consolidate its policies, procedures and protocols. This review should prioritise identifying gaps in relation to safeguarding children and should inform the development and implementation of consistent statewide policies, procedures and protocols on child safety.
2. The Department's safeguarding policies should include implementing the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations and other recommended policy changes (namely, policies on reporting obligations, professional conduct and providing a chaperone (Recommendations 15.12, 15.13 and 15.14)).
3. The Department should undertake regular scheduled reviews of its policies, procedures and protocols for child safety to ensure they continue to reflect best practice and organisational changes.
4. The Department should publish its policies, procedures and protocols for child safety on its website to promote transparency and ensure accessibility to staff, patients and their families.

3.5.5 Mandatory and other reporting policies

Doctors, nurses, midwives and departmental employees and volunteers are all prescribed mandatory reporters under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act.[202] Mandatory reporters must report to Child Safety Services when 'in carrying out official duties or in the course of [their] work' they believe, or suspect 'on reasonable grounds' or know that 'a child has been or is being abused'.[203]

Employers and staff who are registered in a health profession under the National Law are also obliged to make mandatory notifications to Ahpra and the National Boards in circumstances including when they form a 'reasonable belief' that a health practitioner has engaged in sexual misconduct in connection with the practice of a health profession.[204]

In Chapter 14, we find that Launceston General Hospital had no clear system, procedures or process in place to report complaints about Mr Griffin to external agencies, such as Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme or Ahpra. Consequently, ward staff, nurse unit managers, senior management and members of the executive were not aware of their distinct roles and responsibilities for reporting. Many staff members were also not aware that they could independently make reports to external agencies on a mandatory or voluntary basis.

The Tasmanian Health Service Protocol – Complaint or Concern about Health Professional Conduct ('Complaints Protocol'), which came into effect in November 2020 and applies to all Tasmanian Health Service staff, sets out how staff should report complaints or concerns about colleagues.[205]

The Child Safe Governance Review recommended that the Complaints Protocol focus on practical guidance for staff in managing and responding to risks of child sexual abuse.[206] The Complaints Protocol states:

> In the case of reporting an offence complaint, this should be undertaken through the relevant Executive/Medico-Legal Advisor (South) through Human Resources. Mandatory reporting of a registered health professional, as represented by the organisation, must be sanctioned formally (in writing) and in accordance with line delegations.[207]

We have two concerns about this approach.

First, although it is reasonable—for the purpose of keeping management informed of concerns or to avoid multiple staff making a report about the same incident—that an organisation has a process in place for reporting child safety concerns through senior personnel, a staff member cannot be precluded from making a mandatory report themselves, and this should be made explicit in the Complaints Protocol. Put another way, there should be no suggestion in the Complaints Protocol that a staff member's reporting of a health worker must be authorised according to line delegations. Under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, it is a defence to a charge of failing to make a mandatory report if a person can prove that they 'honestly and reasonably believed' another person had already made a report.[208] It is not a defence that they did not make the report because they were not given approval to do so by their manager or an executive at their organisation.

Second, a protocol that relies on senior personnel to make a mandatory report must be supported by a transparent reporting process against which senior personnel will be held accountable. It also requires that health service executive members be aware of their reporting obligations and requirements.

We heard evidence that some health service executive members at Launceston General Hospital were not aware of the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line—the first point of contact for reporting child safety and wellbeing concerns, including making mandatory reports under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act.[209]

In our view, the Complaints Protocol should provide more guidance on external reporting obligations, including about voluntary pathways for reporting and support for staff.

Adjunct Professors Picone and Crawshaw advised us that, as of July 2023, a draft complaints management framework had been developed by the Department and has been subject to some initial consultation. This initial feedback is being incorporated before a broader round of consultation, which will involve consumer engagement.[210]

Recommendation 15.12

1. The Department of Health should ensure there are up-to-date policies on mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations, including for concerns about staff conduct, and that these are effectively communicated to staff. These policies must not require that reporting be formally authorised.
2. The Department's review of the Tasmanian Health Service Protocol – Complaint or Concern about Health Professional Conduct and associated documents should include:
    a. a description of external reporting requirements in relation to child safety, including voluntary reporting pathways, and reporting to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 and the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency
    b. guidance on when it is appropriate to acquit mandatory reporting obligations by reporting concerns to a superior (for example, to avoid multiple notifications). This should make clear that a person is always entitled to make a notification to an external agency if they wish to do so
    c. a list of internal contacts for staff who have questions about child safety concerns and their reporting obligations.

3.5.6 Developing and implementing a professional conduct policy

The National Royal Commission identified an increased risk of institutional child sexual abuse when expectations of conduct between children and staff are not clear or consistently enforced.[211] This clarity and consistency can be achieved by implementing a professional conduct policy for staff (including employees, volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors). The Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care's User Guide states that creating a 'code of conduct that establishes clear expectations for appropriate behaviour with children' is one strategy for building a child safe culture in health services.[212]

The National Royal Commission recommended that a code of conduct contain clear descriptions of acceptable and unacceptable behaviour towards children, articulate the process to be followed in response to breaches of the code, be signed and acknowledged by all staff, and be broadly publicised, including to children and their families.[213]

Neither the Department nor Launceston General Hospital appear to have had a professional conduct policy beyond the State Service Code of Conduct in place during the period under examination by our Commission of Inquiry.

We recommend that the Department develops and implements a professional conduct policy for staff including employees, volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors who have contact with children and young people. The policy should reflect the content recommended by the National Royal Commission and include information about what constitutes a boundary violation or grooming behaviour. The policy should give examples of behaviours that are inappropriate in clinical and a non-clinical contexts, such as being overly or unnecessarily familiar with children, making inappropriate comments to children, engaging with children through online social networks, and having inappropriate and unnecessary contact with children outside the professional relationship. The policy should also address the challenges of maintaining these expectations of staff when they live in small communities, and outline realistic ways in which these expectations can be met. The policy should also state that a breach of the professional conduct policy may amount to a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct and result in disciplinary action (refer to our discussion and recommendations in Chapter 20).

Given the diversity of staff working in the Department and across its services, the professional conduct policy may need to differentiate between general expectations relevant to all staff and expectations that are specific to particular staff—for example, clinical staff, some of whom will be registered health practitioners under the National Law. The latter are subject to other professional codes and guidelines developed by their respective National Boards.

Recommendation 15.13

1. The Department of Health, in developing a professional conduct policy (Recommendation 20.2), should ensure:
    a. there is a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in health services
    b. the professional conduct policy for health services, in addition to the matters set out in Recommendation 20.2
        i. specifies expectations outlined in other relevant Department of Health policies and procedures
        ii. refers to other professional obligations of registered health practitioners, including those developed by the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency and the National Boards
        iii. reflects the specific risks that arise in health services, particularly the sometimes intimate and invasive nature of health services, and the significant trust and power afforded by patients and the broader community to those providing health services
    c. the professional conduct policy for health services spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors
    d. the Department uses appropriate mechanisms to ensure compliance by volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors with the professional conduct policy for health services.
2. The professional conduct policy for health services should be reinforced through professional development requirements (Recommendation 15.15).

3.5.7 The importance of chaperone policies

Chaperone (or Accompanying persons/Observer) policies are designed to ensure children and young people have another person (be that a parent, guardian or another health practitioner) present when any intimate examinations are undertaken on them (for example, an unclothed examination).

Adjunct Professor Picone of the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care emphasised the importance of chaperone policies in health services:

> Now, as far as clinical practice is concerned it is essential if you're doing intimate procedures, particularly on children, and also in my view older cognitively impaired people or people that may have an intellectual or some other disability, you must have two people there: that's the end of it.[214]

The Tasmanian Health Service Statewide Chaperone Protocol for Intimate Examinations ('Chaperone Protocol') (effective from September 2016) states that all patients 'must be offered the presence of a chaperone during any intimate examination and/or treatment', with 'consideration for higher risk patients', who include 'children and adolescents—in addition to the parents'.[215]

The Chaperone Protocol provides guidance on documenting the request for, and use of a chaperone, obtaining consent from the patient to the examination and the presence of a chaperone, the role of the chaperone, and sexual misconduct by a health practitioner in connection with their profession.[216]

We find in Chapter 14, Case study 2, relating to Dr Tim (a pseudonym) that Launceston General Hospital should have formalised, implemented and enforced a chaperone policy as soon as practicable after Zoe Duncan's May 2001 disclosure, and not waited until June 2002 to do so.[217] We heard evidence to suggest that staff at Launceston General Hospital are still not aware of the Chaperone Protocol.[218]

The Child Safe Governance Review observed that, apart from the Chaperone Protocol, there were no other policies, procedures or guidelines in the Department or Tasmanian Health Service covering the accompanying of children and young people (or other vulnerable people) when accessing health services.[219]

The Child Safe Governance Review recommended that the Chaperone Protocol be broadened to include all examinations (not just intimate examinations) of vulnerable or at-risk patients, including children and young people, and that the information pack the hospital provides to patients on admission be updated to include the offer of the presence of an extra staff member during examinations or episodes of care where no family member or carer can be present.[220]

In our view, children and young people, and other vulnerable patients, should be offered a chaperone for all examinations and treatments. The risk for abuse is not confined to examinations or treatments of an intimate nature.

Recommendation 15.14

The Department of Health's chaperone (or Accompanying Person/Observer) policy should be updated to require the presence of an extra staff member during examinations or episodes of care where no family member or carer can be present.

3.6 Professional development for health service staff

Many people (including employees, volunteers and contractors) who work with children and young people in health services are in a unique position to identify and respond to child safety concerns because they develop a rapport with children and young people as part of the care relationship. However, to run a child safe health service, staff must know how to recognise the indicators of child sexual abuse, respond to disclosures and comply with relevant reporting requirements. As Professor Mathews from the Queensland University of Technology School of Law told us:

> Education and training are the cornerstone of any effort by an institution to embed the capacity and skills to properly recognise child sexual abuse.[221]

Policies, procedures and protocols relating to child safety must be supported by comprehensive induction and ongoing professional development programs that equip staff to see the practices and behaviours of others through a child safety lens.[222] The National Principles (Principle 7) state the expectation that staff and volunteers are 'equipped with the knowledge, skills and awareness to keep children and young people safe through ongoing education and training'.[223]

This section summarises what we heard about professional development relevant to child safety in the Department and Launceston General Hospital, and how it should be improved. We recommend that the Department identifies minimum requirements for professional development on child safety for different levels of staff, including leadership.

3.6.1 Professional development at Launceston General Hospital

We observed a lack of awareness about the risks to child safety at Launceston General Hospital. This lack of awareness was apparent among paediatric ward staff, middle management, human resources staff and executives. Staff at the hospital did not have specific training on, or an understanding of, grooming behaviours and professional boundary breaches. They didn't know where to go with concerns or how to fulfil reporting requirements.

At our hearings, Eric Daniels, former Chief Executive, Hospitals North/North West, acknowledged a 'significant failure' to provide professional development to all staff (from frontline staff through to senior management), particularly for identifying grooming behaviours.[224] Mr Daniels told us that additional training has since been developed in relation to child safety.[225]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that while there are mandatory training requirements for departmental staff, they are not specific to identifying, reporting or responding to child sexual abuse, or to trauma-informed practice.[226] Secretary Morgan-Wicks advised that staff training needs are assessed by managers and officials at the local level, and that the focus on child safety depends on the type of service provided.[227]

Michael Sherring, Clinical Nurse Educator, Women's and Children's Services, Department of Health provided the details of mandatory and voluntary training sessions organised for staff in Women's and Children's Services at Launceston General Hospital, including Ward 4K staff, during the period examined by our Commission of Inquiry. These sessions covered topics such as Child Safety Services, vulnerable children, the effects of child abuse, the child safety liaison officer role and trauma-informed care.[228]

Mr Sherring advised that orientation packs for new staff (including support and administrative staff) have always included information about child safety, mandatory reporting and professional boundaries.[229] However, we saw no evidence of any training or resources provided to staff specifically covering the risk of child sexual abuse perpetrated by a staff member at the hospital. Also of note is that the findings of the National Royal Commission did not prompt the hospital to provide any training to its staff on child sexual abuse in institutional settings.[230]

Other evidence confirmed that limited professional development on recognising and responding to child sexual abuse was provided to the staff, management and executive at Launceston General Hospital before the revelations of Mr Griffin's offending in 2019.[231]

We accept Mr Sherring's evidence that he arranged training for staff on professional boundaries, but we consider that training could be strengthened. Emily Shepherd, Branch Secretary, Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (Tasmanian Branch), met with Ward 4K members on 24 October 2019 after Mr Griffin's death.[232] In her statement to us, she wrote that 'members reported minimal, if any, education and training on mandatory reporting obligations or grooming behaviours'.[233]

Ms Shepherd said that it was clear to her that 'there was confusion, lack of clarity, and there was a myriad of different reporting systems'.[234] Ms Shepherd also observed that, beyond raising concerns with their nurse unit manager or nursing director, Ward 4K members were not clear on the processes for escalating their concerns.[235]

We recommend that the Department ensures there are up-to-date policies on mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations, including for concerns about staff conduct (refer to Recommendation 15.12).

However, policies alone are not enough—staff must also receive regular professional development that reinforces their reporting obligations and provides the opportunity to clarify these obligations.

3.6.2 Professional development for human resources staff

Human resources staff in health services have a central role in responding to complaints and concerns about staff and, by extension, in managing risks connected to child sexual abuse. They are often the first port of call for a staff member or manager who is unsure about how to respond to concerns or complaints about the behaviour of a colleague.

We were extremely concerned about the clear lack of understanding among human resources staff at Launceston General Hospital about child safety issues, including risks of child sexual abuse, grooming and professional boundary breaches perpetrated by staff members. Mathew Harvey, former Human Resources Consultant, Department of Health told us that, to the best of his knowledge, prior to the allegations concerning Mr Griffin becoming more broadly known in 2019, neither he nor anyone else in the human resources department had received any professional development in relation to identifying child sexual abuse or grooming behaviours.[236] This lack of training was confirmed by other human resources staff.[237]

It is our view that human resources staff must have sufficient knowledge to recognise potential risks to child safety and to provide advice and direction to staff on how to respond to and navigate these risks, as well as associated concerns such as staff animosity and disagreements that may arise when a complaint is made.

Knowledge relevant to child safety and abuse is particularly important when managers and staff have a close working, or even personal, relationship with the staff member against whom a complaint is made. This relationship, in the absence of a trained response to child safety risks, can compromise objectivity and create difficult dynamics in a workplace. To ensure accurate advice and appropriate referrals, it is critical that human resources staff understand child sexual abuse risks, know their reporting and notification requirements, and are familiar with all relevant hospital policies, procedures and protocols related to child safety.

3.6.3 Recent professional development on child safety

Secretary Morgan-Wicks acknowledged an absence of department-wide training in child safety.[238] However, we understand that since revelations about Mr Griffin's offending in 2019, some steps have been taken to improve professional development opportunities for staff on child safety matters. For example, following feedback from a staff member, Launceston General Hospital arranged education sessions for Ward 4K staff on abuser profiles, tactics and strategies with respect to grooming behaviour. An external organisation delivered this training in February and March 2020.[239] As far as we are aware, this was one-off training provided only to Ward 4K staff.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that in May 2022, mandatory child safety training had also been developed as part of the Department's Child Safe Organisation Project.[240] We understand from the Child Safe Governance Review that this training is being delivered across the Department and Tasmanian Health Service.[241] Secretary Morgan-Wicks reported that key areas of focus for the training include the National Principles, indicators of abuse and grooming behaviours, mandatory reporting, and trauma-informed approaches to receiving reports or complaints about child safety.[242]

In a written update provided to our Commission of Inquiry in February 2023, Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that the Australian Childhood Foundation's 'Foundations of Safeguarding Children and Young People' course was made available to departmental staff in November 2022.[243] Secretary Morgan-Wicks also reported that 'short online sessions' on mandatory reporting, professional boundaries, grooming and lodging child safeguarding concerns in the Safety Reporting and Learning System had been developed and would be available 'over coming months'.[244]

The Child Safe Governance Review made numerous recommendations for staff professional development across Launceston General Hospital and the Department. Key recommendations included that:

- a capability review be conducted for any necessary training and upskilling of statewide human resources staff[245]
- a full-time child safety liaison officer role and a dedicated child safe unit be established to support reporting and training in child safety at Launceston General Hospital and to provide expert advice to staff[246]
- the content and frequency of mandatory training for all Launceston General Hospital staff be reviewed as soon as possible to streamline, and ensure an optimum environment for, implementing mandatory child safety training.[247]

The Child Safe Governance Review's recommendations are consistent with a more general recommendation made by the co-chairs of the Community Recovery Initiative that all staff 'undergo training in their responsibility to prevent and report incidents of child sexual abuse and more generally in the principles and pillars of the Launceston General Hospital safety culture'.[248] The co-chairs of the Child Safe Governance Review advised us that, as of July 2023, more than 15,500 staff have undertaken mandatory child safety training.[249] We were told the Department is mindful that undertaking such training may be difficult for staff with their own personal experiences of abuse, which has contributed to the development of a confidential Safety Plan tool. This tool can be used by affected staff with their line manager to ensure they receive sufficient support to undertake their work duties safely.[250]

3.6.4 Improving professional development on child safety

The ability of staff to view the clinical practice of their colleagues through a child safety lens is a key part of ensuring child sexual abuse and inappropriate behaviours, including grooming and professional boundary violations, are identified and acted on early.

Many management and executive staff who made statements to our Commission of Inquiry said that professional development on child safety was a way to improve the health system's response to allegations of child sexual abuse and would help restore community confidence in Launceston General Hospital.[251] We consider that substantial professional development is required across all levels of staff at Launceston General Hospital and the Department on a range of matters concerning child safety.

Professional development in relation to children and young people should be designed for all health workers, not just those who are specially trained to deliver health care to children.[252] It should also extend to a health service's executive and human resources personnel so they can understand the risks of abuse to children and young people, identify staff training needs to address these risks, and ensure managers are well supported to respond to and manage complaints about staff conduct.

However, over-reliance on professional development to address child safety concerns must be avoided. An ability to identify and respond effectively to child abuse must also be coupled with a preparedness to act.

The executive and senior managers who appeared at our hearings were well into long careers in the health sector. While employers have a responsibility to provide professional development opportunities to staff on a broad range of matters, including child safety, individuals also have a responsibility to be attuned to the types of risks that may arise within their workplace. This extends to applying good judgment and common sense to situations and to escalating concerns up the chain or to external agencies (as the case may be). This is particularly important in paediatric wards where frontline staff would more routinely be confronted with disclosures or evidence of child abuse that has taken place elsewhere, including the family home.

In our view, the work already underway by the Department and the implementation of the Child Safe Governance Review's recommendations are appropriate to address concerns about the lack of professional development on child safety and must be given time to succeed. We consider that child safeguarding officers at Tasmania's major public hospitals are well placed to help plan and deliver training to staff on child safety issues in health services.

We consider the professional development requirements for staff in relation to child safety should be subject to public reporting. This would be one way to assure the community that a particular standard of knowledge and capability has been reached across the workforce. Periodic evaluations also enable assessment of whether existing professional development requirements and opportunities continue to align with best practice and, importantly, whether the desired uplift in workforce capability has been achieved and maintained over time.

3.6.5 Enhancing leadership skills

Above we discuss the importance of leadership in establishing a child safe culture. Professor Loh, from St Vincent's Health Australia, described the importance of management training for health practitioners moving from clinical practice into senior executive roles. For doctors, this may be training through the Royal Australasian College of Medical Administrators, and for nurses and other health practitioners, training through the Australasian College of Health Service Management.[253] In evidence during our hearings, Adjunct Professor Picone indicated that either an undergraduate or postgraduate degree in management was required, at a minimum.[254] Ms Turnbull, from SA Health, agreed, adding that those making the transition to management should also receive ongoing mentoring and supervision.[255]

Ms McBeath, who at one point held the role of Director of Nursing at Launceston General Hospital, told our Inquiry about the challenges some nursing staff face when transitioning from a clinical to a managerial or leadership role:

> I believe that one of the many challenges for particularly Nurse Unit Managers is the broadness of their responsibility and the lack of support and preparation for them as they transition from a clinical to a managerial and leadership role. Investment in leadership development and manager support would provide much needed opportunities which may assist managers in identifying and responding appropriately to complex issues such as the issues under review in this investigation.[256]

The Child Safe Governance Review considered the professional development needs of leaders, including managers. It noted that a key component of the Department's One Health Cultural Improvement Program is 'consistent and effective leadership and management development and training across the Department and Tasmanian Health Service'.[257] The Child Safe Governance Review noted that the Department was participating in a range of leadership and management development activities and developing two more management and leadership programs for staff, one with the University of Tasmania.[258]

The Child Safe Governance Review recommended that leadership and management training be prioritised for frontline and middle managers at Launceston General Hospital, and that the Department's leadership and management training 'retain a multi-disciplinary focus rather than a siloed approach involving different professional cohorts'.[259]

In a written update provided to our Commission of Inquiry in February 2023, Secretary Morgan-Wicks identified two professional development programs the Department is delivering: the Aspire Leadership Program and the Elevate Management Program.[260] She told us that the Aspire Leadership Program is a specialised program designed to 'identify and support our senior leaders' and was piloted with 18 participants from different health services and professional areas between August and December 2022.[261] A second cohort of 20 participants began the program in February 2023.[262] Secretary Morgan-Wicks stated that the Elevate Management Program is designed to develop management skills in staff across areas such as governance, risk, problem solving, communication, people management and project delivery and execution.[263]

In July 2023, we were advised by Adjunct Professors Picone and Crawshaw that the One Health Culture Elevate Management Development Program had commenced, which is specifically designed for the Department and is:

> … designed to upskill managers in the non-clinical aspects of their roles and focuses on development in the areas of planning, delegating, financial and people management, governance, performance management, communication and human resources.[264]

While we welcome the Department's recent efforts at improving the professional development of those in leadership roles, organisations such as Launceston General Hospital and the Department must have leaders and managers who are committed to prioritising children's and staff safety and wellbeing over the long term. In the context of our findings in Chapter 14, Case study 3, relating to James Griffin, leaders must have the capacity to effect organisational change, the curiosity to ask questions to understand problems, and an aptitude for developing and implementing reforms. Managers must also be supported to confidently perform their roles and responsibilities through appropriate professional development and ongoing supervision and mentoring. Because their roles and responsibilities include managing and responding to complaints about staff conduct and any associated conflict in an open and transparent way, their training must focus on helping them to discharge these responsibilities well. Ideally, staff applying for senior leadership and management roles in the Department and at Launceston General Hospital should have leadership and management qualifications or training at the time of appointment. At a minimum, the organisation should support them to undertake this training and obtain these qualifications when new to the role. New and emerging leaders, such as those being promoted from clinical practice into people management roles, should be provided with professional development to help them navigate this transition.

Professor Mathews commented on the need for external governance to be in place to ensure institutions and their leaders have a genuine commitment to child safety. Such governance may include requirements for leaders to hold certain qualifications or undertake professional development related to child sexual abuse, and for leaders to prove its workforce meets a standard of education.[265]

3.6.6 Our observations

In addition to the Department's recent professional development initiatives, we consider that the Department should monitor the effectiveness of these initiatives. Outcomes-based measures of effectiveness could include consumer and staff feedback on the knowledge and skills of staff and leadership, including through consumer and staff surveys.

Recommendation 15.15

1. The Department of Health should identify minimum requirements for professional development on child safety for different levels of staff, including staff, volunteers and contractors, as well as leadership. Professional development should cover, at a minimum:
    a. understanding child sexual abuse (including grooming and boundary breaches)
    b. the requirements and expectations of a child safe organisation
    c. mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations, including the role and function of Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 and the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency
    d. relevant child safeguarding policies and procedures.
2. The Department should have appropriate processes in place to ensure leaders have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability requirements to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation.
3. The Department should develop outcomes-based measures of the effectiveness of child safety professional development initiatives for all categories of staff, volunteers, and contractors, including management, leadership, human resources, and professional and non-professional staff.
4. These outcomes-based measures should be reviewed annually and the results used to inform further professional development initiatives and leadership selection.

4 Improving responses to child sexual abuse

The National Principles aim to prevent the likelihood of child sexual abuse occurring in institutions. However, the National Principles require that organisations have robust systems in place to respond to child safety concerns where they arise. Principle 6 states that processes to respond to complaints and concerns should be 'child focused'.[266] Robust complaints management and investigations systems are also requirements of the National Standards.[267]

The National Royal Commission noted that responses to complaints of child sexual abuse encompass a range of actions that institutions should take. These actions include:

- identifying complaints—child or adult survivors who report possible child sexual abuse should be taken seriously
- assessing risk—potential safety issues for victims and other parties should be identified and action taken to ensure their safety (including for the subject of the complaint where necessary)
- reporting—all relevant bodies and institutions should be informed of the complaint, including, for example, the police, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line and any relevant professional oversight body
- communicating and providing support—institutions may need to communicate with all affected parties and must assess the need for, and be able to provide, support for those involved, including complainants, parents, employees and other affected children
- investigating—this process should begin after a complaint is received and risk assessment completed; some actions, such as ensuring the integrity of a location as soon as possible after a complaint is received, can be crucial to an investigation
- maintaining records—institutions should maintain relevant records, including of investigation processes
- completing a root cause analysis—where required, institutions should review the circumstances of the complaint to identify possible systemic factors that may have contributed to the incident
- monitoring and reviewing—institutions must have policies and procedures to help continually improve the 'protection of children for whom the institution has responsibility'.[268]

The case studies in Chapter 14 show that Launceston General Hospital and the Department more broadly did not have a robust complaints management framework in place for responding to child safeguarding concerns. In Case study 3, we make findings that:

- Launceston General Hospital failed to manage the risks posed by James Griffin.
- Launceston General Hospital did not have a robust system for managing complaints involving child safety.
- Launceston General Hospital failed to consider the cumulative effect of complaints about James Griffin.
- Launceston General Hospital had no clear system, procedures or process in place to report complaints about James Griffin to external agencies.

- The response of Launceston General Hospital to complaints about James Griffin suggested it was ultimately not concerned about his conduct.

The case studies in Chapter 14 have also exposed a disciplinary system that is not tailored to addressing high-risk, sensitive complaints involving children's safety. In the health service context, we saw a highly conservative approach to initiating disciplinary proceedings.

In Chapter 6, we recommend that a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate be established. This directorate would support agencies to meet the requirements outlined by the National Royal Commission in relation to child safety concerns and complaints about staff conduct. The Directorate would also receive, assess, investigate, coordinate and oversee responses to allegations of child sexual abuse against staff. The Directorate's management of such misconduct matters, including procedures for an investigation and the recommendations made at the end of an investigation, would be controlled by the State Service's disciplinary system. We discuss the failings of the State Service disciplinary system extensively in Chapter 20.

In this section, we make recommendations to improve the Department's complaints and disciplinary processes in line with the directorate we recommend in Chapter 6.

4.1 Complaints

This section considers the systems and processes required to effectively respond to complaints in a health service and outlines the reforms currently underway to strengthen the complaints and disciplinary processes at Launceston General Hospital and across the Department. We discuss the specific problems we identified at Launceston General Hospital, so the Department and the hospital can focus on addressing these problems when implementing reforms. We recommend a series of principles to shape reforms to complaints processes.

4.1.1 Best practice approaches to complaints about child sexual abuse

It is important to use a consistent and transparent process in responding to all complaints about health workers. Complaints that may initially seem minor or trivial can hold vital information or reveal more concerning behaviour on further investigation. Complaints about professional boundary breaches, for example, often point to more serious misconduct.[269]

Complaints can also be an important sign that something is not working as intended in the health system and that clearer policies, changed practices or improved staff training and development are necessary. Professor Loh told us that research into doctors consistently shows that the more complaints that are made about a doctor, the more likely their patients will experience adverse clinical events and outcomes.[270]

In the context of child sexual abuse, complaints that a health worker is overly familiar with young patients, has made inappropriate comments in the presence of young patients or has contact with young patients outside the clinical setting, may indicate grooming, which is a serious precursor of other forms of child sexual abuse. We consider that the Department should adopt the widest possible interpretation of what defines a child safety complaint, and therefore what may or may not constitute child sexual abuse. Kathryn Fordyce, Chief Executive Officer, Laurel House, told us:

> Low reporting thresholds are important in protecting children from child sexual abuse. If minor issues are identified, corrected and dealt with constantly and consistently, this deters perpetrators of child sexual abuse from committing child sexual abuse because they are aware that the system will be able to identify them … If we reaffirm that reporting is for the purpose of protecting children from child sexual abuse rather than prosecuting offenders, the process will be more effective.[271]

Adjunct Professor Picone told us that an effective complaints management system is underpinned by health services encouraging all staff to bring concerns to management at the earliest opportunity.[272] She said that health services should record all incidents, including 'near-misses or complaints', which can act as a public health tool in providing 'intelligence' to inform system improvements.[273]

Adjunct Professor Picone also made clear that child sexual abuse complaints should be treated as 'extremely serious' and require a 'thorough' response from senior management.[274] She laid out the following best practice approach to child sexual abuse complaints:

- the matter is immediately escalated to the appropriate senior manager
- the senior manager immediately reports the matter to the police
- the senior manager takes an immediate administrative decision regarding the duties of the alleged offender, including whether they are to be suspended
- the senior manager initiates an open disclosure process with the victim and their family.[275]

Adjunct Professor Picone emphasised that it is not the role of senior management to determine whether an alleged abuser has engaged in child sexual abuse; rather, part of their role is to notify the police of the allegation as soon as possible.[276] We would add that a senior manager must act on the basis that the allegation is true, ensure the risks to child safety as a result of the allegation are addressed and gather organisational information on any previous conduct of concern relating to child safety or professional boundary breaches that might relevant to an investigation and/or assessment of child safety risks. They will also need to ensure all mandatory external reporting requirements are met and appropriate records made.[277]

4.1.2 Current complaints processes

Secretary Morgan-Wicks described the following key features of the Department's complaints system:

- Complaints about child sexual abuse in health settings can come through several channels including online enquiries, consumer feedback, public interest disclosures, referrals to human resources staff, reports made on the Department's Safety Reporting and Learning System, notifications of suspensions of registration to work with vulnerable people or other mandatory accreditation, self-disclosures, unions and media reports.[278]
- On admission, health services give patients, families and carers information about how to raise concerns or to make complaints.[279]
- Supports provided to parties involved in complaints about child sexual abuse are managed on a case-by-case basis, with consideration given to who the most appropriate person is to make contact with a complainant and the way to make contact (in person, by phone, by email or by letter).[280] Other supports offered to affected parties may include the Employee Assistance Program or referrals to external support services and providing a contact person at the Department.[281]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks conceded that the Department's complaints process departed from best practice in the following ways:

- The various avenues for receiving complaints mean that the approach to 'recording, reviewing, investigating and reporting is varied and uncoordinated'.[282]
- There is no consistent governance and oversight of complaints. The person responsible for the complaint depends on how the complaint is received.[283]
- Complaints can be referred to the area that is the subject of the complaint, creating potential conflicts of interest and concerns about confidentiality.[284]
- There is no 'regular, structured analysis, reporting and monitoring of complaints data' due to the disparate ways complaints are managed. This means information on 'trends and systemic issues' is not available to the governance committee to inform decision making.[285]

The evidence we received about how poorly Launceston General Hospital responded to complaints about health practitioners reinforces our view that all complaints about staff conduct towards children should be independently managed through a dedicated unit, such as a Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate. Before outlining the desirable features of such a unit, we describe some reforms in relation to child safety complaints recently announced by the Department.

4.1.3 Efforts towards ensuring a stronger, safer child safety complaints system

In her statement of 22 June 2022, Secretary Morgan-Wicks advised us that she was establishing a complaints management oversight unit ('Statewide Complaints Oversight Unit') in the Office of the Secretary.[286] She said the unit will be responsible for recording and tracking the progress of complaints in a document management system, assessing complaints against previous complaints, and allocating the complaint to an appropriate business unit for action after identifying any potential conflicts of interest.[287] She said the unit will be supported by internal trauma-informed investigators to assist with employee misconduct matters.[288]

As noted above, in November 2020 a Complaints Protocol was introduced across the Tasmanian Health Service. The Complaints Protocol distinguishes between complaints that are 'minor' and able to be 'immediately resolved', and those considered 'serious'.[289]

Under the Complaints Protocol, complaints from consumers are considered more serious where they give rise to a possible legal claim, are a 'public relations risk', may require an external peer review or a root cause analysis investigation, or are subject to open disclosure.[290] In such instances, the relevant executive must be notified—in the case of Launceston General Hospital, this is the Executive Director of Medical Services.[291] Complaints about staff conduct are also considered serious if they give rise to potentially significant misconduct under the State Service Act.[292] The responsibility for deciding whether a matter is minor or serious sits with the relevant manager.[293] We are concerned that the focus of the Complaints Protocol is managing reputational risk and public perception, rather than the harm or risk of harm to patients. We recommend below that the Department's complaints policy prioritises risks of harm to children.

We understand that the Child Safety and Wellbeing Service has been established to receive and triage at least some child safety complaints. The new Child Safety and Wellbeing Service sits with the Deputy Secretary, Community, Mental Health and Wellbeing.[294] The Child Safe Governance Review reported that the Child Safety and Wellbeing Service would receive and triage all concerns and complaints about child safety and make determinations about referrals to other entities (including the Statewide Complaints Oversight Unit, Ahpra and the National Boards), departmental human resources, child safeguarding officers in hospitals, the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line or the police.[295] We are uncertain about the proposed relationship between the Child Safety and Wellbeing Service and the Statewide Complaints Oversight Unit.

The Child Safe Governance Review also made a broad range of recommendations for managing complaints, the most relevant of which can be summarised as follows:

- The Statewide Complaints Oversight Unit should develop clear and consistent forms, policies and practices for complaints, and the Tasmanian Health Service should review its complaints management framework.[296]

- The Department's Safety Reporting and Learning System should be the single point for recording complaints and concerns.[297]
- There should be increased monitoring, auditing and public reporting of incidents logged in the Safety Reporting and Learning System.[298]
- The Complaints Protocol (described above) should be reframed to include a focus on providing practical guidance in responding to concerns about staff, and a concise document summarising patient safety reporting obligations based on the different categories of staff should be developed.[299]

The Secretary has accepted these recommendations.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks gave evidence that she is establishing an independent statewide Child Safety and Wellbeing Panel. The purpose of the panel will be to oversee the monitoring and investigation of child safeguarding concerns in the Department. The Child Safety and Wellbeing Panel will comprise experts in child safeguarding and health systems.[300] Its specific functions will include:

- reviewing and assessing all serious child safeguarding events referred by the Secretary (including completing a root cause analysis)
- conducting research and providing advice or evaluations on evidence-based approaches to safeguarding
- advising on improvements based on lessons from serious safeguarding incidents.[301]

The Department has since appointed several individuals to serve on the Child Safety and Wellbeing Panel, including two consumer representatives.[302]

4.1.4 Principles to guide the implementation of reforms

Our evidence pointed to specific weaknesses and shortcomings in complaints handling in the Tasmanian health system. From this we have developed principles that we consider should drive reforms to the Department's complaints management system. This is in addition to the need we identify above that the complaints process should have clear escalation processes, internal and external reporting requirements within specific timeframes, and address immediate risks to children's safety. These principles are that:

- Complaints processes should be well understood, trusted and accessible to staff, patients and others.
- There should be appropriate scrutiny and oversight of how complaints about child safety are escalated to senior staff, managed and recorded.
- Complaints about child safety should be recorded comprehensively and stored securely in incident management (Safety Reporting and Learning System) and human resources systems.

- Complaints about unprofessional conduct and boundary violations with child patients should be recognised as a patient safety issue and treated as serious.
- Complaints data should support decision making and inform system improvements.
- There should be appropriate communication and supports provided to those making complaints or affected by the alleged conduct, including through open disclosure processes.

Except for appropriate communication and supports (which we discuss below), we discuss each of these principles, and the evidence that gave rise to them, in turn.

4.1.5 Complaints processes should be well understood, trusted and accessible

Our case studies in Chapter 14 reveal shortcomings in Launceston General Hospital's complaints management processes. Chapter 14, Case study 3, relating to James Griffin most clearly illustrates the lack of clarity and inconsistency in managing complaints, which were received, recorded and responded to in a variety of ways and with no clear process. This was, in large part, because of:

- a failure to recognise boundary violations towards child patients as a potential child safety concern
- the absence of clear, organisation-wide directives on how child safety concerns should be managed
- the significant discretion given to staff in responding to complaints of this nature.

We heard that line managers were often the first port of call for any child safety complaints, with the occasional involvement of the human resources team.[303] Ms Shepherd, from the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation, told us that the Tasmanian health system is hierarchical and therefore staff are likely to report any concerns to a manager or senior staff member.[304] Secretary Morgan-Wicks made a similar observation, noting a tendency for health workers to report suspected misconduct by another health worker to a direct line manager such as a nurse unit manager.[305]

The absence of a transparent and user-friendly complaints process also meant that patients were not supported and empowered to report concerns. Chapter 14, Case study 3, relating to James Griffin outlined that attempts made by Ward 4K patients to raise concerns about Mr Griffin's conduct were often dismissed or downplayed by senior and frontline staff. We also heard that patients were not aware they could report a concern to external agencies.

It is vital that any complaints framework is clear, simple to use, consistently applied, accessible and transparent.

4.1.6 Internal and external scrutiny and oversight

The absence of a transparent and consistent complaints framework at Launceston General Hospital meant that line managers, some of whom were relatively junior in the overall hospital hierarchy, carried significant responsibilities for assessing and resolving serious complaints. Most of the complaints made about Mr Griffin were reported to his nurse unit manager at the time, who sometimes (but not always) sought advice and assistance from human resources staff. We heard that the human resources team may or may not be notified, depending on the nature of the complaint and how it was made.

Very few complaints filtered up to senior nursing management. This reflects the significant power and responsibility placed on local managers to designate a matter as 'minor' and manage it informally. Perverse incentives may motivate managers to resolve complaints informally; for example, they may be worried about how such complaints reflect on their own performance. The lack of formality in responding to complaints creates many problems.

As we saw across our case studies, an informal approach to complaints management contributed to failures or delays in notifying or involving external agencies such as the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, Child Safety Services, Tasmania Police and professional regulators. The involvement of these agencies would likely have made the risks posed by particular staff more apparent and empowered agencies to take protective measures. External oversight by these agencies would have also facilitated some scrutiny of the hospital's response.

Line managers should not be unilaterally responsible for determining complaints connected to child safety. Information about 'minor' complaints, as defined in the Complaints Protocol, should also not be held exclusively by line managers in file notes or diary entries. There should be one system for capturing all complaints, no matter how minor.

4.1.7 Recording and storing information about complaints

The purpose of the Safety Reporting and Learning System is to record reports of all safety concerns in clinical settings, including any complaints of child sexual abuse.[306]

Nursing staff and managers who gave evidence to our Commission of Inquiry seemed to believe that the Safety Reporting and Learning System was primarily for recording clinical events (for example, medication errors), rather than concerns about staff conduct towards a patient.[307]

Human resources staff also gave evidence to our Inquiry that the Safety Reporting and Learning System was not designed to capture child safety concerns, which were instead addressed through local managers.[308] Mr Harvey noted that human resources staff never see most reports in this system.[309]

Adjunct Professor Picone told us that although systems such as the Safety Reporting and Learning System are more frequently used to record clinical incidents, they should also be used to record non-clinical incidents—for example, complaints about abuse or suspected abuse.[310]

At our hearings, Adjunct Professor Picone confirmed that she had examined the Department's Safety Reporting and Learning System and that, while records can be altered, and frequently are altered from what is first recorded, there is a clear record of such alterations, and the original entry is not destroyed.[311] Adjunct Professor Picone described the system as 'probably the best in the country' in this regard.[312]

Ms Turnbull, from SA Health, told us there is often confusion about what is a human resources issue and what is a clinical issue, and that it is important that staff understand that a complaint about child safety must be recorded in a hospital's incident management system and its human resources system.[313] Ms Turnbull indicated that in South Australia, which uses the same incident management system as Tasmania (but called the Safety Learning System), there is a specific notification section that deals with child sexual abuse complaints.[314]

We understand that a new Child Safety Module has been specifically developed to 'facilitate the reporting of child safety incidents and issues' in Tasmania's Safety Reporting and Learning System. This new model is supported by training and 'how to' guides for staff.[315] Complaints made under this module are sent directly to the Child Safety and Wellbeing Service to be risk assessed and referred for follow-up and ongoing management with appropriate respect for confidentiality.[316] Individuals who made the relevant report are advised of the actions taken, and outcomes of the safeguarding concern.[317] Adjunct Professors Picone and Crawshaw advised us in July 2023 that while the module was relatively new, reporting to date has been stronger in the Northern region of Tasmania compared to other areas, and that the Child Safety and Wellbeing Service would continue to promote awareness and reporting across the State.[318] A new complaints reporting dashboard has also been created, which is consistent across all three Tasmanian regions.[319]

We consider that in addition to recording concerns or complaints about child safety in the Safety Reporting and Learning System, complaints involving staff should also be recorded in a health service's human resources system to ensure they are accessible to those who require such information to inform decision making about staff management, including disciplinary action.

4.1.8 Recognising complaints about child sexual abuse as a patient safety issue

Launceston General Hospital's Quality and Patient Safety Unit is dedicated to managing and resolving complaints.[320] Despite the central role that the Quality and Patient Safety Unit apparently holds in managing complaints, we received little evidence that those making or responding to complaints about child safety concerns dealt directly with this unit.

Dr Peter Renshaw, former Executive Director of Medical Services, Launceston General Hospital, described the Quality and Patient Safety Unit (and its various iterations over the years) as being the area that records 'complaints or grievances made by either staff, patients or family members of patients at the LGH'.[321] He described the unit allocating complaints and clinical incidents to a senior clinician or manager in the affected area, who would oversee an investigation and determine the appropriate response.[322] He said that the Quality and Patient Safety Unit was responsible for ensuring that a response to the complaint was provided within 28 days and 'evaluated the quality of the complaint responses through audit of complainant experience'.[323]

A former nurse within the Quality and Patient Safety Unit at Launceston General Hospital told us that the service coordinates patient safety programs, quality improvement, and risk and incident management.[324] The nurse said that the Quality and Patient Safety Unit is not directly tasked with investigations into staff performance or other human resources matters but that these issues are sometimes uncovered in the unit's reviews of patient safety events, and are then referred to the relevant manager or director, or to the human resources department.[325]

The nurse told us that the Quality and Patient Safety Unit held safety event meetings attended by relevant staff from the unit and by the Executive Director of Medical Services (who, until recently, was Dr Renshaw).[326] The purpose of these meetings was to review serious incidents and discuss investigation processes and improvement opportunities.[327] Following the public release of The Nurse podcast, the matter of Mr Griffin was apparently discussed at a serious safety event meeting.[328] The Quality and Patient Safety Unit also sought advice from Dr Renshaw on how to respond when queries from concerned families related to Mr Griffin were raised with the hospital.[329]

Other than this meeting, the Quality and Patient Safety Unit does not appear to have been involved in any of the complaints about Mr Griffin. Again, this suggests that child safety governance arrangements at the hospital have primarily focused on clinical risks, with risks to child safety posed by staff boundary breaches considered a matter for the human resources team. It is important that organisational and governance arrangements in health services recognise that the risk a staff member poses to the safety of children is a serious patient safety issue and not simply a staffing problem to be managed locally.

One of the main problems we noted across all our case studies was that complaints about child sexual abuse or boundary breaches tended to be considered as isolated incidents and did not prompt reviews of child safeguarding systems more broadly. Rarely were complaints routinely escalated to the Secretary to contemplate disciplinary action. This represents many missed opportunities to learn from mistakes and to work to prevent future misconduct.

As previous reviews have revealed, there is a defensive culture within the Tasmanian Health Service. Richard Connock, Health Complaints Commissioner, described how he had 'encountered a somewhat protective and adversarial attitude' within the Tasmanian Health Service in responding to complaints, and had 'routinely encouraged the [Tasmanian Health Service] to be more open with complainants'.[330]

Mr Connock told us that complaints can take an extremely long time to arrive at his office and often seemed to be 'waylaid in the "legal department" for long periods'.[331] We agree with Mr Connock that the Department could do more to recognise the value of complaints across the organisation and, in doing so, apply principles promoting open disclosure by admitting mistakes and identifying opportunities to implement improvements.[332]

While the Department has started work to improve its complaints management processes for child safety concerns, there is not a clearly defined and publicised pathway for escalating, managing and investigating complaints across the Department and within its health services. The governance and review arrangements underpinning such complaints processes are also unclear. We acknowledge that this work is underway, but we consider that the Department must ultimately clarify the complaints pathway along with the roles and responsibilities of the various bodies involved in responses to child safety concerns. We consider that this information could be conveyed through an information diagram showing the complaint escalation, management and investigation pathways for child safety issues in the Department and associated governance and review arrangements. The diagram should be included in the complaints escalation, management and investigation policy that we recommend below, and be made available to health service users and the public.

Recommendation 15.16

1. The Department of Health should have a specific policy on responding to complaints and concerns about staff conduct. The policy should establish a complaints escalation, management and investigation process that is informed by the following principles:
    a. Complaints processes should be well-understood, trusted and accessible to staff, patients and others.
    b. Complaints processes should have clear escalation processes, internal and external reporting requirements within specific timeframes, and address immediate risks to children's safety.
    c. There should be appropriate scrutiny and oversight of how complaints about child safety are escalated to senior staff, managed and recorded.

d. Complaints about child safety should be recorded comprehensively and stored securely in incident management (such as the Safety Reporting and Learning System) and human resources systems.

e. Complaints about unprofessional conduct and boundary breaches with child patients should be recognised as indicating a patient safety issue and treated as serious.

f. Complaints data should support decision making and inform system improvements.

g. There should be appropriate communication and supports provided to those making complaints or affected by the alleged conduct, including through open disclosure processes (Recommendation 15.18).

2. The policy should include a diagram showing the complaints escalation, management and investigation pathways for child safety concerns and associated governance and review arrangements. It should also outline the roles and responsibilities of the various bodies involved in responding to child safety concerns.

3. This policy and diagram should be available to health service users and the public.

4.2 Staff disciplinary processes

Despite being one of the largest public sector agencies, the number of preliminary assessments and Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations conducted by the Department of Health between 2000 and February 2023 were the lowest across all three child-facing agencies we examined.[333] We describe the data we received from the Department relating to disciplinary processes taken against its staff in greater detail in Appendix H.

In this section, we discuss disciplinary processes and make recommendations for a reformed disciplinary process for child safety concerns and staff behaviour towards children, managed by a Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate. This is consistent with recommendations we make for a new Child-Related Incident Management Directorate in Chapter 6.

4.2.1 Receiving complaints and concerns about child safety and staff conduct

Irrespective of where a complaint or concern about child safety is raised, it should be reported to a central body, which should be staffed by people with child safeguarding expertise who can assess and triage complaints and concerns. We consider this function should be rolled into the Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate we recommend below. We have been told the intention is for the Child Safety and Wellbeing Service to 'work closely' with the Statewide Complaints Oversight Unit.[334]

4.2.2 Incident Management Directorate

In Chapter 6 on our recommendations for the way forward for children in schools, we describe the findings of the 2014 South Australian Report of the Independent Education Inquiry led by the Honourable Bruce Debelle AO KC (and often referred to as 'the Debelle Report'). The South Australian Government commissioned this Inquiry in response to the handling of an incident of child sexual abuse at a local school.[335] While this report was prepared with education settings in mind, it provides useful guidance to all organisations on how to respond effectively to complaints and incidents of child sexual abuse, including health services.

As part of implementing the Debelle Report, investigations into child sexual abuse in South Australian schools are now managed by a specialised Incident Management Directorate.[336] The South Australian Education Department has published guidelines that outline in some detail the steps to take after receiving a complaint of sexual misconduct against a staff member.[337] There is also a clear procedure for public disclosure processes when a staff member has been charged with child sexual abuse offences.

The Department should draw on insight from the Debelle Report when establishing the Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate and associated policies on mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations, open disclosure processes and a critical incident response plan (refer to Recommendations 15.12, 15.18 and 15.19).

We recognise that there may be features of the health service environment that call for a tailored approach in responding to and investigating complaints. An understanding of the health care context (and sometimes specialised clinical knowledge) may be required to consider and investigate complaints of child sexual abuse effectively, particularly where conduct occurs under the guise of a medical procedure or nursing care. For this reason, we do not specifically recommend that complaints about grooming, child sexual abuse and other related harms to children in health services be considered by the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate that we recommend be set up in Chapter 6. Rather, we consider the Tasmanian Government should consider the most appropriate model for managing complaints of this nature against health workers. This could occur by the Tasmanian Government electing to partner with the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate and ensuring the Directorate has access to specialist skills and knowledge relating to complaints in a health services context when required. Alternatively, the Tasmanian Government may decide a separate Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate is needed. If this is the case, it should be structured and operate consistently with the approach we recommend for the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, including having three arms of responsibility—for incident report management (including complaints and case management), investigations, and misconduct and disciplinary advice respectively. We briefly summarise these functions below, but further detail can be found in Chapter 6.

We recommend an incident report management arm, which would assess and triage the complaint or concern and determine how it should be managed, including whether a formal investigation is necessary. Any conflicts of interest that may arise in this process should be promptly identified, documented and dealt with. This arm of the Directorate should also:

- ensure compliance with the policy on responding to concerns and complaints about child safety issues and staff conduct
- ensure staff have made appropriate notifications to agencies including Ahpra and the National Boards, Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme, and act as liaison for these agencies regarding the complaint (such liaison must include seeking confirmation with agencies about whether and when the Department can initiate an investigation without compromising parallel criminal or regulatory investigations)
- ensure other agencies involved in a complaint about staff behaviour towards children (such as the new Commission for Children and Young People, the Health Complaints Commissioner or the Integrity Commission) receive any information they need to acquit their functions
- provide support and guidance, including through fit-for-purpose case management, to the relevant health service about: how any potential risks to patients can be managed while a complaint or concern is investigated; what information should be provided to different audiences (staff, patients and their families and the community) and when; ensuring affected children and young people (and their families and carers) are updated on the status of any complaint, receive appropriate support and can continue to safely receive the health care they need
- ensure all records about the complaint (and the staff member) are comprehensive, accurate and stored in incident management (such as the Safety Reporting and Learning System) and human resources systems.

Rather than human resources staff, the investigations arm of the Directorate should conduct or oversee investigations where sexual misconduct and professional boundary breaches related to children are alleged. Although the human resources team will not have a role in managing and investigating such matters, as noted above, we consider that human resources staff should be familiar with child safety policies so they can ensure any child safety concerns are appropriately responded to and referred when they arise.

Investigations of complaints should be undertaken by independent investigators who are trained and skilled in child development, child sexual abuse and trauma-related behaviours, and in interviewing vulnerable witnesses. Wherever possible, investigators should have knowledge and experience of the health services context.

Investigations should include the following processes:

- Complainants, their families and key witnesses should be invited to provide evidence or information if they choose to do so. If a decision is made to not contact a complainant or key witness, this should be explained and justified to the decision-maker (Head of Agency).
- Investigators should have access to the specialised and independent clinical knowledge or expert opinion required if a staff member argues that the behaviour subject to a complaint was legitimate clinical care.
- Once started, investigations should be undertaken promptly, and a clear and evidence-based report provided to legally trained adjudicators, who should then make recommendations to the relevant decision-maker (Head of Agency).

We consider some form of investigation should occur even if a staff member leaves the State Service. This investigation would need to determine the full extent of any possible open disclosure or mandatory reporting obligations and identify any necessary system improvements.

The misconduct and disciplinary advice arm should comprise staff who are trained to weigh evidence and assess compliance with procedural fairness requirements. Where a breach of the professional conduct policy, the State Service Code of Conduct or another associated departmental policy is found, this should be outlined in an investigation report provided to the Head of Agency, alongside any advice and recommendations.

Recommendation 15.17

1. The Department of Health should establish a separate Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate or partner with the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate (Recommendation 6.6) to respond to allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct by staff, breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct and professional conduct policies, and reportable conduct (as defined by the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023) in health services.

2. If the Department partners with the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, it should ensure the directorate has access to specialised advice to inform investigations against health services staff, particularly where allegations have arisen in the context of provision of health care.
3. If the Department establishes a new Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, it should mirror the functions and manner of operation reflected in the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, including having three distinct roles and skill sets covering incident response management, investigations, and misconduct and disciplinary advice.

4.3 Communicating with and supporting victim-survivors

A key element of an organisation's response to child sexual abuse is communicating with and supporting victim-survivors, their families and carers, and others affected by the abuse.

4.3.1 An effective open disclosure process

Under the National Standards, health services must implement a framework of open disclosure with patients, family members and carers in relation to critical incidents that occur in their health service and result in harm to a patient.[338]

An open disclosure process involves an honest discussion with a patient or carer 'about an incident that resulted in harm to the patient while receiving health care'.[339]

Adjunct Professor Picone told us that the key elements of an open disclosure process are:

a. an apology or expression of regret, which should include the words 'I am sorry' or 'we are sorry'
b. a factual explanation of what happened
c. an opportunity for the patient, their family and carers to relay their experience
d. a discussion of the potential consequences of the adverse event
e. an explanation of the steps being taken to manage the event and prevent recurrence.[340]

Adjunct Professor Picone also told us that the principles of open disclosure can be applied at the broader community level. In such circumstances, the principles are:

a. being open and honest about the fact that an incident has occurred
b. admitting fault for the error or set of circumstances as appropriate
c. making a very genuine apology to the affected persons and community

d. identifying what has been learnt from the error

e. advising the community about what is being done or will be done to address the problem

f. demonstrating to the community that the organisation is following through with its promises.[341]

We discuss how open disclosure can be applied at the community level in more detail below (refer to Section 5).

Adjunct Professor Picone said a health service cannot promise an incident will never happen again, but the community needs to see that it is working to resolve issues and is taking steps to prevent recurrence.[342]

The Debelle Report discussed the concept of 'responsible disclosure' for schools managing child sexual abuse allegations. It described responsible disclosure as providing factual information, at an appropriate time, to the various people who have been or may be affected by an event.[343] It notes that providing information after a critical incident or other crisis helps parents (in particular) to maintain their confidence in the institution. Such confidence can be 'greatly undermined' if important information is instead learned through the media.[344]

There was little evidence that the response of Launceston General Hospital to victim-survivors or potential victim-survivors of Mr Griffin's abuse followed best practice. Conversely, there was much evidence that the hospital attempted to manage the revelations of Mr Griffin's offending by restricting communication and the information provided to victim-survivors, former patients, and their families and carers.

Many of the elements of open disclosure (listed above) were missing from Launceston General Hospital's response to the community in 2019, 2020 and thereafter. It was only at our hearings that Mr Daniels, former Chief Executive of Hospitals North/North West, showed some empathy and understanding for the scale of suffering that had occurred at the hospital.[345]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks issued a public apology to victim-survivors, validating a widespread feeling that the Department and Launceston General Hospital had not reckoned with the scale of suffering:

> I am personally horrified by the lack of empathy, humanity and often a lack of trauma-informed approach by the Department and the Tasmanian Health Service to such devastating accounts of abuse from the victim-survivors who have shown immense courage to come forward.[346]

We consider that supports such as counselling should always be offered to patients and their families and carers as part of the open disclosure process.[347] People looking for support should be personally assisted to access this support rather than just provided with information about how to seek support themselves (that is, they should be provided with a warm referral to a service).

Recommendation 15.18

The Department of Health should ensure open disclosure processes for patients who experience child sexual abuse in health services and their families and carers that:

a. create a safe, trauma-informed pathway for victim-survivors, or others affected by an event, to receive clear and personalised information in response to their questions or concerns

b. facilitate appropriate notifications including to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 and the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency

c. make appropriate supports available to affected people, including victim-survivors, their immediate family and carers, where abuse is connected to the Department's health services, including warm referrals, with the person's consent, to trained and experienced child sexual abuse counsellors.

4.4 Developing and implementing a critical incident response plan

Child sexual abuse in an institution can trigger a trauma event felt by many.[348] The implications of this are discussed in Section 5. The sexual abuse of a child in a health service, particularly by a staff member who has worked in the service for a long time, can also be described as a critical incident for the purposes of workplace policies, procedures and protocols.

It is not uncommon for institutions to be unprepared and unsure about what to do when a critical incident occurs in the workplace.[349] Dr Kate Brady, Research Fellow, Community Resilience, Melbourne School of Population and Global Health, University of Melbourne, told us that those tasked with managing recovery following a critical incident may not be trained in crisis management and often do not have the skill set required to respond appropriately.[350] Dr Peter Rob Gordon OAM, a clinical psychologist specialising in trauma, emergencies and disasters, explained that a disturbing, tense and threatening event will place a person in a state of 'high arousal'.[351] When those responding to a critical incident enter a 'high arousal state' it can limit their ability to look at what has occurred systematically and morally, resulting in poor decision making.[352] He said that those tasked with responding may focus on strategies to limit liability, such as forbidding or inhibiting communication outside the institution, and not acknowledging what has happened or not apologising to those involved.[353]

The behaviours described by Dr Gordon were apparent in Launceston General Hospital's response to revelations about Mr Griffin. It is our view that the sheer scale of events connected to Mr Griffin overwhelmed the hospital's executive and management. We heard that managers did not feel equipped or supported to respond to these events. While some senior staff, such as Dr Renshaw, had previously confronted matters of child sexual abuse in their careers (for example, in response to Dr Tim), for most staff it was the first time they had to respond to such a crisis. Helen Bryan, former Executive Director of Nursing, Tasmanian Health Service North, told us that, while she did not agree that there was a lack of urgency from senior management in response to this critical incident, 'this was an incident or allegations that none of us had ever had to manage, experience, and we were navigating through an area that we were not familiar with'.[354] Sonja Leonard, former Nurse Unit Manager, Ward 4K, Launceston General Hospital similarly reflected that 'we were all in very uncharted waters and didn't have any knowledge, or experience, or training in how to deal with this'.[355]

In response to a question from Counsel Assisting our Inquiry about whether management could have done more to ensure greater transparency in the hospital's response, Janette Tonks, former Nursing and Midwifery Director, Women's and Children's Services, Launceston General Hospital said the following:

> Yes … but I also need to acknowledge that we were navigating an issue that—that most of us had never travelled before. We also had been traumatised and significantly affected by the events that had occurred. I think that everything we did was in good faith, we did what we thought at the time was in the best interest of the staff, as well as maintaining the police request about their investigation.
> It was extremely difficult to know what was the right thing and what was the wrong thing; there isn't actually a rule book around how you navigate through this particular type of issue.[356]

We heard expert evidence that poor responses to critical incidents can be averted by developing a clear and considered critical incident response plan that leaders can refer to in unprecedented or unanticipated situations. Dr Gordon told us that while health services may have policies, procedures and protocols in place to guide responses to critical incidents such as natural disasters, they are less likely to have explicit policies designed to promote recovery following human-caused traumatic events (that is, intentional acts at the hands of humans such as deliberate negligence or criminal offending) including child sexual abuse by a member of staff.[357] However, he indicated that policies that respond to these types of events can be developed.

In Chapter 14, Case study 3, relating to James Griffin, we find the lack of a coordinated and transparent response by Launceston General Hospital increased feelings of mistrust among hospital staff. Neither the Department nor Launceston General Hospital appear to have had a critical incident response plan in place at the time that Mr Griffin's offending became widely known. However, Mr Daniels indicated that the hospital had started work on critical incident stress management processes for staff and the community in response to the Hillcrest School tragedy, which occurred in December 2021.[358] Mr Daniels indicated that critical incident stress management processes could also apply in circumstances such as those involving Mr Griffin.[359]

In February 2023, Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that a department-wide 'Critical Incident Response Protocol' would be developed as part of the One Health Culture Strategy 2022–2027.[360] She said that the Critical Incident Response Protocol 'will align with the [Department's] overarching Health and Wellbeing program to provide guidance on what support is available, how it is arranged and monitored'.[361]

In our view, the Critical Incident Response Protocol should go further, acknowledging that it is currently under development.[362] Dr Brady told us that a critical incident response plan should draw on Australia's nationally endorsed principles for disaster recovery, which promote community care through psychological first aid.[363] The principles were developed by the Social Recovery Reference Group Australia and are available on the Australian Institute for Disaster Resilience's website.[364] They are: understanding the context; recognising the complexity; use community-led approaches; coordinate all approaches; communicate effectively; and recognise and build capacity.[365]

Dr Brady also highlighted the importance of good communication after collective trauma events, which typically requires regularly communicating with those affected about what is known, what is not known, what is being done and what people can do to help.[366]

Dr Gordon told us it is crucial that those responding to critical incidents seek assistance from people who are external to the institution and its associated organisations to support clear thinking and to form appropriate responses.[367]

Those responsible for responding to critical incidents in health services should have clear policies, procedures and protocols to support their decision making. These policies, procedures and protocols should outline the key steps to take in communicating with and supporting those affected by the incident.[368] We consider that other Tasmanian Government departments should also review whether they have appropriate policies, procedures and protocols in place.

Recommendation 15.19

The Department of Health should develop and implement a critical incident response plan for human-caused traumatic events where numerous staff and patients are affected, including serious child-related incidents. The response plan should:

a. identify who is responsible for leading the response to a critical incident and set out the applicable reporting arrangements

b. identify the steps to responding to a human-caused traumatic event (including incidents relating to child safety)

c. provide for external assistance from experts with training and expertise in crisis management

d. be based on best practice responses to traumatic events

e. provide for early communication of information about the event

f. provide psychological first aid to affected people

g. provide extra support from skilled psychologists on an 'as needed' basis to affected people

h. provide for information about other support services that can assist affected people

i. facilitate communication and support among affected people as a means of social support

j. provide for critical incident debriefing run by a neutral and trained expert where appropriate

k. provide for a review of the Department's response to the critical incident

l. provide for an evaluation of any actions to be implemented as part of the Department's response to the critical incident

m. provide for any lessons from a review or an evaluation of the Department's response to the critical incident, to be shared with the Secretaries Board to further inform responses to critical incidents across the whole of government.

5 Restoring trust

The Launceston community has been profoundly affected by child sexual abuse at Launceston General Hospital and how that abuse was managed. These impacts are manifest in submissions, witness testimony, sessions with a Commissioner and consultations.

There has been a significant and long-term loss of trust in health workers among some in the Launceston community, with some parents avoiding taking their children to Launceston General Hospital and some victim-survivors refusing health care because they feel unsafe in health services. Where victim-survivors have sought health care at Launceston General Hospital, many described the feelings associated with their past experiences of abuse being reactivated, which hospital staff were often not well equipped to mitigate. This is a significant public health concern.

A lack of consistent and transparent information from a health service about what is being done in the wake of child sexual abuse revelations can serve to create an information vacuum. In the case of Mr Griffin, insufficient communication by Launceston General Hospital—with victim-survivors, their families and carers, former patients, staff and the broader community—led to various theories and rumours, some of which were well founded and others that we have not been able to substantiate. More generally, the hospital's approach invited suspicion that it was, above all, trying to protect its reputation.

As already noted, Dr Brady told us that child sexual abuse (particularly on this scale) can become a collective trauma event requiring a response that promotes community care and the restoration of trust using principles of disaster recovery.[369] While it is always best to adopt this approach as quickly as possible after an event, experts assured us that it is never too late to start responding in ways that help a community to heal and regain trust.

Shortly after our first week of hearings relevant to Launceston General Hospital in June 2022, the Department took steps to address some of the issues that emerged from these hearings. These steps included conducting the Child Safe Governance Review and the Community Recovery Initiative. On 8 November 2022, the Tasmanian Parliament apologised to all victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions, including those connected with Launceston General Hospital.[370] These responses reflect a start, rather than an acquittal, of what is required to re-establish trust and goodwill in the Northern Tasmanian community.

The public release of our final report, which includes a range of information that has not yet been made public, may have a further unsettling effect on the community and will require a thoughtful and nuanced response from the hospital and the Department. There is a long road ahead.

In this section, we provide a summary of the evidence we heard from victim-survivors, their families and hospital staff about the loss of trust they have experienced following Launceston General Hospital's response to child sexual abuse, particularly the response to the 2019 revelations about Mr Griffin's offending.

We then consider the response of the hospital and the Department to this loss of trust and some of the Department's efforts towards restoring community trust in Launceston General Hospital and public health services more generally.

We recommend that Launceston General Hospital and Tasmania Police assist victim-survivors of child sexual abuse at the hospital on an ongoing basis.

5.1 The loss of trust

This section describes some of what we heard from victim-survivors, their families and supporters about the effects on them of alleged abuse at Launceston General Hospital, including how these events have impacted their overall trust in health services. We also describe some of what we heard about the psychological toll on staff at Launceston General Hospital following the hospital's manifestly deficient approach to responding to disclosures of abuse.

5.1.1 Victim-survivors' loss of trust in the health system and particularly Launceston General Hospital

Several witnesses described to us the trust that they placed in health workers to care for their children. For example, Kim (a pseudonym), whose daughter Paula (a pseudonym), was nursed by Mr Griffin at Launceston General Hospital, told us: 'We trusted the doctors and nurses, we trusted our children to LGH when they were at their most vulnerable'.[371]

Those whose trust has been undermined described an ongoing wariness and, at times, fear about seeking health care, particularly for their children.[372]

Several victim-survivors who experienced Mr Griffin's abuse also told us that their abuse had made them reluctant to seek health care for themselves or their children. One person who had experienced abuse by Mr Griffin said: 'I still feel uncomfortable going to LGH and hospitals in general because of what happened'.[373] Another victim-survivor said: 'Ever since the abuse, I have avoided hospitals and where I have required admission, I have discharged myself shortly after admission. I feel panic when I go near hospitals'.[374] Keelie McMahon, who also experienced abuse by Mr Griffin outside of the hospital, said: 'I shouldn't be putting my children's health on the line purely because I can't step foot in that hospital'.[375]

Michelle Nicholson, a community health social worker, suggested that the reluctance to access health services, as described by some of the witnesses to our Inquiry, is widespread. She told us that it was not uncommon for her clients to avoid seeking health care due to their past experiences.[376]

The effects of breaches of trust by health workers can also extend to other care arrangements. One family that participated in Launceston General Hospital's open disclosure process after their child (who has a disability) was identified in photographs found in Mr Griffin's possession, said:

> The long-term impact this has had on our family is significant. Our trust in others to care for [our child] is now very limited. We cannot bring ourselves to arrange overnight respite in supported accommodation facilities, even though we have been advised by other parents that the care is very good.[377]

We heard that mistrust in Launceston General Hospital has also resulted in people seeking care outside the region. Angela (a pseudonym) told us that she prefers to travel to Hobart to seek health care for her daughter (who has cerebral palsy) after receiving no response from Launceston General Hospital to a complaint she made about the care her daughter was receiving from nurses on Ward 4K, including Mr Griffin.[378] Angelique Knight, a former Ward 4K patient, told us that she, too, attends another hospital whenever possible. She said 'sometimes because of the complexities of my condition they send me to LGH. I dread going there every time'.[379]

Another victim-survivor who experienced abuse by Mr Griffin described going to significant lengths to avoid Tasmanian health services when her children need care. She said: 'When my children have had medical issues and a choice has existed around their treatment, I have made the decision to take them out of the state for treatment'.[380]

We heard from several witnesses that they avoid Launceston General Hospital because being there triggers the trauma of their abuse or otherwise makes them feel unsafe.[381]

One victim-survivor of Mr Griffin stated: 'My son was in hospital recently. I wanted to stay with him but felt unsafe being by myself. Hospital staff did not let my partner stay with me. This response failed to cater to my needs associated with the trauma of the abuse'.[382]

The Child Safe Governance Review reported that '[s]ome survivors perceived staff interactions with them, albeit well intentioned, as making them feel treated as "victims" in a notorious case of serial child abuse rather than as members of the community attending for health care'.[383]

While acknowledging these experiences and the importance of providing trauma-informed care to victim-survivors, Ms Nicholson advocated for individual hospital staff to not be left navigating responses to intergenerational trauma caused by sexual abuse. She said:

> … by and large the vast majority of health workers are doing the best they can in difficult and challenging understaffed circumstances where they are not provided with the necessary trauma informed care training … While on the surface it may look like people are failing to do their duty of care to survivors of historical trauma and children, I believe it is mainly not individuals but a flawed system that is the problem.[384]

The report of the Child Safe Governance Review, reflecting the views of the Lived Experience Expert Reference Group, states that any patient may have experienced prior trauma and therefore all patients should enjoy a level of care and sensitivity based on that assumption. We recommend in Chapter 19 that the Tasmanian Government should develop a whole of government approach to professional development in responding to trauma within government and government funded agencies that provide services to children, as well as statutory bodies that have contact with child sexual abuse victim-survivors (refer to Recommendation 19.2).

5.1.2 Loss of trust among Launceston General Hospital staff

Former and current Launceston General Hospital staff spoke to us about how the mismanagement of allegations of child sexual abuse at the hospital had affected them.

Maria Unwin, a former Ward 4K nurse, recalled that when she joined Launceston General Hospital in 1993, a colleague told her that a nurse had been caught in the act of sexually abusing a child on the ward during night shift. Ms Unwin stated:

> It was clear that when I started at the hospital some staff were still traumatised by this incident and how it had been handled. When it was discussed you could sense a level of fear from the people who were talking about it … When I heard the allegations I was shocked and felt sick. I was always shocked that even [when] someone was caught in the act of child sexual abuse they would only be moved on and that it would be covered up. I would never have expected this to be happening at the hospital in the 1990s.[385]

Kylee Pearn, a former hospital employee, told us that when Mr Griffin was allowed to remain on Ward 4K after she disclosed to human resources staff, in 2011 or 2012, that he had sexually abused her as a child, she 'couldn't cope'.[386] She left her social work role at the hospital and moved to a new role in a school.[387]

Annette Whitemore, a former Ward 4K nurse told us that the hospital's response to allegations against Mr Griffin contributed to her resigning from Ward 4K.[388]

We also heard that some staff were reluctant to seek health care from Launceston General Hospital because of the hospital's failure to effectively respond to allegations of sexual abuse against young patients.[389]

5.2 Launceston General Hospital's response to loss of trust

As outlined in Chapter 14, Case study 3, Launceston General Hospital offered open disclosure to some patients who were identified in photographs found in Mr Griffin's possession. The one family that took part in the open disclosure process expressed concerns about how this process was conducted, in particular:

- hearing about Mr Griffin's offending through a voice message left on their phone while they were at work
- whether they were told the truth that previous concerns raised with the hospital about Mr Griffin were not of a sexual nature
- not being offered counselling or follow-up support from Tasmania Police or the hospital.

The absence of clear communication from the hospital about the photographs found in Mr Griffin's possession has also left some former patients, and their families, wondering if the patients may have been in the cache of images seized by Tasmania Police.

As discussed in Chapter 14, Case study 3, after hearing details of Mr Griffin's offending on The Nurse podcast, Ms Knight recalled asking the hospital whether any of the photos found were of her and whether she could see them.[390] The hospital told her that only one patient had been identified from the photos.[391] Ms Knight said that the hospital 'did not explain the process that led to this identification or explain why I couldn't see [the photos] myself'.[392] She went on to explain:

> I don't know if James Griffin did take photos of me and that bothers me. He had plenty of opportunity. I showered in front of him. I was naked in his presence. If there were photos of me on his phone I would have been able to identify myself. I was really annoyed by all of this and it felt like [the hospital] was just brushing me off again. I felt like I was nothing and just a number …[393]

As becomes clear in Chapter 14, Case study 3, beyond the existence of the photographs, the hospital's executive was denying, internally and externally, that there was any connection between Mr Griffin's offending and hospital patients. This denial continued until our hearings when the extent of complaints against Mr Griffin and the experiences of former patients became more broadly known.[394]

Dr Renshaw, who was involved in the response to revelations about Mr Griffin, told us that he had turned his mind to communicating more broadly with potential victims, however:

> I considered the logistics of doing a mail-out to the families of every paediatric patient of the LGH over the previous 15 or so years were well beyond the resources available within the LGH. It was also a factor that there were periods when Griffin was not working at the LGH. I did consider approaching patients and their families who had been inpatients for longer than a specified period of time (for example, over a week or over a month) as being more likely to have been victims of Griffin. However, there was also the potential with such a blanket approach to cause unnecessary distress and anxiety to families whose children had no contact at all with Griffin during their hospital stay.[395]

As set out in Chapter 14, Case study 3, we also heard that some victim-survivors who contacted the hospital were given generic lists of phone numbers for psychological support.[396] While such resources can be useful, simply providing contact details for support services is not an appropriate response from an institution that has a duty to protect patients from harm.

We invited the leadership of Launceston General Hospital to reflect on what could be done to restore the trust of victim-survivors and staff of the hospital. Unfortunately, the responses we received suggested that restoring trust had not been the subject of any deep thought or reflection. Where suggestions were made, they tended to be superficial.[397]

It was clear to us that the hospital's leadership lacked a meaningful understanding of the impact that Mr Griffin's offending has had on victim-survivors, staff and the broader community, and that the leadership has failed to grasp the extent of the work required to restore trust. The hospital's leadership provided no evidence to suggest any insight that acknowledging the extent of Mr Griffin's offending, and providing information about how such offending continued for many years, are essential to restoring trust. We hope that our Commission of Inquiry and final report will provide some of these answers.

We accept that, due to poor records, failed memories, the absence of any witnesses and the reality that the full extent of Mr Griffin's abuse is unlikely to ever be known, Launceston General Hospital will not be able to answer every question and reassure every individual. However, the hospital has an obligation to do what it can to provide some clarity and closure to those who remain distressed or concerned about the implications of Mr Griffin's offending.

Launceston General Hospital's response to victim-survivors, their families and carers, staff and the broader community must not be a bureaucratic exercise. The hospital must consider the needs of known and as yet unknown victim-survivors and, as we recommend above (refer to Recommendation 15.18), make appropriate supports available to affected people including victim-survivors and their immediate family and carers, including warm referrals to trained and experienced child sexual abuse counsellors.

We consider that Launceston General Hospital and Tasmania Police have an ongoing obligation to help identify victim-survivors of Mr Griffin when requests emerge, or, if this is not feasible, to clearly explain why. We are aware that other jurisdictions are using advances in technology to identify victim-survivors in child sexual exploitation material.[398]

We also consider that any communications with the broader community following an incident, such as the potential sexual abuse of patients by a staff member at a hospital, should be informed by the principles of open disclosure applied at the community level, which we have outlined earlier (refer to Section 4.3).

Recommendation 15.20

1. The Department of Health, Launceston General Hospital and Tasmania Police should make clear that they will continue to assist, on an ongoing basis, known and as yet unknown victim-survivors of child sexual abuse by James Griffin related to the hospital and should nominate a contact person for people who have enquiries.
2. Assistance should include:
    a. outlining what is known about Mr Griffin's offending at the hospital
    b. taking steps to ascertain whether a person is or may be a victim-survivor of Mr Griffin's offending or clearly explaining why this cannot be done.
3. The Department and Launceston General Hospital's communications with known and as yet unknown victim-survivors of Mr Griffin and their families and carers and the broader community should be informed by the principles of open disclosure.
4. Launceston General Hospital should ensure victim-survivors and their families and carers who do not receive individual open disclosure (Recommendation 15.18) still receive a warm referral to trained child sexual abuse counsellors if desired.

6 The work of oversight agencies

In Chapter 13, we provided a brief overview of key agencies that oversee aspects of Tasmania's health system, including health practitioners and health services. These agencies include Ahpra, the National Boards and the Health Complaints Commissioner. A core role of these agencies is ensuring the safety of children and young people who receive health care.

In this section, we discuss the role of each agency and make observations about how these agencies might be made more effective in helping to protect the safety of children. In relation to Ahpra and the National Boards, we highlight a general lack of community awareness of their roles and functions. We consider that the recommendations we make above will address concerns about ensuring consistent information is provided to patients, including age-appropriate resources for children and young people and their families and carers (Recommendation 15.8), ensuring there are up-to-date policies on mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations, including for concerns about staff conduct (Recommendation 15.12), developing of a professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in health services (Recommendation 15.13) and strengthening professional development around child safety for different levels of staff (Recommendation 15.15).

In relation to the Health Complaints Commissioner, we highlight problems in its ability to fully perform its role and functions, and identify possible areas of improvement. We do not make recommendations about these improvements because we consider the new Commission for Children and Young People that we recommend be established (refer to Chapter 18) will be the peak oversight body responding to concerns about children and young people. We do, however, recommend a review of the Health Complaints Act to consider some of the problems we discuss.

6.1 Ahpra and the National Boards

Ahpra is the agency that administers the National Registration and Accreditation Scheme for health practitioners in Australia. It also provides administrative support to 15 National Boards, which carry out a range of functions for overseeing health practitioners registered across 16 health professions under the National Law.

6.1.1 Codes of conduct

Staff who are registered under one of the health professions recognised by the National Law must follow codes of conduct established by their respective National Board. These codes offer guidance on the expected standards of conduct for registered health practitioners that apply to health practitioners when they are delivering care and to their behaviour outside the workplace.[399] These codes require that health practitioners maintain professional boundaries with patients.[400]

Codes and guidelines that have been approved by the National Boards are admissible in disciplinary proceedings under the National Law. They can be used as evidence of what constitutes appropriate professional conduct or practice for a particular health profession.[401]

6.1.2 Notifications to Ahpra and the National Boards

The National Law provides for notifications to be made to Ahpra and the National Boards where the health, conduct or performance of a registered health practitioner poses a risk to the public.[402]

Registered health practitioners and their employers are mandated under the National Law to report a registered health practitioner if they form a reasonable belief that the practitioner has engaged in 'notifiable conduct'.[403] Notifiable conduct includes 'engaging in sexual misconduct in connection with the practice of a health profession'.[404] Examples of sexual misconduct include sexual activity with a current patient, making sexual remarks, touching patients in a sexual way, touching a patient in an intimate area without clinical indication and engaging in sexual behaviour in front of a patient.[405]

A health practitioner who forms a reasonable belief that another health practitioner has engaged in notifiable conduct and does not make a mandatory notification may be subject to regulatory action.[406]

In addition to mandatory notifications, any entity or person, including patients or members of the public, can make a voluntary notification about a health practitioner.[407] Voluntary notifications can be made to Ahpra and the National Boards on several grounds, including that the practitioner is or may not be a suitable person to hold registration in a health profession because they are not, for example, a fit and proper person to be registered in the profession.[408] A notification may also be about concerns that a practitioner's conduct is unprofessional, unlawful or below acceptable standards.[409]

6.1.3 Managing notifications involving sexual misconduct

Ahpra refers notifications about health practitioners to the National Boards.[410] The National Boards are empowered to take a range of steps in response to a notification, including:

- taking immediate action to stop a health practitioner from practising
- launching an investigation
- imposing registration conditions
- directing the practitioner to attend a health or performance assessment.[411]

Where there is enough evidence for a National Board to form a reasonable belief that child sexual abuse has occurred, the National Board will refer the matter to a responsible tribunal under the National Law.[412] In Tasmania, this tribunal is the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal.[413] After considering a matter, the tribunal may make a range of orders, including cautioning or reprimanding a practitioner, imposing conditions on their registration, imposing a fine, or suspending or cancelling the practitioner's registration.[414]

A strength of the National Registration and Accreditation Scheme is that it hosts a single database of all notifications and complaints made about registered health practitioners in Australia.[415] The national database records all notifications about registered health practitioners since the National Law began, irrespective of whether the notification was made to a National Board or to another health complaints entity (such as the Tasmanian Health Complaints Commissioner).[416] The database helps in assessing future complaints about registered health practitioners by enabling patterns of behaviour that have not otherwise resulted in disciplinary action to be identified—for example, repeated concerns about boundary violations.[417]

It is important for health services to have clear systems and processes in place that inform and guide staff about reporting to Ahpra and the National Boards.

6.1.4 Awareness of Ahpra and the National Boards

Despite Ahpra and the National Board's role in managing notifications about health practitioners, we identified through our Inquiry that staff, former patients and the community are not aware of their regulatory functions, nor of their ability and, in some cases, obligation, to make notifications to Ahpra and the National Boards under the National Law. In Chapter 14, Case study 3, relating to James Griffin, we find that Launceston General Hospital had no clear system, procedures or process in place to report complaints about James Griffin to external agencies.

In relation to staff at Launceston General Hospital, Ms Unwin told us that although she was aware of the obligation to report suspected abuse including mandatory reporting under child safety legislation, she had 'always been led to believe that evidence was required to make a complaint'.[418] She said it was not until 2020 that she became aware that she could have made a complaint to the former Tasmanian Nursing Board or Ahpra about Mr Griffin based on her concerns alone.[419]

Similarly, another former Ward 4K nurse, Annette Whitemore, said: 'We all knew we were mandatory reporters, and I don't think we were deliberately not told this, but until 2019 when all this happened … I never knew I could go straight to Ahpra'.[420] Will Gordon, Ward 4K nurse, told us that most nurses on Ward 4K did not realise they could report their colleagues to Ahpra.[421] He said: 'We just didn't know, we weren't told about it, there was no education about that sort of complaint process'.[422]

Dr Renshaw agreed that 'it was clear' staff at Launceston General Hospital were not aware of their mandatory reporting obligations under the National Law.[423] He confirmed that prior to the public revelation of events involving Mr Griffin, there was no training provided to staff about the National Law.[424]

In a statement to us, Matthew Hardy, National Director, Notifications, Ahpra, said:

> Information in relation to a health practitioner's mandatory notification obligations is widely available for health practitioners, and I would expect that registered health practitioners take reasonable steps to undertake self-directed learning to stay current with changes in their profession. Specifically, I would expect that health practitioners and students undertake a degree of training by employers or other entities, with that education supplemented by self-directed learning, including in relation to mandatory notification obligations established by their respective National Board or otherwise as published on Ahpra's website. National Boards mandate participation in annual Continuing Professional Development to facilitate this ongoing professional learning and development process.[425]

In relation to awareness of Ahpra and the National Boards among patients and the community, Ms Knight, a former Ward 4K patient, told us: 'I have never heard of the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation [Agency], even though I've spent so much of my life in hospitals'.[426] Another witness and victim-survivor said she ‘wasn’t aware of the existence of Ahpra as an independent body’ and, in their experience, ‘people generally aren’t aware of Ahpra like they are with the Ombudsman, Teachers Registration Board or the Integrity Commission’.[427] They said that had they known about Ahpra, they would have contacted the agency about Mr Griffin at the earliest opportunity.[428]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks described the Department’s promotion of Ahpra and the National Boards’ notification processes to patients as ‘limited’, adding that information is ‘more likely’ to be provided once a complaint is received.[429]

Mr Hardy told us that it was his expectation that ‘health consumers and the general public are aware of the existence of health professional regulation in Australia and that there are mechanisms by which complaints can be made’.[430] He said health consumers and the public can access Ahpra and the National Boards’ websites, which provide information on ‘accreditation, registration and notification systems’.[431]

We consider that more must be done to raise awareness about the role of Ahpra and the National Boards among health workers, patients and the broader community. Mr Hardy agreed that although Ahpra does not have a legislated educative role, as a model regulator, the organisation does have ‘an obligation to make sure that our practitioners are educated, that we engage with employers of those practitioners and that the community is aware of who we are and what we do’.[432]

Our Commission of Inquiry’s mandate does not extend to making recommendations to Ahpra or the National Boards. However, we hope that they increase their educational activities, particularly in relation to the ability of any member of the public to report concerns about the conduct of health practitioners.

The Department should ensure staff who are registered health practitioners are aware of their obligations under the National Law. This can be achieved through professional development and by implementing policies that outline what staff should do when they have concerns about a colleague who is a registered health practitioner. We make recommendations above about ensuring there are up-to-date policies on mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations, including for concerns about staff conduct, as well as strengthened professional development on child safety for different levels of staff (refer to Recommendations 15.12 and 15.15).

The Department can also play a role in increasing patient awareness of their rights to make a notification about a health practitioner to Ahpra and the National Boards by including this information in any documentation they produce about patients’ rights and expectations. We make a recommendation above about ensuring consistent information is provided to patients, including age-appropriate resources for children and young people and their families (refer to Recommendation 15.8).

6.2 Health Complaints Commissioner

In Chapter 13, we briefly discuss the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner under the Health Complaints Act. Richard Connock is the current Health Complaints Commissioner. Mr Connock is also the Tasmanian Ombudsman.

Mr Connock leads the Office of the Ombudsman and Health Complaints Commissioner. Together, these offices cover six separate jurisdictions—those of the Parliamentary Ombudsman, the Health Complaints Commissioner, the Energy Ombudsman, Right to Information, the Official Visitors Programs and the Custodial Inspectorate. Mr Connock referred to his Right to Information role as a 'de-facto' role.[433]

The relevant key functions of the Health Complaints Commissioner are:

- receiving, assessing and resolving complaints about Tasmanian health service providers in the public and private sectors
- inquiring into and reporting on matters related to health service providers and health services at the discretion of the Health Complaints Commissioner or at the direction of the Minister for Health.[434]

6.2.1 Complaints involving children and young people

The Health Complaints Commissioner can receive complaints from a parent or guardian of a child under 14 years of age, a person appointed by a child who is aged 14 years or older, or the child directly in circumstances where the Health Complaints Commissioner agrees the child is capable of lodging a complaint.[435]

Matters to note about the Health Complaints Commissioner's management of complaints involving children and young people and child sexual abuse include:

- Complaints are initially referred to Tasmania Police given the behaviour is potentially criminal in nature.[436]
- Complaints involving a health worker who is not registered under the National Law are considered and investigated by the Health Complaints Commissioner, but the Commissioner does not yet have any powers to impose sanctions on that worker.[437]
- Complaints about a health practitioner registered under the National Law are referred to Ahpra and the National Boards (discussed above).[438]
- The Health Complaints Commissioner has a memorandum of understanding with Ahpra that requires complaints to be managed collaboratively. Where a complaint relates to a registered health practitioner and the health service they work in, the complaint can be separated, with the Health Complaints Commissioner investigating the aspects of the complaint relating to the health service to identify broader systemic issues and Ahpra investigating the aspects relating to the individual practitioner.[439]

While we do not consider that the Health Complaints Commissioner should be the first port of call whenever there is a complaint of child sexual abuse within a health service, the Health Complaints Commissioner plays a unique and important role in identifying systemic risks to child safety within health care settings, particularly in relation to health services that do not do enough to address poor or unprofessional staff conduct.

6.2.2 Strengthening the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner

The Health Complaints Commissioner also has an important role in informing and empowering consumers, including children and young people, with respect to their health care rights and the options available to them when they are dissatisfied with or have concerns about their health care. The community should be aware of this role and benefit from these options.

However, the Health Complaints Commissioner faces barriers in effectively performing its legislative functions including a lack of public awareness about the Health Complaints Commissioner's role and inadequate funding.

6.2.3 The Health Complaints Commissioner's response to child sexual abuse in health services

Complaints made to the Health Complaints Commissioner cover a broad spectrum of issues, which vary in nature and degree of seriousness.[440] Mr Connock told us that although his office does not specifically monitor risks in relation to child sexual abuse, it is vigilant in responding to enquiries and complaints involving vulnerable groups and people.[441] He also told us his office had not received any complaints about child sexual abuse in health services throughout the period our Commission of Inquiry is examining (that is, since 2000).[442] However, his office has received complaints about the alleged sexual abuse of vulnerable adults in health services (refer to the Health Complaints Commissioner's report into Ward 1E, which is summarised in Chapter 13).[443]

While the Health Complaints Commissioner would not ordinarily be the first point of contact for those affected by child sexual abuse (in a way that the police or Child Safety Services may be), the absence of any complaints about child sexual abuse is surprising, particularly given how enduring the complaints and concerns were about Mr Griffin and Launceston General Hospital's response.

Mr Connock acknowledged that not receiving complaints about these matters means his office does not have insight into the extent of systemic issues relevant to child safety.[444] He said the absence of complaints connected to child sexual abuse may be because of:

- a lack of awareness among health service users and the community in general of the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner and the Ombudsman, as well as the ability to make notifications to Ahpra and the National Boards

- the Health Complaints Act and Ombudsman Act 1978 being unable to guarantee anonymity in relation to complaints
- reluctance to make complaints due to fear of reprisals.[445]

6.2.4 Funding the Health Complaints Commissioner

Mr Connock told us that most of his office's resources are dedicated to complaints handling, conciliation and resolution.[446] Data shows that the number of complaints the Health Complaints Commissioner receives has increased considerably since 2019–20. Most recently, in 2021–22, the Health Complaints Commissioner received 769 complaints, up from 440 complaints in 2020–21.[447] These figures do not include enquiries made or notifications received from Ahpra and the National Boards, which accounted for another 541 contacts in 2021–22 and 625 contacts in 2020–21.[448]

Mr Connock told us that the health complaints jurisdiction had historically been underfunded.[449] A review of the Health Complaints Act, completed in 2003, identified funding as a key issue affecting the health complaints jurisdiction. The review concluded that 'the Commissioner's office had been under-resourced since it was first established'.[450] Underfunding is also referenced across several of the Health Complaints Commissioner's annual reports.[451]

Mr Connock also described to us the effects of having very few staff:

> In the past, low staff numbers in the Health Complaints jurisdiction had not only an adverse impact on the time taken to resolve complaints but also, with a necessary focus on complaint resolution, resulted in an inability to perform other functions prescribed under the [Health Complaints] Act. These include things such as: education on health rights; building complaint resolution capacity in providers; auditing improvements to health services and conducting own motion investigations.[452]

All these functions—education on health rights, building health services' capacity in relation to complaints handling, auditing and investigations—are important to ensuring health services protect consumers, including children.

Mr Connock told us that a lack of funding is a key barrier to his office's ability to improve complaints handling procedures in Tasmanian health services.[453] While his office provides feedback to health services about how complaints might be better handled in the course of day-to-day management of health complaints, Mr Connock explained that he has not been able to exercise his broader functions in educating health services on how to manage complaints internally because 'we've got so many complaints; we're really just dealing with those'.[454] Mr Connock also indicated that there have been occasions when he would have undertaken more substantive investigations but did not have the funding and staff available to do so.[455]

Mr Connock told us that the Office of the Ombudsman began receiving extra three-year funding in 2021 to be spread across all six jurisdictions of the Office of the Ombudsman and Health Complaints Commissioner identified above. This was the first increase to funding the Office of the Ombudsman and Health Complaints Commissioner had received since 2014 (apart from dedicated funding for the Right to Information jurisdiction in 2019).[456]

Mr Connock said he was 'hopeful' but 'hesitant' to say that the increased funding, which was significant, would enable the Office of the Health Complaints Commissioner to adequately perform its legislated functions. He noted that the increased funding will 'certainly be a vast improvement' but '[the Office] will just have to see how we go' because an increase of this scale had not occurred before.[457] He did, however, indicate that the funding would 'make a meaningful change' to the performance of functions across all jurisdictions, including the health complaints jurisdiction.[458]

6.2.5 Appointing a separate Health Complaints Commissioner

The Health Complaints Act permits a person who holds the position of Ombudsman to also be appointed to the position of Health Complaints Commissioner.[459] Mr Connock was appointed to the role of Ombudsman and Health Complaints Commissioner in July 2014. He told us that, since the Office of the Health Complaints Commissioner was established in 1997, both appointments have always been held by the same appointee.[460]

The 2003 review of the Health Complaints Act identified distinct advantages in amalgamating review bodies. These advantages included the ability to offer the community the same range of review services present in larger jurisdictions, as well as cost savings associated with salaries, shared premises and shared administrative and infrastructure support.[461]

Since the review, the Ombudsman's roles have greatly increased. Mr Connock said that with responsibilities for six jurisdictions, he only dedicates about one day a week to the performance of the Health Complaints Commissioner role.[462] All other Australian states (although not territories) have appointed a separate Health Complaints Commissioner (or Director, as is the case in Western Australia).[463]

Mr Connock also referred to the potential for conflicts of interest to arise when the Ombudsman is investigating the administrative actions of the Health Complaints Commissioner. He said:

> There have been issues recently in the past with potential conflict of interest because, as Ombudsman, Health Complaints Commissioner comes within my jurisdiction, so we have had complaints against the Health Complaints Commissioner. We've managed that, it's not been— there has not been a problem, but the perception is there and the capacity for conflict.[464]

6.2.6 Code of conduct for unregistered health workers

Health services often employ registered and unregistered health workers. The conduct of registered health practitioners is subject to Ahpra and National Board oversight. A National Board must refer registered health practitioners located in Tasmania to the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal where it reasonably believes the practitioner has behaved in a way that constitutes professional misconduct.[465] Our case studies primarily focused on nurses and doctors who are registered in this way.

There is currently no similar professional misconduct process for health workers in Tasmania who are not registered under the National Law.

Health workers who are not registered under the National Law include counsellors, social workers, massage therapists, dietitians, speech pathologists, naturopaths, alternative therapists, personal care attendants and pharmacy assistants.[466] People in these roles often have contact, including close physical contact, with children and enjoy significant community trust. These factors can increase the risks of child sexual abuse.

A complaint can be made to the Health Complaints Commissioner about a health worker who is not registered under the National Law. The Commissioner may investigate and make recommendations in relation to such a complaint, but the Commissioner does not have any disciplinary powers to impose sanctions on the worker.[467] Unregistered health workers who are employed in the State Service are subject to Employment Direction processes (discussed in Chapter 20) or may also face consequences associated with losing, or not obtaining, their registration to work with vulnerable people, including children. However, the Health Complaints Commissioner has no ability to ensure these processes are followed.[468] Because unregistered health workers are not overseen by Ahpra or any National Board, there is a regulatory gap for this group.

In June 2013, at a meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Standing Committee on Health, Australia's health ministers agreed in principle to establish the National Code of Conduct for Unregistered Health Care Workers ('the Code').[469] Drafting the Code was also agreed at a meeting of the former Council of Australian Governments' Health Council in 2015.[470] Each Australian state and territory is responsible for giving effect to the Code.[471] Regimes have been introduced in New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia and Victoria.[472] The Tasmanian Parliament passed amendments to the Health Complaints Act to implement the Code in 2018, but no date has been set for them to begin.[473] The Health Complaints Commissioner will be responsible for administering the Code in Tasmania.[474]

The Code outlines minimum standards of conduct and practice for unregistered health workers who provide a health service.[475] Implementation of the Code in Tasmania will allow the Health Complaints Commissioner to act against unregistered health workers who fail to comply with the standards of conduct and practice set out in the Code. The Health

Complaints Commissioner will have powers to make public warning statements and publish prohibition orders in relation to unregistered health workers who have breached the Code and who pose a risk to public health and safety, including to children.[476]

Mr Connock told us that the administration of the Code will be different from the work his office currently undertakes.[477] He described the Health Complaints Commissioner becoming 'in effect, the equivalent of Ahpra for unregistered practitioners' and that investigations 'required to justify the making of prohibition orders and public statements will be more in the nature of a prosecution than an investigation'.[478] In his 2021–22 annual report, Mr Connock observed that any complaints related to the Code 'would mean an added strain on resources that are already stretched' and require 'extensive modifications to our case management system to accommodate workflows related to the administration of the Code'.[479]

6.2.7 Review of the Health Complaints Act

At the time of establishing the Health Complaints Commissioner in 1997, the role was modelled on health complaints entities in Victoria and Queensland.[480] These entities focused heavily on resolving and conciliating complaints.[481] Mr Connock told us that, as a result, the Health Complaints Commissioner in Tasmania has traditionally dedicated most of its time to conciliating rather than investigating complaints.[482]

The role of health complaints entities in other Australian jurisdictions has since evolved to become 'more of a watchdog' body.[483] The Health Complaints Act has not, however, been reviewed or updated to reflect this more contemporary role, nor has it been substantially reviewed since the National Registration and Accreditation Scheme began in 2010.

When the Health Complaints Act first began, it contained a provision requiring the Health Complaints Commissioner to review the Act three years after its commencement and at five-year intervals thereafter.[484] This provision was repealed by the Justice and Related Legislation (Miscellaneous Amendments) Act 2006.[485]

Mr Connock told us that the Health Complaints Act had only been the subject of one legislative review, which, as noted above, was published in 2003.[486] This review resulted in 35 recommendations, including in relation to the early resolution of complaints, the Commissioner's powers of investigations, the appointment of a separate Health Complaints Commissioner, increased responsiveness to the needs of the community and resource allocation. Most of the report's recommendations were incorporated into the Health Complaints Amendment Act 2005.[487]

6.2.8 Our observations

In our view, it is unsatisfactory that the Health Complaints Commissioner appears unable to perform its legislated functions appropriately due to a lack of funding and resources.

Given what has emerged about Launceston General Hospital's inability to respond to and manage complaints from health service users and staff in relation to child sexual abuse, there is an urgent need to resource the Health Complaints Commissioner to provide education to the community about its role and to undertake capacity-building work in health services about internal complaints management processes. The Health Complaints Commissioner must also be equipped to undertake investigations when needed. Ensuring health services are safe and trusted is an important contribution to public health objectives and will contribute to keeping children safe from harm.

The current time dedicated to performing the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner (estimated by Mr Connock as the equivalent of one day a week) is inadequate and should be increased.[488] Performing the role with such little time cannot ensure sufficient oversight of the health complaints jurisdiction or the effective acquittal of the Health Complaints Commissioner's legislated functions so far as they relate to complaints connected to child sexual abuse.

The potential for conflicts of interest to arise between the Ombudsman and the Health Complaints Commissioner in circumstances where the Ombudsman is investigating the administrative actions of the Health Complaints Commissioner is also an issue that must be addressed to ensure the community can have confidence in the exercise of functions with respect to each role. A Health Complaints Commissioner who is separate from the Ombudsman should be appointed.

A need for more funding also arises from the expected implementation of the Code of Conduct for Unregistered Health Care Workers. Implementing the Code would be a significant step to address a current gap in oversight by improving responses to the conduct of health workers who pose a risk to children and young people and who are not currently captured by existing regulatory schemes. However, implementing the Code will result in more responsibilities for the Health Complaints Commissioner and an added strain on already stretched resources. The Tasmanian Government must ensure the Health Complaints Commissioner has the resources to implement and administer the Code.

In our view, the issues we raise would be best addressed through a comprehensive review of the Health Complaints Act and the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner. We understand the Health Complaints Commissioner secured funding for a consultant to complete a review of the Act by the end of the previous financial year (2022–23).[489] This review may prove a useful first step towards modernising the Act.

We consider that with the introduction of the new Commission for Children and Young People (refer to Chapter 18) and the implementation of the Reportable Conduct Scheme under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act (also discussed in Chapter 18), most concerns about child sexual abuse and related matters in health services will be within the jurisdiction of the new Commission for Children and Young People. We view this new Commission as the primary oversight body for the safety of children and young people in Tasmania. We also consider professional regulation of unregistered health workers a priority because they are a cohort that often provides services to children.

Recommendation 15.21

The Tasmanian Government should ensure a review of the Health Complaints Act 1995 is completed and considers the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner in relation to:

a. addressing systemic issues within health services related to child safety

b. incorporating the administration, monitoring and oversight of the Code of Conduct for Unregistered Health Care Workers

c. coordinating with the role of the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6), and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023.

7 Conclusion

The case studies our Commission of Inquiry considered make clear the enormous suffering caused to victim-survivors, their families and staff, as well as the far-reaching adverse impacts on the broader community and the health system overall, when health services fail to:

- appreciate the risks of abuse to children and young people
- prioritise the safety and wellbeing of children and young people
- respond appropriately to risks and disclosures of harm.

The recommendations we outline in this chapter, and the reforms the Department has recently adopted, represent the beginning, not the end, of the Department's efforts to safeguard children and young people in health services. Keeping children and young people safe is not a one-off endeavour, but a process of continuous improvement that must be informed by children and young people, victim-survivors, independent experts and health workers, including those who have worked tirelessly to advocate for children's safety. Current and future leaders and senior managers at the Department and Launceston General Hospital must be up to this task.

We wish to emphasise that all Tasmanian health services, not just Launceston General Hospital, should reflect on their own child safe practices and closely consider the findings and recommendations in this volume. The issues identified at Launceston General Hospital can, and no doubt do, occur in other health services. We would like all health services to benefit from implementing our recommendations.

We once again recognise the hard-working people in Tasmania's health services, the great majority of whom always seek to act in the best interests of children and young people and ensure their safety. We again express our profound appreciation to the many victim-survivors, their families, current and former staff, advocates and others who contributed to our Commission of Inquiry. We acknowledge your suffering and pay tribute to your efforts to bring incidents of abuse, and the broader matters at Launceston General Hospital, to the public's attention, motivated by a desire for justice and to ensure other children and young people do not have to experience the same trauma. We also recognise former patients and their families and carers who have experienced abuse at Launceston General Hospital or in other Tasmanian health services, and those who may have chosen, for a range of reasons, not to come forward.

The commitment of many who spoke with us about improving the safety of all children and young people in health services was palpable. We trust that this will translate into meaningful and long overdue change in Tasmanian health services.

Introduction to Volume 7

In this volume—Volume 7—we look specifically at the role the criminal and civil justice systems, including redress schemes, play in responding to child sexual abuse. We examine how these systems might better serve victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in government institutions. The two chapters in this volume discuss the criminal and civil systems in turn. We note that while the former is focused on holding individual perpetrators to account and the latter has a broader focus on institutional accountability, they are not mutually exclusive options for victim-survivors seeking recourse for child sexual abuse.

In Chapter 16, we consider recent reforms to criminal justice responses to child sexual abuse in institutional settings and what further reforms are needed. While the criminal justice system is an important mechanism for holding perpetrators of child sexual abuse to account, it is an adversarial system. It is not always equipped to respond to the complex and sensitive issues that arise for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. However, there are many ways the system's limitations can be alleviated. For this reason, we make recommendations directed at:

- police specialisation
- training and professional development for the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions
- improving the law (noting significant and welcome change has already been achieved)
- improving rules of evidence and court procedures
- improved monitoring of the performance of the justice system in relation to child sexual abuse.

In Chapter 17, we assess the effectiveness of the three main pathways available in Tasmania to victim-survivors seeking recompense from the State for the sexual abuse they suffered as children. These pathways are the National Redress Scheme, civil litigation and victims of crime compensation. Relevant to our assessment of these pathways is a consideration of the accessibility of information and records the Government and its institutions hold. In this chapter, we also consider the importance to victim-survivors of receiving a personal apology for the sexual abuse perpetrated against them in government institutions. We make recommendations to ensure:

- redress options are available to victim-survivors into the future
- Government lawyers take a trauma-informed approach to managing settlement processes in child sexual abuse cases

- victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts can access their records
- rights for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse are increased under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1976
- victim-survivors receive an apology from the Government if they request one.

16 Criminal justice responses

A note on language

In other chapters of our report, we generally use the terms victim-survivor and perpetrator or abuser. However, in this chapter, we also use the terms complainant, accused person, alleged offender and offender because they have particular meanings in the criminal justice system. A reference to victim-survivors is a reference to child and adult victim-survivors, unless otherwise specified.

We use the terms Director of Public Prosecutions ('DPP') and Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions ('ODPP') to distinguish between the individual officeholder and the office.

We also use the terms 'police officer' when referring to a 'sworn' police officer and 'member' or 'members' to capture police officers as well as staff who work for police but are not police officers.

1 Introduction

This chapter focuses on criminal justice responses to child sexual abuse in institutional settings and considers whether reform is needed.

Where child sexual abuse occurs and is reported to police, the criminal justice system may apply. Victim-survivor perceptions of how people in that system respond to complaints can influence whether they disclose the abuse. And the assumptions, practices and structures in the system may affect whether victim-survivors who do make reports to police will have their reports taken seriously and investigated. The criminal justice system provides one of the few ways to hold perpetrators to account and is an important means of disrupting future offending by these abusers.

The National Royal Commission released a standalone report on the criminal justice system in August 2017. The report noted that the criminal justice system is often seen as ineffective in responding to sexual violence, including child sexual abuse.[1] The National Royal Commission made 85 recommendations for criminal justice reform. Tasmanian criminal justice agencies have implemented many of these recommendations, including to introduce a Witness Intermediary Scheme pilot and new provisions in the Evidence Act 2001 ('Evidence Act') to make it easier for children to give evidence. We commend the Tasmanian Government for making these significant reforms.

During our Inquiry's consultations, sessions with a Commissioner and hearings, we heard from victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse about their experiences with the criminal justice system. While some people who spoke to us described sensitive responses, others described practices and behaviour that they felt had exacerbated their trauma. Some of these criticisms came from victim-survivors who had been complainants in child sexual abuse cases prior to recent reforms to the criminal justice system. Other criticisms were made by people with a more recent experience of the criminal justice system, some of whose concerns had not been addressed by the changes.

As part of our Inquiry, we have considered the extent to which legal and procedural reforms made in Tasmania during the past decade or so, including those based on the National Royal Commission's recommendations, have improved the way the criminal justice system deals with child sexual abuse. As we explain in this chapter, the fact that some people continue to describe the criminal justice system as insensitive and traumatic suggests that more needs to be done.

Of course, some principles that underpin the system may render its processes difficult for victim-survivors, irrespective of reform. These include the right of the accused person to remain silent, procedural requirements designed to ensure a fair trial, and the nature of the adversarial system, which requires the evidence of victim-survivors to be tested. A consistent concern that victim-survivors of child sexual abuse express is that, while the accused person has the right to remain silent, the victim-survivor is often subjected to extensive, vigorous, personal and at times degrading cross-examination. Victim-survivors are often retraumatised by the telling and retelling of their story while preparing for trial and through cross-examination, and by the consequences of an acquittal.[2] Acquittal is often claimed to constitute 'exoneration' of an accused person, whereas it is, in fact, a finding that the offence has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt.

We sympathise with these critiques of the criminal justice system as they relate to child sexual abuse, but—given our terms of reference—we do not address the broader criminal justice system in this chapter. Instead, we focus on reforms that will help victim-survivors in that system. For some victim-survivors, a redress or civil claim may be preferred or may be more appropriate than relying on the criminal justice system. We discuss redress and civil systems in Chapter 17.

We acknowledge that legal and procedural reforms alone will not necessarily improve the criminal justice experience of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. As long ago as 1998, a Tasmanian task force on sexual assault and rape observed that:

> Law reform is capable of modifying practices and making the process more tolerable for victims. The law can also have an educative effect in terms of attitudinal change in the community. However, it is important to be clear sighted about the impact of changes to legislation without corresponding changes to awareness of the issues within the legal system and in the wider community. Until educational and attitudinal change strategies modify community belief systems, perpetrators will continue to break the law without fear of penalty and victims will continue to lack credibility in the courts and have little confidence in the justice system.[3]

These observations are particularly relevant for crimes involving child sexual abuse in institutions that the community trusts to care for children. Such behaviour was often ignored until the National Royal Commission made its shocking findings about the prevalence of institutional child sexual abuse and the failures of institutions and governments to prevent or respond to such abuse. Our Inquiry has shown that child sexual abuse in institutions is not solely historical.

In this chapter, we explain police and prosecution responses to child sexual abuse cases and highlight areas where we consider more reform is needed. Our recommendations in this chapter consider the fact that Tasmania is a small jurisdiction with limited resources.

Although our Inquiry focuses on child sexual abuse in institutional settings, our recommendations will naturally have an impact on child sexual abuse that occurs in other contexts.

2 Overview of the criminal justice system

This section summarises the key stages in the Tasmanian criminal justice system as they relate to child sexual abuse offence cases. The chapter includes more detail on each stage when it is discussed in relation to a recommendation.

The criminal justice process starts when an offence is reported to, or detected by, police. Police then decide whether to investigate the offence. If they do investigate, they are then responsible for conducting that investigation. In the case of child sexual abuse offences, the investigation typically involves interviewing the accused person, the complainant and any other witnesses. If police gather enough supporting evidence, they may arrest and charge the accused person.

In child sexual abuse offence cases, police typically receive advice from the ODPP about whether an accused person should be charged with an offence. Pre-charging advice that recommends charges not proceed reflects the prosecutor's judgment that there is no reasonable prospect of conviction and not their judgment about whether the alleged behaviour occurred.[4] The willingness or ability of a complainant to give evidence at trial can often be a key consideration when making this recommendation.

Child sexual abuse offence cases are generally heard in the Supreme Court. The ODPP prosecutes these cases. The ODPP also prosecutes some indecent assault matters in the Magistrates Court where the accused person elects to have the matter dealt with summarily (under section 72 of the Justices Act 1959). During the hearing of an indecent assault charge in the Magistrates Court, the accused person may be committed to the Supreme Court in certain circumstances, including if a magistrate considers that the charge should be dealt with in the Supreme Court.[5] The ODPP also prosecutes summary child exploitation material offences under the Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Enforcement Act 1995 ('Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Enforcement Act') in the Magistrates Court.

A victim-survivor may be asked to help prosecute the case, which will normally involve giving evidence about what they experienced. The ODPP provides a Witness Assistance Service to support victim-survivors in giving evidence and understanding the court process.

If an accused person pleads not guilty to a child sexual abuse offence, a trial will be held in the Supreme Court before a judge and jury (or in some cases in the Magistrates Court before a magistrate). Tasmania recently introduced legislation to allow for judge-alone criminal trials, which began on 8 June 2022.[6] At the trial, the Crown (represented by a prosecutor from the ODPP) represents the State and a defence lawyer generally represents the accused person.

When a case is heard before a judge and jury, the judge will decide what evidence the jury can hear. The judge will direct the jury about the legal principles it must apply in deciding whether the accused person is guilty or not guilty. If the jury finds the accused person guilty, the judge decides the sentence. If the jury finds the accused person not guilty, the accused person is acquitted of the offence(s) with which they were charged. Although the Attorney-General can appeal against an acquittal on a question of law in some circumstances, this occurs rarely.[7]

When a person pleads guilty or is found guilty, the court has a sentencing hearing. Again, both the Crown and the defence lawyer will make submissions to the trial judge. Facts that are in dispute may result in another hearing.

A victim-survivor may choose to make a victim impact statement, which they can read out at the sentencing hearing or have read out by the prosecutor. At the end of the sentencing hearing, the judge summarises the facts or makes findings of fact, imposes a sentence and outlines the reasons for the sentence. In Tasmania, the maximum sentence that can be imposed for a child sexual abuse offence is 21 years' imprisonment.[8]

A person who has been sentenced can appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal (a division of the Supreme Court) against the conviction, against the sentence imposed or against both the conviction and sentence. The Crown can appeal against a 'not guilty' decision on a question of law or fact, or against a verdict (with the Court's permission) in cases tried by a single judge, or against a sentence in all cases.[9]

3 Police responses

Police are often the first point of contact with the criminal justice system for victim-survivors. Sometimes police will be the first to receive a disclosure of child sexual abuse. How police respond is often highly influential in determining how a victim-survivor views the criminal justice system and their willingness to seek a criminal justice response.[10]

Police decisions, including whether and to what extent to investigate a reported crime, are also critical in determining how a matter proceeds. Police failure to prioritise and act on a report of child sexual abuse can have an enormous impact on the quality of evidence they find.

In this section, we outline recent changes Tasmania Police has made to improve the way it deals with child sexual abuse cases. We go on to discuss opportunities for reforms relating to:

- establishing specialist police units
- building trust with particular communities
- improving professional development

- making reporting easier
- conducting effective investigations
- implementing complaints and oversight mechanisms.

Opportunities to improve police coordination and information sharing with other agencies are discussed in Chapter 19 and Chapter 21.

Police can play an important role in disrupting child sexual exploitation and abuse, particularly for vulnerable children such as those in out of home care. We discuss disruptive policing in out of home care in Chapter 9.

3.1 Recent police reforms and initiatives

Tasmania Police told us that it has significantly changed its policies and procedures for investigating child sexual abuse in the past two years. This section outlines those changes.

The National Royal Commission explored issues on how police can:

- encourage reporting
- conduct effective investigations and interviews
- maintain trust and continuity with victim-survivors
- ensure appropriate charging decisions.[11]

The National Royal Commission made several recommendations relating to police, including Tasmania Police.

Tasmania Police has accepted most of these recommendations. Of those it has accepted all are completed or in progress, though some are part of ongoing capacity building and workforce development.[12] Tasmania Police's primary response to the recommendations has been to make extensive changes to the section on sex crimes in the Tasmania Police Manual. The manual now offers clearer guidance to police officers on how they should respond to, and investigate, complaints of sexual assault and abuse.[13]

Tasmania Police informed us that it began an internal review on 30 November 2020 to examine police interactions relating to James Griffin.[14] This review found deficiencies, including interagency coordination, information sharing, legislative barriers and investigative shortcomings.[15] We discuss this review in the James Griffin case study (refer to Chapter 14). In summary, the review found that:

- Following a report about Mr Griffin in 2011, there was no record that the police investigator searched the police intelligence system, which would have revealed a report about Mr Griffin from 2009.[16]
- Following a report about Mr Griffin in 2013, there was no record that the police investigator searched the police intelligence system, which would have revealed the previous two reports.[17]
- There were deficiencies in the management of information received by Tasmania Police from the Australian Federal Police in 2015 relating to Mr Griffin's sexual offending and possession of child exploitation material.[18] This matter has been the subject of a Professional Standards investigation, and the police officers involved have been disciplined.[19]

On the public release of the findings of its review on 21 February 2021, Tasmania Police committed to setting up a specialist investigative and policy team to focus on improving police procedures for child sexual abuse cases.[20]

Darren Hine AO APM, former Commissioner, Tasmania Police, told us that the recommendations from the review have led to significant change in the way police respond to child sexual abuse.[21] He stated that Tasmania Police has sought to improve information sharing between agencies by creating the Tasmania Police Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines. It has also entered various memorandums of understanding, including the 2021 Keeping Children Safe Memorandum of Understanding between the Children Safety Service (in the former Department of Communities) and Tasmania Police (in the Department of Police, Fire and Emergency Management), to ensure prompt and efficient information sharing.[22]

The Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines, which came into force on 23 July 2021, guides the response of police officers when they receive a report of child sexual abuse. The guidelines include information about how to manage forensic evidence, notifications and referrals. They also outline the minimum requirements of police officers prior to them filing a report of child sexual abuse, which are to:

- contact the reporting person
- make every effort to establish the victim's identity (if unknown) and to assess and investigate the report
- conduct a thorough examination of Tasmania Police databases
- request cross-agency and interstate checks to see whether intelligence held outside Tasmania may assist the investigation

- provide contact details of the investigating police officer to the victim-survivor and/or parent, guardian or, where appropriate, other support person
- have a supervisor confirm that the above actions have been taken.[23]

On 26 February 2021, the Tasmanian Government launched its Historic Complaints Review Process within Tasmania Police.[24] This review concluded in January 2022. The Child Sexual Abuse Joint Review Team, a multi-agency team, sought to identify potential perpetrators of child sexual abuse where there may be unlinked reports or references across agencies relating to a person.[25]

The Tasmanian Government is also setting up two multidisciplinary centres to co-locate family and sexual violence support services and specialist police investigators.[26] Pilot programs are to start in Launceston and Hobart.[27] Media reports suggested the pilot programs would start in mid-2023.[28] We discuss multidisciplinary ('Arch') centres in Chapter 21. In this chapter—Chapter 16—we focus on the relationship between multidisciplinary centres and police specialisation, which we discuss in Section 3.2.2.

3.2 Opportunities for other police reforms

3.2.1 What we heard about police

The criminal justice system only works if victim-survivors feel comfortable coming forward and making a complaint to police. It is vital that police are seen as a trusted avenue to seek help. They must communicate to victim-survivors with respect and ensure victim-survivors feel supported.

In submissions, consultations, sessions with a Commissioner and hearings, victim-survivors reported varied experiences with police. The experience of a victim-survivor not only affects them (and possibly others affected by the matter they are reporting) but might also influence the decision of others (such as family or friends) to report crimes.

Some victim-survivors described positive experiences with police. One victim-survivor of child sexual abuse told us that the police officer investigating her case had gone 'above and beyond' to make sure the investigation was thorough and timely and that she felt supported.[29] Leah Sallese, a victim-survivor, told us that the police officer investigating her case was 'amazing' and 'treated me with respect, care and kindness'.[30] She said:

> I don't know if everyone has the same experience with Tasmania Police, but I feel lucky to have had the right detectives there to bat for me. My positive experience with the police was a key reason I ended up pursuing criminal justice.[31]

Tiffany Skeggs, a victim-survivor, described the investigating police officer in her case as 'professional and at the same time genuinely caring'.[32] Alex (a pseudonym), another victim-survivor, also told us that the detective on his case had been very supportive.[33]

In contrast, some victim-survivors told us about negative experiences. Mark Southern, a victim-survivor, told us that when he reported sexual abuse to police in 2003, they took his statement and then he 'didn't hear back from them in 10 years'.[34] Mr Southern said police left him 'in the dark' and did not offer him any support while he was waiting for a response.[35]

Faye (a pseudonym) said that when, in about 2006, she spoke to police about the first time she was sexually abused, the person taking the statement said, 'Oh, is that all it was?'[36] She said that this has really stuck with her; she felt judged.[37]

Victim-survivors told us about negative experiences with police when reporting child sexual abuse by James Griffin (refer to Chapter 14 for a detailed discussion of Mr Griffin).[38] Keelie McMahon, a victim-survivor, told us that, while her initial contact with Tasmania Police was 'really good', after Mr Griffin's death 'everything just shut down' and she was told 'that's it, he's dead, there's nothing more we can do'.[39] Angelique Knight, another victim-survivor of Mr Griffin, was also told that there was nothing police could do.[40] She said:

> This made me really angry. I think this hurt the most because I had really built myself up to go in there. It was a big thing for me. I was really struggling to find what direction to go in and this made me feel like my experience wasn't important.[41]

Laurel House reported that victim-survivors it had contact with had mixed experiences with police, noting that some police demonstrated 'exemplary trauma-informed practice' while, in other cases, contact with police 'further traumatises victim-survivors or silences them'.[42]

In stakeholder consultations, we also heard a range of views on the efficacy of police responses to child sexual abuse, with some participants reporting police to be responsive and professional.[43] Some stakeholders noted that attitudes towards child sexual abuse are changing—it is now easier to report and police are more responsive.[44] Some participants reported complexity involved in deciding whether to pursue criminal charges, also noting that police decisions not to proceed with a matter are sometimes made to respect the wishes of victim-survivors and their families, and to avoid retraumatising a victim through the process.[45] Some stakeholders at our Burnie consultation spoke highly of police in North West Tasmania, with one participant describing police as trauma-informed and willing to 'go the extra mile to help victims'.[46]

In contrast, other consultation participants said police have a poor understanding of child sexual abuse and a tendency to believe adults over children.[47] Some participants raised concerns about the timeliness of investigations, particularly where there may be ongoing risks to children.[48]

As noted, Tasmania Police has introduced reforms to improve the experience of victim-survivors, including extensive changes to the Tasmania Police Manual. The following sections consider specific opportunities to improve the way police communicate with, and respond to, victim-survivors.

3.2.2 Establishing specialist police units

Investigating allegations of child sexual abuse is a highly complex task requiring specialised knowledge and skills. These investigations are sometimes limited by a scarcity of evidence, often due to the absence of independent witnesses and physical evidence. Therefore, police need a high level of skill in using all opportunities to gather evidence effectively, including the skills to elicit detailed, reliable and relevant accounts from complainants, particularly children.[49]

We heard evidence from Dr Patrick Tidmarsh, a consultant at Whole Story Consulting, who previously worked with Victoria Police as a forensic interview adviser and trainer in the Sexual Offence and Child Abuse Investigation Team.[50] According to Dr Tidmarsh, investigating child sexual abuse offences calls for a specific skill set that most police do not have, regardless of their level of experience.[51] We also heard from Victoria Police that some police officers have attributes that position them better for this work.[52] Dr Tidmarsh told us that specialisation in this area is important to maximise the number of complaints that progress to prosecution and conviction, and to minimise the compounding nature of the trauma adult and child victim-survivors experience as they move through the investigation.[53] Also, police specialisation has the potential to ensure those who investigate child sexual abuse cases take a trauma-informed approach to victim-survivors.

Tasmania Police does not have specialised child sexual abuse investigation teams. Responsibility for responding to a notification or an allegation of suspected child sexual abuse generally lies with the police geographical district where the offending is alleged to have occurred. Tasmania Police consists of nine commands: three geographical police districts (Southern, Northern and Western) and six specialist support commands.[54]

Tasmania Police has a High-Risk Child Exploitation Unit operating in its Crime and Intelligence Command. This unit assesses and acts upon referrals from the Joint Anti Child Exploitation Team or other information Tasmania Police receives, including from the Australian Centre to Counter Child Exploitation.[55]

Commissioner Hine informed us that initial responses to an allegation of child sexual abuse may involve general duties patrols, the Criminal Investigation Branch, Family Violence Units and Forensic Services.[56]

In its submission, Tasmania Police stated that relevant specialist teams are based under different commands, leading to inconsistent operating practices and reduced connectivity.[57] It advised us that, despite efforts to work together, differing priorities mean these organisational units can work in operational silos, which does not always support trauma-informed approaches to prevention, detection, investigation and collaboration, nor ensure police officers have the skills to appropriately support victim-survivors.[58] In June 2022, Commissioner Hine told us that, although all police officers conduct investigations, the Criminal Investigation Branch leads most investigations, including those into sexual abuse.[59]

Commissioner Hine said that Tasmania Police will refer victim-survivors of child sexual abuse to the relevant sexual assault support agency and (where the victim-survivor is a child) to the Child Safety Service.[60] Tasmania Police's Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines specify that a single investigator should conduct the whole investigation in child sexual abuse matters wherever possible.[61]

The generalist approach in Tasmania differs from practices in most other jurisdictions of Australia and New Zealand. Elsewhere, child sexual abuse investigations are undertaken by decentralised, specialist child abuse investigation units or by local policing child abuse investigation units with centralised specialist support.[62] In some jurisdictions, such as New South Wales (discussed below), Queensland and Western Australia, specialist units focus on child abuse. Other jurisdictions, such as Victoria (also discussed below), have units or groups within sex crime divisions that include adult sexual offences.[63]

We heard some concerns that the size and geography of Tasmania can be a practical barrier to having specialist units. Commissioner Hine told us that the challenge is to provide coverage across Tasmania, particularly in sparsely populated areas. He noted that some areas, such as Queenstown, Burnie and Devonport, are too small to have a dedicated resource.[64]

Police specialisation would need to consider these challenges. Tasmania Police emphasised that any reforms must ensure it can continue to provide a local response to meet community needs.[65] Tasmania Police further noted that this does not mean there has to be an identical presence in every population centre, but it does require consistency of response in regional areas with a surge capacity to respond effectively and equitably across Tasmania.[66]

We consider there is scope to draw on the key features and experience of specialist police models in other Australian jurisdictions and to adapt these to Tasmania, recognising unique considerations based on the size, scale and demographics of the State.

We heard evidence about the specialist police units in New South Wales and Victoria, where police officers receive extra training and become expert child sexual abuse investigators. Victoria Police's Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation Teams (referred to as 'SOCITs') provide specialist response and investigation for sexual assault and child abuse matters. In Victoria, 450 investigators are spread across 28 sites.[67] These investigators receive specialised training and are dedicated to investigating sexual assault and child abuse.

Some specialist police work in multidisciplinary centres across Victoria, which co-locate specialist police with child protection expertise, as well as counsellors and advocates from the Centres Against Sexual Assault.[68] In areas that do not have a multidisciplinary centre, other specialist police operate with the same interagency protocols to achieve the same collaborative approach, but each agency works from separate offices. In these areas, police must contact their local Centres Against Sexual Assault office within two hours of a report, to facilitate support.[69]

In Victoria, police receive reports of child sexual abuse through channels including referrals from Centres Against Sexual Assault and schools. The specialist police team receives most reports of child sexual abuse from the Department of Families, Fairness and Housing under its Protecting Children protocol.[70] Victoria Police also has a specialist task force (the SANO Taskforce) to investigate historical and new allegations of child sexual abuse in a religious or institutional setting. Police officers in this task force are specially trained to investigate sexual offences.

In New South Wales, a specialist referral team, the Joint Child Protection Response Program, handles most serious child abuse offences. The specialist team is a statewide centre-based response that includes specialist police ('Child Abuse Units') and child protection and health agencies. Cases for the specialist team come through a shared central reporting system. Cases are then assessed and triaged.[71] This differs from the approach in Victoria, where reports of child sexual abuse come through various channels rather than a central unit.

The Child Abuse Units, which work as part of the specialist referral team, are not attached to a region and operate under the Child Abuse and Sexual Crime Squad command. Peter Yeomans, Detective Chief Inspector, New South Wales Police Force, told us that a benefit of this approach is that Child Abuse Units are not 'swallowed up' if a particular region has a homicide or a large-scale investigation that uses up police resources.[72]

Detective Chief Inspector Yeomans told us there were 19 Child Abuse Units operating throughout New South Wales, most of which are located near the Department of Communities and Justice and New South Wales Health but are not co-located with them.[73] If necessary, police officers from the units travel to remote parts of the State.[74] With 19 units throughout the State, the maximum travel time is three hours.[75] Police mostly travel to the victim.[76]

A review conducted for the National Royal Commission on the efficacy of specialist police investigative units in responding to child sexual abuse identified some challenges, including access to resources, the availability of specialised training for investigators and effective interagency collaboration.[77] Having considered this review, as well as the experience in other Australian jurisdictions, we consider the key features that underpin successful specialist child sexual abuse investigative units are:

- specialised training, including training on interviewing child and vulnerable witnesses
- proactive strategies from police to encourage reporting and to build trust and credibility with the community
- partnerships with other agencies and support services commonly involved in the response (closely located but not necessarily co-located)
- a dedicated focus on child sexual abuse investigations (and possibly adult sexual offence investigations)
- that they support the emotional health and wellbeing of police officers
- that they are located in, or have access to, appropriately furnished and equipped facilities for interviewing victim-survivors, separate from accused persons
- that they have sites across the State to provide equitable access to victim-survivors regardless of where they live.

Specialised training, including training on interviewing child and vulnerable witnesses

We heard evidence that the most important aspect of skill specialisation for police in sexual offending cases is interviewing.[78] In child sexual abuse offence cases, the evidence of the victim-survivor is often the only evidence of offending. The police interview is therefore extremely important and will dictate if the investigation should proceed to the stage of interviewing the alleged offender.[79]

Dr Tidmarsh told us that most inconsistencies in interviews are created by interviewers and not the complainant. He stated that continuity of engagement and specialisation in interviewing are therefore key to the investigative process.[80]

The Victoria Police Specialist Development Unit developed the concept of the Whole Story framework for investigating sex offending and the sexual abuse of children. It is based on the concept that although the prosecution must prove that certain events happened in time and place, sex offending and the sexual abuse of children usually arises out of a pre-existing relationship. The relationship would have occurred before and during those events and often helps to contextualise the offending.[81] Dr Tidmarsh stated that when victim-survivors can use a narrative style, the breadth and depth of the information elicited increases dramatically.[82]

Daryl Coates SC, DPP, told us that there is great benefit in having specialist police conducting interviews for complainants and vulnerable witnesses, and in maintaining contact with these witnesses.[83] He noted that, in general, interviewing police officers have become more aware of the need to have complainants identify with as much detail as possible the instances of sexual abuse. There has also been an increase in the use of open-ended questioning and encouraging a 'narrative' from the witness.[84]

Witness intermediaries can assist police in improving the quality of their interviews by offering strategies to elicit the best evidence from the person (particularly children). Refer to Section 5.2.1 for more on Tasmania's Witness Intermediary Scheme pilot.

Partnerships with other agencies and support services, without the need for co-location

Strong partnerships with other agencies and support services are important for an effective specialist investigation unit. But co-location in a purpose-built facility is not necessary to create effective partnerships.[85]

Detective Chief Inspector Yeomans communicated the view of the New South Wales Police Force that it is now best to have the agencies near each other, rather than co-located. He noted that in New South Wales, effective and regular communication between agencies is critical to the success of the specialist referral team, whether a service is co-located or not.[86] He emphasised that working close to health centres and community services is most important.[87] He gave an example of how police work out of an old house in the township of Inverell, with a community service centre and a health centre across the road.[88]

Unfortunately, it is possible for services to be co-located and still operate in a highly siloed way. Conversely, others can be located separately and still work together effectively. What is important is a shared commitment to collaborate and for legislation and related processes to enable that collaboration (for example, through effective information sharing).

It is also important to have clear mechanisms within the response that build and sustain strong working relationships and collaborative practices to foster a multidisciplinary team approach, such as joint case strategy meetings and shared professional development.[89] Where multidisciplinary teams are responding to many cases in an area, there may be efficiency in co-location for undertaking the work and opportunities for incidental contact that strengthen relationships. Crisis and therapeutic supports for victim-survivors may also be more readily accessible. However, where teams are co-located, it is important that the facilities meet the different needs of each profession within the building; for example, police may need an evidence room and space for confidential case discussion.

Although we do not consider co-location is necessary, we do consider it is important to conduct interviews in a space where children feel comfortable. These spaces are better located outside police stations, such as in other services' facilities. Research indicates that conducting interviews in a space where a child is comfortable increases the likelihood of detailed disclosure, which is conducive to prosecution and conviction and reduces the likelihood that the child will be retraumatised.[90]

Tiffany Skeggs, a victim-survivor, told us that when police interviewed her, she was 'utterly terrified someone might see her walk into the police station'.[91] Ms Skeggs noted that being interviewed in a police station could deter some people from coming forward, a view other victim-survivors also expressed.[92]

We also note that for many people who may have a criminal background or who come from a community that does not trust police, attending a police station may feel unsafe or be a barrier to reporting.

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Sexual Crime requires special investigators to respond to reports of recent sexual abuse in plain clothes and an unmarked vehicle.[93]

Detective Chief Inspector Yeomans also informed us that the specialist Child Abuse Units in New South Wales are not housed in police stations with uniformed police officers. He stated that children feel more comfortable engaging with police officers as a result, which appears to have contributed to more disclosures over time.[94]

Tasmania Police expressed support for new and improved 'soft' interview rooms (this is a term police use to describe rooms that are designed to feel safe and welcoming for adult and child complainants and witnesses). Glenn Hindle, Detective Senior Constable, Tasmania Police, told us that some soft interview rooms are in use but that the location of those interview rooms in police stations is contentious.[95] He told us of a soft interview room at Launceston police station where:

> … quite often we're having to separate the mother off from the child and that separation quite often occurs at the front counter of the police station and the child is then marched through the police station as an individual on their own as well, so the journey is not pleasant for everybody.[96]

We note that children may not disclose as much specific detail about their abuse when a parent is in the room because it might distress their parent. Ideally, there should be a private, family-friendly waiting room located adjacent to soft interview rooms, where families (including any siblings waiting to be interviewed) can wait with the support of a counsellor or advocate while a child is being interviewed.

Katrina Munting, a victim-survivor, described her experience of making a report to police: 'I found the police station quite frightening. I went to a small room that I think was usually used to interview suspects. It was small and bleak and not very comforting'.[97]

Detective Senior Constable Hindle said that a better environment to take a statement from a complainant might involve them entering a facility that is not so authoritative.[98] He noted that 'often it is a complainant's first dealing with police, and they walk into a building feeling like they've done something wrong'.[99]

At a consultation in Hobart, some police noted that new systems for recording evidence were being rolled out, and they spoke about intentions to improve soft interview rooms. Many expressed a preference for interviews to be conducted offsite to make victims more comfortable.[100]

Moreover, in a submission to us, Tasmania Police stated that soft interview rooms should be 'specifically designed, separate from police stations, fitted out and located across the State to ensure all victims have the most conducive environment to tell their story'.[101] We support such an approach.

A dedicated focus on child sexual abuse investigations

We consider there is a strong basis for having specialist investigation units focused on child sexual abuse cases, and possibly adult sexual offences, rather than being absorbed into another unit such as a family violence unit. Family and sexual violence often occur together (almost 40 per cent of sexual offences involve family violence).[102] But while there are some overlaps and similarities in family violence and sexual offending, there are also differences, particularly in the context of institutional child sexual abuse.

Where child sexual abuse investigations are absorbed into other units, especially those that are busy with a high number of reports like family violence, there is a risk that the child sexual abuse work (particularly where it may be historical) will be overwhelmed by the immediate pressures of managing high-risk family violence offenders. Victoria Police told us that, under its model, the two units work closely together and that it is important for police officers working in these areas to do so.[103] Specialist family violence teams also undergo specialised sexual offence and child abuse investigation training in Victoria.[104]

There may be scope for rotating police officers through specialised units to broaden skill sets and to help build specialisation over time. However, we consider that there should be a dedicated team of specialised police officers for child sexual abuse, which could include adult sexual assault.

Our consultations with police in Hobart and Launceston highlighted that, under current arrangements, resourcing challenges and competing pressures could slow the pace of work and reduce the ability of police to focus on sexual crimes, noting that these crimes are resource-intensive and complex.[105]

Detective Senior Constable Hindle told us that police investigating child sexual abuse face limitations, including conflicting priorities such as shift work and investigations unrelated to sexual offending.[106] He stated that in his position as an investigator focusing on interpersonal crimes, he is sometimes drawn away from that area to spend time dealing with a wounding or an armed robbery, for example.[107] Dr Tidmarsh also observed that, given its small size, Tasmania Police is set up for service delivery through single stations in different locations; it is normal for police officers to multi-task.[108] Resourcing and rostering demands can take specialist police officers away from their specialist work.

Dr Tidmarsh also gave evidence about the risks of absorbing sexual abuse investigations into another area such as family violence. According to Dr Tidmarsh, because family violence requires a crisis response in a way that sexual offending does not, and sexual offending is harder to prosecute and is fraught with more community myths and misconceptions than family violence, family violence can become the dominant area of work. Child sexual abuse investigations can therefore become engulfed in those processes and the sheer volume of family violence matters.[109] We are convinced by these concerns and have serious reservations about Tasmania's intention to incorporate family and sexual violence responses with child sexual abuse responses.[110]

We consider that establishing specialist child sexual abuse units in Tasmania will provide the best possible service for child and adult victim-survivors. As Detective Chief Inspector Yeomans told us:

> You've got to have a specialist squad that deals with this type of crime. You've got to have specially trained officers that deal with this type of crime, otherwise the risk is too high … to that child and to the community if we do our job poorly, because in the end … it's about the interview, it's about the investigation, because if we don't do that job, you're not talking about thieves here or robbers or whatever else, you're talking about the most vulnerable in our society, so you've got to have dedicated staff to do that …[111]

Establishing multidisciplinary centres provides one approach to foster greater specialisation and improved services to victim-survivors. We welcome Tasmania's commitment to setting up multidisciplinary centres but consider it should prioritise police specialisation to ensure virtual or physical multidisciplinary responses include specialists. We consider that the best approach for Tasmania is to set up specialist investigation units for child sexual abuse for child and adult victim-survivors (and possibly sexual offences against adults), but not include domestic and family violence. These specialist units should work closely with other agencies involved in the response. They may be, but do not have to be, co-located with them.

With cases of recent sexual abuse, best practice is to collect evidence and take statements as soon as possible. When specialist units are centrally located, this can require that children be transported for multiple hours to the specialist team—sometimes without having bathed and still in the clothes in which they were sexually abused. Minimising the need for victim-survivors to travel long distances and enabling police to respond quickly are important features of a victim-centred response.

To provide a statewide response, specialist investigation units could be located in Hobart, Launceston and the North West. Staff who perform reception duties at these locations should be trained to treat victim-survivors in a trauma-informed way. Tasmania Police could draw on the experience in New South Wales to provide coverage and coordinated support to victim-survivors in remote areas. As previously noted, New South Wales police officers from the specialist units will, if needed, travel to the victim-survivor, who is usually located within a three-hour drive.[112]

The success of specialist units also depends on having enough staff. Tasmania is a small state with a limited number of senior detectives. Victoria Police told us that the specialist model requires shifting from more traditional generalist police structures that allow resources to be diverted when required.[113]

Commissioner Hine said there is no guarantee that specialist investigators in Tasmania's new multidisciplinary centres will not have to perform other duties.[114] This could include being routinely rostered to the Criminal Investigation Branch 'Crime Car'.[115] However, Commissioner Hine noted that Tasmania Police would always do its best to support police officers investigating child sexual abuse to perform their main role.[116]

There needs to be protection of this specialist resource so competing priorities do not overwhelm investigators. They should only be drawn into other policing areas when there are exceptional circumstances, such as natural disasters or public health emergencies.

Tasmania Police should attract people to work in this area by recognising the breadth of skills required, acknowledging the investigative complexity of these matters and properly rewarding this difficult work. Tasmania Police may learn from other jurisdictions, such as Victoria Police, to create incentives that attract well-suited police officers to join such units. In the case of Victoria Police, this includes supporting detective training and ensuring appropriate support for vicarious trauma.[117]

Support for emotional health and wellbeing of police

Police who specialise in child sexual abuse investigations can experience stress, trauma and burnout. The National Royal Commission review into the use and effectiveness of specialist police investigative units reported that staff in all types of specialist units raised concerns about their emotional health.[118] Staff in specialist police units commented on the high emotional toll of working solely on sexual abuse cases, noting that this might lead to burnout and secondary trauma.[119]

We heard evidence about the 'world-leading health and wellbeing strategy' for investigators developed by the Australian Centre to Counter Child Exploitation and Human Exploitation Operations.[120] Hilda Sirec, Commander, Australian Federal Police, who leads the Centre, told us that it is an 'opt in' environment, meaning that police officers must agree to transfer.[121] She also indicated that investigators have access to in-house psychological and wellbeing support, and that the physical work environment has been designed with health and wellbeing in mind.[122]

Detective Chief Inspector Yeomans highlighted the need to offer psychological support to police who specialise in this field.[123] In New South Wales, specialist police officers must take part in mandatory quarterly psychological tests. These are conducted by trained psychologists in the Psychology Unit of the New South Wales Police Force. The specialist investigators are also rotated into other areas of the New South Wales Police Force every three years. This rotation is usually for three months. Detective Chief Inspector Yeomans told us that the rotation policy is strictly adhered to for the development and welfare of police officers.[124] Victoria Police does not mandate rotations outside the specialist unit but is vigilant about vicarious trauma and other psychological impacts of the work, noting that some police officers will decide they need a change or move to a different area.[125]

Similarly, Dr Tidmarsh said that Victoria Police has a specialist Investigator Support Unit with therapeutic professionals who work onsite in the Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation Teams. These professionals run group reflective practice sessions and work with individuals to look after the health and wellbeing of police officers in this field.[126]

Recommendation 16.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should fund and establish specialist units in Tasmania Police, based on the Victorian Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation Teams model, to investigate child sexual abuse and to be based in three locations (Hobart, Launceston and the North West).
2. The specialist police units should:
    a. specialise in the investigation of child sexual abuse, including historical child sexual abuse (and potentially adult sexual assault) but not undertake domestic and family violence work unless it is directly connected to child sexual abuse (or adult sexual assault)
    b. be staffed by police officers who have undertaken specialised professional development (Recommendation 16.3) and members who have trauma-informed training (Recommendation 19.2)

c. partner with other agencies and support services involved in responding to child sexual abuse to create multidisciplinary teams. These teams do not have to be co-located, although this may be appropriate in some areas

d. have access to a 'soft' interview room, ideally offsite from police stations and potentially in multidisciplinary centres

e. be directed to perform other policing duties only in exceptional circumstances and not as part of a unit's usual roster

f. support the wellbeing of police officers and members working in the specialist unit

g. develop and implement strategies to engage and build trust with marginalised communities, particularly Aboriginal people and people with criminal histories (Recommendation 16.2).

3. Tasmania Police should measure and report on victim-survivor satisfaction with the operation of the specialist units within two years of establishment and regularly thereafter.

3.2.3 Making reporting easier

The processes for reporting child sexual abuse to police should be made easier, especially for vulnerable groups.

Online reporting

Not all victim-survivors of child sexual abuse will necessarily know how to make a report to police. In some cases, they may not even recognise what they have experienced as sexual abuse. Victim-survivors may also feel uncomfortable seeking information and support in person. We consider that victim-survivors should have easy access to information on ways to access support services, how to contact police, the process involved in making a complaint and what to expect at each stage of the criminal justice process.

The National Royal Commission recommended a national website and helpline as a 'gateway to accessible advice and information' and to connect people with support services.[127] It envisaged the website as 'a visible, central point of contact' for victim-survivors.[128] The Australian Government's National Redress Scheme website and its website on implementing the National Royal Commission's recommendations respond to this recommendation.[129]

The Victorian Law Reform Commission recommended that the Victorian Government set up a central website (or expand an existing website) with practical information on sexual violence and options for support, reporting and justice.[130] Like the Victorian Law Reform Commission, we consider that such a website could help young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse understand what is involved in making a report to police and help them access support. The Victorian Law Reform Commission considered that the website should provide information and access to support in a range of languages and formats and be tailored to diverse needs.[131]

The website recommended by the Victorian Law Reform Commission would apply to all forms of sexual violence and sexual abuse. Our Commission of Inquiry focuses on child sexual abuse, but such a website may be useful for victim-survivors of all sexual abuse.

Tasmania Police is examining opportunities to develop its digital capacity to allow online reporting of sexual abuse.[132] The purpose of this initiative is to encourage reporting of allegations of child sexual abuse, with an emphasis on vulnerable victims (including Aboriginal people and people in prison).[133]

Commissioner Hine told us that online reporting provides an opportunity for victims to tell their story (anonymously if they wish), have it recorded and receive information about support services. Commissioner Hine noted that, although computer literacy is not as high as it should be in Tasmania, online reporting would provide an alternative for young people to communicate with Tasmania Police.[134]

Commissioner Hine told us that Project Unify, an initiative to upgrade Tasmania Police's technology, has been allocated $46 million and aims to include online reporting. According to Commissioner Hine, this would offer an enhanced service for victim-survivors who want to remain anonymous. Funding for this project flows through to 2025–26.[135] We welcome this initiative and consider that Tasmania Police would benefit from reviewing online reporting platforms in other Australian jurisdictions.

Recommendation 16.1 above refers to the need to establish trust with marginalised communities. This section discusses barriers to reporting child sexual abuse that some community groups experience. It recommends that the specialist police units investigating child sexual abuse take steps to address these barriers.

People who have experienced discrimination from authorities or who have been in trouble with the law may be reluctant to report allegations of child sexual abuse to police.

Past inquiries have highlighted systemic racism as a barrier to disclosure for many Aboriginal people who have experienced child sexual abuse.[136] Aboriginal consultation participants told us of a reluctance among Aboriginal people to report allegations of child sexual abuse to police or other institutions because of a lack of trust in those institutions.[137]

The National Royal Commission made recommendations to encourage reporting of allegations of child sexual abuse from Aboriginal victim-survivors, as well as from people in prison and former prisoners.[138] In this section, we discuss these recommendations and consider whether more can be done to encourage reporting of child sexual abuse among particular communities.

To encourage reporting from Aboriginal victim-survivors, the National Royal Commission recommended that policing agencies take the lead in developing good relations with Aboriginal communities and provide channels for reporting outside of the community (such as phone and online reporting forms).[139] We understand that Tasmania Police views developing good relationships with communities as part of its 'business as usual' and is considering offering other reporting channels.[140]

Commissioner Hine gave evidence about the measures that Tasmania Police is taking to engage and build trust with Aboriginal communities, including the Tasmania Police Aboriginal Strategic Plan 2014–2022.[141] This plan includes strategies to develop and maintain appropriate and culturally respectful relationships and to deliver equitable and accessible policing services.[142] The plan covers, among other matters, liaison and engagement with Aboriginal communities, recruitment, training and education.[143]

Commissioner Hine also noted that the State Aboriginal Liaison Coordinator functions include contributing to local strategies to reduce the number of Aboriginal people entering the criminal justice system as victims or offenders.[144] We encourage Tasmania Police to continue efforts to build trust with Aboriginal people. More should be done to ensure Aboriginal people who have experienced sexual abuse, including child sexual abuse, can access information and support.

To encourage people in prison and people who have formerly been in prison to report child sexual abuse, including institutional child sexual abuse, the National Royal Commission recommended that policing agencies provide channels for reporting that can be used from prison and that allow reports to be made confidentially, and that former prisoners not be required to report at a police station.[145] The Tasmanian Government has not yet implemented this recommendation. In its Fifth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2023 the Government said that:

> Consultation with the Department of Justice has commenced to identify a short-term solution to allow confidential reporting. A long-term solution to this recommendation will require procedural and technical development … The implementation date is predicted to be December 2024.[146]

In practice, victim reports from people in Risdon Prison are made to police officers from Bellerive Police Station (the nearest police station) or Bellerive Criminal Investigation Branch and facilitated by custodial officers at Risdon Prison (generally in a prepared Department of Justice report) and, as such, are not confidential.[147] Commissioner Hine told us that reforms to this internal Department of Justice process could increase confidentiality, but he appeared to consider this the responsibility of the Department of Justice.[148] Police investigations and enquiries after Department of Justice reporting are confidential.[149]

Commissioner Hine explained that people formerly in prison can report matters to police via the Police Assistance Line.[150] This means they do not have to attend a police station to make an initial report. It would be the responsibility of police to visit the reporter at their home or another location to take a report. Direct phone contact with local police is also available to avoid the need to visit a station.[151]

We consider that the lack of confidentiality for a report to the Department of Justice is likely to deter reporting. We agree with Commissioner Hine that the process could be improved by increasing confidentiality at this point. We also consider that Tasmania Police should develop strategies to build trust with people in prison (and formerly in prison), which we accept is a significant but not insurmountable challenge. This is particularly important in Tasmania, given the high proportion of abuse claims that arise from (or are connected to) young people in detention at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, many of whom enter the adult prison system (refer to discussion in Chapter 10).

Many young people who were detained or had previously been detained in Ashley Youth Detention Centre told us about their experience of child sexual abuse at the Centre. Few of those we spoke to had reported their abuse. Many spoke of the shame and guilt they felt, the fear of not being believed and a lack of trust in police. One victim-survivor told us:

> What happened to me at Ashley has given me a massive distrust when it comes to the system. This includes the justice system and the police. The ones that are supposed to help are the ones you're trying to escape from.[152]

In its submission, the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service expressed significant concerns for Aboriginal children and young people in contact with the justice system:

> Allegations of historic and current sexual abuse and a lack of trust in authority and institutions and cultural issues re 'dobbing in' remain issues for our Aboriginal clients. A clear and transparent complaints process, coupled with culturally sensitive, trauma-informed awareness and education campaign, would assist our clients to report sexual and other misconduct, particularly where there is a perceived and/or legitimate imbalance of power.[153]

More needs to be done to build trust in police for particularly vulnerable children and adults.

Police also need to address negative attitudes towards some groups of vulnerable young people. A submission from a youth worker cited prejudicial attitudes held by police in the 1990s against young people in out of home care. She said:

> I was told nothing they could do … no-one would believe the stories of 'those types of boys'. At this time police were not interested in actioning any disclosures from our clientele due to, in their words, 'these kids are troublemakers and crims and can't be trusted'. [154]

In Chapter 9, we discuss the need for increased police involvement in disrupting child sexual exploitation, particularly in relation to children in out of home care.

One serving Tasmania Police officer described the young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre as 'the worst of the worst' and noted 'they are not very nice people, these kids'. Another police officer, also speaking about the young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, stated that it was 'too easy for kids to make allegations about these staff' and 'their reward for holding the line against these kids is to be the subject of allegations'.[155]

A former Acting Executive Director, People and Culture, at the former Department of Communities provided evidence of the attitude of one police officer towards young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. We were told about a police officer 'laughing' at a young person's claims against a member of staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. The police officer showed disbelief when told that the member of staff would be suspended because the young person was 'from a well-known criminal family, had a long criminal past' and 'should not be trusted, especially when there was money involved'.[156]

Jonathan Higgins APM, then Assistant Commissioner of Operations, Tasmania Police, conceded that Tasmania Police needs 'to work on [its] unconscious bias' against detainees or young people with a criminal history wanting to disclose child sexual abuse to police.[157]

It is clear that the following community groups are likely to experience barriers to reporting child sexual abuse to police:

- Aboriginal communities
- people who are or were in prison or youth detention
- people who are or were in out of home care (or youth support services).

We consider that the specialist police units (refer to Recommendation 16.1) should work with these groups to implement measures that build trust and encourage reporting.

Recommendation 16.2

1. Tasmania Police should establish ways for people to report child sexual abuse online.

2. The Department of Justice and the Department for Education, Children and Young People should review their internal processes to make it easier for people in prison and youth detention to report abuse to the police or other bodies, including online or by phone hotline, and ensure appropriate confidentiality of reports.
3. Specialist police units (Recommendation 16.1) should develop a strategy to engage with 'priority communities', by implementing measures to develop relationships, build trust and encourage reporting of child sexual abuse, and to assist prevention and 'disruptive' policing (Recommendations 9.29 and 9.30).
4. Priority communities include:
    a. Aboriginal communities
    b. people who are or were in prison or youth detention
    c. people who are or were in out of home care (or youth support services).

3.2.4 Improving professional development

Police officers who investigate child sexual abuse need specific professional development in the dynamics of child sexual abuse offending, as well as training in trauma-informed care and specialised techniques for interviewing children and vulnerable witnesses. They would also benefit from training to help create a safer environment and reporting experience for groups who are more likely to be sexually victimised.

Tasmania Police gave evidence to our Inquiry about the training it provides to police officers.[158] Different levels of training are provided to recruits, frontline police officers, investigators and detectives.[159]

Commissioner Hine stated that the training starts as part of the Recruit Training Program and is built on as a police officer moves into investigative phases.[160] He also noted opportunities to 'optimise investigative training', including developing a sexual assault investigating program specialising in trauma-informed practices and interviewing vulnerable witnesses.[161] Learning and Development Services is developing a curriculum for a specialised Sexual Assault Investigation Program that is due to start in 2023. The target audience is experienced detectives looking to further develop their investigative skills, specifically in sex crimes and family violence. It is intended that all detectives should refresh their training to ensure best practice when engaging with victims of sexual violence.[162]

Commissioner Hine also informed us that:

- Ninety-four per cent of all police officers have completed training in the Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines. This mandatory online training program is aimed at preventing and disrupting child sexual abuse and prioritising children's safety.[163]
- Tasmania Police is training police officers on the Whole Story framework, discussed in Section 3.2, as part of its Investigative Practice Program.[164]
- In 2017, Tasmania Police introduced a training package for interviewing vulnerable witnesses that includes a Whole Story component.[165] We understand this training is for detectives.

Commissioner Hine told us that Tasmania Police recognises its need for more education on grooming and boundary breaches.[166] We agree.

Dr Tidmarsh told us that the concept of grooming is one of the most important factors for investigators in this field to understand because it reveals the tactics of the abuser and their dynamics with the victim-survivor.[167] Dr Tidmarsh said that, in the training he conducted, inexperienced investigators in this field would (wrongly) start with the act that took place—the act that they were going to charge the abuser with—and they often thought that the relationship context from before that point was not relevant.[168]

We also consider that an understanding of grooming and the dynamics of child sexual abuse is crucial to police efforts to disrupt and prevent abuse. So, too, is challenging the myths of child sexual abuse. Dr Tidmarsh told us that when he started work with Victoria Police in 2007, there were still many myths and misconceptions about victim-survivor behaviours with respect to sexual crime. These included questioning the behaviour of the victim-survivor as contributing to the offending, querying the credibility of the victim-survivor and seeking an independent witness who saw the actual abuse take place.[169] He said that research he conducted shows that, following training, police investigators were better equipped to see through these myths and misconceptions about victim-survivor behaviours.[170] For example, investigators were less likely to blame victims.[171]

As well as specific professional development for police working in specialist police units, we have identified a need for continuous and contemporary training across Tasmania Police in ways to respond effectively to reports of child sexual abuse. Assistant Commissioner Higgins noted that general duties police officers are likely to be first responders in sexual abuse cases. A victim-survivor's initial contact with first responders and investigators affects their ongoing trust in the criminal justice system.[172]

It is also important that police officers receive ongoing professional development. Judith Cashmore AO, Professor of Socio-Legal Research and Policy, Sydney Law School, University of Sydney, told us: 'Interviewing child witnesses is a complex task and requires training, monitoring and feedback on an ongoing basis; it is not a single-shot "inoculation"'.[173]

Dr Tidmarsh also stated that not all gains from training are maintained once 12 months have elapsed—there is a need for a continuous approach to professional development.[174]

In Chapter 19, we recommend a whole of government approach to professional development on responding to trauma (Recommendation 19.2). Police members who have contact with victim-survivors will benefit from this professional development.

Finally, we note that, in addition to formal training, using witness intermediaries can improve police capacity to respond to the needs of child witnesses. We discuss Tasmania's Witness Intermediary Scheme in Section 5.2.1.

Recommendation 16.3

Tasmania Police should review its professional development on child sexual abuse to ensure:

a. all police are trained in
    i. the dynamics of sexual abuse and the concept of grooming, and perpetrators' use of these to facilitate a crime
    ii. myths and misconceptions about child sexual abuse and disclosure
    iii. responding to child and adult victim-survivors sensitively and with an understanding of trauma
b. child sexual abuse specialist detectives are trained in
    i. approaches to interviewing child and adult victim-survivors and vulnerable witnesses, including the Whole Story framework (or similar specialist interviewer training)
    ii. understanding the vulnerability of specific groups of children (such as those in out of home care and youth detention) and common myths about these children
c. all police receive scheduled and regular refresher training and ongoing professional development.

3.2.5 Conducting effective investigations

In this section, we explore factors that support effective police investigations (beyond the interviewing process discussed above).

We look at how processes are working and consider whether there is scope to improve the effectiveness of police investigations through:

- conducting routine audits to ensure minimum standards for investigations are met
- ensuring quality audiovisual equipment is available where witness statements are taken about child sexual abuse
- improving access to forensic examinations in regional and remote areas.

Routine audits to ensure minimum standards are met

Auditing police files would help identify areas for improvement, enhance the quality of investigations and build public confidence in investigative processes.

Auditing also has an important role to play in creating accountability in cases where police decide not to investigate a report of child sexual abuse. Police have considerable discretion in deciding whether to proceed with an investigation. Auditing could provide visibility of, and accountability for, these decisions.

Tasmania Police does not have any organisation-wide performance measures for investigating child sexual abuse.[175] Responses to child sexual abuse are conducted in line with the Tasmania Police Manual and the Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines. As noted, the guidelines came into force on 23 July 2021 and give police officers direction when they receive a report of child sexual abuse. They specify that a single investigator should lead child sexual abuse cases for the entire investigation wherever possible.[176]

We welcome these minimum standards for conducting police investigations into child sexual abuse. We consider the next step is to put processes in place to ensure these standards are met.

Victoria Police told us that every file run by its specialist unit is reviewed by a superior who checks for compliance against requirements before the file is closed or 'paused' (noting that some victim-survivors decide to return and pursue a process later).[177]

Tasmania Police supports measures to oversee police investigations into child sexual abuse. Commissioner Hine told us that Tasmania Police wants to do random audits on how it is dealing with child exploitation matters as well as family violence matters.[178] He said that these audits could be conducted by its Professional Standards or another management review team and could ensure police are getting feedback, doing the right thing and identifying what they need to learn.[179] According to Commissioner Hine, the random audits would also enable Tasmania Police to differentiate between districts and identify factors such as response rates, matters that were not pursued and how long investigations took.[180]

In New Zealand, the Independent Police Conduct Authority conducted an inquiry after discovering more than 100 child abuse investigation files in one branch that had seen little or no progress on the original complaint. The Authority then urged New Zealand Police to conduct a nationwide audit of child abuse investigations. Among other things, the Authority recommended establishing a process to audit child abuse investigations that included random file sampling.[181]

New Zealand's Quality Assurance and Improvement Framework was introduced nationally in February 2016.[182] It aims to provide consistency in family violence, child protection and sexual assault investigation processes and practice.[183]

Recommendation 16.4

1. Tasmania Police should develop and implement quality audit and assurance processes for investigating child sexual abuse offences, including random file sampling.
2. File sampling should:
    a. capture data on how well police are complying with procedures for investigating child sexual abuse offences, including the requirements set out in the Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines
    b. assess whether
        i. contact was made with the person reporting child sexual abuse
        ii. every effort was made to establish the victim's identity and to assess and investigate the report, where appropriate
        iii. a thorough examination of intelligence on Tasmania Police databases was conducted
        iv. cross-agency and interstate requests for information checks were made to determine whether any intelligence held outside Tasmania might assist the investigation
        v. contact details of the investigating officer were provided to the victim, parent, guardian or other support person
        vi. a supervisor confirmed whether the above actions were taken

c. capture data on the timeliness of investigations

d. go beyond technical adherence to requirements and assess the overall quality of police investigative responses and outcomes for victim-survivors, including identifying any opportunities for improvement.

Quality of audiovisual recordings

Child sexual abuse is typically committed in secrecy and without direct witnesses.[184] Therefore, the complainant's account of what happened is the main evidence and, in many cases, the only evidence against the abuser. The quality of pre-recorded audiovisual interviews is extremely important because the pre-recorded interview is likely to be used as the complainant's evidence-in-chief (that is, it provides the foundation of the prosecution's case). A poor-quality recording, or an ineffective interview, may also mean that a complainant has to retell their experience, something that should be avoided if possible.

Where the complainant in a child sexual abuse matter is still a child, the prosecution is generally allowed to use their pre-recorded police interview in court, as some or all of the complainant's evidence-in-chief. This aims to reduce the stress placed on the complainant by giving evidence in court. It can also improve the quality of the evidence the complainant gives, because the interview can be conducted shortly after the abuse is reported to police, rather than months later when the trial begins. In instances where the complainant is a child, this also helps give the jury a more accurate visual representation of the age and vulnerability of a child closer to the time of the offence. These issues are discussed further in Section 5.

The DPP told us that, while the technical quality of audiovisual recordings has improved over recent years, there are still problems. For example, there have been instances where the camera equipment has failed and the recording has not been available, or the quality of the audio has been poor.[185] At times it is difficult to discern the subtleties of a witness' demeanour due to the positioning of the camera.[186] The DPP recommends reviewing the facilities in all interview rooms to ensure they are appropriate for children and vulnerable witnesses and to ensure visual images include a close-up of the complainant.[187] We support this suggestion.

Commissioner Hine indicated that Tasmania Police uses several methods to record interviews, and the quality of these recordings can fluctuate.[188] Most large police stations have vulnerable persons' interview rooms or 'soft' interview rooms (discussed in Section 3.2.2). These may use a standalone video recorder or another recording system.[189] Police officers have also conducted interviews using their police-issued tablets, and this can be effective.[190]

Commissioner Hine further noted that Tasmania Police is moving to provide new interview cameras to larger police stations, but they are not yet installed in soft interview rooms.[191] Commissioner Hine told us these cameras are of high quality and are designed to be discreet.[192] Commissioner Hine also informed us that better interview rooms are part of the planned design for the multidisciplinary centres.[193] These centres will roll out from 2023.[194]

Tasmania Police should:

a. review the adequacy and availability of equipment used to record evidence by video or audio, and ensure this equipment is available in all police facilities where victim statements relating to child sexual abuse are taken

b. ensure specialist child sexual abuse police officers receive training on the use of recording equipment and refresher training if they have not used the equipment for six months or more.

Improved access to forensic examinations in regional and remote areas

As part of a police investigation into child sexual abuse, a child may be asked to undergo a forensic medical examination. Forensic medical examinations are conducted by specially trained professionals.

A forensic examination is important in some cases, but often it is of little assistance. For example, it may be of limited use in non-penetrative offences. Even where there is penetration, forensic evidence may not be conclusive. In most cases of historical child sexual abuse, a forensic examination will not be of any use.

The process for conducting forensic examinations is outlined in the Tasmania Police Manual. The manual states that examinations of victim-survivors must be undertaken in a coordinated way between the medical examiner, police, crisis support services and/or the Child Safety Service if the victim is a child.[195]

Forensic Science Service Tasmania has developed a Sexual Investigation Kit for collecting evidence in sexual assault cases.[196] These kits are held at each major hospital and can only be used by a trained medical practitioner.[197] An Early Evidence Kit is used in cases where there is a delay in a full examination. These can be used at any location and are designed for the victim-survivor to take samples under the guidance of a second person.[198] Early Evidence Kits are held at rural police stations and at Hobart, Launceston, Burnie and Devonport police stations.[199]

Commissioner Hine explained to us how forensic examination processes work. He told us that whenever Tasmania Police receives a report of child sexual abuse, a notification is made to the relevant support service organisation for the area.[200] According to Commissioner Hine, all regions have strong protocols for the forensic procedures in sexual assault cases.[201] The Tasmania Police Manual stipulates that, before conducting a forensic examination of a child, consultation must occur with paediatric specialists:

- in the Southern police district, the on-call paediatrician at Royal Hobart Hospital
- in the Northern district, the on-call Sexual Assault Forensic Examiner Nurse
- in the Western district, the on-call paediatrician at North West Regional Hospital.[202]

Kathrine Morgan-Wicks PSM, Secretary, Department of Health, told us that although sexual assault forensic examinations are available across the State, there may be delays in accessing a forensic medical examiner due to limited availability, particularly out of hours if the on-call staff are busy attending to urgent medical cases.[203] Secretary Morgan-Wicks also informed us that if a victim-survivor is in a rural area, the distance required to attend an examination facility may cause delay. For example, she noted that the only examining facility in the North West is at North West Regional Hospital.[204] Commissioner Hine also said that time delays can occur for children living in remote areas.[205]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks further noted that while the North West does not have a formal acute paediatric sexual assault service, it has two senior paediatric specialists with training and experience in paediatric sexual assault. However, she noted there are times when children requiring assessment in the North West need to travel to Launceston.[206]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks stated that because these occurrences are relatively infrequent, there can be some confusion about the process, with presentations occurring to police, general practitioners, rural hospitals and emergency departments. She noted that the counsellors at the Sexual Assault Support Service and Laurel House can offer extra support and information to victim-survivors.[207]

At a stakeholder consultation in Burnie, participants spoke of a shortage of practitioners who can do forensic examinations in the area, with most children under 13 who require an examination having to travel to Launceston. This contributes to their distress. We were told of a child who presented at 8.00 pm but could not be examined until 1.00 pm the next day, and was unable to shower—noting that using the toilet or eating during that period also risked compromising forensic evidence.[208]

We observed that the Department of Health does not require a standard level of training for forensic examiners across the State. The level of training in different regions ranged from a 'tertiary level qualification in the Medical and Forensic Management of Adult Sexual Assault through the New South Wales Education Centre Against Violence' to an internal course run by the Tasmanian Health Service.[209]

Child sexual assault examinations require specialist skills and, again, we saw variation between the regions in the services available for children. In northern Tasmania, examinations are conducted by medical staff (paediatricians, gynaecologists or general practitioners) who have undergone 'formal training in child sexual assault'.[210] In southern Tasmania they are conducted or supervised by paediatricians with training from Monash University.[211] The North West does not have a 'formal acute paediatric sexual assault service', but Secretary Morgan-Wicks advised that the two senior paediatricians in the region have 'training and experience in paediatric sexual assault'.[212]

Children in all areas of Tasmania should be able to receive a child-friendly, trauma-informed forensic medical examination in a timely manner. While it would be preferable for a paediatrician who is trained in sexual assault to undertake forensic examinations with children, this may not always be possible.

Therefore, increasing the availability of forensic medical examinations for children will likely require increasing the skills of doctors and nurses around the State to undertake paediatric forensic medical examinations. This may involve training existing adult sexual assault forensic examination services to examine child victim-survivors. In other areas, where no sexual assault forensic examination services exist, the Department of Health should ensure suitably qualified local health practitioners are trained and supported in conducting forensic medical examinations for sexual assault.

Recommendation 16.6

1. The Department of Health should increase the availability of forensic medical examination services for child victim-survivors of sexual abuse to ensure all child victim-survivors can access an examination with minimal delay. To achieve this, the Department should:
    a. train existing adult sexual assault forensic medical examination services to examine child victim-survivors
    b. ensure, in areas of Tasmania where no sexual assault forensic medical examination services exist, suitably qualified local health professionals are trained and supported to conduct forensic medical examinations for child sexual abuse.

2. At a minimum, the training should include:
    a. an external, recognised qualification in forensic medical examinations
    b. external recognised training in sexual abuse care for children.

3.2.6 Implementing police complaints and oversight mechanisms

Our Commission of Inquiry mostly focused on government institutions whose primary functions relate to the care and supervision of children. However, during our Inquiry, we also received information about alleged child sexual abusers who were police officers, which caused us concern about how allegations of child sexual abuse against police officers are reported and dealt with.

Due to the relatively limited evidence we received on this topic, as well as time constraints, we have not explored this issue in detail. But based on what we heard, we consider that strong measures are needed to ensure independent oversight and accountability in cases where a police officer is alleged to have committed child sexual abuse. This will assist Tasmania Police to meet its obligations under the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

We start by sharing a question raised by Azra Beach, a victim-survivor, who alleged she was abused by several individuals, including a police officer. Ms Beach asked:

> … when someone wishes to proceed with historical sexual abuse charges that involve a member of Tas Police, what guarantee does the survivor have that it will be investigated fully and appropriately? … I feel like there needs to be someone independent investigating, not Tas Police …[213]

Commissioner Hine told us of 22 instances of complaints or information received concerning allegations related to child sexual abuse involving Tasmania Police officers since 2000.[214] We also note the recently reported case of Paul Reynolds, a police officer, who was investigated for child sexual abuse shortly before his death by suicide in September 2018.[215]

The following case example describes what we heard about the police handling of these allegations against Paul Reynolds. As we set out, in September 2018, Paul Reynolds was afforded a full police funeral, with a guard of honour. Yet his death followed significant police investigations and reports about his possible sexual abuse of multiple children, among other concerns.

Case Example: Tasmania Police complaints handling—Paul Reynolds

Paul Reynolds served as a Tasmania Police officer for almost 40 years. Shortly before his death by suicide in September 2018, he was investigated for child sexual abuse offences. The circumstances surrounding his death have been the subject of coronial proceedings and reported in the media, and we do not intend to repeat them here.

We heard that in 2008, police officers from an interstate police force were delivering training to Tasmania Police officers in Tasmania. After the first day of training concluded, at drinks at the Tasmania Police Academy bar, an interstate police officer alleged that a conversation occurred suggesting that then Inspector Reynolds was 'a paedophile'.[216] Two Tasmania Police officers, both with the rank of Inspector, reportedly gave examples of concerning behaviour.[217]

One Inspector reportedly said he had visited Inspector Reynolds' home and saw him with a 15-year-old boy between his legs, giving him a massage. Another Inspector reportedly said that his wife had been approached by people in the community concerned about Inspector Reynolds' behaviour around young boys.[218]

We were told that the interstate police officer who was present during this conversation became concerned 'about the nature of the discussion and potential truth around such serious allegations' and reported it to a Tasmania Police Divisional Inspector.[219] The Divisional Inspector then briefed the Commander of Internal Investigations.[220]

Shortly after, Darren Hine, then Deputy Commissioner, Tasmania Police, wrote to the Inspectors who had reportedly described the concerning behaviours, asking them to respond to the interstate police officer's report.[221] Both Inspectors replied to the Deputy Commissioner suggesting there had been a misinterpretation of comments made and that it had not been said Inspector Reynolds was a paedophile.[222] An Assistant Commissioner who was present when the conversation was alleged to have occurred was also approached to make a statement. Before providing his response, the Assistant Commissioner had been made aware of the responses of the Inspectors to the allegations against Inspector Reynolds. The Assistant Commissioner wrote a response indicating there was no mention of paedophilia in the bar that evening and that he did not believe there was any basis to pursue the matter further.[223] He suggested that the interstate police officer had 'seriously misunderstood' the conversation and said such an allegation had 'potentially very damaging consequences for a person wrongfully accused'.[224]

After receiving this advice, the Commander of Internal Investigations wrote to the Deputy Commissioner that 'the weight of evidence suggests [the interstate police officer] was either mistaken or misinterpreted' the comments.[225] In the absence of anything other than the interstate police officer's account, the Commander wrote that there was 'no other evidence' available.[226]

The two Inspectors were advised that the matter would be closed and filed for future reference.[227] The advice recommended that Inspector Reynolds not be told (given he was apparently unaware of the allegation) to avoid 'dissension between him' and the two Inspectors.[228]

In 2012, Inspector Reynolds reverted to the rank of Senior Sergeant following concerns about his work performance.[229]

In 2018, a senior police officer lodged a complaint using a tool (Blue Teams) for making complaints about colleagues.[230] It was alleged that Senior Sergeant Reynolds had sent and received child exploitation material and had groomed young men (including some involved with a local football club).[231] Shortly after these allegations, police searched his home and Senior Sergeant Reynolds died by suicide.

Senior Sergeant Reynolds received a police funeral following his death, at which now former Commissioner Hine spoke and outlined Senior Sergeant Reynolds' career.[232]

In 2022, Counsel Assisting the Coroner reportedly told an inquest into the deaths of four Tasmania Police officers (including Senior Sergeant Reynolds) that it was supposedly 'widely known in Deloraine that [Paul Reynolds] was a paedophile'.[233] We were told by Tasmania Police that it has 'no evidence that that asserted reputation of Senior Sergeant Reynolds was previously known to any member of Tasmania Police' before Senior Sergeant Reynolds' death.[234]

We acknowledge that, from 2018, Tasmania Police eventually investigated Senior Sergeant Reynolds for child sexual abuse and other offences. However, it is concerning that a decade before Senior Sergeant Reynolds' death there appeared to be credible reports that suggested an awareness (or at least a suspicion) of his engaging in inappropriate behaviour with children.

We consider that the approach to investigating the alleged conversation overheard by the interstate police officer was inadequate. The interstate police officer should have been invited to make a formal statement.

We are further concerned that Senior Sergeant Reynolds was given a police funeral. We received an anonymous submission from a community member who was 'furious' when they learned from a police contact that Senior Sergeant Reynolds had been investigated before his death for child sexual abuse offences.[235] The community member wrote:

> Why is it that Paul Reynolds was given a full police send off when he was under investigation before he killed himself? What impact has this public heroism had and will have on the alleged victims and their families?[236]

We share these questions. We can only imagine how distressing this would have been for those who heard rumours about Senior Sergeant Reynolds' behaviour and believed them to be true. We are concerned by the Commissioner's delivery of the eulogy, given the Commissioner was, at that stage, aware of the concerns about Senior Sergeant Reynolds.[237]

Commissioner Hine described the processes that apply when a police officer is alleged to have been involved in child sexual abuse. He told us that anything of that nature would go to the Professional Standards Command, which would investigate it under the direction of the Deputy Commissioner. The matter would then be reported to the Integrity Commission.[238] We note that this process specifies where known cases are investigated but does not address the concerns of victim-survivors about how they make a complaint or about complaints mechanisms other than attending or phoning a local police station.

Under the Integrity Commission Act 2009, the Integrity Commission has the power to audit the way Tasmania Police (a public authority) has dealt with complaints of police misconduct.[239] As well as audits of a class of police complaints, the Integrity Commission can undertake individual audits of police complaints.[240] The Integrity Commission reported in its 2020–21 annual report that it had undertaken an audit of 30 complaints files with varying levels of seriousness, as well as one audit of an individual police complaints file relating to the use of force.[241]

Commissioner Hine said that after a matter has been reported to the Integrity Commission it then goes to the DPP to be dealt with in court.[242]

Commissioner Hine said that specific steps ensure the Professional Standards investigation is done independently from the area where the police officer is based, and that there is oversight from the Integrity Commission.[243] He also pointed out that the issue is dealt with in the Commissioner's Directions for Conduct and Complaint Management and Compliance Review (2021), which is a publicly available document.[244] While this document sets out good processes for dealing with police misconduct, it is long (173 pages excluding appendices) and complex. And, while it refers to handling family violence complaints against police, it does not refer specifically to child sexual abuse. Noting that our Inquiry did not have the opportunity to explore this matter further in evidence, in our view this process is not transparent enough in terms of making victim-survivors aware of how to report child sexual abuse by a police officer. We also consider that the police investigation needs to be more independent than being overseen by the Deputy Commissioner.

Commissioner Hine said that, regarding family violence, there were issues relating to perpetrators or witnesses being police officers. Accordingly, Tasmania Police has changed its policy. There is now a review panel chaired by an independent person who looks at the investigation to ensure independence.[245] Commissioner Hine noted that it would be a natural progression for Tasmania Police to convene a similar review panel where a police officer is alleged to have been involved in child sexual abuse.[246]

In Victoria, complaints against police can be made directly to the Independent Broad-based Anti-corruption Commission, but most are referred to Victoria Police for investigation.[247] The Independent Broad-based Anti-corruption Commission oversees these investigations, which includes reviewing and auditing selected investigations.[248]

Victoria Police has established a specialist Sexual Offences and Family Violence Unit, formerly known as Taskforce Salus, in its Professional Standards Command to investigate allegations against Victoria Police employees involving sexual assault (including against children) or family violence.[249] Victoria Police has also published an 'options guide' for victim-survivors of sexual assault or family violence perpetrated by Victoria Police employees.[250] This guide is available online and sets out various options for reporting allegations.[251] It explains the criminal complaints and investigation process and the internal disciplinary process. It indicates that interim action can be taken to suspend or transfer a Victoria Police employee who is under investigation.[252]

We strongly support the need for independent oversight of internal police investigations. More broadly, we emphasise that workplace culture is a key pillar in detecting and preventing most forms of unethical police behaviour.[253] Supervisors and managers have significant influence over the culture of their workplaces and are positive role models of acceptable behaviours.[254] We consider that professional development and strong leadership are required to ensure police uphold the highest standards.

We urge Tasmania Police to continue its path to improving police responses to reports of child sexual abuse, noting that strong accountability measures are required when allegations are made against police members. The cost of failing to rigorously investigate allegations of child sexual abuse is too high.

Tasmania Police has told us that planning is well advanced to establish a Family and Sexual Violence Involving Police Review Committee. An independent person will chair the committee. We are glad to hear of the intention to establish such a body.

Tasmania Police should:

a. establish a clear, publicly accessible process for reporting and responding to allegations of child sexual abuse against a member of Tasmania Police, including the ability to report to an entity independent of police such as the Integrity Commission

b. expand the domestic violence review panel to cover child sexual abuse and ensure independence in investigations when a member is alleged to have been involved in child sexual abuse.

4 Prosecution responses

The DPP is responsible for prosecuting serious criminal matters, including institutional child sexual abuse cases.

In recent decades across Australia, significant changes have improved how prosecution agencies respond to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.

In this section, we outline how the ODPP deals with child sexual abuse offence cases, focusing on:

- prosecution specialisation and training
- complaints and oversight mechanisms.

We then consider whether there are opportunities to strengthen and improve responses, and whether the ODPP is adequately funded to meet an increased demand for its services. In Section 9, we consider the ODPP's capacity to collect data and monitor outcomes in child sexual abuse cases.

4.1 Prosecution roles and responsibilities

The ODPP conducts criminal prosecutions in the Supreme Court and some summary criminal matters in the Magistrates Court. Prosecutors have a duty to present the case against an accused person fairly and honestly and to assist the court with submissions that allow the law to be properly applied to the facts.[255] The DPP acts on behalf of the State and is independent of the police and the courts.[256]

The prosecution has the responsibility to make decisions in line with the Criminal Code Act 1924 ('Criminal Code Act') and the DPP Prosecution Policy and Guidelines ('DPP Guidelines') including:

- whether to start a prosecution
- whether to discontinue a prosecution
- the appropriate charge to be laid against an accused person
- whether to accept a plea of guilty to a lesser charge.[257]

These decisions can have a significant impact on victim-survivors.

The National Royal Commission made recommendations in its Criminal Justice Report that were directed at each Australian DPP.[258] The recommendations made to prosecuting authorities mostly relate to consultation, providing information to victim-survivors for court and having robust and transparent decision-making processes (particularly for decisions to discontinue or drop charges).[259] Tasmania's ODPP advised us that it has implemented all the National Royal Commission's recommendations for which it is responsible.[260]

The ODPP referred to improvements it had made in dealing with child sexual abuse. In particular, the ODPP referred to:[261]

- creation of the Witness Assistance Service, which began in July 2008[262]
- introduction of a pre-charging advice service for Tasmania Police[263]
- establishment of a victims' right of review to the DPP of decisions made by the ODPP[264]
- implementation of detailed policies about how decisions that affect victims are made.[265]

The DPP told us that the ODPP prioritises sexual offence prosecutions, giving precedence to matters where the victim is still a child, where there are child witnesses and where a pre-recording will be conducted in court under the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act 2001 ('Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act').[266] Also, where the victim is still a child, there is a direction from the Chief Justice that the ODPP informs the Supreme Court. Once this occurs, a judge case-manages the matter.[267]

The DPP also advised us that child sexual abuse prosecutions are treated differently from other prosecutions in the following ways:

- The ODPP has generally provided pre-charging advice to Tasmania Police before the accused person is committed for trial. We discuss the pre-charging advice service in Section 4.4.1.
- It is the ODPP's practice to have early and ongoing contact with victims of sexual offences.[268] This contact occurs mainly through the Witness Assistance Service, which we discuss in Section 4.4.2.

4.2 Communicating with and supporting victim-survivors

As with police, victim-survivors told us of mixed experiences with prosecuting authorities. Some victim-survivors were positive about their experiences with prosecutors. Katrina Munting, a victim-survivor, told us that the support staff at the Witness Assistance Service from the ODPP were excellent. She described the woman she worked with as 'the kind conduit between myself and the terrifying Supreme Court and lawyers'.[269] Although Ms Munting did not spend a great deal of time with the Crown Prosecutor, she told us 'was very kind, understanding and patient in all our interactions'.[270]

By contrast, Leah Sallese, a victim-survivor, said that she had a 'terrible time' during the prosecution stage in 2017 and noted that it was retraumatising to have to repeat the same information.[271] In response to Ms Sallese's evidence, the DPP provided our Inquiry with documents indicating how prosecutors handled Ms Sallese's case.[272] While our Inquiry does not suggest that these prosecutors were at fault, it is clear, and the DPP acknowledges, that the criminal justice system can be difficult for victims.[273]

There may be circumstances where complainants need to retell their stories to multiple people on multiple occasions. The issue is particularly acute where disclosures are made bit by bit. This emphasises the need, of which the DPP is conscious, for sensitive and trauma-informed processes in the ODPP. The recommendation made below for professional development for prosecutors and other ODDP staff and the availability of the Witness Assistance Service should help address this issue.

Robert Boost, a victim-survivor, told us that the decision of the ODPP not to proceed with his case after he reported to police in 2020 left him feeling as if the person he alleged abused him still had power over him. Mr Boost said he felt 'that the system is there to protect [the alleged abuser], not me'.[274]

Mr Boost said he felt a 'deep sense of injustice' when the ODPP declined to proceed to trial with his matter because of insufficient evidence:

> There is a real imbalance in these 'historical' cases. I was a little kid when I was abused, faced with a perpetrator in a position of power. That power imbalance must be factored in by the DPP when they consider whether or not to run a case … I was dismissed by the perpetrator as a child, and the system is still dismissing me as an adult now.[275]

Kerri Collins, a victim-survivor, told us that she learned two weeks before the trial was to begin that the ODPP had decided not to proceed with the prosecution. Ms Collins said she wrote to the ODPP expressing her 'utter horror' at what had been decided.[276] She spoke to us about feeling powerless, as a victim, against the system.[277]

Ms Collins' matter was dealt with in 2004. The DPP told us of changes in the law and greater emphasis on supporting victims since then, which means that Ms Collins' case would be dealt with differently today.[278]

The DPP also told us that there is now an expectation in the ODPP of communicating with complainants throughout the prosecution process. The DPP Guidelines (updated in 2022) state:

> Informing the complainant of the proposed discharge or reduction in charges is an important step in the process. It is important that the complainant understands the reasons why a decision is made. It is preferable that the complainant be informed of the reasons in person. However, if this is not possible, it should be done by telephone. When informing a complainant of the decision the prosecutor should advise how decisions are made, provide a brief history of the matter and brief reasons for the decision. The complainant should be given an opportunity to provide his or her views about the decision.[279]

The DPP stated that, in the past, communicating with victim-survivors was, to a large extent, left to the discretion of the counsel in charge of the matter.[280] We are pleased to hear about this change in approach.

The DPP also stated that complainants are now notified of key decisions and have a right to request a review of a decision.[281] Where the complainant is under 18 years of age or has disability, their parent, guardian or spokesperson will be notified.[282] We discuss this in Section 4.3.

4.2.1 Prosecution specialisation

Child sexual abuse prosecutions can be difficult and complex. As noted, in relation to child complainants, these cases typically involve the word of a child against an adult, with no eyewitnesses and often a lack of forensic evidence. Those who prosecute child sexual abuse offences should have specialised skills and training in the law as it pertains to child sexual abuse and the nature and impact of child sexual abuse.

Terese Henning, Adjunct Associate Professor, Faculty of Law, University of Tasmania, recommends specialisation among the police and prosecution in sexual assault matters:

> Expertise and special skills are needed to deal with these cases, in order to know what communication tools are available, and how to get the best evidence out of these kinds of witnesses. These cases need to be managed in particular ways, and you need to have particular expertise to manage them appropriately.[283]

The DPP told us that, since 2016–17, the ODPP has had a specialist Sexual Assault and Family Violence Team covering Hobart and Burnie.[284] The purpose of the team is to streamline sexual assault and family violence prosecutions and to facilitate oversight by a single Principal Crown Counsel to ensure consistency in approach and appropriate prioritisation.[285]

We support the specialist arrangements in the ODPP for child sexual abuse prosecutions. In Section 4.4, we consider the subject of funding to support specialisation.

4.2.2 Prosecutor training

The DPP told us that specific training for prosecuting child sexual abuse matters is mostly done 'on the job'. The DPP stated that the team structure in the ODPP enables mentoring of staff, supervision of work and a knowledge of each practitioner's workload and experience.[286] New prosecutors are given the opportunity to act as the junior in contested matters before conducting a hearing or trial on their own.

The DPP Guidelines set out the duties of prosecutors, including those that apply to children and special witnesses.[287] For this, the DPP Guidelines refer to the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration's Bench Book for Children Giving Evidence in Australian Courts.[288] The Bench Book is primarily for judicial officers who deal with children giving evidence in criminal proceedings as complainants or witnesses, rather than for prosecutors. It covers the nature and impact of child sexual abuse, children's evidence and coping skills, and suggested procedures for children giving evidence. It includes a suggested script to use in special hearings with children or cognitively impaired witnesses.[289] The DPP Guidelines strongly encourage prosecutors with proceedings involving children or cognitively impaired witnesses to review the relevant portions of the Bench Book in preparing for trial.[290]

The DPP gave us examples of training provided to staff at Continuing Legal Education days, including:

- self-care and trauma, delivered by the Sexual Assault Support Service, June 2022
- interviewing complainants and leading evidence—in particular, children in the context of sexual assault—delivered by the Assistant Director (Summary Prosecutions), June 2022
- child sexual abuse and trauma-informed practice, delivered by the Sexual Assault Support Service, December 2021.[291]

The DPP also noted that Senior Crown Counsel are involved in and facilitate training courses. He said there are counsel in the ODPP who have considerable experience in prosecuting sexual abuse offences. The DPP stated that all practitioners are encouraged to, and regularly do, consult with experienced counsel.[292]

The DPP stated that it is always desirable for prosecutors to have ongoing training to help them prosecute child sexual abuse cases, including abuse in institutional contexts. The DPP noted that more training would be beneficial in the following areas:

- trauma-informed responses

- understanding the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act
- tendency and coincidence evidence
- issues that children may face in giving evidence in general and accommodations that can be made.[293]

We welcome the efforts the ODPP has made to train prosecutors on the nature and impact of child sexual abuse and the laws that apply to child sexual abuse offence prosecutions. We agree with the DPP that there is scope to build on and strengthen training, for example, to include training on the role of witness intermediaries.

It would also be helpful for defence lawyers to receive such training through The Law Society of Tasmania, or possibly Tasmania Legal Aid. Additionally, it might be possible to include prosecution lawyers sharing their experiences as part of the training.

Recommendation 16.8

1. The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions should provide ongoing professional development to staff on child sexual abuse, including:
    a. specialist training on trauma-informed practice
    b. training on issues that children and adult victim-survivors may face in giving evidence and approaches that can be taken to make the process trauma-informed, including the role of witness intermediaries
    c. training on the laws of evidence and procedure that apply in child sexual abuse cases
    d. training on the nature, causes and methods of child sexual abuse and grooming, including addressing common myths about child sexual abuse.
2. The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions should also explore opportunities with Tasmania Legal Aid and the Law Society of Tasmania for joint training on the dynamics of child sexual abuse and trauma-informed practice.

4.3 Complaints and oversight mechanisms

The ODPP has the power to decide whether to proceed with charges, what charges to proceed with and whether to discharge an accused person. These are significant decisions for complainants and accused people. Being involved in the criminal justice system is difficult for many complainants and their families, and it is inevitable that some of them will find the system unfair or insensitive. This makes it particularly important that there are internal review processes and clear and effective complaints mechanisms.

The National Royal Commission recommended that each Australian DPP:

- has comprehensive written policies for decision making and consultation with victim-survivors and police
- publishes all policies online
- provides a right for complainants to seek written reasons for key decisions
- offers opportunities to discuss the reasons for decisions in person before written reasons are provided.[294]

The DPP advised us that every decision to prosecute or to discharge a matter is internally reviewed.[295] The DPP explained the process as follows:

- When enough relevant information has been provided, the lead prosecutor must determine whether, in their view:
    - an indictment should be filed
    - the accused person should be discharged
    - alternative summary charges should be laid.[296]
- The prosecutor must prepare a memorandum setting out:
    - facts that are essential to the charges to be considered
    - strengths or difficulties with evidence, including with witnesses
    - possible legal arguments
    - the prosecutor's thoughts on the likely resolution.[297]
- The memorandum must be forwarded to the DPP, or to a committee whose members include the Deputy Director and Principal Crown Counsel.[298] In most cases, the memorandum is forwarded to the committee in the first instance. Generally, memorandums are only forwarded to the DPP in the first instance for charges that require the DPP's authorisation.[299]
- If an indictment on the same or similar charges for which the accused person has been charged and/or committed is sought, one other member must agree with the lead prosecutor. In the case of any committee member making the recommendation, the agreement of another member is required.[300]
- If discharging the accused person is recommended, the agreement of two committee members is required unless the recommendation is that of a committee member, in which case the agreement of another committee member is required.[301]

- If the recommendation is to prosecute the accused person on the same or similar charges but one member of the committee recommends a discharge or a substantial downgrading of charges, then two other committee members must also agree with such a discharge or downgrading of the charges.[302] Where the committee cannot agree in these terms, the matter is forwarded to the DPP for review and determination.[303]
- The DPP can overturn a committee decision.[304]

The DPP informed us that a decision to indict or discharge an accused person in a case involving child sexual abuse is considered in the same way as for any indictable crime. In most cases, it will involve a discussion with the complainant before a final decision is made.[305] If prosecuting an accused person discontinues after charges have been laid, detailed reasons for the discharge must be clearly documented.[306]

The DPP Guidelines state that 'ordinarily' a letter should be provided to the complainant confirming that the charges will not proceed and that the complainant has a right to request the DPP to review that decision.[307] The DPP Guidelines do not require the letter include an explanation for the decision, but complainants may request written reasons for decisions.[308] The ODPP told us that usually staff meet with complainants to explain why a decision not to proceed with a prosecution has been made.[309]

A complainant may apply to have the DPP review a decision to discharge an accused person or substantially downgrade a charge against an accused person (unless the decision was approved by the DPP).[310] Requests for review are generally to be made within seven days of notification of the decision.[311]

The DPP Guidelines state that a final decision to discharge an accused person will only be overturned if it is plainly wrong (that is, it was based on incorrect or irrelevant material or was plainly unreasonable, or unless new evidence becomes available).[312] The DPP told us that he will also overturn a non-final decision if a complainant requests him to review that decision and he disagrees with the decision.[313] The DPP Guidelines do not allow for reviews of DPP decisions, but a complainant may request to meet with the DPP or Deputy Director to have the reasons for the decision explained.[314]

Some people shared their dissatisfaction with us, not only with the decisions made on their matters but also with the way the ODPP handled their complaints or concerns.

One victim-survivor told us of their disappointment at being told in 2014 that there was not enough evidence to charge the person who abused them, only later discovering that there were more victim-survivors abused by the same person:

> I was also advised by the Public Prosecutions Office that any review of the decision not to prosecute [the abuser] would have to be made to Daryl Coates SC [the DPP] as "there was no formal procedure for review".[315]

We are pleased that there have been changes to the process since 2014.

The mother of another victim-survivor described her family's 'heartbreak' when advised in 2006 by a former DPP that her daughter's complaint would not proceed, despite initially being assured they had an extremely good case.[316] Later, they tried again with a subsequent DPP, only to be told that he could not overrule the previous decision. She said: 'DPPs are not God, and therefore decisions … should be able to be overturned by another DPP'.[317] (Refer also to the experience of Kerri Collins, described in Chapter 5).

The National Royal Commission considered whether there should be judicial review of DPP decisions.[318] Judicial review is when a court reviews a decision made by a public authority to ensure the decision is legal and that the decision maker considered everything that was legally relevant. In reviewing a decision, a court considers whether the decision was valid but does not review the merits of the decision itself (that is, a judicial review does not reconsider the facts of the matter or focus on whether the decision was correct). If a court is satisfied that the grounds for judicial review have been established, it can set aside the decision and refer it back to the decision maker for further consideration.

The DPP told us that he does not support judicial review of prosecutorial decisions.[319] In considering whether there should be judicial review of decisions by Directors of Public Prosecutions, the National Royal Commission cited longstanding judicial authority that has held that the integrity of the judicial process, including its independence, would be compromised if the courts were to decide or be in any way concerned with decisions about who is to be prosecuted and for what.[320] In light of strong opposition from Directors of Public Prosecutions and noting the position of the High Court, the National Royal Commission did not consider that judicial review would be likely to provide an effective means for victim-survivors to get a review of prosecutorial decisions.[321] We share the National Royal Commission's reservations about judicial review.

The National Royal Commission noted that in the absence of judicial review it is critical that Directors of Public Prosecutions and Offices of Directors of Public Prosecutions, and relevant governments, ensure complaints mechanisms for internal merit reviews are robust and effective.[322] The National Royal Commission recommended that Directors of Public Prosecutions establish robust and effective internal processes to audit their compliance with policies for decision making and consultation with victim-survivors and police.[323] Like the National Royal Commission, we emphasise the need for robust and effective mechanisms for internal merit reviews. We also note that care and diligence should be applied not only to the decision itself, but also to how it is delivered and explained to victim-survivors and their families.

The DPP informed us that, since 2017–18, the ODPP has conducted annual audits of discharge files for compliance with the DPP Guidelines. The DPP stated that 30 per cent of discharged cases are randomly selected and benchmarked against the DPP

Guidelines in respect of a discharge.[324] The ODPP noted that the audit results are published in its annual reports. The ODPP has also reviewed historical matters, noting that the standard of record keeping has significantly improved in the past 15 years.[325] The DPP stated that, following the annual audit, an email is sent to all staff to remind them of the discharge procedures and to identify any deficiencies in practice.[326] We welcome this change.

4.4 Properly funding and resourcing prosecution services

In this section we outline what we heard about funding and resource challenges for the ODPP and the impact this is having on its ability to meet demand.

We heard evidence that the increasing workload is placing pressure on the ODPP and resulting in:

- delays in providing pre-charging advice to police
- an inability of the ODPP's Witness Assistance Service to provide services to witnesses in cases other than sexual offence matters
- delays in prosecuting criminal cases.

These challenges are discussed in the sub-sections below.

We note that extra funding was provided to the ODPP in the 2022–23 Tasmanian Budget to help it reduce the backlog of cases in the Supreme Court.[327]

4.4.1 Delays in pre-charging advice

The National Royal Commission recognised the importance to victim-survivors of having the correct charges laid against an accused person as early as possible, so charges are not significantly downgraded or withdrawn at (or close to) trial. It made a recommendation to this effect.[328] The National Royal Commission noted that victims and their families are likely to experience significant distress if they believe there will be a criminal trial and are later told that the charges against the accused person will be dropped.[329]

Tasmania Police regularly requests and receives pre-charging advice from the ODPP on various matters, including child sexual abuse.[330] The ODPP provides the pre-charging advice service to police before charging a person with 'any sexual assault crime' in circumstances where there may be a question about the appropriateness of charges or the sufficiency of evidence.[331] Individual detective inspectors receive a file from investigators, via their supervisors, and assess the file. If specific advice is required before charging an accused person, the file is forwarded to the ODPP.[332]

Under section 125A of the Criminal Code Act, the approval of the DPP is required before a charge can be laid for the offence of persistent sexual abuse of a child or young person. Approval is also required under section 105A for the offence of failing to report the abuse of a child. Under protocols between the DPP and Tasmania Police, the DPP must be notified within four working days of charges for other sexual offences.[333]

According to Commissioner Hine, the arrangements 'work well' and Tasmania Police has discretion on whether to charge, based on the evidence at hand. Police can seek advice if in doubt.[334]

Commissioner Hine considers that the ODPP pre-charging advice service is effective at reducing the likelihood of charges being dropped, downgraded or dismissed due to better, more timely advice on the correct charge selection or on possible deficiencies in the evidence necessary to charge an accused person.[335]

Commissioner Hine considers that, while the police should be able to charge based on their discretion, for charges of persistent sexual abuse of a child or young person, DPP authorisation is appropriate because the process ensures the details that form the basis of an indictment are correct.[336]

The DPP stated that the benefits of pre-charging advice are well recognised, and it is an integral part of the work in the ODPP.[337] According to the DPP, the pre-charging advice service ensures:

- correct charges are laid at an early stage
- early advice is given about the prospect of gathering more evidence (where evidence is gathered before charging, there is less likelihood of the case being dropped after proceedings have started)
- matters with no reasonable prospect of conviction do not proceed, avoiding false expectations among complainants.[338]

Although Tasmania Police and the DPP value the pre-charging advice service, the DPP told us that resourcing constraints create delays in providing the advice. The ODPP aims to have advice completed within six weeks of referral.[339] In a consultation with us, and in its most recent annual report, the ODPP conceded that the six-week deadline for providing advice to Tasmania Police was not being met due to volume and resourcing pressures.[340] Between 1 January 2012 and 31 April 2022, the average time an advice file remained in the ODPP was 15.3 weeks.[341] This is a long wait for a complainant to find out whether a prosecution is likely to proceed.

A participant in our stakeholder consultation in Devonport noted the need for the ODPP to be adequately resourced to provide timely advice to police, with wait times of up to nine months in Devonport.[342]

The DPP stated that these files are complex and time-consuming.[343] The DPP also noted that these files are taking longer to review because many contain audiovisual statements, which can be more difficult to follow and longer to listen to and watch than written statements.[344] According to the DPP, they sometimes include irrelevant or inadmissible material and may not describe events in sequence.[345] We note that care needs to be taken with such statements—the Whole Story framework (discussed in Section 3.2) may produce material that appears irrelevant to a lawyer but is an important part of the complainant's story of the abuse.

The DPP stated that pre-charging advice to Tasmania Police is mainly provided by the Sexual Assault and Family Violence Team.[346] However, he noted that, more recently, charging advice has been provided by Crown Counsel outside of the team because the team has not been able to service an increase in workload.[347]

The DPP is of the view that the pre-charging advice targets could be better met if they had specialist prosecutors dedicated to providing this advice, without also having to conduct other criminal prosecutions. This is because urgent criminal work and court deadlines mean that pre-charging advice does not always get the priority it needs.[348]

4.4.2 Witness Assistance Service challenges

The National Royal Commission recommended that the prosecution Witness Assistance Service be funded and staffed to ensure it can perform its tasks of keeping victim-survivors and their families informed and putting them in contact with relevant support services.[349]

The ODPP established the service in 2008 to support witnesses and victims and their families while they go through the criminal justice processes.[350] The DPP informed us that the number of staff employed in the service has increased steadily since 2008.[351] Qualifications of staff include legal, psychology, criminology, social science and social work degrees.[352]

The Witness Assistance Service provides services to complainants and vulnerable witnesses, including:

- helping witnesses to understand court and legal processes
- providing information on court dates and outcomes
- offering support during charge selection, negotiation or discontinuance
- arranging, and supporting witnesses in, meetings with the prosecutor
- showing witnesses court facilities ahead of giving evidence
- supporting witnesses in court or on video link, or while waiting to give evidence

- helping to prepare victim impact statements
- providing a post-court briefing and helping to organise ongoing support.[353]

Sexual assault cases have been automatically allocated a Witness Assistance Service Officer since 2010.[354] The DPP outlined how the service operates:

- Once an accused person is charged with a sexual assault offence, Tasmania Police notifies the ODPP within four working days.
- Within two days of that notification, the Sexual Assault Liaison Clerk writes to the complainant to explain the usual course of proceedings.
- Following notification that charges have been laid, the Sexual Assault Liaison Clerk forwards a copy of the notification to the Witness Assistance Service Manager, who allocates the matter to a Witness Assistance Service Officer. This officer is responsible for contacting the complainant and providing any updates.[355]

The DPP informed us that a Witness Assistance Service Officer generally contacts a complainant in a child sexual abuse case before any application for bail and notifies the complainant of the outcome of any such application.[356]

The DPP noted that, as much as possible, allocated Witness Assistance Service staff continue working on a child sexual abuse matter until it is resolved.[357]

Ms Munting, also quoted above, described how someone from the Witness Assistance Service assisted her:

> The woman I worked with was so kind and understanding of my anxiety surrounding every step of the process … She also arranged for a private session in one of the courtrooms at the Supreme Court. This allowed me to know what to expect when I attended; the 'feel' of the room, who would be positioned where, what I needed to do at each point, to practice sitting in the witness box prior to the hearing, and to practice my victim impact statement in the same setting it would be required.[358]

Another victim-survivor acknowledged the significant support she received from a Witness Assistance Officer, adding:

> Given my experiences, I believe it should be standard practice for victims/survivors of crime involved in criminal cases to be given a package of information up-front explaining the roles and responsibilities of the Witness Assistance Service, the roles and responsibilities of the Witness Assistance Officer, the court process, the availability of support services and the dos and don'ts of being a witness.[359]

According to the DPP, the Witness Assistance Service is funded and staffed to ensure it can perform its tasks of keeping sexual abuse victims informed and connecting these victim-survivors with relevant support services.[360] The DPP advised us that contact with victim-survivors of sexual abuse offences is the service's priority. However, he noted the growing demand for the service is affecting the assistance it can provide to other complainants and vulnerable witnesses.[361] The DPP told us that, because priority is given to sexual abuse matters and matters involving children, the Witness Assistance Service is funded well enough to meet these priorities.[362] However, the DPP noted that this limits the ability of the service to help other vulnerable complainants and witnesses.[363] The DPP also advised that contract positions make it difficult to keep qualified and suitable staff, stating that it would be much better if the positions were permanent.[364]

4.4.3 Delays in prosecuting criminal cases

The DPP told us that the ODPP struggles with criminal processes, workload increases and increased pressure because of a backlog of cases in the Supreme Court.[365] He stated that the effects of the increased workload and the resulting delays are significant for victim-survivors, accused people, witnesses, ODPP staff and the quality of justice.[366]

Delays can be highly distressing for victim-survivors and compromise their willingness and ability to take part in a criminal justice process.

Ms Munting told us:

> Each time there was another delay, another adjournment, or not meeting the next expected progress point, it tore me apart. I was so determined not to give up; however, the process drove me ever closer to suicide as I could not cope.[367]

The DPP told us of increasing pressures on the ODPP, noting:

- There is a relatively small pool of counsel, Crown and defence with experience in sexual offence cases. The DPP said this causes issues with continuity of counsel and adds to delays.[368]
- There has been an increase in pre-trial directions hearings and special hearings under the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act.[369] The DPP said that, while the provisions under this Act are well used and of great benefit, they inevitably lead to delays and affect the backlog.[370]
- The ODPP has a limited number of Senior Crown Counsel available to conduct complex prosecutions, including prosecutions for sexual abuse offences. The DPP said that junior practitioners have been employed but it will take time for these practitioners to gain the skills and experience necessary to prosecute sexual abuse offences.[371] The DPP noted this creates more pressure and requires more resources for training, continuity of counsel and delays.[372]

The DPP stated that, overall, the lack of resources is a problem. He noted that the workload of the specialist prosecution unit continues to increase and there are not enough resources to keep up with demand.[373] The DPP further stated that the criminal backlog cannot be properly addressed without a sizeable increase in ongoing funding to the ODPP and corresponding funding for criminal defence services.[374] Since the DPP's statement to us in June 2022, the Tasmanian Government has increased funding for staff in the ODPP to help reduce the backlog of criminal matters in the system.[375]

KPMG conducted an independent review into the ODPP in 2010.[376] The review concluded that, compared with similar jurisdictions, the Tasmanian ODPP was efficient and effective. KPMG suggested that there was little, if any, scope for further efficiency from the then resource base.[377]

The DPP stated that the review resulted in a substantial increase in funding for the ODPP in the 2012–13 Tasmanian Budget, but that the extra funding was taken from the ODPP in the 2013–14 and later budgets.[378] He stated that funding was subsequently given to the ODPP for other work, such as the Child Safety Group and the Unexplained Wealth Unit.[379]

The DPP told us there have been small increases for the criminal section before the past two budgets to account for rises in salaries and rent, and for the Sexual Assault and Family Violence Unit. He said that the 2021–22 Tasmanian Budget provided about $1.4 million to the ODPP for the new high-risk offenders legislation, which imposes significant obligations on the ODPP and the Sexual Assault and Family Violence Unit.[380] He further noted that this included extending funds that were previously given to the ODPP but were not ongoing.[381]

The Tasmanian Government could consider whether to further support the pre-charging advice service and to extend the Sexual Assault and Family Violence Unit to cover Launceston (in addition to Hobart and Burnie).

5 Offences, evidence and procedure

In this section, we consider criminal offences and the laws of evidence and procedure that apply in child sexual abuse cases.

Over the past decade, Tasmania has made many welcome amendments to the law in this area, including changes to the Evidence Act, introducing provisions to make it easier for children to give evidence in sexual offence trials and piloting the Witness Intermediary Scheme.

The Tasmanian Government also introduced the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Bill 2022, which commenced as the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act 2023 ('Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commissions) Act') on 20 April 2023. The Act made other changes including new child sexual abuse offences and introducing model provisions developed by the Uniform Evidence Law jurisdictions to address barriers to the admissibility of tendency and coincidence evidence.[382]

We also note that the Tasmanian Government is examining bail laws. We encourage the Department of Justice to consider the views and experiences of victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse as part of that review.[383] For example, Keelie McMahon, a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse perpetrated by James Griffin (refer to Chapter 14), told us how she felt when Mr Griffin was granted bail:

> Jim lived in the same suburb as me. Prior to him being charged we would go to the same shopping centre and I would frequently run into him there. After Jim was bailed I became really anxious and very rarely left my house because I was fearful of running into him. My mum told me he wasn't at his house anymore but I still had the anxiety of knowing he was out there somewhere.[384]

This section focuses on the areas in which we would like to see more improvements to criminal offences, rules of evidence and court procedures. We then consider whether improvements can be made to ensure:

- criminal offences cover the range of offending behaviour that can occur in child sexual abuse cases and also have a preventive role in condemning and deterring such behaviour
- adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse offences are extended the same protective measures that exist for children to minimise the traumatic impacts of a trial
- audiovisual recordings of evidence given by witnesses in child sexual abuse offence cases are of high quality
- relevant evidence in child sexual abuse offence cases is admissible
- juries understand the dynamics of child sexual abuse so they can effectively assess evidence in trials
- information is available for judges and the legal profession on the nature of child sexual abuse and trauma-informed court practice
- judges can rule on the admissibility of evidence before a jury is sworn in and before the trial starts to allow trials to progress with minimal procedural disruption.

5.1 Offences

This section describes the offences that may apply to perpetrators who commit child sexual abuse in institutional settings. It also refers to offences applicable to those who do not act to prevent child sexual abuse from occurring and recommends some changes. In the period since our Commission of Inquiry has been operating, there have been several changes to these offences, which are noted below.

In Tasmania, a person who sexually abuses a child, permits the sexual abuse of a child or is in a position of authority and fails to protect a child from sexual abuse can be charged with various indictable offences. These offences are dealt with in the Supreme Court and include:[385]

- rape[386]
- indecent assault[387]
- penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person[388]
- penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person by a person in a position of authority[389]
- person permitting penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person on a premises[390]
- persistent sexual abuse of a child or young person[391]
- doing an indecent act with or directed at a child or young person[392]
- procuring a child or young person to have unlawful sexual intercourse with another person or to commit an indecent act with another person[393]
- communicating with a child or young person to induce them to engage in an unlawful sexual act ('grooming')[394]
- communicating with any person with the intention of exposing a child or young person to indecent material without legitimate reason[395]
- failure by a person in authority to protect a child from a sexual offence.[396]

There are also various indictable offences relating to producing, using, possessing or accessing child exploitation material.[397]

There is no time limit (limitation period) for prosecuting indictable offences. An accused person can be prosecuted, at least in theory, for offences that are alleged to have occurred many years before. However, in practice, the ODPP could advise the police that an alleged perpetrator should not be charged because the available evidence means there is not a reasonable prospect of conviction.[398]

Until recently, there were time limits on prosecuting summary offences.[399] A time limit applied to assault with indecent intent, which may involve child sexual abuse, and a person could not be charged with the offence beyond 12 months after it was alleged to have occurred.[400]

The enactment of the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act removed this limitation period for assault with indecent intent.[401] The amendment is retrospective to enable historical offences to be pursued.[402] The Act also removed the two-year limitation period that applied to the offences of making, reproducing or procuring a child to be involved in making child exploitation material under the Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Enforcement Act.[403] We support these recent reforms.

5.1.1 Persistent sexual abuse offence

An accused person is entitled to a fair trial, which includes knowing the details of the case against them. Normally, when a person is charged with an offence, the prosecution must specify when the offence is alleged to have occurred. This enables the accused person to properly defend themselves against accusations of child sexual offences.

However, it is often difficult for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse to give details of the offending against them because:

- young children may not have a good understanding of dates and times
- delays in reporting may cause memories to fade
- the abuse may have occurred repeatedly and in similar circumstances, so the victim-survivor cannot describe specific occasions.[404]

To overcome this difficulty, Tasmania introduced an offence in 1994 of 'maintaining a sexual relationship with a young person', which applies where the accused person is alleged to have committed at least three separate unlawful acts.[405] It is not necessary to prove the date on which any of the unlawful sexual acts were committed, nor the exact circumstances in which they were committed.[406]

The language of the offence, as originally drafted, misleadingly suggested that the child and abuser had a relationship, rather than indicating that the child had been subjected to continuing abuse. Although the National Royal Commission recognised this problem, it endorsed the language of 'sexual relationship' because it was used in similar Queensland legislation, which had previously operated successfully.[407]

Some states have since renamed the offence 'persistent sexual abuse'.[408] This occurred in Tasmania in 2020.[409] However, while the name of the offence has changed, the language of 'maintaining a sexual relationship' is still used within the section.[410] We consider that the provision should be redrafted to no longer use this terminology.

This change will not alter how the section operates, but it will have the important effect of acknowledging that sexual interaction between children and adults is inherently abusive and non-consensual and should never be condoned. We note the efforts of the Grace Tame Foundation, through its 'Harmony Campaign', to advocate for removing this language, which the Foundation describes as giving licence 'to characterise abuse as romance'.[411] This forms part of a broader campaign to strengthen and harmonise child sexual abuse offences across states and territories.[412] Victim-survivor Leah Sallese also agreed that the language of a 'relationship' is problematic:

> I think this language needs to change because it suggests that the victim-survivor shoulders the blame. We're already shaming and blaming ourselves, we don't need a description such as this adding to our trauma.[413]

The rewording of the provision to remove reference to 'maintaining a sexual relationship' will not change the substance of the law.

Tasmania Police will generally seek advice from the ODPP before charging an accused person with sexual offences in cases where there may be a question about the appropriateness of the charges or the strength of the evidence.[414] As discussed, this aims to ensure the charges laid are the most appropriate and to avoid charges being dropped or changed. Tasmania Police requires authorisation from the DPP to lay charges for the offence of persistent sexual abuse of a child or young person under section 125A of the Criminal Code Act.

5.1.2 Position of authority offence

As we discuss in Chapter 3, children in schools, out of home care, youth detention and hospitals are at risk of abuse from people who are employed by or otherwise associated with the institution. Staff, volunteers or carers in these organisations are often well placed to groom and abuse young people because of their power and close contact with them, as well as the trust others place in them.

The National Royal Commission recommended that all state and territory governments introduce offences that punish people in a 'position of authority' who sexually abuse children.[415] Most states and territories have introduced offences for misusing authority over children and young people to sexually abuse them.[416]

Child sexual abuse offences generally apply to sexual contact with children who are under the age at which they can consent to sexual contact with an adult. One of the purposes of a position of authority offence is to capture circumstances where the child is above the age of consent (17 in Tasmania) and the alleged offender is in a position of authority over them. Position of authority offences aim to cover a gap in existing laws, criminalising sexual conduct between a child over the age of consent and a person in a position of authority or care.[417]

Since our Inquiry began, Tasmania has enacted legislation prohibiting penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person by a person in a position of authority over them through the enactment of the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act on 20 April 2023.[418] However, the offence only covers penetrative sexual acts.[419] It does not capture perpetrators in a position of authority who engage in acts of grooming or sexual touching before a child has turned 18. We heard of cases where the abuser deferred penetration until after the child turned 18. In our view, section 124A also needs to cover non-penetrative sexual acts committed by a person in a position of authority, as is the case in several other states.[420] We have recommended this change below.

An important feature of the offence is that it provides a non-exhaustive list of people in a position of authority. This list includes:

- a teacher if the child is a pupil of the teacher or is a pupil where the teacher works
- a parent (which is defined to include a stepparent or a foster parent)
- a person who provides religious, sporting, musical or other instruction to the child
- a religious or spiritual leader in a religious or spiritual group attended by the child
- a health professional or social worker providing professional services to the child
- a person who has the care of a child with a cognitive impairment
- a person employed or providing services in a prison or a youth detention centre
- a person who provides childcare or a childcare service
- an employer of the child or other person in a position of authority over a child in relation to the child's employment (or voluntary work).[421]

We are pleased that this offence has been introduced and welcome its broad application to a range of institutional settings including schools, out of home care, youth detention centres and hospitals.

One question that can arise in applying the position of authority offence is how it applies to a case where a child interacted with the alleged offender while there was a relationship of authority between them, but the sexual acts did not occur until after that relationship of authority ended. For example, a child could be groomed by a teacher in their high school who does not initiate sexual contact until the child transfers to college in Year 11. In some circumstances, this offence could apply where the position of authority has ceased by the time the sexual act occurs if a connection has been maintained between the child and the person in the position of care, supervision or authority. For example, in Lydgate (a pseudonym) v The Queen the Victorian Court of Appeal held that evidence of sexualised conversations and messages between the principal of a school and a student were admissible evidence to prove that the principal was guilty of the similar Victorian offence, even though the sexual acts did not occur until after the school board had suspended the principal and he had resigned from his position.[422]

While we welcome the offence of penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person by a person in a position of authority in Tasmania, we recommend broadening the offence to cover all forms of sexual contact (not just sexual penetration), as recommended by the National Royal Commission.[423]

5.1.3 'Failure to protect' offence

The National Royal Commission recommended introducing a new offence of failure to protect a child in a relevant institution from a substantial risk of sexual abuse by an adult associated with the institution.[424] As with failure to report offences, it is designed to protect children from abuse in institutional settings.

The National Royal Commission recommended that the offence apply where:

- an adult knows of a substantial risk that another adult associated with the institution will commit a sexual offence against
    - a child under 16
    - a child aged 16 or 17 years if the person associated with the institution is in a position of authority in relation to that child
- the person has the power or responsibility to reduce or remove the risk
- the person negligently fails to remove or reduce the risk.[425]

The National Royal Commission contemplated that relevant institutions would be defined to include institutions that run facilities for or provide services to children in circumstances where the children are in the care, supervision or control of the institution. Foster care and kinship services would be included, but individual foster carers and kinship carers would not.[426]

The Australian Capital Territory, South Australia and Victoria have enacted a failure to protect offence in broadly similar terms to the offence recommended by the National Royal Commission.[427] Unlike the National Royal Commission recommendation, the South Australian offence also applies to a provider of out of home care who knows of a substantial risk that another person providing out of home care will abuse the child.

In Tasmania, the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act introduced into the Criminal Code Act the offence of failure by a person in authority to protect a child from a sexual offence.[428] The offence is broadly consistent with the recommendation of the National Royal Commission set out above. We consider that this offence could have an important symbolic and educative effect, as well as being a powerful tool for prosecutions. We welcome its introduction.

We note that the offence, as currently drafted, could potentially apply to a person who is under the age of 18. In contrast, the National Royal Commission considered that the offence should only be able to be committed by adults in the institution and not by children who are in leadership positions.[429] Like the National Royal Commission, we do not consider the offence of failure to protect should apply to children.

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the following provisions in the Criminal Code Act 1924:

a. section 125A to remove all language referring to 'maintaining a sexual relationship with a young person' and replace it with words referring to the 'persistent sexual abuse of a child or young person'

b. section 124A (the position of authority offence) to cover indecent acts with or directed at a child or young person under the age of 18 by a person in a position of authority in relation to that child or young person. The offence should

   i. not apply where the person accused of the offending is under the age of 18 at the time of the offence

   ii. qualify as an unlawful sexual act for the purposes of the offence of 'persistent sexual abuse of a child or young person' under section 125A of the Criminal Code Act 1924

c. section 125E (the offence of failure by a person in authority to protect a child from a sexual offence) to ensure the offence does not apply to a person who was under the age of 18 at the time of the offence.

5.2 Supporting victim-survivors of child sexual abuse to give evidence

In the past, complainants and other witnesses in sexual offence cases, including children, had to give oral evidence in a courtroom in the presence of the accused person and a judge and jury, or before a magistrate.

During hearings and sessions with a Commissioner, some people who had experienced institutional child sexual abuse told us how stressful it was to be required to give evidence describing traumatic details about what had happened to them, and to be cross-examined about the circumstances in which the alleged offence occurred. Fear of having to give evidence and being cross-examined may discourage victim-survivors from reporting offences and inhibit the capacity of the criminal justice system to hold abusers accountable for their actions.

One anonymous submitter described giving evidence when she was a child, as a witness to the sexual abuse of her friend:

> The cross-examination of me as a witness took half a day. The perpetrator's defence lawyer tried to confuse, intimidate, undermine, frustrate, trap, persuade, humiliate and degrade me. For example, he tried to make me make sexual noises in front of a room full of strangers to prove that I knew what sex sounded like.[430]

Ms Munting described her experience of being cross-examined as an adult:

> That was a harrowing and mortifying experience. I felt victim-blamed by the defence lawyer. [The accused] sat metres away from me, making dismissive noises and gestures while I was being questioned by the Crown and the defence.[431]

Judith Cashmore AO, Professor of Socio-Legal Research and Policy, Sydney Law School, University of Sydney, said that even 'gentle' questioning could be unsettling for a witness giving evidence.[432]

Most Australian jurisdictions have introduced laws to prevent harassing and offensive cross-examination. Under Tasmania's Evidence Act, the court must prevent a question being put in cross-examination in certain circumstances, including if the court believes the question is misleading or confusing, unduly annoying, harassing, intimidating, offensive or repetitive.[433]

Research on the effect of such provisions has shown that judges and magistrates take a variety of approaches in deciding whether counsel should be permitted to put a particular question in cross-examination.[434] Professor Cashmore told us:

> In my experience, effective cross-examination designed to discredit the child's evidence is rarely aggressive and may not be seen by those familiar and comfortable with the court process as oppressive.[435]

We are not aware of any research on the practices of Tasmanian judges and magistrates in deciding whether questions should be disallowed.

We make recommendations to assist courts to best exercise their powers in appropriate circumstances in Section 5.5.

Although controls on cross-examination can assist complainants and other witnesses to give evidence in child sexual abuse cases, adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse spoke of finding court processes very difficult.[436] For children, court processes can be even more confusing, frightening and traumatic than for adults.

In this section, we discuss laws and processes aimed at making it easier for children (and in some cases adults) to give evidence. These include:

- the recent Witness Intermediary Scheme pilot
- special measures intended to make it easier for child witnesses (and, in some circumstances, adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse) to give evidence
- improving the quality of audiovisual recordings used in trials.

5.2.1 Witness intermediaries

The Tasmanian Government piloted a statewide Witness Intermediary Scheme to help children give their best evidence as witnesses in the criminal justice system.[437] The scheme started on 1 March 2021, with 21 (now 28) witness intermediaries serving all Tasmanian regions.[438]

The scheme was introduced in response to recommendations of the National Royal Commission and the work of the Tasmanian Law Reform Institute in its 2018 report Facilitating Equal Access to Justice: An Intermediary/Communication Scheme for Tasmania? [439]

The Witness Intermediary Scheme makes witness intermediaries available to all children who are victims or witnesses in court proceedings relating to sexual offence and homicide matters, and to adults in such proceedings who have extra communication needs.[440] Although this is not covered by the legislation, Tasmania Police may also use witness intermediaries when investigating crimes.[441]

The role of intermediaries in court is to assist the judge and any lawyer to communicate with the witness and 'perform any other function that a judge in a specified proceeding considers is in the interests of justice'.[442]

A judge may order that an intermediary prepares an expert assessment report if a child is a witness or if the judge or a lawyer identifies an adult as having extra communication needs.[443] The assessment report provides recommendations to the judge and the lawyers appearing in court on adjustments that should be made to aid the witness' communication with the court.

If the judge orders that a witness intermediary can be used, a ground rules hearing will be held before the trial. At this hearing, the judge can make directions dealing with matters such as how the witness is to be questioned and for how long, when the questions are to be provided to the witness intermediary, and the use of any models, plans, body maps or other aids to help communicate a question or answer.[444]

In this way, the judiciary and legal profession can be educated and informed about the communication needs of an individual child witness and, as intermediaries come to be used more often, the general needs of child witnesses. Professor Cashmore described witness intermediary schemes as having particular 'educative value for lawyers, judges and others involved in the process'.[445]

We note that the Tasmanian Law Reform Institute's report recommended that the scheme be used for police interviews as well as for the pre-trial and trial stages of the criminal justice process.[446] The Department of Justice funds intermediaries to assist police in communicating with vulnerable witnesses. Ginna Webster, Secretary, Department of Justice, advised us that witness intermediaries may not be available to meet every request for assistance from Tasmania Police and that this will be adjudicated by the Department of Justice Intermediary Liaison Team.[447]

Although the Witness Intermediary Scheme pilot has only been running since 1 March 2021, the evidence we heard and the recent evaluation we refer to below suggest it is operating effectively.[448]

Commissioner Hine told us that, from the examples he has seen, the Witness Intermediary Scheme pilot is working well.[449] He noted that the way witness intermediaries assist in interviewing children provides a good opportunity to get the best evidence from a victim-survivor.[450]

The use of witness intermediaries can also help build the skills and understanding of police in interviewing children and vulnerable witnesses.

According to information provided to us by Secretary Webster as of 12 May 2022 and later updated:

- Twenty-seven (now 28) witness intermediaries had received specialist training and been appointed to the intermediaries panel.[451]
- Intermediaries had assisted 501 vulnerable witnesses by identifying their needs and providing advice on special measures to assist police, lawyers and the courts in Tasmania.[452]
- Police made the largest number of referrals to witness intermediaries (22 adults and 412 children). Of these, 343 referrals related to sexual abuse. A small number of intermediaries were used in family violence cases where the witness had a serious communication need.[453]

- In matters going to court, the Magistrates Court referred two adults and 24 children to intermediaries. The Supreme Court referred 12 adults and 26 children.[454]

Secretary Webster stated that the number of referrals had significantly exceeded the Department of Justice's expectations and that the Department had received 'resoundingly positive feedback' from judicial officers, lawyers and police officers.[455]

We did not hear directly from anyone who had been assisted by an intermediary in Tasmania, either when they were interviewed by police, communicated with a prosecutor or gave evidence at trial. However, we note that our own investigator was greatly assisted by witness intermediaries when interviewing some vulnerable victim-survivors.

On 30 May 2023, the Honourable Elise Archer MP, Attorney-General and Minister for Justice, provided an update in Parliament on the Witness Intermediary Scheme pilot. The Attorney-General said that, since the scheme began on 1 March 2021, witness intermediaries had assisted witnesses on more than 800 occasions by facilitating effective communication between children and vulnerable witnesses, police and the courts.[456]

The Attorney-General indicated that the Department of Justice had commissioned an independent process evaluation to 'analyse the data and conduct anonymous surveys and interviews with stakeholders'.[457] She said feedback from the evaluation had been 'overwhelmingly positive, with almost all stakeholders agreeing that the Witness Intermediary Scheme pilot is an important and necessary program promoting the interests of justice in criminal trials'.[458]

The key findings of the process evaluation were:

- There is a high level of support for the purpose of the [Witness Intermediary Scheme Pilot] among evaluation participants and its potential to contribute positively to criminal justice processes in Tasmania.
- Most [Witness Intermediary Scheme Pilot] activity involved child witnesses, with far fewer cases involving adults with communication needs.
- [Witness intermediaries] are generally considered essential for child witnesses. Stakeholders are divided on the need to involve witness intermediaries when interviewing/questioning teenagers with good communication capabilities, however the best way to determine this eligibility is unclear.
- In practice, the role and functions of [witness intermediaries] in the context of the role of other stakeholders (including police, Witness Assistance Officers, lawyers, prosecutors and judicial officers) requires further clarity and adherence.
- Stakeholders were largely satisfied with referral and matching processes.

- The expertise of [witness intermediaries] is valued, however there are some stakeholders who believe that the justice system already adequately caters to meeting the communication needs of vulnerable witnesses.
- Further stakeholder engagement and marketing of [Witness Intermediary Scheme Pilot] among stakeholders is required to clarify the unique role and functions of witness intermediaries and how all stakeholders can collaborate most effectively around vulnerable witnesses.
- The marrying of health and legal expertise in the criminal justice system has resulted in both positive and challenging experiences for stakeholders and requires further refinement in relation to communication assessments, recommendations, reports and court attendance.
- Training of [witness intermediaries] appears to be effective, however additional confidence building for working in court settings may be useful.
- Witness intermediaries are eager for structured peer support, mentoring and professional supervision.
- There are some concerns related to the administration of the [Witness Intermediary Pilot Scheme] covering areas of remuneration and working conditions, time management, opportunities for [witness intermediaries] and feedback mechanisms.
- There is widespread support for considering the use of witness intermediaries for other vulnerable groups.[459]

The use of witness intermediaries has also been evaluated positively in New South Wales.

The Attorney-General said that the findings and recommendations from the process evaluation are being considered and that the Department of Justice would implement them.[460]

The Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act also made procedural amendments to the Witness Intermediary Scheme.[461]

Using intermediaries in child sexual abuse offence cases in Tasmania is an important measure. Although witness assistance officers can help children and vulnerable adult witnesses to some extent, communication difficulties may not be immediately recognisable or may be regarded as insurmountable barriers to prosecution. Prosecutors may decide not to proceed because a child witness has difficulty communicating what happened to them. The Witness Intermediary Scheme may allow some cases to proceed that previously would not have, as well as increasing the possibility of police and prosecutors getting the best evidence from witnesses with communication difficulties. We also consider that the Witness Intermediary Scheme pilot can help build the skills and understanding of police in interviewing children and vulnerable witnesses.

At present, the Witness Intermediary Scheme does not apply to a defendant in a prosecution for a sexual offence.[462] The Tasmania Law Reform Institute recommended that the scheme apply to all people with extra communication needs who are involved in the criminal justice system, whether as witnesses, victims of crime, suspects or accused persons.[463] Tasmania Legal Aid also supported extending the scheme to accused persons who are children or whose difficulties in communication mean they need help in engaging in proceedings.[464] We agree with that view and recommend accordingly. We believe there would also be advantages to amending the legislation to explicitly provide for use of witness intermediaries by police when interviewing children and young people. We also consider there may be benefits to using the scheme for vulnerable adult witnesses, including adult survivors of child sexual abuse, on a routine basis. This should be considered in the review being conducted by the Department of Justice following the evaluation of the pilot scheme.

1. The Tasmanian Government should extend the Witness Intermediary Scheme to include children who are under investigation for, or who have been charged with, sexual offences, and fund it to do so.
2. The Tasmanian Government should consider whether legislation should be enacted requiring police to use witness intermediaries in police interviews of children and young people and adults with communication needs (including defendants), relating to sexual offences.

5.2.2 Special measures

Children in child sexual abuse cases are a special category of witness. Most Australian jurisdictions have legislation to reduce the stress on child witnesses in child sexual abuse cases by providing special measures for how they give evidence. Some of these measures also apply to adult complainants in sexual offence cases.[465] These measures aim to minimise the potential for distress and retraumatisation in giving evidence.

In 2019, the Tasmanian Government changed the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act to provide a range of special measures for child witnesses. These provisions can apply to adult witnesses in the circumstances described below. The Act's special support provisions include:

- Use of special hearings to pre-record evidence. A court can make an order for a special hearing after hearing an application from the prosecution.[466] In a special hearing, the child gives evidence before the jury is empanelled and then does not need to attend the trial.

- Provision for giving of evidence by audiovisual link if facilities are available, unless otherwise ordered.[467] This means the child is not in the courtroom and is not exposed to the accused person.
- A prior statement, such as an audiovisual police interview, may be admitted into evidence, provided the judge makes an order.[468]
- A child is entitled to have a support person near them. The judge must approve the choice of support person.[469]
- A child witness' evidence at trial is automatically recorded. If there is a retrial it can be used again if the judge orders that this occurs.[470]

Under the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act, adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse who are subject of a witness intermediary order, because they have been assessed as having a communication need, are also entitled to special support.[471] The same special measures that apply to child witnesses in sexual offence proceedings also apply to these adult witnesses. They can have an approved support person present, and a prior statement, such as an audiovisual interview, may be admitted into evidence. Evidence is given by audiovisual link unless otherwise ordered.[472]

There are also some other special measures for adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse (an 'affected person') who are not the subject of a witness intermediary order.[473] A judge can make an order for a special hearing to pre-record the evidence if the judge considers this is in the interests of justice and the other party consents.[474] A judge can also make such orders after hearing an application for a special hearing, including orders for a support person and giving evidence by audiovisual link at the special hearing (which means the victim-survivor does not need to be in court).[475] Even if there is no special hearing, the evidence of an adult victim-survivor of child sexual abuse will be automatically audiovisually recorded at trial, and this recording may be used as evidence in a future trial.[476]

If any further orders are required to assist a witness, a judge can make an order declaring that person to be a 'special witness' if satisfied that:

a. by reason of intellectual, mental or physical disability, the person is, or is likely to be, unable to give evidence satisfactorily in the ordinary manner; or

b. by reason of age, cultural background, relationship to any party to the proceeding, the nature of the subject matter of the evidence or any other factor the court considers relevant, the person is likely –

   i. to suffer severe emotional trauma; or

   ii. to be so intimidated or distressed as to be unable to give evidence or to give evidence satisfactorily.[477]

The DPP told us that pre-recording the entire evidence of children and other special witnesses (in a special hearing) has resulted in positive outcomes, such as:

- lessening stress on the witness, in that the witness can come at an appointed time and have their evidence heard
- creating a more streamlined process than a trial and providing the ability to edit the evidence played to the jury. This allows children and special witnesses to be 'eased into' the proceedings in a less formal way and may enable them to take more frequent breaks
- increasing the likelihood that judges will intervene and control questioning.[478]

The DPP stated that these special measures are routinely used in child sexual abuse trials.[479]

The DPP also informed us that, on some occasions, this process has resulted in an earlier plea of guilty because several people have entered pleas shortly after the pre-recording.[480]

Professor Cashmore agrees that measures of this kind ease the prosecution process for children. She said these measures:

> … are valuable measures that ease child witnesses' experience of giving evidence in ways that do not impugn the defendant's right to a fair trial. It is also my observation that these measures, and particularly witness intermediaries, may have some educative value for lawyers, judges and others involved in the process. This understanding promotes and improves the adoption of a child-sensitive approach by all stakeholders in the prosecutorial process.[481]

For a witness under 18 years of age or a victim-survivor of an alleged sexual assault, the DPP Guidelines state that the prosecutor must consider whether the special measures in the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act apply. [482] If they do, the prosecutor should advise the witness of their options and consider, especially with a child witness, having their evidence pre-recorded.[483]

We heard how daunting the court process can be for adult victim-survivors because it may mean reliving traumatic experiences that occurred when they were children. As Ms Sallese told us:

> The lead-up to the court hearing was quite harrowing for me. I had buried it all for 24 years, and then I was suddenly experiencing all of the things that I should probably have experienced at the time, again in my forties.[484]

Professor Cashmore said there should be an opportunity for adult victim-survivors to have allowances when giving evidence:

> … I think there needs to be the opportunity, a window there for those people to be protected in the same way with special measures so that they can give their evidence in a fair way. If you're under immense stress you don't give your best evidence.[485]

We consider that adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse should have the same protections that are available to child complainants. Often, adult victim-survivors will have suffered significant trauma over many years. Tiffany Skeggs, a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse, told us that the need to recount events each time she spoke with someone different, including the police and lawyers, was exhausting and traumatic.[486]

Making it easier for adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse to give evidence by using special measures recognises that trauma. The protections available to child witnesses should automatically apply to all complainants in cases involving child sexual abuse, regardless of their age at the time of giving evidence. The DPP told us he thought it would be beneficial to have a presumption in favour of admitting prior audiovisual statements (from police interviews) and having evidence at a special hearing given by audiovisual link for adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse (not just for child witnesses).[487]

The DPP considered that introducing a non-exhaustive list of special measures that can be made during a trial, such as the use of a screen between the victim-survivor and the accused person when the victim-survivor gives evidence in court, should be included in the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act.[488] We agree it would be useful for the court to direct the use of a screen in cases where the witness wants to give evidence in court.

The Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act made changes to the special measures provisions in the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act by extending:

- the ability to admit audiovisual recordings of police interviews as all, or part of, the evidence-in-chief of adult victims or special witnesses in sexual offence or family violence proceedings[489]
- the use of pre-recording of audiovisual evidence to any other witness where it is in the interests of justice to conduct the pre-recording, and the parties agree.[490]

We support these changes.

Finally, in our view, the special measures in the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act are unnecessarily complex, poorly drafted and extremely difficult to understand. The DPP shares this view, telling us that the Act is:

> … somewhat clunky and difficult to follow. It is particularly confusing that there are definitions for affected child, affected person, prescribed proceedings, prescribed witnesses, special witnesses, specified offence and specified proceeding.[491]

These provisions should be redrafted so the measures that apply to children, adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and people who are using a witness intermediary are much clearer. The special measures provisions could be simplified and rationalised as much as possible at the same time as drafting the amendments we recommend to the special measures.

Recommendation 16.11

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act 2001 to simplify the legislation to clarify when special measures are available to adults who are complainants in trials relating to child sexual abuse and allow them to:
    a. have a support person present when they give evidence in court
    b. give their evidence at a special hearing before the trial unless the judge considers that this would be contrary to the interests of justice, regardless of whether the accused consents
    c. be shielded from the view of the accused person by a screen or partition if they choose to give evidence in court.
2. The Tasmanian Government should ensure courts, public defence counsel (such as Tasmania Legal Aid) and the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions are appropriately funded to carry out this recommendation.

5.2.3 Quality of audiovisual recordings

We have discussed the need for audiovisual recording facilities in all locations where specialist police take statements from victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. We also heard about the need for modern and consistent statewide audiovisual recording facilities in the Supreme and Magistrates courts.[492] These facilities support police interview recordings being used as victim-survivors, evidence at trial. They also support victim-survivor recordings being used as evidence in a special hearing at which the victim-survivor will be cross-examined. These special hearing recordings are played to the jury in the trial, avoiding the need for the victim-survivor to attend the trial to give evidence in person. If there is a retrial, the same recording can be played to the new jury.

The DPP stated that the audiovisual recording facilities in the Supreme and Magistrates courts are poor, and that the quality of recordings is far from desirable.[493] The DPP further stated that:

> The recordings often do not adequately capture the subtle emotions of a witness. We have instances where the recording has not worked and the witness has > been required to participate in the pre-recording again. In one other matter a pre-recording included a portion where the witness listened to some telephone intercept material. In court it was evident that the material was highly distressing to the witness; however, on the recording the image of the 'recording playing' [audio only] was the predominant image with the image of the witness being in a small box.[494]

The DPP advised us that it is not uncommon for Supreme Court staff to have limited understanding of how the audiovisual facilities work.[495] He noted that, apart from the standard of the system generally, this can further diminish the presentation of the recordings and the way these recordings are played in court.[496]

In our consultations, the ODPP also cited problems with the court's technology and capability, which can result in complainants having to give evidence again. Image quality can be grainy, and it can be difficult for the jury to assess the witness and their credibility.[497] Defence counsel told us that recordings of police interviews are generally of good quality but described video links into court as 'notoriously bad'.[498]

The DPP suggested that issues with audiovisual recordings in court could be overcome by funding and installing new audiovisual recording facilities and training staff to operate these new facilities.[499] We support that approach.

The Solicitor for the State informed us that the 2020–21 Tasmanian Budget allocated $1.8 million to upgrade audiovisual technologies across Tasmanian courts and the Tasmanian Prison Service, and that the project will be finished by the end of 2023.[500] We welcome that assurance and emphasise the urgency of improving the equipment as soon as possible. We also consider that improving the equipment will be of limited use without the equipment operators receiving proper training.

Recommendation 16.12

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. update the audiovisual equipment available to the Supreme and Magistrates Courts

b. discuss with the Supreme and Magistrates Courts ongoing training for relevant staff on using audiovisual equipment.

5.3 Ensuring relevant evidence is admissible

5.3.1 Broadening the test for tendency and coincidence evidence

The unfortunate reality in our criminal justice system is that, in cases of child sexual abuse where the only evidence of the abuse is the victim-survivor's evidence, it can be difficult for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the alleged offence occurred. Tendency and coincidence evidence (in the past often referred to as propensity or similar fact evidence) is evidence that attempts to show that:

- an accused person has a tendency to commit certain acts based on them having done it before, or
- it is likely that an accused person committed multiple offences based on the similarity of multiple allegations against them.

In the context of institutional child sexual abuse, an abuser may have committed offences against more than one child. In such cases, the laws of tendency and coincidence evidence apply to determine whether:

- evidence from other victim-survivors should be admitted in the trial, or
- whether a joint trial could be held to determine charges against an accused person made by multiple complainants.

In the past, the law was restrictive in its approach to allowing tendency or coincidence evidence. This has been distressing for victim-survivors who have felt that a jury was not getting the full picture of an accused person and the potential nature and breadth of their offending.

Professor Cashmore described the way such evidentiary rules can make it difficult for victim-survivors giving evidence:

> But then we have a legal system that tends to split and dice those stories so you don't get a whole narrative, a coherent narrative, about what happens; where you have separated trials and there are issues around tendency and coincidence evidence. All of it makes it very much harder for a complainant to tell a story in terms that is really the whole of the story. You're asked to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, but telling the whole story can be really difficult, particularly if you're not being questioned in a way that actually allows that whole story to emerge.[501]

Restrictions on tendency and coincidence evidence reflected a concern that a jury would give too much weight to the evidence, which may be unfairly prejudicial to the accused person.[502] However, Jury Reasoning Research conducted for the National Royal Commission found no evidence of unfair prejudice to the accused person.[503] The National Royal Commission recommended that the laws for tendency and coincidence evidence in prosecutions for child sexual abuse offences be reformed to allow for greater admissibility and cross-admissibility of tendency and coincidence evidence and to make it easier to try charges involving multiple complainants in a single trial.[504]

Legislative changes in recent years have broadened the admission of tendency and coincidence evidence.[505] In 2017, Tasmania introduced a presumption for joint trials to take place where there are two or more charges for sexual offences joined in the same indictment.[506]

These legislative changes, together with recent decisions of the High Court of Australia, have considerably relaxed the earlier principles that restricted the admission of such evidence.[507]

The Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act introduced further amendments to the Evidence Act, to broaden the test for the admission of tendency and coincidence evidence in criminal prosecutions involving child sexual offences.[508] The Act introduced the model provisions developed by the Uniform Evidence Law jurisdictions, which have already been introduced in New South Wales.[509] The provisions aim to address barriers to the admissibility of relevant evidence of an accused person's tendency to perpetrate sexual violence against children.[510]

The test for the admission of tendency and coincidence evidence is whether the court thinks it has 'significant probative value'.[511] If the prosecutor seeks the admission of the evidence, its probative value must outweigh 'the danger of unfair prejudice' to the accused person.[512] Section 97A(2) of the Evidence Act now provides that, where the accused is charged with a child sexual offence, it is presumed that certain categories of tendency evidence have a significant probative value. These include:

a. tendency evidence about the sexual interest that the defendant has or had in children (even if the defendant has not acted on the interest)

b. tendency evidence about the defendant acting on a sexual interest that the defendant has or had in children.

This applies whether the sexual interest or act relied upon relates to the complainant in the proceeding, or any other child or children generally.[513]

Under section 97A(4), the court has a discretion to decide that evidence falling within the provisions described above does not have significant probative value if it is satisfied that there are sufficient grounds to do so.

Section 97A(5) allows courts to consider certain matters, that they could not previously take into account, when deciding whether evidence can be admitted to show that the defendant had a tendency to offend sexually against children. For example, the court can now consider that evidence of the defendant having a sexual interest in children is ‘of significant probative value’ even if the child to whom the evidence relates is of a different age, gender or sex than the victim.[514] The recent legislative changes have made it easier for the court to allow the jury to hear tendency and coincidence evidence.[515]

We are mindful that the changes made to the tendency and coincidence evidence provisions in the Evidence Act because of enacting the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendment) Act reflect an agreement between the Council of Attorneys-General (now the Standing Council of Attorneys-General).[516] We consider there are advantages in clearly setting out this complex area of law in legislation and do not propose any changes to these provisions.

5.3.2 Admitting evidence from the Magistrates Court

During our Commission of Inquiry, we heard about restrictions in the way evidence from a case in the Magistrates Court can be used in any later case involving the same victim-survivor.

Ms Collins told us about her experience with the criminal justice system.[517] The trial in her case did not proceed, and it appears that the charges were dismissed in the Magistrates Court in 2004, even though no evidence was presented to the Court and the Court did not decide whether sexual abuse had occurred.[518]

The DPP told us that it was not possible to reopen the case, even though there had been changes to the law since 2004 that would make it easier to prosecute the accused person today.[519]

There is no power for a matter to be reopened after charges have been dismissed in the Magistrates Court. The DPP informed us that a similar restriction applies in family violence offences but that this has been overcome by amending the Family Violence Act 2004 (‘Family Violence Act’).[520]

The DPP recommends inserting a new provision into the Criminal Code Act like the approach taken in family violence cases.[521] Section 13B of the Family Violence Act provides that if:

> a. a person is charged with a family violence offence (the first charge) in [the Magistrates Court] but is acquitted because the prosecution has informed the court that it will not be offering any evidence in support of the charge; and
> b. the person is charged with another family violence offence (the second charge) [in any court]
> [the earlier acquittal in the Magistrates Court does not prevent the court from hearing evidence of the first charge as evidence that the accused person had a tendency to commit certain acts based on the assertion that they have done it before].

We consider this a sensible approach that should be adopted for all sexual assault matters, including child sexual abuse matters.

Recommendation 16.13

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to extend the principles of section 13B of the Family Violence Act 2004 to sexual assault matters, including child sexual abuse. This will ensure that where a person is acquitted in the Magistrates Court because the prosecution has informed the Court it will not be offering any evidence in support of the charge, the acquittal does not prevent admitting evidence of relationship, tendency or coincidence evidence in a later related matter.

5.4 Improving case management

In this section, we recommend a change to a procedure that would allow judges to make rulings on the admissibility of evidence before a jury is sworn in. This will reduce delays and improve case management.

5.4.1 Pre-trial rulings

Before a criminal trial occurs, a judge may make rulings ('pre-trial rulings') on procedural questions and legal arguments put by the prosecution or defence counsel, including arguments about the admissibility of certain evidence. This makes the trial process more efficient by sometimes making it unnecessary to suspend witness testimony during the trial while these legal arguments are considered.

Section 361A(1) of the Criminal Code Act provides that after a person has entered their plea, but before a jury is sworn in, among other things, the court may:

- determine any question of law or procedure that has arisen or is expected to arise in the trial3
- determine any question of fact that may lawfully be determined by a judge alone without a jury
- determine any other question that it considers necessary or convenient to determine to ensure the trial will be conducted fairly and expeditiously
- give such directions as it sees fit to resolve any issue or matter that it considers necessary or convenient to resolve before a jury is sworn.

Any admission, determination or direction made or given under section 361A(1) of the Criminal Code Act has the same status for the purposes of a new trial as if it had been made or given during the new trial.[522]

The DPP told us of limits in how this provision works in practice. Under the provision a judge can only make a ruling if the accused person has entered a plea. When an accused person enters a plea, the trial starts. The DPP stated that sometimes judges refuse to make rulings under the provision if they may not be the ultimate trial judge and that this can cause scheduling difficulties and delays.[523] He pointed out that all judges sit in Hobart, Burnie and, on occasion, Launceston, noting:

> If a pre-trial ruling is required for a matter listed in Burnie, and there is insufficient time for the trial proper to immediately follow the ruling, it may be a matter of months (perhaps over a year) before the judge who made the ruling is sitting in Burnie again. It would be beneficial to amend section 361A to avoid this situation.[524]

We understand there are now two Supreme Court judges who permanently sit in Launceston and Burnie (respectively), and that other judges travel on circuit to these courts. We also note it is up to the DPP to list trials in the Supreme Court. The DPP's concern about section 361A(1) may now be less acute.

However, we consider it would be beneficial to expand the circumstances in which such rulings can be made. In Victoria, section 199 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) allows pre-trial rulings to be made before an accused person has entered a plea.

Under section 204 of that Act:

> An order or other decision made at a directions hearing or other pre-trial hearing by a judge who is not the trial judge is binding on the trial judge unless the trial judge considers that it would not be in the interests of justice for the order or other decision to be binding.

Under section 205(1) of the Act:

> If a new trial is held, the court may treat any order or other decision made at a directions hearing or other pre-trial hearing held in connection with the earlier trial as if it had been made at a directions hearing or other pre-trial hearing held in connection with the new trial.[525]

We recommend that Tasmania's Criminal Code Act be amended to provide that a judge can make a ruling before the accused person has entered a plea.

Recommendation 16.14

The Tasmanian Government should, in similar terms to sections 199, 204 and 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic), amend the Criminal Code Act 1924 (including section 361A) to:

a. allow pre-trial rulings or orders to be made before the accused person has entered a plea

b. provide that such pre-trial rulings or orders are binding on a trial judge, even where a different judge made the order, unless the trial judge considers that would not be in the interests of justice

c. provide that such pre-trial rulings or orders apply at a new trial unless this would be inconsistent with any order or decision made on an appeal or would not be in the interests of justice.

5.5 Assisting juries to assess the evidence of children

In a criminal trial, the jury must listen to all the evidence and decide which parts of the evidence should be accepted. The judge is responsible for directing the jury about the law and for ensuring the proceedings are conducted according to the law.

After witnesses have given their evidence and prosecution and defence counsel have made their closing submissions, the judge directs the jury about the elements of the offence and summarises the evidence. The judge also directs or warns the jury about how to consider certain matters. Various legal principles govern the jury directions that a judge must give.

The National Royal Commission recommended that each state and territory develops jury directions about children and the impact of child sexual abuse.[526] Victoria has introduced legislation about jury directions that is designed to assist juries to assess a child's evidence and to consider other questions relevant to the trial.[527] We discuss the Victorian provisions in more detail below.

In this section, we discuss jury directions in the context of child sexual abuse offence cases and make recommendations for helping juries to assess the evidence of children.

5.5.1 Reliability of children's evidence

Both the prosecution and defence can ask a judge to warn the jury that a witness' evidence may be unreliable. Unless the judge considers there are good reasons for not doing so, the judge must:

- warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable
- inform the jury of matters that may cause it to be unreliable
- warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether or not to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it.[528]

Evidence that could be considered unreliable includes that which may be affected by 'age, ill health, whether physical or mental, injury or the like'.[529]

A warning cannot be based on the child's age alone.[530] But there may be aspects of the evidence of a child that could be thought to cast doubt on what they have said. In these circumstances the judge can, on their own initiative or on an application of the prosecution or defence, give a warning in the terms listed above.[531]

Failure to give such a warning may be a basis for an appeal against conviction. For that reason, judges may warn about the reliability of a child's evidence out of an abundance of caution. Excessive use of warnings, combined with a commonly held (and incorrect) belief that children often lie about sexual matters, could influence some juries to disbelieve a child because of the way they have given their evidence. Adjunct Associate Professor Terese Henning told us:

> Prosecution counsel and complainants are faced with generations of deeply embedded and persistent perceptions about sexual offences and prejudices around children's credibility … so those complainants start off at a considerable disadvantage in addition to the difficulties of withstanding the rigours of the trial process itself.[532]

In Victoria, the Jury Directions Act 2015 (Vic) ('Jury Directions Act (Vic)') codifies the directions that judges must give in criminal trials. Like Tasmanian legislation, it provides for judicial warnings about matters that may affect the reliability of a child's or other person's evidence and specifies the way in which juries should be warned about factors affecting reliability. Unlike in Tasmania, Victoria also provides for juries to be given directions about the difficulties child witnesses often face in giving evidence in the same way that adults can, which may affect the way juries assess the reliability of a child's evidence. Professor Cashmore described these difficulties in the following way:

> A large body of evidence has established that children's memory is reliable. Often, however, those questioning children do not ask questions in ways that optimise the reliability or accuracy of the child's answer. Further, once a matter is in court, the child witness is potentially exposed to a range of stressors that make it more difficult to process information, answer questions and provide reliable evidence. These include the formality of the court, potentially facing the alleged abuser and cross-examination that is often confusing and developmentally inappropriate, designed to discredit the evidence of the witness.[533]

In Victoria, if a trial judge considers, before any evidence is given and after hearing submissions from the prosecution and defence, that the reliability or credibility of a child witness is likely to be an issue, section 44N of the Jury Directions Act (Vic) requires the judge to tell the jury that:

a. children can accurately remember and report past events; and

b. children are developing language and cognitive skills, and this may affect—

    i. whether children give a detailed, chronological or complete account; and

    ii. how children understand and respond to the questions they are asked; and

c. experience shows that, depending on a child's level of development, they—

i. may have difficulty understanding certain language, whether because that language is complicated for children or complicated generally; and…

ii. may have difficulty understanding certain concepts, whether because those concepts are complicated for children or complicated generally; and…

iii. may not request the clarification of a question they do not understand; and

iv. may not clarify an answer they have given that has been misunderstood.[534]

Judges must give this direction to juries before any evidence is given and after hearing submissions from the prosecution and defence.

The Jury Directions Act (Vic) provides some examples of situations in which children may have problems in answering questions, including the use of 'hypothetical, ambiguous, repetitive, multi-part or yes/no questions', or questions involving the use of 'passive voice, negatives and double negatives'.[535]

While we consider witness intermediaries are likely to play an important role in supporting child witnesses to give their best evidence, a provision like section 44N of the Jury Directions Act (Vic) could help juries to understand the difficulties that children face in giving evidence and the distinctive ways in which they may do so.

5.5.2 Children's reactions to sexual abuse

Research into the reactions of children who have been sexually abused shows that victim-survivors respond in a variety of ways. Not all children who have been abused avoid the perpetrator; indeed, many of the witnesses we heard from continued to have some contact with their abuser after the abuse had stopped.

In our hearings, some victim-survivors told us that they continued to see the person who abused them for a long time after they were first abused because they did not understand they had been abused or had been groomed to believe that the abuser loved them or that they were in a 'relationship'.[536] Some victim-survivors had no choice but to continue seeing the abuser because of a family relationship or because the abuser held a role that they could not avoid (for example, as their teacher).[537]

Research also shows that sexual abuse disclosure typically occurs in stages.[538] If the child's first attempt to tell someone about their experience is not understood or acknowledged they may never go on to describe the extent of the abuse or they may do so many years later, often into adulthood. Michael Salter, Scientia Associate Professor of Criminology, School of Social Sciences, University of New South Wales, told us:

> Disclosure of child sexual abuse should be understood as an ongoing process rather than a discrete event, characterised by diverse behavioural and psychological indicators of trauma, as well as delayed, conflicted and even unconvincing disclosures followed by retraction or recantation. During this process, children are hyper-sensitive to displays of scepticism or disbelief in the conduct and tone of the adults they are trying to connect with. They anticipate not being believed or being blamed for their abuse and are likely to withhold further information or recant their disclosure entirely if they detect blame or scepticism.[539]

The DPP told us he supports jury directions to the effect that it is not uncommon for a complainant to maintain ties with the accused person many years after the sexual abuse occurred.[540]

Because juries may not understand these features of institutional child sexual abuse, we consider it would be useful for them to receive a direction from the judge informing them of these matters.

5.5.3 Corroboration warnings

Previous inquiries have discussed the history of warnings issued by judges in relation to child witnesses and sexual abuse.[541] In summary, historically, children who alleged they had been sexually abused were regarded as suspect witnesses, so the law required that their evidence be corroborated. Similar suspicions applied to adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. However, we know that abusers generally conceal their offending and that prosecutions for child sexual abuse offences often rest on word-against-word evidence.

Even after legislation abolished this formal corroboration requirement, judges presiding over sexual offence trials used to be required to warn juries that it could be 'dangerous to convict' based on the complainant's evidence alone and/or that the evidence of complainants in sexual offence cases should be scrutinised with great care. The use of the words 'dangerous to convict' may well have been interpreted by some juries as a direction to find the accused person not guilty.

Judges also had to give jury directions based on myths and assumptions about the typical behaviour of people alleging they had been raped or sexually abused—for example, the false belief that sexual offence victim-survivors usually tell someone about the offence soon after it occurs, although research shows that this is rarely the case. The National Royal Commission recommended changes to jury directions or warnings.[542] These changes were intended to encourage reporting of offences against children and address incorrect assumptions that members of the community (including the judiciary and legal profession) may hold about the behaviour of child victims of sexual abuse.[543]

In 2010, Tasmania enacted provisions that prohibited a trial judge from warning the jury:

- that children are unreliable witnesses
- that the evidence of children is inherently less credible or reliable, or requires more careful scrutiny, than the evidence of adults
- about the unreliability of a particular child's evidence solely because of their age
- in a criminal proceeding, of the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of a witness who is a child.[544]

The requirement that the evidence of all complainants in sexual offence trials be corroborated has also been removed. Adjunct Associate Professor Henning described these as 'the most significant reforms' in relation to children and sexual offences.[545]

Section 136 of the Criminal Code Act provides that:

- At the trial of a person accused of certain sexual offences, no rule of law or practice requires a judge to give a warning to the jury to the effect that it is unsafe to convict the person on the uncorroborated evidence of a person against whom the crime is alleged to have been committed.
- A judge shall not give a warning of this kind unless satisfied that the warning is justified in the circumstances.[546]

This provision means that the judge is not required to give such a warning, but it does not prohibit such a direction being given.

The DPP told us that some Tasmanian judges in sexual offence trials will give what is often referred to as a 'Murray direction' (derived from the case of R v Murray), which directs the jury that where there is only one witness asserting that a crime has been committed, the evidence of the complainant should be scrutinised with great care before a verdict of guilty is delivered.[547] The DPP said that, on occasion, that direction is given even when there are other witnesses who give supporting evidence.[548] He told us that this is done on the basis that if the jury rejected the evidence of other witnesses, the complainant's evidence should be treated as if it were the evidence of only one witness.[549]

The DPP said that giving the Murray direction in these circumstances undermines the effect of section 136 of the Criminal Code Act, which, as explained above, removes the requirement to warn the jury about the dangers of conviction on the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant in sexual offence cases. This practice may make juries reluctant to convict in cases where the prosecution case depends solely on the complainant's evidence.

The practice of issuing a Murray direction may undermine uncorroborated evidence from a victim-survivor. Robert Boost, a victim-survivor, described his experience reporting to Tasmania Police in 2020 as 'fantastic' until the DPP decided not to proceed based on the absence of corroborating evidence:

> My bad experience with the criminal justice system really occurred when Tasmania Police approached the DPP to discuss laying charges on the perpetrator. Unfortunately, I heard from Tasmania Police that the DPP had formed the view that, while I was likely to be a reliable witness, there was insufficient corroborating evidence from other witnesses, and the matter did not meet the DPP's threshold for proceeding to trial.[550]

In Ewen v R, the New South Wales Court of Appeal was critical of the practice of giving a Murray direction solely because the evidence of the complainant was uncorroborated. Justice Simpson commented that:

> A 'Murray direction', based only on the absence of corroboration, is, in my opinion, tantamount to a direction that it would be dangerous to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant.[551]

The DPP supports adopting a provision along the lines of section 294AA of the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW), which limits the warnings that can be given in word-against-word cases to a further extent than the Tasmanian provisions.[552] This provision prohibits the Murray direction from being given solely because the complainant's evidence is uncorroborated.[553] Instead, the DPP proposes that, when a Murray direction is given, the judge should have to warn the jury that it is the circumstances of the case generally, and not the complainant, that require the direction; and that it is not unusual in cases of sexual assault that the conduct is not witnessed.[554]

We agree that it is appropriate to limit the use of Murray directions where the complainant is still a child or is an adult who is giving evidence about childhood abuse. Legislation that does so should not prevent counsel from requesting that the judge draws the jury's attention to features of the complainant's evidence, other than the lack of corroboration, that may be relevant in determining whether the accused person can be found guilty beyond reasonable doubt.

5.5.4 The effect of delay

In the past, judges were also required to warn juries about the danger of convicting a person accused of a sexual offence when there was a delay in reporting the offence. We heard from victim-survivors of child sexual abuse who had not told anyone about the offending for many years after it had ceased. Their reasons for not doing so included:

- not recognising the experience(s) as abuse
- shame and embarrassment about having been abused

- not wanting their families to know they had been abused
- fear about what the abuser would do if they reported.

Mr Boost told us how he grappled with shame for many years after he was abused in the early 1990s:

> I kept the perpetrator's abuse to myself until 2014. I felt ashamed of what had happened. I blamed myself for what I saw at the time as a relationship with the perpetrator, not grooming or abuse.[555]

Victim-survivor Rachel (a pseudonym) also told us:

> After bottling the child sexual abuse for almost two years, I broke down and finally came out with details about the sexual abuse I had suffered … It was really difficult for me to talk about what I had been holding back for years.[556]

Victim-survivor Azra Beach, who told us she was abused while in the out of home care system, explained that she had no understanding that what was happening was abuse:

> [A fellow victim-survivor] and I didn't tell anyone about what was going on. We had no-one to tell. For me, I also didn't realise anything abnormal was happening. It was just the way that it was. This is what people do.[557]

Some victim-survivors were also afraid they would not be believed. Ms Skeggs told us: 'When I made my report I was terrified of not being believed by the authorities. [James] Griffin was a well-respected and seemingly powerful member of the community'.[558]

In years gone by, warnings about delay may have made juries reluctant to convict people for offences that occurred many years previously.

The National Royal Commission recommended states and territories legislate that jury directions about delay and credibility were not required. It recommended such legislation provide that no direction or warning that delay affects the complainant's credibility should be given, unless it was requested by the accused person and is warranted on the evidence; and that if a direction or warning is given, the judge should not use expressions such as 'dangerous or unsafe to convict' or 'scrutinise with great care'.[559]

In her witness statement, Professor Cashmore referred to a research report that she and co-authors had prepared for the National Royal Commission titled The Impact of Delayed Reporting on the Prosecution and Outcomes of Child Sexual Abuse Cases.[560] She summarised data on delayed reporting in New South Wales and South Australia. In these states, most reports were made within three months of the incident, but nearly one in four sexual assaults were reported more than five years after the offence, with some reports being made after 20 years.[561] Men were more likely to delay their reporting, and they delayed reporting for longer than women. The longest delays occurred when the accused perpetrator was a person in a position of authority. In these cases, most reports were made at least 10 years after the incident.[562]

Professor Cashmore commented that this data showed that:

> … there are relatively high instances of delayed reporting of child sexual abuse where that abuse occurs in institutional settings. These reports relate to historical child sexual abuse in some older-style residential institutions, as well as some more recent church-based and sporting organisations. Whether the very delayed reporting evident in these earlier cases will continue for more recent and current sexual abuse is uncertain, given the increased awareness and exposure of both sexual abuse and the associated cover-up to protect the institutions.[563]

Adjunct Associate Professor Henning described the way many of these repealed laws or practices, including warnings about delays, 'played to stereotypes that juries have in relation to who is a "genuine victim"'.[564] However, she noted that reform can only go some way to ameliorate this, with an example:

> … in cases of historical sexual assault, there is obviously an absence of recent complaint. Defence counsel play on that and it doesn't matter that the judge is mandated to instruct the jury that absence of recent complaint does not necessarily indicate the mendacity of the complainant, or fabrication of the offences. It's just one of those misconceptions that are difficult to dislodge.[565]

The Criminal Code Act reflects the National Royal Commission's recommendation to some extent. It provides that where the alleged victim does not make a complaint, or where the complaint comes a long time after the alleged offence, the judge shall:

- warn the jury that absence of complaint or delay in complaining does not necessarily indicate that the allegation that the crime was committed is false
- inform the jury that there may be good reasons why such a person may hesitate in making, or may refrain from making, a complaint.[566]

Victoria's Jury Directions Act goes further than the Tasmanian provision. It provides that if, after hearing the submissions from the prosecution and defence, the trial judge considers that there is likely to be evidence of a delayed complaint, the judge must give the jury certain information before evidence of delay can be given. In these circumstances, the trial judge must inform the jury that:

- people may react differently to sexual offences and there is no typical, proper or normal response to a sexual offence
- some people may complain immediately to the first person they see, while others may not complain for some time, and others may never make a complaint
- delay in making a complaint about a sexual offence is common
- there may be good reasons why a person may not complain, or may delay complaining, about a sexual offence.[567]

The provision applies to trials regardless of whether the victim-survivor is an adult or a child.

We prefer the positive framing of this direction, which focuses on common practices, compared with the Tasmanian direction, which is framed in the negative. The DPP supports introducing a direction about the effects of sexual abuse on a child, including that it is known that children often do not complain for many years.[568] We recommend that a provision similar to that in Victoria be adopted in Tasmania.

5.5.5 Timing of jury directions

Jury directions are usually given near the end of a trial as part of what is known as the judge's charge to the jury.

The National Royal Commission noted considerable merit in allowing the trial judge to give a direction at any time before the close of evidence at the discretion of the judge and requiring some directions to be given at particular times in the trial, generally earlier than might otherwise occur.[569]

In its report Improving the Justice System Response to Sexual Offences, the Victorian Law Reform Commission noted that research suggests if jurors hear a jury direction early in the trial, they will have an informed position in their minds before they hear the complainant's evidence and before they form any opinions based on misconceptions.[570]

The Victorian Law Reform Commission recommended jury directions be given before or during the evidence and that judges repeat them at any time in the trial, if either party requests, or if the judge considers there is evidence in the trial that requires the direction to be given.[571] We consider this is sensible and recommend a similar approach be taken in Tasmania.

5.5.6 Non–case specific jury education

Myths and misconceptions about sexual offences, including child sexual abuse, have long affected the criminal justice system's responses to child sexual abuse.[572] As the National Royal Commission noted, these myths and misconceptions have influenced the law and the attitudes that jurors bring to their decision making.[573]

The National Royal Commission identified the following myths and misconceptions as being particularly prominent in child sexual abuse cases:

- women and children make up stories of sexual abuse
- a victim of sexual abuse will cry for help and attempt to escape the abuser
- a victim of sexual abuse will avoid the abuser
- sexual assault, including child sexual abuse, can be detected by a medical examination.[574]

Adjunct Associate Professor Henning told us that prosecutions of sexual offences are uniquely difficult. She indicated this is largely because of deeply held and persistent societal views about 'genuine victims', who they are and their behaviour, and the nature of consent.[575]

We heard evidence from Dr Tidmarsh from Whole Story Consulting that non-specific training for jurors, conducted before a trial starts, could minimise the impact of myths and misconceptions that defence counsel may want to use during trial.[576]

Dr Tidmarsh stated that:

> … given what we know about how strongly juries struggle to move beyond their own psychological schema, their own understanding of sexual relationships, of sexual offending relationships, their own judgment, to leave jury members unprepared to meet the complexity and the nuance of these kinds of stories, I think it does them and the justice system a significant disservice, and that anything we can do, without prejudicing the fairness, the rights of the accused, to inform them of the background of these stories; what grooming is, for example, would be very beneficial and would certainly level the playing field.[577]

Dr Tidmarsh informed us that some models have used non-case specific educational sessions for jurors and potential jurors before trial. These sessions encourage defence counsel to use fewer myths and misconceptions than they otherwise would have.[578]

When we put this idea to Professor Cashmore at hearings, she agreed we should not assume jurors understand the dynamics of child sexual abuse. She added:

> But for jurors coming in, it is a strange environment and these are difficult cases to determine, and the evidence … it's not an equal playing field … So, I think having jurors who have a better understanding of what the dynamics and the context and the consequences, you know, why children behave in certain ways: they may never have had any experience, and hopefully they haven't had any experience, of knowing a child who's been sexually abused and understanding that. So, it makes sense to me to even the playing field a little.[579]

One witness in a child sexual abuse matter (who was herself a child at the time of trial) described her frustration at the fact that most female jurors were excluded through defence challenges, leaving mainly men around the same age or older than the abuser.[580] She added:

> The entire defence hinged on the prevailing attitude of 'children lie about sexual abuse'. But how true is this underlying assumption? The literature shows that children rarely lie about child sexual abuse.
> I wonder what these kinds of trials would look like if the jury (and the public) were made aware of this fact. What if decision-making in the justice system was informed by facts and statistics, just like medicine and science are, rather than being informed only by the attitudes of the average juror? Sounds radical, but it shouldn't be.[581]

In New Zealand, the Sexual Violence Legislation Act 2021 (NZ) introduced a requirement for judges to direct juries as 'necessary or desirable to address any relevant misconception relating to sexual cases' with a non-exhaustive list of possible misconceptions relating to false allegations, victim blaming and rape myths.[582] A New Zealand study on juror use of cultural misconceptions in sexual violence trials noted that such directions rely on sound judicial education and implementation by individual judges.[583] The study noted that, if done poorly, directions may focus jurors on the misconceptions they set out to rectify and could make the situation worse.[584]

The New Zealand study also observed a growing interest in other forms of jury education; for example, information about cultural misconceptions could be sent out with jury summons, provided in writing or by video at the time of jury selection, or left in the jury room.[585] However, as with other forms of juror education about misconceptions, the New Zealand study indicates there is relatively little knowledge about what works and to what extent awareness raising affects reasoning in real cases.[586] We consider that any information given to jurors should be factual and focus on common practices in relation to child sexual abuse, rather than being negatively framed to overcome common myths.

The National Royal Commission reported mixed views about the benefits or otherwise of providing video or other material to juries, particularly about child sexual abuse. It considered that authorising trial judges to give directions about child witnesses and child sexual abuse is better than developing extra educational material to assist juries.[587]

Section 108C of the Tasmanian Evidence Act provides for juries to be educated about child development and child behaviour—for example, why their failure to complain or their failure to respond to sexual abuse in a particular way is normal. The ODPP told us that this provision is not often used but that it is a valuable provision.[588] In our view, the ODPP should consider whether to use this section in child sexual abuse cases. We are aware that section 108C of the Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) has been used in New South Wales to admit opinion evidence to help understand the behaviours of child sexual abuse victim-survivors and common misconceptions about their behaviours and responses.[589]

Although we consider that providing non-case specific information to juries about common practices relating to child sexual abuse is not enough in itself to dispel myths and change attitudes, we consider such information could play an important role.

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to:

a. require trial judges to explain to juries the difficulties child witnesses often face in giving evidence in court, and the distinctive ways in which they give evidence, in cases where the reliability or credibility of a child witness is likely to be in issue, in similar terms to section 44N of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (Vic)

b. provide that in jury trials of a person accused of a child sexual abuse offence, if a party so requests, the judge must, unless the judge considers there are good reasons for not doing so, direct the jury that

    i. children who have been subjected to child sexual abuse respond in a variety of ways and some children who have been abused do not avoid the alleged perpetrator

    ii. disclosure of abuse may occur over time and not all on one occasion

c. prohibit, in similar terms to section 294AA of the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW), a judge in a trial of a person indicted for sexual offences against a child from

    i. warning a jury against convicting the accused person solely because the only evidence is the evidence of the complainant

    ii. directing the jury about the danger of conviction in the absence of corroboration

d. amend the Evidence Act 2001, in similar terms to section 52 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (Vic), to require a trial judge who considers that delay in complaining is likely to be raised in a trial for a child sexual abuse offence to inform the jury that

    i. people react differently to sexual abuse and there is no typical, proper or normal response to a sexual offence

    ii. some people may complain immediately to the first person they see, while others may not complain for some time, and others may never make a complaint

    iii. it is common for a person to delay making a complaint of sexual abuse, particularly if it occurred when they were a child

    iv. there may be good reasons why a person may not complain, or may delay complaining about sexual abuse

e. amend the Evidence Act 2001 to provide that the warnings and directions can be

   i. given by a judge to the jury at the earliest opportunity, such as before the evidence is called or as soon as practicable after it is presented in the trial

   ii. repeated by the judge at any time during the trial

   iii. given by the judge's own motion, or if requested by either party before the trial or at any time during the trial.

5.6 Improving professional education for judicial officers

As the Victorian Law Reform Commission acknowledged in its work on sexual offences reform in 2003, discussion and education that foster cultural change in the criminal justice system are essential elements for change.[590]

The Victorian Law Reform Commission stated that those who work in the system, including police, lawyers, magistrates and judges, are likely to be more responsive to the needs of victim-survivors, and to perform their role more effectively, if they understand the context in which sexual offences commonly occur and the social and psychological aspects of sexual offences that affect complainants.[591] These reflections on the importance of education remain just as relevant today.

In most states, it has become increasingly common for judicial officers to attend education programs. The Judicial College of Victoria has been offering such programs, including programs on sexual assault, for many years. We consider such programs should be offered in Tasmania and/or that Tasmanian judicial officers could be encouraged to attend interstate programs.

Changes in relation to understanding the myths and misconceptions about child sexual abuse over the past few years, together with legislative changes, make it important for the courts to be supported with information and training.

Adjunct Associate Professor Henning said that in her experience:

> ... there's not a resistance on the part of the [Tasmanian] judiciary to obtaining information to inform themselves in areas of expertise and specialisation where they feel they need to have a great deal more information.[592]

Professional development of judicial officers can be achieved in various ways. Professor Cashmore spoke to us about educating judges, lawyers and jurors via witness intermediaries, which we discuss in Section 5.2.1.[593] She observed that, in New South Wales, the need for witness intermediaries to intervene has diminished as judges have become more alert to the needs of child witnesses.[594]

Tasmania could draw on training and materials developed in other Australian jurisdictions. For example, the Judicial Commission of New South Wales has recently published a new chapter in the Equality Before the Law Bench Book to raise judicial awareness about the nature and impact of trauma and its prevalence, and how to apply trauma-informed principles to the task of judicial decision making. The chapter also covers trauma and its impact on victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.[595] In addition, the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration has published the Bench Book for Children Giving Evidence in Australian Courts, which was updated in March 2020.[596] The Supreme Court could consider developing professional development material based on this bench book.

In Victoria, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court directs the professional development and continuing education and training of judicial officers.[597] In discharging this responsibility, the Chief Justice may direct a judicial officer to take part in specified professional development or continuing education and training activity.[598] We consider that Tasmania should adopt a similar provision.

We encourage the Supreme Court to support members of the Bench to actively seek out and participate in professional development and continuous education programs and activities as a matter of course. Judicial officers could attend programs already developed in other jurisdictions, such as the programs offered by the Judicial College of Victoria.

Recommendation 16.16

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. fund the Supreme Court to support the professional development of judicial officers on the dynamics of child sexual abuse and trauma-informed practice

b. consider introducing legislation dealing with the responsibility of the Chief Justice to direct the professional development and continuing education and training of judicial officers, in similar terms to section 28A of the Supreme Court Act 1986 (Vic).

6 After a conviction

In this section, we focus on what happens after an accused person pleads guilty or is found guilty of child sexual abuse. We discuss:

- sentencing in child sexual abuse cases and recent sentencing trends
- the availability of perpetrator programs for child sex offenders in the community
- restorative justice as an alternative to traditional criminal justice responses.

We discuss victim support services in Chapter 17.

6.1 Sentencing

After an accused person pleads guilty or is found guilty, a sentencing hearing decides their sentence. At a sentencing hearing, the court may hear submissions from the prosecution and defence about:

- the facts of the case, including any mitigating factors (facts or circumstances that could lessen the severity of a sentence) or aggravating factors (facts or circumstances that could increase the sentence received)[599]
- the offender's circumstances (for example, the prosecution might refer to the offender's criminal history, while the defence might state that the offender has shown remorse)
- relevant sentencing principles (for example, the principle of proportionality, which means that the severity of the sentence must fit the seriousness of the crime)
- the type of sentence that might be appropriate (for example, imprisonment or a community-based order).[600]

A victim impact statement may be read out at a sentencing hearing, either by the victim or by the prosecution on the victim's behalf.[601]

After hearing submissions from the prosecution and defence, a court must consider factors in deciding the appropriate sentence to impose on an offender including:

- sentencing practices for the offence type
- the nature and seriousness of the offence
- the impact of the offence on any victim, including any injury, loss or damage caused by the offence
- the personal circumstances of any victim

- whether the offender pleaded guilty and at what stage of the proceedings this occurred
- any mitigating or aggravating factors.[602]

We heard from victim-survivors about their experience with the sentencing process. Victim-survivor Katrina Munting explained to us that she 'found the experience of the criminal justice system devastating' and that she was not sure she could put herself through it again.[603] However, she said:

> … I felt believed by the court and this helped me. I found his Honour's disputed facts findings and sentencing remarks really helpful because they came from an impartial and authoritative perspective, and they recognised the pain and suffering I had been through.[604]

As noted above, when a court is sentencing an offender for child sexual abuse offences, the victim-survivor may make a written statement to the court that describes how they were affected by the offence and can refer to any injury they have suffered. The victim-survivor can request that they or another person acting on their behalf read the statement to the court before the offender is sentenced.[605] The Witness Assistance Service at the ODPP can help a victim-survivor prepare their statement.[606]

The Victims of Crime Service in the Department of Justice also provides support in preparing victim impact statements.[607] Catherine Edwards, Manager, Victims Support Services, Department of Justice, said that all counsellors at the Victims of Crime Service provide support with writing and submitting victim impact statements based on the victim's capacity and their request.[608] This includes proofreading a victim's draft statement, interviewing the victim and working with them.[609]

Victim-survivors told us of their experiences in making their victim impact statements. Sam Leishman, a victim-survivor, remembers standing up in court and starting to read his statement. He told us:

> … I suddenly felt like the biggest person in the room because I was there standing up in front of everyone, including him, speaking up for the child that I once was when I felt that that had never been done before, and that was 36 years after when it first started, and that's a long time.[610]

By contrast, victim-survivor Leah Sallese described her experience as 'really traumatic'. She said:

> I had help … to prepare my victim impact statement. They also wrote and rewrote what I had to say. Because everything had to be so carefully put, basically, you know, and that was really traumatic because I was actually trying to say—I wanted to say certain things, and I was told I couldn't do that, and this is what you have to do, so I felt like a little bit of my power had been taken away … I didn't really get to say everything I wanted to say, basically.[611]

6.1.1 Sentencing trends

In Tasmania, the maximum penalty that a court can impose on a person for all sexual offences in the Criminal Code Act is 21 years' imprisonment.[612] Courts exercise discretion in sentencing and have established a range of sentences for different offences.[613]

The approach to sentencing child sex offenders, and the length of prison sentences imposed, have changed significantly in recent years.[614]

In Tasmania, the number of offenders who receive custodial sentences and the lengths of sentences for child sexual abuse have both increased. The Sentencing Advisory Council's research paper Sentencing for Serious Sex Offences Against Children confirmed a marked upward trend in sentencing in Tasmania for serious child sexual abuse offences when comparing the period 1 January 2015 to 30 September 2018 with the period 1 January 2008 to 31 December 2014.[615]

Also, the DPP can appeal against a sentence if they consider a different sentence should have been given.[616]

The DPP will take the complainant's view into consideration when determining whether to appeal.[617] The ODPP told us that the DPP had undertaken appeals against sentences in child sexual abuse matters, including in the case of Director of Public Prosecutions v Harington, which they considered provided strong guidance to courts in sentencing for these matters.[618] In that case, Justice Wood remarked that sentences for maintaining a sexual relationship (now persistent sexual abuse) were increasing, observing that:

> To some extent this is an inevitable consequence and a reflection of the greater community understanding of the long-term effects of child sexual abuse. The hearings of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse have provided the community and the courts with valuable insight with regard to the serious impact of abuse on child victims.[619]

The Sentencing Advisory Council reported that the median sentence for this offence doubled from three to six years in the period from 1 January 2008 to 31 December 2014 to the period from 1 January 2015 to 30 September 2018.[620] The DPP told us that the sentencing range for rape is generally higher than the sentencing range for penetrative sexual abuse of a child.[621] However, he noted that 'the sentencing range for penetrative sexual abuse of a child is becoming higher than it used to be. It used to be quite low compared to rape; it is less so now'.[622]

Prosecutors felt the courts were increasingly recognising the long-term impacts of child sexual abuse and were taking this into account for sentencing, with an upward trend in sentencing for these matters.[623]

Nevertheless, victim-survivors reported feeling that sentences applied to their abusers were inadequate.[624] We discuss data collection for sentencing in child sexual abuse cases in Section 9.

6.2 Perpetrator programs

Perpetrator programs aim to stop offenders committing further offences, working to change their behaviours and attitudes. This aim recognises that almost all child sex offenders (even those who have been imprisoned) will remain in or re-enter the community. For this reason, interventions directed at abusers are a crucial way to prevent them from harming children.

The Tasmanian Prison Service delivers an adult sex offender program (the New Directions Program) to all people in custody for sex-based offending who are assessed as suitable for the program, except those who refuse to engage in treatment.[625]

A sex offender may also have to take part in sex offender treatment as a requirement of a community-based sentencing order. A court can direct an offender to have treatment in the community as a condition of a community-based order.[626] The Parole Board also has the power to order an offender take part in rehabilitation and treatment as a condition for parole.[627] We did not hear any evidence about treatment programs for sex offenders in the community.

In addition, the Tasmanian Government has recently introduced the Dangerous Criminals and High Risk Offenders Act 2021. The Act introduces a scheme for detaining dangerous offenders indefinitely and for making high-risk offender orders, the latter providing for extended supervision of high-risk offenders when released from prison.[628] The Act commenced on 13 December 2021.[629]

To reduce the risk of reoffending, the National Royal Commission emphasised the need to offer support services to child sex offenders moving back into the community.[630] However, it did not consider this issue in detail and noted that it did not have the evidence or submissions necessary to make recommendations in relation to it. The National Royal Commission considered that state and territory governments should continually review the adequacy of support services they provide for child sex offenders in the community.[631]

In 2017, the Sentencing Advisory Council released a research paper on mandatory treatment for sex offenders in custody and in the community.[632] The research paper considered the scope and availability of support services for child sex offenders in the community.

The research paper states that there were only limited treatments available for sex offenders in the community at the time of the report.[633] It further indicates that treatment relies on independent counselling services accessed through private providers and that it may be difficult to get treatment in the north and North West because of a lack of providers.[634] The research paper notes there are no government funded community-based treatment programs for sex offenders in Tasmania.[635] It also considers that it would not be feasible to run group programs in the community in Tasmania because of the small number of offenders involved and the geographic dispersion of these offenders.[636]

The research paper does, however, note that sex offenders in the community are subject to mandatory intervention by Community Corrections under the Community Based Sex Offender Case Management and Interventions program.[637] It notes that all sex offenders under the supervision of Community Corrections are actively managed and that individual treatment is available if this is a requirement of a parole or court order.[638] According to the research paper, this reflects the need for community-based treatment for sex offenders who have been released from prison to be individualised and targeted rather than treatment that is simply a repeat of the group rehabilitation programs in prison.[639] The research paper states that Community Corrections staff working with sex offenders have received extensive training about sexual offending, managing sex offenders and case management.[640]

The Tasmanian Government should ensure community-based preventive programs for child sex offenders who are released from prison are properly funded. Such programs should also comply with best practice for treating abusers. In this regard, James Ogloff AM, Distinguished Professor of Forensic Behavioural Science, Swinburne University of Technology, drew our attention to Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers practice guidelines that specify standards for treating adults and young people.[641] Professor Ogloff explained that these practice guidelines focus on three elements—cognitions (including cognitive distortion, where perpetrators convince themselves that what they are doing is not wrong), behaviours (including strategies for controlling specific behaviours) and emotions (including developing insight into emotional states and the triggers that may cause inappropriate behaviours).[642]

The National Royal Commission also recommended a national strategy to prevent child sexual abuse (refer to Chapter 18).[643] It recommended that the national strategy encompass information and help-seeking services to support people who are concerned they may be at risk of sexually abusing children, highlighting the Stop It Now! program as a potential model to adopt.[644]

The Stop It Now! program operates in North America, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and Ireland. It has also operated on a small scale in Queensland.[645] The program has been positively evaluated in the Netherlands and the United Kingdom.[646]

In Victoria, Jesuit Social Services is piloting Stop It Now! for those who self-identify a sexual interest in children and want to address this.[647] The pilot started in late August 2022 and was to run for a year.[648] The program aims to reduce and eliminate the sexual abuse and exploitation of children, and seeks to achieve this by engaging with adults who may go on to harm children.[649]

The program's key feature is an anonymous helpline for people who are worried about their own sexual thoughts and behaviour in relation to children, as well as professionals and family members who are concerned about the behaviour of others.[650] The service includes a website with advice, self-help materials and guidance to raise awareness of child abuse.[651] While the service can be accessed anonymously and confidentially, it complies with all mandatory reporting guidelines.[652]

The University of Melbourne will evaluate the effectiveness of the program and its potential for national scale-up.[653] We welcome programs such as Stop It Now! that seek to reduce and eliminate child sexual abuse.

Recommendation 16.17

The Tasmanian Government should ensure preventive programs for adults who are at risk of abusing, or have abused, children are available beyond the custodial setting. These programs should be:

a. properly funded

b. align with the practice guidelines issued by the Association for the Treatment and Prevention of Sexual Abusers

c. include a monitoring and evaluation process.

6.3 Restorative justice

Restorative justice involves people affected by a crime, including the victim-survivor and the offender, communicating about the damage caused by the offence and how it can be repaired. It can include methods such as an exchange of letters, engagement with an institution where the harm occurred and supported conferencing processes with professionals.[654]

We heard evidence about restorative justice as an alternative to traditional criminal justice responses to child sexual abuse, given their inherent limitations.

Elena Campbell, Associate Director, Research, Advocacy and Policy at the Centre for Innovative Justice, told us that:

> Restorative justice approaches recognise that, while the adversarial system meets the imperative of the State in prosecuting wrongdoing, it does very little to meet the needs of the people who have experienced this wrongdoing. By contrast, restorative justice approaches give victim-survivors a voice and validation, essentially allowing them to be heard, to ask questions and to feel that somebody who has caused harm to them has taken steps to repair it.[655]

Professor Cashmore gave evidence about the potential for restorative justice to play a role in the criminal justice system's response to child sexual abuse. She told us that there needs to be some serious consideration of other avenues of justice, including certain restorative justice approaches.[656] She also drew our attention to a pre-trial diversion program in New South Wales in which familial child sex offenders had to take responsibility by pleading guilty and complying with strict requirements, including disclosing their conduct to family members and their work managers and colleagues, with breaches resulting in the offender returning to court for sentencing.[657]

The National Royal Commission considered the potential of restorative justice approaches for institutional child sexual abuse. It noted some stakeholder support for restorative justice approaches. However, the National Royal Commission indicated that, based on evidence at the time, it was ultimately not 'satisfied that formal restorative justice approaches should be included as part of the criminal justice response to institutional child sexual abuse, at least in relation to adult offenders'.[658] The National Royal Commission highlighted issues that often make restorative justice approaches unsuitable, including where there is a significant power imbalance, where the victim-survivor does not want to take part or where the passage of time may mean relevant parties are unable or unwilling to participate.[659]

The National Royal Commission did not express a firm view on whether there is a role for restorative justice in the criminal justice system, either as a sentencing option for offenders or as an alternative for victim-survivors to access justice. However, the National Royal Commission considered that such principles could, and should where appropriate, be embedded in institutional responses to child sexual abuse, including in the National Redress Scheme.[660]

In its report Improving the Justice System Response to Sexual Offences, the Victorian Law Reform Commission noted strong support for restorative justice for adult sexual offending. It indicated that restorative justice can be an avenue to meet the needs and wishes of a victim-survivor that a criminal justice system cannot provide.[661] The Victorian Law Reform Commission noted the risks associated with using restorative justice processes involving children who have been sexually abused and, while it acknowledged that such processes are unlikely to be suitable in many instances involving young victim-survivors, it recommended that suitability be determined on a case-by-case basis rather than by a blanket exclusion.[662] We note, however, that Victoria has well-established restorative justice processes in place. We are not aware of Tasmania having a similar system.

We have not made any recommendations on applying restorative justice for institutional child sexual abuse as an alternative to criminal justice. We consider that there may be limited circumstances in which restorative justice could be appropriately applied. This may include some cases where the harmful sexual behaviour is by a child, and for non-sexual offences such as failing to report the abuse of a child.[663] Also, as recommended by the National Royal Commission, we consider that restorative justice may have a role to play in institutional responses to child sexual abuse and note that these principles are embedded in the National Redress Scheme. We discuss the National Redress Scheme in Chapter 17.

7 Changing the language of consent in child sexual abuse cases

In this section, we highlight the need for the judiciary and legal professionals to avoid reinforcing outdated understandings of child sexual abuse in sentencing remarks and in making submissions.

The language the judiciary and legal professionals use during a trial and when sentencing a child sex offender can have a powerful and sometimes devastating effect on victim-survivors. It can also have a broader symbolic effect on the understanding of child sexual abuse. In this section, we also discuss how the language of consent can send inaccurate and damaging messages to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and the broader community, and consider whether there are ways to address this.

Benjamin Mathews, Research Professor, School of Law, Queensland University of Technology, told us that child sexual abuse:

> … is inflicted in secret, and usually by an adult who is known to the child or a family member. It can be inflicted in circumstances where force or coercion is clearly apparent, but it can also be inflicted where such coercion is not as stark but where the victim is not developmentally capable of understanding the acts and/or where the child is in a position of physical, cognitive, emotional or psychological vulnerability such that consent is not freely given.[664]

The issue of consent is generally not relevant to child sexual abuse offences because, except in the case of similarity of age which we explain below, children under the age of 17 are legally incapable of consenting to sexual contact. Consent is considered relevant in the following two instances:

- when an accused person and victim-survivor are close in age
- when an accused person is charged with rape, rather than with offences specifically related to the abuse of a child.

The closeness (or similarity) in age defence recognises that there might be good reason not to criminalise a young person who is involved in sexual behaviour with another young person of a similar age—for example, where the complainant is 14 and the accused person is 15, and there was genuine consent in the circumstances.[665] In relation to these types of offences, we recognise that discussing consent is entirely appropriate.

If a person is charged with the rape of a child or young person, and does not plead guilty to that offence, the prosecution must prove that the complainant did not consent and that the accused person was aware of the lack of consent. This may result in the child or young person being cross-examined on the issue of consent.[666]

An accused person may argue that they believed the complainant was consenting at the time the sexual penetration occurred.[667] That belief on the part of the accused person must be 'honest and reasonable'. The Criminal Code Act provides that:

> … a mistaken belief by the accused as to the existence of consent is not honest or reasonable if the accused –
> a. was in a state of self-induced intoxication and the mistake was not one which the accused would have made if not intoxicated; or
> b. was reckless as to whether or not the complainant consented; or
> c. did not take reasonable steps, in the circumstances known to him or her at the time of the offence, to ascertain that the complainant was consenting to the act.[668]

However, consent is defined in the Criminal Code Act as meaning 'free agreement'.[669] Section 2A(2) sets out situations in which a person does not 'freely agree'. Two of these situations may be particularly relevant to whether a child or young person has consented. They include where a person 'agrees or submits because he or she is overborne by the nature or position of another person' or where the person is 'unable to understand the nature of the act'.

Under section 335 of the Criminal Code Act, a person can be charged with rape but convicted of penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person, or penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person by a person in a position of authority, if the jury is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt about lack of consent.[670]

As discussed in Section 6.1, the sentencing range for rape is higher than the sentencing range for penetrative sexual abuse of a child.[671] The DPP told us that, depending on the circumstances, the DPP may charge an accused person with the offence of rape and the jury will be directed that if it is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the complainant did not consent, then it can consider the alternative offence of penetrative sexual abuse of a child.[672] Where it is relevant, the jury may also be directed that it can consider the alternative and recently introduced offence of penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person by a person in a position of authority.

If an accused person is convicted of or pleads guilty to rape, the issue of consent is irrelevant, though physical violence or other factors present at the time of the offence may be relevant to sentencing. Because consent is technically irrelevant, defence counsel should not be able to raise consent in sentencing hearings where a person pleads guilty or is convicted of rape. If this is done, the prosecutor should object to the issue being raised and the judge should make it clear that consent is irrelevant to sentencing in these circumstances.

When the accused person is convicted of, or charged with, a child sexual abuse offence, or is convicted of that offence as the alternative to rape, consent is also irrelevant unless the defence of similarity of age applies. Evidence we heard suggests the notion of 'consent' in child sexual abuse matters perpetuates outdated ideas about where responsibility sits and reveals a limited understanding of the way in which abusers groom children to submit to sexual abuse. Applying the notion of consent has the potential to reinforce victim-survivors' fears that they are to blame for the abuse, which they are not.

Victim-survivor Leah Sallese told us she believed for decades that, as a child, she had had an 'affair' with her teacher. It was not until she was in her forties, when a psychotherapist told her that what she had experienced was child sexual abuse, that she could question the 'narrative' in her mind and understand that she was a victim of abuse.[673] Ms Sallese referred to the 'offensive' language used by the judge in her case, who described the abuse as 'consensual', and in the offence itself as it was then known: 'maintaining a sexual relationship with a young person'.[674] She emphasised the importance of changing the language, which has now occurred in relation to the title of the offence.[675] We support that change, although we recommend a further change to the language of the provision (refer to Recommendation 16.9). The language prosecutors, defence counsel and judges use can also have a profound effect on the wider community's understanding of child sexual abuse.

Given the effects of applying the notion of consent on victim-survivors and the wider community, we consider that its use is inappropriate in child sexual abuse matters. The DPP concedes that prosecutors could use the unlawful act being alleged rather than the word 'consent' in child sexual abuse matters.[676] He stated that:

> … you'll see many judges comment when passing sentence [for persistent sexual abuse] where they say 'It's not suggested it's consensual'. Now, having thought about it, we don't have to say that, what might be better to say is that what the Crown is alleging is penetrative sexual abuse of a child …[677]

After our hearings, the DPP wrote to us to suggest one way of changing the language used in the criminal justice system would be to amend the Sentencing Act 1997 ('Sentencing Act'). He suggested, for example, that a statement could be included in section 11A to the effect that, for child sexual abuse offences, consent is not a mitigating factor and that the court is to presume that the sexual abuse will result in long-term and serious physical and psychological harm to the victim-survivor.[678] He considers that such a change would avoid criminal trials and disputed facts hearings requiring the complainant to give evidence on the issue of consent.[679]

We agree that it could be beneficial to amend section 11A of the Sentencing Act to include a provision to the effect that, for child sexual abuse offences, consent is not a mitigating factor. This would also reflect the existing case law as set out in Director of Public Prosecutions v Harington and Clarkson v The Queen; EJA v The Queen.[680] This would mean that the submission, acquiescence or apparent consent of a child is not relevant in sentencing.

We also consider training for the judiciary and legal profession is needed to help ensure the language used in court does not suggest or imply that a child consented to abuse. We discuss prosecutor training in Section 4.2.2 and improving professional education for judges in Section 5.6. The DPP Guidelines should be amended to make it clear that the language of consent should be avoided when prosecuting child sexual abuse offences.

Recommendation 16.18

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend section 11A of the Sentencing Act 1997 to provide that, in determining the appropriate sentence for an offender convicted of a child sexual abuse offence, the acquiescence or apparent consent of the victim is not a mitigating circumstance.
2. The Director of Public Prosecutions should amend its Prosecution Policy and Guidelines to make it clear that in child sexual abuse matters where consent is not an element of the offence, then the language of consent should not be used by prosecutors.
3. Professional education for judicial officers (Recommendation 16.16) and prosecutors (Recommendation 16.8) should include challenging the myths and misconceptions about consent in relation to child sexual abuse.

8 Responses to children and young people displaying harmful sexual behaviours Harmful sexual behaviours cover a broad range of behaviours, from those that are developmentally inappropriate and involve only the child displaying the behaviours, to those that involve one child sexually harming another child. In our hearings and in sessions with a Commissioner, we heard from victim-survivors who had been sexually harmed by other children in institutions. Harmful sexual behaviours can have a detrimental and lasting impact on victim-survivors and need to be managed with great care and sensitivity.

While the impact of harmful sexual behaviours is significant, it is generally recognised that punitive responses are often not appropriate because children can display such behaviours for a range of complex reasons, including because of their own sexual victimisation.

In addition, research about children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours indicates a low rate of recurrence for these behaviours.[681] This means that adopting stigmatising criminal justice interventions is unlikely to be effective. Professor Ogloff informed us that harmful sexual behaviours displayed by young people are usually highly treatable, with treatment based on gaining cognitive and emotional control, and often there is a strong element of remorse and a desire to change.[682]

The National Royal Commission considered that interventions are needed to respond to children who display harmful sexual behaviours, ranging from prevention and early identification to assessment and therapeutic intervention.[683] It found that a public health model should be applied to address and prevent problematic and harmful sexual behaviours displayed by children. The Victorian Law Reform Commission also recommended in 2021 that the Victorian Government strengthens the support available to children and young people who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours.[684]

The National Royal Commission noted that, for a small group of children, a child protection or criminal justice response may be necessary.[685] It recommended state and territory governments ensure there are clear referral pathways for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours to access expert assessment and therapeutic intervention, regardless of whether the child is engaging voluntarily, on the advice of an institution or through their involvement with the child protection or criminal justice system.[686]

We discuss responses to children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours in Chapter 21. In that chapter, we recommend funding be increased for specialised therapeutic services for young people in the context of a statewide, whole of government framework for responding to harmful sexual behaviours, so all children and young people can access the appropriate responses for their situation. Here we consider whether there are opportunities in the youth justice framework for courts to direct the small number of young people who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours and are charged with an offence to therapeutic services.

We note that the Tasmanian Government has developed the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint 2022–2032: Keeping Children and Young People out of the Youth Justice System, which outlines the strategic direction for Tasmania's youth justice system for the next 10 years.[687] The draft blueprint's aim is to improve the wellbeing of children, young people and their families while addressing the underlying drivers of offending behaviours, reducing offending and improving community safety. We welcome this initiative and consider there is an urgent need for youth justice system reform. We discuss the draft blueprint further in Chapter 12.

There is potential in the existing legislative frameworks for courts to divert young people who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours to specialised therapeutic services. The Youth Justice Act 1997 ('Youth Justice Act') provides the legislative framework for administering youth justice in Tasmania. The Youth Justice Division of the Magistrates Court deals with most young people charged with criminal offences. But the Supreme Court deals with more serious offences such as aggravated sexual assault, rape and persistent sexual abuse of a child.

Instead of proceeding to sentence a young person, the Magistrates Court can do one of the following:

- Order the young person to attend a community conference.[688] If the Court makes such an order, it can require the young person to enter into an undertaking to do anything else that may be appropriate in the circumstances.[689] The Court can then dismiss a charge after the young person takes part in the community conference.[690]
- Defer sentencing of a young person to allow them to take part in an intervention plan.[691] An intervention plan is a plan that specifies the activities or programs that a young person is expected to undertake while on bail.[692]

In addition, when sentencing a young person under the Youth Justice Act, the Magistrates Court can order that the young person undergoes psychiatric or psychological treatment as a special condition of a probation order or a community service order.[693]

We note that, where a young person is charged with a family violence offence, the court also has the power to order a rehabilitation program assessment and direct the young person submit to that assessment.[694] This power is limited to offences committed by a person against their spouse or partner.[695]

When a young person is sentenced in the Supreme Court, the court has discretion to sentence the person under the Sentencing Act or the Youth Justice Act. In sentencing a young person under the Sentencing Act, the court can:

- order release of the offender if the offender undertakes to comply with specified conditions
- make a community correction order with special conditions if the young person has reached 18 years, which could include a treatment program order.[696]

We consider the courts should have broader powers to refer young people to rehabilitation assessments and supports. In Chapter 21, we recommend that the Magistrates Court be given the power to divert a young person who has engaged in harmful sexual behaviours from the criminal justice system by adjourning the criminal proceedings to enable the young person to take part in therapeutic treatment (Recommendation 21.9). They could then discharge the young person after completing the treatment.

In addition, we consider that courts should use their powers to direct young people who have been charged with criminal offences and who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours to specialist therapeutic services, whenever this is appropriate.

Recommendation 16.19

We encourage the courts to consider using their powers to direct young people engaging in harmful sexual behaviours who are charged with a criminal offence to specialist therapeutic services.

9 Monitoring and evaluation

There is a lack of comprehensive data on child sexual abuse offences in the Tasmanian criminal justice system. In its report Improving the Justice System Response to Sexual Offences, the Victorian Law Reform Commission highlighted the challenges of building an evidence base for reform without the benefit of regularly published data.[697]

Of the child sexual abuse matters that are reported to police (and we know that many are not), we heard that only a small proportion result in prosecution and conviction—in New South Wales, about 12 per cent of reported cases (and we heard this is broadly consistent with other studies).[698] Other data from New South Wales shows that, of the cases in which a person pleads guilty or goes to trial, almost half are convicted of at least one child sexual abuse offence.[699] Conviction rates for cases that are prosecuted in Tasmania are higher than in New South Wales.

> … between 2017 and 2021 the Office finalised 231 sexual assault cases involving child complainants, with a conviction rate of 67.33% and a discharge rate of 23.9%. A previous study between 2010 and 2014 showed a similar result. The conviction rate was higher than that for all crimes whereas the discharge rate was significantly lower than that for all crimes.[700]

The report attributed the high conviction rate to the DPP Guidelines ensuring early contact with complainants, the conduct of matters by experienced prosecutors and the pre-charging advice service the ODPP provides to Tasmania Police, which was said to mean that the 'correct charges are laid and additional evidence is obtained at an early stage'.[701]

Figures provided to our Commission of Inquiry on conviction rates for sexual assault crimes (which would have included some adults who reported child sexual abuse) were similarly high.[702] These figures showed a conviction rate of 67.53 per cent and a discharge rate of 23.3 per cent.[703]

Although the ODPP's figures are encouraging, we do not know what proportion of these cases involved institutional child sexual abuse. Moreover, the ODPP figures do not show the attrition rate between cases reported to Tasmania Police and cases that get a conviction. Research has consistently shown that the majority of sexual offences are not reported, preliminary enquiries made to police do not always result in a formal report, and only some cases reported to police proceed to prosecution. If police do not encourage victim-survivors to formally report an offence, or if a charge is never laid because of the ODPP's pre-charging advice, only a low proportion of reports of child sexual abuse proceed through the criminal justice process. For example, a study on the attrition of sexual offence incidents in the Victorian criminal justice system covering the period 2015–16 to 2016–17 shows that only one in seven sexual offence incidents reported to police was ultimately proven in court and that attrition was 'highest during the police investigation stages of the justice system process'.[704] Police formally identified an offender for about half (48 per cent) of the incidents reported and laid charges against about half (52 per cent) of those offenders they identified.[705] We note these figures relate to sexual offence incidents generally and are not confined to sexual offences against children or offences occurring in an institutional context.

For this reason, we consider the Tasmanian Government should ensure data is collected on the proportion of child sexual abuse cases reported to police that result in prosecution and conviction. This information should be compared with statistics from other Australian jurisdictions where such data is collected. The analysis of this data should consider jurisdictional differences in systems (for example, in Tasmania a magistrate cannot refuse to commit a matter).[706] Such a comparison would provide a more objective means of assessing the performance of the Tasmanian criminal justice system in investigating, charging and convicting child sexual abuse offenders than currently exists.

Attrition data—indicating when and why cases stop progressing through the criminal justice system—is also required to help identify factors and barriers that have contributed to decisions by victim-survivors to withdraw from criminal justice processes. This could also inform future policy and reform.

It should be possible to track how many incidents of child sexual abuse offending progress through the criminal justice system to be proven in court and at what points incidents 'exit' the system. We note that the ODPP already collects some of this data, including the reasons for matters being discharged, and reports on it in its annual report.

In respect of the ODPP's pre-charging advice service, the ODPP keeps a record of the number of advice files provided to Tasmania Police in which the ODPP recommended, in respect of child sexual abuse offences, that:

- charges be laid
- charges not be laid
- further police enquiries be made.

The ODPP has provided our Commission of Inquiry with figures for 2016–17 to 2022–23 (up until 5 May 2023). These are shown in Table 16.1.[707] This table indicates that, in some years many matters reported to police did not result in charges being laid, although in recent years the proportion of cases where charges are laid appears to be increasing.

Table 16.1: Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, Pre-charge advice files relating to child sexual offences provided to police, 2015–2023[708]

Year	Charges laid	Charges not laid	Further police enquiries be made	Total (charges laid or not laid)	Percentage of cases with charges laid, of those with a charge laid or not laid

The National Royal Commission recommended that the DPP monitors the number, type and success rate of appeals in child sexual abuse matters to identify any areas of potential reform and to ensure any National Royal Commission recommendations are working as intended.[709] We acknowledge that, in recent years, police and the ODPP have made improvements including:

- developing a specialised unit within the ODPP
- developing and expanding the Witness Assistance Service
- implementing early engagement with victim-survivors
- establishing the ODPP's pre-charging advice service.

Nevertheless, throughout this chapter we have identified areas where it is still difficult to assess the performance of the police and the ODPP without other transparency measures.

Commissioner Hine told us Tasmania Police 'holds a wealth of data across many different systems'.[710] He said that 'currently more than 10 years of offence reporting data is at hand from which we can examine trends across offence types, locations, clearance and other factors over time'.[711] He also said integration and reporting on this data will improve with the upcoming migration of more applications into Atlas, the Tasmania Police data system.[712]

The DPP told us that the ODPP's in-house file management and record keeping methods need to be modernised to better record data and automatically generate reports. He said that the Department of Justice is undertaking a project (called 'Justice Connect') to improve information sharing between stakeholders. The DPP said that it is not clear how this system will benefit the ODPP.[713] We recommend that the Tasmanian Government supports the ODPP to improve its data collection.

We also consider that more work needs to be done to collect data about child sexual abuse across the criminal justice system. We therefore recommend the Tasmanian Government prioritises collecting comprehensive data on the criminal justice system's response to child sexual abuse.

Although data is important, it only tells part of the story. Victoria Police noted its view that not every victim-survivor wants to go through the court process, and prosecution is not always the goal and only measure of 'success'.[714] We agree.

In Section 3.2.2, we recommend that specialist police units measure and periodically report on victim-survivor satisfaction with the specialist police units (refer to Recommendation 16.1).

We also recommend below that periodic qualitative surveys be conducted with victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. These should focus on their experiences and satisfaction with the criminal justice system. Such surveys could measure whether the victim-survivor felt listened to and believed, whether they understood the process and whether they were kept informed of the progress of their case.

Recommendation 16.20

1. The Department of Justice should:
    a. prioritise collecting and publishing key data about institutional child sexual abuse, including
        i. the number of reports of child sexual abuse made to police
        ii. police, prosecution and court outcomes of reports, and reasons for outcomes, including the reasons why cases did not proceed
        iii. the time between reporting, charging or a decision not to progress, and prosecution
        iv. whether the abuse took place in an institutional setting
        v. basic demographics of victim-survivors and alleged perpetrators (for example, age, gender and Aboriginal status)
        vi. trends in relation to particular groups, including Aboriginal people
    b. support the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions to improve its data collection for child sexual abuse cases so it can effectively monitor
        i. the cases on which police seek advice, that proceed to court and that are discontinued, including the reasons for discontinuance
        ii. the number, type and success rate of appeals in child sexual abuse matters
    c. cause periodic surveys to be conducted and published with victim-survivors of child sexual abuse on their experience and satisfaction with the criminal justice system, including on whether the victim-survivor
        i. felt listened to
        ii. felt believed
        iii. understood the process
        iv. was kept informed of the progress of the case.

2. The Sentencing Advisory Council should periodically review trends in sentencing for child sexual abuse offences in Tasmania and compare them with sentencing outcomes for equivalent offences in other Australian jurisdictions.

10 Conclusion

As recognised by the National Royal Commission, the criminal justice system is unlikely ever to provide an easy or straightforward experience for a victim-survivor of institutional child sexual abuse. The very nature of the crime and the criminal justice system mean that the experience is likely to be distressing and stressful.[715] However, we understand that the criminal justice system represents an important mechanism to condemn child sexual abuse, hold abusers to account and intervene to stop abusers offending.

The criminal justice system should do everything possible to avoid retraumatising victim-survivors, who must be listened to, respected and treated with dignity in all their interactions with the criminal justice system. A victim-survivor's experience of the system can be shaped by how they are spoken to and the support they receive. We heard that, for some people, aspects of the criminal justice process were ultimately affirming and rewarding, particularly when victim-survivors felt heard and believed and the offending was condemned.

While every victim-survivor of child sexual abuse has individual experiences and needs, some common themes emerged from the victim-survivors who shared their experiences with us. They spoke of how difficult it was to recount their experience multiple times and how important it is to be offered support throughout the criminal justice process.

We heard about the importance of victim-survivors having a voice, being believed and not having damaging myths or language wielded against them throughout the criminal justice process. We also heard about how important it is for police and prosecutors to speak to victim-survivors with kindness, care and patience, and to keep them informed about the progress of their case.

We accept that the criminal justice system, as an adversarial system, is not well equipped to respond to the complex and sensitive issues that arise from child sexual abuse. We consider recent reforms, such as introducing a witness intermediary scheme and using special measures to support complainants in giving evidence, can help alleviate some of the system's limitations, but we accept victim-survivors will always find reporting offences and giving evidence a very difficult process.

We welcome recent reforms to the criminal justice system but consider more can be done.

Like the National Royal Commission, our recommendations aim to reduce the extent to which a victim-survivor might feel marginalised, vulnerable, attacked or retraumatised.[716]

Our key recommendations in this chapter include:

- establishing specialist police units for child sexual abuse investigations
- ensuring police and prosecutors are trained on the nature and dynamics of child sexual abuse and trauma-informed care
- implementing independent oversight of investigations of allegations of child sexual abuse involving police officers
- assisting juries to assess the evidence of child witnesses through jury directions
- improving professional development for judicial officers and legal professionals
- changing the language of consent in child sexual abuse offence cases
- improving data collection across the criminal justice system.

Underlying all our recommendations is the need to improve education and training for police, prosecutors and the courts, as well as the wider community, on the nature and dynamics of child sexual assault and trauma-informed practice.

17 Redress, civil litigation and support

A note on language

In other chapters of our report, we generally use the terms victim-survivor and perpetrator or abuser. However, in this chapter, we also use the terms claimant and offender because they have particular meanings in redress and civil systems. A reference to victim-survivors is a reference to child and adult victim-survivors, unless otherwise specified.

1 Introduction

Victim-survivors of child sexual abuse often suffer serious harms, including difficulty in forming and maintaining relationships, a continuing sense of shame and loss of trust in others.[1] Victim-survivors often experience depression, anxiety, flashbacks and other physical and mental health impacts of trauma, which can make it difficult to complete education, work and maintain a career.[2] The impacts of child sexual abuse can lead to substance misuse, poverty, homelessness and difficulty in parenting. Victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings also experience the additional impacts of betrayal and loss of trust in public institutions. Some victim-survivors who might objectively be 'okay' still live with the memory of the abuse and mourn the life and opportunities they could have had if they had not been sexually abused.[3]

Many victim-survivors who shared their experiences with our Commission of Inquiry wanted an apology or recognition of the harm they suffered.[4] They also wanted the Government to acknowledge its responsibility for their harm, and to take steps to ensure children were better protected in the future.[5]

Victim-survivors of child sexual abuse often need psychological support and an individual response to their experience. Some wish to seek financial compensation. The terms of reference for our Commission of Inquiry required us to consider:

> what the Tasmanian Government should do to address, or alleviate the impact of, past and future child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including, in particular, ensuring justice for victims through … support services.[6]

The National Royal Commission published several interim reports during its five-year inquiry, including a 2015 report on redress and civil litigation, which dealt with these issues.[7] In its final report, the National Royal Commission recommended introducing a redress scheme for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse that would include:

- monetary payments
- counselling and psychological support
- a direct personal response
- changes to the approaches of state and territory governments to civil litigation claims by victim-survivors.[8]

Many of the National Royal Commission's recommendations have been adopted in Tasmania, which has also joined the National Redress Scheme.[9] The Government provides some psychological support and limited compensation to victims of crime through a Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme.

What we heard suggests there is a need for significant additional reform to improve the operation of existing mechanisms that support and compensate victim-survivors. The mechanisms discussed in this chapter include the National Redress Scheme, civil litigation, apologies, support (including financial assistance) for victims of crime, and access to information and records.

The important reforms we recommend in this chapter include measures to:

- ensure victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions continue to have access to a redress scheme, including in relation to child sexual abuse experienced on or after 1 July 2018 (which falls outside the scope of the present National Redress Scheme)

- review the Government's litigation practices and how civil claims arising from allegations of child sexual abuse are managed, and clarify the roles of the Solicitor-General, departmental secretaries and other Heads of Agencies in the conduct and settlement of civil litigation arising from allegations of child sexual abuse in institutional settings
- ensure government institutions adopt a consistent and appropriate approach to apologies to individual victim-survivors of child sexual abuse
- ensure the Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme is administered in a way that minimises delays and handles applications in a sensitive and trauma-informed manner
- enable victim-survivors of child sexual abuse who have applied for an award under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1976 ('Victims of Crime Assistance Act') to seek merits review of decisions of Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal
- review the operation of the Right to Information Act 2009 ('Right to Information Act') and the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 ('Personal Information Protection Act') to ensure victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts can get access to information relating to that abuse.

In Chapter 3, we recognise that non-sexual forms of abuse can contribute to an institutionalised culture that treats violence, bullying and harassment as normal, and that sexual abuse can co-occur with other types of abuse and neglect. This was the case in Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Responses for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse should take into account their whole experience of abuse.

2 The National Redress Scheme

The National Royal Commission recommended establishing a single national redress scheme for victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse. The scheme would apply in all states and territories. The National Royal Commission saw a national scheme as the most effective structure.[10] It recommended the elements of redress schemes should include:

- the offer of an apology and a direct personal response from institutions to victim-survivors
- counselling and psychological care
- monetary compensation as tangible recognition of the seriousness of the hurt and injury suffered.[11]

The Australian Parliament enacted the National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth) ('National Redress Scheme Act') to establish the National Redress Scheme. The National Redress Scheme began operating on 1 July 2018.[12]

To create the National Redress Scheme, state and territory governments needed to refer legislative power to enact it to the Australian Parliament. All states and territories have now joined the National Redress Scheme. Tasmania adopted the National Redress Scheme from 1 November 2018.[13]

In this chapter, we consider the National Redress Scheme at a high level, including eligibility requirements, the life of the Scheme, direct personal responses and advice and support. In Volume 5, we discuss the amount of claims the State has been receiving about current staff and the challenges of initiating disciplinary action based on claims under the Scheme. We recommend, in Chapter 12, that the Government improve its information sharing processes in relation to the National Redress Scheme to protect the safety of children and to advocate at a national level for a review of the information sharing framework under the Scheme.

2.1 Entitlement requirements

The entitlement requirements for the National Redress Scheme are set out in the National Redress Scheme Act.[14] Broadly, the National Redress Scheme applies to any Australian citizen or permanent resident born before 30 June 2010, who was subjected to child sexual abuse in a government institution or participating institution before 1 July 2018. To apply for redress, the applicant must be 18 years of age or turn 18 before 30 June 2028. This date is known as the 'sunset date'—the date when the National Redress Scheme ends.[15] The closing date for applications is 30 June 2027 (12 months before the sunset date).[16]

We heard from some victim-survivors who do not qualify for redress under the National Redress Scheme, in some cases because the abuse occurred more recently. There are likely to be others who did not contact us.

The sunset date for the end of the National Redress Scheme was also identified as a barrier to people accessing redress. In his evidence, Warren Strange, Chief Executive Officer, knowmore Legal Service ('knowmore'), emphasised the difficulties the application deadline for redress will create for many people. He said:

> So, we know it takes a long time, and at least 22 years on average for survivors to make a disclosure about their experience of child sexual abuse, often longer. There will be people who are eligible to apply for the National Redress Scheme, and it won't be the right time for them or they won't have the supports or the safety to apply during its life. … I feel very much that these people need to have justice options available into the future that are appropriate for them and suit their timing rather than the timing of what we or what governments might impose.[17]

Some people are not eligible for redress under the National Redress Scheme, even if they were abused in an institution during the period required and make a claim prior to the sunset date. A person who is in gaol at the time the application is made is not eligible for redress unless the National Redress Scheme Operator ('Operator') determines the circumstances are exceptional.[18]

A person who has been sentenced to imprisonment for five years or longer for a state, territory, federal or foreign country offence cannot receive redress unless the Operator determines the person is eligible.[19] The Operator may determine a person is entitled to redress as long as this would not:

- 'bring the scheme into disrepute'
- 'adversely affect public confidence in, or support for, the scheme'.[20]

In determining eligibility, the Operator must consider any advice from a 'specified advisor'. Where the abuse occurred in a Tasmanian Government institution or the offence was against a Tasmanian law, the Tasmanian Attorney-General is the specified advisor.[21]

The Operator must also consider:

- the nature of the offence
- the length of sentence of imprisonment
- the length of time since the person committed the offence
- any rehabilitation of the person
- any other relevant matters.[22]

The National Redress Scheme requires the Operator give greater weight to advice received from the Tasmanian Attorney-General than to any other matter.[23]

In June 2021, a review of the National Redress Scheme expressed 'significant and immediate concern' about the eligibility of prisoners under the Scheme 'given the representation of child abuse survivors in the prison population'.[24] The review noted the restrictions on the eligibility of prisoners:

- 'potentially deny individuals the subject of institutional child sexual abuse the opportunity to apply for redress'
- 'appear to be deterring eligible applicants from applying'
- have an 'adverse impact on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander survivors'.[25]

The review recommended the eligibility criteria be changed to enable a single application process for prisoners and those with serious criminal convictions, as well as non-citizens and non-permanent residents who experienced child sexual abuse in Australia.[26]

The Australian and state and territory governments released their final response to the review in May 2023. In this response, they committed to changing the National Redress Scheme, including its eligibility criteria.[27] All governments agreed to:

- remove the restriction on people in prison applying to the Scheme
- refine the special assessment process for determining eligibility for applicants with serious criminal convictions
- enable child migrants who are not Australian citizens or permanent residents to be eligible for redress.[28]

However, the Australian Government also considered the current special assessment process for people with serious criminal convictions 'should be adjusted rather than removed entirely, to ensure that public confidence in the Scheme is maintained'.[29] The Australian Government stated that once these changes are implemented, 'only people with certain types of particularly serious offences (such as homicide and sexual offences) or where there may be a risk to the integrity of the Scheme in allowing access to redress will go through the special assessment process'.[30] These adjustments have not yet been made. We discuss this review below in more detail.

2.2 What does the Scheme provide?

The National Redress Scheme has three components.

The first component is a maximum payment of $150,000.[31] To receive financial redress, the victim-survivor must relinquish any claim for damages against the institution. In the case of government institutions, this would be the relevant state government.[32]

The second is a counselling and psychological component. This component comprises access to counselling and psychological services provided under the Scheme or a payment (of up to $5,000) to enable the person to access counselling and psychological services provided outside the Scheme.[33]

The third is a 'direct personal response' from the relevant institution. This can include one or more components of an:

- apology or a statement of acknowledgement or regret
- acknowledgement of the impact of the abuse on the person
- assurance about the steps the institution has taken, or will take, to prevent abuse from occurring again.

The legislation also allows the response to include an opportunity for the person to meet with a senior official of the institution.[34]

Victim-survivors who spoke to the National Royal Commission emphasised the importance of receiving an explanation of why the abuse occurred and why they did not receive an appropriate response.[35] Many of them wanted reassurance that other children would not suffer in the same way in the future.[36] Our Commission of Inquiry received similar evidence from victim-survivors.[37] The National Redress Scheme, through a direct personal response (if a victim-survivor chooses to receive one), may enable victim-survivors to access such information.

2.3 The operation of the National Redress Scheme in Tasmania

The Operator of the National Redress Scheme, and not the Tasmanian Government, determines entitlement for redress. The Operator is the Australian Government Secretary of the Department of Social Services.[38]

The Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit ('Royal Commission Response Unit') in the Department of Justice coordinates the Tasmanian Government's response to redress claims.[39] Ginna Webster, Secretary, Department of Justice, described the Tasmanian Government's role in the administration of the National Redress Scheme as summarised below.[40]

When the Operator identifies the Tasmanian Government as potentially responsible for a case of abuse, the Operator notifies the Tasmanian Government of the application and gives limited time to provide necessary information.[41] The Royal Commission Response Unit summarises the application and sends it to the relevant body (in the case of Tasmanian Government institutions, this will be a department or agency). The relevant body must then retrieve relevant records.[42] The department or agency is given six weeks to provide records for a non-priority application and three weeks for a priority application (where the applicant is elderly or ill).[43]

Information the Royal Commission Response Unit obtains through this process is then forwarded to the Operator, who determines eligibility to apply under the National Redress Scheme.[44] If the Tasmanian Government department or agency needs extra details to satisfy the request for information, the Royal Commission Response Unit approaches the Operator who may contact the applicant.[45]

The Royal Commission Response Unit makes the request for relevant government records so the applicant does not need to apply for information under the Right to Information Act. As discussed below, the need to apply for information under the Right to Information Act often creates difficulties for victim-survivors who want to seek damages from the Tasmanian Government, rather than make a claim under the National Redress Scheme.

Secretary Webster told us the Tasmanian Government offers counselling and psychological care to any applicant who accepts the monetary payment and contracts with organisations to provide this care.[46] The Tasmanian Government manages and facilitates requests for counselling and psychological care and a direct personal response through the Royal Commission Response Unit.[47]

Based on the information Secretary Webster provided on 8 April 2022, as modified by subsequent information provided by the Solicitor-General of Tasmania:[48]

- 689 claims have been made in relation to Tasmanian Government institutions since the National Redress Scheme started[49]
- the Operator had finalised 494 applications by offering a monetary payment, counselling and a direct personal response[50]
- the Tasmanian Government's total monetary compensation amounted to $31,204,169.66[51]
- 48 claims were not approved by the Operator or were withdrawn by the applicant, while 147 claims had not been determined when our Commission of Inquiry received this information[52]
- 275 applicants were eligible for counselling and psychological care, but when Secretary Webster gave her evidence, only 53 applicants had requested those services[53]
- 10 applicants had requested face-to-face direct personal responses, with four of those applicants also choosing to receive a written direct personal response, and an additional nine applicants choosing to receive only a written response.[54]

The Royal Commission Response Unit normally responds to requests for information within the specified time. Fourteen two-week extensions had been granted for providing information.[55] Secretary Webster confirmed these were all completed within the permitted two-week extension time.[56]

2.3.1 A direct personal response

A key part of the Tasmanian Government's responsibilities under the National Redress Scheme is managing individual requests for a direct personal response from government institutions or the Tasmanian Government.

The Tasmanian Government cannot contact applicants to the National Redress Scheme and is not given the contact details of individuals. The Royal Commission Response Unit must wait for an individual to make contact.[57]

2.3.2 Redress advice and support services

In Tasmania, several organisations advise and support victim-survivors regarding applications under the National Redress Scheme. They include knowmore, the Sexual Assault Support Service, Relationships Australia Tasmania and the South East Tasmanian Aboriginal Corporation.[58]

In particular, victim-survivors need to be carefully advised about how and whether to make a National Redress Scheme claim, because accepting redress will prevent them from seeking damages from the relevant institution or government.[59]

Mr Strange explained to us the advice and support knowmore provides.[60] Established in 2013, this organisation is a national community legal service that helps victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse. The Australian Government funds knowmore to provide various services to victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse.[61] It does not have an office in Tasmania, but visits Tasmania regularly and provides advice remotely. When comparing the state's population with the rest of Australia, Tasmania is disproportionately represented among knowmore's clients, amounting to 4 to 5 per cent of its clients.[62]

Mr Strange told us that where a National Redress Scheme claim:

> … appears to be straightforward and the client does not have complex support needs and/or has existing relationships with support workers, such as social workers and psychologists, knowmore may refer the client to a local Redress Support Service to progress their … application. [63]

Mr Strange said knowmore advises and supports victim-survivors to help them decide whether to make a claim under the National Redress Scheme or to pursue a civil claim for damages. It also gives clients initial advice on the pros and cons of this choice.[64] Mr Strange emphasised the difficulty of gaining a client's trust because of the complex trauma they have suffered and the fact they had often told their stories to police or other officials with no outcome.[65] He commented on the importance of building trust with local communities and respecting 'the scepticism, and often difficulty of engaging, that many victims and survivors of child sexual abuse understandably have'.[66]

If a person is considering suing for damages, knowmore does not advise them about their prospects of success, but will refer the client to a member of a panel of private law firms that have entered into a memorandum of understanding with knowmore. This memorandum is intended to ensure the firm responds sensitively and appropriately to victim-survivors.[67] If the person decides to apply under the National Redress Scheme, they will be referred back to knowmore who will help them apply, free of charge, or will refer them to a local redress support service.[68]

Mr Strange said knowmore handles complex redress claims such as those:

- that need to be resolved quickly because the client has a terminal illness

- where cultural support is needed from knowmore's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Engagement Team
- where the client has received a sentence of five or more years of imprisonment and must demonstrate exceptional circumstances to qualify for redress.[69]

Mr Strange said knowmore had seen examples where the Tasmanian Attorney-General had opposed claims on the basis of a client's imprisonment, in situations where at least some other state Attorneys-General would not have done so on the same facts. While we acknowledge Mr Strange's view, we note that some applicants under the National Redress Scheme have been convicted of serious crimes, including child sexual abuse. The Tasmanian Government told us that of the 21 requests for advice received through the National Redress Scheme, the Tasmanian Attorney-General has provided advice supportive of redress in 13 of those cases.[70] While the Operator must consider advice from the Tasmanian Attorney-General on such matters, the final decision rests with the Operator. Mr Strange also stated there had been 'lengthy delays' in such cases.[71]

As well as giving initial advice to victim-survivors, knowmore provides training and information to local support services and helps them by reviewing draft National Redress Scheme applications, where necessary.[72] It also provides information to clients about speaking to police about their abuse and has helped clients to engage directly with specialist units or taskforces.[73]

2.4 Criticism of the National Redress Scheme

We heard evidence that the handling of enquiries by the National Redress Scheme had not taken sufficient account of the trauma that victim-survivors had experienced. For example, Kylee Pearn, who was abused by James Griffin, telephoned the National Redress Scheme in 2020 to ask some general questions about eligibility for redress. Ms Pearn was referred to a lawyer.[74] Ms Pearn told us that the following occurred at a subsequent phone appointment with this lawyer:

> Before determining eligibility, they went through a series of questions about what abuse had actually occurred to me, and I certainly wasn't anticipating that, I felt they didn't ask those questions in a very trauma-informed way. One particular question I remember is, they asked if his 'penis, tongue or finger had penetrated any of my orifices'. [75]

Ms Pearn, a social worker, said, in that role, she would never have asked the question in that way.[76] Presumably, the question was asked because the amount of compensation paid under the National Redress Scheme depends on the nature of the abuse, including whether the offence was penetrative or non-penetrative.[77] Still, we agree with Ms Pearn's concern that questions about the details of her abuse were raised during a phone appointment with a lawyer in the context of a general enquiry about eligibility.

The lawyer responding to her enquiry could have explained how the National Redress Scheme operated in a general way, without asking her for details about her abuse.

We accept the Tasmanian Government may often be unaware of victim-survivors' concerns or complaints about their interactions with the National Redress Scheme, given the Australian Government administers the Scheme and there is often no direct contact between the Tasmanian Government and victim-survivors seeking redress. However, where the Tasmanian Government is aware of insensitive interactions with victim-survivors in responding to enquiries or managing applications under the National Redress Scheme, it should bring these issues to the attention of the Australian Government.

The Australian Government should ensure that staff, including contractors who assess entitlement for redress, are appropriately trained to do this in a sensitive and trauma-informed manner.

There was also criticism of delays in the assessment process. Secretary Webster told us that the time limits are usually met for the Tasmanian Government to provide relevant information.[78] This suggests that overcoming perceived delays in assessment will require changes in the Australian Government's administration of the National Redress Scheme. The Australian Government (and all other participating jurisdictions) should examine what measures are needed to reduce application processing delays under the Scheme.

2.5 The Second Year Review of the National Redress Scheme

Between July 2020 and March 2021, Robyn Kruk AO undertook an independent review of the National Redress Scheme.[79] As noted above, the final report on the Second Year Review of the National Redress Scheme ('Second Year Review') was delivered at the end of March 2021.[80]

The Second Year Review concluded 'there remains a strong commitment to the original objectives that led to the set-up of the Scheme'.[81] However, it also noted consensus among victim-survivors and stakeholders in several areas relating to:

> ... the need to improve survivor experience; hold institutions accountable; strengthen the levers being utilised to facilitate non-government institutions signing on; support Scheme integrity; increase transparency; drive ongoing improvement of Scheme operation and performance; and address unintended or negative survivor consequences identified in the Scheme's early conduct linked to legislation, policy and practice.[82]

As the National Redress Scheme was approaching its third year of operation and the timeframe for improving the National Redress Scheme was 'extremely limited', the Second Year Review focused on issues that had the greatest potential to improve participation and experience for victim-survivors and sustain the viability of the Scheme.[83] Among other things, it examined the following topics:

- improving survivor experience
- access and applying for redress
- assessing abuse
- eligibility
- redress payments
- counselling and apologies (direct personal responses)
- staffing capability and support
- Scheme information management systems
- funding arrangements.[84]

The Second Year Review made 38 recommendations relating to improving survivor experience, delivering better outcomes, enhancing fairness integrity, staff capability and support and improving communications. Some of these recommendations included:

- amending the National Redress Scheme Inter-governmental Agreement, so survivors and non-government institutions have formal input into the Scheme's operation (Recommendation 1.1)
- developing a co-designed Survivors' Service Improvement Charter by the end of 2021 (Recommendation 2.1)
- amending the eligibility criteria to include a single application process for all applicants, including non-citizens, non-permanent residents, prisoners, people with serious criminal convictions and care leavers (Recommendation 3.2)
- exploring alternative mechanisms to enable access to the Scheme for vulnerable individuals, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander, culturally and linguistically diverse and applicants with disability (Recommendation 3.8)
- making assessment and policy guidelines publicly available by removing legislative protections to achieve greater transparency in decision making and consistency with contemporary practices of other government schemes (Recommendation 3.13)
- co-developing and implementing a clinically designed recruitment and selection process for all new staff to ensure they are trauma aware and possess the capability and capacity to provide a trauma-informed redress service to survivors (Recommendation 6.4)

- mandating the auditing and reporting on staff participation in clinically designed and delivered training programs that include modules on:
    - trauma-informed and culturally safe practices
    - work health
    - safety and wellbeing
    - privacy
    - protected information
- monitoring the efficacy of the training programs through survivor feedback mechanisms (Recommendation 6.5)
- assessing whether the redress Information and Communications Technology system is fit for purpose (Recommendation 6.8)
- committing to continue improvements in complaint management and reflecting these in the Survivor's Service Improvement Charter (Recommendation 6.11).

The Second Year Review noted that because of the 'extremely limited' time available to implement changes, 'unprecedented cooperation by all governments that enabled the Scheme's establishment' would be required.[85]

In May 2023, the Australian Government released its full response to the Second Year Review, in which it outlined the Government's actions and ongoing commitment to improving the National Redress Scheme for victim-survivors. It noted that state and territory governments had collaborated closely on the agreed responses to the Second Year Review's recommendations.[86] In summary, the Australian Government:

- supported 30 of the 38 recommendations in full
- supported four recommendations in part or with amendment (including recommendation 3.2 referred to above)
- did not support four recommendations (including Recommendation 3.13 referred to above).

In response to Recommendation 3.2 (also referred to above), the Australian Government advised that a Service Charter had been co-developed with victim-survivors, redress support services and advocacy groups. The Charter began in September 2022 and is publicly available on the National Redress Scheme's website.[87] It sets out 'standards to be maintained in ensuring the Scheme operates in a safe, transparent and responsive way for survivors, and also outlines what survivors who apply to the Scheme can expect from the redress process'.[88]

We are pleased the Australian, state and territory governments support many of the Review's recommendations. Implementing these recommendations may help improve the operation of the Scheme and overcome concerns we heard about how enquiries and applications for redress are managed. We encourage the Australian Government to further extend the Scheme to people who have committed serious crimes.

2.6 Our observations

As we have explained, victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions are entitled to redress under the National Redress Scheme only where the abuse occurred before 1 July 2018. Victim-survivors must apply for redress on or before 30 June 2027, 12 months before the end of the Scheme.[89] At the time of the application, victim-survivors must be 18 years of age or be turning 18 before 30 June 2028.[90]

The limited life of the National Redress Scheme diverges from the recommendations of the National Royal Commission, which recommended that redress schemes, when established, should have no fixed closing date. The National Royal Commission contemplated that when applications had declined to such a level it would be reasonable to consider closing the Scheme, a closing date might be specified at least 12 months into the future.[91]

Counsel Assisting our Commission of Inquiry asked Secretary Webster about planning for alternative or replacement schemes to meet the compensation and counselling needs of victim-survivors when the National Redress Scheme does not apply. She accepted that any replacement scheme should consider what had been learned from experience of the limitations of the National Redress Scheme, including the need to minimise delays in responding and provide trauma-informed case management of applicants.[92]

We are heartened by Secretary Webster's recognition that a redress scheme is needed to assist victim-survivors who were abused after 1 July 2018 and who have never been covered by the National Redress Scheme. We understand the Tasmanian Attorney-General has indicated the Tasmanian Government is open to taking action to ensure compensation and counselling is available for these victim-survivors.[93]

Our Inquiry has shown the Tasmanian Government has failed to protect some children in Tasmanian Government institutions from child sexual abuse and related conduct, in historical and contemporary contexts. In our view, the Tasmanian Government should have a responsibility to continue to provide an avenue for victim-survivors to obtain appropriate redress for past abuse, other than by pursuing a civil claim against the Tasmanian Government.

We are not convinced that applications to the National Redress Scheme have declined to such a degree that the National Redress Scheme should close, as provided for under the National Redress Scheme Act. The findings of our Commission of Inquiry make it clear that child sexual abuse remains a contemporary issue, in and beyond Tasmanian Government institutions.

Some barriers to taking civil action for damages relating to child sexual abuse have been removed, notably where institutions responsible for children have failed to exercise a duty of care to take reasonable precautions to prevent child sexual abuse. However, victim-survivors seeking damages will still meet obstacles of cost, delay and cross-examination if the matter goes to trial. This is in addition to the traumatic effect of having to constantly recount their experience of child sexual abuse. In contrast, well-designed redress schemes allow victim-survivors to obtain a measure of justice without facing these problems.

The Australian Government should consider extending the scope of the National Redress Scheme to allow all people who have experienced child sexual abuse to access the Scheme, irrespective of when they were born or when the abuse occurred. This would cover child sexual abuse that occurred on or after 1 July 2018, in addition to abuse that occurred before 1 July 2018. The time for making applications for redress under the existing Scheme would also have to be extended beyond 30 June 2027. We also note the National Redress Scheme currently requires that the victim-survivor turns 18 before the Scheme's sunset date, which would also need to be removed. If the Australian Government does extend the Scheme, it should consider the Second Year Review in full, noting that the review focused on changes achievable within the life of the Scheme at the time.

If the Australian Government does not extend the National Redress Scheme to cover child sexual abuse that occurred on or after 1 July 2018, we recommend the Tasmanian Government step in to establish a redress scheme covering child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions that falls outside the scope of the current National Redress Scheme.

Any Tasmanian redress scheme should also consider the recommendations of the Second Year Review (discussed in Section 2.5) and ensure redress is available to victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse, regardless of when that abuse occurred. The scheme should also minimise the kinds of problems that have arisen with the National Redress Scheme. In particular, the scheme should reduce delays, and manage applications for redress in a sensitive and trauma-informed manner.

We consider that any redress scheme—a national or a Tasmanian one—should be available to people with serious criminal convictions in the same way it is to other victim-survivors. We are conscious that many children and young people who were abused at Ashley Youth Detention Centre are now in the adult justice system, some for serious offences. This approach is in line with the recommendation of the Second Year Review.

The scheme should also be structured to allow information to be shared to reduce current risk to children, wherever possible, and to facilitate disciplinary action and reporting to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 (refer to Recommendation 12.5).

Our findings in relation to Ashley Youth Detention Centre demonstrate that physical, sexual and psychological abuse of children can co-occur in institutions. While we have not inquired into this matter in detail, the Government might explore the benefits of extending any redress scheme to any serious abuse of a child in an institutional context, particularly as it would provide an alternative to civil litigation.

Recommendation 17.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions have access to a redress scheme irrespective of when the abuse occurred, when they were born or whether they have committed a serious offence.
2. To achieve this outcome, the Tasmanian Government should advocate at a national level for:
    a. the National Redress Scheme to apply to child sexual abuse in institutions experienced on or after 1 July 2018, with no specified closing date for applications
    b. changes to the National Redress Scheme that will allow access to redress for people sentenced to imprisonment for five years or longer for a state, territory, federal or foreign country offence.
3. If the National Redress Scheme is not extended, the Tasmanian Government should itself establish a redress scheme for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions, with no specified closing date for applications to be made.
4. The design and operation of any Tasmanian redress scheme should:
    a. ensure delays are minimised and that applications for redress are handled in a sensitive and trauma-informed manner
    b. incorporate relevant recommendations made in the Second Year Review of the National Redress Scheme

c. make it available to people sentenced to imprisonment for five years or longer for a state, territory, federal or foreign country offence

d. allow information to be shared to reduce current risk to children wherever possible, and to facilitate disciplinary action and reporting to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 (Recommendation 12.5).

3 Civil litigation

A person injured by the wrongful act or negligence of another person may seek damages from the person who injured them and, in some situations, from the institution or organisation where that person worked. In some situations, they may be able to sue the employer for damages for the acts of an employee.

In theory, a person injured by the perpetrator of child sexual abuse may be able to recover damages from that perpetrator.[94] However, this is of little practical use if the perpetrator has no financial resources and is not covered by insurance.

In these situations, the victim-survivor may wish to seek damages against the body that failed to protect them from abuse. In the context of our Commission of Inquiry, this would require a civil claim against the State of Tasmania. If a claim is initiated, the Tasmanian Government may admit liability and enter negotiations with the claimant to settle the claim and pay damages, or contest the claim in court proceedings. The following discussion relates to civil damages claims against the Tasmanian Government in relation to child sexual abuse in government institutions. We do not discuss civil claims against perpetrators.

The National Royal Commission acknowledged there are many difficulties victim-survivors may face in pursuing civil litigation other than those addressed in its final report. These include legal costs, difficulties in bringing class or group actions, and the burden of giving evidence and being subject to cross-examination.[95] These difficulties may be shared by many other people who pursue civil litigation relating to personal injury or other claims.

Academic commentators have expressed concerns about access to compensation through the torts system (the civil law system) for at least the past 20 years.[96] Apart from the problems of cost and delay faced by all those who seek to recover damages for harm they have suffered, the system is particularly difficult for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings. They may have to repeat their account of abuse several times. They will be subjected to cross-examination that seeks to cast doubt on the accuracy of their recollections.

There have also been many inquiries into access to justice in the civil system. In 2014, the Productivity Commission concluded that, while court processes in all jurisdictions have undergone reforms to reduce the cost and length of litigation, 'progress has been uneven and more needs to be done to avoid unnecessary expense'.[97]

More resources may be needed to better meet the legal needs of disadvantaged Australians. The Law Council of Australia's Justice Project states Australians who experience disadvantage can find it more difficult to get access to justice for a multitude of reasons, including:

- education and literacy levels
- language barriers
- financial constraints
- lack of accessibility
- access to information and digital technology
- past traumas and hesitation to engage in legal processes
- lack of knowledge around rights and where to go for advice or help.[98]

3.1 Reforms based on National Royal Commission recommendations

The National Royal Commission identified other barriers that prevented victim-survivors of child sexual abuse from obtaining damages from institutions. They recommended various law reforms to address these barriers.[99] The Tasmanian Government enacted legislative reforms to implement these recommendations, though some of these changes do not apply to past (or 'historical') abuse. The most important of these legislative changes, for our purposes, were removing time limits and expanding the liability of institutions.

On 1 July 2018, time limits were removed from civil actions started by victim-survivors of child sexual or serious physical abuse. The change was retrospective, so it applies to historical abuse claims.[100]

Legal principles were reformed that made it difficult to hold institutions, including government agencies, liable for child sexual abuse.[101] Under amendments made to the Civil Liability Act 2002 ('Civil Liability Act'), which came into operation on 1 May 2020, institutions responsible for children now have a duty of care to take reasonable precautions to prevent relevant individuals associated with the organisation from abusing those children.[102] The onus is on the institution to prove it took reasonable precautions to prevent the abuse.[103] Institutions are also vicariously liable for the actions of employees (or people similar to employees) who abuse a child.[104] These provisions only apply to child abuse perpetrated after 1 May 2020.[105]

This means most of the settlement negotiations in which the Tasmanian Government is currently engaged will be conducted under the previous law.

The National Royal Commission also noted that some states had adopted model litigant policies and principles to guide their approach to civil litigation arising out of child sexual abuse.

In this context, the Solicitor-General released Model Litigant Guidelines in 2019.[106] These guidelines require the Tasmanian Government and its agencies to:

- settle legitimate claims promptly and without resort to litigation
- not contest liability where the only issue is the amount of damages, or the application of a remedy
- not require a party to prove a matter that the Tasmanian Government knows to be true
- not rely on technical issues where the Tasmanian Government will not suffer prejudice, unless it is necessary to do so in the public interest, or to protect the Tasmanian Government's interests.

In 2019, the Solicitor-General also released Guidelines for the Conduct of Civil Claims, which contain guidance relevant specifically to litigation involving victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.[107] These guidelines state the Tasmanian Government and its agencies must:

- acknowledge the potential for litigation to retraumatise claimants, and act to minimise this potential
- avoid unnecessarily adversarial conduct and communications
- facilitate access to records relating to the claimant and the alleged abuse, subject to other privacy and legal restrictions
- offer alternative forms of acknowledgement or redress, in addition to monetary claims.

As discussed in more detail below, we consider that further practice changes should be made to ensure the spirit of these guidelines is reflected in practice.

3.2 Criticism of State conduct of civil litigation

Paul Turner SC, the then Assistant Solicitor-General, who oversaw the conduct of litigation on behalf of the Tasmanian Government, said in evidence that the Model Litigant Guidelines were taken seriously. He said:

> From time to time the contention will be made that the state is not acting as a model litigant or hasn't complied with the guidelines which the Cabinet have directed apply to abuse in care claims. We, by and large, don't think that those have substance, those complaints—they're rare, I hasten to say, but we're just acutely conscious of these and how they are to apply and how the state is to conduct litigation.[108]

However, our Commission of Inquiry heard evidence about the considerable difficulties faced by people who seek damages from the Tasmanian Government. A submission from Laurel House, a sexual assault support service, observed that:

> … there remains significant challenges for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse to bring about civil claims against any organisation, especially the Tasmanian Government. In particular, the process for bringing civil claims against the Tasmanian Government is not sufficiently transparent, and many victim-survivors can find it difficult to pursue legal action due to significant functional challenges related to trauma. Further, for many victim-survivors concerns about the potential cost of legal action and fear about how they will be treated through … civil proceeding acts as a barrier.[109]

We heard from lawyers who have acted for claimants that, at least until recently, the Tasmanian Government response did not consider claimants' trauma and the delays and other obstacles they may encounter in resolving their claim. These factors may worsen the harm caused by child sexual abuse and may cause some people to give up a damages claim that might otherwise have succeeded.

Angela Sdrinis, Director, Angela Sdrinis Legal, a plaintiff law firm that specialises in sexual and institutional abuse and has acted for more than 1,700 victim-survivors across Australia, gave evidence about the responses faced by claimants. She said:

> Whilst the Solicitor-General's Office lawyers are good lawyers, their approach to responding to child sexual abuse matters has been noticeably different to that of government lawyers we deal with in other Australian jurisdictions. It is evident that there has either been a lack of understanding amongst the Tasmanian Solicitor-General's Office lawyers that such matters must be conducted in a more trauma-informed way or their approach has been based on instructions from the Government.[110]

Ms Sdrinis said there had been some improvements in approach over the more than six years she had been involved in the process, but at least until recently, there was

- a reluctance to discuss settling a claim before filing proceedings
- a technical and legalistic approach to claims
- an insensitive approach to claimants.[111]

Ms Sdrinis also stated that following the record award of $5.3 million to a sexual abuse survivor, the settlement offers being made in Tasmania were now more consistent with settlements and awards made in the mainland states.[112]

Similarly, Mr Strange referred to feedback from their panel of independent lawyers that the Tasmanian Government was less willing than some religious institutions to take part in genuine settlement conferences and, sometimes, adopted an overly adversarial approach.[113]

We note that knowmore supported providing appropriate training to all government lawyers and departmental staff involved in responding to child sexual abuse claims, so they could better understand child sexual abuse and its impacts. In knowmore's view, lawyers involved in child sexual abuse matters would benefit from understanding the impacts of abuse and how delays and failures to negotiate can compound a person's trauma.[114]

In the following sections, we briefly describe specific problems raised by these witnesses and others who spoke to us about the difficulties of pursuing civil litigation in relation to child sexual abuse. Specific issues raised with us included:

- the reliance by the Solicitor-General's Office on the 'consent' of the victim-survivor of child sexual abuse to deny civil liability
- the approach of Tasmanian Government institutions and the Solicitor-General's Office in settlement negotiations, including in relation to access to medical reports and making apologies
- delays by Tasmanian Government institutions in providing information and settling claims.

We also acknowledge the changes that have been made during our Commission of Inquiry in response to some of these concerns, including the Tasmanian Attorney-General's statement in March 2023 about managing civil claims in a sensitive and not unnecessarily adversarial manner through the establishment of a new State Litigation Office.[115]

3.2.1 Reliance on consent

Ms Sdrinis told us that:

> … in some matters the Tasmanian Government has argued that limitation periods still apply where the claimant allegedly 'consented' to a sexual relationship even though the claimant was a minor and the sexual conduct might be a criminal offence under s124 of the Criminal Code.[116]

Ms Sdrinis said she was unaware of any other jurisdiction that had relied on 'consent' in this way where the victim was a minor and the perpetrator was an older person. She also stated that, to her knowledge, the 'consent' argument had only been made in relation to female young people and not male young people.[117]

As far as we understand it, such an argument would rely on an interpretation of the meaning of the term 'sexual abuse' in the Limitation Act 1974 which, in our view, is legally dubious. It also appears to be inconsistent with a legislative and policy intention to remove the limitation period for child abuse.

The Tasmanian Government has told us the issue has only arisen in two cases (both of which involved a female young person).[118] We have undertaken no consideration or analysis of those cases, including whether or not there was discrimination or bias.

Following media publicity about one of these cases, the Attorney-General directed that no reliance should be placed on consent, to avoid the reform of limitation periods.[119] We are glad that is now the case, but consider it would be useful for the Solicitor-General to provide guidance to lawyers working in that Office to ensure they do not take this position in the future.

We also encourage the Tasmanian Government to actively monitor whether the notion of 'consent' is being used in responding to civil claims relating to child sexual abuse and whether the legislative and policy intention to remove the limitation period for child abuse is being honoured.

3.2.2 Approach in settlement negotiations

Ms Sdrinis also told us that despite the adoption of the Solicitor-General's Model Litigant Guidelines (referred to in Section 3.1), the Tasmanian Government originally showed little interest in non-litigious settlements of child sexual abuse claims.[120] One client had settled against Ms Sdrinis's legal advice because of the Tasmanian Government's resistance to the claim.[121]

Ms Sdrinis said that, initially, the Solicitor-General's Office had shown no interest in agreeing to an informal protocol to govern the settling of claims, as is the process in Victoria. She had first written to the Tasmanian Government in 2015 proposing such a protocol.[122] She was told, in late 2017, the Tasmanian Government would no longer require the filing of proceedings before settling child sexual abuse claims, but it took another couple of years for further progress.[123] The Tasmanian Government now no longer requires statements of claim to be drafted before settlement negotiations can occur, which reduces the cost of making a claim.[124]

Ms Sdrinis also criticised the requirement that claimants attend the opening session of an informal settlement conference between their solicitor and lawyers representing the Tasmanian Government.[125] She said this requirement did not apply elsewhere and considered its purpose had been to demonstrate the Tasmanian Government's 'hard-line approach' to settling claims.[126] Clients who had been abused in out of home care were particularly vulnerable. She said:

> People who are abused as children often develop self-destructive behaviours post the abuse. In ward of state claims we have situations where children probably experienced trauma or at least neglect, because that's why they've gone into care, so to sit there and hear government lawyers analyse those life experiences in a way which is designed to support an argument that compensation should be reduced or minimised because of non-related trauma, can obviously be very hurtful to a claimant.[127]

It appears the Solicitor-General's Office no longer insists claimants attend opening sessions, and even if there is a legitimate reason for raising these issues, the Tasmanian Government 'seems to be more aware of the trauma that can be caused to claimants if participation in a mediation or informal settlement conference is not well managed'.[128]

We also received a submission from Shine Lawyers, the third-largest specialist plaintiff litigation law firm in Australia. Shine Lawyers has represented numerous victim-survivors of institutional sexual abuse in civil litigation and other legal proceedings.[129]

Shine Lawyers criticised the Tasmanian Government's response to damages claims, pointing out that statutory reforms 'did not mean survivors had an unobstructed path towards justice'.[130] Criticisms of inadequate responses to civil claims causing further roadblocks for victim-survivors included:

- an unnecessarily adversarial approach to civil claims
- an implication that victim-survivors ought to pursue redress under the National Redress Scheme rather than through a civil claim
- the lack of a collaborative framework to respond to civil claims against the Tasmanian Government.[131]

In their submission, Shine Lawyers gave many examples of the Tasmanian Government's obstructive and uncompassionate behaviour, including a case where the Tasmanian Government suggested that the victim-survivor should make a claim against the individual perpetrator, rather than the institution.[132] In another case, a victim-survivor, who had entered into a deed settling her claim for an inadequate amount, was pressured by the Tasmanian Government not to seek further compensation.[133] Months later, the Tasmanian Government agreed to set aside the deed rather than pursue a contested application in court.[134] Regarding those two matters, the Tasmanian Government told us its view was that one or both matters did not involve the State of Tasmania.[135]

3.2.3 Medical reports

Ms Sdrinis also acknowledged some positive changes, including how the Tasmanian Government is now more prepared to consider joint medical examinations, the cost of which the Tasmanian Government will cover.

The Solicitor-General's Guidelines for the Conduct of Civil Claims provide that the Tasmanian Government must, in appropriate matters, suggest a range of potential experts to claimants that:

- are acceptable to the Tasmanian Government
- provide genuine choice to claimants
- where appropriate, help both parties agree to use a single expert.[136]

Using a single expert ensures both parties have access to medical reports or other expert evidence.

However, as we discuss below, the Tasmanian Government has previously also claimed privilege over independent medical examination reports.[137]

Victim-survivors will usually produce a medical report or a report from a psychologist to support their claim for damages. The Tasmanian Government, sometimes, will require them to attend another health practitioner (or practitioners), so an independent medico-legal report can be prepared about the nature and cause of the harm on which the claimant relies.

Ms Sdrinis was critical that the Tasmanian Government is able to claim, and has claimed, legal professional privilege over such reports because such an approach is not trauma-informed.[138] Further, Ms Sdrinis said the Tasmanian Government sometimes relies, in negotiations, on aspects of the medical report that have not been made available to the claimant or their lawyer.[139] Ms Sdrinis said, in Victoria, if the Victorian Government were to arrange a medical assessment, the contents of the report would be made available to the claimant.[140]

In his evidence, Mr Turner attributed to the previous Solicitor-General the practice of claiming privilege over medical reports. He said the position is 'generally that, in circumstances where a report has been obtained [that] attracts that privilege it won't be waived unless an advertent decision is made that it is favourable to the interests of the state, in which case it will be'.[141] As we understand it, that meant medical evidence that supported the claim for damages was not necessarily revealed to the victim-survivor. The Tasmanian Government has now informed us this position changed in July 2022 after instructions were sought and received from the Attorney-General to waive privilege in relation to medical reports as a matter of general policy.[142] We are pleased this change has been made.

3.2.4 Reinforcing the Litigation Guidelines

The Model Litigant Guidelines and the Guidelines for the Conduct of Civil Claims were released in 2019, and while there have been some improvements in negotiating settlements, these guidelines appear to have had limited impact. In its Fifth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2023, the Tasmanian Government refers to a statement by the Honourable Elise Archer MP, Attorney-General and Minister for Justice, to the effect that:

> … the management of civil claims is to be conducted with the utmost sensitivity to victim-survivors and in a manner that is not unnecessarily adversarial. This included that all state lawyers apply a trauma-informed lens to all decisions relating to the management of child sexual abuse civil litigation matters against the State.[143]

We welcome this statement and other changes in practice that may have occurred recently. However, to ensure civil claims are handled appropriately, Tasmanian Government lawyers need to understand the effect of child sexual abuse on victim-survivors and the problems they may face during the litigation process. Secretary Webster told us it was the responsibility of the Solicitor-General to ensure that lawyers in her office were aware of these issues.[144] She said, in 2021, members of the Litigation Division of the Office of the Solicitor-General had taken part in training on trauma awareness and providing a trauma-informed direct personal response.[145]

3.2.5 Delays in providing information and settling claims

Mr Strange, Ms Sdrinis and Shine Lawyers told us victim-survivors often experienced long and stressful delays in obtaining information they had requested to support their claims.[146] Both Ms Sdrinis and Mr Strange said the situation in Tasmania was worse than in other states, which was retraumatising for clients.[147] Shine Lawyers said that even when the Tasmanian Government was notified of a likely claim, it might take months to be given details of the person handling the matter.[148] Further, when the Tasmanian Government was initially notified of some claims, 'the notice bounced around between different officers and departments who responded variously with comments such as "we don't know who looks after these claims"'.[149]

Lengthy delays in responding to lawyers' requests for information may also be caused by inadequate record keeping or insufficient numbers of state servants who can recover and provide the information. In her evidence, Secretary Webster said:

> Yes, so in terms of what we have found since certainly the matters that came to the attention of the Commission … but also through the civil and criminal litigation areas, that we do need some additional resourcing in the civil litigation, the Abuse in State Care area. It's clear that that includes legal practitioners, administrative support, and I think, depending on the final model, the management of those matters could probably also benefit from some clinical advice on how they're managed as well; and by that I mean trauma-informed practice.[150]

Shine Lawyers told us delays make it harder for a claimant to recover from the harm they have suffered and adds to their stress.[151] While the Tasmanian Government has made some changes, improvements have been patchy. As we explain below, some but not all delays appear to relate to the operation of the Right to Information Act. We discuss this issue in Section 6.2.

3.3 The Solicitor-General's role

The Solicitor-General acts as a lawyer for the Tasmanian Government, including in relation to legal issues relevant to institutional child sexual abuse. In this section, we discuss the role of the Solicitor-General and their Office in advising whether claims for damages against the Tasmanian Government by victim-survivors should be settled, and in conducting litigation where the Tasmanian Government denies liability. We also, briefly, discuss the role of the Solicitor-General more broadly.

The Solicitor-General Act 1983 ('Solicitor-General Act') establishes the Solicitor-General as an independent statutory office that is accountable to the Tasmanian Parliament. Under section 7 of the Solicitor-General Act, the Solicitor-General's functions are to:

- act as counsel for the Crown in right of Tasmania or for any other person for whom the Attorney-General directs or requests them to act
- perform such other duties ordinarily performed by legal practitioners as the Attorney-General directs or requests them to perform
- perform such duties (if any) as are imposed on them by or under any other Act.

A direction from the Attorney-General, dated 13 January 2022, made under section 7(b) of the Solicitor-General Act, requires the Solicitor-General to act for the Tasmanian Government in civil proceedings.[152]

Under section 8 of the Solicitor-General Act, the Attorney-General can delegate responsibility for powers and functions that can be performed by the Attorney-General, to the Solicitor-General. At present, there has been no delegation under section 8 to the Solicitor-General.[153]

Section 51(1) of the Financial Management Act 2016 ('Financial Management Act') allows the Treasurer of the Tasmanian Government to issue instructions relating to the principles, practices and procedures all agencies must observe in their financial management. 'Agencies' covers specified Tasmanian Government departments, authorities, bodies, organisations and offices.[154] Accountable authorities and officers within these agencies have a duty to comply with the Treasurer's instructions.[155] Section 55 of the Financial Management Act allows the Treasurer to authorise payment to a person if the Treasurer is satisfied it is appropriate to do so because of special circumstances, even though the payment would not otherwise be authorised by law or be required to meet a legal liability (also known as an 'ex gratia payment').

Under a Treasurer's instruction made under section 51 of the Financial Management Act, all agencies and instrumentalities of the Crown must get legal advice only from Law Officers of the Crown. They must follow that legal advice in relation to 'the legal functions, powers or responsibilities of the Crown; or the lawfulness of any action, or proposed course of action, by the Crown'.[156] The effect of that Treasurer's Instruction is that all departments must seek advice only from the Solicitor-General's Office unless Crown Law—the administrative entity responsible for providing legal services to the Tasmanian Government—agrees in writing that the agency can get external advice.[157]

The accountable authority (in most cases, the Head of the relevant Agency) 'must not directly engage external counsel or commercial legal services without the written agreement of Crown Law'.[158]

During our hearings, we sought to clarify the roles of the Solicitor-General, departmental secretaries and other Heads of Agencies in settling civil claims arising from child sexual abuse in government institutions.

We heard evidence on this issue from Sarah Kay SC, Solicitor-General, and Mr Turner. At the time of our hearings, Mr Turner was the head of the section of the Solicitor-General's Office that deals with civil litigation.

The Solicitor-General referred to the Treasurer's Instruction under the Financial Management Act, which requires the Solicitor-General to act as Counsel for the Crown, and the Attorney-General's direction that the Solicitor-General conducts all civil litigation on behalf of the Tasmanian Government.[159]

The Solicitor-General said these instructions were based on 'a constitutional convention'.[160] The Treasurer's Instruction, which prevents agencies from getting external legal advice, states the Instruction reflects the following constitutional principles:

- the Crown must ascertain and obey the law
- unless otherwise lawfully permitted, the Crown must get its legal advice from Law Officers of the Crown.[161]

The Treasurer's Instruction, including the Instruction that prevents getting external legal advice without an exemption, applies to the Ombudsman and the Chief Executive Officer of the Integrity Commission.[162] Arguably, the application of the Instruction to these specified Agencies and Accountable Authorities is inconsistent with the intention these bodies be independent from the Executive.

In response to questions from Counsel Assisting, the Solicitor-General differentiated between advising on the legal rules which regulate how agencies can act, and instructing agencies about the decision they should make, stating 'we might assist [agencies] to form their decision within correct legal parameters in order to protect that ultimate decision from challenge, but we do not dictate what sort of decision that might be made'.[163] The Solicitor-General did not elaborate on how that distinction operated in the case of advice about settlement of civil claims.

In addition, the Treasurer's Instruction does not clearly cover Solicitor-General advice about the precise amount of a settlement, which requires using discretion rather than a determination on whether a settlement is lawful.

According to their evidence, the Heads of Agencies generally consider the Solicitor-General makes the final decision on whether a claim should be settled. However, there was a lack of clarity about the role of a Head of Agency regarding payment amounts when a secretary considers the proposed settlement amount is too low.[164]

A Head of Agency or department may take the view the settlement amount the Office of the Solicitor-General proposes is too low because the:

- abuse was longstanding
- department responded inadequately to reports of risk of harm
- claimant suffered extreme harm
- department's reputation would be negatively affected by offering meagre damages in the situation that led to the claim.

Although a secretary can raise these concerns with the Solicitor-General's Office, the general view seems to be the Treasurer's Instruction relates to decisions about liability and amount of damages.[165]

Mr Turner said if there was a disagreement between the Solicitor-General's Office and a Head of Agency or department on this issue, they would discuss it, but if they could not resolve the matter, the Solicitor-General's Office would be the decision maker 'because we are part of the Crown'.[166] He based this interpretation of the Treasurer's Instruction on the approach taken by the Solicitor-General's predecessor and on the Solicitor-General Act.[167]

The usual duty of a lawyer is to advise their client, who can then accept or reject that advice. By contrast, it appears the Solicitor-General's role goes beyond advising a client to making decisions on behalf of Tasmanian Government agencies. We do not doubt the dedication of the lawyers who work in the Solicitor-General's Office. We also realise that Tasmanian public funding is stretched and the rationale for the Solicitor-General's virtual monopoly on providing legal advice may be to limit public spending.

We are concerned that restricting the ability of departmental secretaries and other Heads of Agencies to seek alternative advice in relation to settlements and litigation in all child sexual abuse cases could lead to complacency and reinforce practices that cannot be justified.

Restricting access to external sources of legal advice may also have negative consequences in other contexts relating to child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions. These contexts include when agencies seek advice about access to information applications, laws around information sharing, or in employment law disputes. Across our report, we have identified times when legal advice has affected whether agencies have taken action to protect the safety of children. We understand most other states do not prevent Heads of Agencies from obtaining external legal advice in situations where they consider it appropriate.

3.4 Our observations

Some barriers to recovering damages from the Tasmanian Government for child sexual abuse occurring in Tasmanian government institutions have been removed by legislative reforms following the final report of the National Royal Commission. However, in our view, other improvements can be made to help victim-survivors seek compensation through the civil litigation system without trauma.

Lawyers representing the Tasmanian Government have a duty to serve their client to the best of their ability. That duty may require a lawyer involved in settlement discussions to raise legal issues that may be obstacles to a successful claim by a victim-survivor. However, as the Model Litigant Guidelines recognise, and the Attorney-General has acknowledged, this duty should not prevent lawyers managing claims sensitively, for example, by considering a claimant's difficulties in having to talk about their abuse, sometimes on multiple occasions, and to submit to medical examinations.[168]

Secretary Webster's evidence suggests the Tasmanian Government is reconsidering its civil litigation practices. She noted:

> Work has been undertaken to review the structure and processes with respect to civil litigation and the management of child sexual abuse claims and information has been provided to the Attorney-General regarding potential changes that comply with her announced expectations with respect to the management of civil litigation.[169]

Nevertheless, we consider that staff who deal with civil claims relating to child sexual abuse need more detailed guidance. We recommend regular staff training on the nature and effects of child sexual abuse on victim-survivors and how to consider these effects when victim-survivors are involved in civil litigation processes.

We recommend the Tasmanian Government review its litigation practices and how it manages claims arising from allegations of child sexual abuse.

In this context, we note the Attorney-General's recent instruction that claims should not be made by the Tasmanian Government's representatives for legal professional privilege in relation to medical reports or other expert evidence relevant to child sexual abuse.

As noted above, in March 2023, the Attorney-General announced the Tasmanian Government would 'establish a new separate State Litigation Office to take over the management of the Tasmanian Government's civil litigation'. The Attorney-General stated: 'this is an opportunity to contemporise the management of civil litigation and ensure an understanding of the impact of trauma and harm is embedded in all areas of the State's legal system'.[170]

The new State Litigation Office would provide the Attorney-General with 'advice regarding specific guidelines and directions on the handling of civil claims, including any changes to ensure that processes are more victim-centric and trauma-informed'.[171]

In performing its functions, the new Office should consider our conclusions and recommendations concerning Tasmanian Government litigation practices and the management of claims arising from allegations of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions.

In addition, we consider that the respective roles of departmental secretaries and the Solicitor-General need to be clarified, particularly in relation to determining the amount of damages that should be offered in civil litigation matters. We also consider that departmental secretaries and other Heads of Agencies should be authorised to seek external legal advice when they consider it appropriate. The Tasmanian Government should consider whether external advice should be available more broadly in other contexts where agencies wish to seek legal advice relating to child sexual abuse in government institutions.

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure all lawyers who act for the Tasmanian Government in civil claims relating to child sexual abuse receive regular professional development on:
    a. the nature and effects of child sexual abuse, including institutional child sexual abuse, perpetrator tactics and impacts on victim-survivors
    b. how to consider these effects when victim-survivors are involved in civil litigation processes.
2. The Solicitor-General or the new State Litigation Office should issue and ensure compliance with guidelines relating to:
    a. trauma-informed management of settlement processes and conferences in child sexual abuse cases
    b. whether and when legal professional privilege should be claimed by the Tasmanian Government in relation to medical reports or expert evidence, adopting the principle that generally legal professional privilege should be waived
    c. making apologies before reaching a final settlement.

Recommendation 17.3

1. The Attorney-General should issue guidelines to clarify the respective roles of the Solicitor-General and the new State Litigation Office, departmental secretaries and other agency heads where Tasmanian government agencies are engaged in the conduct and settlement of civil litigation arising from allegations of child sexual abuse.
2. The Treasurer's Instruction relating to obtaining external legal advice should be amended to:
    a. make it consistent with the Attorney-General's guidelines on civil litigation arising from allegations of child sexual abuse
    b. specify the circumstances in which departmental secretaries and other agency heads should be able to seek external legal advice on matters related to child sexual abuse.

4 Apologies

4.1 The importance of apologies to victim-survivors

Victim-survivors, who gave evidence at our hearings, made submissions or took part in a session with a Commissioner, spoke about the importance of receiving a direct personal response to their experiences. Alex (a pseudonym), for example, stated:

> I would have loved to have got an apology. I went [to the health service] wholly and solely to find out the outcome of that incident and if that perpetrator is still working amongst children … if I'd received the help when I asked for it [at the time] and when I asked for it [4 years later], I don't think I would be this broken person.[172]

Katrina Munting, who in 2018 disclosed alleged abuse by a teacher, also spoke about the Department of Education's failure to acknowledge what had happened to her, even after the teacher had been charged with offences. She wrote to the Minister for Education 16 times in 2020 requesting to meet, and received 'two, maybe three, replies' signed by the Minister declining her request.[173] After many attempts to arrange meetings, she was referred to meet with the Deputy Secretary of the Department of Education.[174] Ms Munting said that although the Deputy Secretary listened well to her story and apologised to her, she would have 'preferred a proper, personalised apology from the Department of Education itself and a proper discussion with them so that they could hear me personally'.[175] At our hearings, Ms Munting indicated she needed more than just a 'generic' or 'sweeping' apology.[176] In her own words:

> … they need to be sorry that I was abused in their institution and they chose to ignore it, and they chose not to follow it up, and they chose to ignore me, and, you know, they need to name up exactly what it is that they're sorry for, because I don't want a hollow 'I'm sorry'. What are you sorry for? Because, not only have I been devastated by the abuse, the fallout that I've had to deal with since has made it so much worse.[177]

Azra Beach also gave evidence about the absence of any apology from the Tasmanian Government about the abuse she experienced in out of home care. She said a politician with whom she had raised this issue had assured her she would receive an apology, but this had not happened.[178] She told us:

> … no-one should have to chase up their own apology at all, and I think what makes this even worse is that the people that I have spoken with already knew that this was happening long before this Commission even came about; I raised it so many times, but I suppose because of who I am and, you know, sometimes how I talk and how I communicate it was complete—I felt, again, completely dismissed.[179]

In her evidence, Ms Sdrinis spoke about how an apology can help victim-survivors recover from the abuse. She said:

> In my experience, it's not always about the money for survivors. The money's important because that's the tangible acknowledgment of wrongdoing, but when survivors go on a journey where they're listened to, where they're believed, where the right amount of compensation is offered—and that's not always more money—it's about an amount of money that the survivor feels is adequate recognition—where there's an apology, a proper apology at the end of that process, and I'll say it again, most importantly, where the survivor feels listened to and believed, then that is trauma-informed practice and I've seen it change survivors' lives; like, completely change their lives.[180]

4.2 Apologies by the Tasmanian Government

The Tasmanian Government has made apologies relating to child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions.

On 26 February 2021, the Honourable Peter Gutwein MP, the then Premier of Tasmania, and the Tasmanian Police Commissioner issued an apology about police failings in the investigation of allegations against James Griffin.[181] The then Premier also referred to this apology in the Tasmanian Parliament on 2 March 2021.[182]

On 11 November 2021, Premier Gutwein also apologised on behalf of the Tasmanian Government and previous governments to victim-survivors of historical abuse in schools and other education facilities.[183]

During our Commission of Inquiry, the secretaries of the then Department of Education, the Department of Justice, the Department of Health and the then Department of Communities also acknowledged the failure to prevent, investigate and respond adequately to institutional child sexual abuse and its devastating effect on victim-survivors.[184]

On 8 November 2022, the Tasmanian Parliament delivered an apology to all victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions.[185] As part of this apology, the current Premier, the Honourable Jeremy Rockliff MP, expressed deep regret for the institutional failures that led to a profound violation of trust, and for the harm caused to victim-survivors, some of whom had died and would not hear the apology. The Premier also acknowledged the bravery of people who had shared their experience with our Inquiry. He thanked those who had spoken up to protect children whose voices had previously been ignored. The Premier made an undertaking to all Tasmanians 'to never allow a repeat of this abuse, of the secrecy and the suppression' and 'to never allow a repeat of the failures that allowed such abuse to occur'.[186] He undertook to implement the recommendations of our Commission of Inquiry: 'Our Government is acutely aware of the enormous responsibility to act swiftly and to act decisively to implement the Commission's recommendations'.[187]

4.3 Apologies and civil litigation

Despite, or in addition to, these general apologies, some victim-survivors are likely to want a direct personal response from a senior state servant in the department that oversaw the institution where the abuse occurred. Ms Sdrinis told us the Tasmanian Government has not formally agreed to apologise to victim-survivors who are involved in civil litigation until their claim has been resolved. This contrasts with the approach of some organisations that apologise as soon as a claim has been served on them.[188]

Ms Sdrinis said apologies that recognise the suffering of the victim-survivor could also be offered before settlement in some civil damages claims.[189]

Where a victim-survivor is seeking damages from the Tasmanian Government, the Tasmanian Government may be reluctant to apologise because an apology could be treated as an admission of liability.

Under section 7 of the Civil Liability Act, an apology made by or on behalf of a person is not:

- an admission of fault or liability
- relevant to the determination of fault or liability
- admissible for that purpose in any civil proceedings.[190]

However, this provision does not apply to cases involving intentional acts of child sexual abuse.[191] This provision may also inhibit government agencies' ability to offer an apology when they first receive an allegation or complaint about child sexual abuse.

Some victim-survivors will not consider apologies as any consolation, unless the Tasmanian Government is prepared to settle the claim for damages.[192] However, an appropriately delivered apology that acknowledges an individual's suffering would provide solace to some. In her statement, Secretary Webster recognised this approach could be useful and said:

> The Office of the Solicitor-General has recently sought to improve their provision of trauma-informed redress to civil litigants. The Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit will engage with civil litigants to access redress by preparing personal apologies using … trauma-informed principles and support other forms of redress as requested.[193]

4.4 Our observations

We welcome the apologies the secretaries of Tasmanian Government departments gave during our Commission of Inquiry. We hope they will be of some comfort to victim-survivors. We recognise the symbolic significance of the public apology to victim-survivors by the Premier and the Tasmanian Parliament on 8 November 2022. We also welcome the Premier's commitment to implementing our recommendations.

In relation to a direct personal response, we recognise the risk of future harm to victim-survivors where apologies are given in relation to allegations of child sexual abuse and institutional failings that the Tasmanian Government later contests. Vacuous or meaningless apologies are of little help to victim-survivors. Institutions should adopt an approach that allows agency staff to give a human and compassionate response when interacting with victim-survivors.

We consider an apology should acknowledge what happened to the victim-survivors, answer any questions they might have about their time in the institution and the institution's response, and be prepared to answer questions about what steps have been taken to prevent child sexual abuse happening again.

Some of the difficulties victim-survivors have experienced in obtaining adequate responses, including apologies, may have been based on legal advice or concerns that an apology would be used by people to support a damages claim against the Tasmanian Government. In our view, the Tasmanian Government should be allowed to apologise for institutional child sexual abuse, without this affecting the liability of the Tasmanian Government.

In relation to civil litigation matters, we consider that, at least in some cases, it would be appropriate for the Tasmanian Government to apologise before the resolution of a claim. Similarly, when institutions receive allegations or complaints about child sexual abuse, they should feel able to make an immediate and genuine apology.

We recommend the Civil Liability Act be amended to ensure the Tasmanian Government and government institutions can apologise in relation to child sexual abuse without compromising any defence the Tasmanian Government may have, for example, based on all reasonable steps having been taken to protect a child from abuse.[194] There should be no legal disincentive to apologising.

Recommendation 17.4

The Tasmanian Government should ensure individual victim-survivors of child sexual abuse who request an apology receive one. Proactive steps should also be taken to offer an apology to victim-survivors who make contact in relation to their abuse. The apology should include:

a. the opportunity to meet with a senior institutional representative (preferably the Secretary) and receive an acknowledgment of the abuse and its impact

b. information about the victim-survivor's time in the institution

c. information about what steps the institution has taken or will take to protect against further sexual abuse of children, if asked.

Recommendation 17.5

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Civil Liability Act 2002 to ensure that an apology in relation to child sexual abuse can be made without amounting to an admission of liability.

5 Support for victims of crime

Victims Support Services in the Department of Justice provides various services to victims of crime, including child sexual abuse victim-survivors. These services are described below.[195] In addition, under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1976 ('Victims of Crime Assistance Act'), eligible child sexual abuse victim-survivors can be financially compensated up to a prescribed maximum.[196] At present, this maximum is $30,918 in the case of the primary victim who suffers a single offence, and up to $51,531 for a victim of more than one offence. Compensation for the cost of medical, dental, psychological or counselling services, which a Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner is satisfied the primary victim will require in the future, can be awarded in addition to the prescribed maximum.[197]

5.1 Victims Support Services

Police or the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions often refer victims of crime to Victims Support Services. Psychologists, counsellors or health practitioners sometimes make referrals. There is also a Victims Support Services website, which was reviewed and redesigned in 2021.[198]

Victim-survivors can also contact the service directly and often do. Victims Support Services includes a Victims of Crime Service, which provides access to counselling and other forms of support.[199] We discuss the Victims of Crime Service in more detail in Chapter 21 and make a recommendation to increase these services across the State (refer to Recommendation 21.5). In summary, the Victims of Crime Service can:

- refer a victim-survivor to other service providers
- provide information about the criminal justice system
- help victim-survivors prepare a victim impact statement.[200]

An estimated 85 per cent of all Victims Support Services clients accessing the Victims of Crime Service are supported to complete a victim impact statement.[201] These can be used for sentencing in criminal courts or for the Parole Board.[202] Statements also frequently form the basis of Victims of Crime Assistance applications.

Victims Support Services also keeps an Eligible Persons Register.[203] The Register allows victims to be given information about offenders.[204] This information is available to anyone who is registered as the victim of a violent crime, committed in Tasmania, where the offender has received a custodial sentence.[205] A victim-survivor of violent crime who is on the Register is entitled to receive certain information about the offender, including 'their location, security classification, parole hearing dates and possible release dates'.[206]

The Victims Support Services could not provide any figures on the number of victim-survivors who had sought counselling for child sexual abuse. Data on the Eligible Persons Register has similar limitations. Catherine Edwards, Manager, Victims Support Services, Department of Justice, told us a new case management system will enable this data to be obtained. The system is expected to be rolled out by December 2023.[207] In our view, it would be helpful if that database could differentiate between child sexual abuse in government institutions and in other contexts.

5.2 Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme

Victims of crime may be able to access financial assistance under the Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme. The Victims Assistance Unit in Victims Support Services provides administrative support for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners, who decide whether a victim of crime is eligible to receive financial support (or compensation) and the amount that should be awarded.[208] Ms Edwards said the Unit actively manages applications, liaises with victims of crime and their solicitors, and advises victims on its processes.[209]

Applications for compensation are initially reviewed by an assessment officer and then by a Commissioner, whose decision can be based on the papers alone, a telephone hearing or an in-person hearing.[210] Victims are supposed to be able to choose whether to attend a hearing, although one victim-survivor told us she was not given this choice.[211]

The victim may be asked to provide certain information, for example, medical records. Ms Edwards said if the person makes a direct claim, rather than being represented by a solicitor, Victims Support Services collects police and court records, rather than requiring the victim to do so.[212]

There are seven Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners. Ms Edwards told us a full-time fixed-term Commissioner was appointed in September 2018, and has been acting in this role since this time. There are six sessional Commissioners—two in Burnie, one in Launceston and three in Hobart.[213] Ms Edwards also told us the number of Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners was not fully funded and, as a result, the budget for Victims Support Services was in structural deficit, making it difficult to plan and recruit suitable Commissioners.[214] The Department of Justice told us, in March 2023, that it has now met this deficit to enable the full-time Commissioner position to be funded on an ongoing basis.[215]

Compensation can be awarded where the victim (or, in some situations, a family member) suffers injury or death as the result of an act that was a criminal offence or would have been an offence if the person committing the act were not too young to be criminally liable or was insane.[216] This would include victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. To award compensation, the Commissioner who hears the application must be satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that the death or injury resulted from criminal conduct.[217]

The payments made under the scheme are modest. The amount of the award may cover:

- expenses reasonably incurred because of the injury
- the cost of future medical, dental, psychological or counselling services
- loss of wages or salary caused by the victim's total or partial incapacity for work
- compensation for the pain and suffering arising from the injury
- expenses reasonably incurred by the primary victim in claiming compensation.[218]

The following sections discuss factors potentially relevant to the success or otherwise of applications for compensation made by victim-survivors for institutional child sexual abuse.

5.2.1 Time limits

An application for an award under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act must generally be made within three years of the date of the relevant offence, unless the applicant was a child at the time of the offence, in which case they will have three years from the date they turn 18 years of age to apply.[219]

There is provision for a victim-survivor to apply for an extension of time if the Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner is satisfied there are special circumstances that justify the extension.[220] Victim-survivors and others expressed concern about the time limit for making applications for compensation. As one victim-survivor told us:

> Even with the best policies, processes and practices in the world, most victim/survivors of child sexual abuse, because of the very nature of the abuse, are going to take years to disclose. Is it fair for the time limit to apply to victims/survivors of child sexual abuse relative to other victims of crime?[221]

Ms Edwards told us that, since 2017, there had been two applications relating to child sexual abuse where an extension of time had been refused.[222]

We are pleased to note the recent commencement of the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act 2023 on 20 April 2023 removed the time limits for applicants seeking compensation for child sexual abuse under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act.[223]

5.2.2 Behaviour of the victim

When deciding whether to make an award or the amount of the award, the Victims of Crime Assistance Act requires a Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner to: 'have regard to any behaviour, condition, attitude, or disposition of the victim that appears to him to have directly or indirectly contributed to the injury or death in relation to which the award is sought'.[224]

We would be concerned if a Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner used this provision to disqualify or reduce the compensation payable to children or young people who were groomed to believe their sexual abuse occurred in the context of a relationship with a perpetrator. We have already referred to civil litigation where a victim-survivor was told limitation periods still apply (and, therefore, damages were not payable) because they had 'consented' to the abuse. However, the Attorney-General intervened to change that practice (refer to Section 3.2). Similarly, issues about a child or young person's consent should never be raised in response to an application for compensation under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act.

5.2.3 Compensation and assisting prosecution

Although compensation can be awarded to a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse even if the perpetrator was not convicted of the offence or offences, under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act:

> The Commissioner shall not make an award to a person if that person has failed to do any act or thing which, in the opinion of the Commissioner, that person should reasonably have done to assist in the identification, apprehension, or prosecution of any person alleged to have committed the criminal conduct or alleged criminal conduct for which compensation is claimed. [225]

This could result in a denial of compensation if it would have been reasonable for a report to have been made. Ms Edwards told us if the victim had told a person in authority about the abuse or had suffered a psychological injury that made it difficult for them to tell anyone about it, these factors could be considered in deciding whether it was reasonable for the applicant not to report the offence.[226]

5.2.4 Compensation and civil proceedings

A Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner can refuse to make an award of compensation if satisfied the person has or had an adequate remedy in civil proceedings. They can consider any amount that was or was likely to be recovered in civil proceedings.[227] Potentially, this could place inappropriate pressure on a victim-survivor to become involved in civil litigation, even if they do not want to do so.

5.2.5 Review of decisions under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act

A decision by a Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner that compensation should not be awarded is not subject to merits review by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal. The decision cannot generally be appealed in the courts.[228]

In Victoria, a person affected by a decision of the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal, including refusing to make an award or determining the amount of assistance, may apply to the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal for review of the decision.[229] This position is to be maintained under Victoria's new Financial Assistance Scheme, which is expected to open in 2024, and will replace the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal in Victoria.[230]

In New South Wales, some decisions of the Commissioner of Victims Rights are reviewable by the New South Wales Civil and Administrative Tribunal. This includes decisions about 'recognition payments' that are made in recognition of the trauma suffered by a victim of an act of violence.[231]

5.3 Criticisms of the operation of the Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme

5.3.1 Management of claims

Some victim-survivors criticised the management of applications for compensation under the Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme. We received an anonymous submission from a victim-survivor who told us she was abused by a teacher, employed by the Department of Education, for four years between the ages of 14 and 18.

This victim-survivor queried whether applications were actively managed and called for a mechanism for complaints about how Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners deal with applications.[232] She also commented on Commissioners' lack of training and accountability.[233]

More generally, she said that questions put to her by a Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner were 'unnecessary, intrusive, inappropriate, re-traumatising, contrary to Item 1 of the Victims Support Services Charter of Rights for Victims of Crime'.[234] She told us the questions were 'not in line with the findings and recommendations of [the National Royal Commission] or the Tasmanian Government's response to those recommendations'.[235] Among other things, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner asked her 'how I as an intelligent, well-educated and accomplished person was in a relationship with [the perpetrator] for so long (if not those exact words, words to that effect)'.[236]

5.3.2 Training

Ms Edwards said budget constraints limited her ability to implement comprehensive annual training for Victims Support Services staff.[237] In April 2016, counselling staff attended Blue Knot Foundation's two-day professional development training 'Working Therapeutically with People who have Complex Trauma Histories'.[238] She had also allowed staff to attend some professional development training, although the topics covered did not appear to relate specifically to trauma-informed practice or sexual abuse of children.[239] She said there was no budget for training Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners and she was 'limited' in her ability to direct Commissioners to take part in training, 'even in response to complaints'.[240]

Secretary Webster acknowledged the need to fund training for staff and Commissioners to ensure services and decisions were appropriately trauma-informed. She said:

> … I think the work [we're] doing around the Child Safe organisations and rolling training out around trauma-informed practice and a range of other things through that will be training that will be provided to the Victim Support Service of course, but I would expect that those statutory officers, I would also make that training available to those statutory officers.[241]

5.3.3 Delays

Significant delays may occur in operating the Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme because departments and other agencies fail to provide timely access to relevant records. This problem is discussed in more detail below, in relation to access to information and records.

5.4 Our observations

It is essential that staff of the Victims Support Services receive regular professional development on how to respond, in a trauma-informed and sensitive manner, to those who seek support or compensation for child sexual abuse. In Chapter 19, we recommend the Tasmanian Government develop a whole of government approach to professional development in responding to trauma within government and government funded services that provide services to children and young people or adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse (refer to Recommendation 19.2). The Victims Support Services staff should also receive targeted professional development on child sexual abuse.

People being considered for appointment as full-time or sessional Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners should have professional development about the issues faced by victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse, before their appointment and regularly afterwards. The Tasmanian Government should fund this training. It may be useful for Victims Support Services staff and Commissioners to attend such training alongside others who regularly deal with sexual abuse matters.

We also consider there should be a right to appeal on the merits of a decision of a Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioner to the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal.

In Tasmania, while the maximum amount of compensation that can be awarded to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse may seem modest, awards of compensation also constitute important recognition of victim-survivors and their suffering. The interests of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse which are affected by an administrative decision about criminal injuries compensation seem sufficiently important to justify access to merits review by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal.[242]

While merits review should extend to decisions on the amount of compensation, to avoid disputes over small amounts, the legislation could specify the amount of an award in relation to which merits review is available. Alternatively, merits review could require the Tribunal's leave (permission) to apply for review.

Recommendation 17.6

The Department of Justice should ensure that:

a. in relation to claims for financial assistance under the Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme, delays are minimised and applications for compensation are handled in a sensitive and trauma-informed manner

b. staff in Victims Support Services receive regular professional development on the effects of child sexual abuse and how to respond to victim-survivors in a trauma-informed manner

c. people being considered for appointment as Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners are required to take part in professional development on the effects of child sexual abuse and how to respond to victim-survivors in a trauma-informed manner before their appointment and regularly thereafter.

Recommendation 17.7

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1976 to create a right of review on the merits by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal in relation to a decision of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners:

a. to refuse financial assistance to a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse

b. about the amount of financial assistance to which a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse is entitled.

6 Record keeping and access to information

To support a claim of civil liability or application for redress, victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse often need access to information held by government. This information can also be critical helping victim-survivors understand the context in which the abuse occurred and the response at the time (if any). It may also provide a sense of recognition and acknowledgment of the abuse and harm it caused. For some victim-survivors, access to this information can help to fill gaps in their personal story. This role is particularly important for victim-survivors who have been in state care. These victim-survivors often have limited personal records of their childhood and may lack a network of family and friends from that time, who can help them tell or make sense of their experiences.[243]

Individuals have a legislative right to access government information, unless an exemption applies.[244] Despite this right, in hearings, consultations and statements to our Commission of Inquiry, victim-survivors and their representatives described systemic barriers to exercising this right, including costs, poor record keeping, lengthy delays, refusals and extensive redactions, with many resorting to slow and non-binding review processes.

This evidence highlighted an administrative culture that was not pro-disclosure and which, combined with a complex legislative scheme and insufficient resourcing, limits the release of information in practice.

In this section, we consider access to government information in Tasmania and its implementation in relation to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts. First, we review record creation and record-keeping practices in Tasmania. We then focus on the operation of the legislative scheme established by the Right to Information Act and the Personal Information Protection Act.[245]

While on the surface, the legislative scheme may appear to be an administrative or bureaucratic process, in practice, victim-survivors' experiences of delays, redirections, refusals, redactions and additional costs can subject them to more trauma. One victim-survivor said:

> I felt completely stymied by the process. I felt like I was up against a wall, and I just didn't understand the implications of it. … [I]t just didn't sit well at all. I thought, I just—this is a rabbit hole I'm not gonna go down, I can't do it.[246]

Ultimately, the experience can leave victim-survivors with a sense that the interests of others are being protected at their expense. Urgent reform of the access to information scheme and its operation is needed to ensure it is as accessible, efficient, transparent and trauma-informed as possible.

6.1 Records and record keeping

For an access to information scheme to support the principles of open and transparent government, good records of government activities need to be created in the first place, and subsequently managed, retained and disposed of in a systematic way.247

6.1.1 National Royal Commission

The final report of the National Royal Commission highlighted the importance of good records and record-keeping practices, stating:

> The creation of accurate records and the exercise of good recordkeeping practices play a critical role in identifying, preventing and responding to child sexual abuse. Records are also important in alleviating the impact of child sexual abuse for survivors. Inadequate records and recordkeeping have contributed to delays in or failures to identify and respond to risks and incidents of child sexual abuse and have exacerbated distress and trauma for many survivors.[248]

The National Royal Commission recommended all institutions that engage in child-related work implement five principles for records and record keeping to a level that responds to the risk of child sexual abuse occurring within the institution.[249] The Principles state:

1. Creating and keeping full and accurate records relevant to child safety and wellbeing, including child sexual abuse, is in the best interests of children and should be an integral part of institutional leadership, governance and culture.
2. Full and accurate records should be created about all incidents, responses and decisions affecting child safety and wellbeing, including child sexual abuse.
3. Records relevant to child safety and wellbeing, including child sexual abuse, should be maintained appropriately.
4. Records relevant to child safety and wellbeing, including child sexual abuse, should only be disposed of in accordance with law or policy.
5. Individuals' existing rights to access, amend or annotate records about themselves should be recognised to the fullest extent.[250]

The National Royal Commission stated that: 'State and territory governments should require all institutions that care for or provide services to children to comply with the five principles for records and recordkeeping'.[251]

Besides the five principles, the National Royal Commission recommended minimum retention periods for records relevant to child sexual abuse.[252] Specifically, it recommended: 'institutions that engage in child-related work should retain, for at least 45 years, records relating to child sexual abuse that has occurred or is alleged to have occurred'.[253] It made further recommendations that the National Archives of Australia and state and territory public records authorities develop records disposal schedules accordingly, and provide guidance to help institutions to identify relevant records.[254]

6.1.2 Tasmanian records and record keeping

In August 2018, the Tasmanian Government started implementing the National Royal Commission's five record and record-keeping principles and has adopted measures related to retention and document maintenance.

In December 2019, the Office of the State Archivist issued a new Disposal Schedule for Records Relating to Child Abuse.[255] The new Disposal Schedule applies to all organisations (including Tasmanian Government agencies) as defined in the Archives Act 1983 ('Archives Act').[256] The Office of the State Archivist also imposed a document disposal freeze that applies until 2029 to retain 'all records that contain the best information about children, services provided to them, and employees that provide the service'.[257] It aims to prevent the destruction of documents held by institutions that provide services to children that may be relevant to claims for compensation concerning child sexual abuse and applications for redress under the National Redress Scheme.

In October 2020, the Office of the State Archivist released a new Information and Records Management Standard, which 'aligns to the Royal Commission's records and recordkeeping principles'.[258] All government organisations subject to the Archives Act must comply with these principles.[259] The Tasmanian Government further noted the Office of the State Archivist offers:

> … an Information Management Foundations training course specifically for government employees modelled on the standard, which includes relevant content about the Royal Commission, child abuse records and good recordkeeping practices. Non-government employees can attend.[260]

In its latest report on implementing the National Royal Commission recommendations, the Government indicated that work is ongoing.[261]

Evidence before our Inquiry raised two key areas of concern regarding record keeping. First, we heard evidence of poor document maintenance, which affected searchability and accessibility. Second, we heard evidence of inadequate document retention and disposal practices, leading to a loss or destruction of relevant records. Sometimes it can be difficult to know whether a record has been lost, not well maintained, or never created.

Document maintenance: searchability and accessibility

During our Commission of Inquiry, we heard evidence of records kept across multiple systems in various locations in a mix of digital and hard copy formats, which impedes identifying and accessing relevant documents. For example, in response to Commission notice to produce concerning incident reports from Ashley Youth Detention Centre, we were informed that a manual document review would be required to identify relevant documents, suggesting the incident reporting system was not easily searchable.[262] During our Inquiry, the problems of record keeping at Ashley Youth Detention Centre became more apparent (refer to Chapter 12). Mr Strange described knowmore's experience of communicating with the former Department of Communities in relation to right to information requests. He said knowmore was aware of records and information (both physical and electronic) existing across multiple bodies and areas, sometimes at up to five or six different locations.[263]

The Department of Communities confirmed difficulties in retrieving records about out of home care and youth justice. Michael Pervan, former Secretary, Department of Communities, reported that in response to the initiation of our Commission of Inquiry: 'The biggest initial issue was the retrieval of documentation in the Department's possession or control, given the physical nature and location [of] files throughout the State and the breadth of the Out of Home Care model over time'.[264] Secretary Pervan gave examples of 'records [which] have not been consistently catalogued and boxes [that] are often labelled incorrectly', noting 'many high-priority hard and soft copy files within the Children, Youth and Families Division require remediation, such as through comprehensive cataloguing of handwritten content'.[265]

Other departments described similar challenges. For example, Kathrine Morgan-Wicks, Secretary, Department of Health, described at least 10 different record-keeping systems that contained documents of potential relevance to child sexual abuse.[266] Secretary Morgan-Wicks acknowledged that: 'the standard of record keeping across the Department of Health requires significant improvement to achieve statewide consistency'.[267] Similarly, Timothy Bullard, Secretary, Department for Education, Children and Young People described the mixed approach to record keeping in schools, stating:

> There was no central system to collect student information until 2014, when [the Student Support System] was introduced. Before 2014, schools used a mixture of practices, with some using a paper-based method of recording files and notes, and some using a system built by a teacher within the respective school.[268]

Recognising the need to improve searchability and accessibility of records, several departments reported establishing remediation projects. For example, the former Department of Communities had started a project to digitise approximately 110,000 hard copy files concerning out of home care and youth justice (refer to Chapter 11, Case study 7, and Chapter 12).[269] The Department of Health stated that improvement of the standard of record keeping 'is a key priority within Health's Digital Strategy and Record Audit', noting the commencement of 'an Information Remediation Project for the roll out of the Content Management system across the Department'.[270]

The Department for Education, Children and Young People has been taking part in discussions with the Department of Health about the Department of Health's complaints management system project.[271] If the Department of Health system meets its needs, the Department for Education, Children and Young People may move across to that system in the future.[272] The Department for Education, Children and Young People's Strategic Systems Development team has been asked to reserve time in 2023 to deliver an alternative solution should the Department of Health's complaints management system be deemed not fit for purpose.[273]

According to the Tasmanian Government, the Case Management Platform 'will deliver a streamlined approach to the way information is recorded, accessed, managed and interpreted'.[274]

Document retention and disposal

In evidence, we heard examples of victim-survivors frustrated by the apparent loss or destruction of documents they believed did or should exist. Victim-survivor, Rachel (a pseudonym), spoke of her mother receiving a letter in response to a request for information that essentially stated: 'the [Teachers Registration Board] have no record of any investigation in 2007'.[275] In evidence, Rachel expressed her distress at this response, stating:

> That was hard to read because I was like, "What the heck? What do you mean there was no investigation? I have a statement that I signed in 2008 from the [Teachers Registration Board]". I just don't get it. I just don't understand.[276]

When the Tasmanian Government responded to this evidence, it suggested the letter may not have come from the Teachers Registration Board, which does hold documents relating to Rachel's complaint, but from the Department of Education. It is possible that Rachel was mistaken regarding the source of the letter to her mother, but it is troubling that she received no help to get this information.[277]

Rachel's experience was shared by representatives of other victim-survivors. For example, Ms Sdrinis noted instances of clients insisting they had made a complaint to the police of which the police had no record.[278] She further stated: 'it is not uncommon in Department of Education matters for clients to instruct me that they made a complaint to a teacher or even the Principal and no record has been kept'.[279]

We are informed that the Department for Education, Children and Young People is reviewing and improving its complaints management system, and has a new policy for handling complaints that should help to address these problems.[280]

6.1.3 Our observations

It is critical that remediation of historical records is prioritised and adequately resourced across Tasmanian Government institutions, extending to non-government institutions that are funded to provide government services. It is also critical that searchable and accessible document management systems are introduced and maintained in line with the National Royal Commission's records and record-keeping principles.

We discuss the preservation of Ashley Youth Detention Centre and out of home care records in more detail in Chapter 12. We recommend in that chapter that the Department for Education, Children and Young People work with the Office of the State Archivist to establish an approach to preserve historical records relevant to children and young people and staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and in state care. We consider preserving these records a matter of priority.

We welcome the Tasmanian Government's response to the National Royal Commission's recommendations concerning document maintenance and retention. To ensure successful implementation of the recommendations, it is critical that staff within relevant government and government funded institutions engage in ongoing training about their record and record-keeping obligations, and that regular compliance audits are conducted. We consider the Office of the State Archivist may be best placed to provide the necessary ongoing training and to regularly measure and assess the quality of record-keeping capability and practice across institutions. We welcome their Information Management Foundations training course.

6.2 Access to information

Multiple people may be seeking information in relation to an institution's response to child sexual abuse, including, for example, victim-survivors seeking 'personal information' or journalists seeking information about an institution's response to child sexual abuse.

Tasmania, like most Australian jurisdictions, has separate pieces of legislation regulating access to information and protecting personal information.[281] An individual's right to access, amend or annotate personal information is generally contained as a principle in privacy or personal information protection legislation. This is compared to the broader right of access to government information in right to information legislation (sometimes referred to as 'freedom of information' legislation). Access to information the Tasmanian Government holds is regulated by a legislative scheme established by the Right to Information Act and the Personal Information Protection Act.

Government information is provided to the public through a range of channels such as:

- annual reporting obligations
- selective publication of policies, procedures and other reports
- in response to requests such as letters from the public.[282]

If information is not disclosed through these channels, as a 'last resort', individuals can apply under the Right to Information Act for an 'assessed disclosure', otherwise called a right to information application.[283] Individuals have a right to the information requested, unless an exemption applies.[284] There are 18 types of exempt information, including information disclosing personal information of a person other than the person making the application, information affecting national or state security, defence or international relations, information relating to enforcement of the law, legally privileged information and other information that is contrary to the public interest to disclose.[285] A person can apply to the Ombudsman for a review of an agency's decision about a right to information request.[286]

The Personal Information Protection Act regulates the 'collection, maintenance, use, correction and disclosure of personal information relating to individuals'.[287] It contains 10 Personal Information Protection Principles, including Principle 6, which regulates access to and correction of personal information.[288] It states that if a 'personal information custodian' holds personal information about an individual, the custodian 'may' provide that individual with access to their personal information upon receipt of a written request.[289]

On its face, the legislative scheme appears to set clear parameters for releasing or protecting Tasmanian Government information through established processes in line with fixed timeframes. However, in practice, victim-survivors and their representatives described a frustratingly slow, complex, and obstructive system. Their experiences align with evidence the National Royal Commission reported about the operation of freedom of information and privacy legislation across Australia: 'we have been told by many survivors and their advocates and by records holders that many people still find navigating the current systems complex, costly, adversarial and traumatising'.[290]

As outlined above, the National Royal Commission sought to address these difficulties by implementing records and record-keeping principles. Specifically, Principle 5 requires: 'Individuals' existing rights to access, amend or annotate records about themselves should be recognised to the fullest extent'.[291] Detailing what is required in practice under Principle 5, the National Royal Commission stated:

> Individuals whose childhoods are documented in institutional records should have a right to access records made about them. Full access should be given unless contrary to law. Specific, not generic, explanations should be provided in any case where a record, or part of a record, is withheld or redacted.

> Individuals should be made aware of, and assisted to assert, their existing rights to request that records containing their personal information be amended or annotated, and to seek review or appeal of decisions refusing access, amendment or annotation.[292]

According to the Tasmanian Government, the new Information and Records Management Standard introduced in 2020 aligns with the National Royal Commission's records and record-keeping principles.[293] However, evidence before us suggests, in practice, individuals' rights to access information are still not being 'recognised to the fullest extent'.[294]

The concerns expressed to us about the operation of the access to information scheme in Tasmania fall within the following themes:

- an administrative culture that limits the release of government information
- legislative and procedural complexity, particularly where the Right to Information Act and the Personal Information Protection Act overlap, hampering access to personal information
- lengthy delays in responding to applications
- inadequate and unenforceable review processes when the release of information is delayed, refused or extensively redacted
- under-resourced and decentralised assessment processes contributing to delays and inconsistent outcomes
- inconsistent approaches to fees and waivers for right to information requests.

Ultimately, these issues cause significant distress and frustration for victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse, who can be retraumatised by the process. Consequently, urgent reform of the legislative scheme, together with additional resources and improved implementation in practice, is required.

6.2.1 Administrative culture

Evidence to our Commission of Inquiry indicates that when responding to requests for information related to child sexual abuse, public authorities frequently adopt an approach that is not 'pro-disclosure'. The following example outlines the Department of Health's reluctance to provide access to information it held about James Griffin.

Review of a journalist's request for information about James Griffin

Journalist Camille Bianchi requested information from the Department of Health in relation to paediatric nurse James Griffin on 1 April 2020.[295] The Department of Health had not released its decision to Ms Bianchi by 29 June 2020. At this point, the Ombudsman accepted her request for external review because the Department's failure to respond to the request in this time constituted a refusal to provide the requested information.[296] The Department indicated to the Ombudsman that the delay was because of the diversion of resources to the COVID-19 pandemic response.[297]

On 22 July 2020, the Department released its decision to Ms Bianchi, identifying 104 pages of relevant information.[298] However, it refused to release any of these pages, claiming exemptions under four separate sections of the Right to Information Act.[299]

Following a comprehensive review, released on 4 November 2021, the Ombudsman concluded that all claimed exemptions were not made out or should be varied.[300] Ultimately, the Ombudsman directed the release of 74 pages, subject to the redaction of some personal information.[301] Of the remaining 30 pages, 10 were already publicly available and 20 pages were out of scope of the original request.[302]

In his decision, the Ombudsman stated that: 'Public servants have a public role and duties, which brings with it the potential to be publicly identified. Service to the public is not intended to be shrouded in secrecy…'.[303] He noted: 'There is a fine line between protecting public servants from distressingly intense scrutiny and limiting their accountability to the people of Tasmania which comes from transparency of administrative action'.[304]

The Ombudsman expressed concern about the weight the Department of Health placed on the interests of its staff, without sufficient consideration of the interests of the victims of Mr Griffin's alleged offending, or the public interest in holding the Government and its administration to account. He stated:

> While the Department's consideration of the interests of its staff and Mr Griffin's associates is understandable, I am concerned that it does not appear to have considered the interests of the victims of Mr Griffin's alleged offending while he was in its employ and the concerns of [Launceston General Hospital] patients and the general public about the adequacy of management of concerns by the Department as highly. … I consider that the public interest in protecting the interests of alleged sexual abusers of children is lower than that of the victims of such abuse. In contrast, the Department does not once mention or appear to consider the victims of Mr Griffin's alleged offending or the valid community concern and desire for accountability from the Department, given that abuse is alleged to have occurred against vulnerable child patients receiving care in a public hospital over an extended period. [305]

The Ombudsman also identified several relevant documents that had been omitted from the Department of Health's response. In his decision, he commented:

> The failure to produce this information or properly respond to my office's requests for an explanation as to why the information is not in the possession of the Department is inexplicable and disappointing. I am concerned with the sufficiency of the search conducted by the Department for all information responsive to Ms Bianchi's request due to failure to properly respond to requests regarding these documents.[306]

Despite the Ombudsman's direction to the Department to release 74 pages of documents (as detailed above), the Department did not immediately do so.[307] Following media reports in December 2021 about the Ombudsman's decision, the Department finally released the documents to Ms Bianchi, approximately 22 months after her original request was submitted.[308]

This administrative culture towards non-disclosure is reflected in concerns expressed in the Ombudsman Tasmania's Annual Report 2021–22. Richard Connock, Ombudsman Tasmania, found that 95 per cent of the external reviews of right to information requests conducted in 2021–22 'identified issues with the manner in which the public authority had responded to a request for assessed disclosure…'.[309] While some progress has been made compared to previous years, the Ombudsman stated:

> The express object of the [Right to Information] Act is clear in relation to its pro-disclosure focus, seeking to increase government accountability and acknowledging that the public has a right to the information held by public authorities who are acting on behalf of the people of Tasmania. Too often, sadly, adherence to this object is not evident in practice and a closed, and at times obstructive, approach is taken when responding to requests for assessed disclosure which come before my office.[310]

For completeness, we note the Right to Information Act and the Ombudsman's comments apply to 'public authorities', which includes bodies such as councils and statutory authorities, not only government departments and agencies.

In 2020, the Ombudsman reported that, for the year 2018–19, the rate at which Tasmanian public authorities refused access to any information in response to Right to Information requests was 7.5 times the rate of Australia's most open jurisdictions (Victoria and the Northern Territory).[311]

Legal representatives of victim-survivors expressed concerns about the reluctance of Tasmanian public authorities to release information. For example, Ms Sdrinis stated:

> It has been my experience that the Department of Education has a general reluctance to provide information responsive to [right to information] requests in a timely way. The Department appears to me to take a broad view of the various exemptions that it can apply. … I have found the provision of documents in Tasmania to be generally less forthcoming than in other jurisdictions.[312]

Ms Sdrinis stated she was not satisfied the records the Department of Education provide in response to requests 'contain everything they could or should give us, and they appear to be heavily redacted'.[313] Similarly, Mr Strange of knowmore described the Tasmanian Government's response to requests for records as 'often less than desirable'.[314] He highlighted frequent delays and extensive redactions in released material as being 'particularly pronounced in Tasmania'.[315]

A comparative analysis of the public use of information access rights across Australia for the period 2020–21 indicated Tasmania had:

- the second-lowest number of formal applications per capita at 2.6 applications per 1,000 population (the lowest was the Commonwealth at 1.4 applications per 1,000 population), compared to Western Australia with the highest number of applications per capita of 7.6 per 1,000 population. This may reflect a view that it is not worth making an application which has a limited chance of succeeding
- the lowest percentage of all decisions made on formal applications nationally where access was granted in full or in part (75 per cent), compared to the next lowest percentages from Queensland (82 per cent) and the Commonwealth (82 per cent)
- the highest percentage of decisions where access was refused in full (25 per cent), compared to the next highest percentages from Queensland (18 per cent) and the Commonwealth (18 per cent)
- the second-lowest percentage of decisions made within the statutory timeframe (73 per cent) above South Australia (67 per cent), based on the data available (noting that no data is available from Queensland in relation to this metric) and compared to the next lowest percentage from the Commonwealth (77 per cent)
- the highest percentage of applications reviewed by the Information Commissioner or Ombudsman (6.1 per cent) compared to the next lowest percentages from the Northern Territory (3.9 per cent) and Queensland (3.7 per cent).[316]

Broadly, similar percentage differences between state approaches to the release of information appear in 2017–18 and 2018–19.

This analysis reflects the published statistics regarding access to information nationally. However, the Ombudsman informed us of a recently identified difference in how Tasmania records this data compared to other states and territories. Tasmania's figures include applications that are withdrawn or transferred and where the release of information is deferred in full. We understand such applications are not included in the published statistics of other jurisdictions. The Ombudsman told us this difference is 'somewhat distorting the accuracy' of these statistics. The Ombudsman said 'efforts are being made to correct this misalignment as soon as possible', and once it is corrected, 'it is expected that Tasmania will no longer be an outlier in these statistics'.[317]

Some of these differences may be attributed to differing legislative schemes. For example, the Right to Information Act does not include an explicit principle in favour of the release of information. Instead, it includes a statement that: 'It is the intention of Parliament … that discretions conferred by this Act be exercised so as to facilitate and promote, promptly and at the lowest reasonable cost, the provision of the maximum amount of official information'.[318] In comparison, the freedom of information schemes in New South Wales, Queensland and the Australian Capital Territory all include an explicit 'pro-disclosure bias' or overarching principle in favour of disclosure to guide assessment decisions.[319] The lack of an explicit statement to this effect may contribute to a tendency to restrict access rather than release information, although building a pro-release culture is also important.

Another difference in access to information schemes across Australia is the approach to exemptions subject to an assessment of whether release of that information would be contrary to the 'public interest'. For example, in Victoria, the 'public interest test' is embedded in the exemptions themselves, which specify the public interest considerations relevant to each exemption.[320] In contrast, public interest considerations in the Tasmanian Right to Information Act are contained separately in a lengthy Schedule to the Act.[321] Differences in legislative approaches between states and territories make it difficult to determine how this affects the decision not to release documents.[322] However, some exemptions may contribute to a decision refusing the release of information, particularly in the absence of a pro-release culture.

Ultimately, the impact of these legislative differences on decision making in practice is unclear. However, considering the comparative metrics summarised above, combined with the Ombudsman's comments and evidence before us about individuals' experiences seeking access to information, we are concerned the administrative culture may, at times, frustrate the intended pro-disclosure intent of the Right to Information scheme in Tasmania and limit the release of government information.[323]

6.2.2 Protection of personal information

The process to request access to personal information relies on a connection between the right to information and personal information protection schemes, as is the case in most Australian jurisdictions. The Personal Information Protection Act establishes a process for an individual to make a written request to the organisation holding their personal information.[324] If the request is refused or there is no response within 20 working days, the individual may submit a second written request. This second request is to be assessed as if it were a right to information application under the Right to Information Act.[325]

On its face, the initial written request process under the Personal Information Protection Act provides a more informal, cost-free channel to access personal information. However, in practice, victim-survivors of child sexual abuse have experienced additional delays because this process defaulted to a two-step process when their initial request was refused or they received no response. Consequently, their second request was treated as a formal right to information application. In consultation, the Ombudsman stated he had encouraged people to use the Right to Information Act process rather than the Personal Information Protection Act process.[326]

The reasons for the refusal or lack of response to the first written request under the Personal Information Protection Act may be because of the nature of the discretion granted to the 'personal information custodian'. The Personal Information Protection Act provides that the personal information custodian 'may' provide access to the personal information.[327] In contrast, other jurisdictions state the holder of the information 'must' provide access, subject to exemptions.[328]

Another reason for refusal or delay under both the Personal Information Protection Act and Right to Information Act is the approach to protection of personal information concerning another person. Under the Right to Information Act, information is exempt if it would involve disclosing personal information of a person other than the applicant.[329] Other jurisdictions include similar exemptions.[330] Some jurisdictions include a 'reasonableness' test in the assessment. For example, in Victoria, information is exempt if 'providing access would have an unreasonable impact on the privacy of other individuals'.[331]

Under the Right to Information Act, if disclosing the information about another person is likely to be of concern to that person, the public authority must seek that person's views on whether the information should be released.[332] If, following this process, the public authority decides to release the information, they must notify the other person and they can apply for a review of that decision.[333] Set timeframes regulate providing notices and applications for review, which must elapse before the information can be released.[334]

In child sexual abuse matters, information requested by a victim-survivor or their representative frequently includes other people's personal information. For example, records of investigations are likely to include statements by other witnesses or the alleged perpetrator. In such cases, the public authority must seek the other person's views before making a final determination on whether to release the information.

In evidence, legal representatives of victim-survivors highlighted their experiences of extensive delays and redactions associated with requests to access information that captures information about other people. For example, Mr Strange noted documents the Tasmanian Government provided were often heavily redacted, particularly when the information related to third parties.[335] He commented the Tasmanian Government used the third party provisions 'in a very black and white way to make those redactions'.[336]

At our hearings, Sam Leishman described his attempts to access information from the Department of Education and the way it made him feel.[337]

Case example: Barriers to accessing personal information

Sam Leishman is a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse perpetrated by teacher Darrel Harington, which occurred when Mr Leishman was a school student. We discuss Mr Leishman's experience in detail in Chapter 5. Here, we focus on his experience of seeking information from the then Department of Education.

In 2015, Mr Harington was convicted of offences against Mr Leishman and sentenced to gaol. Following the conviction, Mr Leishman requested information related to the offending from the Department of Education. The Department told Mr Leishman to make a formal right to information application. In response to the application, Mr Leishman recalls being told that because most of the information concerned Mr Harington, Mr Harington's permission would be needed to release it.[338] At that point, Mr Leishman described feeling 'completely stymied by the process' and unwilling to go down a 'rabbit hole' of asking permission from the man who had committed offences against him.[339]

At our hearings, Mr Leishman described the Department's lack of support or action throughout the process, which ultimately spanned a period of two years. He said:

> … I was given no answers to anything. I felt that … I was just going to be made to jump through hoops and things were just going to be made more and more difficult for me. … I thought, what is it, what is it? There must be something that they do have to tell me and they don't want to tell me: I don't know.[340]

The process set out in the Right to Information Act requires the public authority to seek the views of the other party before releasing information concerning them, which occurred in this case. Secretary Bullard recognised that: 'Mr Leishman felt uncomfortable with that, and who wouldn't?'[341] He stated the perpetrator refused release of the information, 'but in the public interest the decision maker agreed that some of the information should proceed'.[342] He concluded that: 'to me, [for] a third party like Mr Leishman sitting there thinking he has a right to know [it] looks like a lack of accountability and transparency, albeit it is operating within a legislative framework, whether or not that be right or fit for purpose for these kinds of situations'.[343] While some information was ultimately released, Mr Leishman concluded: 'I still don't feel that everything's been laid on the table'.[344]

It is clearly necessary to balance the competing right of access to information with other parties' right to privacy, while ensuring a procedurally fair process. However, in practice, this process can be traumatic for victim-survivors. Victim-survivors may feel a perpetrator has control over what information they can access, or government employees are protecting their own or their colleagues' personal interests over the interests of victim-survivors. The additional steps required can also lead to significant delays.

6.2.3 Lengthy delays

The Right to Information Act and Personal Information Protection Act set timeframes for responses to requests for information. Under the Right to Information Act, the applicant must be notified of a decision on a right to information application as soon as practicable, and no later than 20 working days after the application has been accepted.[345] This timeframe can be extended for a further 20 working days if the information request includes personal information about another person or relates to the business affairs of another party who should be consulted before releasing information.[346] The timeframe can also be extended by agreement with the applicant or by the Ombudsman.[347] Under the Personal Information Protection Act, if a request to access personal information is refused or no response is received within 20 days, the applicant can make a further written request, which is treated as a right to information application, as outlined previously.[348]

Despite these statutory timeframes, we heard evidence of responses to requests for information being delayed and subject to multiple extensions. For example, Ms Sdrinis noted that the right to information process had deteriorated since 2018. She commented:

> Initially, unlike the Department of Human Services and Corrections, the Department of Education dealt with [Right to Information] requests relatively promptly. More recently time lines have blown out … to about 12 months and I anticipate that the time lines will blow out further as we are regularly receiving requests for extensions of time…[349]

Similarly, Mr Strange commented while delays were an issue nationwide, they are 'particularly pronounced in Tasmania. Record requests in Tasmania have taken as long as two years, and generally can take up to 18 months'.[350] Ms Sdrinis agreed the situation was worse in Tasmania compared to other states.[351]

We also heard examples of extreme delays for some individuals seeking access to records. For example, the submission from Care Leavers Australasia Network ('CLAN') noted one CLAN member waited four years to receive his state ward records from the Tasmanian Government, with many of the records redacted and labelled out of scope.[352]

Rachel provided information relating to repeated delays and requests for extensions from the Teachers Registration Board in response to her right to information application.[353] Rachel submitted a right to information application to the Teachers Registration Board in October 2021. Over the next 12 months, Rachel repeatedly contacted the Board seeking a response.

When questioned about Rachel's experience, Ann Moxham, Registrar, Teachers Registration Board, pointed to a lack of staffing (exacerbated by the absence of a key staff member on extended leave) impeding the Board's capacity to process requests in a timely way.[354]

Ms Bianchi's right to information request in relation to Mr Griffin, outlined previously, was also subject to significant delays. Emily Baker, a journalist, also indicated Ms Bianchi's experience was consistent with her experience of submitting right to information applications, stating: 'Oh, it's completely consistent. It seems, frankly, a waste of time, and it doesn't mean we don't still file them, we do, but it is absolutely an issue of last resort—you're gearing up for a fight'.[355] She described being 'fobbed around, rebuffed, it goes away'.[356] However, Ms Baker noted she thought this approach was changing.[357]

The systemic nature of individuals' experiences of delays is confirmed by the comparative analysis of access to information schemes across Australia for the period 2020–21, noted above. It found more than a quarter of decisions on requests for information in Tasmania did not meet the statutory timeframe.[358] Of the jurisdictions surveyed, only South Australia had a lower rate of response to requests completed on time.[359]

Ombudsman Tasmania's Annual Report 2021–22 also expresses concern regarding delays in Tasmanian Government responses to access to information applications, particularly by the Department of Health and the former Department of Communities. Between them, right to information applications to these departments accounted for 26 per cent of all external review requests in 2021–22.[360] The Ombudsman stated:

> While I acknowledge that both departments have advised of a significant increase in the volume of assessed disclosure applications, there are improvements that could be achieved by both departments in relation to issuing of decisions within the statutory timeframe, improving communication with applicants regarding delays and ensuring decisions are of high quality. Such improvements might reduce the volume of external review requests relating to these departments.[361]

6.2.4 Under-resourced and mixed assessment processes

Currently, requests for information (either for personal information under the Personal Information Protection Act or right to information applications under the Right to Information Act) are sent to and processed by the public authority holding the relevant information. Representatives of Tasmanian Government departments and agencies described different processes and levels of resourcing dedicated to managing these requests.[362]

Generally, the relevant business unit within the department manages requests for personal information under the Personal Information Protection Act. There is no centralised register recording requests and responses. In contrast, right to information applications are managed by designated staff within each department, such as the legal services area or Office of the Secretary, and centralised departmental records are maintained. For example, in the Department of Education, seven legally trained staff were responsible for assessing right to information requests (in addition to other responsibilities).[363] Several senior executives in the Department (separate to the legal services area), have delegated responsibility to conduct internal reviews. In the words of Secretary Bullard, he remains at 'arms-length' from the process.[364] In contrast, the Office of the Secretary in the Department of Justice manages responses to right to information applications.[365] Similarly, the Legal Services Unit in the Office of the Secretary of the Department of Health manages right to information applications.[366]

Departmental secretaries and other Tasmanian Government Heads of Agencies reported increases in the number of right to information requests over recent years.[367] For most, the increase had an adverse impact on their capacity to respond within the statutory timeframes. For example, the average number of days taken by the Department of Health to respond to a right to information application had increased significantly: from 23 days in 2019–20 to 59 days in 2021–22.[368] Similarly, the Department of Education confirmed the increase in right to information applications relating to historical sexual abuse has 'impacted the substantive response timeframes and the Department's ability to consistently meet the statutory timeframe of 20 business days'.[369] Commenting on the Teachers Registration Board's delayed response to Rachel's right to information application outlined above, Ms Moxham stated:

> … we find it extremely difficult to meet the timelines that are in the Act because we have such a small workforce … with the huge volume of historical matters that have now descended upon us that makes it even more problematic to sort out those sorts of issues for our office.[370]

In contrast, Secretary Webster gave evidence that while the number of right to information applications from 'plaintiff law firms' had increased in recent years, the average number of days to respond to an application from either a 'plaintiff law firm' or relating to a person's correctional records potentially relating to child sexual abuse had decreased from 21 days in 2018–19 to 13 days in 2020–21.[371]

In addition to delays, victim-survivors and their representatives expressed concerns about inconsistent approaches and inadequate search practices, potentially resulting in information not being identified or incorrectly assessed. As noted above, Ms Sdrinis was not satisfied that responses to right to information applications provided all relevant documents. She said it was sometimes possible to compare documents provided through the right to information process with records provided at a later date through discovery processes.[372]

Similarly, in the Ombudsman's review of Ms Bianchi's right to information application, he identified several relevant documents that had been omitted from the Department of Health's response.

The evidence before us suggests that, for most government departments and agencies our Commission of Inquiry examined, current resourcing levels and procedures to process right to information applications are not adequate to meet statutory timeframes, particularly in the face of increasing demand. Nor do they ensure full disclosure of all relevant documents as required by the legislative scheme.

6.2.5 Fees and waivers

In Tasmania, the fee for a right to information application under the Right to Information Act is currently $44.50.[373] There is no fee for requests for personal information under the Personal Information Protection Act. For information concerning child sexual abuse, some Tasmanian Government authorities exercise their discretion to waive the fee under the Right to Information Act. To do so requires the applicant to seek a waiver on one of the grounds set out in the Act, which include if the applicant is 'impecunious' (that is, does not have any or much money) or if it is sought for 'a purpose of general public interest or benefit'.[374] Requests concerning child sexual abuse may fall into one of these categories. The approach to fees is similar to that in other jurisdictions.[375]

Neither the Right to Information Act nor the Ombudsman's guidelines on fee waivers specifically refer to matters concerning child sexual abuse. Further, the decision to waive fees is discretionary.[376] Consequently, the approach of government authorities and agencies to fee waivers for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse varies. For example, the Department of Education's practice was to waive the fee for applicants who identify they are seeking records relating to child sexual abuse. The fee is waived based on public interest.[377] In contrast, representatives of victim-survivors spoke of the cost burden of these fees. They noted civil litigation may result in multiple requests from government authorities for revised right to information applications, which incur a fee each time.[378] Imposing a fee, even if it can be waived, can be an added barrier to victim-survivors seeking compensation and redress, which can reinforce their sense of being obstructed and not supported. If fee waivers are not granted in these situations, they should be.

6.2.6 Limited review and enforcement mechanisms

We heard about two issues of concern regarding the external review process for right to information requests. First, the process is lengthy because of the:

- level of scrutiny required
- resources involved in processing external review applications
- high number of applications for external review.

Delays in reviews add to the delay in an applicant receiving the information they request, or having a final decision about their right to the information. The Ombudsman's Annual Report 2021–22 highlighted the backlog of external review applications they have been trying to clear since 2019.[379] The report noted:

> Unfortunately, though modest inroads have been achieved, due to a range of issues (most particularly high staff turnover, unexpected leave and major difficulty in recruiting, but also a high number of new external review requests requiring formal decisions), this has not occurred and the backlog remains.[380]

To address the backlog, Ombudsman Tasmania has dedicated additional resources and sought to recruit new staff to manage the external review process.[381] The Ombudsman has also updated its priority policy and approved a greater number of external review applications for expedited processing.[382] Prioritised requests include government responses to child sexual abuse in institutional settings.[383] As a consequence of focusing on the backlog, the Ombudsman could not offer formal training to public authorities in 2021–22.[384] Suspending training concerns us because regular training is likely to increase and maintain the skills and capabilities of staff managing right to information applications. In turn, this will reduce the need for victim-survivors to make applications for external review.

Despite these efforts, it appears the backlog is worsening. In February 2023, it was reported in the media that the backlog of active external right to information review requests had increased from 101 at 30 June 2022 to 129 at 7 February 2023.[385] It was also reported that some applicants for external review had been waiting for more than three years for the external review process to begin.[386] The Ombudsman has cited staffing and recruitment issues and a high number of external review requests as the reason for the continuing backlog.[387]

The second issue of concern regarding the external right to information review process is that the Ombudsman's decision is not enforceable.[388] While the Ombudsman is empowered to give directions (for example, to release documents), the public authority is not obliged to comply with these directions. The examples concerning Rachel and Ms Bianchi's right to information applications show a level of noncompliance, or at least delayed compliance, by the relevant public authorities in response to the Ombudsman's directions.

In a consultation, the Ombudsman proposed the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal be given a right of review.[389] An order of the Tribunal would be enforceable. Other jurisdictions such as Victoria and New South Wales provide for review by a tribunal.[390]

The extensive delays associated with external reviews and the lack of enforceability of the Ombudsman's directions may contribute to public authorities' poor compliance with their obligations under the Personal Information Protection Act and Right to Information Act. Poor accountability and enforcement mechanisms may limit the incentive for public authorities to comply with their obligations.

6.2.7 Impact of the access to information scheme on victim-survivors

A persistent theme in statements, submissions and hearings was the significant adverse impact of the access to information scheme and its implementation on victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse. As highlighted in the examples discussed previously, victim-survivors described feeling obstructed, not prioritised and, ultimately, retraumatised by a process that often required them to repeatedly tell their story and justify why they should be given access to records concerning their experiences of abuse.

Representatives of victim-survivors confirmed the traumatic impact of the process. Mr Strange commented that extensive redactions 'can be re-traumatising for a victim-survivor. … they can leave the victim in the dark about parts of their own history and abuse'.[391] He stated: 'the applicant's trauma is exacerbated by such decisions (about redaction) being made by the same institution perceived as responsible for the victim-survivor's child abuse'.[392] Referring to victim-survivors taken into state care as children, Mr Strange stated that:

> … to have significant redactions that take out, for instance, the name of those family members, it is viewed as perpetuating the abuse that happened to them as children and the negative experiences of being placed in an institution; they see that as re-traumatising, that it took them so long to try and reconnect with their family and here is the government or the state trying to keep information from them about their family again….[393]

Mr Strange also confirmed that delays can be retraumatising for victim-survivors who 'have difficulty in progressing their options for justice due to inability to access records made about them in a timely way'.[394] Ultimately, according to Ms Sdrinis, these delays can cause her clients to lose motivation to pursue their claims.[395] Representatives of victim-survivors called for the Government to adopt trauma-informed practices in responding to right to information applications, supported by training for all decision makers.[396]

In evidence, several departmental secretaries acknowledged they needed to adopt a trauma-informed response when dealing with matters involving child sexual abuse. Responding to questions about the Department of Health's investigation of allegations of child sexual abuse at Launceston General Hospital, Secretary Morgan-Wicks stated: 'It is apparent that trauma-informed practice is not embedded practice and may be a new way of working for many Departmental Officials. This must be a priority moving forward so that any communication and interactions with victim-survivors is applied to "do no harm"'.[397] Several departments have started providing training in trauma-informed practice to their staff, particularly in their legal services teams.[398]

6.2.8 Our observations

The concerns outlined above, and the traumatic impact on victim-survivors, confirm the current framework for providing victim-survivors with access to information does not meet the principle the National Royal Commission recommended that: 'Individuals' existing rights to access, amend or annotate records about themselves should be recognised to the fullest extent'.[399] Cultural, legislative, procedural and resourcing barriers have combined to impede individuals' ability to exercise their rights to access information in a meaningful and supportive way.

On 24 May 2022, Premier Rockliff committed to a number of actions to keep children safer, including:

> Improve the Right to Information process, including providing training across the State Service to ensure more consistent responses.[400]

The Premier's commitment is an important acknowledgement of the need for reform. However, the extent of progress towards that reform is unclear, with progress indicated to be 'underway', a discussion paper circulated, and an expected delivery date of July 2024.[401]

It is imperative the Government progress reforms urgently to overcome the current delays and lack of clarity that impedes victim-survivors' access to information in the current system. We recommend the Tasmanian Government review and reform the access to information scheme in Tasmania, with a particular focus on child sexual abuse in institutional contexts. Reforms should focus on the legislative scheme established by the Right to Information Act and Personal Information Protection Act. Reforms should also focus on their implementation in practice, to ensure it is as accessible, efficient, transparent and trauma informed as possible. In particular, the review should consider:

- including an explicit presumption in favour of disclosure in the Right to Information Act and Personal Information Protection Act
- embedding the public interest test in specific exemptions in the Right to Information Act, tailored to those exemptions
- streamlining the interface between the Right to Information Act and Personal Information Protection Act to overcome what has become a two-step process by default to request personal information
- requiring that a personal information custodian under the Personal Information Protection Act 'must provide' rather than 'may provide' personal information upon request from the individual who is the subject of that information (subject to exemptions)
- including a 'reasonableness' test in the Right to Information Act as part of the assessment of whether to withhold personal information relating to a person or third party other than the person making the request for information, which would allow for competing factors to be weighed when assessing whether to disclose information, including on review
- strengthening and streamlining internal and external review processes in the Right to Information Act and Personal Information Protection Act, with a focus on options to enforce decisions of the Ombudsman and review by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal

- providing an automatic fee waiver for Right to Information Act right to information applications which relate to child sexual abuse.

We recognise legislative reform can take time. To address the impact of the current access to information scheme on victim-survivors in the short term, the Tasmanian Government should allocate additional resources to:

- Tasmanian Government departments and agencies to enable them to process requests for information under the Right to Information Act and Personal Information Protection Act within statutory timeframes
- Ombudsman Tasmania to speed up external reviews of right to information decisions.

We also understand the Tasmanian Government has investigated the roll out of trauma-informed training across the State Service. It has partnered with Lifeline Tasmania through the Tasmanian Training Consortium to pilot trauma-informed training sessions for leaders. Feedback from these pilot sessions has informed the development of courses on trauma, trauma-informed practice and trauma-informed organisations for:

- State Service employees
- those involved in State Service Code of Conduct investigations
- State Service leaders.[402]

We recommend, in Chapter 19, the Government develops a whole of government approach to professional development in responding to trauma within government and government funded services that provide services to children and young people, and statutory bodies who have contact which child sexual abuse survivors.

We also recommend the Government considers centralising how they access information requests within a specialist unit or department. The evidence above shows varying levels of expertise, resourcing, responsiveness and resourcing across government departments and agencies. In our view, centralising the management of access to information processes would:

- promote a culture committed to transparency with a presumption in favour of disclosure
- prioritise requests for information as its core business, rather than as part of a larger role competing with other demands and resourcing
- minimise potential conflicts of interest which may arise within units which operate in the same department or agency which is subject to the access to information application
- ensure deeper understanding and consistent application of legislative obligations, particularly in the application of exemptions

- develop deeper expertise in Tasmanian Government record-keeping systems and obligations helping to identify relevant records
- promote trauma-informed practice through dedicated staff training specific to access to information applications
- enable more transparent monitoring of and reporting on the access to information scheme, with a centralised source of data.

To implement centralised management of access to information processes, departments and other government agencies should establish access to information liaison officers with adequate resourcing to ensure timely and comprehensive responses to requests for information.

Recommendation 17.8

1. The Tasmanian Government should review and reform the operation of the Right to Information Act 2009 and the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 to ensure victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts can obtain information relating to that abuse. This review should focus on what needs to change to ensure:
    a. people's rights to obtain information are observed in practice
    b. this access is as simple, efficient, transparent and trauma-informed as possible.
2. The review should consider reforms to the Right to Information Act 2009 and the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 to:
    a. include an explicit presumption in favour of disclosure in the Right to Information Act 2009 and Personal Information Protection Act 2004
    b. embed the public interest test in specific exemptions in the Right to Information Act 2009, tailored to those exemptions
    c. streamline the interface between the Right to Information Act 2009 and Personal Information Protection Act 2004 to overcome what has, by default, become a two-step process to obtain personal information
    d. require that a personal information custodian under the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 'must provide' rather than 'may provide' personal information upon request from an individual who is the subject of that information, subject to any appropriate exemptions to that requirement
    e. include a 'reasonableness' test in the Right to Information Act 2009 as part of the assessment of whether to withhold personal information relating to a person or third party other than the person making the request for information

f. strengthen and streamline internal and external review processes in the Right to Information Act 2009 and Personal Information Protection Act 2004, with a focus on options to enforce decisions of the Ombudsman and to apply for review by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal

g. provide an automatic fee waiver for right to information applications relating to child sexual abuse made under the Right to Information Act 2009 by victim-survivors or a person acting on their behalf.

3. The Tasmanian Government should consider centralising management of access to information processes in a specialist unit or department, supported by access to information liaison officers located in government departments and agencies.

4. The Tasmanian Government should provide funding to government departments, agencies and the Ombudsman, as the case may be, to:

   a. ensure access to information requests are processed within statutory timeframes

   b. speed up external review of right to information decisions

   c. provide trauma-informed training to the Tasmanian State Service in relation to victim-survivor access to information (Recommendation 19.2).

7 Conclusion

This chapter has examined the National Redress Scheme, civil litigation, the provision of apologies to victim-survivors and supports (including financial assistance) available to victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse who are also victims of crime. It has also explored access to information and records. While many of the National Royal Commission's recommendations relating to these areas have been adopted in Tasmania, there is still a need for further reform to improve the operation of mechanisms that seek to support and compensate victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse. It is essential that victim-survivors can:

- access redress or make civil claims
- access ongoing support
- where appropriate, have avenues available to receive a direct personal apology
- be given information and records that may provide much-needed clarification about the circumstances of their abuse and, potentially, support a National Redress Scheme or civil litigation claim.

These are the goals of the recommendations throughout this chapter.

100 Limitation Act 1974 s 5B, which provides that no limitation period applies to an action for damages for personal injury or death of a person arising from or related to the sexual abuse, or serious physical abuse, of the person when the person was a minor. Under section 5C of the Limitation Act 1974, the Court can set aside a previous settlement of such an action. This is likely to be relevant to claims settled by institutions.

112 ZAB v ZWM [2021] TASSC 64. This case did not concern institutional sexual abuse but the abuse of a boy by his father when he was aged between 10 and 15. Nevertheless, the principles involved in the calculation of the award could also be relevant in assessing damages for institutional sexual abuse and in negotiating settlements for such abuse. The son was professionally qualified and a significant proportion of his loss related to how his earning capacity had been reduced by the effect of the abuse.

184 In November 2021, following the release of the Independent Inquiry into the Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse Report, Timothy Bullard, Secretary, Department of Education, made a public apology that included the following: 'As an organisation we are deeply sorry for the historical abuse that happened in our schools and apologise unreservedly to the victims and survivors'. Refer to Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 893 [43]–894 [6]. Ginna Webster, Secretary, Department of Justice, apologised to victim-survivors in her statement to our Commission of Inquiry. Refer to Statement of Ginna Webster, 10 June 2022, 1 [3]. Kathrine Morgan-Wicks, Secretary, Department of Health, also apologised to victim-survivors. Refer to Transcript of Kathrine Morgan-Wicks, 5 July 2022, 2375 [33]–2378 [4]. Mr Michael Pervan, the then Secretary of the Department of Communities, repeated the words of the Premier that 'We are so terribly sorry that we failed those people, our system failed those people'. He also apologised to Azra Beach, who had given evidence, and to other witnesses who had given evidence to our Inquiry about what had happened to them. Refer to Transcript of Michael Pervan, 17 June 2022, 1589 [23–44].

190 Civil Liability Act 2002 s 7(1). An 'apology' is defined as 'an expression of sympathy or regret, or of a general sense of benevolence or compassion, in connection with any matter, which does not contain an admission of fault in connection with the matter': s 7(3).

191 Civil Liability Act 2002 ss 3B(1)(a), 6A.

192 For example, Ms Munting emailed the Premier on 15 December 2022 to point out that, following the Tasmanian Parliament's apology to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions, no settlement was reached in her case, which had been set down for trial in March 2023, as a result of which she would have to submit to cross-examination again. She said she considered the apologies made by the secretaries of the Tasmanian Government departments and the Premier were empty words.

193 Statement of Ginna Webster, 10 June 2022, 47 [305].

194 The Civil Liability Act 2002 defines 'child abuse' for the purposes of section 49H (the 'duty of care' provision) and section 49J (vicarious liability claims) as '(a) sexual abuse, or physical abuse, of the child; and (b) any psychological abuse of the child that arises from the sexual abuse or physical abuse'. Thus, the provision is not confined to child sexual abuse.

195 Some aspects of support for victims of crime are also discussed in relation to criminal justice responses in Chapter 16.

196 Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1976 s 6A. These figures relate to 'primary victims', that is, those who are directly harmed. The cap of $30,918 applies up to 30 June 2023 and is now indexed to the Consumer Price Index. Refer to Victims of Crime Assistance Regulations 2010 reg 4. There is also provision for family members and others to obtain compensation if the primary victim has died.

281 The Northern Territory combines the management of freedom of information, privacy and records in the Information Act 2002 (NT). South Australia and Western Australia do not have separate privacy legislation. South Australia relies on a Premier and Cabinet Circular: Department of Premier and Cabinet, PC012 Information Privacy Principles (IPPS) Instructions (Government of South Australia, May 2020). An afterword

In this volume—Volume 8—we consider how the Tasmanian Government can better coordinate and strengthen its approach to addressing child sexual abuse. The recommendations we make in the chapters of this volume are relevant to all the institutions we consider in detail across our report, as well as institutions that we did not consider in detail. There are six chapters in this volume, as well as appendices to our report.

In Chapter 18—Overseeing child safe organisations, we consider the community-wide child sexual abuse prevention strategies recommended by the National Royal Commission. We also consider the Tasmanian Government's investment in ensuring that staff and volunteers who work within child-facing organisations have a good baseline knowledge of child sexual abuse and how to respond to it. We recommend a new Commission for Children and Young People. The new Commission would subsume the functions of the current Commissioner for Children and Young People, which include advocating for, and promoting the wellbeing of, all children in Tasmania. The new Commission would also be responsible for:

- educating relevant organisations on the Child and Youth Safe Standards
- overseeing and enforcing compliance with those standards
- administering, overseeing and monitoring the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

We make recommendations to support the independence of the Commissioner for Children and Young People. We recommend the Ombudsman, the Integrity Commission, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the new Commission for Children and Young People clarify and formalise their respective functions and information-sharing arrangements and ensure these are clear to the community.

In Chapter 19—A coordinated approach, we describe what is required to ensure there is a united approach to child safety issues across the Tasmanian Government. We recommend the development of a child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan to bring together an extensive reform agenda, hold government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies to account for their responsibilities in implementing child sexual abuse reforms, and provide information to victim-survivors and their families, the community and government and non-government agencies about what is being done to address child sexual abuse in Tasmania. We recommend this strategy and action plan is overseen by a strong governance structure led by the Department of Premier and Cabinet and ensure children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse take part. We also recommend improving whole of government information sharing, coordination and response.

In Chapter 20—State Service disciplinary processes, we consider the disciplinary processes that apply when an employee of a government institution is the subject of an allegation of child sexual abuse or related conduct. We outline many problems with the State Service's disciplinary framework in responding to allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct, including in relation to the State Service Code of Conduct and employment directions. We propose reforms relating to the application and implementation of the Code itself, and to the employment directions related to suspensions, breaches of the Code of Conduct and inability to perform duties. Fundamentally, we are calling for a shift in the focus of this disciplinary framework to allow for the safety of children to be prioritised. It will take significant commitment and culture change to achieve this outcome. We invite unions to support these reforms.

In Chapter 21—Therapeutic services, we review the support services available to children, young people and adults who have experienced child sexual abuse in an institutional setting. We also consider the support needs of children and young people who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours and require an additional level of specialised intervention to address those behaviours. We recommend the Tasmanian Government:

- provides leadership, and funds the development of a therapeutic service system with optimal maximum waiting periods
- ensures that funding agreements with non-government specialist services have appropriate governance requirements, sexual abuse service standards, service evaluation and child safe accreditation built into them. They should require that services meet the needs of all victim-survivors and children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours, irrespective of their gender, background, culture or identity
- establishes and funds a peak body for the sexual assault service system, distinct from and working collaboratively with the family violence peak body
- develops a statewide framework and plan for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. This framework should ensure the Government provides ongoing and increased funding for specialist therapeutic interventions for abusive and violent harmful sexual behaviours.

In Chapter 22—Monitoring reforms, we note the Tasmanian Government has committed to implementing our recommendations and propose that the Government establishes an implementation monitor to ensure the recommendations of our Commission of Inquiry result in:

- sustained systemic improvements towards preventing child sexual abuse in institutions
- improved institutional responses to such abuse
- victim-survivors receiving the supports they need.

In a final chapter of this volume and of our report, Chapter 23—Afterword, we outline challenges we have faced due to the legislation that applied to our Commission of Inquiry. We make suggestions to address these challenges for the benefit of future commissions of inquiry.

18 Overseeing child safe organisations

1 Introduction

Across our report, we have focused on prevention and responses to child sexual abuse in government institutions, particularly within government schools and health services, the out of home care system, and youth detention. We also have considered the systems that respond to abuse, including the criminal and civil law justice systems and psychological and support services. We make a range of recommendations specific to those institutions and systems. This chapter focuses on the oversight of a child safe system across Tasmania more broadly.

Every member of the Tasmanian community has a role to play in keeping children safe. Whether in their role as staff member, volunteer, parent or carer, trusted family friend or bystander—we consider it is critical that everyone has at least a basic understanding of child sexual abuse, including the factors that increase its likelihood and the signs that it may have occurred.

This foundational understanding must counteract common myths and misconceptions about sexual abuse, the credibility of children, and the nature of perpetrators. It must equip everyone in the community with the skills to respond to disclosures of abuse—including awareness of who to report to and how to offer a supportive response.

The National Royal Commission directed most of its community-wide prevention recommendations to the Australian Government. However, we consider the Tasmanian Government has a role to make sure national prevention investment benefits and is accessible to Tasmania, and to ensure it also invests in addressing the specific community educational needs of Tasmanians. We consider community-wide education will give staff and volunteers who enter child-facing organisations a good baseline of knowledge that can then be further built upon.

We welcome the Tasmanian Government's Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework, which will see Tasmania implement recommendations from the National Royal Commission to legislate Child Safe Standards (called Child and Youth Safe Standards in Tasmania) and a Reportable Conduct Scheme overseen by an Independent Regulator. These complementary regulatory schemes are designed to ensure organisations that engage with children have embedded the essential requirements to maximise child safety, including:

- robust policies and practices
- appropriate training and professional development
- clear strategies to reduce risks of abuse
- effective and transparent processes for escalating and addressing child safety concerns.

We consider the effective implementation of these schemes to be the most important strategy to prevent abuse within organisations and to improve responses to complaints, when made.

We broadly endorse the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 ('Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act'). However, we recommend the functions of the Independent Regulator sit with a new Commission for Children and Young People in Tasmania, with expanded functions to oversee and monitor child safety (particularly within the out of home care and youth justice systems). We consider the Commissioner for Children and Young People should be the Independent Regulator.

While we consider a new Commission for Children and Young People should be the primary body to oversee the management of child safety concerns in organisational settings, we recognise there may be situations where other oversight bodies—including the Ombudsman, Integrity Commission and Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme—will have a shared interest or responsibility for addressing risks to children in organisations. Recognising that each body has a role in receiving information and/or investigating complaints relating to misconduct or unlawful behaviour of individuals working within public bodies, we recommend clarifying roles and responsibilities between these bodies. We also recommend formalising information-sharing arrangements under a memorandum of understanding and, where necessary, legislative change.

2 Community-wide prevention strategies

Improving community awareness and understanding of child sexual abuse is a fundamental requirement to protect children from harm. Institutions exist within the community and comprise individuals who may bring their own attitudes and understanding of child safety issues which, individually or taken together, can determine how an institution responds to risks of child sexual abuse.

Professor Ben Mathews, Research Professor, Queensland University of Technology leads the Australian Child Maltreatment Study, and told us community awareness of child sexual abuse was an important element of strengthening 'the protective social fabric' of our society.[1] He added: 'In the long-term, this [awareness] would be of more value than anything else. Whilst it is not an easy solution, this is the foundation of everything else'.[2]

Despite the significant awareness the National Royal Commission raised and the recent development of the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse (described further in Section 2.1), it is clear there is much to be done to increase and improve community understanding of child sexual abuse. The Australian Childhood Foundation, together with Monash University, has conducted periodic studies tracking community attitudes relating to child sexual abuse since 2003 across Australia. Its most recent study in 2021 found little progress in the state of awareness and appreciation of the nature and gravity of child abuse amongst participants. The study described awareness of such matters being 'virtually identical' to earlier studies. The 2021 study showed that:

- Just over one in three respondents did not believe child abuse was a problem they needed to be personally concerned about.
- 32 per cent of respondents believed children make up stories of abuse.
- Seven out of 10 respondents could not remember seeing or hearing anything about child abuse in the media in the preceding 12 months.
- One in five respondents were 'not at all' confident on what to do if they suspected a child was being abused or neglected.[3]

The report noted:

> The community lacks all of the building blocks required to prevent child abuse and adequately act to protect them from abuse and neglect. They are not aware of the true scale and impact of child abuse. They do not believe it is as widespread as it really is. They have a shallow definition of how it is defined, what its components are, how it develops … They lack confidence about when, what and why they should take action when exposed to information that children are being abused and neglected … These attitudes have been there for at least eighteen years and they have not changed.[4]

These findings, while shocking, did not surprise us. They reflect many of the views and attitudes that became apparent across different institutional settings through our Inquiry. We discuss some of these further in relation to community attitudes in Tasmania in Section 2.2.

The National Royal Commission made several recommendations relating to community-wide prevention, which were directed at the Australian Government. These included developing a national strategy to prevent child sexual abuse that encompassed a range of initiatives, including:

- social marketing campaigns targeting community awareness to increase knowledge of child sexual abuse—including challenging problematic attitudes that reflect myths and misconceptions
- prevention programs in preschools and schools and other community settings for children and young people, noting that such education can be linked with the existing Australian curriculums, such as respectful relationships and sexuality education
- online safety education for children, parents and other community members, supported by the Office of the eSafety Commissioner
- increased prevention education on child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours for tertiary students entering child-related occupations
- help-seeking services targeting individuals who feel they may be at risk of sexually abusing children
- information on pathways to seek help if child sexual abuse is disclosed or suspected.[5]

The National Royal Commission recommended the Australian Government ensures prevention initiatives:

- align with relevant strategies relating to child maltreatment
- be appropriately tailored and targeted to reach different communities

- involve and engage children and young people in their design and development
- be based on best practice evidence of what works to prevent child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours.[6]

2.1 National reforms relating to prevention

Since the National Royal Commission, the Australian Government has undertaken initiatives relevant to community-wide prevention of child sexual abuse, including:

- establishing the National Office for Child Safety on 1 July 2018, tasked with leading and implementing recommendations from the National Royal Commission, including the development of a national strategy[7]
- releasing the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030 ('National Strategy') on 27 October 2021, supported by $307.5 million in implementation funding[8]
- delivering the initial five-year funding for establishing the National Centre for the Prevention of Child Sexual Abuse (ultimately named the National Centre for Action on Child Sexual Abuse ('National Centre')), which is a joint venture between Blue Knot Foundation, The Healing Foundation and the Australian Childhood Foundation, announced in October 2021.[9]

This National Centre is designed to 'commission critical research, evaluate interventions and therapeutic programs, raise community awareness, reduce stigma and provide training'.[10] In June 2023, the National Centre released Here for Change: Five Year Strategy 2023–2027, which is intended to transform the way child sexual abuse is understood and responded to in Australia.[11]

2.1.1 National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse

The National Strategy is an initiative of the Australian and state and territory governments. It is divided into four categories:

- National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse
- First National Action Plan
- Commitments
- Evaluation Reporting.[12]

The First National Action Plan and First Commonwealth Action Plan cover the period 2021–24, with subsequent three-year action plans scheduled for 2025–27 and 2028–30.[13] The former Premier, the Honourable Peter Gutwein MP, was a signatory to the National Strategy, alongside the then Prime Minister and other state and territory leaders.

The National Strategy seeks to set up a nationally coordinated and consistent way to prevent and respond to child sexual abuse, including within families, by other people, in organisations and online.[14] It is based on a public health approach. The prevention measures include:

- primary (aimed at the whole community and addressing the underlying causes)
- secondary (addressing the early warning signs that change the result for those at risk of being victims or perpetrators)
- tertiary (aimed at responding to child sexual abuse and preventing it from happening again)
- quaternary (evaluating the effectiveness of tertiary interventions).[15]

The First National Action Plan (which reflects the current priorities) has five themes. Most relevantly, preventing child sexual abuse is Theme 1, which covers 'Awareness-raising, education and building child safe cultures'. Under this theme, there are six measures that the National Office for Child Safety leads. These measures are:

- implementing and promoting the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (described in Section 3.2.1)
- setting up ongoing national reporting for non-government organisations to report against their progress on creating and maintaining child safe cultures
- enhancing national information-sharing arrangements relating to child safety and wellbeing
- supporting educational resources to ensure children and young people learn about wellbeing, relationships and safety (including online safety)
- working with the National Centre for Action on Child Sexual Abuse on education and the skills and capabilities of the workforces to respond to child sexual abuse
- delivering a national awareness raising campaign on child sexual abuse.[16]

2.2 Community awareness and attitudes in Tasmania

Through our Commission of Inquiry, we saw how a lack of awareness and understanding of child sexual abuse contributed to poor prevention and responses to it within government service systems and organisations. The most common problems we saw across all the different organisational contexts included a limited appreciation for the many and varied strategies perpetrators rely on to identify, groom and coerce their victims. We also saw how such strategies can sometimes enthral victims of abuse and make children and adolescents compliant and loyal towards the person who is abusing them, rather than fearful and avoidant.

Kathryn Fordyce, Chief Executive Officer of sexual assault service Laurel House, highlighted grooming as a particular area requiring further education in Tasmania, noting there are 'considerable misconceptions' around it that make 'victim-blaming attitudes' all too common:[17]

> We need to educate people to identify the components of grooming and act on red flags and boundary breaches … this can be achieved by educating the community about what grooming looks like, providing examples and educating people to identify these components.[18]

We also observed simplistic understandings of 'consent'—including a tendency to conflate concepts of consent with compliance and an absence of physical resistance from a victim. We sometimes observed a lack of appreciation of the many ways in which 'consent' is usually irrelevant in the context of child sexual abuse and the significant power disparity that often arises where adults are in a position of trust and authority over a young person.[19] For example, in our commissioned research on children's experiences of safety within Tasmanian organisations, two high school focus group participants argued that if a young person consented to a sexual relationship with a teacher it 'might be OK', which generated much debate within the focus group more broadly.[20]

The July 2022 report commissioned by the Sexual Assault Support Service, Sexual Violence in Southern Tasmania: Research Report for Sexual Assault Support Service Tasmania, considered 'the scale of sexual violence, its nature, barriers to seeking help, and potential solutions' in Tasmania.[21] This also included some discussion of sexual abuse of children and young people.

This report highlighted a common narrow and simplistic understanding of consent and sexual abuse in the community, with the researchers noting:

> Discussion of consent was rarely framed by stakeholders or community participants as positive, affirming, and enthusiastic agreement; instead, participants defined sexual violence in terms of the absence of consent.[22]

This report also highlighted how abusive relationships can sometimes be normalised, with one participant in the study reporting:

> It's not frowned upon for a 15- or 16-year-old to date someone in his mid-20s and be impregnated by him. … I mean, two of my siblings, are the children of what I would deem paedophilia. My father was 27, and that woman 14, for one of my brothers, and he was 29 and the girl 15 for my sister. I have siblings literally born of paedophilia. Yeah, and it was completely normalised. Their families didn't care. They never thought it was weird. I didn't realise it was weird until I grew up … it is horrific, and it is everywhere.[23]

The most troubling area in which we saw confusion regarding consent was for children in out of home care who were being sexually exploited by adults outside the service system, to which they were sometimes seen—including by Child Safety Services and Tasmania Police—as consenting, which is discussed in Chapter 9.

We also discuss how the language of consent in criminal justice proceedings relating to child sexual abuse contributes to distress and confusion for participants and the broader public in Chapter 16.

Across several institutional settings, we observed a limited understanding of what constitutes harmful sexual behaviours, the harm it causes victims and the most appropriate way to manage the risks associated with a young person using such behaviours. We discuss these in more detail in Volumes 3, 4, and 5 (relating to children in schools, out of home care and youth detention).

We also observed a tendency to doubt and downplay the complaints of children, with particular scepticism reserved for complaints made by young people who are considered to be 'bad' or 'troubled' (for example, in complaints handling in the context of Ashley Youth Detention Centre, discussed in Chapter 11). There often exists a corresponding predisposition to sympathise and believe the accounts of adults. This trust in adults contributed to misguided blame and responsibility, with an undue scrutiny and focus on the actions and behaviours of a victim-survivor rather than the conduct of their alleged abuser (refer for example to 'Katrina's experience' in Chapter 5 or Case study 2 relating to Dr Tim (a pseudonym) in Chapter 14).[24] It also included an undue concern for reputational and other impacts on a person accused of abuse or misconduct and inadequate care and consideration extended to the suffering and support needs of a victim-survivor (refer to Chapter 20 on State Service disciplinary processes).

We also saw failures to recognise that child sexual abuse is often perpetrated by everyday people working in positions of trust within the community. Dr Michael Guerzoni, Indigenous Fellow, University of Tasmania with expertise in criminology, described a common lack of sophistication in community understanding (in Tasmania and more broadly): '[P]erpetrators of child sexual abuse are [commonly] understood as sexual deviants and "bad apples", and may be readily distinguished from other, "normal" people'. Dr Guerzoni told us this was a problem because:

> [W]hen there is a fixed understanding as to what an offender is, that will colour all of the interpretations of institutional policy and procedure towards child sexual abuse and, in turn, it may lead to non-compliance with what is written down in the policies and procedures.[25]

Victim-survivor, Robert Boost, told us of the importance of not making assumptions about who is likely (or unlikely) to perpetrate abuse, noting the inherent power difference between adults and children:

> Society needs to see every adult as being 'capable' of abusing children because of their relative positions of power towards children. This is made even more acute when an adult is in a position of power relative to other adults … We as a society need to recognise that real danger in order to protect our children, even if it means some adults' lives will be made more difficult. We need to stop worrying about hurting adults, and look at the damage that is being done to children.[26]

We discuss 'situational' perpetrators of abuse (and related prevention strategies) in Section 3.1.

The Sexual Violence in Southern Tasmania: Research Report for Sexual Assault Support Service Tasmania report commissioned by the Sexual Assault Support Service also highlighted how sexual violence (and the attitudes that enable it) could be amplified in isolated and close-knit communities.[27] As Mr Boost reminded us: 'In a close-knit place like Tasmania, relationships often influence outcomes'.[28]

Michael Salter, Scientia Associate Professor of Criminology, School of Social Sciences, University of New South Wales, told us that rather than acting as a barrier to prevention of child abuse, Tasmania's relatively small population and close-knit features could be a 'resource that should be capitalised on'.[29] Dr Salter cited bystander intervention programs (where members of an institution or community receive training on how to detect the signs of abuse and intervene effectively) and community mobilisation programs (which build community-wide connections to services and agencies to respond to social problems) as examples of prevention strategies that are well-suited to discrete communities.[30]

2.2.1 Tasmanian prevention initiatives

While we recognise National Royal Commission recommendations relating to primary prevention were directed largely at the Australian Government, we agree with the National Children's Commissioner, Anne Hollonds, who noted the National Strategy (as well as the implementation of the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations, discussed in Section 3.2.1) are 'important steps and will require the commitment of all federal, state and territory governments to be fully implemented'.[31]

In line with our terms of reference, our key recommendations for preventing child sexual abuse in Tasmania include implementing:

- a mandatory child sexual abuse prevention curriculum from early learning programs to year 12 students, drawing on expert evidence of best practice (refer to Recommendation 6.1 in Chapter 6)
- legislated Child and Youth Safe Standards for Tasmanian organisations engaging with children, overseen by an Independent Regulator (which has been implemented through the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act and is discussed in Section 4.3).

However, we also consider it is important for the Tasmanian community to receive the full benefit of any national community education and awareness initiatives by ensuring they are fit-for-purpose and suited to the needs of Tasmanians.

We also consider it may be necessary for the Tasmanian Government to complement national initiatives by developing specific local content for Tasmanians. We understand the Department for Education, Children and Young People is working on a 'tell someone' website and accompanying public campaign, although we have limited information on this initiative.[32]

Dr Charlie Burton, Manager Policy, Tasmanian Council of Social Services, emphasised the importance of a public health approach to address child sexual abuse:

> This means looking beyond practices in particular institutions or organisations and taking a whole-of-community lens, with action along the continuum from universal prevention, early intervention and targeted tertiary responses, as well as trauma informed support for recovery.[33]

Dr Burton recommended the Tasmanian Government work to translate national initiatives (such as those connected to the National Centre for Action on Child Sexual Abuse) to the Tasmanian context, guided by victim-survivors and Tasmanian organisations with expertise in sexual assault.[34] Dr Burton also felt the Tasmanian Government had a clear role in funding general prevention programs itself:

> In particular, it needs to drive change to address a societal culture that minimises or dismisses behaviours that escalate to child sexual abuse. It needs to invest in understanding the evidence of what works in prevention and early intervention and follow that up with resources and action.[35]

Ms Fordyce, whose organisation Laurel House currently designs and delivers a range of prevention programs in schools, workplaces and the broader community, told us her service could expand prevention initiatives with increased funding, rather than being 'predominantly reactive service':[36]

> We could focus additional efforts towards preventing the occurrence of child sexual abuse by educating people working in and interacting with institutions where there are high incidences of abuse. We would like to be more visible in schools and the community so we can supplement formal training opportunities with incidental conversations with people who work with children to help them understand the critical role they play in preventing, identifying, responding to and reporting sexual abuse, and other forms of violence.[37]

Jillian Maxwell, Chief Executive Officer, Sexual Assault Support Service, which also delivers primary prevention programs, described some of the challenges for Tasmanian organisations to get funding for particular initiatives (for example, under the National Strategy). Ms Maxwell recognised the importance of being accountable for funding but described how 'red tape' associated with Commonwealth funding management was onerous.[38] Ms Maxwell said such problems did not exist for state-based funding, which often benefited from closer relationships with ministers, advisors and grant managers that made managing such funding more straightforward as you 'get a chance to talk them through the issues'.[39]

We consider it is important the Tasmanian Government ensures Tasmanians receive the full benefit of national prevention initiatives, by advocating to federal counterparts on the specific needs of Tasmanians to ensure such measures translate to tangible and meaningful change. We also consider the Tasmanian Government may need to invest in its own targeted community awareness initiatives to complement national strategies, where practical, using and drawing upon Commonwealth-funded materials and resources. Such programs should be developed to meet the Tasmanian context.

Recommendation 18.1

The Tasmanian Government should continue to advocate for Tasmania to receive the full benefit of Australian Government prevention strategies, including under the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030.

3 Creating child safe organisations

Across our Commission of Inquiry, we have heard how some of the most trusted organisations have not been safe places for children. Many times, child sexual abuse could have been prevented or identified earlier if the organisation in question had taken a more proactive, targeted approach to identifying and addressing risks of abuse. This includes having an organisational culture vigilant to potential harms to children and that encourages and empowers anyone with child safety concerns to report them, with confidence that such reports will be taken seriously.

Earlier in this chapter, we discussed prevention initiatives designed to educate the entire Tasmanian community. However, we consider organisations that engage directly with children have additional responsibilities to prevent and address risks of abuse.

In this section, we discuss some of the evidence we received about how organisations can (and should) adopt 'situational prevention' strategies to reduce risks of child sexual abuse. Such strategies make organisations less vulnerable to motivated perpetrators who may actively seek environments in which they can abuse children. However, such strategies can also reduce the likelihood of abuse or harm from 'situational' perpetrators who may—under unsafe and permissive conditions—engage in inappropriate conduct with children.

The value of situational prevention is reflected in the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations. In Tasmania, these are reflected in the Child and Youth Safe Standards legislated through the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act. As discussed in Section 4, this legislation requires child-facing and other in-scope organisations to take active steps to prevent harms to children through robust policies, practices and a child-centred culture. We support this legislative reform and consider its successful implementation a key pillar to prevent abuse within Tasmanian organisations.

Tasmania's proposed Reportable Conduct Scheme, which complements the Child and Youth Safe Standards, will strengthen independent oversight for the response of an organisation to complaints or concerns, improving the mitigation of risk to children and young people. We expect organisations to examine the circumstances that contribute to reportable conduct they investigate, and work to further strengthen and refine their child-safe practices over time. In this sense, a reportable conduct scheme is a mechanism to ensure appropriate responses to reports of harm to children. It also offers a clear opportunity for organisations to learn, improve and prevent similar occurrences into the future.

3.1 Situational prevention of abuse within organisations

We sought evidence from relevant experts on how organisations can reduce the likelihood of child sexual abuse occurring. This included considering the features of organisations that were more, or less, likely to enable abuse to occur.

Dr Guerzoni defined situational crime prevention as 'a theory of criminology that argues that crime occurs due to the interconnection of individual and environmental factors; it is not solely a matter of premeditated desires of this offender'.[40] He noted the benefit of adopting a situational crime prevention model is that 'it moves consideration away from endless debates about abuse causation … to emphasis on what can be done by organisations to prevent abuse based on empirical criminological research'.[41]

As foreshadowed, not all perpetrators of child sexual abuse have a pre-existing motivation to offend. Professor Donald Palmer, Graduate School of Management, University of California has expertise in organisational misconduct (including child sexual abuse) and told us some individuals only develop the motivation to offend against children after they have joined an organisation, describing them as 'situational offenders'.[42] Professor Palmer told us that situational offending can occur due to 'individual psychological factors' but also noted that 'organisational structures and processes also can influence the likelihood that organisational participants will become situational child sexual abusers'.[43]

Professor Palmer noted situational offenders will abuse when they think children will be vulnerable to their advances and they are unlikely to be detected and punished. He stated:

> For this reason, most situational prevention measures focus on creating conditions under which potential offenders believe that their advances will be rejected (for example, child sexual abuse training of children and youth) and believe that if successful, their advances will be detected (for example, prohibition of one-on-one staff/child interactions) and addressed (for example, staff training).[44]

Because some offenders are situational, Dr Guerzoni highlighted flaws with organisations adopting a 'bad apples' mentality, which has the organisation looking out for characteristics assumed to align with motivated sex offenders. Instead, it is more effective to consider the factors that are more likely to give rise to abuse. Dr Guerzoni gave some examples of the factors that may be relevant for organisations to consider:

> [E]nvironments where few other persons are present, rooms without surveillance, professions which enable isolated interactions with minors or remote locations. Such situational factors tend to manifest in the circumstances of the profession. For example, helping the child change after sport, a consultation with a child in one's office, staying behind after class, or driving a child home. These isolated environments are known to both create opportunity for offending, as well as precipitate thoughts of offending amongst perpetrators.[45]

The Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse undertaken by Professors Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack discussed how the physical environment of schools could heighten risks of abuse to students.[46] We discuss this in greater detail in Volume 3.

Professor Mathews described the challenge of responding to grooming and boundary violations. He noted that, properly construed, grooming is an intentional act of cultivating a relationship to enable child sexual abuse. However, he noted:

> A boundary violation could take place without an intention to sexually abuse the child in any proximate time. It may for example be an isolated mistake that could be the subject of positive intervention, such as an inappropriate comment in a text message or email. These types of instances involving adults should be easily remedied through proper education, policies and codes of conduct.[47]

Professor Palmer described how the dynamics of an organisation can shape and influence a person's attitudes and behaviour, noting that '[a] person's behaviour is subject to much more control within an organisation, when compared to other settings'.[48] He said that organisations should invest in ensuring their policies, practices and culture prioritise child safety, rather than relying only on the goodwill and capabilities of the individuals within it.

Dr Guerzoni described the best approach as a partnership between the individual and the institution:

> In that partnership, organisations must be willing to be aware and active in their monitoring of child safety matters. This should extend to ensuring staff are supported to make complaints (including that they are given time to make such complaints), staff are required or encouraged to undertake relevant professional development, and that matters of child safety are framed as a present (as opposed to historical) risk that is to remain consistently on the agenda.
> Simultaneously, individuals must be willing to monitor the environment and their colleagues for risks or signs of grooming and victimisation. This includes being open to, and aware of, the fact that if that individual is not careful, they may put themselves in a position where they may be more susceptible to criminal decision making. Individuals must also be willing and open to raising complaints or concerns.[49]

Dr Guerzoni described how organisations can strengthen their policies by:

- recognising a criminal record check is not enough to determine the potential risk a person may pose to children
- considering child safety in interview and recruitment processes
- challenging myths (that sexual offending against children is only perpetrated by paedophiles) and helping staff to understand the situational factors that may contribute to abuse
- introducing requirements that minimise isolated interaction with children and try to mitigate situational risk factors.[50]

Robert Ryan, Executive Lead, Strategy and External Engagement, Life Without Barriers, described that organisation's whole of organisation approach to child safety in its We Put Children First child sexual abuse prevention strategy:

> The strategy is based on a situational prevention approach, which recognises that the risk of child sexual abuse can be reduced by making environmental and cultural changes within an organisation, rather than only focusing on the risk presented by particular individuals. To reduce the risk of child sexual abuse, organisations need to create conditions where offending is difficult, the risk of detection is high, environmental cues that can trigger offending are removed and permissibility is reduced.[51]

While Professor Palmer agreed these factors are important, he explained organisations are often looking for a 'free lunch' when attempting to become safer for children and young people.[52] Policies go some way but are not a 'comprehensive solution' for the following reasons, stating: 'They don't address culture, they don't address power, they don't address informal groups, they don't address socialisation'.[53]

Professor Palmer said there is much work to be undertaken by an organisation to 'truly embed child safe practices in an organisation'.[54] Professor Palmer described the first step for an organisation is to outline its mission and goals and assess the extent to which they conflict with child safety objectives 'and then deal with that conflict in an honest fashion'.[55] Professor Palmer gave an example of this tension in schools, where a balance needs to be struck between the benefit of fostering close student/teacher relationships that improve a child's learning and development, and the risk that such dynamics can be open to abuse by teachers.[56] Dr Guerzoni agreed on the importance of striking the right balance in managing risks to children as '[s]trict approaches to child safety may cause adults to not pursue proper or nurturing relationships with young people … for fear of not doing the right thing'.[57]

Associate Professor Tim Moore, Deputy Director, Institute of Child Protection Studies, Australian Catholic University, also cautioned against such situational prevention strategies having 'unintended consequences' by making adults reluctant to engage with children due to fears of how such behaviour would be perceived—for example, workers in residential care units being wary of hugging children in their care.[58] A disproportionate emphasis on the risks adults can pose could also erode children and young people's trust in those engaging with them.[59] Associate Professor Moore told us of the importance of ensuring children and young people have the benefit of healthy connections with adults, using the example of the out of home care system:

> Again, if you look at some of the lives of some of these children and young people who have been potentially sexually abused or physically harmed in their family environments, we put them through a system that discourages children and young people to have their intimacy needs met. When I'm talking about intimacy I'm not talking about sexual intimacy necessarily, I'm talking about to feel loved and cared for, to be hugged, you know, to feel like someone's demonstrating their care and love for you in this physical kind of way. Kids are often denied that within the system and therefore don't know what's okay and what's not okay and how to express themselves.[60]

We agree it is important that organisations are careful when assessing risks but must ensure their risk mitigation is proportionate and appropriate to their specific context and operating environment. It is also important that staff and volunteers are clear on appropriate standards of behaviour towards the children and young people they engage with. This is to limit the potential for inadvertent boundary breaches that may arise from a lack of experience or clarity on appropriate professional boundaries within the context of a particular organisation. Children and young people can benefit greatly from the services and care offered by organisations they interact with. The overwhelming majority of adults who provide services to children do so with their best interests at the forefront of their minds.

Striking the appropriate balance is entirely consistent with implementing Child and Youth Safe Standards, which encourage organisations to design and embed child safe practices suited to the services and care they provide. We discuss this in the next section.

3.2 Child Safe Standards

A note on language

Child Safe Standards is a term used by the National Royal Commission and adopted by certain jurisdictions. We use 'Child Safe Standards' where we specifically refer to the National Royal Commission or jurisdictions, such as Victoria, that use that term.

We use the term 'Child and Youth Safe Standards' when we refer to Tasmania's implementation of these Standards, as this is the term adopted in the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act. When we use this term, we intend for it to also encompass the Universal Principle, which is an additional Tasmanian requirement for organisations to protect Aboriginal cultural safety. Where Tasmanian witnesses have used 'Child Safe Standards' we have not altered the language.

Child Safe Standards reflect a set of principles and requirements that, taken together, articulate what constitutes a child safe organisation.[61] The National Royal Commission developed ten Child Safe Standards and described them as interrelated, overlapping and of equal importance, noting they should be 'dynamic and responsive' rather than 'static and definitive'.[62] The National Royal Commission noted:

> The standards are designed to be principle-based and focused on outcomes and changing institutional culture as opposed to setting prescriptive rules that must be followed or specific initiatives that must be implemented. This is to enable the standards to be applied to, and implemented by, institutions in a flexible way, informed by each institution's nature and characteristics. The risk of child sexual abuse varies from institution to institution. Therefore, every institution needs to consider each standard and take time to identify risks that may arise in their context, and find ways to mitigate or manage those risks.[63]

3.2.1 National Principles for Child Safe Organisations

Following the release of the National Royal Commission report, the Australian Government tasked the former National Children's Commissioner, Megan Mitchell, to lead the development of National Principles for Child Safe Organisations, which were ultimately endorsed by members of the Council of Australian Governments in February 2019, including the Tasmanian Government.[64] These draw heavily on the Child Safe Standards the National Royal Commission developed but are framed to apply to a broader set of harms to children. National Children's Commissioner, Anne Hollonds explained:

> The National Principles cover all forms of potential harms, and adopt a child rights, strengths-based approach to organisational development. Applied collectively, they demonstrate that a child safe organisation is one that creates a culture that empowers and values children and young people, engages families and the broader community, adopts suitable strategies and takes appropriate action to promote child safety and wellbeing.[65]

National Principles for Child Safe Organisations

1. Child safety and wellbeing is embedded in organisational leadership, governance and culture.
2. Children and young people are informed about their rights, participate in decisions affecting them and are taken seriously.
3. Families and communities are informed and involved in promoting child safety and wellbeing.
4. Equity is upheld and diverse needs respected in policy and practice.
5. People working with children and young people are suitable and supported to reflect child safety and wellbeing values in practice.
6. Processes to respond to complaints and concerns are child focused.
7. Staff and volunteers are equipped with the knowledge, skills and awareness to keep children and young people safe through ongoing education and training.
8. Physical and online environments promote safety and wellbeing while minimising the opportunity for children and young people to be harmed.
9. Implementation of the national child safe principles is regularly reviewed and improved.
10. Policies and procedures document how the organisation is safe for children and young people.

The National Principles have informed and underpin many of the recommendations we have made in the chapters that relate to specific organisations.

Since the development of the National Principles, resources and guidance material have been created to support organisations to implement them. These include:

- a draft child and wellbeing policy template
- an example code of conduct

- an introductory self-assessment tool for organisations
- a checklist relating to online safety.[66]

SNAICC – National Voice for Our Children, Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency and the National Office for Child Safety have also developed a guide specifically designed to support organisations to embed cultural safety for Aboriginal children and young people within organisations, in line with the National Principles.[67] Resources have also been developed at state and territory level, such as the Victorian and New South Wales guides to enabling children's participation in decision making.[68]

As we discuss in Section 4.1, these National Principles largely form the basis of Tasmania's legislated Child and Youth Safe Standards and will become mandatory for institutions that provide services to, or engage with, children from 2024 onwards.[69]

We heard of varied approaches to implementing the National Principles across the Tasmanian Government. This includes the following (non-exhaustive) initiatives:

- In the context of education, the relatively newly established Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People has been tasked with mapping the Department's activities against the National Principles. Secretary, Department for Education, Children and Young People, Timothy Bullard, told us 'this includes understanding where there may be overlap with work underway in response to recommendations of the [National] Royal Commission and the [Department of Education independent] inquiry, where there are gaps and the key areas in which work must be prioritised'.[70] We note that since the education hearings, the Office of Safeguarding has broadened the remit of its work within an expanded Department for Education, Children and Young People to develop a whole of department framework for safeguarding children and young people that aligns with the National Principles.[71]
- In the context of health, the Child Safe Organisations Project team was established in 2021 to implement the National Principles and evaluate the Department of Health's performance against them. The Tasmanian Government told us the Department of Health has since made progress implementing those National Principles, including delivering:
    - a signed Statement of Commitment to child safety and wellbeing by members of the Health Executive
    - a new Child and Young Person Advisory Panel to provide a process for seeking the views of children and young people on changes across the Department that affect them

- a Child Safety and Wellbeing Policy that establishes the requirement to comply with the National Principles and children's rights, and the roles and responsibilities of executive and senior leaders, and all staff in the Department of Health
- a new Child Safety and Wellbeing Service to support the promotion of child safety and wellbeing, prevention of harm, analysis to identify trends, patterns and red flags, compliance and performance monitoring, and managing risks
- increased mandatory child safeguarding training, clearer guidance to staff on recognising signs of harm and responding to disclosures of harm by children, and improvements to incident reporting to capture any child safeguarding concerns, among other initiatives.[72]

- In the context of youth justice, former Secretary of the Department of Communities, Michael Pervan, told us work was undertaken in 2021 to 'contemporise all [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] policies and procedures to be compliant with Child Safe Standards' alongside the commencement of a Learning and Development Framework.[73] A commitment to the National Principles is also referenced in the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint 2022–2032.[74]
- In the context of out of home care, in July 2019, the Tasmanian Government created a policy obliging all government funded non-government organisations with significant liabilities under the National Redress Scheme to demonstrate they were engaging in child safe practices. This included mapping the services and existing standards and regulatory regimes against the National Principles. It also included developing a self-assessment tool the community sector could use.[75]

We note that much of this effort and initiative began during our Commission of Inquiry. We also observe that despite the Tasmanian Government's commitment to the National Principles in 2019, their implementation within Tasmanian Government departments is in its relative infancy.

While the obligations imposed by Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Standards start from 2024, there has been nothing preventing an institution from adopting these requirements voluntarily. Indeed, the National Royal Commission recommended all organisations implement its Child Safe Standards to uphold the rights of the child, as required by Article 3 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.[76] While our terms of reference limit our recommendations to government (or government funded) organisations, we consider all organisations committed to the safety of children should take steps to apply the National Principles, whether they are legislatively bound to or not. Organisations that will be legislatively mandated to comply from 2024 may also wish to take steps to comply with the requirements before they are legislatively required to do so.

Recommendation 18.2

All organisations engaging in child-related activities should voluntarily comply with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (as reflected in Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Standards) to the greatest extent possible, regardless of whether they are legislatively bound to do so or when their legislative obligations commence.

3.2.2 Legislated Child Safe Standards

The National Royal Commission recommended Child Safe Standards be legislated and apply to a range of organisations that engage with children. These include health, disability, education services, youth detention, out of home care, childcare, and coaching and tuition services, among others.[77] It recommended compliance with these requirements be overseen and enforced by an independent body.[78]

New South Wales, Victoria and South Australia have implemented legislated Child Safe Standards, although there is some variation in the approach and model adopted by different jurisdictions.[79] At the time of writing, Western Australia and the Australian Capital Territory were considering legislated Child Safe Standards.[80] Different governments (and departments) in Queensland, the Northern Territory and the Australian Capital Territory have 'committed' to the National Principles, but have not, at the time of writing, legislated compliance with them.[81]

Because it is one of the more advanced legislated models (having been introduced in 2016), we sought evidence from Victoria about its approach to legislating, monitoring and enforcing Child Safe Standards. The implementation of Victoria's Child Safe Standards was also reviewed in 2019. This information is reflected in the following box.

Victoria's implementation of legislated Child Safe Standards

Victoria has had legislated mandatory Child Safe Standards since 2016, adopting a staged approach to implementation. Some organisations were required to comply from January 2016 and a broader range of organisations from January 2017.[82] The Commission for Children and Young People in Victoria assumed its formal functions in relation to the Child Safe Standards in January 2017.[83]

Principal Commissioner, Commission for Children and Young People (Victoria), Liana Buchanan, shared with us her view of the importance of Victoria's Child Safe Standards:

> As a mandatory set of standards with a very broad reach, the Child Safe Standards are very important in terms of changing the way children are seen in organisations, changing awareness in organisations about children and child safety issues and about supporting organisations to have all of the systems and processes necessary to keep children safe.[84]

Emily Sanders, Director, Regulation, Victorian Commission for Children and Young People told us: 'The focus on prevention of abuse and the capability building elements of the Child Safe Standards are key elements'.[85]

The operation of Victoria's Child Safe Standards was reviewed in 2018 by Victoria's then Department of Health and Human Services. This review found strong support for the Child Safe Standards among regulated organisations but described implementation as resource intensive and difficult.[86] The review also found strong support for harmonisation with the National Principles and that oversight and compliance functions needed to be clarified and strengthened.[87] This review informed several amendments and refinements to Victoria's model.

Since 1 July 2022, Victoria's Child Safe Standards largely mirror the 10 National Principles, with an additional Standard that requires '[o]rganisations establish a culturally safe environment in which diverse and unique identities and experiences of Aboriginal children and young people are respected and valued'.[88] A detailed guide supports Victoria's 11 Child Safe Standards, which includes the minimum requirements that an organisation must meet (which reflect the key action areas of the National Principles). The guide also includes 'compliance indicators' (what the Commission will look for to assess compliance), as well as advice and information on how to be compliant and create a child safe organisation.[89]

When asked to reflect on the successful features of Victoria's Child Safe Standards, Ms Buchanan described how the Commission's functions supported their implementation. Ms Buchanan told us that most organisations 'demonstrate goodwill and preparedness to implement the Child Safe Standards' but benefit from support and guidance to do so.[90] She explained the Commission's functions supported it to do a range of activities, including:

- developing educational guides and tools
- running information sessions
- supporting a Child Safe Standards Community of Practice
- engaging with peak bodies and sector leads
- providing targeted support and guidance to organisations to support their compliance.[91]

Ms Buchanan told us of the value of having recourse to stronger compliance functions, when warranted. This includes the Commission for Children and Young People having powers to:

- issue notices to produce and notices to comply
- attend and inspect premises to enable the Commission to speak to staff and volunteers
- request further information to assess compliance.[92]

Ms Buchanan said these powers are important where organisations are uncooperative, repeatedly fail to comply or where significant risks to children have been identified. She added: 'In many cases, the fact that organisations know we can resort to enforcement measures is sufficient to prompt action'.[93]

Since 1 January 2023, the Commission has had additional enforcement powers to:

- enter premises with consent (without notice)
- enter with a warrant
- search premises
- seize information and documents.[94]

The Commission can also now:

- issue official warnings for non-compliance
- accept enforceable undertakings (legally enforceable agreements that describe what an organisation will do to comply)
- issue infringement notices
- seek a range of court orders, including injunctions and adverse publicity orders (in which an organisation is required to publicise their failure to comply with the Standards and the consequences of those failures).[95]

Ms Buchanan foreshadowed these amendments to us when she gave evidence in May 2022 and welcomed them, observing the changes would help to 'address some of the gaps needed in instances where we are unable to support organisations to comply, and need further powers to ensure compliance, especially where children are at risk'.[96] From 1 January 2023, the Commission for Children and Young People shares responsibility with Victorian government departments, the Victorian Registration and Qualifications Authority and the Wage Inspectorate for promoting and supporting compliance with the Child Safe Standards.[97]

The Commission for Children and Young People has a graduated approach to enforcement, which it describes as follows (noting this pre-dates some of its newer enforcement powers):

- inform and educate (including general awareness raising and guidance materials)
- support to comply (including providing specific advice and guidance where non-compliance is identified)
- monitor compliance (including inspecting an organisation's premises and documents, investigating non-compliance or conducting an own motion investigation, sharing information with other regulators)
- enforce the law (including issuing a 'Notice to Comply' with the Standards to compel action, applying to court for a declaration of non-compliance or naming organisations, where appropriate, when publishing information relating to the operation of the Standards).[98]

In 2021–22, the Commission initiated action against 33 organisations for potential non-compliance with the Child Safe Standards.[99] Since commencing the Child Safe Standards, non-compliance actions have been initiated against 250 organisations.[100]

Ms Buchanan also stated oversight of the Child Safe Standards has led to a 'large improvement' in the Commission's understanding of the organisations and sectors at risk, which 'has in turn informed the Victorian Government and others through formal submissions, inquiries and other information sharing processes'.[101]

We discuss Victoria's implementation of its Reportable Conduct Scheme further in Section 3.3.

3.2.3 Tasmania's implementation of legislated Child Safe Standards

In 2018, the Tasmanian Government accepted in principle the National Royal Commission recommendations related to Child Safe Standards. In doing so, the Tasmanian Government expressed support for the 'aspirational principles as the architecture of the National Framework' but noted jurisdictions may differ in their implementation approach due to their existing systems and that consistency would be achieved over time, where possible.[102] As noted before, the Government endorsed the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations in February 2019.

In late 2020, the Tasmanian Government released a draft Child Safe Organisations Bill 2020 for consultation.[103] Ginna Webster, Secretary, Department of Justice, explained the delay to us in her statement as follows:

> By way of context it is important to note that some of the delays in relation to drafting the Child Safe Organisations Bill 2020 were due to urgent legislation required to manage the COVID-19 pandemic. This is not to say that the Bill was not a priority for Government however the capacity of the Office of Parliamentary Counsel (OPC) and the State Service in a state the size of Tasmania presents some limitations.[104]

Feedback from stakeholders through that consultation showed general support for implementing the National Royal Commission recommendations relating to regulating organisations that provide services to children, with an acknowledgment that some organisations (particularly those that are smaller or volunteer run) may need help and support to comply.[105]

However, the Tasmanian Government received critical feedback from stakeholders, including that:

- Tasmania's proposed Child Safe Standards did not align adequately with the National Principles.
- The scope of the obligations (particularly which organisations would and would not be captured) was not clear.
- There was a lack of clarity around the role, powers and the designated body to undertake independent oversight.[106]

Secretary Webster gave her reflections on the feedback received:

> The feedback received on the Child Safe Organisations Bill supported the acceleration of the project to include independent regulation of the Child Safe Standards and a reportable conduct scheme. Despite intentions to align the Bill with the Principles for Child Safe Organisations endorsed by First Ministers at the Council of Australian Governments, during the drafting of the Bill some drafting changes were made to accommodate the structure of the Bill. Many stakeholders provided feedback about the departure from the wording of the Principles.[107]

Secretary Webster told us in her 10 June 2022 statement that the lack of consistency with the National Principles would be 'resolved in future drafts'.[108]

We consider it unfortunate the Tasmanian Government's initial attempt to progress implementation of Child Safe Standards was hampered by significant deficiencies in the 2020 Bill, as this represented a substantial loss of time and wasted effort.

Consistent with the feedback provided to the Department of Justice in response to its 2020 Bill, several individuals and organisations voiced support for implementing legislated Child Safe Standards, overseen by a strong and effective independent regulator, in our consultations and public submissions.[109] Tasmania's Commissioner for Children and Young People, Leanne McLean, told us:

> In my view, Tasmania can and should implement a best practice child safe system, including mandatory legislated child safe standards accompanied by a reportable conduct scheme with child-centred independent oversight consistent with the recommendations of the [National] Royal Commission.[110]

This ultimately occurred with the development and passage of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, which introduced legislated Child and Youth Safe Standards and a reportable conduct scheme.

3.3 Reportable conduct schemes

The National Royal Commission described a reportable conduct scheme as 'a legislated scheme that requires reporting, investigation and oversight of child protection-related concerns that arise in certain government and non-government institutions that provide services to, or engage with, children'.[111]

A reportable conduct scheme is intended to ensure complaints or allegations relating to the abuse or neglect of a child by institutions are managed robustly and transparently. The National Royal Commission described the key features of such a scheme as follows:

- the head of an institution must notify an oversight body of any reportable allegation, conduct or conviction involving its staff (we describe how this relates to sexual abuse below)[112]
- the institution is generally responsible for appropriately managing reportable conduct matters (for example, by assessing and managing risk and conducting investigations) unless the oversight body directs otherwise or conducts its own investigation[113]
- the oversight body monitors and scrutinises the institution's handling and investigation of any allegation, complaint or notification[114]
- the oversight body can audit an institution's policies and procedures to help them improve their systems and practices for responding to complaints or allegations.[115]

Reportable conduct schemes do not apply to children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours.[116]

The National Royal Commission recommended that state and territory governments establish reportable conduct schemes.[117] Four jurisdictions currently have a reportable conduct scheme: Victoria, New South Wales, Western Australia and the Australian Capital Territory.[118]

Conduct reportable under a reportable conduct scheme includes the abuse or neglect of a child, including sexual abuse (including sexual misconduct), physical abuse and psychological abuse.[119] Importantly, sexual misconduct is intended to capture behaviour that may not meet the threshold of a sexual offence, including crossing professional boundaries, sexually explicit or other overtly sexual behaviour or grooming.[120] This creates far greater opportunity to identify and address concerning behaviours at an early stage. It also overcomes some of the paralysis that can arise when organisations are confronted with conduct that is concerning but may not meet reporting thresholds to police or child protection, by giving a mandated lever for some action to be taken at an early stage.

Ms Fordyce felt that creating an environment for complaints and concerns to be acted upon at an early stage was important for minimising risks of abuse, noting at present, in Tasmania, organisations often only acted in response to child sexual abuse once a serious incident had occurred.[121] Ms Fordyce added:

> Low reporting thresholds are important in protecting children from child sexual abuse. If minor issues are identified, corrected and dealt with constantly and consistently, this deters perpetrators of child sexual abuse from committing child sexual abuse because they are aware that the system will be able to identify them.[122]

Stephen Kinmond, recently appointed as the New South Wales Children's Guardian, reflected on his experience overseeing New South Wales' Reportable Conduct Scheme in a former role as New South Wales Deputy Ombudsman (Human Services). Mr Kinmond also highlighted how a reportable conduct scheme could allow for earlier intervention in response to high-risk behaviours. He noted the importance of broad definitions of sexual misconduct, as these provide an opportunity for the organisation and oversight body to closely assess the risk posed by the person who is the subject of the allegation, recognising it can be difficult to initially determine the nature and extent of the conduct at the initial report.[123] Broad definitions for sexual misconduct also reflect that substantiating criminal charges, particularly for complex conduct such as grooming, can be difficult. Mr Kinmond added:

> I believe it is important to recognise that the threshold for taking action must be different to the threshold required to sustain a finding in a criminal matter. This need to proactively identify and respond to risk is vital to ensuring that we can take appropriate risk management action for the safety of children.[124]

As with the Child Safe Standards, we asked Victorian experts to describe the operation of its Reportable Conduct Scheme. This is described in the following box.

Overview of operation of Victoria's Reportable Conduct Scheme

Victoria's Reportable Conduct Scheme commenced in July 2017. Its scheme requires certain organisations to provide mandatory notifications relating to alleged child abuse and certain child-related misconduct to Victoria's Commission for Children and Young People.[125] A failure to do so without reasonable excuse is a criminal offence.[126] Ms Sanders told us:

> This means that, from the start of the investigative process to the outcome of the investigation, the CCYP [Commission for Children and Young People] is aware of the allegation and is able to independently and transparently scrutinise the organisation's investigation into that allegation. The CCYP can also educate and guide the organisation.[127]

The Reportable Conduct Scheme applies to organisations with a high level of responsibility for children and is not as broad as the category of organisations captured under the Child Safe Standards. It includes schools, disability and mental health services, hospitals, out of home care, religious bodies, occasional care providers and other prescribed entities (that could be zoos, libraries, museums and so forth).[128] In Victoria, the scheme was introduced in three tranches over 18 months, with different types of organisations captured by the scheme in each phase.

The Reportable Conduct Scheme in Victoria imposes obligations on the heads of relevant organisations to notify the Commission of a 'reportable allegation' within three business days of becoming aware of it.[129] In addition to the requirements of the Child Safe Standards (described in Section 3.2.2) it also requires the head of an entity to have systems in place to prevent reportable conduct and ensure it is reported and investigated where it does occur.[130] The 'head' of an organisation is defined in the Act to generally be the Secretary (where the entity is a department) or as otherwise prescribed in regulations, and in any other case the chief executive officer, the principal officer or otherwise a person nominated and approved by the Commission.[131]

'Reportable conduct' is defined broadly in Victoria to include:

- a sexual offence committed against, with or in the presence of a child (whether or not a criminal proceeding has been commenced or concluded)
- sexual misconduct committed against, with or in the presence of a child (defined as 'behaviour, physical contact or speech or other communication of a sexual nature, inappropriate touching, grooming behaviour and voyeurism')
- physical violence committed against, with or in the presence of a child

- any behaviour that causes significant emotional or psychological harm to a child
- significant neglect of a child.[132]

Under the scheme, allegations that may constitute criminal offences should also be reported to Victoria Police. A police investigation has priority, with any investigations by an organisation to be suspended or not started until police advise that it may proceed.[133] Guidance material from the Commission states that criminal allegations should be 'immediately reported' to police, in addition to the Commission.[134]

As soon as possible and within 30 calendar days after becoming aware of the reportable allegation, the organisation must provide the Commission with:

- detailed information about the reportable allegation
- whether or not any disciplinary action is proposed and reasons why (or why not)
- any written submissions made to the head of the organisation that the relevant employee wished to have considered in determining disciplinary or other action.[135]

As soon as possible after completing the investigation, the head of the organisation must provide the Commission with a copy of the investigation findings and information about actions.[136]

Failure to notify the Commission of the reportable allegation, or to keep the Commission updated on actions taken to investigate and respond within 30 calendar days, is an offence.[137] The head of the entity must investigate the allegation (or engage another body, such as the Commission to investigate) and, as soon as possible after the investigation concludes, provide a copy and reasons for findings, details of disciplinary and other action to be taken and an explanation if no disciplinary or other action is proposed.[138]

The Commission can request information or documents relating to a reportable allegation or investigation at any time. The head of the entity must comply with the request.[139] The Commission can visit an entity to inspect any document related to the reportable allegation or conduct an interview.[140]

The Commission also has own motion powers to investigate a reportable allegation where:

- it receives information about a reportable allegation and believes on reasonable grounds that reportable conduct may have been committed and considers it in the public interest to investigate the reportable allegation
- it is advised the organisation will not or cannot investigate the reportable allegation or engage an independent investigator
- it is concerned there has been inappropriate handling of (or response to) a reportable allegation and considers it in the public interest to investigate itself.[141]

Affected parties can seek internal review of some decisions the Commission makes. This includes decisions to issue a notice to produce regarding the Reportable Conduct Scheme or findings by the Commission in an own motion investigation, for example.[142] Some internal review decisions can be further reviewed by the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal.

The Commission for Children and Young People published Guidance for Organisations: Investigating a Reportable Conduct Allegation in June 2019. Key points from this guide include:

- Decision-makers in reportable conduct investigations must apply the 'balance of probabilities' standard of proof (whether more likely than not the reportable conduct happened). In so doing, the decision-maker must apply the 'Briginshaw test', which requires that the more serious the allegation and gravity of a substantiated finding, the more comfortably satisfied on the evidence they should be.[143]

- An independent investigator must be used, defined as an 'independent body or person (who can come from within the organisation) with appropriate qualifications, training or experience to investigate reportable allegations'.[144] The guide describes situations where an external investigator should be considered, including where the matter is complex or there is a conflict of interest.[145]
- An alleged victim and the subject of an allegation should be interviewed, unless there are good reasons not to (these should be documented). The guide includes the factors to consider when interviewing a child, including their age and developmental stage, whether they have been interviewed already and the nature of the allegations.[146] It also states that 'careful thought and planning' is required to enable a child to describe their experience, where appropriate, 'being mindful to avoid causing any further trauma to the child'.[147] The Commission for Children and Young People has developed the Guide for including children and young people in reportable conduct investigations, alongside other resources (including mock interviews). These provide specific guidance on how to ensure interviews are trauma-informed, including for Aboriginal children and young people.[148]
- A worker or volunteer who is the subject of a reportable allegation is entitled to receive natural justice (often called procedural fairness). The guide identifies the factors that will facilitate such fairness (including the provision of a notice on the nature and scope of allegations, ability to have a support person present, have reasonable opportunity to respond and have this considered before any final decisions are made).[149]
- The importance of organisations managing risks to children while investigations are conducted, with regard to the nature and seriousness of the reportable allegation, the vulnerability of the children and the position and duties of the subject of the allegation (including whether they have unsupervised access to children).[150]

In addition to the powers above, the Commission has specific functions in administering the scheme. This broadly includes:

- educating and providing advice to organisations to support compliance
- overseeing the investigation of reportable allegations (and in some instances, investigating the allegations itself)
- monitoring compliance

- exchanging information with Victoria Police, other regulators and Working with Children Check Victoria (we discuss information sharing in the context of New South Wales' Reportable Conduct Scheme below)
- reporting to the Minister and Parliament on trends.[151]

Ms Buchanan told us the Commission for Children and Young People works closely with many regulatory bodies and it has implemented formal memoranda of understanding with some of these bodies.[152] Ms Buchanan said this enhances the safety and wellbeing of children by ensuring relevant information is shared, while also reducing duplication of effort in responding to matters.[153]

Ms Buchanan said the Commission shares information with co-regulators and other agencies to help them perform their role regulating organisations or individuals in relation to child safety.[154] It can refer a substantiated allegation to the Working with Children Check Unit or a professional accreditation body (for example, Victorian Institute of Teaching or the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency).[155] It can also bring agencies together to share information about a matter and support each regulator to fulfil its roles and responsibilities in addressing child safety issues, while minimising duplication.[156]

Where Victoria Police investigates a matter that falls within the scope of the Reportable Conduct Scheme, the Commission can request information about the matter from Victoria Police and share it with a relevant organisation.[157] Ms Buchanan said placing a police officer within the Commission during the first two years of operation of the Reportable Conduct Scheme helped the Commission to establish processes to effectively manage information and information requests between the two agencies. This resulted in an increase in intelligence about potential abuse being shared with Victoria Police to assist criminal investigations. The Commission now routinely shares with and requires considerable information from Victoria Police. Victoria Police also shares reportable conduct allegations with the Commission that may not have otherwise come to light.[158]

New South Wales was the first jurisdiction to establish a reportable conduct scheme. We asked Mr Kinmond to describe the features of the New South Wales model, including its lessons in implementation. Mr Kinmond described in detail the significance of a reportable conduct scheme in providing central oversight of high-risk individuals and strong collaboration with police and child protection agencies to actively manage the risks these individuals posed. We describe the New South Wales experience relating particularly to information-sharing in the following box.

Information sharing under the New South Wales Reportable Conduct Scheme

New South Wales implemented a reportable conduct scheme in 1999, originally sitting within the New South Wales Ombudsman before being administered by the Office of the Children's Guardian from 1 March 2020.[159] The regulator has responsibility for overseeing the handling of child abuse and neglect allegations against employees of more than 7,000 government and non-government agencies.[160]

Stephen Kinmond was appointed to lead the Employment-Related Child Protection Division within the New South Wales Ombudsman in 2010 and had responsibility for the Reportable Conduct Scheme. Mr Kinmond recognised the importance of an oversight body of this nature 'value adding' and being proactive in the management of risks to children.[161] He stated that before he joined the Office of the Ombudsman, it had 'reflected a more passive traditional oversight model'.[162] He described the action he took:

> [I] immediately went about establishing standard operating procedures with the police, getting access to the police system, getting access to the child protection system, ensuring that in fact we were proactive in our response.[163]

Increasing 'in-house' access to databases held by police and child protection enabled the Ombudsman to 'obtain a holistic understanding of the prevailing risks in particular matters and to better inform [its] assessment of any action that may be required' to supplement its own information gleaned through reportable conduct notifications.[164] This provided a 'helicopter view' of critical information.[165]

Chapter 16A of the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW) ('Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act') provides significant scope for the regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme, as well as other prescribed bodies, to proactively share risk-related information to promote the safety, welfare and wellbeing of children.[166] Section 245C states:

1. A prescribed body (the provider) may provide information relating to the safety, welfare or well-being of a particular child or young person or class of children or young persons to another prescribed body (the recipient) if the provider reasonably believes that the provision of the information would assist the recipient:
    a. To make any decision, assessment or plan or to initiate or conduct any investigation, or to provide any service, relating to the safety, welfare or well-being of the child or young person or class of children or young persons ...
    b. To manage any risk to the child or young person (or class of children or young persons) that might arise in the recipient's capacity as an employer or designated agency.
2. Information may be provided under this section regardless of whether the provider has been requested to provide the information.[167]

Provisions under the Act also permit an agency to request information relating to the safety, welfare or wellbeing of children from another prescribed body and provide protection from liability to those who provide information under provisions set out in the Act.[168] Prescribed bodies for the purposes of the Act include New South Wales Police, public service agencies or public authorities, government or registered non-government schools, TAFEs, public health organisations, private health facilities and persons or bodies prescribed in regulations.[169]

On a regulator's approach to information sharing, Mr Kinmond said:

> I took the view that an Ombudsman's Office should err on the side of disclosure, given the importance of ensuring the Office of the Children's Guardian was provided with relevant risk related information to carry out their functions. My approach was always to think about what the community's views would be on a failure to act in a particular situation, including failing to provide information that indicated an individual may pose a risk to children. I find this to be a simple but helpful test.[170]

The provisions in the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act seek to overcome agency concerns about breaching individual privacy.[171] Mr Kinmond said that a reportable conduct scheme regulator must take an active role to ensure relevant information is shared with appropriate agencies and acted on.[172] This is best achieved through broad information sharing powers.[173] He said the reportable conduct scheme regulator must also model proactive information exchange in its own practice to send a clear message to agencies and sectors that there is a 'collective responsibility' to share information to promote the safety, welfare and wellbeing of children.[174]

Mr Kinmond said the regulator of a reportable conduct scheme must assess the information it gathers and form a view about whether it can be exchanged with other prescribed bodies consistent with promoting the safety, welfare and wellbeing of a child or class of children.[175] This requires an assessment of the nature and quality of the information and ensuring the exchange of information beyond what is permitted by legislation does not occur.[176]

Mr Kinmond provided us with a submission the NSW Ombudsman made to the National Royal Commission in 2016 that cited an example where a historical child sexual abuse case was reopened by police after the Ombudsman identified an individual having two different 'unlinked' names within the police database.[177]

Mr Kinmond told us of the importance of regulators and oversight bodies being proactive in the context of overseeing a reportable conduct scheme:

> It's not an acceptable situation to have an oversight body that understands that risks are in play in relation to matters that are reported to it and remains passive, and so, in that respect it's perhaps different than other oversight arrangements because, if there is an unacceptable risk to children – or a child or children … the oversight body has to respond.[178]

Mr Kinmond stressed the importance of providing for capacity building for organisations through training, education and guidance, recognising that smaller agencies in particular often lacked the knowledge and experience to handle reportable allegations properly.[179] Failures to build capacity could also undermine the level and quality of reporting to the regulator.[180]

We consider that many of the problems we observed in responses to allegations or complaints of child sexual abuse or sexual misconduct in our Inquiry could have been prevented through a reportable conduct scheme, underpinned by proactive information-sharing arrangements and a supportive approach to helping organisations to manage investigations effectively. This is particularly the case for conduct that may not meet the threshold for more serious interventions (for example, not meeting the threshold for police reporting).

We consider that, had Tasmania adopted a reportable conduct scheme earlier, a range of problems we describe throughout our report may have been prevented, including:

- failures to notify other agencies of complaints or concerns relating to child sexual abuse (such as police, professional regulators or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme) and to share information appropriately to ensure risks to children are properly assessed and mitigated (refer to, for example, Volumes 3, 4, 5 and 6)
- failures to investigate complaints or concerns, or investigate them adequately, and in a trauma-sensitive way (particularly in adopting best practice approaches to interviewing children and young people) (refer to, for example, Volumes 3, 4, 5, 6 and Chapter 20 in Volume 8)
- a tendency to prioritise the perceived rights and interests of the person accused of the conduct and the reputation of the organisation ahead of the safety of children by failing to ensure investigations were transparent, trauma-informed, appropriately included the accounts and perspectives of affected children and young people, and ensured risks associated with particular individuals were appropriately managed (refer to, for example, Volumes 3, 4, 5, 6 and Chapter 20 in Volume 8).

As noted, the Tasmanian Government released a consultation draft of the Child Safe Organisations Bill in 2020. This Bill did not provide for a reportable conduct scheme, as this was proposed to occur after the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations had been legislated.[181] As we noted earlier, Secretary Webster told us feedback on the draft Bill showed support for a reportable conduct scheme.[182] In her submission to us, Commissioner McLean outlined her 'strong view' that Tasmania should have both Child Safe Standards and a reportable conduct scheme.[183]

We agree and consider the value of a reportable conduct scheme lies in addressing a significant gap in responding to institutional responses to child sexual abuse and sexual misconduct. We note the child protection system is primarily focused on the care and protection of individual children and responding to risks of harm within the familial setting.

As we discuss in the next section, the Tasmanian Government has implemented a reportable conduct scheme in its Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, which is due to commence in 2024. Secretary Webster told us:

> Once established, the Reportable Conduct Scheme … will be a central repository for reportable conduct and the investigation outcomes related to child sexual abuse in organisations, government and nongovernment. The Reportable Conduct Scheme will have an important role in data collection and monitoring the incidence of child sexual abuse.[184]

4 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023

In September 2022, the Government released a revised draft Child and Youth Safe Organisations Bill for public consultation. This consultation included an invitation for the views of children and young people, who could participate in a short survey about their ideas. Public consultation closed on 1 October 2022.[185] The revised Bill introduced a more comprehensive child safe organisation framework than the 2020 Bill. It was introduced into the Tasmanian Parliament on 22 November 2022.[186] The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act was passed by the Tasmanian Parliament in May 2023 and commenced on 1 July 2023 (with some legislative obligations commencing in a phased manner in 2024).[187]

We summarise the key features of the Act in the following section.

4.1 Child and Youth Safe Standards and Universal Principle

As previously outlined, the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act introduces Child and Youth Safe Standards that mirror the National Principles certain organisations must comply with, as part of the broader Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework. Organisations must also comply with an embedded Universal Principle that requires a regulated entity to 'ensure that the right to cultural safety of children who identify as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander is respected'.[188] The Universal Principle has the same status as the Child and Youth Safe Standards, with the Independent Regulator's powers (including enforcement powers) identical to those of the Standards.[189] As we noted earlier, our references to Child and Youth Safe Standards should be read as inclusive of the Universal Principle.

A range of organisations must comply, including health, educational, accommodation providers, youth justice workers, recreational clubs and businesses that provide services to children.[190] The Act stipulates that local councils, legal practitioners providing services to children, government agencies and the Parliament of Tasmania must also comply.[191]

The Independent Regulator is given broad functions regarding the Child and Youth Safe Standards that relate to education and advice on compliance, oversight and enforcement, information sharing, data collection and analysis, and public reporting.[192] The Independent Regulator also has enforcement powers that extend to:

- requesting documents and information
- inspecting premises
- sharing information
- issuing relevant notices to an organisation (to produce a document or to comply with requirements the Child and Youth Safe Standards impose).[193]

Penalties apply to non-compliance with the legislation.[194]

4.2 Reportable Conduct Scheme

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act also introduces a reportable conduct scheme, which requires the head of a relevant entity to notify the Independent Regulator within three business days of becoming aware of reportable conduct. Most relevantly for our purposes, reportable conduct includes a range of sexual offences as well as sexual misconduct, which is defined to include inappropriate behaviour, physical contact and voyeurism when performed in a sexual manner or with a sexual intention.[195] The head of an entity is required, as soon as practicable and no later than 30 days after becoming aware of the reportable allegation, to notify the Independent Regulator of information received, action taken, and any submissions received by parties related to the matter.[196]

The Reportable Conduct Scheme applies to a slightly narrower cohort of organisations than the proposed Child and Youth Safe Standards (which is consistent with the recommendations of the National Royal Commission) and includes all government agencies, out of home care and accommodation providers, youth justice, health services and schools, among others.[197]

The Independent Regulator has a range of functions to administer and oversee the scheme, including educating and advising entities, monitoring investigations of reportable conduct (and conducting own motion investigations), monitoring compliance with the scheme, facilitating appropriate information sharing, collecting and analysing data, and public reporting.[198]

As with the Child and Youth Safe Standards, the Independent Regulator has a range of powers, including to request documents or information, enter premises, conduct interviews and share information.[199]

4.3 Independent Regulator and Deputy Independent Regulator

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act provides for the Governor to appoint an Independent Regulator and Deputy Independent Regulator (one of whom must be known to be Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander).[200] The Act makes it explicit the Independent Regulator and Deputy Independent Regulator are 'not subject to the direction or control of the Minister' and 'must act independently, impartially and in the public interest' when exercising their functions or powers.[201]

The Act also makes provision for 'entity regulators', which the Independent Regulator is to determine.[202] Entity regulators can exercise certain functions the Independent Regulator delegates, including powers to inspect premises, interview persons or give a notice to produce a document.[203]

At the time of writing, it is unclear how the Independent Regulator, Deputy Independent Regulator and the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework, including the Reportable Conduct Scheme, will be operationalised. The Tasmanian Government has stated its intention to establish a new entity led by the Independent Regulator 'focused on the institutional safety and wellbeing of children and young people' to administer the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework.[204] Recruitment for the role of the Independent Regulator is underway at the time of writing, with appointment of the Deputy Independent Regulator to follow.[205]

We consider the Tasmanian Government should establish a new and appropriately resourced Commission for Children and Young People (discussed further in Section 5.2), which should also administer the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

4.4 Information-sharing provisions

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act includes several provisions designed to facilitate appropriate information sharing between agencies. These provisions are expansively drafted to empower the Independent Regulator to obtain, record, disclose and otherwise use information for a broad range of purposes, including for:

- promoting and protecting the safety of children
- supporting investigations by law enforcement
- employment and disciplinary processes.[206]

It also provides that a range of persons and bodies may disclose information or documents relating to compliance with the Child and Youth Safe Standards or matters relating to reportable conduct between different organisations. This includes:

- heads of organisations
- entity regulators
- police (including police in other jurisdictions)
- the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme
- ministers
- an independent investigator (where necessary)
- the Chief Commissioner of the Integrity Commission
- others, including persons or bodies that can be prescribed.[207]

We note the Ombudsman is not listed as a body that can take part in information sharing. We are unclear on the reasons for this. We consider it important and necessary that the Ombudsman be expressly empowered to share information with the Independent Regulator, alongside those listed, given its complaints-handling and oversight functions.

The State has agreed with this position and committed to prescribing the Ombudsman within the regulations to bring it within information-sharing provisions under the Act, and to confer investigative functions on the Ombudsman as an entity regulator under the Reportable Conduct Scheme.[208]

Recommendation 18.3

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Ombudsman is prescribed as an entity for the purposes of disclosure of information under section 40 of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023.

4.5 Other matters

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act has a commencement date of 1 July 2023, with staggered commencement of the requirements in 2024.[209] The first tranche of organisations will be required to comply with the Child and Youth Safe Standards (including government agencies such as schools, health services, out of home care and youth justice) from 1 January 2024. A second tranche will be required to comply from 1 July 2024 (mostly private and commercial business, such as party services or talent and beauty competitions).[210] A similar logic applies to phasing the implementation of the Reportable Conduct Scheme, recognising some variation in the organisations subject to the scheme.[211]

Table 18.1: Organisations regulated under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023[212]

Type of organisation	Child and Youth Safe Standards	Reportable Conduct Scheme	Date must start to comply
Accommodation and residential services for children, including housing services and overnight camps	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Activities or services of any kind, under the auspices of a particular religious denomination or faith through which adults have contact with children	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Child care and commercial baby sitting services	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Child protection services and out-of-home care, including contact services	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Health services for children, including organisations that provide counselling services*	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
An organisation that provides early intervention or disability support services	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Justice and detention services for children*	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Education services for children	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Tasmanian Government and Local Government	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Tasmanian Parliament	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Government House	Yes	Yes	1 January 2024
Neighbourhood Houses	Yes		1 July 2024
A club, association or cadet organisation that has a significant membership of, or involvement by, children	Yes	Yes	1 July 2024
An entity that provides a coaching or tuition service to children	Yes	Yes	1 July 2024
An entity that provides commercial services to children	Yes		1 July 2024
A transport service specifically for children	Yes		1 July 2024

The Act also provides for a review of the first three years of its operation, with a report on the review outcomes to be tabled in Parliament.[213]

4.6 Stakeholder feedback

As foreshadowed, the Department of Justice released a consultation draft of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Bill in September 2022. The Department of Justice published 11 submissions from stakeholders in response to the consultation draft, all of which reflected broad support for the objectives, aims and provisions of the Bill.[214] Some of the key themes emerging from the submissions included:

- recommendations that the Tasmanian Commissioner for Children and Young People assumes the functions of the Independent Regulator for the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme.[215] The importance of ensuring the Independent Regulator was appropriately resourced was also emphasised[216]

- support for explicit consideration of cultural safety for Aboriginal children but recommending this align to the approach adopted in Victoria by introducing an additional Standard (rather than a Universal Principle)[217]
- some support for expanding the scope of the Reportable Conduct Scheme to capture all organisations that would be bound by the Child and Youth Safe Standards (acknowledging this goes beyond what the National Royal Commission recommended).[218]

Stakeholders who provided feedback on the consultation draft also made a range of technical and drafting suggestions.

The CREATE Foundation, the national consumer body for children and young people with an out of home care experience, also consulted a group of young people in September 2022 on the draft Bill. The feedback from this group was broadly positive. They suggested the Child and Youth Safe Standards should be accessible and understood by young people.[219]

As part of its consultation process, the Department of Justice established a range of advisory panels to support the implementation of the new requirements, including a:

- Lived Experience Advisory Panel—with members who have lived experience of child sexual abuse in institutional settings or are family members or friends who are victim-survivor advocates.
- Sector Implementation Advisory Panel—which brings together representatives from sectors likely to be affected by the reforms, including a range of services and organisations, businesses, clubs, associations, local government and private organisations (such as non-government schools).
- Interdepartmental Implementation Advisory Panel—chaired by the Department of Justice with representatives from the Department for Education, Children and Young People, the Department of Health, the Department of State Growth, the Department of Police, Fire and Emergency Management, the Department of Natural Resources and Environment Tasmania and the Department of Premier and Cabinet.[220]

4.7 Supporting the implementation of Tasmania's child safe regulatory framework

We welcome the Tasmanian Government's introduction of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act and consider it has appropriately responded to stakeholder feedback by:

- aligning with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations
- reflecting the need for all organisations to take active steps to ensure they feel safe and welcoming for Aboriginal children
- capturing a wide range of organisations that must manage the most acute risks of harms to children in both the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme
- facilitating and explicitly enabling robust information sharing between key agencies that prioritises the safety of children and young people
- embedding the independence of the Independent Regulator and Deputy Independent Regulator
- providing for a review of the operation of the legislation after three years.

We also welcome the adoption of broad definitions of reportable conduct. However, we note these rely on staff and volunteers to be sufficiently skilled to identify reportable conduct (for example, inappropriate boundary violations or breaches).

We are particularly pleased Tasmania Police will become a regulated entity for the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme. We consider this appropriate, as police occupy unique positions of trust within the community and can wield significant power and authority over children and young people.

We consider there has been a significant delay in implementing the National Royal Commission recommendations as they relate to the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme. The Child Safe Standards in the 2020 draft of the Bill were not fit for purpose and had to be abandoned, while a reportable conduct scheme was only proposed in the draft Bill of 2022. The unfortunate effect of these delays is the opportunity to reduce any risks that children and young people may be subject to was missed. Valuable time was lost to start the necessary consultation, capacity building and preparation within regulated organisations needed to ensure the success of their implementation.

Given the broad alignment with the key features of interstate models, and the extensive delays to date, we do not propose revisiting the substance of the Act, beyond our recommendation regarding the inclusion of the Ombudsman as an information-sharing entity (outlined in Section 4.4). In the interests of realising the benefits of these regulatory schemes as soon as possible, we encourage the Tasmanian Government to be considered and thoughtful with its implementation in order to maximise the success and impact of the regulatory schemes. We also recommend the issues we would like considered in the statutory review of the operation of the Act.

Other jurisdictions, such as New South Wales and Victoria, have substantially progressed implementation of these schemes and can offer valuable insight to guide Tasmanian implementation. It was clear from the evidence from these jurisdictions that close collaboration with other agencies with relevant information and responsibilities (such as police), including access to their information holdings, was an important enabler for effective information sharing. Tasmania can now leverage resources and guidance materials that have been developed at the national level to support organisations and regulators alike. These will greatly assist during the implementation process and avoid the need for Tasmania to 'reinvent the wheel'.

Recommendation 18.4

The Tasmanian Government, in implementing the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, should ensure:

a. the functions of the Independent Regulator and Deputy Independent Regulator under the Act are embedded within the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6)

b. the Commission is sufficiently resourced to enable it to effectively perform these regulatory functions

c. the Commission has access to government data systems such as those held by Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme to enable systematic and proactive monitoring and that those agencies have access to the Commission's data, where appropriate.

We note that section 64 of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act allows the Minister to initiate a review of the Act covering the three years since the Act started and to ensure a report of the review outcomes is tabled in Parliament within four years of commencement. We welcome this provision but offer recommendations in the next section regarding considerations we consider should guide this review, which we consider should be undertaken by an independent entity.

Recommendation 18.5

The Tasmanian Government should ensure its independent three-year review of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 has a particular focus on:

a. whether the Independent Regulator is sufficiently resourced and empowered to perform its functions effectively, and new or additional resourcing, functions and powers are necessary to support compliance

b. how effectively the Independent Regulator is working with other agencies, including the Ombudsman or other oversight bodies, Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, Tasmania Police, professional regulatory bodies and other peak bodies, to support compliance, share information and manage active risks to children and young people

c. how organisations captured by the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme have experienced the new regulatory requirements, and in particular whether they have felt sufficiently supported to comply

d. analysing data emerging from the operation of the schemes, particularly as they relate to complaints and notifications and trends within and across sectors

e. whether the Universal Principle requiring organisations to uphold cultural safety is achieving its intended objective, and whether it should become an additional Child and Youth Safe Standard, mirroring the approach in Victoria

f. whether any further legislative changes are required to ensure appropriate information sharing between the Independent Regulator and other agencies.

4.8 The appointment of the Independent Regulator

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act does not specify the body that will assume the functions of the designated Independent Regulator and Deputy Independent Regulator. Secretary Webster told us:

> 'the establishment of an independent statutory oversight body will require the analysis of current legislation in Tasmania to identify the best placement and analysis around what existing functions of current statutory officers may need to be reviewed'.[221]

She noted Tasmania's relatively small size will need to be considered when examining how other jurisdictions have approached independent regulation.[222]

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Project Plan states the Tasmanian Government is committed to establishing a 'dedicated independent oversight body' to oversee the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.[223]

As noted in Section 4.3, the Government has stated its intention to establish a new entity led by the Independent Regulator to administer the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework.[224] Recruitment for the role of the Independent Regulator is underway at the time of writing, with appointment of the Deputy Independent Regulator to follow.[225]

The National Royal Commission contemplated that existing children's commissioners and guardians could assume responsibilities for Child Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Schemes.[226] We agree these responsibilities should be assumed by an oversight body focused exclusively on children and young people. We consider the person or body appointed as Independent Regulator should:

- be independent of government
- have specialist knowledge of children
- be accessible to children and their parents/carers, as they may wish to make a reportable allegation
- have a child-centred focus and processes
- have appropriate regulatory skills, which could be built over time.

In a small jurisdiction such as Tasmania, it is also important the appointment of the Independent Regulator avoid duplication of work with existing roles and entities.

As described earlier, in Victoria, the Commission for Children and Young People administers its Child Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme, which also performs other important functions. As discussed in Chapter 9, these functions include:

- conducting inquiries into the safety and wellbeing of an individual vulnerable child or group of vulnerable children[227]
- undertaking systemic inquiries into the provision of services to vulnerable children[228]
- monitoring serious incidents in the out of home care and youth justice systems[229]
- administering an independent visitors scheme for children in youth justice centres.[230]

As outlined in Sections 3.2 and 3.3, we heard evidence from Ms Buchanan and Ms Sanders, about the Commission for Children and Young People Victoria.[231] We were impressed at the considerable knowledge and expertise the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People has built as a regulator of Child Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme since 2017.

Ms Buchanan believed there was benefit in the Commission for Children and Young People holding the role as regulator, as it is a body with 'specialised knowledge and understanding of children, children's development and child sexual abuse', noting that this knowledge and expertise continues to grow.[232] Ms Buchanan said:

> So, one of the really important aspects of performing an oversight function here is, [number one], you have to be an organisation that has and continues to develop a very good understanding of children, of risks to children, of the patterns of child abuse and harm to children and about what organisations need to have in place to prevent and appropriately respond to child abuse, so that knowledge, that expertise, that specialisation in children and harms to children is very, very important.[233]

Ms Sanders stated how Child Safe Standards and a reportable conduct scheme are complementary:

> The Child Safe Standards are about systems, while the [Reportable Conduct Scheme] is about more specific and detailed management of investigations by organisations. They work together as part of the same overall child safety framework. We consider that these are two key aspects of the safeguarding system that seeks to prevent and respond to child sexual abuse.[234]

Ms Buchanan and Ms Sanders pointed to benefits in one regulator overseeing both the Child Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.[235] These benefits are summarised as follows:

- The number and nature of reportable allegations received under the Reportable Conduct Scheme can offer intelligence as to the organisation's level of compliance with Child Safe Standards (where the number or nature of these reports is inconsistent with expected trends).[236]
- An assessment of how well an organisation is implementing Child Safe Standards can guide how the regulator may wish to oversee the management of a reportable allegation. For example, if there are compliance concerns arising from the Child Safe Standards relating to an organisation or sector, this may encourage the regulator to be more proactive in working with the organisation in its investigation into reportable conduct.[237]
- There are no information barriers to overcome as the information held about both the Child Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme are held by the one regulator.[238] This means the Commission's internal teams can use information gleaned in regulating one scheme to inform its approach or action in relation to the other.[239]

Commissioner McLean supported Tasmania's regulator overseeing both schemes, as occurs in Victoria.[240] She noted:

> I believe the Victorian child safe model provides a particularly useful example of how we could take the steps needed to further protect the safety and wellbeing of children and young people in Tasmanian institutional contexts.[241]

As outlined earlier, in New South Wales, Child Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme are administered by the Office of the Children's Guardian.[242] The New South Wales Ombudsman was initially responsible for the Reportable Conduct Scheme, however this responsibility was transferred to the Office of the Children's Guardian in March 2020.[243]

We are pleased to see the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act proposes the same entity regulates the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

With its specialist knowledge of matters relating to children and its child-centred processes, we consider our proposed new Commission for Children and Young People (discussed in Section 5.2) to be the logical choice for the functions of the Independent Regulator. This organisation, as the successor to the current Commissioner for Children and Young People, will have the benefit of being known to children and families in Tasmania as an organisation that can help with concerns relating to children and young people. It will also ensure there is one oversight body in Tasmania with a focus on the safety and wellbeing of children and young people. We consider this recommendation takes account of Tasmania's relatively small size and the need for regulation to be effective and efficient.

While we acknowledge it will take some time to fully establish the new Commission for Children and Young People, the implementation of the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme should progress with some urgency.

5 Oversight and safeguards supporting a child safe system

A healthy and robust system of oversight is a critical pillar to improving children's safety in Tasmanian organisations. This is because well-regulated organisations are more likely to have the features of child safe organisations—including clear policies and procedures, healthy and protective work cultures, skilled and motivated staff and a culture of collaboration, reflection and continuous improvement. Organisations that tolerate poor practice, fail to properly address misconduct, and lack transparency and accountability are more likely to have heightened risks of abuse of children. In this section, we outline our recommendation to strengthen the oversight and regulation of child safety in Tasmania by establishing a new Commission for Children and Young People, which expands the current functions of the Commissioner for Children and Young People.

5.1 A confused and complex oversight system

In Chapter 2, we outline the current child sexual abuse system and identify that Tasmania has a range of oversight and integrity bodies (including professional regulators) that have some responsibility relating to child safety. In particular, the current oversight and integrity system in Tasmania is complex and confusing. The Ombudsman, Integrity Commission and the Commissioner for Children and Young People have certain highly specific (and often narrow) functions that relate to managing child safety.

Commissioner McLean acknowledged that Tasmania's oversight system lacks coordination, stating:

> In Tasmania we currently have a disconnected patchwork of systems and processes which do not provide an integrated and systematic approach to keeping children safe from abuse in institutional settings. The flow-on effects of the current system are that navigation by the public and agencies is difficult, there is limited coordination or communication between regulatory agencies, there is no central body with responsibility for systemic oversight …[244]

During our hearings, we convened a panel comprising the Chief Executive Officer, Integrity Commission, Michael Easton, the Ombudsman, Richard Connock, and Commissioner McLean to explain how their respective bodies work together in receiving and responding to complaints and concerns relating to child safety. Their evidence revealed what appeared to us to be a complex and confused integrity and oversight model in Tasmania, including:

- The Ombudsman's powers in relation to publicly funded private entities 'depends on the relationship between the private entity and the government'—which may create a lack of clarity for some out of home care providers, depending on their status.[245]
- The decision to initiate (or not initiate) disciplinary processes are administrative decisions but are not, in most cases, subject to the Ombudsman's jurisdiction.[246] We note the Integrity Commission has powers relating to misconduct by public officers.[247]
- The Commissioner for Children and Young People has individual advocacy functions for children and young people detained under the Youth Justice Act 1997, but no individual advocacy functions for children and young people in out of home care.[248] This means they cannot advocate on behalf of an individual child in the out of home care system or investigate a specific organisation providing care services, for example.[249] We discuss problems with these lack of powers in Chapter 9 relating to children in out of home care.

- The Commissioner for Children and Young People currently cannot, on their own motion, investigate decisions made about children and young people in detention. The Commissioner can only advocate on a child or young person's behalf (for example, to facilitate a complaint to the Ombudsman about their treatment).[250]
- The Commissioner for Children and Young People, the Ombudsman, the Custodial Inspector and the Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism appointed under the United Nations Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture (noting the latter three roles are held by Mr Connock) all have functions relating to youth detention. For the Commissioner, this extends to visiting and advocating for children and young people in detention. For the Ombudsman, this relates to investigating administrative decisions made by the Department overseeing youth detention. For the Custodial Inspector, this relates to inspecting detention facilities against established standards.[251] The Integrity Commission may also be involved where there is misconduct by a staff member if, after considering whether the alleged misconduct could be a criminal offence and any necessary consultation with Tasmania Police, it considers that involvement to be appropriate regarding the principles set out in section 8(1)(l) of the Integrity Commission Act 2009 ('Integrity Commission Act').
- Referral pathways could sometimes lead to potentially unintended outcomes—for example, if a young person shared a concern with the Commissioner for Children and Young People about their treatment in detention and they were fearful of making a formal complaint because of concerns about reprisal, it is possible the Commissioner for Children and Young People could still make a complaint to the Integrity Commission regarding the misconduct concerns. The Integrity Commission could refer the complaint back to the Department responsible for youth justice to investigate.[252] The young person in question would not necessarily know how their privately expressed concern was being managed.
- Only public officers or contractors who have entered into a contract with a public body can make public interest disclosures under the Public Interest Disclosures Act 2002, which limits who can receive the protections under the Act—for example, private individuals who may hold relevant information to the operation of a public body.[253] The Integrity Commission does not have such limitations as to who can make a complaint to it.[254]

In unpacking the various roles and responsibilities, how they intersect (and how they do not) Counsel Assisting posed questions for Mr Connock, Mr Easton and Commissioner McLean:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Would you each agree with me that this is a complex system … ?
>
> A [Ms McLean]: Yes.
>
> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Ombudsman?
>
> A [Mr Connock]: Yes.
>
> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Mr Easton?
>
> A [Mr Easton]: Yes.
>
> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Is it a difficult system for lay people to navigate, Commissioner?
>
> A [Ms McLean]: In my experience, yes, people are often confused about my role.
>
> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Mr Ombudsman?
>
> A [Mr Connock]: It can be, yes.
>
> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Mr Easton?
> A [Mr Easton]: I think it's difficult for people to understand the complexities, but they know—my sense is the layperson would know they could come to us about misconduct …[255]

All three oversight heads reported very few complaints (or public enquiries, in the case of the Commissioner for Children and Young People, who does not have a complaint handling function) relating to child sexual abuse.[256] Mr Connock seemed unable to explain why complaints about child sexual abuse, or whistleblowing complaints relating to misconduct were so low, but was cautious to attribute it to barriers to reporting.[257] In later hearings regarding Ashley Youth Detention Centre, Mr Connock reflected that there may be inadequate recognition of the protections for complaints-handling (including against reprisal), and that better publicising complaints avenues (and related protections) may help.[258]

Mr Easton was more willing to draw conclusions about barriers to reporting during our first week of hearings, stating:

> … it's our view based on our experience that people will not report things for fear of retribution or for fear of ostracisation as a whistleblower … But equally people won't report things because they don't understand the process within their agency of reporting things, or they won't report things because they don't think they have to.[259]

Mr Easton suggested there had been an uptick in such notifications since the establishment of our Commission of Inquiry.

Mr Kinmond, reflecting on his former role as New South Wales Deputy Ombudsman (Human Services) with responsibilities for a reportable conduct scheme, told us the absence of complaints should be a source of concern for a regulator:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: [W]e can take it as read that the society that we live in has a problem with child sexual abuse and so, if it's not being reported, that itself indicates that something needs to happen?
> A [Mr Kinmond]: Absolutely, or if it has been reported and things aren't being handled appropriately, then the community would take a very dim view of an oversight body failing to act.[260]

We consider there is a lack of clarity about respective roles and responsibilities for oversight bodies as they relate to the safety of children in organisations. This makes it difficult for members of the public—including children, young people and their parents—to understand where they can make a complaint or seek help if they have concerns about their treatment within organisations. It renders the complaints process dependent on the judgment of the oversight bodies.

5.2 A new Commission for Children and Young People

As foreshadowed, we consider it is important that the prevention and management of child sexual abuse is overseen by a body with specialist skills in, and knowledge of, children's rights and safety. We consider a new Commission for Children and Young People in Tasmania—with appropriate independence, powers and resourcing—would achieve a clearer and more cohesive system of oversight of children's safety than exists currently.

It is not clear whether the Tasmanian Government has contemplated the establishment of a Commission for Children and Young People with expanded powers and responsibility for monitoring and oversight of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework. While the Tasmanian Government has announced and made some progress towards appointing a new Independent Regulator, we consider these functions should ultimately be performed by the new Commissioner for Children and Young People.

The Commission for Children and Young People would subsume the current functions of the Commissioner for Children and Young People, which are to:

- advocate for all children and young people in Tasmania
- act as advocate for children and young people in youth detention
- research, investigate and influence policy development on matters relating to children and young people generally
- promote, monitor and review the wellbeing of children and young people generally
- promote and empower the participation of children and young people in the making of decisions, or the expressing of opinions on matters, that may affect their lives

- help ensure the State satisfies its national and international obligations regarding children and young people generally
- encourage and promote the establishment by organisations of appropriate and accessible mechanisms for the participation of children and young people in matters that may affect them
- perform any other prescribed functions.[261]

However, the Commission for Children and Young People would also have several new and expanded functions to support recommendations in other parts of our report. In Chapters 9 and 12, we examine the oversight of the out of home care and youth detention systems respectively. In those chapters, we discuss oversight functions exercised regarding individual children in out of home care and youth detention, and, more broadly, regarding the out of home care and youth detention systems.

Regarding individuals, we distinguish between advocacy on behalf of an individual child—including visiting a child in out of home care or youth detention, assisting them to raise any concerns about their experiences and seeking resolution of those concerns—and the formal investigation of a complaint made by a child or young person about out of home care or youth detention. We also consider systemic advocacy by oversight bodies—for example, making recommendations to government to improve the out of home care and youth detention systems.

In Chapters 9 and 12, we make several recommendations to improve individual advocacy for children in out of home care and youth detention, and to strengthen oversight of those systems. We recommend (among other matters):

- establishing a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People to advocate for Aboriginal children and young people in out of home care and youth detention, and more broadly (Recommendation 9.14)
- establishing an independent community visitor scheme for children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities (Recommendations 9.34 and 12.36)
- establishing an independent Child Advocate to advocate on behalf of children and young people in out of home care and youth detention, with the power to make a complaint to the Ombudsman on behalf of a child or young person in out of home care or youth detention, and to apply to the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal to review departmental decision-making in relation to a child in out of home care (Recommendations 9.33, 9.34 and 9.35)
- expanding external monitoring and oversight of the out of home care and youth justice systems (Recommendations 9.38 and 12.38).

In addition to the current functions of the Commissioner for Children and Young People set out here, the functions of the new Commission for Children and Young People would therefore include:

- educating relevant entities on the Child and Youth Safe standards, overseeing and enforcing compliance with those standards and related functions under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, with reference to the Victorian child safe organisational framework and underlying legislative framework[262]
- administering, overseeing and monitoring the Reportable Conduct Scheme and related functions under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act with reference to the Victorian child safe organisational framework and underlying legislative framework[263]
- administering the independent community visitor scheme for children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities (Recommendations 9.34 and 12.36)
- advocating for individual children in out of home care and youth detention, including supporting children to make complaints to the Ombudsman and (for children in out of home care) to apply for an independent review of departmental decision-making (Recommendations 9.35 and 9.36)
- monitoring the operation of the out of home care and youth justice systems and the provision of out of home care and youth justice services to children, by analysing data on those systems regularly provided by the Department for Education, Children and Young People and conducting own motion systemic inquiries into aspects of those systems and/or the services received by an individual child or group of children in those systems (Recommendations 9.38 and 12.38)
- recommending improvements to government for the out of home care and youth justice systems
- promoting the participation of children in the out of home care and youth justice systems in decision-making that affects their lives
- upholding and promoting the rights of children in the out of home care and youth justice systems.

The new Commission for Children and Young People should have all powers necessary for it to perform these functions.

We also make some specific recommendations relating to oversight bodies in particular organisational contexts across our report. This includes recommendations relating to strengthening and clarifying the role of the Teachers Registration Board (refer to Chapter 6).

In the next section, we outline the key statutory roles required to support the new Commission for Children and Young People, the need to clarify regulatory and advocacy roles, and several measures to ensure the independence of the new Commission from government.

5.3 Statutory roles

Legislation establishing the new Commission for Children and Young People should provide for the appointment by the Governor of three statutory roles, each for a term of five years:

- Commissioner for Children and Young People, who would also be the Independent Regulator of the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme
- Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People (recommended in Chapter 9)
- Child Advocate (Deputy Commissioner) (recommended in Chapter 9).

As is currently the case for the Commissioner for Children and Young People, the legislation should permit the reappointment of a person appointed to any of the above roles for a further five-year term.[264]

We note there are different models in Australian jurisdictions for establishing a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People. For example, in Victoria, the Commission for Children and Young People Act 2012 (Vic) establishes a Commission for Children and Young People, which is constituted by the 'Principal Commissioner'. The Principal Commissioner has all the functions and powers of the Commission.[265] The Victorian Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People is appointed by the Governor in Council as an 'additional Commissioner' under that Act but does not have separate statutory functions or powers.[266] The Principal Commissioner may delegate relevant functions and powers to an additional Commissioner.[267]

In practice, the activities of the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People relating to Aboriginal children are led by the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, however the Commissioners consult each other on 'key policy or strategic issues'.[268] Ms Buchanan and the former Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, Justin Mohamed, have previously expressed the view that the Victorian legislation should include clearly defined functions and powers for the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People.[269]

In South Australia, the Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People are appointed under the Children and Young People (Oversight and Advocacy Bodies) Act 2016 (SA), and each has their own separate legislated functions and powers.[270] These include the power to employ staff.[271]

A 2021 report of Western Australia's parliamentary Joint Standing Committee on the Commissioner for Children and Young People noted the potential for duplication and overlap with the South Australian model.[272] The committee did not recommend adopting the South Australian model, but suggested features of the South Australian legislation 'may be worth exploring' in the event of implementation of an Aboriginal children's commissioner in Western Australia.[273] We agree that the Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People should work together and avoid duplication.

As outlined in Chapter 9, we recommend the role of Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People be given its own, clearly defined statutory functions and powers to promote the safety and wellbeing of Aboriginal children. These functions and powers should be equivalent to those of the Commissioner for Children and Young People. However, we acknowledge it would not be practical to vest regulatory functions regarding the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme in two separate statutory roles. We therefore recommend the regulatory functions of the new Commission for Children and Young People be the responsibility of the Commissioner for Children and Young People, although they should consult with the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People where appropriate.

A further question arises about the relationship between the new Child Advocate and the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People. In Chapter 9, we recommend the new Commission for Children and Young People be given the function of advocating for individual children in out of home care and youth detention, primarily through an independent community visitor scheme (Recommendation 9.34). Under this scheme, independent community visitors would regularly visit children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities, help them raise any concerns they may have with the Department for Education, Children and Young People, and seek to have those concerns resolved on the child's behalf. We also recommend appointing at least one Aboriginal visitor, who would be available to visit Aboriginal children in out of home care and youth detention where possible.

In Chapter 9, we also recommend the individual advocacy function of the new Commission for Children and Young People be supported by a small number of legally trained child advocacy officers, who would be available to help children in out of home care or youth detention with more complex matters or concerns, such as applying for a review of a departmental decision about out of home care (Recommendation 9.36). The new Child Advocate would be responsible for appointing community visitors and child advocacy officers and administering these programs.

Given the substantial over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care and youth detention (refer to Chapters 9 and 12), it would be extremely beneficial for Aboriginal children in those systems to have access to a senior Aboriginal person to advocate on their behalf. The South Australian Guardian for Children and Young People, Penny Wright, told us that only an Aboriginal advocate can help foster strong connection to culture and identity for Aboriginal children in custody in a meaningful way.[274] Accordingly, in addition to the appointment of Aboriginal visitors, we recommend the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People undertakes individual advocacy for Aboriginal children in out of home care or youth detention who request the Commissioner's assistance.

Recommendation 18.6

1. The Tasmanian Government should establish a statutory Commission for Children and Young People, which includes the following roles, each appointed for a term of five years:
    a. a Commissioner for Children and Young People
    b. a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People
    c. a Child Advocate (Deputy Commissioner).
2. The Commission for Children and Young People should, in addition to the functions of the current Commissioner for Children and Young People under the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016, have the following functions:
    a. educating relevant entities on the Child and Youth Safe Standards and overseeing and enforcing compliance with those standards as Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023
    b. administering the Reportable Conduct Scheme as Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023
    c. administering the independent community visitor scheme for children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities (Recommendations 9.34 and 12.36)
    d. advocating for individual children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities
    e. monitoring the operation of the out of home care and youth justice systems and the provision of out of home care and youth justice services to children (Recommendations 9.38 and 12.38)
    f. conducting inquiries into the out of home care and youth justice systems and the services provided to individual children in those systems, including own motion inquiries (Recommendations 9.38 and 12.38)

g. making recommendations to government for out of home care and youth justice system improvements

h. promoting the participation of children in out of home care and youth justice in decision making that affects their lives

i. upholding and promoting the rights of children in the out of home care and youth justice systems.

3. The Commission for Children and Young People should have all necessary powers to perform its functions.

5.4 Separation of regulatory and advocacy functions

As outlined earlier, the new Commission would have individual advocacy functions for vulnerable children, and systemic monitoring and oversight functions for the out of home care and youth justice systems, as well as being responsible for administering the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

As discussed, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People regulates organisations subject to the Child Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme, while also undertaking systemic monitoring and oversight functions in relation to the out of home care and youth justice systems. While it does not have an explicit individual advocacy function under its enabling legislation, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People administers an independent community visitor program for children in youth justice centres.[275] It also has an arrangement whereby children in youth justice centres can contact the Commission for Children and Young People directly via the Youth Justice telephone system to raise concerns.[276] In practice, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People undertakes individual advocacy for children in custody.

In addition, in June 2022, the Victorian Government introduced a Bill to confer power on the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People to advocate for individual children in out of home care or in contact with the child protection system.[277] This suggests that there is no inherent obstacle to a single body undertaking advocacy for individual children, performing systemic monitoring and oversight functions, and administering Child Safe Standards and a reportable conduct scheme.

Still, we acknowledge there may appear to be a tension or conflict between the performance of individual advocacy functions and regulatory functions by a single entity. For example, a situation may arise in which the new Commission for Children and Young People is undertaking advocacy on behalf of a child in out of home care who is the subject of a reportable allegation and, at the same time, monitoring the investigation of that allegation. Commissioner McLean indicated that if the Tasmanian Commissioner for Children and Young People was tasked with the oversight and administration of Child Safe Standards and a reportable conduct scheme, there would be a need to consider 'the appropriateness or otherwise of the Commissioner retaining an individual advocacy role' for children in youth detention.[278]

However, we consider this tension could be overcome by ensuring:

- functions in respect of the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme are performed by the Commissioner for Children and Young People, supported by a separate regulatory team within the Commission for Children and Young People
- individual advocacy functions for children in out of home care and youth detention are performed by the new Child Advocate and (where Aboriginal children are concerned) the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, supported by independent community visitors and child advocacy officers.

5.5 The importance of independence

The United Nations' Paris Principles for establishing national human rights organisations require such organisations to be independent of government.[279] The Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016 ('Commissioner for Children and Young People Act)' requires the Commissioner for Children and Young People to act 'independently, impartially and in the public interest' when performing a function or exercising a power, 'unless otherwise specified'.[280]

Ms Buchanan observed that independence was crucial for her role as Principal Commissioner of the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People:

> I simply can't imagine performing my regulatory functions to improve child safety without that independence. My role, both as an oversight body in terms of youth justice and out of home care, but also in terms of a regulator of organisations to improve child safety often requires that I am having to consider what powers I have at hand, I'm having to engage and persuade, but ultimately I'm having to make decisions about, if an organisation is not doing what I think needs to be done, what the law and certain standards require, then my independence means that I can make a clear objective decision about what powers and functions might need to be exercised: that's what independence means to me.[281]

Ms Buchanan also referred to the inherent tension involved in maintaining 'good, open but robust' relationships with the bodies regulated by the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People, but taking action where a risk to a child or children requires it:

> … I cannot imagine overlooking an issue for the sake of a relationship; I need to be able to kind of engage constructively, collaboratively, work with organisations and leaders of organisations, but that only works if there's a mutual respect for our roles and if, to be frank, the organisation with which I'm working understands that at any point I may need to take some stronger and more formal action; that's kind of the way that I work.
> … all of our work really, whether it's oversight work or our regulatory work, is risk-based, so we kind of assess how significant is the risk, what are the issues for either the individual child or children more broadly, and we make our decisions on what action is needed based very much on that.[282]

Similarly, Mr Kinmond told us:

> And so, there is that aspect of being in no doubt that whilst on the one hand you seek to facilitate and work in a constructive relationship with bodies with a common aim of protecting children, your calling, your responsibility, is to act always in the public interest, and the moment you lose sight of that you probably should go and find employment elsewhere.[283]

We were impressed by the level of independence clearly shown in such comments.[284]

We also heard about the importance of adequate resourcing to support the independence of regulatory and oversight bodies. South Australian Guardian for Children and Young People, Penny Wright, told us the legislative independence of her roles as Guardian and Training Centre Visitor can be constrained if adequate resources are not provided to fulfil the statutory functions of those offices.[285] Similarly, Mr Kinmond commented that without institutional independence, and sufficient powers and resourcing to enable an integrity body to carry out its statutory functions, its aims are likely to go largely unrealised.[286]

Kim Backhouse, Chief Executive Officer, Foster and Kinship Carers Association, observed the role of Tasmanian Commissioner for Children and Young People has been 'a chequered portfolio' in the past, as it has been held by individuals from interstate who have 'clashed with the government'.[287] The role has been held by 10 individuals (including Commissioner McLean) since it was first established in 2000.[288]

Andrea Sturges, Chief Executive Officer, Kennerley Children's Homes, expressed the view that the Commissioner for Children and Young People 'should not be a political appointment'.[289] While we are aware some initial concerns were expressed at the time of Commissioner McLean's appointment about the appropriateness of an individual moving from a political role to an independent statutory office, the Commissioner indicated she had not experienced political interference during her term.[290]

Former Commissioner for Children and Young People, Mark Morrissey, told us that in 2017 he was asked to 'back off' advocating for changes at Ashley Youth Detention Centre by a senior government politician, and to 'cease writing' to the then Minister for Child Protection by a senior member of the Minister's staff.[291] According to Mr Morrissey, this appeared to be a request to change his relationship with the Minister and Parliament, to instead direct correspondence through the Department.[292]

Mr Morrissey also referred to 'several subtle factors' that can bring pressure to bear on the independence of the role of Commissioner for Children and Young People.[293] These include the Department delaying recruitment to staff vacancies and applying efficiency dividends, which Mr Morrissey described as 'turn[ing] the resourcing tap down, by increments and delay'.[294] He also observed that relying on the Department for human resources, information technology, finance and other corporate support can limit the efficacy of the role and may create 'real or perceived conflicts of interest', whereby the Commissioner for Children and Young People is required to hold to account the Department it relies on for operational support.[295] The Integrity Commission agreed with this observation, telling us '[a]s a small agency, it is inevitable that we be reliant on administrative and technological support from another department, and we are not sufficiently resourced to operate otherwise'.[296]

Ms Buchanan highlighted the importance of operational independence, observing that:

> I, as the Commissioner, need to be able to make decisions about the source of advice, make decisions about how I and we at the Commission approach our legislative functions. I need to make decisions, as I can, about who I employ, they need to be my employees, not employees of a department, all of those are very important aspects to my independence and my ability to perform my role.[297]

5.6 Transparency of statutory appointments

In Western Australia, the Governor appoints the Commissioner for Children and Young People on the recommendation of the Premier.[298] Before making a recommendation for appointment, the Premier must:

- advertise throughout Australia for expressions of interest from people with professional qualifications and substantive experience in matters affecting children
- consult with the leader of any political party that has at least two members in either house of parliament.[299]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2006 (WA) also specifies that children and young people must be involved in the selection process.[300] We understand this requirement could be met through having a children's selection panel, as well as an adult selection panel, for example.

We note that the process for appointment of the Chief Commissioner of the Tasmanian Integrity Commission by the Governor requires the Attorney-General to consult first with the Joint Standing Committee on Integrity of the Tasmanian Parliament.[301] This is a multi-party committee comprising three members of the Legislative Council and three members of the House of Assembly, required to be appointed at the commencement of the first session of each parliament.[302]

The Integrity Commission Act also provides for the appointment of a chief executive officer of the Integrity Commission by the Governor on the recommendation of the Premier, following consultation with the Joint Standing Committee on Integrity.[303]

We recommend further safeguards to the integrity of appointments to the new Commission for Children and Young People, as described below.

Recommendation 18.7

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the process for appointing future Commissioners and Deputy Commissioners for Children and Young People adopts the following:

a. future Commissioners and Deputy Commissioners be appointed following an externally advertised merit-based selection process to ensure they have relevant professional qualifications and substantive experience in matters affecting vulnerable children

b. the recruitment process for these roles include a non-partisan adult selection panel with at least one member external to the Tasmanian State Service, and a separate children's selection panel

c. the adult and children's selection panels for the role of Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People have a majority of Aboriginal members

d. before making a recommendation to the Governor for an appointment to the Commission for Children and Young People, the Minister be required to consult with the leader of any political party with at least two members in Parliament.

5.7 Funding and employment of staff

According to the Paris Principles, a national human rights organisation must have adequate funding to enable it to have its own staff and premises, and not be 'subject to financial control which might affect its independence'.[304] It is essential that the new Commission for Children and Young People receives enough funding to enable it to perform its various functions.

The funding allocated to the Commissioner for Children and Young People for 2021–22 was $1,386,000.[305] Commissioner McLean told us her budget flowed through the former Department of Communities, rather than being a separate appropriation.[306] In contrast, the Ombudsman, Mr Connock, told us he had a separate appropriation for funding and was therefore in control of his own budget, which was 'helpful'.[307] The Office of the Ombudsman has a service-level agreement with the Department of Justice for the provision of human resources and information technology support.[308]

As outlined in Chapter 9, Commissioner McLean told us that resourcing constraints have limited her ability to fulfil her current functions.[309] In particular, she told us in April 2022, the resourcing of her office seriously limited her ability to undertake 'own motion' investigations or inquiries.[310] Despite this, in December 2022, Commissioner McLean announced she would undertake an own motion investigation into the allocation of child safety officers for children in out of home care in Tasmania, under the new out of home care case management model.[311] Commissioner McLean told us that the decision to undertake an own motion investigation was 'not made lightly' as it diverted resources from and delayed other core reporting, research and advisory activities of her office.[312]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People Act provides that a person may be employed under the State Service Act 2000 ('State Service Act') 'for the purpose of enabling the Commissioner to perform his or her functions' under the Act.[313] A person so employed may serve the Commissioner for Children and Young People in any capacity 'in conjunction with State Service employment'.[314] Commissioner McLean told us this 'creates an inherent conflict', as her staff are State Service employees employed to implement the Government's policies and programs, while the Commissioner 'sometimes communicates different policy views to those of the Government'.[315] In April 2022, Commissioner McLean told us she was supported by nine staff with several new positions recently established but not yet filled.[316]

It is not clear that having staff who are State Service employees necessarily creates a conflict for a regulatory or oversight body. Staff of the Tasmanian Integrity Commission and Ombudsman are appointed in line with the State Service Act.[317] Similarly, staff of the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People are employed under the Public Administration Act 2004 (Vic), while staff of the Queensland Family and Child Commission are employed under the Public Service Act 2000 (Qld).[318]

Ms Wright told us the funding for the South Australian Guardian for Children and Young People comes from the Department of Education, and her staff are Department of Education employees rather than employees of the Department of Child Protection.[319] She described this as 'a very effective arrangement' as 'a conflict of interest could well arise if the overseen body is determining the funding and employment arrangements of the oversight body'.[320] Ms Wright indicated it was 'not acceptable to have to rely on "goodwill" from the Departments or Ministers who are subject to … oversight'.[321]

In contrast, employees of the South Australian Commissioner for Children and Young People and Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People are deemed not to be public service employees, other than for the purposes of the Public Sector (Honesty and Accountability) Act 1995 (SA).[322]

In our view, the new Commission for Children and Young People should be funded via separate appropriation, like the Ombudsman, rather than through the Department for Education, Children and Young People. The Commission for Children and Young People should have the power to control its own budget and hire its own staff. While we acknowledge Commissioner McLean's concerns about the status of her staff as State Service employees, we do not consider this would have a material bearing on the independence of the new Commission for Children and Young People, if the other protections that we recommend in this chapter were implemented. If human resource and information technology support are needed, this should be achieved through a service agreement with a department the Commission does not have a regulatory relationship with.

Recommendation 18.8

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Commission for Children and Young People is separately and directly funded, rather than through the Department for Education, Children and Young People. Any funding arrangements or conditions should be structured to ensure the Commission has power to control its budget and staffing.

5.8 Oversight of the new Commission for Children and Young People

In Western Australia, the work of the Commissioner for Children and Young People is monitored and examined by the Joint Standing Committee on the Commissioner for Children and Young People of the Western Australian Parliament, appointed under the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2006 (WA).[323] This committee comprises two members appointed by the Legislative Assembly and two members appointed by the Legislative Council.[324]

The functions of this committee are to:

- monitor, review and report to parliament on the exercise of the functions of the Western Australian Commissioner for Children and Young People

- examine the reports of the Western Australian Commissioner for Children and Young People
- consult regularly with the Western Australian Commissioner for Children and Young People.[325]

Similarly, in New South Wales, the Committee on Children and Young People—a parliamentary joint committee established under the Advocate for Children and Young People Act 2014 (NSW)—oversees the work of the Children's Guardian.[326] Mr Kinmond indicated it was useful for a regulatory body to report to a 'Parliamentary oversight body' as an 'important check and balance'.[327]

In Tasmania, the Integrity Commission, Ombudsman and Custodial Inspector—referred to in the Integrity Commission Act as 'integrity entities'—are monitored by the Joint Standing Committee on Integrity of the Tasmanian Parliament.[328] The functions of this committee are to:

- monitor and review the performance of the functions of integrity entities
- examine the annual reports or any other report of an integrity entity
- report to both houses of parliament on matters relevant to an integrity entity.[329]

To maximise independence, we consider the performance of the functions of the new Commission for Children and Young People should be monitored by a joint standing committee of the Tasmanian Parliament—whether by the Joint Standing Committee on Integrity or by another joint standing committee established for this purpose, as in Western Australia.

The Ombudsman and the Integrity Commission should have the power to receive and investigate complaints about the new Commission for Children and Young People as a 'public authority' under the Ombudsman Act 1978 ('Ombudsman Act') and the Integrity Commission Act respectively.[330]

Recommendation 18.9

A joint standing committee of the Tasmanian Parliament should oversee the performance and proper execution of functions of the Commission for Children and Young People.

6 Other oversight and regulatory bodies

While we expect the Commission for Children and Young People would be the primary gateway for child safety matters, we acknowledge there may be instances where complaints and concerns about how an organisation is working to protect children may fall within the jurisdiction of other oversight bodies—for example, where there is staff misconduct (Integrity Commission) or where there is a complaint about the administrative action of a public authority or a public interest disclosure (the Ombudsman).

While the Reportable Conduct Scheme will also ensure appropriate scrutiny and oversight of the management of child safety complaints in the most high-risk organisations in Tasmania, not all departments and organisations will be legally captured by these schemes where they are not directly involved with providing services to children. In addition, the Commission for Children and Young People may identify systemic concerns that fall outside its area of responsibility.

Even with a new Commission for Children and Young People with expanded functions, the Ombudsman would retain a role in investigating complaints about public authorities and public interest disclosures. The Integrity Commission would retain responsibility for promoting and enhancing standards of ethical conduct by public officers through education, dealing with and assisting public authorities in handling misconduct and making findings and recommendations regarding its investigations and inquiries. To achieve a cohesive and effective oversight system, we recommend greater clarity in how these bodies work together—and suggest that each should be proactive in encouraging any complaints or concerns that are within their powers to investigate and resolve. Once such complaints are received, these oversight bodies should work together seamlessly to achieve the best possible outcome that promotes the safety and wellbeing of children and young people—particularly through clear and enabling information sharing arrangements.

The Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme also plays a role in managing the risks posed by staff and volunteers in a range of organisational settings.

In this section, we discuss the roles and functions of these other integrity and oversight bodies and make recommendations for improvements. Regarding the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, we recommend statutory guidance on how they undertake an assessment of risk of harm.

6.1 Integrity Commission and Ombudsman

In Section 5.2, we propose a new Commission for Children and Young People that will support and oversee Tasmania's introduction of Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme. These measures will go a long way to reducing the need for recourse to other oversight bodies, such as the Ombudsman and Integrity Commission, as most matters relevant to children and young people will be within the remit of the new Commission. Organisations with the greatest risk factors for abuse will also be legislatively compelled under the Reportable Conduct Scheme to proactively notify the new Commission (as our recommended Independent Regulator) of any reportable complaints, which can then oversee and monitor the organisation's investigation and response to that complaint to ensure it is appropriate. This increased transparency and scrutiny (alongside the capacity building that will occur as the new Commission supports and guides organisations in their responses) will increase the integrity and quality of organisational responses over time. However, these other oversight bodies will still play a role in protecting the integrity and good administration of the State Service.

We hold concerns that oversight bodies have sometimes inappropriately referred matters back to departments to investigate complaints against them. While referring complaints back to an entity is standard practice, judgment must be exercised in deciding whether this is appropriate, and the oversight body should retain oversight of the department's subsequent actions.

The Integrity Commission told us it receives very few complaints about child sexual abuse.[331] Where it does so, it would generally liaise with Tasmania Police and would be unlikely to take further action if a police investigation were to occur, unless the complaint raised broader concerns, for example, relating to poor reporting structures or procedures.[332] We consider this appropriate, although note that in the future the complaint should also be referred to the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

However, in Chapter 14, we discuss the Integrity Commission's handling of a whistleblower complaint about Launceston General Hospital management's response to child safety concerns relating to a registered nurse, James Griffin. In that complaint, the Integrity Commission conducted an initial assessment before referring it to the Department of Health to investigate. This departmental investigation was ultimately undertaken by the human resources team led by an individual who had a direct conflict of interest. Despite some reservations, the Integrity Commission ultimately accepted this investigation (which we now know was flawed) without further action. In that chapter, we find the Integrity Commission's monitoring of the Department's response to the complaint was insufficient.

In Chapter 11, Case study 7 we discuss how in the mid-2010s the Office of the Ombudsman referred a serious complaint made by a detainee back to Ashley Youth Detention Centre for response, without adequate monitoring and oversight. While we were told this was an error, this example shows why appropriate independent oversight over youth detention is important.

We consider it important that the Integrity Commission and Ombudsman clarify (and publicise) the circumstances in which it will be appropriate for complaints related to child sexual abuse to be referred back to an agency, and when it is not. We consider this guidance should consider the following matters:

- the significance of the matter being alleged or complained about and the risks associated with that conduct
- the potential for actual or perceived conflicts of interest in the relevant department or agency
- the capacity of the department or agency to undertake a robust and quality investigation
- the risks associated with retribution and reprisal toward the complainant and of their anonymity being compromised
- public considerations, including the importance of preserving public confidence in Tasmania's integrity and oversight regime
- whether the complaint goes to matters relevant to multiple public authorities, which may benefit from a more global, systemic review by the entity.

Where possible, the Integrity Commission and Ombudsman should consult the complainant on the intended approach to managing the complaint (particularly if the oversight body wishes to send the complaint back to the relevant department or agency) to enable that individual to give their views on the suitability of this approach. This is particularly important if the complainant is seeking to maintain anonymity or is fearing reprisal.

Recommendation 18.10

1. The Integrity Commission and Ombudsman should develop a publicly available policy for complaints related to child sexual abuse which explains the circumstances in which complaints may be referred back to the agency that is the subject of the complaint for investigation.
2. The Integrity Commission and Ombudsman should consult the complainant on the intended approach to handling the complaint, including referring the complaint back to the relevant agency.

The Reportable Conduct Scheme will not capture all departments and organisations, which may leave a role for the Integrity Commission in overseeing the management of allegations of child sexual abuse in some situations. The Integrity Commission told us that currently, public authorities are not required to notify the Integrity Commission when they are responding to an allegation of misconduct (including serious misconduct). This means it 'may not be aware of matters involving child sexual abuse'.[333] Recommendation 11 of the Independent Five Year Review of the Integrity Commission Act 2009 requires public authorities to notify the Integrity Commission of any allegations of serious misconduct.[334] The Integrity Commission advocated the Tasmanian Government implement this recommendation.[335] We agree this should occur, where the agency does not have an obligation to notify the Commission for Children and Young People of the allegation under the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

Recommendation 18.11

The Tasmanian Government should implement Recommendation 11 of the Independent Reviewer's 2016 Report Independent Review of the Integrity Commission Act 2009, which would oblige public authorities to notify the Integrity Commission of any allegations of serious misconduct.

6.2 Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme

Registration to work with vulnerable people requirements are an important regulatory safeguard, as they provide for screening and monitoring of staff or volunteers who work with vulnerable people, including children. Tasmania requires individuals undertaking certain 'regulated activities', including a range of services to children (such as health, education and youth justice), to hold registration to work with vulnerable people.[336]

The importance of the role of the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme cannot be overstated. Although their office is small, it is pivotal to the administrative structures designed to protect children against sexual abuse. Any comments in this section should not be seen as criticism of the Registrar or the staff of their office.

6.2.1 Opportunities for reform

The former Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme ('Registrar'), Peter Graham, told us in his statement that, as at 31 July 2022, there were 147,878 people who held registration.[337] Since establishing the scheme in 2014, there have been 2,204 people who have had their application for registration rejected (or have withdrawn their application after past conduct was queried), with a further 397 people having surrendered their registration (or having had it suspended or cancelled) in response to information reported to the Registrar.[338]

However, Mr Graham told us there were opportunities to strengthen the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme:

- ensuring a consistent understanding of reporting and notification requirements to make certain the Registrar receives information relevant to their decision making[339]
- all State Service agencies undertaking a systemic review of past complaints or investigations[340]
- amending the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 ('Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act') to enable determinations to suspend or cancel registration to be the subject of review by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal[341]
- creating statutory guidance regarding the power of the Registrar to suspend a person's registration.[342]

We heard that the Registrar is not consistently receiving information relevant to their decision-making, including from Child Safety Services.[343] Mr Graham said he was, however, optimistic about the ability of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework to help reinforce the obligations of agencies and other organisations to report behaviour.[344]

Mr Graham told us that he considered it 'likely' that a systematic review by State Service agencies of past complaints or investigations would reveal information that should be reported to the Registrar.[345] In Chapter 11, we discuss examples of departments (including the Department of Justice and the former Department of Communities) not consistently reporting allegations of child sexual abuse received about current or former Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff. For this reason, we recommend in Chapter 12 an independent audit of past complaints and redress claims to ensure the Registrar has all relevant information they need to assess risk.

The Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act requires that applications for the review of any decision or determination by the Registrar be made to the Administrative Appeals Division of the Magistrates Court.[346] Mr Graham told us he would support change to enable determinations to suspend or cancel registration be reviewed by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal.[347] We agree with this suggestion.

The Tribunal was created after the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act was introduced and we consider that its expertise in administrative law and its ability to provide appropriately qualified members to hear reviews makes it a more appropriate jurisdiction than the Magistrates Court for administrative reviews of determinations under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act.[348] The introduction of a tribunal review process would also make Tasmania's approach consistent with that of other states and territories.[349]

Accordingly, we recommend that the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act be amended so that administrative reviews under the Act are undertaken by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, instead of the Administrative Appeals Division of the Magistrates Court. Any legislative amendment should also require Tribunal members hearing administrative reviews of decisions under the Act to have the knowledge, skills, experience and aptitude to deal with each matter, including in relation to child sexual abuse, neglect and family violence.

We are aware that, where an applicant applies for a review of a determination of the Registrar to suspend, refuse or cancel their registration under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act, there may be no person who opposes that application, whether the application is in the Magistrates Court or the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal. We did not examine this issue in detail, and we are not making a formal recommendation about it. It is unclear to us whether the Registrar should be empowered to argue for such refusal, suspension or cancellation. This, however, may be an area where consideration could be given to providing a child affected by the registration, that child's representative, the Commission for Children and Young People or a government agency the authority to intervene and oppose such review applications.

In Chapter 11, we find that occasionally, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme adopted too high an evidentiary threshold in assessing whether Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff with allegations against them posed an unacceptable risk to children. Mr Graham also told us there is a lack of statutory guidance regarding the power of the Registrar to suspend a person's registration. The Registrar is required to conduct an additional risk assessment of a registered person if they believe, on reasonable grounds, there is 'new, relevant information about that person'.[350] The Registrar is also empowered to suspend a person's registration while this risk assessment is undertaken, but there is no guidance on when and how that action should be taken.[351] Mr Graham told us he generally reserved this suspension power for situations where the new and additional information would likely prevent registration (for example, relating to a relevant criminal offence) or where he formed the view that the person posed an unacceptable risk and a suspension was justified while the cancellation process took place.[352]

The suspension of registration to work with vulnerable people can provide grounds for the termination of employment and Mr Graham reported that, at times, the Registrar has been pressured by agencies to suspend a person who is subject to an additional risk assessment.[353] Mr Graham accepted sometimes this was a desirable outcome but also often meant that employment direction investigations may cease before completion.[354] Mr Graham told us:

> The existence of such a power, the absence of clear legal test and the lack of appeal mechanism has caused confusion and had unintended behavioural responses from agencies.[355]

In Chapter 20, we discuss a tendency by departments to prefer managing concerns about conduct of staff through Employment Direction No. 6—Inability, which allows for a determination that an employee is unable to perform their duties because of a loss of registration, instead of managing concerns by conducting misconduct investigations.

We also discussed the response of the Registrar to information received about staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in Chapter 11. While we accept the Registrar was often working with limited or incomplete information, we saw examples of what we consider a high evidentiary threshold adopted in relation to suspensions. We make a finding in that case study that, on occasion, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme appeared to adopt too high an evidentiary threshold in assessing whether staff at the Centre with allegations against them posed an unacceptable risk to children.

The Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act is clear that the Registrar's assessment of whether a person poses an unacceptable risk to vulnerable persons is a predictive exercise to assess future risk to vulnerable persons, based on known facts and present circumstances.[356] Such an assessment does not need to be based on proof of previous harm to vulnerable persons. For example, the Registrar may consider a past allegation of child sexual abuse in their assessment despite not having substantiated, or being able to substantiate, that that allegation occurred 'on the balance of probabilities'.[357]

The broader understanding of a risk assessment under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act is supported by the Second Reading Speech for the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Bill which became the Act, which states that the Bill provides for a:

> … broader basis on which to conduct background checking that includes a person's criminal history, non-conviction information, relevant offences and other pertinent information.[358]

The concept of risk assessment and its predictive nature is not novel. It involves the evaluation of the likelihood of an event occurring, alongside gauging the magnitude of harm which may occur if the event occurs. The Registrar should decrease their threshold to determine whether to exercise their power under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act to refuse or cancel registration as the risk that a person poses to vulnerable persons increases. That threshold should be lowered further in relation to a suspension of registration to protect vulnerable persons who may be at risk of harm while a comprehensive assessment of risk is undertaken.

We recommend that the Tasmanian Government provides the Registrar with guidelines for how risk assessments should be conducted. We further recommend that the Act be amended to provide that the principles outlined by the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia in the case named Isles and Nelissen regarding risk assessments be applied by the Registrar in determinations of risk relating to registration, suspension and cancellation of registration under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act.[359] That case considered the test relating to unacceptable risk under the Commonwealth Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). It referred to:

> ...two separate questions ... on the one hand, whether or not allegations of abuse are proven on the balance of probabilities; and on the other, whether or not an unacceptable risk of harm is demonstrated, regardless of the finding made in respect of the frank allegations of abuse.[360]

That decision further held that the 'tendency rule has no work to do when assessing risk'.[361] This means the decision maker should not be precluded from considering evidence that might suggest a tendency of a person to abuse when assessing risk.

In Chapter 11, we also discuss instances where the Registrar had formed negative views about the complainants or sources of information to his office (in that instance, former detainees), including in some instances that complainants colluded or were financially motivated in seeking redress.[362] While we accept the Registrar is entitled and indeed required to apply judgment and discretion when assessing and weighing information, we consider it beneficial for this to be clearly guided by statute to limit the risks of personal value judgments (some of which may be based on myths and misconceptions or reflect societal stigma) in making assessments relating to child safety.

Recommendation 18.12

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation or regulations to provide statutory guidance to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme on the factors to be considered when conducting risk assessments in respect of applications for registration, suspension or cancellation pursuant to the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013.
2. The statutory guidance should provide that (among other things):
    a. the assessment of unacceptable risk is a predictive exercise that is not necessarily capable of empirical proof nor subject to a particular standard of proof such as 'the balance of probabilities'
    b. the assessment of unacceptable risk of harm to a child or children requires determination of two separate questions, without conflation, namely
        i. whether or not an allegation or allegations of previous harm to vulnerable people are proven on the balance of probabilities, and

ii. whether or not an unacceptable risk of harm is demonstrated regardless of whether there is a finding, on the balance of probabilities, that previous harm occurred

c. the Registrar is not limited in the factors they can consider in assessing unacceptable risk, including information that suggests a person's tendency to cause harm, as the ultimate determination of unacceptable risk is a predictive exercise

d. when the Registrar is considering suspending a person's registration, the focus on the prospective risk that a person may pose to children should have a lower evidentiary threshold, noting further assessment will likely occur prior to a decision to cancel registration or otherwise

e. once the Registrar makes a determination that a person poses an unacceptable risk to a child or young person, irrespective of other factors (such as employment or mental health), that person's registration must be refused, suspended or cancelled (as the case may be).

Recommendation 18.13

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 and related statutory instruments to replace the Administrative Appeals Division of the Magistrates Court with the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal as the forum for administrative reviews of decisions under the Act.
2. The Tasmanian Government should:

    a. introduce legislation or regulations to require the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal to support Tribunal members who hear administrative reviews of decisions under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 to have the knowledge, skills, experience and aptitude to deal with each matter, including in relation to child sexual abuse, neglect and family violence

    b. provide sufficient funding to the Tribunal to support members to gain this knowledge, skills, experience and aptitude.

6.3 Coordinating oversight and regulation

As discussed, even with the establishment of the new Commission for Children and Young People, there will be instances where other bodies may need to assume responsibilities as they relate to child safety. For this reason, we recommend all these agencies work together to develop clear and user-friendly guidance describing their roles and responsibilities to help members of the public, and children and young people, to understand how they can raise concerns with these agencies and what to expect when they do. A single resource, including user friendly infographics, should be developed to support public understanding of the different roles and responsibilities of Tasmanian oversight bodies in relation to child safety. This includes reassurance and public commitment to a 'no wrong door' approach to complaints. This resource should be adapted for children and young people and form part of each agency's community education activities as they relate to promoting the safety of children and young people within Tasmanian organisations.

Recommendation 18.14

1. The Commission for Children and Young People, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Integrity Commission and the Ombudsman should work jointly to develop a user-friendly guide for the general public, which describes:
    a. how each of these agencies can assist with complaints and concerns about how organisations respond to child sexual abuse
    b. the process these agencies will adopt in responding to reports, complaints and concerns, including what outcomes these agencies are empowered to achieve
    c. how information provided by a person lodging a report, complaint or concern will be shared and managed
    d. that agencies are committed to a 'no wrong door' approach to complaints, so people are reassured that all reports, complaints and concerns will receive a response from an agency
    e. pathways for raising concerns about the way any of these agencies respond to reports, complaints or concerns.
2. A child and youth-friendly version of the guide should also be developed and should be publicised and distributed widely in schools, out of home care, youth justice and health settings.

3. Both guides should be available on each of the agencies' websites and form part of their child safety community education and engagement activities.
4. While the Commission for Children and Young People should be promoted as the key agency for receiving reports, complaints or concerns relating to conduct towards children, people should be able to raise reports, complaints or concerns with any of these agencies and these agencies should ensure the matter is appropriately referred (the 'no wrong door' approach).

6.4 Effective information sharing between oversight bodies

Effective information sharing is a crucial component of any child-centred system—not only to ensure risks to children and young people are effectively managed, but also to make certain responses by oversight or other agencies are clear and coordinated.

We examined the existing powers of the Commissioner for Children and Young People, Ombudsman and Integrity Commission to share information relevant to child safety, which we describe below:

- The Commissioner for Children and Young People is empowered to provide and request non-identifying information relating to a child or young person to and from an information-sharing entity.[363] An information-sharing entity may also, on its own initiative, provide the Commissioner with non-identifying information.[364] An 'information-sharing entity' is defined in the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act as having the same meaning as in the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997, and for our purposes includes a State Service officer or employee and other organisations providing health, disability and community services.[365] 'Non-identifying information' is defined as 'information in relation to a person that does not contain identifying details for the person or enable the identity of the person to be ascertained or discovered'.[366] An individual who provides this information does not breach professional standards or incur any criminal or civil liability.[367]
- The Ombudsman Act contains provisions that enable information disclosure. A person may disclose information to the Ombudsman's office where it relates to preliminary inquiries being made by the Ombudsman or to the making of a complaint or investigation by the Ombudsman.[368] The Ombudsman may also disclose information to a person exercising similar functions in another Australian jurisdiction, the Integrity Commission and the Custodial Inspector.[369] Protections are also available to the Ombudsman and its staff from criminal and civil proceedings for actions carried out in good faith under the Act.[370] There do not appear to be similar protections for complainants.

- The Integrity Commission Act contains provisions relating to referring and exchanging information. The Integrity Commission may refer a complaint to a public authority, integrity agency, Parliamentary integrity agency, the Commissioner of Police or any other person the Integrity Commission thinks appropriate for investigation and action.[371] 'Personal information custodians' are also authorised to disclose personal information to the Integrity Commission under the Personal Information Protection Act 2004.[372] The definitions provide that 'personal information custodians' include government agencies.[373]
- The Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act contains provisions allowing the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme to require a range of Tasmanian entities, as well as certain bodies outside Tasmania, with information it reasonably considers relevant to its powers and functions.[374] The Registrar is also empowered to disclose particular information to a registering authority or prescribed entity (for example, agencies within the meaning of the State Service Act and Tasmania Police).[375]

We heard there are no consistent formal arrangements for information sharing between the Commissioner of Children and Young People, the Ombudsman and the Integrity Commission, with the determination of who is best placed to deal with a particular complaint often managed on a case-by-case basis.[376] Mr Easton said the Integrity Commission has memoranda of understanding with various entities, including Tasmania Police and the Auditor-General. For information sharing between the Integrity Commission and the Ombudsman, Mr Connock and Mr Easton said they would generally resolve informally which of their agencies are best placed to manage a complaint where their interests intersect.[377] Mr Connock felt informal information-sharing arrangements worked well: 'So we have a good idea, having been doing it for a while, where things should go'.[378]

While we do not underestimate the benefit of informal and practical approaches to information sharing between agencies, we consider it a risk for information of such importance to be left to the experience and good judgment of individuals. This creates a risk that complaints or enquiries fall between the cracks where they do not neatly fit the definitions of this complex model, or they are considered in a fragmented or piecemeal manner by several entities, limiting the ability to give appropriate visibility to the risks to child safety posed overall. We consider there is benefit in the Ombudsman, Integrity Commission, Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the new Commission for Children and Young People to have clear and formalised information-sharing agreements to underpin their informal practices. This is particularly the case if the new Commission for Children and Young People receives oversight functions and powers under our recommendations and under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, which has extensive information-sharing provisions in Part 5.

Generally (and considering the views of a complainant), we consider:

- The Commission for Children and Young People should lead matters that relate to its responsibilities to monitor and enforce the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme for relevant organisations and its responsibilities to oversee and monitor incidents in the youth detention and out of home care systems.
- The Integrity Commission should lead the response to complaints about misconduct and serious misconduct by public officers (which may include child sexual abuse) that are not otherwise captured by the Commission for Children and Young People's functions (for example, relating to agencies that are not legislatively required to comply with Child and Youth Safe Standards or the Reportable Conduct Scheme).
- The Ombudsman should lead the management of formal individual complaints about the administrative actions of a public authority that do not constitute reportable allegations.
- The Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme should assess the suitability of individuals to work with, and alongside, children and young people. This assessment should be ongoing and subject to any additional information received about a registered individual.

Recommendation 18.15

The Commission for Children and Young People, the Integrity Commission, the Ombudsman and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme should develop a formal memorandum of understanding relating to the management and oversight of reports, complaints and concerns relating to child sexual abuse and information sharing. The memorandum of understanding should:

a. define the roles, responsibilities, functions and limitations of each agency and describe where these overlap or intersect

b. require consultation prior to the initiation of systemic reviews or inquiries where the subject of that inquiry relates to areas of common interest or intersecting functions

c. provide for permissive and enabling information-sharing practices that prioritise the safety and welfare of children for individual matters and ensure each party receives from others de-identified trend data necessary to perform its functions.

7 Conclusion

Our Commission of Inquiry has established that Tasmanian children and young people are not as safe as they could be within organisations tasked with their care—including schools, health services, out of home care and youth detention. We recommend addressing specific risks and problems we identified in those specific settings, but firmly consider the foundations of child safety within organisations needs to improve across the board.

The primary objective for organisations should be to prevent child sexual abuse occurring in the first place. We consider this is best achieved through a combination of strategies, which includes robust community-wide education about the dynamics and risk factors associated with sexual abuse. We recommend the Tasmanian Government continues to work with the Australian Government to maximise the benefit of national prevention initiatives and ensure they are fit for purpose in Tasmania. In our chapter on children in the education system, we recommended specific preventative programs targeting school students.

We also consider that organisations must be proactive in developing policies and practices that target the specific risks of sexual abuse that arise in their setting, and consider legislated Child and Youth Safe Standards to be the best mechanism to ensure this occurs and endures.

We accept that no child safe system will be perfect. For this reason, it is critical to have robust and transparent processes to ensure any complaints and concerns that arise within organisations are dealt with quickly and prioritise the safety and wellbeing of children and young people. Responding to child safety concerns is not easy. Organisations will benefit from guidance and support. To ensure this occurs, and to ensure the integrity of investigative processes, we consider a reportable conduct scheme—which ensures there is appropriate support and oversight into organisational responses to complaints or concerns—is also an essential element to improving safety for organisations with the most direct contact with children and young people.

Working in tandem, we consider these regulatory schemes will improve safety for Tasmanian children and young people and build community trust and confidence in processes to register complaints and concerns individuals may have about the safety of children.

Having an empowered, well-resourced and suitably skilled Independent Regulator will be integral to the success of these schemes. We heard from experts in Victoria and New South Wales about the factors that made those jurisdictions' implementation of Child Safe Standards and a reportable conduct scheme successful. We also learned about the necessary functions and features of an effective oversight body in the context of child safety.

We consider the best way to support Tasmanian organisations to be safe for children and to provide oversight and scrutiny to particularly high-risk groups (including those in the out of home care system and within youth detention) is for Tasmania to establish a new Commission for Children and Young People, with a broader suite of powers and functions than those of the current Commissioner for Children and Young People. We also recommend establishing a dedicated role to promote the interests, wellbeing and cultural safety of Aboriginal children and young people.

A new Commission for Children and Young People should assume the monitoring and oversight functions of the Independent Regulator for the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act. It should have specific powers to monitor and investigate concerns relating to the out of home care and youth justice systems. The new Commission should be fiercely independent, appropriately resourced and sufficiently empowered to lead genuine change across Tasmania. We make several recommendations directed at supporting this goal.

We consider the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme operating in tandem and overseen by a well-resourced and empowered Independent Regulator, will go a long way towards reducing the need for recourse to other oversight bodies, such as the Integrity Commission and the Ombudsman. However, these bodies may still play a role, particularly in addressing specific complaints and targeting broader systemic risk factors within organisations that can increase risks of abuse, particularly as they relate to misconduct, poor decision-making and tolerance for poor behaviour and practice. We consider it will likely increase the level and quality of information available to inform decisions of the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme. For this reason, we recommend the Ombudsman, Integrity Commission, Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and a new Commission for Children and Young People clarify and formalise their respective functions and information-sharing arrangements, and ensure these are clear to the community. We also recommend further clarifying the powers of the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme to suspend individuals when taking additional risk assessments relating to registered individuals.

We hope that over time, recourse to oversight bodies will be reduced, as organisations' proactive efforts to prevent abuse greatly reduce harm to children and ensure any complaints and concerns are managed quickly and effectively by the organisation at the earliest opportunity. We expect this to occur as Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme become more thoroughly embedded across Tasmanian organisations. However, we consider there will always be a need for oversight bodies to be vigilant to risks to child safety and responsive to concerns about managing those risks.

19 A coordinated approach

1 Introduction

An effective approach to preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse in institutions requires a coordinated and sustained commitment across government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies. In this chapter, we outline what we consider is needed to ensure there is a united approach to child safety issues across the Tasmanian Government. We recommend developing a child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan to:

- bring together an extensive reform agenda
- hold government, government funded agencies and statutory bodies to account for their responsibilities in implementing child sexual abuse reforms
- help victim-survivors and their families, the community, and government and non-government agencies understand what is being done to address child sexual abuse in Tasmania.

We also recommend strengthened leadership, accountability and governance mechanisms to oversee this strategy and action plan, which, among other things, will ensure children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse can inform government policy and reform work.

We also discuss the challenge of sharing information and coordination between agencies relating to child safety issues in Tasmania. We recommend any legislative barriers that hinder the sharing of information to protect the safety and wellbeing of children be identified and removed. To address cultural barriers to information sharing and further support responses to child safety issues, we also recommend the development of child safety information sharing, coordination and response guidelines that clearly set out the roles and responsibilities of agencies in responding to child safety concerns.

2 A fragmented system

As part of our inquiries, we asked the Tasmanian Government to describe its current service system—including services, initiatives, policies and procedures—related to preventing, identifying, reporting and responding to allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts.[1] Rather than receiving one coordinated response to this request that described the system across the whole of government, we received separate and varied responses from individual government departments including the:

- former Department of Communities, which produced a summary document and 109 attachments[2]
- former Department of Education (now the Department for Education, Children and Young People), which produced a summary document and 35 attachments[3]
- Department of Health, which produced a summary document and no attachments[4]
- Department of Justice, which produced a summary document and one attachment[5]
- Department of Police, Fire and Emergency Management, which produced a summary document and 18 attachments.[6]

Our observations following a review of these responses were that:

- they listed or summarised policy documents and initiatives without explaining how they intersected or operated in practice, which made it difficult for us to understand the linkages between policies or to situate initiatives within the Government's broader system response to child sexual abuse[7]
- most material referred to in the responses appeared to be directed towards child abuse and neglect more broadly, particularly familial abuse, and there was limited material within the responses that specifically contemplated child sexual abuse in institutional contexts

- a proportion of the material supplied as part of the responses, particularly policies, was past its stated review date or did not have a review date, so it was not clear whether the material remained operational, had been superseded by new material, or was no longer in use[8]
- some source material supplied as part of the responses was not signed or dated, which made it difficult for us to know whether particular documents had been executed and when they came into operation.[9]

Our concern extends beyond the format in which the information was provided. Our overall conclusion after reviewing the responses is that the Government could not clearly articulate a cohesive system for preventing, identifying, reporting and responding to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutions. Instead, it described elements of a service system without setting out how the system is intended to operate across the whole of government and intersect with other service systems, recognising the issues affecting children and young people do not occur in a silo and often cut across several portfolios.[10] We acknowledge that many of the policies Tasmanian Government departments initially produced to our Commission of Inquiry have since been or are being updated.

Leanne McLean, Commissioner for Children and Young People, expressed a similar view to ours, describing the features of Tasmania's current system response to institutional child sexual abuse as:

> … a disconnected patchwork of systems and processes which, despite their good intent, fail to provide an integrated and systemic approach to keeping children safer from abuse in institutional settings. The flow on effects of the current system are that navigation by the public and agencies is difficult, there is little to no coordination or communication between regulatory agencies and there is no central body with responsibility for systemic oversight.[11]

Similarly, in consultations where we asked what was working well in the system that responds to child sexual abuse, participants expressed frustration that there was no system, or that the system was not well coordinated.[12]

We outline in Chapter 2 what we understand to be the current system for responding to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts. It took considerable work on our part to decipher this system. As described in that chapter, we understand the system covers:

- organisations, including:
    - the Child Safety Service
    - Tasmania Police
    - Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme

- professional registration bodies, including:
    - Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency ('Ahpra')
    - Teachers Registration Board
- oversight bodies, including:
    - Commissioner for Children and Young People
    - Ombudsman
    - Integrity Commission
    - Auditor-General.

The system for responding to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts also encompasses sexual assault support services, the criminal justice system and the civil justice system, which includes the National Redress Scheme. Lastly, the system includes the processes through which specific government institutions—such as schools, out of home care, youth detention and health services—prevent, identify and respond to child sexual abuse.

3 Developing a child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan

In Chapter 2, we discussed several national strategies and frameworks relevant to child safety and child sexual abuse. We also identified Tasmanian strategies, frameworks and action plans that outline whole of government approaches to issues affecting children and young people, including their safety and wellbeing. These national and local strategies and frameworks should inform Tasmania's approach to child sexual abuse, including in government institutions. In this section, we outline the Tasmanian Government's current policy approach to child sexual abuse. We recommend a child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan be developed to bring together an extensive reform agenda, provide information and guidance to victim-survivors and their families and the community about what is being done by the Government to specifically address child sexual abuse in Tasmania, and to hold government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies to account for their responsibilities in implementing child sexual abuse reforms. As Kathrine Morgan-Wicks, Secretary, Department of Health, told us:

> Successful reform will require a multi-faceted and integrated response across Government, strong leadership, and clear governance and accountability on a whole of government level. Clear and consistent information and advice must be provided across government.[13]

These sentiments were echoed by Jan Shuard PSM, Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence:

> I consider that, to avoid reliance on a single person for change, responsibility for reform needs to go beyond ministers and portfolios or agencies and be driven by a 'whole of government' approach across institutional settings, culture, procedure and policy.[14]

As we have acknowledged elsewhere in our report, cultural change is central to protecting children from child sexual abuse in institutions and ensuring that if it occurs, it is responded to appropriately.

3.1 Tasmania's Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan

The Tasmanian Government's primary policy approach to child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours is its Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan. There have been three iterations of this plan since 2015:

- Safe Homes, Safe Families: Tasmania's Family Violence Action Plan 2015–2020[15]
- Safe Homes, Families, Communities: Tasmania's Action Plan for Family and Sexual Violence 2019–2022[16]
- Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 ('Survivors at the Centre').[17]

The first plan focused solely on family violence. However, the second and third iterations have included 'sexual violence', which is broadly defined in the following way:

> Sexual violence is a behaviour of a sexual nature directed towards a person that makes them feel uncomfortable, distressed or threatened, and to which they have not consented. Sexual violence includes a wide range of unwanted, non-consensual, traumatic and harmful sexual behaviours.
> Sexual violence includes sexual harassment, technology facilitated abuse, unwanted kissing or sexual touching, coercion, sexual assault including rape, child sexual abuse and child sexual exploitation, and stealthing (removal of a condom without consent).[18]

The family and sexual violence plans are accompanied by annual 'responding and reporting' reports, which outline key achievements under the plans.[19] There is also a practice guide, which primarily focuses on adult victim-survivors and perpetrators of family and sexual violence. The guide provides some information about support pathways for children and young people, mostly in relation to family violence.[20]

The Government has indicated the family and sexual violence plans address the implementation of many of the National Royal Commission's recommendations about responding to child sexual abuse in institutions and harmful sexual behaviours.[21]

The most recent plan, Survivors at the Centre, was released in November 2022. It represents the Government's response to the National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022–2032 ('National Family Violence Plan').[22]

3.2 Developing a strategy for child sexual abuse

Survivors at the Centre states it 'has been developed in the context of the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Response to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings' and that the 'Tasmanian Government is deeply committed to learning from the past, hearing the stories of victim-survivors, and ensuring that children and young people are safeguarded now and into the future'. However, our review of the plan and earlier iterations reveals that many of its actions do not specifically respond to or address child sexual abuse, child sexual abuse in institutional settings or harmful sexual behaviours.[23] Of the 38 actions in Survivors at the Centre, only the following actions appear to directly relate to child sexual abuse:

- Pilot the establishment of two Multidisciplinary Centres in the North and South of the State to provide survivor-centred, holistic and integrated responses to family and sexual violence.[24]
- Provide historic increased core funding to Tasmania's specialist family and sexual violence services with five-year contracts to enable funding certainty.[25]
- Effectively embed Respectful Relationships and Consent Education in Tasmanian schools and develop a suite of resources informed by key stakeholders and children and young people that builds understanding of consent, coercive control and grooming in the Tasmanian community.[26]
- Continue to deliver the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Program for children and young people.[27]
- Establish Tasmania's first victim-survivor advisory council, which will include victim-survivors of family and sexual violence and adults who may have experienced child sexual abuse as well as family and friends of victims who have lost their lives to family and sexual violence.[28]

Other actions that could affect the response to child sexual abuse, depending on how the action is interpreted, include:

- Expand the scope of the Safe Families Coordination Unit to undertake whole of government data coordination and integration for family and sexual violence.[29]
- Provide next generation technology and instruments for forensic scientists to ensure higher quality evidence for court proceedings, and increase capacity for storage of evidence, including sexual evidence kits.[30]
- Establish a family and sexual violence liaison service within the Tasmanian Health Service, which will provide Family Violence Liaison Officers statewide to support clients who identify as experiencing family and sexual violence to access services.[31]

- Investigate the establishment of a Tasmanian Family and Sexual Violence Peak to improve coordination of family and sexual violence services and advice on policy development and service design.[32]
- Continue to provide legal assistance to people experiencing family and sexual violence.[33]
- Deliver funding for community-based projects to support inclusion, access and equity to support diverse Tasmanians who experience barriers for accessing support for family and sexual violence.[34]
- Continue the Hearing Lived Experience 2022 Survey of Victim-Survivors of Family and Sexual Violence to inform implementation of the action plan and provide a comprehensive data set of victim-survivor experiences.[35]

Survivors at the Centre also commits to a program of measurement, evaluation and learning, which will be formalised into an Outcomes Framework that will be 'co-designed with victim-survivors, the family and sexual violence service system and community members, and will be delivered in the second year of [the] Action Plan'.[36] The current plan does not outline the governance arrangements in place to oversee the implementation of actions in the plan, despite such arrangements having appeared in an earlier iteration.[37]

In our view, Survivors at the Centre, in its current form, is not sufficiently targeted towards child sexual abuse, child sexual abuse in institutions and harmful sexual behaviours. It does not contemplate reform work the Government announced in response to our Commission of Inquiry, including:

- the Premier's priorities for action to keep children safe (also known as the Keeping Children Safer Actions that are summarised in Chapter 2)
- establishing the Child and Youth Safe Standards
- establishing the Reportable Conduct Scheme

These are key elements of a response to child sexual abuse in institutions.[38]

The plan also does not align with a contemporary understanding of child sexual abuse and family violence. The National Family Violence Plan acknowledged that 'many of the risk factors and experiences of child abuse and neglect align closely with violence against women and children'.[39] However, the National Family Violence Plan recognised the need for two distinct approaches to family violence and child sexual abuse because:

> Sexual violence perpetrated against children below the age of consent is child sexual abuse. Although these issues are interrelated, the Commonwealth's child sexual abuse response is covered by the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030. The drivers and impacts of child sexual abuse can be vastly different to those of adult sexual abuse, and they require different responses [emphasis is ours].[40]

As a result, the Australian Government has two separate approaches to these issues that sit side-by-side:

- National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022–2032
- National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030.[41]

This latter strategy encompasses all child sexual abuse, regardless of the context in which it occurs. We consider Tasmania should take a similar approach and develop its own child sexual abuse reform strategy. The Australian Childhood Maltreatment Study has shown the scale of the problem of child sexual abuse (including child sexual abuse in institutions) in Australia. This study found an overall national prevalence of child sexual abuse in Australia of 28.5 per cent, and a prevalence of child sexual abuse in Australia of 25.7 per cent among those surveyed who were aged 16–24.[42] We consider a standalone strategy is not only justified but warranted. We note that in developing a separate reform strategy to respond to child sexual abuse, Tasmania would model a best practice whole of government response to child sexual abuse for other states and territories in Australia.

Tasmania's child sexual abuse reform strategy should align with the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse and existing strategies and frameworks relating to children and young people that the Government has already developed. Taking this approach will provide information and guidance to victim-survivors and their families, the community and government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies on what is being done to address and respond to child sexual abuse, child sexual abuse in institutions and harmful sexual behaviours in Tasmania. It will ensure these agencies and statutory bodies meet their obligations. It will also ensure the different drivers associated with child sexual abuse (including in institutional settings) and harmful sexual behaviours are being appropriately addressed and are not lost within a much broader approach to family and sexual violence. Importantly, it will act as a safety net for the Government to be self-assured it has a coordinated whole of government approach to creating, monitoring and improving its response to child sexual abuse.

The Government has committed to an extensive reform agenda in relation to child sexual abuse in institutions. This reform agenda includes implementing:

- recommendations from the National Royal Commission
- recommendations from the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse
- Keeping Children Safer Actions
- recommendations from the Child Safe Governance Review of the Launceston General Hospital and Human Resources and the Launceston General Hospital Community Recovery Initiative
- recommendations from our Commission of Inquiry.[43]

These reforms should be captured in the child sexual abuse reform strategy.

This strategy should outline a 'theory of change', that is, the system for preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse that Tasmania is seeking to achieve, including the component parts of that system, how Tasmanians will know it is working, and the role of different reforms and recommendations in achieving the intended outcomes.

The strategy should address many of the matters we raise across our report or that are essential elements of a whole of government strategy. These elements include:

- identifying guiding principles
- ensuring empowerment of children
- defining key concepts
- addressing diversity
- outlining key reform agendas.

The development of the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan will benefit from consultation. In Chapter 21, we recommend establishing a peak body for the sexual assault service system. In developing the strategy and action plan, the Government should consult with the:

- peak body
- Premier's Youth Advisory Council
- adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group we recommend be established later in this chapter.

3.3 Developing an action plan for child sexual abuse reform

Implementing an extensive reform agenda requires coordinated planning and prioritisation across the whole of government.

Tim Cartwright APM, inaugural Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence from August 2016 until August 2019, told us that although there is often a degree of urgency to implementing recommendations after a royal commission, implementation must be undertaken in a way that is designed to 'build a path to sustainable change'.[44] A key step in this process is developing a detailed implementation plan.[45]

Mr Cartwright told us, in relation to implementing royal commission recommendations, it was important for an implementation plan to identify:

- intended completion dates for each recommendation
- the agency or government department responsible for each recommendation
- any milestones, dependencies and priority actions.[46]

Mr Cartwright said that in his role as the inaugural Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor, '[t]he absence of this information made it very difficult to report on progress against individual recommendations'.[47] We consider similar principles also apply to implementing a reform strategy.

Ms Shuard emphasised the importance of understanding the intended outcomes of proposed reforms and the various roles that many departments play in achieving those reforms:

> Reform requires the involvement of multiple agencies and departments. Implementing change is about everybody understanding how new elements fit into the overall existing system to achieve the desired outcomes. A whole lot of actions are required to make a specific recommendation work beyond just the specific reform. So there is a need to clearly identify and understand the intended outcomes.[48]

Mr Cartwright told us that responsibility for implementation 'is best given to agencies that have a track record in program delivery and implementation'.[49] Agencies allocated responsibility for implementing recommendations must have a track record for engaging stakeholders and the community, and be open to receiving scrutiny and criticism, including from an implementation monitor.[50]

In our view, the Tasmanian Government should develop a well-considered action plan that outlines how all the individual reforms comprising key reform initiatives identified in the child sexual abuse reform strategy, are to be prioritised for implementation over the short-, medium- and long-term. The action plan should consider the timeframes we propose for the implementation of our recommendations is Chapter 22. It should also assign responsibility for implementing the reforms to an agency and role holder, and include a transparent process for reporting against the implementation of recommendations. While we recognise the action plan may need to evolve over time due to changes in factors affecting the successful implementation of reform, at the outset, we consider it should contain several elements that we identify in Recommendation 19.1.

The child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan should be overseen and reviewed under a strong governance structure, which includes representation from children and young people and victim-survivors of child sexual abuse (refer to Recommendation 19.5). The Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor we recommend in Chapter 22 (refer to Recommendation 22.1) should monitor the Government's progress against the strategy and action plan.

1. The Tasmanian Government should develop a whole of government child sexual abuse reform strategy for preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse, including child sexual abuse in institutions and harmful sexual behaviours. The strategy should:

    a. describe the system that Tasmania seeks to achieve, including the component parts of that system, how Tasmanians will know it is working, and the role of key initiatives, reforms and recommendations in achieving the intended outcomes

    b. be separate from, but complement, the Government's Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan

    c. be informed by the voices of children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse (Recommendation 19.5)

    d. include agreed definitions of child sexual abuse, institutional child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours

    e. set out guiding principles and objectives to inform preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse

    f. identify the agencies, including statutory bodies and non-government organisations, involved in preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse

    g. set out processes through which government agencies, statutory bodies and non-government organisations can consult on child sexual abuse reform

    h. set out considerations relevant to particular cohorts of children and young people, including Aboriginal children, children with disability, children with mental illness, children who identify as LGBTQIA+ and children from culturally and linguistically diverse communities

    i. outline the sources of funding for key initiatives and reforms set out in the strategy

    j. outline the governance, monitoring, review and evaluation arrangements for child sexual abuse reform, including that the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, as Chair of the Secretaries Board, is responsible for endorsing, overseeing, coordinating and reporting on the strategy and action plan (Recommendation 19.3).

2. The Tasmanian Government should develop an action plan for the implementation of the child sexual abuse reform strategy. The action plan should:
    a. prioritise all recommendations and reforms for implementation over the short, medium and long term and include expected timeframes for implementing each recommendation
    b. identify the role holders and agencies that have responsibility for implementation of each recommendation and reform
    c. describe the actions to be taken to implement the recommendations and reforms, including any milestones, sequencing and dependencies
    d. identify the status of each recommendation and reform (that is, complete, under way or not commenced) and whether it is progressing on time
    e. be endorsed and overseen by the governance structure identified in the strategy.
3. The child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan should be:
    a. tabled in each House of Parliament
    b. published on a dedicated website
    c. supported by a communication plan that seeks to inform and provide visibility of reform work to stakeholders and the community
    d. periodically reviewed and updated by the Secretaries Board through the Department of Premier and Cabinet.

3.4 Ensuring the system for preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse is trauma-informed

The National Royal Commission identified that all human services should respond to the needs of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and 'should be trauma-informed and have an understanding of institutional child sexual abuse'.[51] It recommended:

> The Australian Government and state and territory government agencies responsible for the delivery of human services should ensure relevant policy frameworks and strategies recognise the needs of victims and survivors and the benefits of implementing trauma-informed approaches.[52]

Research commissioned by the National Royal Commission defined trauma-informed approaches as:

- recognising the impact of trauma on a victim-survivor
- understanding their behaviour in the context of their past trauma
- interacting in a way that supports recovery and reduces the possibility of re-traumatisation.[53]

The term 'trauma-informed' refers specifically to 'the context in which services are offered' (emphasis in original), as distinguished from 'trauma-specific treatment services', which refers to clinical treatments for the trauma itself.[54] Both are essential.

In Tasmania, several victim-survivors and those who worked with them told us how their experiences with government services—such as the Child Safety Service, Tasmania Police, Director of Public Prosecutions, the Teachers Registration Board and hospitals—had not been trauma-informed. In some cases, we heard these services increased the harm caused by the abuse.[55] Kathryn Fordyce, Chief Executive Officer, Laurel House, observed that first contact with services is a particular challenge for victim-survivors of institutional abuse because their confidence that an institution will act in their best interests has already been 'damaged'.[56] Jillian Maxwell, Chief Executive Officer, Sexual Assault Support Service, said victim-survivors report that they have often tried to disclose their abuse and seek help and 'either feel not heard, believed or silenced'.[57] She expressed concern that there was 'a lack of or sufficient trauma-informed training about child sexual assault in some government settings and facilities'.[58]

The child sexual abuse reform strategy we recommend the Tasmanian Government develops (refer to Recommendation 19.1) should require all relevant staff to undertake regular professional development in responding to trauma.

We note that 'relevant staff' is a broad category and includes:

- many government and government funded staff of human service organisations including employees, volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors
- staff involved in direct responses to child sexual abuse such as the police, health workers and counsellors
- staff working in services in which child sexual abuse survivors are disproportionately represented, such as drug and alcohol, health, housing, legal services and prisons
- staff who are tasked with developing policy and are empowered to make decisions about people affected by trauma
- staff working within statutory bodies (such as the Commissioner for Children and Young People) who may have contact with child sexual abuse victim-survivors.

We note that as part of the Keeping Children Safer Actions, the Government made the following commitments:

- investigate rolling out trauma-informed training across the State Service with those in leadership positions, including Heads of Agencies[59]
- review the structure and processes across civil litigation to ensure the approach is trauma-informed and that legal practitioners recognise evidence-based understandings of the nature and impact of child sexual abuse[60]
- require mandatory professional development for all Department for Education, Children and Young People staff[61]
- make trauma-informed practice training mandatory for investigators and other state servants involved in misconduct investigation processes.[62]

These commitments have been marked as complete, except for the third, which has an expected delivery date of September 2023.[63]

In several other volumes and chapters of our report we have also made context-specific recommendations regarding mandatory minimum knowledge about child sexual abuse, grooming, professional boundary breaches, harmful sexual behaviours, reporting and responding. Regarding mandatory education, the Government's overall aim should be to ensure the delivery of appropriate mandatory education to as many people as possible in the most cost-effective way. Some roles will require a more advanced level of knowledge and skill (for example, child safety officers), or professional development tailored to elevated risks in a specific context, such as residential care, youth detention or policing. However, there will also be a minimum level of knowledge in child sexual abuse, grooming, professional boundary breaches and harmful sexual behaviours that is common across sectors. We recognise the Department of Health and the Department for Education, Children and Young People have recently developed and started rolling out mandatory reporter training. To help in cost efficiency and consistency of understanding, we suggest that state-owned and developed child sexual abuse professional development materials be collated and made available when new training is being developed by state agencies. In the future, consideration should also be given to whether any of these training offerings can be consolidated.

Recommendation 19.2

The Tasmanian Government should develop a whole of government approach to professional development on responding to trauma within government and government funded services, as well as statutory bodies, that provide services to children and young people or adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.

4 Establishing leadership, accountability and governance for child safety

The successful implementation of reform requires strong and sustainable leadership, accountability and governance mechanisms. The Tasmanian Government will need to establish these mechanisms before starting the reform work included in the child sexual abuse reform strategy and accompanying action plan.

4.1 Leadership and accountability for child safety

At the beginning of our Inquiry, we were concerned there was an absence of clear leadership, responsibility or accountability for child safety across the Tasmanian Government.

In week one of our hearings, Jenny Gale, Secretary, Department of Premier and Cabinet and Head of the State Service, and Ginna Webster, Secretary, Department of Justice, gave evidence on system responses, accountability and the implementation of the National Royal Commission recommendations.[64] Secretary Webster is responsible for the Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit, which coordinates the Government's response to, and implementation of, the National Royal Commission's recommendations. This Unit also develops the annual progress reports and action plans that indicate Tasmania's progress against these recommendations.[65] Responsibility for implementing specific recommendations has also been allocated to the Department of Justice and other government departments and agencies, including the:

- former Department of Communities
- former Department of Education (now the Department for Education, Children and Young People)
- Department of Police, Fire and Emergency Management
- Department of Premier and Cabinet
- Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions.[66]

The Department of Health does not have responsibility for implementing any recommendations, although we note it is now leading the response to the Child Safe Governance Review of the Launceston General Hospital and Human Resources and the Launceston General Hospital Community Recovery Initiative (which we discuss in Chapter 15).

We had anticipated that both Secretaries would jointly or individually be able to outline the cross-government system for preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse and the role and responsibilities of the various government agencies within this system.

Secretary Gale gave evidence that the prevention and detection of child sexual abuse in institutions was a priority for the State of Tasmania but did not articulate how this prioritisation was being achieved in practice. She deferred to Secretary Webster on the question of implementing the National Royal Commission's recommendations.[67] Secretary Gale conceded that child safety had not previously been a focus of her department under her leadership.[68]

Secretary Webster explained that the Department of Justice was responsible for compiling information about other departments' progress in implementing reforms but not for holding them to account:

> … the department leads the whole of government response to those recommendations, and whilst we wouldn't be responsible for other agencies and their implementation, we would certainly be responsible for getting information about how progressed they are; assisting in terms of any barriers that might exist in its implementation, and compiling the report, the reporting process that's required.[69]

Secretary Webster indicated she did not have capacity to direct other Heads of Agencies or government departments in relation to implementing the recommendations.[70] However, she clarified that, as the Chair of the interdepartmental committee established in relation to implementing the National Royal Commission recommendations, she could raise the progress of a recommendation with the relevant agency member on the committee, Head of Agency or Deputy Secretary.[71]

Secretary Webster agreed she had accountability and oversight regarding the implementation of some of the National Royal Commission's recommendations but limited power to actually influence the progression of recommendations that sat outside of her own department.[72] When asked by Counsel Assisting our Inquiry whether she was satisfied with the progress of implementing the National Royal Commission's recommendations, Secretary Webster said she was 'very comfortable that it is a priority for our department and that we are taking the action we need to take; of course, I'd always like things to move a lot faster than they do in lots of areas'.[73]

We also learned during our Commission of Inquiry that Heads of Agencies across the Government, including those with responsibility for direct service provision to children, did not have any direct or specific accountability for safeguarding children or accountability regarding child sexual abuse as part of their performance agreements.[74]

4.2 Efforts to improve leadership and accountability for child safety and reform

Through the course of our Inquiry, we saw significant improvement in whole of government leadership, including in relation to reform regarding child sexual abuse in institutions.

4.2.1 Establishment of the Secretaries Board

The Independent Review of the Tasmanian State Service ('State Service Review') (published in July 2021) considered whether the governing framework for the State Service was fit for purpose. The review made 77 recommendations to improve the overall operation of the State Service.[75]

The Secretaries Board was established in early 2022 in response to the State Service Review.[76] It comprises 'every departmental Secretary'.[77] Secretary Gale chairs the Secretaries Board and meets on a monthly basis.[78] Secretary Gale told us the Secretaries Board is guided by terms of reference that require the identification of priorities for the Tasmanian State Service. It is also guided by regular updates and discussion on whole of government implementation of these priorities.[79] This reflects a significant shift in whole of government accountability, noting that Tasmania's previous arrangements for Heads of Agencies meetings were informal and not subject to terms of reference or formalised reporting requirements.[80]

Secretary Gale told us the Secretaries Board would provide improved governance and accountability for reforms relating to preventing, identifying, reporting and responding to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts. Secretary Gale explained that the Secretaries Board now has collective oversight of the Keeping Children Safer Actions.[81] She said the Premier had tasked the Department of Premier and Cabinet with responsibility for leading reporting to Cabinet on implementation progress in relation to these actions.[82] Although specific actions have been tasked to different government agencies for implementation, as Chair of the Secretaries Board, Secretary Gale is accountable for this work.[83] We consider this responsibility should extend to the oversight and accountability for the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan (refer to Recommendation 19.1).

4.2.2 Changes to Head of Agency Performance Agreements

During our Inquiry, Heads of Agency Performance Agreements have been changed to 'clarify expectations and improve accountability [for] making sure child safety and wellbeing is embedded in organisational leadership, governance and culture'.[84]

This was made possible due to changes in response to the State Service Review. The review observed that for the Tasmanian State Service to 'function well' the 'reporting and decision-making responsibilities between ministers, ministerial staff, Heads of Agencies and senior executives must be clearly stated' and that 'all parties must understand their role and their accountabilities, particularly in the case of statutory and legislative responsibilities'.[85] The review observed that the:

- existing performance management process did not always effectively hold departmental secretaries to account for whole of government initiatives[86]
- performance assessment processes for Heads of Agencies should be reshaped to ensure that whole of government outcomes feature alongside portfolio-based accountabilities, and that the Premier is more centrally involved in the process[87]
- performance agreement for Heads of Agencies should explicitly set out the responsibility of Heads of Agencies to contribute to cross-portfolio programs (including whole of government priorities) and whole of government capability development as well as that of their own agencies.[88]

The review made three recommendations to improve performance agreements and assessments for departmental secretaries:

> Recommendation 7
>
> That the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, in full consultation with relevant portfolio ministers and the Premier, develop and undertake departmental secretaries' annual performance agreements and assessments.[89]
>
>
> That the Premier undertake the annual performance agreement and assessment of the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, informed by discussions with ministers (as the Premier sees appropriate) and consolidated advice from other departmental secretaries.[90]
>
>
> Consider [Heads of Agencies] contribution to developing the [Tasmanian State Service] as a genuinely single state service, including the delivery of cross-portfolio outcomes (such as whole-of-government priorities) and whole-of-government capability development, in agency heads' performance assessments.[91]

Secretary Gale told us this new approach to developing departmental secretaries' annual performance agreements and assessments enables common themes to be included in performance agreements. These themes include shared accountability for the safety of Tasmanian children in government institutions, particularly for secretaries whose departments engage in child-related work.[92]

Secretary Gale spoke about what these changes mean in relation to departmental secretaries' performance agreements and her own performance agreement:

> Every Head of Agency's performance agreement with the Premier will commit them to identify and take action within their own department and across the service that will keep children safer. This commitment applies regardless of whether that agency engages directly in child-related work.
>
> In my own performance agreement I commit to being accountable for facilitation and coordination of the suite of actions known as, Keeping Children Safer Actions....

> I also commit to continuing to roll out more trauma-informed training across the [State Service] and to supporting improvements that will see trauma-informed complaints handling processes across the [State Service].[93]

4.2.3 Our observations

We consider the reforms we recommend regarding child sexual abuse in institutions should be a whole of government priority. As such, the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, as Chair of the Secretaries Board, should be responsible for endorsing, overseeing, coordinating and reporting on the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan.

All relevant secretaries, as members of the Secretaries Board, should be responsible for actioning particular reforms under the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan within their portfolio responsibilities. These responsibilities should be included in their performance agreements and reviewed annually.

We also consider that accountability for implementing the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan should be extended to the performance agreements of other relevant State Service executives. Over time, the statements of duties for relevant departmental staff, particularly those who provide services to children and young people, should also reflect their responsibilities in relation to the strategy and action plan. This signifies that everyone has a responsibility for keeping children and young people safe within government institutions.

Recommendation 19.3

The Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, as Chair of the Secretaries Board, should be responsible for endorsing, overseeing, coordinating and reporting on the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan.

Recommendation 19.4

1. The Premier should, through their performance agreements, ensure Heads of Agencies are responsible for reforms under the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan within their portfolio responsibilities.
2. Heads of Agencies should ensure relevant State Service executives are also responsible for implementing the strategy and action plan.
3. The statements of duties for relevant departmental staff should refer to their responsibilities in relation to the strategy and action plan.

4.3 Existing governance structures for child safety reform

At our hearings, Ms Shuard told us that a governance structure must be inclusive of a 'whole range of agencies' to ensure coordination and that no one is left behind in relation to reform work.[94] Ms Shuard said reporting mechanisms are also important for ensuring there is a shared understanding of what's happening across all the reforms.[95] She was of the view that system-wide risks should be brought to the attention of the Secretaries Board.[96] She also emphasised the importance of hearing the voices of children and young people:

> Their voice must be heard in these arrangements, otherwise we design around our old constructs and forget what that might mean for children and young people, so the peak bodies or advocates for children and young people are essential voices to be heard ...[97]

The Tasmanian Government has established a governance structure for overseeing and implementing the Keeping Children Safer Actions. This structure comprises:

- Department of Premier and Cabinet, which is responsible for coordinating, monitoring and reporting on the Keeping Children Safer Actions.[98] The Department drafts monthly briefings and implementation status reports for Cabinet.[99]
- Departmental secretaries and Heads of Agencies, who have been allocated responsibility for implementing the Keeping Children Safer Actions by the Premier (either as a sole agency or with another agency or agencies).[100] Departmental secretaries are accountable to the Premier for implementing the Keeping Children Safer Actions under performance management instruments.[101] Department leads prepare fortnightly reports for the Keeping Children Safer Working Group.[102]
- Keeping Children Safer Working Group, which comprises Deputy Secretaries and Directors from across government and has been established to coordinate and oversee implementation activity regarding the Keeping Children Safer actions, provide authoritative advice and endorse fortnightly implementation status reports and reports to Cabinet.[103] The Working Group is guided by terms of reference and meets fortnightly.[104] It also has access to advice and consultation from subject matter experts as needed.[105] The Working Group reports to the Secretaries Board through written reports after each meeting.[106] The Working Group is supported by a Secretariat from the Policy Branch within the Department of Premier and Cabinet.[107]
- Secretaries Board, which steers implementation activity, helps resolve barriers to implementation and endorses implementation plans and status reports.[108]
- Cabinet, which receives and endorses monthly implementation status reports prepared by the Department of Premier and Cabinet.[109]

Source: Statement of Jenny Gale, 23 November 2022.

Secretary Gale also told us:

- The Children, Young People and Families Safety and Wellbeing Cabinet Committee oversees policies and programs that focus on family and sexual violence and the safety and wellbeing of children, young people and their families in Tasmania.[111] Their work includes overseeing the implementation of the Safe Homes, Families, Communities initiative, Strong Families Safe Kids initiative and the Child and Youth Wellbeing Strategy.[112] The Committee is supported by a 'senior officials' committee', which is chaired by Secretary Gale.[113]
- The Department of Premier and Cabinet has responsibility for developing and delivering whole of government policies relating to child safety and wellbeing, including stewardship of the It Takes a Tasmanian Village: Tasmania's Child and Youth Wellbeing Strategy and the Safe Homes, Safe Families: Tasmania's Family Violence Action Plan 2015–2020.[114]

We consider this governance structure provides a strong foundation for overseeing and implementing the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan. In the following sections, we discuss how this governance structure could be strengthened by providing a mechanism for children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse to influence the system designed to benefit them.

We also consider this governance structure could be strengthened by ongoing sector engagement with agencies outside of government. Throughout our report, we have identified the key role of non-government agencies, including in relation to providing out of home care services and sexual assault counselling. These entities will be a good measure of the success of reforms and should be consulted when developing the strategy and action plan.

We also observe that there does not appear to be any governance arrangements in place to provide an ongoing voice to government from children and young people, such as through the Premier's Youth Advisory Council, or from adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. There are no arrangements to ensure representation from diverse communities in Tasmania, including the Aboriginal community, people with disability, people with mental illness, LGBTQIA+ people, and culturally and linguistically diverse communities. We discuss the inclusion of these voices in the following section of this chapter.

4.4 Empowering children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse

Children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse should be empowered to participate in regular discussion on issues that directly affect them and contribute to change and reform. They should also be able to advise the Tasmanian Government on the best ways to coordinate and implement reform work.[115] The participation of children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse ensures the voices of service users and affected populations can contribute to designing and implementing a system that meets the needs of service users, service providers and the Government.[116]

The Australian Human Rights Commission report Keeping Kids Safe and Well—Your Voices (released on 6 April 2022) was based on consultations led by Anne Hollonds, National Children's Commissioner, Australian Human Rights Commission, to inform the Australian Government's Actions Plans on Safe and Supported: The National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children 2021–2031.[117] In relation to the consultations that informed the report, Ms Hollonds said:

> Overwhelmingly, children, young people and families told us how important it is that governments and service providers listen to them when making decisions that affect them.[118]

At our hearings, Ms Hollonds also said:

> … my experience has been that actually when kids are at the table they're surprisingly insightful and refreshing in all of their wisdom, and they actually bring something that adults don't bring to the conversation …[119]

We note that steps to involve children and young people as well as adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse have already been taken by some government agencies regarding child sexual abuse reform activity.

For example, children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse were engaged when developing the Child and Youth Safe Organisation Framework—comprising the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme—being implemented by the Department of Justice.[120] Secretary Webster told us advisory panels were established relating to developing the framework and included a Lived Experience Advisory Panel comprising adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings and family and friends of victim-survivors.[121]

A suite of consultation methods was also used to capture the views and opinions of children and young people in the community, including children and young people with experience of the out of home care system.[122]

Secretary Webster also told us:

> People with lived experience of child sexual abuse in institutional settings and children and young people are critical stakeholders in the project to develop and implement the Framework. Their expertise gained through lived experience will be a valuable contribution to the policy development and implementation planning for the Framework. Genuine engagement with children and young people and victim-survivor advocates through the project cycle also reflects the Government's commitment to the Child Safe Standards.[123]

As noted above, the Government is also establishing its first Victim-Survivor Advisory Council as an action under its most recent Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan—Survivors at the Centre.[124] The Council will include victim-survivors of family and sexual violence, including adults who may have experienced child sexual abuse, and family and friends of victims who lost their lives to family and sexual violence. It will provide an ongoing voice to government.[125] However, it is not clear how many members will have lived experience of child sexual abuse, or whether the Council will be consulted about reform work falling outside the actions identified in Survivors at the Centre, including reforms relating to child sexual abuse in institutions. We consider victim-survivors of child sexual abuse to have distinct experiences and needs that differentiate them from adult victim-survivors of family and sexual violence.

In our view, the Government must show an ongoing preparedness to hear the voices of children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, including child sexual abuse in institutions, at a broader whole of government level and across all reforms. We recommend the governance structures for the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan incorporate the voices of children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, including child sexual abuse in institutions. Sustained and ongoing engagement of children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse is crucial to building an understanding of issues relating to child safety, child sexual abuse (including child sexual abuse in institutions) and harmful sexual behaviours. It is also crucial for ensuring policy and reform work meets service user needs. We consider the Government can achieve this governance structure through the already established Premier's Youth Advisory Council and through the establishment of an adult-victim survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group.

The Premier's Youth Advisory Council comprises a group of young people aged between 12 and 25 years. It provides an opportunity for 'young people to inform the Tasmanian Government on issues and policies that affect them and their peers' through meetings with the Premier and the Minister for Education, Children and Youth 'several times a year'.[126]

We consider the adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group should comprise some members who have experienced child sexual abuse in institutions.

These groups should be representative of the diverse communities in Tasmania, including the Aboriginal community, people with disability, people with mental illness, LGBTQIA+ people and culturally and linguistically diverse communities.

The issues we consider each advisory group can contribute to include:

- the therapeutic service system that supports victim-survivors and their families and carers
- whole of government policies relating to child safety
- strategies to raise awareness about child safety, including in government institutions
- resources for children and young people in relation to the prevention, identification and response to child sexual abuse
- forms of engagement with children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse
- initiatives designed to improve and respond to the safety of children and young people and harmful sexual behaviours, including initiatives designed for particular cohorts of children
- professional development initiatives to promote trauma-informed practices across government
- recruiting senior leadership roles focused on children and safety (for example, the Commissioner for Children and Young People).

Each advisory group should be promoted across government as a key mechanism through which to test ideas, policies and reform initiatives relating to child safety.

In other chapters of our report, we also recommend establishing advisory groups for specific institutional contexts, such as out of home care, Ashley Youth Detention Centre and health services (refer to Recommendations 9.6, 12.8 and 15.7). We considered whether, for efficiency, there could be one advisory group to meet these different purposes. However, in our view, these specific institutional contexts require specialist knowledge, gained through lived experience, about those systems. We consider these institution-specific advisory groups should also be consulted on policy and reform work when this is appropriate. In contrast, given the lower level of vulnerability of most children and young people in schools, we consider the Premier's Youth Advisory Council, and other existing broad student representative voice mechanisms, should be engaged regarding policy and reform work in schools.

We also recommend that the mechanisms for engaging with children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, including child sexual abuse in institutions, be set out in the child sexual abuse reform strategy (Recommendation 19.1).

Promoting these mechanisms through the strategy will build awareness of the mechanisms and ensure they are consistently and regularly engaged in policy design and reform work as standard practice across government.

Recommendation 19.5

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure, in setting out the governance structure for the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan, that children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse are part of this governance structure through:
    a. the Premier's Youth Advisory Council
    b. the establishment of an advisory group comprising adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, including child sexual abuse in institutions, of different ages, backgrounds, cultures, gender identities and geographical locations and parents of child victim-survivors.
2. The Department of Premier and Cabinet should report on the activities of these advisory groups in its annual report.
3. These advisory groups should:
    a. be guided by clear terms of reference that have been developed in consultation with the advisory groups
    b. have a clear purpose and objectives in terms of how they can contribute across the whole of government
    c. receive secretarial support and be adequately funded and resourced
    d. ensure trauma-informed processes apply in their interactions
    e. support and enable members' attendance by covering the costs of travel and expenses, and providing honorariums where appropriate.

5 Improving information sharing and cross-agency coordination for child safety

To prevent, identify, report and respond to child sexual abuse in institutions, it is essential government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies work effectively with one another. As outlined, many agencies have a role in addressing child sexual abuse in institutions. However, to achieve an effective response, agencies must be clear on the scope of their role and responsibilities and maintain strong communication.[127]

In this section, we summarise some problems we heard about information sharing and coordination across agencies relating to child safety issues, and the steps the Tasmanian Government is taking to address these issues. We recommend that any legislative barriers that hinder the sharing of information to protect the safety and wellbeing of children in Tasmania's legislation be identified and removed.

To further support effective responses to child safety issues, we also recommend the development of child safety information sharing, coordination and response for government and government provided agencies and statutory bodies. These guidelines should clearly articulate the roles and responsibilities of collaborating agencies in responding to child safety issues, including their information sharing obligations.

5.1 The National Royal Commission

The National Royal Commission defined 'information sharing' or 'information exchange' in the following way:

> 'Information sharing' and 'information exchange' refers to the sharing or exchange of information, including personal information, about, or related to, child sexual abuse in institutional contexts. The terms refer to the sharing of information between (and, in some cases, within) institutions, including non-government institutions, government and law enforcement agencies, and independent regulatory or oversight bodies. They also refer to the sharing of information by and with professionals who operate as individuals to provide key services to or for children.[128]

The National Royal Commission considered that information sharing between institutions with responsibilities for the safety of children is important to 'identify, prevent and respond to incidents and risks of child sexual abuse'.[129] It also considered the exchange of information to be important in ensuring the 'proper functioning of reportable conduct and Working With Children Check schemes'.[130] It noted that no single institution collects all the relevant information that can protect children, which is why information must be shared across institutions to enable effective responses to incidents and risks of child sexual abuse.[131]

As a matter of principle, we consider information sharing should occur when there is a concern about a risk of harm (including of child sexual abuse) to a child or a group of children, such as those in a particular institutional context. We also consider information should be shared with any entity that could act to address this risk now or in the future.

5.1.1 Recommendations on information sharing

The National Royal Commission observed the exchange of information relating to child safety often involves personal and sensitive information (such as information about a child's harmful sexual behaviours or information about adults who pose a potential risk to children), which is often protected by legislation.[132] It noted that even where legislation permits the exchange of this information for child safety, there may be a reluctance to share such personal and sensitive information due to concerns about privacy, confidentiality, defamation and confusion about the application of complex and inconsistent laws.[133] It also observed the exchange of information may be inhibited due to institutional cultures, poor leadership and weak or unclear governance arrangements.[134]

The National Royal Commission recommended a nationally consistent information sharing scheme between key agencies and institutions be developed and implemented to improve information sharing in relation to the safety and wellbeing of children within and across jurisdictions and sectors.[135] It said the scheme should:

a. enable direct exchange of relevant information between a range of prescribed bodies, including service providers, government and non-government agencies, law enforcement agencies, and regulatory and oversight bodies, which have responsibilities related to children's safety and wellbeing

b. permit prescribed bodies to provide relevant information to other prescribed bodies without a request, for purposes related to preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts

c. require prescribed bodies to share relevant information on request from other prescribed bodies, for purposes relating to preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, subject to limited exceptions

d. explicitly prioritise children's safety and wellbeing and override laws that might otherwise prohibit or restrict disclosure of information to prevent, identify and respond to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts

e. provide safeguards and other measures for oversight and accountability to prevent unauthorised sharing and improper use of information obtained under the information exchange scheme

f. require prescribed bodies to provide adversely affected persons with an opportunity to respond to untested or unsubstantiated allegations, where such information is received under the information exchange scheme, prior to taking adverse action against such persons, except where to do so could place another person at risk of harm.[136]

The National Royal Commission considered the core group of institutions that should be considered to include in the information exchange scheme to be:

- accommodation and residential services for children
- childcare services
- child protection and out of home care services
- disability services and supports for children with disability
- education services for children
- health services for children
- justice and detention services for children
- state and territory government agencies and public authorities
- law enforcement agencies
- Working With Children Check screening agencies
- regulatory and oversight agencies (including, for example, teacher registration authorities)
- Australian Government agencies that may hold information relating to the safety and wellbeing of children
- professionals who provide key services and supports to children as individual service providers, rather than through agencies or organisations (such as medical practitioners and psychologists)
- professional and disciplinary bodies that oversee professional practice in the institutions set out above.[137]

It also indicated that religious institutions, sport and recreation institutions and non-government organisations that provide particular services to adults (such as drug, alcohol and mental health services) be considered for inclusion.[138]

The National Royal Commission also recommended strengthening information sharing in the education and out of home care sectors. These recommendations provide for the sharing of information about:

- teachers regarding teacher registration across jurisdictions
- students who move schools and may, for example, have exhibited harmful sexual behaviours
- carers as part of introducing carers' registers across jurisdictions to collect information about carers who have applied to work or do work at various out of home care agencies.[139]

Work has commenced to implement some of these recommendations in Tasmania, and some have already been implemented.[140] However, as we outline in the following section, we still heard of problems relating to sharing child safety information.

Secretary Webster told us reform that related to improving access to and the sharing of information to protect children is a difficult area.[141] She said although the National Royal Commission undertook significant work on the issue, it 'fell short of providing definitive guidance about balancing privacy and risk to children'.[142]

5.2 Legislation governing the sharing of information about child safety in Tasmania

Legislation governing the exchange of information regarding the safety of children includes general privacy legislation and specific legislative schemes. In Tasmania, specific legislative schemes that govern the exchange of information between agencies about the safety of children in particular situations include:

- Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ('Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act')
- Youth Justice Act 1997 ('Youth Justice Act')
- Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 ('Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act').

The Personal Information Protection Act 2004 ('Personal Information Protection Act') regulates general information sharing between government agencies that falls outside of a legislative scheme. We discuss key pieces of legislation in the following sub-sections.

5.2.1 Personal Information Protection Act

The Personal Information Protection Act regulates the collection, maintenance, use, correction and disclosure of personal information relating to individuals. 'Personal information' encompasses any information or opinion in any recorded format about an individual whose identity is apparent or is reasonably ascertainable from the information or opinion. That individual must be alive or not have been dead for more than 25 years.[143]

A 'personal information custodian', which includes a government department, must comply with the Personal Information Protection Principles.[144] These Principles state that a personal information custodian must not use or disclose personal information about an individual for a purpose other than the purpose for which it was collected unless, among other things:

- the personal information custodian reasonably believes that the use or disclosure is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious threat to an individual's life, health, safety or welfare, or a serious threat to public health or public safety
- the personal information custodian has reason to suspect that unlawful activity has been, is being or may be engaged in, and uses or discloses the personal information as a necessary part of its investigation of the matter or in reporting its concerns to relevant persons or authorities
- the use or disclosure is required or authorised by or under law
- the personal information custodian reasonably believes the use or disclosure is reasonably necessary for the prevention, detection, investigation, prosecution or punishment of criminal offences or breaches of a law imposing a penalty or sanction by or on behalf of a law enforcement agency
- the personal information is to be used as employee information in relation to the suitability of the individual for appointment or the suitability of the individual for employment held by the individual
- the personal information is employee information that is being transferred from one personal information custodian to another personal information custodian for use as employee information relating to the individual.[145]

When a provision in the Personal Information Protection Act is inconsistent with a provision in another piece of legislation, the provision in the other legislation prevails.[146]

5.2.2 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act

The Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act provides for the care and protection of children in Tasmania. It sets out responsibilities and obligations regarding reporting concerns to the Child Safety Service about the abuse or neglect of children.[147] It states that an adult who 'knows, or believes or suspects on reasonable grounds' that a child is suffering or is likely to suffer abuse or neglect has a responsibility to act to prevent the abuse. This action includes informing the relevant Secretary or the Strong Families Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line.[148]

Specific professionals, including state servants, also have mandatory reporting obligations. They must inform the relevant Secretary or the Strong Families Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line if, in carrying out official duties or in the course of their work, they know or believe or suspect on reasonable grounds that a child has been or is being abused.[149] While there has been some confusion across the Tasmanian Government about whether mandatory reporting obligations arise when information suggests a potential risk to children generally, rather than a risk to a specifically identified child, we consider it best practice to make a report even when this uncertainty exists.

The Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act also provides for information exchange between the Child Safety Service and an 'information-sharing entity' for the safety, welfare or wellbeing of a person who is the subject of a notification to, or under an order of, the Child Safety Service (a relevant person).[150] An 'information-sharing entity' includes a:

- mandatory reporter
- state servant
- person in charge of specified health and disability services
- person in charge of an organisation that receives a referral from the Child Safety Service.[151]

The Secretary may provide information to, or require information from, any of these entities.[152] The information-sharing entity may, if satisfied that information in its possession relates to the safety, welfare or wellbeing of a relevant person, provide the Secretary with this information as well as another information-sharing entity if they are involved with, or are likely to be involved with, the relevant person or a significant person to the relevant person.[153]

The Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act provides that a person who receives a report from a notifier, or who becomes aware of the identity of a notifier of a report, as a result of administering the Act must not disclose the notifier's identity to another person unless the disclosure is made:

- in the course of their official duties under the Act to another person who is acting in the course of their official duties
- with the consent of the notifier
- by way of evidence adduced with leave granted by the court
- to a law enforcement agency (since 2 October 2019).[154]

Although an individual engaged in administering the Act is obliged to maintain confidentiality, they may divulge information where, among other things, it is necessary or appropriate for the proper administration of the Act or they are legally authorised or required to do so.[155] Individuals are protected from liability when performing or exercising functions and powers under the Act, including the disclosure of information.[156] A similar protection is provided to the police.[157]

Since 1 March 2021, there have also been exceptions to the duty to maintain confidentiality for providing:

- relevant personal information for criminal and civil actions against alleged perpetrators who are the subject of the personal information

- information to agencies undertaking an employment screening or review process, or disciplinary investigations or proceedings, against a current or prospective employee or a volunteer.[158]

These 1 March 2021 exceptions apply if sharing the information does not disclose the identity of, or lead to the identification of, a person other than the person who is the subject of the civil or criminal proceedings or employment screening or disciplinary investigation or proceeding.[159] Using this information is subject to the rules of procedural fairness.[160]

5.2.3 Youth Justice Act

The Youth Justice Act provides for the treatment and sanctioning of young people who have offended. It contains provisions relating to confidentiality. Specifically, the Youth Justice Act provides that, subject to some exceptions, a person must not publish any information regarding any action or proceeding that is to be, is being or has been taken against a young person and may lead to the identification of the youth, victim or another person involved who has not consented to publishing the information.[161]

5.2.4 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act

The Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act establishes a screening and monitoring system for people who work with vulnerable people, including children and young people.[162] A 'reporting body', which includes a State Service agency and the police service, that becomes aware by any means, or suspects on reasonable grounds that a person registered under the Act has engaged, or may have engaged, in reportable behaviour, must notify the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, as soon as practicable, of the name and other identifying details of the person and the behaviour.[163] 'Reportable behaviour' is behaviour that poses a risk of harm to vulnerable persons, whether by neglect, abuse or other conduct.[164]

The Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act also contemplates the Registrar receiving information about reportable behaviour other than through the duty that a reporting body has to notify the Registrar. However, there is no specific legislative provision for receiving this information.[165] There is nothing in the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act preventing an entity, including a government department or any individual, from notifying the Registrar of concerning behaviour involving any person. However, they would need to ensure they are not in breach of the general prohibition on the use or disclosure of personal information under the Personal Information Protection Act. Sharing relevant information with the Registrar would generally be for determining whether the person is suitable to:

- be registered under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme (through a risk assessment)
- stay registered under the Scheme (through an additional risk assessment).

These purposes are for the broader purpose of protecting public safety or for the assessment of the suitability of the person for employment. Both purposes are exceptions to the general prohibition on the use or disclosure of personal information in the Personal Information Protection Act. Our view is that the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act should be amended to clarify that any person can notify reportable behaviour to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.

When the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme reasonably considers that an 'entity', which includes an individual, public authority or another body, may have information relevant to their functions and powers under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act, they may require the entity to provide this information.[166] The entity must comply with the request or provide a reasonable excuse for its failure to comply.[167] Information the Registrar obtains arising from a request may only be used to administer the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act.[168]

Peter Graham, former Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, described the obligation to notify the Registrar of 'reportable behaviour' as the 'backbone of the scheme' because 'it forms the basis of information available to the Registrar to consider when conducting a risk assessment [of a person applying for registration] or additional risk assessment [of a person who is already registered]' under the Scheme.[169]

Mr Graham said notifications made under this obligation give the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme 'significantly more information' when undertaking risk assessments than is contemplated by the National Standards for Working with Children Checks. The information available to the Registrar includes criminal intelligence and other information provided by reporting bodies, including allegations that have not been tested by an investigation (unsubstantiated allegations).[170]

The Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and their staff must not use or disclose information about a person that has been disclosed or obtained as part of the performance or exercise of a function or power under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act, unless it is divulged under the Act, another Act or corresponding law, or with the person's consent.[171] The Registrar may disclose the result of a risk assessment, that the registration of a person has been suspended or cancelled, or other information relating to a registered person to another registering authority that has similar functions under another corresponding law.[172]

The Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme may also disclose this information to specified bodies or a person if they consider it appropriate to protect vulnerable persons or a class of vulnerable person from a risk of harm.[173] We were told it is 'typical' for the Registrar to advise a State Service agency of a negative risk assessment regarding an individual, but not share the underlying information or grounds for the assessment. This is because it will generally have been informed by information that is available to the Registrar but not available to the State Service agency (that is, through criminal intelligence information).[174]

Recommendation 19.6

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 to clarify that, in addition to the duty to report in certain circumstances, any person can notify reportable behaviour to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.

5.3 Barriers to information sharing and coordination in Tasmania

During our Inquiry, we heard information sharing and coordination between agencies is not always done in a way that prioritises the safety and wellbeing of children and young people. We also heard it does not always support the needs of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutions. While some of these barriers were explained to us in terms of legislative barriers, we consider culture to be the main barrier to appropriate information sharing and a coordinated response to child safety concerns.

Regarding mandatory reporting to the Child Safety Service and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, we make findings in relation to or heard about the following barriers to information sharing:

- We find in Chapter 14, Case study 3, relating to James Griffin that Launceston General Hospital had no clear system or process in place to support complaints to external agencies and, as a result, staff were not aware of their reporting obligations, including to the Child Safety Service and Ahpra. We also highlighted in Chapter 15 that the Tasmanian Health Service Protocol – Complaint or Concern about Health Professional Conduct (November 2020) included an expectation that staff would not make a mandatory report without executive leadership approval.
- In Chapter 11, Case study 7, we find the Department of Justice does not have an appropriate process to ensure that information in National Redress Scheme applications is shared in a timely manner to protect children. We also discuss how poor information sharing between agencies increased the risk of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

- Tasmania Police told us in its submission that 'because different classes of people are required to report different types of conduct to different departments, the system is vulnerable to information exchange breakdown and consequent delays in investigation'.[175]
- Mr Graham told us it is clear there is a varied understanding of the reporting obligations under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act across the State Service.[176] Previously, legal advice provided to the Department of Justice was based on a narrow interpretation of the use of the word 'finds' regarding the reporting of reportable behaviour under the Act. This advice influenced agencies to not report to the Registrar until after a misconduct investigation had made a 'finding' of misconduct against a staff member.[177] Since 1 February 2021, the wording in the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act in relation to this point has been clarified.[178]
- Secretary Webster told us that outside of Tasmania Police and the Child Safety Service, it has taken longer for other agencies to understand and meet their obligations of reporting to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.[179]

We also heard the following in relation to the sharing of information between Tasmania Police and the Child Safety Service:

- Until the 2021 Keeping Children Safe Memorandum of Understanding, Tasmania Police sometimes had to seek warrants to obtain information from the Child Safety Service.[180] Both the memorandum and accompanying Keeping Children Safe Handbook now state: 'Warrants are not required in order to facilitate the release of information relating to the safety of a child from either party and warrants will not be requested by either party in relation to the provision of such information'.[181]

Regarding State Service disciplinary processes, we heard of the following problems:

- Secretary Bullard told us the general prohibition in the Personal Information Protection Act restricted the former Department of Education's ability to share information about a teacher that had been obtained through an investigation into a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct (referred to as an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation), including with the Teachers Registration Board.[182] Secretary Bullard said this was based on advice that the purpose the information had been collected for (employee disciplinary processes by the Department) was different from the purpose the information was sought to be disclosed (determining good character and fitness to teach by the Teachers Registration Board).[183] It is unclear to us why the public safety or employment reasons exceptions in the Personal Information Protection Act would not apply.

- Secretary Bullard and Secretary Gale both indicated the Personal Information Protection Act is a barrier to keeping complainants and victim-survivors informed about how abuse complaints are managed and the status of investigations.[184]
- Based on legal advice about the privacy provisions in the Children, Young People and Their Families Act and Youth Justice Act, the former Department of Communities had not provided un-redacted material (specifically the files of children who had been in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and Unit Diaries from the Centre) to investigators undertaking Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations.[185] As outlined before, these legislative provisions prevent publishing information about care and protection proceedings as well as court proceedings, formal or informal cautions or community conferences in particular circumstances regarding children and young people.[186]

In our view, these information sharing failures have placed children at risk by not ensuring relevant agencies or entities have the adequate information they need to perform their functions and fulfil their obligations to protect children. We agree with Secretary Bullard's observation that information sharing is critical to assessing risk and ensuring the necessary supports are in place for the safety and wellbeing of children and young people.[187]

We acknowledge that some told us information sharing problems stem from legislative barriers. For example, Mr Graham told us a general exemption should be included in the Personal Information Protection Act that enables information about the safety of children to be shared, noting it would combat the reluctance some people have in sharing information because the Personal Information Protection Act is often used as a barrier to information exchange.[188]

Similarly, Secretary Bullard embraced including such a legislative provision in the Personal Information Protection Act. He queried whether such a provision should be mandatory or permissive.[189] Secretary Bullard said making it mandatory would likely be easier because this removes the need for deliberation and judgment.[190]

In our view, the Personal Information Protection Act already contains sufficient exemptions which would, if interpreted in a way that seeks to promote the safety and wellbeing of children and young people, enable information about the safety of children to be shared, particularly where:

> … the personal information custodian reasonably believes that the use or disclosure [of personal information] is necessary to lessen or prevent … a serious threat to an individual's life, health, safety or welfare; or a serious threat to public health or public safety.[191]

These provisions reflect provisions in other jurisdictions, including the Australian Privacy Principles.[192]

As noted, Secretary Webster told us it was her belief that one of the most difficult areas of reform will be improving access to and sharing information.[193] Secretary Webster explained this particularly in relation to any legislative changes required:

> These reforms impinge on the existing privacy rights of individuals. Legislative reforms to information sharing and erosion of privacy protections can be fraught and controversial. I fully support the need to significantly increase the rights of children to be safe and understand the processes that have affected them, but I note that these reforms will need to be carefully considered and balanced. I also note that these reforms will be complex drafting exercises because of the numerous Tasmanian statutes that contain confidentiality provisions for a [sic] various policy reasons.[194]

Secretary Bullard said changing information sharing practices requires 'sustained change management' including clarity about what information agencies hold, what information can and should be shared, purposes for which it can be shared and with whom.[195] He said it then requires a concerted effort to understand and address underlying beliefs or assumptions about what information should or should not be shared.[196] He said it also requires an understanding of legal and other barriers to change and a willingness to make legislative amendments as required.[197] Despite this challenge, Secretary Bullard said information sharing between departments, independent statutory bodies and with victim-survivors needs to be improved within the bounds of what is legally permissible.[198]

Where there are legislative barriers, these should be removed. We recommend confidentiality and secrecy provisions in Tasmanian legislation be reviewed. Where these provisions create specific legislative barriers to the sharing of information to protect the safety and wellbeing of children and young people, these barriers should be removed.

We consider, however, that many failures to share information stem from a culture within parts of the State Service, including those providing advice. This advice preferences a person's right to privacy over the protection of the safety and wellbeing of children. There is also a lack of understanding of mandatory reporting obligations and staff ability to share information to protect children. These cultural barriers must be addressed. We discuss measures to address cultural barriers to information sharing in the following section.

Recommendation 19.7

The Tasmanian Government should review confidentiality and secrecy provisions in Tasmanian legislation, including the Personal Information Protection Act 2004, to identify any specific legislative barriers that hinder the sharing of information necessary to protect the safety and wellbeing of children and young people and remove these barriers.

5.4 Existing guidance on information sharing, coordination and responses for child safety

Given the cultural resistance to sharing information, it is fundamental that there is clear guidance about how information can and should be shared to protect children, and to facilitate a coordinated response to child safety concerns. Further, it is critical that information affecting children's safety is purposefully shared and leads to action by appropriate entities and services.

Darren Hine AO APM, former Commissioner, Tasmania Police, told us several formal documents guide Tasmania Police on information sharing and coordinating investigations and responding to child sexual abuse. These documents include:

- Tasmania Police Manual, which provides guidance to police officers on performing their duties, including in relation to child sexual abuse, and the types of notifications they must make to external agencies, including (but not limited to) the Strong Families Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, Registrar of the Registration to Work With Vulnerable People Scheme, Ahpra and the Teachers Registration Board.[199]
- Tasmania Police Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines, which provide 'policy and practice guidance to Tasmania Police officers in responding to children and young people who have, or may have been, sexually abused'.[200] The guidelines outline objectives, procedures (including reporting), roles and responsibilities (including initial response, interviews, forensics and information sharing requirements) and relevant legislation and policy documents.
- Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Information Sharing Protocol between the Department of Justice and Tasmania Police, which outlines the process for Tasmania Police to share information with the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Unit in the Department of Justice.[201] Since 2016, an interface between both agencies has supported the exchange of information under the protocol where information is shared daily with the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Unit from Tasmania Police's information systems.[202] A similar information-sharing arrangement has also been in place for the Child Safety Service to share information daily with the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Unit since 2017.[203]

- Memorandums of Understanding between Tasmania Police and various government departments, which includes the Keeping Children Safe Memorandum of Understanding that guides the relationship between Tasmania Police and the Child Safety Service regarding statutory responses to suspected child abuse and neglect.[204] This Memorandum designates Tasmania Police as the lead agency in all child safety matters when an offence is disclosed and the Child Safety Service as the lead agency in matters relating to the care and protection of a child.[205] Joint responses under the Memorandum are to be coordinated in a way that ensures the interests and safety of a child are paramount.[206] The Memorandum is accompanied by the Keeping Children Safe Handbook, which provides additional context and guidance to staff about fulfilling their roles and responsibilities under the Memorandum.[207] It also includes forms and templates for use in cross-agency coordination to ensure there is consistent practice between both agencies.[208] Both documents explicitly state: 'Information will be exchanged freely as requested between the parties in relation to the protection of children, facilitating the complete picture of a child's experience, enabling decisive and effective action'.[209]

We do not consider that the Memorandum or the Handbook responds specifically to the issue of information sharing or coordination of responses to child sexual abuse in institutions.

During our Commission of Inquiry, some government agencies also developed memorandums of understanding with Tasmania Police to clarify their roles and responsibilities in preventing and responding to child sexual abuse in institutions.[210] These memorandums are similar and address the following topics:

- purpose
- shared operating principles
- management of incidents or disclosures of child sexual abuse in education and health settings, including reporting, investigation, communication and information sharing
- governance.[211]

We received no evidence that any formal documents had been developed to specifically guide government or government funded agencies or statutory bodies regarding responses to child sexual abuse in institutions. This includes when a staff member is the subject of an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse.

5.5 Efforts to improve information sharing and coordination of responses to child sexual abuse in institutions

During our Commission of Inquiry, the Tasmanian Government started or committed to undertake several projects to improve information sharing across agencies. We summarise this work in the following sub-sections.

5.5.1 Keeping Children Safer Actions

As part of the Keeping Children Safer Actions, the Tasmanian Government is considering 'legislative solutions and other initiatives that will make it easier to share information about risks to children, including looking at whether issues of custom, practice and culture are creating unnecessary barriers'.[212] The Department of Premier and Cabinet is leading this work. The Government has indicated that legislative options will be developed for it to consider.[213] This action has an expected delivery date of March 2024.[214]

In the final week of our hearings, Secretary Gale told us the Department of Premier and Cabinet is planning reforms to facilitate government-wide information sharing, in the form of 'overarching legislation that would be superior to … all other … legislation in relation to that information'.[215] When asked whether a positive obligation to share information about child safety needed to be considered as part of the Department's work, Secretary Gale said: 'if we need to make it absolutely clear by making it mandatory that we share information, then we will certainly consider that strongly'.[216] Secretary Webster told us the Department of Justice is helping with this work and information was prepared for Cabinet at the end of 2022.[217]

When questioned in the final week of our hearings about professional development for staff to ensure they understand their child safety information sharing obligations, Secretary Gale said information sharing is 'largely driven by custom and practice':[218]

> … even though we know that there is no barrier to sharing that information between agencies, it has been difficult. And I think this gets to the cultural piece that will need to be a very significant part of the work that we do … it's one thing to enable through processes, legislation, and so on, but it is another to change the way in which people behave.[219]

Also related to this work is the Keeping Children Safer action of developing clear information about the circumstances in which agencies can and should share information about the status of investigations and/or investigative material.[220] We understand this work forms part of a broader project to build shared capability across government agencies for serious disciplinary investigations and is expected to be completed in October 2023.[221] We support this work and encourage the Government to develop a plan to ensure this information is known and accessible to relevant staff across agencies.

In the final week of our hearings, Secretary Gale also told us the Department is working on developing procedures to keep complainants informed about Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations within the parameters of the Personal Information Protection Act.[222] She said this will involve exploring how the Act can be changed to enable complainants to be kept better informed about these types of investigations.[223] We have not received further information about this initiative but support its continuation.

5.5.2 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act

One of the Keeping Children Safer Actions is to develop a Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework including Child and Youth Safe Standards and a Reportable Conduct Scheme.[224] Introducing child safe standards and a reportable conduct scheme were recommendations the National Royal Commission made in December 2017.[225]

On 22 November 2022, the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Bill 2022 was introduced into the Tasmanian Parliament. The Bill received Royal Assent and commenced as the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 ('Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act') on 1 July 2023. Implementation of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework, which comprises the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme, is now underway and has an expected delivery date of July 2024.[226]

We discuss the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act in detail in Chapter 18 but, for current purposes, Part 5 of the Act provides for information sharing. In addition to giving the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act broad information-sharing powers (described further in this chapter and in Chapter 18), the Act also provides for sharing information between specified individuals and organisations. This includes powers to share information between:

- the Independent Regulator (of the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme)
- an entity regulator (this can include government agencies or other bodies that assume regulatory functions related to the Reportable Conduct Scheme—the Independent Regulator is to determine these)
- the head of an entity (which would include a Secretary of a Department) (including in relation to contractors)
- the Commissioner of Police, a police officer, or police from other Australian jurisdictions
- an independent investigator, in some situations
- the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme

- the Integrity Commissioner
- a Minister
- any other roles prescribed by regulations.[227]

In Chapter 18, we recommend the Ombudsman be included in the entities required to share information (refer to Recommendation 18.3). Information that can be shared by and between these bodies relates to information or documents relating to the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme (noting that the Standards are broad in scope). This includes:

- information or documents relating to concerns about compliance with the Standards and Universal Principle
- information relating to reportable allegations and associated investigations, including findings and outcomes relating to reportable conduct.[228]

The disclosure of information relating to these matters must relate to:

- the purposes of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act
- the promotion of the safety and wellbeing of children
- a prescribed purpose.[229]

If there is any inconsistency with other legislation (for example, restrictions imposed by the Personal Information Protection Act or the Right to Information Act 2009 ('Right to Information Act')) the permissive information sharing powers of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act are intended to apply and override them.[230]

The Independent Regulator can also obtain information, make a record of information, disclose information to any person, and otherwise use information in situations where such an action is taken:

- to protect and promote the safety and wellbeing of children
- to enable the investigation or the enforcement of a law
- for investigatory, disciplinary or employment-related purposes related to the safety and wellbeing of children
- to share information with other jurisdictions and child safety oversight bodies to collect, publish and analyse data on approaches to child safety
- to perform a function or exercise a power in the Act
- for a prescribed purpose.[231]

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act also allows the Independent Regulator to disclose information relating to the administration of the Reportable Conduct Scheme, including:

- the details of an allegation, investigation and findings to a worker the subject of an allegation
- children and young people involved in an allegation and their guardian in particular situations.[232]

The Independent Regulator must also notify the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme of information relating to a 'relevant finding' made regarding reportable conduct. This includes:

- the fact that a finding has been made
- an outline of the finding and the reasons for it
- the name (including former names or aliases, if known) of the worker who is the subject of the finding
- the worker's date of birth (if known).[233]

The Act also offers protections relating to disclosing information that would identify a child or a person who has disclosed reportable conduct.[234]

Secretary Webster told us that allowing the flow of information between the Independent Regulator and a range of entities by overriding elements of the Right to Information Act and Personal Information Protection Act helps to ensure the safety of children is at the centre of information sharing.[235] We discuss the Right to Information Act in more detail in Chapter 17.

5.5.3 Department for Education, Children and Young People

We were also told that merging the former Department of Communities and the Department of Education into the Department for Education, Children and Young People on 1 October 2022 may help overcome some barriers to information sharing. We discuss the structure of the new Department in Chapter 7.

Secretary Bullard said that he saw this change as:

> … an opportunity to build closer links across all areas working to safeguard and protect Tasmania's children and young people; thereby building a more effective process for sharing information and taking a holistic approach to the prevention, identification and response to child sexual abuse in an institutional context.[236]

Secretary Gale also told us that 'putting the key functions relating to children in the one Agency will help to breakdown cultural and systems-based barriers to information sharing that could keep children safe'.[237] These views were echoed by Secretary Webster who indicated the new department would help ensure a more coordinated and consistent approach to child safety across key child services provided by government.[238]

The Department for Education, Children and Young People has established an oversight committee and advisory group comprising departmental staff to identify and advise about opportunities to, among other things:

- build mechanisms for coordinated decision-making, action and accountability
- improve the information staff have available to make better decisions about the safety, wellbeing and learning of children and young people.[239]

We support these efforts.

5.5.4 Our observations and recommendations

We consider, if successfully implemented, the work already underway across Tasmanian Government departments will go some way to improving information sharing and coordination of responses to child safety issues in Tasmania, including to child sexual abuse in institutions. However, we consider a key element missing from this work across government is the existence of clear and concise information about child safety information sharing obligations and the roles and responsibilities of staff in coordinating responses to child safety issues. We were told there is no publicly available memorandums or statements that set out how the Government manages information sharing internally (including as it relates to child safety).[240]

To address this gap, we recommend government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies work together to develop child safety information sharing, coordination and response guidelines. These guidelines must provide clear direction on the roles and responsibilities of agencies and staff in responding to child safety issues. The guidelines should be drafted to give effect to the guiding principle that the safety and wellbeing of children is paramount.

Aspects of a response we consider should be covered by the guidelines include:

- clarifying the lead agency in responses to child safety issues and their role and responsibilities
- clarifying the role and responsibilities of supporting agencies, including how to ensure the ongoing safety of children within the care of an agency, that any risks to children have been addressed, and that there has been timely fulfilment of relevant reporting and notification obligations and information sharing requirements
- clarifying the role and responsibilities of receiving agencies when information is shared

- developing processes for keeping affected children, families, carers and the community informed about responses to child safety issues
- developing processes for providing support to affected children and their immediate family and carers
- considering the use of disciplinary processes in parallel with any investigations undertaken by police and other regulators and professional bodies such as the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, Ahpra or the Teachers Registration Board
- developing processes for responding to reports of child safety issues when they are connected to another government or government funded agency or statutory body, including alerting the relevant agency of the report
- developing escalation and dispute resolution processes to resolve disagreements that may arise between agencies in responses to child safety issues.

Where necessary, the guidelines can be further supplemented with agency-specific information and resources. For example, in Chapter 21 we recommend that the Tasmanian Government, in collaboration with key stakeholders, should develop a statewide framework and plan for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Recommendation 21.8).

We also consider it important that agencies and statutory bodies examine the professional development needs of staff in relation to responding to child safety issues and the scope of their reporting and information sharing obligations. In a submission to our Commission of Inquiry, Laurel House said:

> There is a need for training and capacity building opportunities to be provided to institutions to ensure that all employees, regardless of their position, understand their role in keeping children safe. All employees and decision makers who work within services that support children should be required to undergo mandatory training that alerts them to the warning signs of childhood sexual abuse, to make them vigilant to grooming behaviours and other sexual misconduct, and to understand their reporting obligations and the risks that failing to act places on children, the employee, the workplace and the community.[241]

We note that one of the Keeping Children Safer Actions is to '[e]ncourage and support staff to raise child safety concerns'.[242] We also note the Keeping Children Safer Working Group (discussed in Section 4.3) has started mapping government agency resources relating to child safety so they can be tailored to departmental needs and support staff training and wider cultural change across the State Service.[243] This work is expected to be delivered in December 2023.[244] We are also aware that individual government departments (particularly the Department for Education, Children and Young People and the Department of Health) have made additional training available to staff on these issues.[245] We consider the guidelines should also identify relevant resources and professional development opportunities available to staff regarding responding to child safety issues.

As a whole of government initiative, the Department of Premier and Cabinet should lead the development of the child safety information sharing, coordination and response guidelines. It should also lead efforts to promote their use across government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies. This work will require a large culture change element, which the Government should fund.

Recommendation 19.8

1. The Department of Premier and Cabinet should lead the development of child safety information sharing, coordination and response guidelines to support government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies to respond to child safety issues. The guidelines should:
    a. set out the principles which guide information sharing, cross-agency coordination and the roles of different services and entities in responding to child safety issues, and require that staff are trained on these issues
    b. identify a process for nominating a lead agency for cross-agency responses to individual child safety issues and set out the lead agency's role and responsibilities
    c. identify a process for setting out the roles and responsibilities of collaborating agencies in responding to child safety issues
    d. explain child safety information-sharing obligations and responsibilities and how staff can fulfil them
    e. set out an escalation and dispute resolution process to resolve disagreements that may arise across agencies
    f. identify resources and professional development opportunities for staff in relation to responding to child safety issues
    g. be subject to periodic review to ensure they remain up to date and accurately reflect best practice cross-agency information sharing and coordination arrangements.
2. The Tasmanian Government should fund the culture change work required to achieve good information-sharing practices.

The Tasmanian Government should fund the culture change work required to achieve good information sharing practices.

6 Conclusion

An effective approach to preventing, identifying, reporting and responding to child sexual abuse in institutions requires a coordinated and sustained commitment across government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies. This starts with developing a clear strategy that directs how Tasmania intends to respond to child safety issues, including child sexual abuse in institutions. This strategy should be accompanied by an action plan to implement child sexual abuse reform over the short, medium, and long-term. The strategy and action plan should be supported by strong governance structures, including input from children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.

Staff working within government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies must also be empowered and supported to respond to child safety issues. This requires that they are clear on how they are expected to act when information is received and can confidently share information to protect the safety and wellbeing of children and young people. Legislation must be clear on when this can occur and should not hinder information sharing when it is necessary to address risks to child safety. Staff within government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies must also understand their broader roles and responsibilities to safeguard children, including how to:

- address risks to other children
- support victim-survivors
- escalate disagreements in relation to responses across agencies.

We consider the recommendations that we make in this chapter will help to create a united and coordinated whole of government approach to child sexual abuse that prioritises the safety and wellbeing of children in Tasmania.

20 State Service disciplinary processes

1 Introduction

A key element of an institution's response to child sexual abuse is the action they can take when there is an allegation of child sexual abuse or related conduct (such as boundary breaches or grooming behaviour) against a staff member within their organisation, including any disciplinary action. Within the State Service, the State Service Act 2000 ('State Service Act'), the State Service Code of Conduct and the Employment Directions that relate to suspensions, misconduct investigations and the ability of an employee to perform their role, form the central components of the State Service disciplinary system.[1]

Throughout our Inquiry, we heard there were significant problems with the Tasmanian State Service disciplinary system, particularly as it relates to matters involving child sexual abuse or related conduct. Problems with the disciplinary system resulted in slow or inadequate responses to concerning staff behaviour, leaving children to be cared for or supervised by people who posed a potential threat to their safety. To address these problems, we make recommendations in this chapter to:

- clarify and strengthen the articulation of expected and acceptable behaviour of state servants, including conduct outside of their employment
- improve the disciplinary processes that Heads of Agencies can follow in response to concerning staff behaviour, including considering child safety and a complainant's needs

- encourage the Tasmanian Industrial Commission to consider the special requirements that should apply when addressing child sexual abuse in relation to employment matters.

We also make observations about the role of unions in promoting child safety and invite their support in reforming the disciplinary process.

In this chapter, we set out how State Service disciplinary processes fit within the broader institutional response to allegations and concerns about child sexual abuse and related conduct.

We explain how the main mechanisms of the State Service disciplinary system—including unions and the industrial system—operate. We discuss the problems and failures we heard about the disciplinary system when it is used to address matters involving child sexual abuse, and recommend improvements.

In this chapter, while the focus is on the disciplinary provisions within the State Service Act and associated policies and procedures (the 'State Service disciplinary system'), we acknowledge obligations on the State arising from the broader employment framework. This framework includes the Industrial Relations Act 1984 and registered awards and agreements. While we do not explicitly refer to these broader frameworks in this chapter, we tested our recommendations with relevant stakeholders and experts. We understand the delicate and, at times, difficult balance incumbent on the State between exercising a duty of care to ensure the safety of children and complying with obligations to an employee in matters relevant to child sexual abuse.

We consider that, in exercising this balance, the duty of care to children has too often been compromised because of barriers within the existing disciplinary framework and its practical application. In this chapter, we seek to identify and address these barriers.

Our proposed reforms require a significant shift in how the State approaches this process and may require changes to awards and agreements. We consider that prioritising child safety justifies this approach.

2 Institutional responses to child sexual abuse

In Chapter 18, we discuss the obligation of Tasmanian Government departments that provide services to children to become child-safe organisations. This includes having child-focused processes for complaints and concerns. The National Royal Commission noted that responses to complaints of child sexual abuse encompass a range of actions that institutions should take. These actions include:

- Identifying complaints—child or adult victim-survivors who disclose possible child sexual abuse should be taken seriously.
- Assessing risk—potential safety issues for victim-survivors and other parties should be identified and action taken to ensure their safety (including for the subject of the complaint where necessary).
- Reporting—all relevant bodies and institutions should be informed of the complaint, including, for example, the police, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, and any relevant professional oversight body.
- Communicating and providing support—departments may be required to communicate with all affected parties and must assess the need for, and be able to provide, support for those involved, including complainants, parents, employees and other affected children.
- Investigating—this process should begin after a complaint is received and risk assessment completed. Some actions, for example, ensuring the integrity of a location as soon as possible after a complaint is received, can be crucial to an investigation.
- Maintaining records—institutions should maintain relevant records, including of investigation processes.
- Completing a root cause analysis—where required, review the circumstances of the complaint to identify possible systemic factors that may have contributed to the incident.
- Monitoring and reviewing—have policies and procedures to help continually improve the 'protection of children for whom the institution has responsibility'.[2]

In Chapter 6, we recommend establishing a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate. This Directorate would support agencies to meet the requirements outlined by the National Royal Commission, as would our recommendations for improved complaints policies and processes in each of our focus institutions: education, out of home care, youth detention and health (refer to Recommendations 6.6, 6.7, 6.8, 9.31, 9.32, 12.35, 15.16, 15.17). The Directorate would be responsible for three core functions comprising:

- support for local-level responses through case management
- investigations
- legal review of the investigation, and recommendations to the Secretary.

The State Service's disciplinary system would control management of child sexual abuse-related misconduct matters by the Directorate, including procedures for an investigation and the recommendations made at the end of an investigation.

3 State Service disciplinary system

The State Service disciplinary system has remained largely unchanged for more than 20 years. This section provides a brief outline of the system's main features, key elements of which we discuss in more detail throughout this chapter.

If an allegation of child sexual abuse is made against a staff member, a preliminary assessment is conducted to decide whether the matter should be investigated to determine if there has been a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. We understand preliminary assessments are sometimes carried out before the Head of Agency is aware of the allegation.[3]

Once the preliminary assessment is complete, the information is transmitted to the Head of Agency who then decides how to respond to the allegations. The response may include:

- suspension
- investigation for a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct
- terminating employment when an employee no longer holds minimum requirements for employment (such as a loss of Registration to Work with Vulnerable People).

These processes are guided by Employment Directions issued by the Premier.

If the Head of Agency has reasonable grounds to believe a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct may have occurred, then the Head of Agency is required to appoint an investigator to investigate and determine whether the employee has breached the State Service Code of Conduct.[4]

At the end of the investigation, if the Head of Agency determines there has been a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, they may apply sanctions, including counselling, a reprimand, reassignment of duties or termination of employment.[5]

We note the State has a continued duty of care to an employee who is alleged to have breached the Code the Conduct during the relevant Employment Direction process.

Unions play a role in this process by:

- providing information and support to their members
- ensuring procedures are adhered to throughout the disciplinary process.

Unions can also support members to appeal to the Tasmanian Industrial Commission against adverse decisions.

4 Problems with disciplinary processes

In this section, we outline the problems we heard that relate to disciplinary processes in the State Service.

We examine the sudden increase in the number of state servant suspensions by respective departments, which was one factor that instigated the establishment of our Inquiry. It is possible such disciplinary action had been avoided previously because of the inadequacy of the disciplinary processes we heard about and the difficulties in terminating the employment of staff in matters pertaining to child sexual abuse.

4.1 Suspensions in the State Service

As discussed in Chapter 1, an increasing number of state servant suspensions due to concerns about child sexual abuse contributed to establishing our Commission of Inquiry.

By February 2023, we were aware there had been 92 state servants suspended from their employment since 1 January 2000 in relation to allegations of child sexual abuse or related conduct in the then Department of Communities, the then Department of Education and the Department of Health. These are outlined in Figure 20.1 and in more detail below.[6]

Figure 20.1: Suspensions by department for the period January 2000 to February 2023 and for the period November 2020 to February 2023[7]

Source: Tasmanian Government, ED trackers produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to Commission notices to produce, 2023.

4.1.1 Department of Communities

Of the 23 suspensions reported by the former Department of Communities (now the Department for Education, Children and Young People), 10 occurred since or just before the announcement of our Inquiry in November 2020.[8] Nineteen suspensions related to employees staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[9] In Chapter 11, Case study 7, we consider the Department's response to allegations of child sexual abuse made against staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. In that case study, we describe instances where employees remained on site despite the Department being aware of allegations through redress claims, civil litigation and other complaints.

Within the 23 suspensions, there were four suspensions in relation to Child Safety Services since 2000.[10] Two of these suspensions occurred during our Inquiry. We discuss this concerningly low number of suspensions in Chapter 8.

The Department acknowledged that poor record keeping and inaccurate data collection affected the reliability of the data the Department provided in relation to Ashley Youth Detention Centre and out of home care.[11] Some staff were suspended multiple times without being dismissed. The Department did not routinely report matters to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, Child Safety Services and Tasmania Police.

4.1.2 Department of Education

In the former Department of Education, records provided to us indicate there had been 43 suspensions relating to allegations of child sexual abuse or related conduct between January 2000 and February 2023, with 20 of these occurring since the announcement of our Inquiry.[12] In Chapter 5, we discuss some of these cases and the effects of the Department's initial investigations on victim-survivors. In this chapter, we discuss some problems with disciplinary processes highlighted by these case studies. The Department's record keeping in the period set by our terms of reference was much better than that of other departments, although we were told of issues with its record keeping outside this period.

4.1.3 Department of Health

There were 26 suspensions in the Department of Health since January 2000 to February 2023, with eight of these occurring since the announcement of our Inquiry.[13] Our review of the information on suspensions the Department provided suggest the Department routinely notified the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme when it suspended employees in relation to alleged child sexual abuse. However, the Department was not consistent in how it reported matters to police or other regulatory bodies such as the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency ('Ahpra') or the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line.[14]

4.2 Inadequacy of disciplinary processes

Through submissions, sessions with a Commissioner, stakeholder consultations, roundtable discussions and public hearings, we identified difficulties with State Service disciplinary processes and procedures. Criticisms and concerns about disciplinary processes as they relate to allegations of child sexual abuse came not only from victim-survivors and their families and supporters but, also, government officials tasked with administering disciplinary processes—from human resources staff to departmental secretaries.

In summary, these problems included:

- A one-size-fits-all approach under the disciplinary system means the investigative processes used in cases of serious misconduct, such as child sexual abuse, are the same as those used for lower-level misconduct.
- There is no ability to immediately terminate employees in cases of serious misconduct where it is overwhelmingly clear the misconduct occurred or the employee admits to the misconduct.
- The basis for, and timing of, suspending employees is unclear following an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse.
- The process for terminating employment is unnecessarily difficult in situations where an employee no longer possesses the certification or accreditation necessary to perform their role.
- The State Service provides insufficient guidance on issues and considerations regarding disciplinary processes.

More specifically, we heard wide-ranging criticisms of and concerns about disciplinary processes regarding each of the institutions we examined.

In the context of children in schools, we received evidence that:

- Narrow and legalistic interpretations of the State Service Code of Conduct meant that despite information suggesting that children might be at risk, the behaviour did not result in disciplinary action. This was particularly the case when behaviour occurred outside school grounds.[15]
- Investigations tended to consider each individual allegation in a complaint separately rather than assessing whether the allegations reflected a pattern of behaviour consistent with sexual abuse or boundary breaches such as grooming.[16]
- Investigation processes were slow, not trauma-informed, did not reflect good practice when interviewing children (where this occurred), and did not appear to understand grooming behaviours.[17]

- Some departmental responses lacked an understanding of child sexual abuse and related concerns.[18]
- Investigations ended if a teacher resigned.[19]
- There was not enough support, care and communication with children, parents, staff and the school community.[20]
- Preliminary assessments appear to have been treated as mini-investigations and developed as a way to deal with disciplinary matters before engaging with the more involved Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct process.[21]

Regarding children in out of home care, we observed:

- Low numbers of disciplinary processes. Because of poor record keeping, it was difficult to determine whether there had been more disciplinary action than that reported to us or whether the Department had been slow to take action against staff for concerning behaviour.[22]

Regarding children in youth detention, we make the following findings and observations in Chapter 11:

- The State Service disciplinary framework was not suited to managing risks associated with child sexual abuse.[23]
- There were problems with the preliminary assessment process, including:
    - applying a high threshold to the initiation of a disciplinary investigation and, instead, conducting a proxy investigation through preliminary assessment processes
    - a lack of clarity in the process for initiating a preliminary assessment regarding a conflict of interest, including identifying a suitable decision maker
    - unacceptable delays in the process risked exposing children to ongoing harm.[24]
- The Department adopted informal practices of 'putting allegations' to alleged perpetrators for response.[25]
- The Department showed a reluctance to consider the cumulative impact of multiple allegations.[26]
- At times, serious complaints were being investigated by staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and not being appropriately escalated.[27]
- At times, the Department did not adequately and appropriately investigate complaints in a timely manner, including complaints made by staff and detainees, and allegations made through redress schemes.[28]

- There were real or perceived challenges in responding to allegations of child sexual abuse against staff due to industrial pressures.[29]
- One of the limitations on the Department's ability to investigate complaints or take disciplinary action regarding allegations of child sexual abuse or related conduct by staff was the absence of provisions in the State Service Code of Conduct relating directly to child safety or child abuse.[30]
- At least until late 2020, due to legal advice or a practice that had developed, no disciplinary action was taken regarding allegations about staff from redress schemes without the Department seeking a sworn statement from a complainant.[31]
- In late 2020, the Department changed its approach to taking disciplinary action against staff who had allegations of child sexual abuse against them and started to place appropriate weight on public interest considerations.[32]
- Despite improvements over the last few years, there continues to be significant delays in taking disciplinary action against staff with allegations of child sexual abuse against them.[33]
- There appeared over time to be a tension or 'push-pull' between the prioritisation of risks to child safety and risks to staff morale and wellbeing. We saw periods where concerns about child safety appeared to be dominant, but over time as the Department attempted to respond to safety concerns emerging from staff culture and conduct, the wellbeing of staff would reemerge as a dominant consideration.[34]

Regarding children in health services, we make the following findings or observations in Chapter 14:

- Investigators examining child sexual abuse allegations in health services should have access to relevant expertise and provide victim-survivors with the option to take part in an investigation.[35]
- There were perceived limitations on taking disciplinary action against a staff member under the State Service Code of Conduct because the requirement that employees abide by Australian law was assumed to require evidence that a person has been convicted of a crime.[36]
- There is a need to apply independent and rigorous investigatory and disciplinary processes to complaints in health settings and for these processes to use trauma-informed practices to minimise trauma for complainants.[37]
- Launceston General Hospital failed to consider the cumulative effect of complaints about James Griffin.[38]
- None of the many concerns raised with Mr Griffin were responded to with a disciplinary response harsher than a letter, education and direction. A disciplinary process was only recommended when there was no other option but to do so, namely, when Mr Griffin was unable to perform his duties when his Registration to Work with Vulnerable People was suspended on 31 July 2019.[39]

- Launceston General Hospital's response to Will Gordon's 2017 Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint did not comply with the requirements of a State Service Code of Conduct investigation.[40]
- Standards of behaviour for staff working in child-facing roles should have been in place, so Mr Griffin's conduct could be transparently assessed and disciplinary action triggered in response to his repeated failures to comply with the standards. The State Service Code of Conduct is not sufficient to assess child safety complaints given its general nature.[41]
- The disciplinary process into Mr Griffin was aborted when he resigned. This practice means the institution does not have the opportunity to learn from any systemic issues that may arise by examining the alleged conduct. Once such a process stops, there is no record preventing the ex-employee from being re-employed to the State Service at a later date.

4.3 Difficulties with terminating employment

Terminating the employment of an employee from the Tasmanian State Service is difficult. We were told this difficulty stems from the provisions of the State Service Code of Conduct and the processes for terminating employment such as Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct.

According to the interim report of the Independent Review of the Tasmanian State Service, terminations of employment from the State Service for breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct are difficult and, therefore, rare.[42] The Independent Review's final report, published in 2021, examined (among other things) the Tasmanian State Service's misconduct and disciplinary framework. The Independent Review's remit was all types of breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct, not only matters involving child sexual abuse. It reported 320 allegations of breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct in the five years before the report's publication. Of these allegations, just over half, 165 (52 per cent), were confirmed breaches, of which only 11 (about 4 per cent) resulted in termination of employment.[43] Stakeholders told the Independent Review that 'the overly prescriptive nature of procedures associated with separations in the [Tasmanian State Service] may be impacting on rates at which employees are terminated for breaches of the Code of Conduct or underperformance'.[44] The Independent Review found, compared with the proportion of terminations of employment for misconduct in the Australian Public Service, terminations of employment for Code of Conduct violations in the Tasmanian State Service were much lower.[45]

Similarly, a 2021 report for the Department of Premier and Cabinet, Critical Analysis Report on Termination in the State Service, noted the disciplinary system in Tasmania was heavily prescriptive compared with other states and territories, and that this resulted in lower resolution rates for misconduct matters and longer times to resolve such matters.[46] The report concluded that the low turnover rate in the Tasmanian State Service was:

> caused by the prescriptive nature of procedures in the [Tasmanian State Service]. Because a failure to strictly adhere to each step could result in the termination being alleged to have been mismanaged, extensive time is taken to ensure everything is covered and every step is taken.
> This focus, internally, on form over substance then unduly narrows the focus of the [Tasmanian Industrial Commission]. The [Tasmanian Industrial Commission] is reviewing strict procedures which already burden the [Tasmanian State Service] system and is not empowered, through legislation, to take a more practical or discretionary view of matters.[47]

The Independent Review's interim report observed that stakeholders had expressed concerns that 'employer-initiated terminations are rarely used in the [Tasmanian State Service] … termination is very difficult, even for very clear examples of underperformance or misconduct'.[48] Stakeholders noted that the reasons for this included:

- misconduct procedures were difficult
- natural justice requirements could be overly burdensome
- there are 'general sensitivities around terminations'.[49]

Some people who engaged with our Commission of Inquiry made similar observations about difficulties associated with misconduct and disciplinary procedures. For example, Michael Easton, Chief Executive Officer, Integrity Commission, said public sector agencies in Tasmania were generally 'overly risk averse' when contemplating taking action against employees.[50] In Mr Easton's view, this stemmed from an approach in government agencies that over-emphasised privacy and confidentiality, and agencies' desire to 'avoid employees being reinstated by the Tasmanian Industrial Commission'.[51]

Likewise, Eric Daniels, former Chief Executive, Hospitals North/North West in the Department of Health, told us he thought there was a 'conservative industrial environment' in the Tasmanian State Service.[52] Mr Daniels said, in his experience:

> [n]ot associated with child sexual abuse but associated with other what I consider to be reasonably significant matters in relation to the practice of individuals, are treated with quite significant delicacy, for want of a better word, to ensure procedural fairness.[53]

When asked whether it was fair to say there was a focus on industrial relations rather than on child safety when managing concerns about employees, Mr Daniels hypothesised that he believed this was the case.[54]

A further general observation about the nature of employment in the Tasmanian State Service is that Tasmania's relatively small population may contribute to the 'general sensitivities' about terminations of employment. For example, Professor Richard Eccleston, University of Tasmania, told us that '[g]iven the broader community dynamics in Tasmania, there is also a risk that obligations to colleagues might trump obligations to uphold high ethical standards in the workplace'.[55] Professor Eccleston went on to say:

> [t]here are strong social and professional connections among the population and among many employees of the [Tasmanian State Service]. These interdependencies make it particularly difficult to maintain integrity and a commitment to process and ethical conduct.[56]

We are concerned that a culture of not addressing poor professional conduct, of any nature, may embolden child sexual abuse offenders in the workplace.

5 Amending the State Service Code of Conduct

5.1 State Service Code of Conduct

The State Service Act governs the conduct of Tasmanian State Service employees. The Act's provisions set out the standards and conduct expected of State Service employees and the consequences for engaging in misconduct. Relevant to employee misconduct, the Act includes:

- the State Service Code of Conduct[57]
- sanctions for breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct[58]
- provisions regarding the termination of employment.[59]

Section 9 of the State Service Act outlines the State Service Code of Conduct. The State Service Code of Conduct outlines the required behaviour of all state servants. It is broad in nature, which means it does not contain specific provisions about child sexual abuse. This reflects a similar approach across most Australian states and territories.[60] Still, depending on the situation, child sexual abuse and related conduct could constitute a breach of several provisions of the State Service Code of Conduct.

Relevant to matters that involve child sexual abuse and related conduct, several provisions in the State Service Code of Conduct require that all State Service employees conduct themselves in particular ways 'in the course of State Service employment'. For example, employees must, in the course of their employment:

- behave honestly and with integrity[61]
- act with care and diligence[62]
- treat everyone with respect and without harassment, victimisation or discrimination[63]
- comply with the law[64]
- behave in a way that upholds the State Service Principles.[65] (These principles include that the State Service performs its functions 'in an impartial, ethical and professional manner'.)[66]

State Service employees also 'must at all times behave in a way that does not adversely affect the integrity and good reputation of the State Service'.[67] This requirement captures conduct that does not occur in the course of employment but has a sufficient nexus between the conduct and the employee's State Service employment (this is discussed in Section 5.3).

State Service employees must also comply with any lawful and reasonable direction given by a person having authority to give the direction.[68]

Depending on the situation, child sexual abuse and related conduct (including boundary breaches and grooming behaviours) may contravene the State Service Code of Conduct by:

- breaching the State Service Principle of ethical and professional behaviour
- being a breach of applicable law
- victimising children
- adversely affecting the integrity and good reputation of the State Service.

A finding that an employee has breached the State Service Code of Conduct can result in sanctions, including:

- counselling
- a reprimand
- reassignment of duties
- termination.[69]

However, as explained, we understand that termination of employment is seldom used in relation to sanctions imposed for breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct and that it can be difficult to terminate employees from the Tasmanian State Service.

5.2 Suitability for child safety

Several people told us the State Service Code of Conduct is not suitable for taking disciplinary action in relation to child sexual abuse or related conduct. Timothy Bullard, Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People, said the State Service Code of Conduct 'is not a framework well suited to the determination of allegations of child abuse'.[70]

Kathrine Morgan-Wicks, Secretary of the Department of Health, considered the State Service Code of Conduct should be amended to include a specific provision aimed at prohibiting specific behaviours.[71] Michael Pervan, then Secretary of the former Department of Communities, said the State Service Code of Conduct was ill-suited to investigating evidence from redress applications and allegations of child sexual abuse in general.[72]

Professors Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, who conducted the Independent Education Review, observed that the generic nature of the Code's provisions meant it was 'ill-suited to the particular contexts of schools' in that it could not 'adequately deal with allegations of child sexual abuse made against Department of Education employees'.[73]

These comments about the general unsuitability of the State Service Code of Conduct to deal with matters involving child sexual abuse or child safety were affirmed by Ginna Webster, Secretary, Department of Justice, and Jenny Gale, Secretary, Department of Premier and Cabinet and Head of the State Service, both of whom indicated that the State is considering reforms to the State Service Code of Conduct.[74]

5.3 A Code of Conduct that responds to risks of child sexual abuse

It is apparent there are deficiencies and problems with the application or interpretation of the State Service Code of Conduct, particularly when it is used to address matters involving child sexual abuse. These problems contribute to the difficulty in taking disciplinary action against employees. They include the fact the State Service Code of Conduct and/or its narrow interpretation gives insufficient weight to the risk that a state servant's behaviour may place children in danger of sexual or other forms of abuse. These problems arise from the interpretation of the following requirements of the State Service Code of Conduct that:

- an employee must comply with all applicable Australian law
- an employee must at all times uphold the integrity and good reputation of the State Service
- conduct must be 'in the course of employment' or have a 'nexus' to employment.

These interpretations are discussed in the following sections.

The application of these provisions is guided by advice from the Office of the Solicitor-General. As discussed in Chapter 17, there are limits to a government department's ability to seek legal advice from external lawyers. Heads of departments are required to follow the advice of the Solicitor-General.

5.3.1 Comply with Australian law

As noted, State Service employees must comply with all applicable Australian law in the course of their employment.[75] Child sexual abuse is a breach of the law and, if the perpetrator was found guilty in a court, this would constitute a breach of this provision of the State Service Code of Conduct. Further, given that disciplinary processes attract a lower standard of proof, if it was determined on the balance of probabilities that an employee was likely to have committed a criminal act of sexual abuse, the employee would have contravened the Code requirement to comply with all applicable Australian law.[76]

However, there appears to be a 'historical and cultural' application which means this provision has not been applied unless there has been a proven breach of an Australian law (to the criminal standard).[77]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that the Australian law requirement:

> is considered to be applicable only where the relevant offending of child sexual abuse has been proven in an Australian court of law (i.e. an offender has been found not to have complied with an applicable Australian law) and not where there is only an investigation, or charges only have been laid, or court proceedings are pending or underway.[78]

Similarly, Secretary Bullard observed that 'where a prosecution does not proceed or is unsuccessful', the Head of Agency will rely on other provisions of the Code of Conduct to take disciplinary action, which are normally those relating to behaving with honesty and with integrity, acting with care and diligence, or acting with respect and without harassment, victimisation or discrimination.[79] These provisions relate to conduct that is in the course of employment.

The Tasmanian State Service Code of Conduct is based on the Australian Public Service Code of Conduct.[80] The latter's guidance for the equivalent provision—must comply with all applicable Australian law—makes it clear that the decision maker does not need to wait until a breach of the law has been proven in a court for the provision to apply.[81]

Noting that criminal prosecutions often do not proceed for reasons unrelated to whether the perpetrator committed the offence (including, for example, when the alleged victim is very young or is unwilling to give evidence in a criminal trial), we suggest the broader interpretation, based on the balance of probabilities that criminal conduct has occurred, would allow for a focus on child safety. As a matter of principle, we assume the Government would wish to be able to ensure that state servants who are likely to have committed a child sexual abuse offence can be removed from the State Service.

5.3.2 Uphold the integrity and good reputation of the State Service

Section 9(14) of the State Service Code of Conduct requires an employee to 'at all times behave in a way that does not adversely affect the integrity and good reputation of the State Service'. This provision appears to be broad and allow the Head of Agency to take disciplinary action against an employee who had been involved in sexual activity or related conduct with a child or young person, irrespective of where that conduct occurred. Unlike many of the other relevant requirements in the State Service Code of Conduct, it does not state that the conduct must be in the 'course of employment'.

The Office of the Solicitor-General has provided advice on the interpretation of the integrity and good reputation provision, suggesting 'integrity' or 'good reputation' in this section are not concerned with:

> ...general considerations relating to the private behaviour, morality or fitness of character of a particular employee, unless there can be said to be a nexus between the behaviour and employment in the [Tasmanian State Service], in the context of accountability to the government, the parliament and the public. Whether there is a nexus requires an evaluative judgement, in the particular circumstances of the case.[82]

Under this interpretation of section 9(14), there is still a requirement for there to be a nexus between the employee's behaviour and their employment in the State Service (in the context of accountability to the Government, the Parliament and the public) for the provision to apply. Presumably, this limitation reflects the view that some aspects of private behaviour should not attract a disciplinary sanction. For example, historically, this could have protected state servants from sanctions simply because they were living with a person outside marriage or had unusual political opinions.

In the context of child sexual abuse, we consider that a better approach is to specifically deal with behaviour that places children at risk, rather than relying on value judgments about whether there is a nexus between the conduct complained of and its propensity to adversely affect the integrity and good reputation of the State Service. In other words, where a state servant works with children or young people and the alleged conduct involves a child or young person, this should supply the necessary nexus or link between that conduct and the disciplinary processes that apply under the State Service Code of Conduct.

In other jurisdictions, similar requirements that state servants not behave in ways that can adversely affect the State Service are defined in ways that may avoid this issue. For example, in Queensland, misconduct is defined in section 187 of the Public Service Act 2008 (Qld) as:

> (a) inappropriate or improper conduct in an official capacity; or (b) inappropriate or improper conduct in a private capacity that reflects seriously and adversely on the public service.

The Code of Conduct for the public service in Queensland also states that state servants will 'ensure our private conduct maintains the integrity of the public service and our ability to perform our duties'.[83]

Further, we note that in the Australian Public Service ('APS') Code of Conduct, employees are required to behave in a way that upholds 'the integrity and good reputation of the employees' Agency and the APS' at all times.[84] This requirement is explained as follows:

> 2.28. Under s.13(11), employees must at all times uphold the Values and Employment Principles and behave in a way that upholds the integrity and good reputation of their agency and the APS. This means that APS employees' behaviour outside work is subject to the Code to the extent that:
>
> - it could reasonably be viewed as failing to uphold the integrity and good reputation of the employee's agency or the APS, or
> - it could reasonably call into question the employee's capacity to comply with the Values and Employment Principles in their work—for example, their ability to be impartial or respectful.[85]

This requirement of the Australian Public Service Code of Conduct is interpreted as applying to an employee's conduct 'outside normal work hours and at non-work premises'.[86] The Australian Public Service advice on interpreting section 13(11) of the Code of Conduct further states that while there is no explicit requirement for conduct to be connected to the employee's employment, in practice, however, a finding that conduct has breached the code 'will generally require some degree of connection to the employee's employment'.[87]

The Tasmanian legislation should make clear that the requirement that employees are to behave in a way that does not 'adversely affect the integrity and good reputation of the State Service' in section 9(14) includes employee conduct outside work where the relevant behaviour means that children and young people are at risk of harm.

5.3.3 Conduct in the course of employment

The term 'in the course of State Service employment' is used in several subsections of the State Service Code of Conduct. Based on evidence at our hearings and the materials provided to us, we consider that the term does not adequately protect children from sexual abuse.[88] The present application of 'in the course of employment' can result in conduct such as grooming behaviour that occurs outside of work situations not being regarded as misconduct under the State Service Code of Conduct, when it should. Secretary Bullard told us:

> It's important to note that these subsections directly relate to conduct that is 'in the course of State Service employment'. In other words, misconduct that occurs outside the work context (e.g. at a weekend social event or after a young person has left the school where the alleged perpetrator is teaching), would not naturally invoke > the [disciplinary] process [to investigate whether the Code of Conduct has been breached] as it would not amount to 'in the course of State Service employment'.[89]

Secretary Webster made similar observations about these restrictions in the State Service Code of Conduct:

> The current Code of Conduct is largely limited to investigations within 'the course of employment' or 'in connection with employment'. There are limitations on investigations under [the Code of Conduct] where the alleged conduct occurs outside the workplace, and where the threshold for a criminal investigation or prosecution is not reached.[90]

In 2021, the State Service Management Office provided the Department of Health with an interpretation of the meaning of the phrase 'in the course of State Service employment' in relation to the State Service Code of Conduct, stating that this would include conduct 'directly associated with and expected of an employee at work and in the course of their duties and can include travelling for work purposes'.[91] This interpretation is based on workers compensation law cases that have discussed the meaning of 'in the course of employment' in an industrial relations context.[92] We consider the test for a connection to employment in the context of workers compensation should differ from that applied in connection with disciplinary matters related to the conduct of state servants towards children.

The Office of the Solicitor-General has also provided advice to Department of Health staff on the meaning of 'in the course of employment', arriving at an equally narrow interpretation, but based on High Court authority on vicarious liability, not workers compensation law.[93] The meaning of the words 'in the course of employment' in the context of a civil compensation claim, in which it is argued the State should be held vicariously liable for the behaviour of a state servant, may differ from the way it should be interpreted in deciding whether a state servant should be disciplined for their behaviour that places children at risk of harm.[94]

This narrow interpretation of 'in the course of employment' has meant that, in some cases, inappropriate behaviours towards children and young people were deemed not to have occurred in the course of employment. For example, we heard in victim-survivor Rachel's (a pseudonym) case, the 2006 investigation into the conduct of her teacher, Wayne (a pseudonym), which included saying she had 'a nice arse', drawing a penis with a pen on her ankle and providing her with alcohol, found that he had not breached the State Service Code of Conduct as the relevant conduct had occurred during a non-school sports trip.[95] (Rachel's case is discussed in Case study 'Wayne' in Chapter 5.) The investigation concluded that although these incidents had occurred, they did not occur in the course of Wayne's employment with the Department of Education.[96] This conclusion was based on advice from the Office of the Solicitor-General.[97] When asked about this advice, Sarah Kay SC, the Solicitor-General, told us:

> I wasn't asked there about whether action could be taken or what action could be taken, it was a question about the construction of a phrase in the statute. And, they are the words of the statute, so whether something might be considered inappropriate or not objectively is a separate matter to considering the scope of the words that we're dealing with in section 9 of the State Service Act.[98]

We acknowledge that if the situation that arose in Rachel's case were to arise in 2023, it would most likely be handled differently. Secretary Bullard explained that, in 2022, a sufficient nexus would be drawn between Wayne's conduct and his employment for the purpose of the State Service Code of Conduct:

> Ongoing conduct, even outside of school hours, can be held to account and therefore included in the [disciplinary] process where the conduct occurred because of a relationship that had developed out of the employee/student relationship.
> If allegations such as those raised by Rachel were raised today, the Department would review all allegations in light of there being such a nexus between the allegations and being 'in the course of employment'.[99]

Secretary Bullard told us that, in 2022, the student-teacher relationship would be relevant at all times, not just while on school grounds or during school hours. [Emphasis added.][100]

However, we note that the State Service Code of Conduct has not changed. Secretary Bullard acknowledged that the requirement for conduct to be 'in the course of employment' is an ongoing issue: '[t]he need to establish a nexus between the alleged conduct and it being "in the course of employment" means that the Department remains exposed to failings and criticism'.[101] The Solicitor-General also told us she had not observed any change in the way her Office views 'course of employment'.[102]

Regarding the Department of Health, Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us she had been notified of matters involving allegations against Department employees where there were questions about the nexus between the conduct and the employee's employment.[103] Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us, in these cases, she had applied a low threshold and had suspended employees while an investigation was undertaken despite the conduct in question having occurred outside the workplace.[104] She said this was done to place 'child safety absolutely at the centre'.[105] We support this approach.

In our view, the requirement that there be a nexus between conduct and employment will continue to compromise the safety of children in government institutions. To ensure their safety, the State Service Code of Conduct should be able to hold state servants accountable for behaviours associated with child sexual abuse, wherever those behaviours occur, including outside of the workplace or after working hours. Where an employee has contact with children or young people through their work, and an allegation is made against that employee, the fact that the connection between the employee and the child or young person is through the employee's work should be enough to warrant disciplinary action to ensure all children and young people in that workplace are protected.

We considered other Australian jurisdictions to determine if there was guidance for the Tasmanian Government on how to address the issue of a nexus to employment. In the Northern Territory, an employee will commit a breach of discipline if the employee 'in the course of employment or in circumstances having a relevant connection to his or her employment, conducts himself or herself in an improper manner'.[106] The meaning of 'relevant connection' in this context is not defined, but it may capture a broader range of behaviour as being connected to employment.

In the Australian Capital Territory, section 9 of the Public Sector Management Act 1994 (ACT) sets out conduct requirements for public servants, some of which relate to conduct 'when acting in connection with the public servant's job'.[107] While 'acting in connection with' is not defined, the Australian Capital Territory Public Sector Standards Commissioner guidelines state that, in relation to the definition of misconduct, '[t]here is no restriction on where or when this conduct occurs and [it] may relate to behaviour that occurs outside of the workplace'. The guidance then notes this may particularly be the case where 'there is a clear connection between the employee's out-of-hours conduct and their employment'.[108]

However, without access to legal advice such as that obtained through our inquiries in relation to the Tasmanian State Service Code of Conduct, it is difficult to draw conclusions about other jurisdictions. As a general observation, other jurisdictions appear to emphasise the need to always uphold the ethical standards of the public sector at all times, although they also make reference to 'in the course of employment'.[109]

We note that professional bodies such as Ahpra and the Teachers Registration Board, which regulate the conduct of health professionals and teachers respectively, have provisions in their legislation that allow them to consider the behaviour of these professionals outside a work setting. Ahpra can take immediate action against a registered health professional based on a 'public interest test' for conduct that may occur outside the practice of a health practitioner's profession (which could include child sexual abuse occurring outside the work environment).[110]

The Teachers Registration Board assesses a teacher's suitability against a good-character test and fitness-to-teach test. The Board can immediately suspend a teacher's registration if it reasonably believes they may pose a risk of harm to students for any reason.[111] The decisions of the Board affect a person's employment, and we consider they could be used as examples for the basis of a similar test in the State Service Code of Conduct.

In relation to police, there are provisions in Western Australia and Tasmania relating to 'loss of confidence'.[112] This enables a Head of Agency to terminate an employee's employment where they have lost confidence in the suitability of an employee to continue in their position having regard to competence, integrity, performance, conduct, or loss of community confidence.[113]

Recommendation 20.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should, by introducing legislation or through other means, ensure that the State Service Code of Conduct includes the following binding obligations:

    a. if a state servant's conduct creates an unacceptable risk to the safety and wellbeing of children or young people accessing government and government funded services, the State Service disciplinary framework should apply, and termination, suspension or sanction should be available (including being able to terminate employment based on a loss of confidence)

    b. in relation to child sexual abuse and related conduct, the requirement that state servants must comply with all applicable Australian law is determined on the basis of a balance of probabilities test and does not require a breach of the law to be determined by a court

    c. where a state servant has contact with a child or young person through their work, and an allegation is made of child sexual abuse or related conduct in relation to that child, this contact is sufficient to establish the conduct occurred 'in the course of employment' or, in the case of section 9(14), has a nexus to employment regardless of whether the conduct complained of occurred outside the workplace or outside working hours.

2. The Tasmanian Government should develop policy documents or guidance on the interpretation of the State Service Code of Conduct explaining (among other things):

    a. how the required connection between a state servant's employment and a child and young person should be interpreted in matters that involve child sexual abuse or related conduct

    b. explain that all provisions of the Code of Conduct should be interpreted to prioritise the protection of children.

5.4 Professional conduct policies

The broad application of the State Service Code of Conduct means it does not contain specific provisions about child sexual abuse. This has led some to call for a separate code of conduct for state servants working in organisational contexts that serve children, particularly in education.[114]

For example, in their evidence to our Inquiry, Professors Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, authors of the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, told us the State Service Code of Conduct was 'generic' and inadequate for the specific context of schools.[115] As we note in Chapter 4, in their report, Professors Smallbone and McCormack recommended a separate code of conduct for schools.[116]

While we agree with the problem identified by Professors Smallbone and McCormack, we are reluctant to recommend a specific code of conduct for each institutional area that serves children. In his evidence, Secretary Bullard was also hesitant to endorse the idea of an education-specific code of conduct due to the current drafting of the State Service Act:

> … if I could reflect on the professors' report, they came back with a recommendation that we should have an education-specific code of conduct, they called it. Our advice is that that would be difficult under the current drafting of the Act because you're going to end up with duelling codes, but the closer that we can get to describing behaviours that are or aren't acceptable in a context, the better.[117]

We are also conscious that developing an institution-specific code of conduct would not be in line with the approach in most Australian jurisdictions, which have one code of conduct applying across the public sector.[118]

To meet the intent of Professors Smallbone and McCormack's proposal, we recommend professional conduct policies be instituted in all child-serving government institutions.

These departmental policies should address child sexual abuse, including related conduct such as boundary breaches, grooming and other inappropriate behaviours of a sexual nature, for example, voyeurism, and inappropriate speech and other forms of communication, including electronic communication.[119]

To ensure disciplinary action can be taken for conduct that breaches these professional conduct policies, the State Service Code of Conduct should be amended to include a provision that stipulates that when a breach of a specified departmental policy occurs, this breach may amount to a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. This would avoid the situation that currently exists; for example, in education, where a breach of a departmental policy must be shown to amount to a direct breach of one or another of the provisions of the State Service Code of Conduct, such as a failure to act with due care or diligence in section 9(2) or the requirement that employees must behave in a way that does not adversely affect the integrity and good reputation of the State Service in section 9(14).[120]

We understand that, at the time our hearings concluded in September 2022, the State Service was exploring changes to its Code of Conduct and to disciplinary processes.[121] One such potential change was the use of standing orders made under the State Service Act to link specific prohibited behaviours to breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct. Section 34(2) of the Act provides that a Head of Agency can make standing orders for administration and operation of the agency. It is a requirement of the State Service Code of Conduct that an 'employee must comply with any standing orders and with any lawful and reasonable direction given by a person having authority to give the direction' [emphasis added] (section 9(6)). However, it appears that, in practice, in the event of a failure to follow a lawful and reasonable direction there does not need to also be a standing order to establish a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct.[122]

Secretary Gale told us she had asked the State Service Management Office, which is in the Department of Premier and Cabinet and advises Secretary Gale on State Service employment matters, to:

> ... investigate the use of standing orders for departments which may then make clear the link between certain behaviours that must or must not occur through a standing order that then would make the link between that behaviour and the Code of Conduct quite explicit.[123]

The standing orders could allow specific behaviours to be proscribed in the particular settings in which they are likely to occur, for example, health, education, out of home care or youth justice. They could allow for specific behaviours to be described and prohibited.

However, we note this approach to regulating misconduct in the State Service was previously attempted in the Department of Education. Documents provided to us show that the Department's policy document, Professional Standards for Staff, was initially intended to be in the form of a standing order. It was drafted and internally approved as such in 2013 after comprehensive consultation. Before the document could receive final approval from the Premier, the Solicitor-General advised the Department that standing orders could not be used for this purpose.[124] We are unclear why this was the case. The consequence of that advice was that Professional Standards for Staff (and its associated guidelines) became a policy document.[125]

Even if standing orders can now be used for this purpose, we do not consider there should also have to be a lawful and reasonable direction, in addition to the requirements set out in a professional conduct policy, before there can be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. We understand this may reflect current practice.[126]

To improve how State Service disciplinary processes operate in respect of child sexual abuse allegations and related conduct, we recommend the State Service Code of Conduct be amended to include a provision that a breach of a specified departmental professional conduct policy may be taken to be a breach of the Code, without needing to assess whether a separate provision of the State Service Code of Conduct has been breached.

5.4.1 Content of professional conduct policies

The relevant departmental professional conduct policy should specify what behaviours are, or are not, acceptable regarding the behaviour of their employees towards children and young people. Following the National Royal Commission's advice on codes of conduct and observations we have made throughout our report (refer especially to Chapters 6, 9, and 12), these departmental professional conduct policies should:

- explain what behaviours are unacceptable, including concerning conduct, misconduct or criminal conduct
- define and prohibit child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations. These definitions should be consistent across departments and should align with the Tasmanian Government's Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework established by the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 ('Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act') and avoid vague terms such as 'appropriate' and 'inappropriate', unless they are further defined and examples provided
- acknowledge the challenge of maintaining professional boundaries in small communities and provide clear identification of, instructions about and examples of how to manage conflicts of interest and professional boundaries in small communities
- provide guidance on identifying behaviours that are indicative of child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations relevant to the particular context of the organisation
- outline the types of behaviours that must be reported to authorities, including what behaviours should be reported to police, child protection authorities, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme or other relevant agencies
- outline the protections available to individuals who make complaints or reports in good faith
- provide and clearly outline response mechanisms for alleged breaches of the policy
- specify the penalties for breach, including that a breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, without needing to assess whether a separate provision of the Code has been breached, and may result in disciplinary action
- include a statement that the failure to report a breach or suspected breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the policy
- cross-reference any other policies, procedures and guidelines that support, inform or otherwise relate to the professional conduct policy, for example, complaints-handling or child protection policies or other codes of conduct relevant to particular professions.

The professional conduct policies should be:

- easily accessible to everyone in the department and communicated by a range of mechanisms
- explained to, acknowledged and signed by all employees
- accompanied by a mandatory initial training session and regular refresher training, including as part of professional development training
- communicated to children and young people and their families through a range of mechanisms, including publication on the department's public facing website.[127]

We consider that professional conduct policies should also outline that sexual relationships between State Service employees and young people are prohibited for a period of two years in certain situations. We note the Teachers Registration Board's Professional Boundaries: Guidelines for Tasmanian Teachers cautions that a sexual relationship between a teacher and a recent student that occurs within two years of the student turning 18 or finishing compulsory education (whichever is later) will likely result in an investigation by the Board that could result in disciplinary action, regardless of whether the teacher taught that student.[128] In assessing the appropriateness of the teacher's conduct in such cases, the Teachers Registration Board will consider a range of other factors in addition to the time that has passed since the former student ceased to be a student or turned 18. These include:

- the age difference between the teacher and the recent student
- the emotional and social maturity of the recent student
- the vulnerability of the recent student
- evidence regarding the nature of the past teacher-student relationship, including the closeness, dependence, significance, and length of the relationship in the educational setting
- any other conduct that may impact on the teacher's good character and/or fitness to teach during the professional relationship with the student.[129]

Similar imbalances of power and authority may also exist in other contexts where an adult is in a position of authority, care or protection of a child or young person because of the adult's employment or work. For example, child protection workers, doctors and nurses can have relationships with children and young people that are characterised by authority, care and protection. To guard against the possibility that a relationship between an employee and a young person has developed as a result of a breach of professional boundaries (including through grooming behaviours), we recommend that departmental professional conduct policies include a prohibition on romantic or sexual relationships between an employee and a young person where the employee is in a position of authority, care and protection of the young person for two years after the employee's position of authority, care or protection has ended or the young person turns 18, whichever is later. This requirement does not displace any other professional and ethical obligations.

In Chapter 16, we discuss the recent introduction of a criminal offence of penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person by a person in a position of authority. We also consider it important to include provisions regarding the position of authority in the professional conduct policies.

We also consider that a professional conduct policy should make it clear that repeatedly not following reasonable directions is a breach of professional standards (refer to Chapter 14, Case study 3 for an example of Mr Griffin repeatedly failing to follow direction).

Further to these considerations, useful guidance to help protect children and young people in government institutions may be provided by professional conduct policies in other Australian jurisdictions. Tasmanian Government departments should draw on relevant codes of conduct (and any related guidance) in other Australian jurisdictions in drafting professional conduct policies.

Departments should also ensure the professional conduct policy spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors, sub-contractors and other adults where relevant to the specific organisation, and use appropriate mechanisms to ensure volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors comply with the policy.

5.4.2 Professional conduct policies and the State Service Code of Conduct

The approach we recommend—that a breach of a specified departmental professional conduct policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct—will allow child and young people-facing government departments to have specific policies tailored to the requirements of their areas of responsibility that can directly ground a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. In our volumes and chapters on education, health, youth justice and out of home care, we recommend that specific 'professional conduct policies' be developed that will ground a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct.

This approach avoids the need to align a breach of a departmental policy with one of the general provisions of the State Service Code of Conduct. If an employee is found, after an investigation conducted in line with disciplinary processes, to have breached the relevant departmental professional conduct policy, then this may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct.

We have heard suggestions that the responsiveness of the State Service Code of Conduct to child sexual abuse matters could be improved by including a specific reference to child sexual abuse or a provision relating to serious misconduct in the Code itself. For example, Secretary Morgan-Wicks wrote that:

> In my respectful view the Code of Conduct could be strengthened to include a specific subsection to prohibit violence or abuse against a vulnerable person, grooming behaviours or other behaviours leading to an investigation or charge for the commission of an indictable offence. Suspension with pay could automatically apply and any investigation would depend on the outcome of a police investigation or court proceeding.[130]

While there is merit in this, and in similar suggestions to amend the State Service Code of Conduct, we consider our recommended approach would provide more flexibility in that it would allow government departments to tailor their professional conduct policies to their institutional contexts but still ground a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct to suit their specific needs and circumstances. And, if required, the departmental policy in question could be amended relatively quickly to account for unanticipated behaviours or consequences, for example, in response to changes in technology-facilitated abuse.

Recommendation 20.2

1. All Heads of Agencies whose agencies provide services to children should develop a professional conduct policy for the agency's employees that:
    a. explains what behaviours are unacceptable, including concerning conduct, misconduct or criminal conduct
    b. defines and prohibits child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations, in language consistent with the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023.
2. The professional conduct policy should:
    a. acknowledge the challenge of maintaining professional boundaries in small communities and provide clear identification of, instructions about and examples of how to manage conflicts of interest and professional boundaries in small communities
    b. provide guidance on identifying behaviours indicative of child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations relevant to the particular organisation
    c. outline behaviours that must be reported to authorities, including what behaviours should be reported to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, or other relevant agencies
    d. provide that not following reasonable directions is a breach of professional standards

e. provide that a failure to report a breach or suspected breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the policy

f. outline the protections available to individuals who make complaints or reports in good faith

g. provide and clearly outline response mechanisms for alleged breaches of the policy

h. specify the penalties for a breach, including that a breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct without needing to assess whether a separate provision of the Code has been breached, and may result in disciplinary action

i. cross-reference any other policies, procedures and guidelines that support, inform or otherwise relate to the professional conduct policy, for example, complaints handling or child protection policies or other codes of conduct relevant to particular professions.

3. The professional conduct policies should be:

   a. easily accessible to everyone in the agency and communicated by a range of mechanisms

   b. explained to and acknowledged and signed by all employees

   c. accompanied by a mandatory initial training session and regular refresher training, including as part of professional development training

   d. communicated to children and young people and their families through a range of mechanisms, including publication on the agency's public-facing website.

4. The professional conduct policies should include a specific prohibition on romantic or sexual relationships between an employee and a young person where that employee has been in a position of authority, care or protection with the young person for two years after the young person turns 18 or the employee's position of authority, care or protection has ended, whichever is later. This requirement should operate in addition to any other professional and ethical obligations.

5. Heads of Agencies should ensure the professional conduct policy spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors, and other adults where relevant to the specific organisation and use appropriate mechanisms to ensure their compliance with the policy.

6. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation, or other binding mechanisms, to ensure:

    a. a breach of a departmental professional conduct policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, without needing to assess whether a separate provision of the Code has been breached

    b. such a breach does not have to be accompanied by a lawful and reasonable direction for there to be a breach of the Code of Conduct.

5.5 Intersection with the Reportable Conduct Scheme

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act came into effect on 1 July 2023. As discussed in Chapter 18, the Act introduces the Government's Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework, which comprises the Child and Youth Safe Standards and a Reportable Conduct Scheme. In section 7 of the Act, 'reportable conduct' is defined broadly, as including:

- a relevant offence (these offences are defined in the Act and relate to child sexual offences in the Criminal Code Act 1924)
- sexual misconduct, which includes inappropriate behaviour, physical contact, voyeurism and speech or other communication including electronic communication when performed in a sexual manner or with a sexual intention
- grooming of a child
- conduct that causes or is likely to cause emotional or psychological harm to a child.[131]

Under the Reportable Conduct Scheme, it is the responsibility of government departments to investigate whether an employee has committed reportable conduct.[132] It should be clear that where an employee is found to have committed reportable conduct, this is a breach of the State Service Act. To achieve this, there should be a mechanism to ensure that reportable conduct, as defined in the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, is a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct in section 9 of the State Service Act.

Recommendation 20.3

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to ensure that where a finding is made that a State Service employee has committed reportable conduct under the Reportable Conduct Scheme, this also constitutes a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct under section 9 of the State Service Act 2000.

5.6 Contractors, volunteers and temporary staff

The State Service Act applies to 'employees', who are defined as permanent employees or fixed-term employees.[133] This means certain people who perform duties for the State Service, for example, foster care volunteers for the Department for Education, Children and Young People, are not subject to the State Service Code of Conduct.

There are specific policies with which contractors, volunteers and temporary staff must comply. For example, relief teachers were previously expected to comply with the Department's Conduct and Behaviour Standards, and a failure to do so resulted in removing them or flagging them on the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register.[134] However, this also meant the Department was not obligated to conduct a thorough review of any conduct-related matter. As discussed in Case study 'Brad' in Chapter 5, the Department's response to the matter involving a relief teacher was conducted outside the State Service's disciplinary processes through a 'duty of care lens' and further investigation depended on the relief teacher's response.[135] The inability to treat breaches of departmental policies as breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct because of the employment classification of the person who has committed the breach may not be in the interests of child safety. We have been told by the State that relief teachers are now included in the category of employee covered by the State Service Act.[136]

Under the proposed Reportable Conduct Scheme, a reportable allegation against a 'worker' must be investigated.[137] A 'worker' is defined in the Act as including someone who is 'engaged by the entity to provide services, including as a volunteer, contractor … whether or not the person is engaged in connection with any work or activity of the entity that relates to children'.[138] To align the Reportable Conduct Scheme with any disciplinary processes, and to protect children, we encourage the State Service to ensure the obligations and provisions of the State Service Code of Conduct apply to contractors, sub-contractors, volunteers and temporary staff. However, the process for terminating employment or applying other sanctions to contractors, sub-contractors volunteers and temporary staff should remain simpler than for terminating the employment of permanent employees.

Recommendation 20.4

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to ensure the provisions in the professional conduct policies apply to contractors, sub-contractors, volunteers and other adults who have contact with children.

6 Employment Directions

To take disciplinary action against an employee, including for child sexual abuse or related conduct, the Head of Agency must comply with Employment Directions issued by the Premier.[139] Relevant to our Commission of Inquiry, Employment Directions provide instruction on how the State Service must manage matters concerning employee misconduct, including suspensions, investigations of alleged breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct, and considerations relevant to whether an employee no longer has the ability to perform their role. The relevant Employment Directions to our Inquiry are:

- Employment Direction No. 4—Procedures for the suspension of State Service employees with or without pay (Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension)
- Employment Direction No. 5—Procedures for the investigation and determination of whether an employee has breached the Code of Conduct (Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct)
- Employment Direction No. 6—Procedures for the investigation and determination of whether an employee is able to efficiently and effectively perform their duties (Employment Direction No. 6—Inability). This direction may apply when a person no longer has the capacity to perform their role or does not satisfy the minimum requirements for employment, such as registration to work with vulnerable people or professional registration.

These Employment Directions are dated 4 February 2013, and were to be reviewed one year later, but remain current.[140] These disciplinary processes must be undertaken at the direction of the Head of Agency, who is the ultimate decision maker. Before any disciplinary process for misconduct under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct takes place, there is often what is called a preliminary assessment. As we noted, preliminary assessments are sometimes carried out before the Head of Agency is aware of the allegation.[141] Once the preliminary assessment is complete, the information is transmitted to the Head of Agency, who then decides whether the matter should be investigated.

While investigations are initiated and disciplinary measures applied by Heads of Agencies, the Head of the State Service and the State Service Management Office also have a role in the administration of employment-related matters. The Head of the State Service manages employment-related matters in the State Service on behalf of the Minister administering the State Service Act and is responsible for the employment framework and overarching guidelines.[142] The Head of the State Service is supported in this role by the State Service Management Office.[143]

We note that neither the State Service Act nor Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct mentions 'misconduct'. Rather, they refer to breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct. However, it is standard practice to refer to a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct as misconduct and we have adopted that approach.[144]

Many people who engaged with our Inquiry were critical of the Employment Directions and how they functioned in relation to matters that involve protecting children. We discuss these issues in more detail in this section.

There have been several recommendations to amend aspects of the Employment Directions, particularly Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, over the years.[145] Documents provided to us show that amendments to the current Employment Directions were drafted in 2016.[146] However, these amendments were not implemented. It is unclear why the amendments did not result.

In 2021, the final report of the Independent Review of the Tasmanian State Service recommended that the Government rewrite all Employment Directions.[147] In relation to disciplinary processes, the Independent Review concluded that the 'overly prescriptive' nature of these processes affected how they were managed, such that 'the risk associated with taking action is often so high that managers elect not to proceed'.[148] Further, the review noted that the 'top heavy' nature of misconduct procedures, requiring the involvement of the Head of Agency in many of the steps, led to delays.[149]

The Government has accepted all the Independent Review's 77 recommendations and set a five-year implementation period. At the time of writing, it was implementing the first stage of those recommendations, which includes several amendments to Employment Directions.[150]

The Independent Review's recommendations about Employment Directions include that:

- all unnecessary Employment Directions be revoked and, where required, converted to practice guides or other suitable instruments
- the remaining Employment Directions be rewritten as 'standards-based directions, with increased flexibility for agency decision making and process design'
- Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct be rewritten to be standards-based, and to allow for Heads of Agencies to adapt investigations based on the circumstances of the alleged breach
- Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct be rewritten to allow for 'a simple, local process to be used where the facts are clear and not disputed and the agency seeks to impose a low-level sanction'.[151]

While these recommendations are not specifically aimed at issues associated with child safeguarding, they will undoubtedly help to increase the responsiveness of the State Service misconduct and disciplinary processes by ensuring serious matters take precedence for investigation. We also consider there should be further reforms to improve the State's disciplinary response to allegations of child sexual abuse. The State Service Employment Directions are not well suited to protecting children because they place disproportionate weight on the rights of employees. Under these directions, it is difficult for Heads of Agencies to take action that prioritises the safety of children. To address these concerns, we make several recommendations, including:

- formalising the preliminary assessment process
- improving Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, including increasing the rights of complainants and children, increasing the speed of investigations, ensuring investigations are informed about the nature of child sexual abuse and are child/victim centred, and clarifying that all matters relevant to children should be considered potential serious misconduct
- providing for immediate termination of employment in specific situations
- allowing for the immediate suspension of staff when there is a risk to child safety
- simplifying the process for ending the employment of staff who do not hold requisite registration, such as a working with vulnerable people registration.

We also call for the Head of the State Service to play a more active role in leading the State Service in the conduct of disciplinary processes through providing guidance and advice and undertaking active monitoring and reporting.

6.1 Preliminary assessments

Preliminary assessments are not currently part of Employment Directions. However, when misconduct by a state servant is alleged, it is common practice for staff to undertake a preliminary assessment to determine whether to recommend to the decision maker (usually the Head of Agency) to appoint a person to formally investigate the matter under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct. Preliminary assessments are used to assess whether the decision maker would be able to form a reasonable belief that there may have been a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. It is also used to determine the most appropriate way to respond to the conduct in question. A threshold consideration in conducting a preliminary assessment is whether the alleged conduct occurred in the course of the employee's State Service employment.

The government agencies we examined use preliminary assessments. From the period January 2000 to February 2023, the numbers were:

- 24 preliminary assessments by the then Department of Communities
- 48 preliminary assessments by the then Department of Education
- 9 preliminary assessments by the Department of Health.[152]

6.1.1 Problems with preliminary assessments

Preliminary assessments seem to have developed to determine whether the threshold for engaging with the formal investigative processes required by Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct has been reached. While gathering some information is necessary to confirm basic facts about the alleged misconduct or incident, there is a danger that a preliminary assessment can assume the role of a de facto investigation but without independence, appropriate considerations or safeguards for victims and witnesses, and procedural fairness for alleged perpetrators.[153] Further, because preliminary assessments are generally not subject to formal rules or policy frameworks, they are usually not subject to specific timeframes.

For example, under clause 7.3 of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, where it is likely that an investigation will require interviewing a child or young person, the relevant Head of Agency must ensure the process is 'sensitive and appropriate' to the age, maturity and personal circumstances of the child or young person. Further, before such an interview is conducted, consideration should be given to obtaining appropriate permissions and whether the child or young person should be accompanied by a parent, guardian or other support person.[154] None of these requirements apply to preliminary assessments because they are not part of the Employment Directions.

6.1.2 Guidance (and policies) on preliminary assessments

Most of the government agencies we engaged with did not have a specific policy on preliminary assessments, except for the recent introduction of such a policy in the Department of Health (which we discuss next). However, the Integrity Commission provides guidance on conducting preliminary assessments as part of its Guide to Managing Misconduct in the Tasmanian Public Sector.[155]

Integrity Commission guidance

As part of its 2017 own motion investigation into the management of how misconduct is managed in the public sector, the Integrity Commission produced a model preliminary assessment process and guidance on managing misconduct, including on conducting preliminary assessments.[156] It outlines the type of information that might be sought in a preliminary assessment, including time sheets or rosters, emails and personnel files, applicable policies and position descriptions, record access logs, and following up detail with the source of the complaint.[157] The guidance stresses it is important that preliminary assessments do not turn into 'investigations' and they should be completed quickly: within three working days.[158] The Integrity Commission's guidance also cautions that interviews with anyone other than the source of the complaint should be avoided at the preliminary assessment stage.[159]

In our view, most of the Integrity Commission's guidance provides helpful and clear instruction on conducting preliminary assessments. However, it does not account for specific issues that may be raised in matters involving allegations of inappropriate conduct towards children or young people. Our recommendations in this section build on the Integrity Commission's guidance to ensure that preliminary assessments are conducted in a way that enhances child safety.

We understand the Integrity Commission is currently reviewing the Guide and the associated training module to consider changes in administrative law and good practice, including the need to consider trauma-informed practices and any relevant outcomes of our Inquiry.[160]

Department of Health

A 2019 audit of the Department of Health's conduct and investigation and management processes revealed preliminary assessments were taking the form of investigations. As a result, these preliminary assessments may not have been objective or have involved procedural fairness. This makes the process open to challenge and criticism.[161] Whether in response to the audit or otherwise, the Department developed Guidance Notes for conducting preliminary assessments.[162]

The Guidance Notes emphasise that preliminary assessments are not investigations—their purpose is not to uncover the facts of the matter. Nor should they 'make findings or arrive at conclusions regarding the alleged conduct'.[163] The Guidance Notes specify that preliminary assessments should be completed within three to seven business days. They note that where it is not possible to meet this timeframe, the reasons for the delay may need to be recorded and communicated to the parties.[164] The Guidance Notes also provide brief instruction on collecting information. This includes that, most times, witnesses should not be contacted, but further information may be required from the complainant. They also set out the possible courses of action that can be taken when the preliminary assessment concludes, including recommending the delegate of the Head of Agency initiate an investigation.[165]

While the Guidance Notes do not mention specific considerations relating to children or young people, an attached preliminary assessment form (for the assessor to complete) has a section relating to allegations of inappropriate conduct towards children. This section instructs that where an allegation involving children or young people is made, the assessor should refer to the Department's Internal Checklist—Child Related Allegations. Significantly, it instructs that the assessor should consider relevant provisions in Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, which, as discussed earlier, require contact with a child to be 'sensitive and appropriate'. We have been told that the separate notation relating to children is to reflect 'the Department's position that an investigation will proceed, the employee be stood down and that such requires immediate action through Human Resources'.[166]

The form also sets out that a threshold consideration in conducting a preliminary assessment is whether the alleged conduct occurred in the course of State Service employment. This contrasts with the Integrity Commission's guidance. Their guidance highlights that the State Service Code of Conduct requires conduct 'in connection with' employment 'at all times' and 'in the course of' employment depending on the requirement, including that at all times the employee must act in a way that does not adversely affect the integrity and good reputation of the State Service.[167]

Department for Education, Children and Young People

The Department for Education, Children and Young People did not appear to have a specific policy about preliminary assessments. Relevantly, the Department's flowchart, Advice for School Staff—Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse, advises that, in supporting a child or young person who has suffered sexual abuse, staff should not question or interview the child or young person. The flowchart further states that Workplace Relations can provide advice about recording information and that a 'Concern Notice template' has been developed to help with this process (refer to Chapter 6).[168]

The former Department of Communities also did not appear to have a specific policy on conducting preliminary assessments. However, Michael Pervan, then Secretary of the Department of Communities, told us the Department had adopted the Integrity Commission's Guide to Managing Misconduct in the Public Sector when conducting preliminary assessments 'with a focus on the risk of safety to children and young people'.[169] We discuss in more detail in Chapter 11 on Ashley Youth Detention Centre, problems with the preliminary assessment processes in the then Department of Communities. The Department took considerable time to conduct preliminary assessments regarding several employees alleged to have engaged in incidents of child sexual abuse. In some cases, quasi-investigations were conducted, contrary to the Integrity Commission's guidance.[170] In relation to preliminary assessments, in Chapter 11, Case studies 5 and 7, we discuss problems in how the Department approached preliminary assessments, which contributed to delays in responding to serious allegations against staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

6.1.3 Improvements to preliminary assessments

We consider that several improvements should be made to the preliminary assessment process to provide stronger safeguards for children and young people in government institutions. The process of conducting preliminary assessments should be formalised across the State Service in Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct (refer to Section 6.3). It should be stipulated that preliminary assessments are to be conducted as quickly as possible: within three to five business days. If more time is required, the reasons for the delay should be documented, a new timeframe set, and the reasons for the delay and the new timeframe communicated to the relevant parties. Preliminary assessments should be confined to a basic assessment of the matter and should not require evidence of wrongdoing. Such evidence should be considered and assessed at the investigative stage. Accordingly, interviews should not be conducted during a preliminary assessment. However, if an interview involving a child or young person is necessary at the preliminary assessment stage, then the interview should be subject to the same considerations as those in clause 7.3 of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, including the matters discussed in Section 6.3 and in Recommendation 20.8.

Child-facing departments should develop policies for conducting preliminary assessments that suit their operating environments. These policies should be developed based on our recommendations and in line with the Integrity Commission guidance, where appropriate. Due to the nature of the preliminary assessment process, any such policies should not require procedural fairness to be accorded to the employee. If the outcome of the preliminary assessment recommends an investigation occurs under an employment direction, then procedural fairness will be accorded to the employee during that investigative process. We recommend the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate conducts preliminary assessments in matters involving child sexual abuse and related conduct.

We also consider that the question of whether the alleged conduct occurred in the course of the employee's State Service employment can involve complex considerations that will not lend themselves to a fast preliminary assessment process. The question of whether conduct occurred in the course of employment is better addressed at the investigative stage in all but the most obvious of cases.[171] We also note that our proposed changes to the State Service Code of Conduct will render the focus on a nexus to employment less central.

Recommendation 20.5

1. The State Service should develop guidance material for conducting preliminary assessments to ensure:
    a. they are conducted quickly (within three to five business days after an allegation is received)

b. the reasons for any delay are documented, a new timeframe set, and the reasons for the delay and the new timeframe are communicated to the parties if applicable in the circumstances

c. they are confined to a basic gathering of information and do not require evidence of wrongdoing

d. they do not assess whether the alleged conduct occurred in the course of the employee's State Service employment.

2. Victim-survivors and child witnesses should not normally be interviewed at the preliminary assessment stage to avoid them being interviewed more than once or being interviewed by a person without special skills. If it is necessary to interview a child or young person at this stage, then this should be done in line with clause 7.3 of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct. Any such interview should be conducted by individuals who have been trained in child development, child sexual abuse (including taking a Whole Story approach), and trauma-related behaviours.
3. Any engagement with a child or young person during the preliminary assessment stage should be child-centred and trauma-informed.
4. The Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should conduct preliminary assessments in child sexual abuse or related conduct matters.

6.2 Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension

One way to protect children from potential harm is to suspend staff who may pose a risk to children until a further assessment of risk is determined.

Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension allows a Head of Agency, who believes on reasonable grounds that it is in the public interest to do so, to suspend an employee with full pay if the Head of Agency believes that the employee:

- has, or may have, breached the State Service Code of Conduct in such a manner that the employee should not continue to perform his or her duties; or
- has been charged in or outside Tasmania with an offence punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding six months; or
- is, or may be, unable to 'efficiently and effectively' perform their duties.[172]

Staff who do not have appropriate professional registration or a working with children registration would satisfy clause (c).

The Head of the State Service may, after considering submissions, suspend an employee without pay.[173] Decisions to suspend employees (either with or without pay) must be made on a case-by-case basis. Decisions should consider several factors, including whether:

- the breach of the State Service Code of Conduct is 'of such a serious nature that it is inappropriate for the employee to continue'; or
- it is in the 'best interests of the public, the Agency, other employees and the employee being investigated'.[174]

In terms of child safety in government institutions, we note two key issues with Employment Direction No. 4:

- There are questions about whether the suspension of an employee under Employment Direction No. 4 may occur immediately when misconduct is alleged or suspected; that is, the basis for an employee's immediate removal is uncertain.
- The requirement that the Head of Agency have reasonable grounds to believe that it is in the public interest to suspend an employee is an unnecessary barrier in matters involving child sexual abuse.

These points are discussed next.

6.2.1 Immediate suspension

The immediate removal of an employee from the workplace when there has been an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse is critical. However, there seems to be some uncertainty about the timing of employee suspensions in the State Service and the basis on which an employee is otherwise removed from the workplace.

Employment Direction No. 4 notes that:

> [A s]uspension is not a sanction, it is only to be used where an investigation of an employee is underway and proper investigation requires the employee to be absent or where because of the nature of the alleged offence it is not appropriate that the employee remain in the workplace.[175]

This provision has caused confusion because it appears to suggest that a suspension can only occur once a misconduct investigation has started. For example, it took the former Department of Health and Human Services (which was responsible for child protection and out of home care at the time) 166 days to suspend a rostered carer who was alleged to have sexually abused a 16-year-old girl in care (refer to Chapter 8).[176] This may have been partly due to the presumed requirement to conduct an Employment Direction No. 5 investigation before suspending a person for misconduct.

Secretary Gale told us that once a Head of Agency has formed a reasonable belief there may have been a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, they may suspend the employee on full pay. According to Secretary Gale, this allows Heads of Agencies to:

> adopt a zero-tolerance approach to allegations of child sexual abuse and remove employees against whom an allegation has been made from the workplace immediately, to avoid risk to the safety of children and young people [emphasis added].[177]

However, as discussed, whether a Head of Agency could form a reasonable belief that the State Service Code of Conduct has been breached is subject to a preliminary assessment process that can take several days at best and, as described in our case studies, several months at worst.

Departmental secretaries have (at least, recently) adopted different justifications for immediately removing employees from the workplace. These practices are welcome if they protect children. For example, Secretary Bullard told us that, as Secretary of the Department of Education, he had a 'duty of care' to children and young people who were under the care of the Department, indicating this justified an employee's immediate removal from a site when there had been an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse. He told us it was the Department's practice that:

> in every case where allegations of child sexual abuse are made against a current employee, the employee is requested, as soon as possible, to leave the workplace prior to service of formal documentation. If after initial examination of the circumstances it is concluded that employees may have breached the State Service Code of Conduct, they are then formally suspended in accordance with Employment Direction No. 4 at the same time as an investigation is commenced pursuant to Employment Direction No. 5.[178]

Regarding the former Department of Communities, then Secretary Pervan and Jacqueline Allen, then Acting Executive Director, People and Culture, told us that Employment Direction No. 4 did not allow them to suspend an employee from duty immediately after an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse was reported or became known.[179] Nor, in their understanding, did it allow for suspension to occur while a preliminary assessment was being conducted.[180]

Secretary Pervan told us that to minimise the risk to children and young people while Employment Directions No. 4 and No. 5 processes are commenced, the employee subject to the allegation was directed to 'remain away from the workplace'.[181] Secretary Pervan told us he had:

> an overriding legislative responsibility to manage and eliminate and/or minimise the health and safety risks to children and young people so far as reasonably practicable in accordance with the Work Health and Safety Act 2012.[182]

So, in then Secretary Pervan's view, removing an employee from the workplace in the former Department of Communities was justified based on workplace health and safety laws.[183]

The Department of Health's approach to the timing of suspension under Employment Direction No. 4 is unclear. The State has advised us that suspensions occur immediately.[184] Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us it 'is Department of Health practice that the respondent is formally advised of suspension pursuant to Employment Direction No. 4 pending further notification of actions to be taken'.[185] Secretary Morgan-Wicks further said:

> Where an allegation of child sexual abuse is made it is current practice that the Department Official is stood down, giving consideration to duty of care and the risk of the employee continuing in the workplace. This is considered in line with the considerations in section 6.4 of Employment Direction No. 4.
> The Department of Health does not currently have protocols or guidelines which cover the period between standing the Department Official down and the formal notification of suspension in accordance with Employment Direction No. 4.[186]

What is important for the safety of children and young people is that where there has been an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse, the subject employee is immediately removed from the workplace pending the start (or not, as the case may be) of disciplinary processes. We consider the basis on which this can occur should be clear.

We recommend that Employment Direction No. 4 provides for the immediate removal of an employee from the workplace when there is an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse. Suspension should not be contingent on the commencement of disciplinary processes. It should precede them. This will help to keep children safer in government institutions by providing a clear basis for removing employees who are subject to allegations of child sexual abuse from the workplace, while the necessary inquiries are made.

6.2.2 Belief that suspension is in the public interest

As discussed in this chapter, the Head of Agency must have reasonable grounds to believe it is in the public interest to suspend an employee under Employment Direction No. 4.[187] In our view, this requirement is superfluous when the allegation or incident involves child sexual abuse as immediate suspension will almost always be in the public interest. We consider child safety warrants, in matters involving allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse or related conduct, there not being the requirement that the Head of Agency have reasonable grounds to believe it is in the public interest to suspend an employee.

We also note that there are several factors the Head of Agency must consider on a case-by-case basis when deciding to suspend an employee.[188] These include the nature of the 'offence', the attitude of the public towards the breach and the employee, and the repercussions for the State Service.[189] However, there is no requirement to consider the safety of children or young people (or of other employees, for that matter). We consider that child safety should be included as a consideration in making such a decision.

Recommendation 20.6

The Tasmanian Government should amend Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension to:

a. specify that in matters involving complaints or concerns about child sexual abuse or related conduct of an employee, they may be suspended immediately

b. clarify, to avoid any doubt, that suspension can occur before the start of any disciplinary processes, including preliminary assessments

c. exclude, in matters involving complaints or concerns of child sexual abuse or related conduct, the requirement that the Head of Agency must have a reasonable belief that it is in the public interest to suspend the employee

d. include the safety of children and young people among the matters a Head of Agency must take into account when deciding whether to suspend an employee.

6.3 Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct

Employers must be able to terminate the employment of, or take other disciplinary action against, staff who have harmed or pose a risk to children. Breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct are determined through the investigative processes set out in Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, which 'establishes … the procedures for the investigation and determination of whether an employee, senior executive, equivalent specialist or [an employee] has breached the State Service Code of Conduct'.[190]

Employment Direction No. 5 stipulates that the powers and functions it grants must not be delegated, except for the Head of Agency for the Department of Health and the Department for Education, Children and Young People.[191] It also stipulates that the procedures within it 'are to be applied with procedural fairness, natural justice and in a timely manner', noting that 'timely' means 'within a reasonable timeframe and free from unreasonable delay'.[192]

Where a Head of Agency has reasonable grounds to believe there may have been a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, Employment Direction No. 5 requires them to appoint an investigator to investigate the alleged breach. Employment Direction No. 5 sets out several requirements for the ensuing investigation, including that:

- investigators must be impartial and report to the Head of Agency about the outcome of the investigation
- if the Head of Agency becomes aware that an employee has committed certain crimes, they may determine that the State Service Code of Conduct has been breached without first conducting an investigation (the employee must be afforded procedural fairness and natural justice)

- if the investigation requires interviewing a child or young person:

> the head of agency must ensure that the processes involving the child are sensitive and appropriate, bearing in mind the age, maturity and personal circumstances of the particular child. Before interviewing a child, consideration must be given to such issues as the permission of the parent or guardian, the child being accompanied by a parent, guardian or support person and, where appropriate, keeping the child informed of the progress of the investigation.[193]

6.3.1 Procedural fairness and the rights of children

Employment Direction No. 5 also sets out other procedural fairness requirements for investigations, such as communicating suspected breaches to employees and informing them of the investigation, their rights regarding the investigation and the possible implications of the investigation.[194] There is no mention of the interests of a complainant in the conduct of an investigation. In the case of alleged child sexual abuse or related conduct, this may mean a child or parent does not have an automatic right of reply once the employee's version of events is presented, although the Head of Agency can request further investigations if new information comes to light.[195]

Employment Directions are focused on providing employees their right to know the allegations made about them and to answer them (often referred to as procedural fairness or natural justice). This focus stems from an 'employment relationship', where the employee is considered to be in the weaker position in relation to the employer: the State. However, this framework poses problems for protecting children in government institutions, who are in a weaker position than an employee within an institution. As explained by Secretary Gale, Employment Direction No. 5:

> exists to provide procedural fairness and natural justice to employees …
> It does not directly reference rights of the complainant, for example, to be kept informed of any investigation's progress or outcome.
>
> [Employment Direction No. 5] is not constructed with the primary goal of facilitating a trauma-informed or child-centred investigation process …[196]

Further, as then Secretary Pervan said, '[t]here is a real tension between child protection and natural justice being given to employees and the [Employment Direction] process favours the protection of employees'.[197]

The tension identified by then Secretary Pervan has not been helped by the fact that Employment Direction No. 5 has not substantially changed over the past 20 years, despite increased awareness of the role of behaviours such as boundary breaches and grooming in child sexual abuse. Despite this, the focus of Employment Direction

No. 5 continues to be on providing procedural fairness to employees. In practice, this has been at the expense of protecting children or providing fairness to complainants.

Affording procedural fairness to employees being investigated under State Service disciplinary processes is necessary and a fundamental principle of our legal system. However, it should not come at the expense of pursuing investigations or considerations of child safety, nor should the pursuit of procedural fairness unduly affect complainants or witnesses.

An employee who is the subject of a misconduct determination also has a right of review. Employment Direction No. 5 provides that if an employee wants to dispute a finding that they have breached the State Service Code of Conduct, and the sanction imposed is termination of employment, 'the dispute will be dealt with by the appropriate industrial tribunal', which in this case is the Tasmanian Industrial Commission.[198] If the sanction imposed was other than termination of employment, the employee will have a right of review under the State Service Act, which is also heard by the Tasmanian Industrial Commission but under different procedural requirements.[199] A complainant or other relevant party does not have a right of review, even when they have been directly adversely affected by the conduct. In our view, this is unfairly biased towards the rights of the employee. The correct forum for a right of review for such a complainant is a complex legal question we have not attempted to solve here, focusing instead on the need for the right of review.

Our recommendations that investigations into employee misconduct be conducted by the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate will help to ensure that the 'tension' between procedural fairness and the needs and concerns of complainants and witnesses is appropriately addressed, particularly in matters involving child sexual abuse (refer to Recommendations 6.6, 15.17 and 20.8). This is because we recommend the Directorate conducts investigations that consider child safety as well as disciplinary measures. We have also recommended expanding the State Service Code of Conduct so that if a state servant's conduct creates an unacceptable risk to the safety and wellbeing of children or young people, the State Service disciplinary framework should apply. Termination, suspension or sanction should be available. The disciplinary framework should ensure that departmental professional conduct policies address behaviour that may pose a risk to children.

We have been advised the State is currently reviewing and rewriting Employment Direction No. 5.[200] We consider that the Employment Directions should be amended to protect the rights of children and complainants, particularly to afford children and complainants a right of reply and review.

We also note the importance of conducting investigations, even if an employee has resigned prior to the initiation of an investigation, to ensure the safety of children and young people is prioritised. For example, we heard evidence from Alana Girvin, the former Director, Incident Management Directorate, Department for Education, South Australia, that in South Australia, if a person resigns, the investigation continues. A determination of their suitability is made on the evidence before the Directorate. A prompt is included on their system, and notifications made to the Catholic or independent systems, public sector, Commissioner of Public Sector and other jurisdictions.[201]

6.3.2 Anonymous complaints

People affected and other employees may be discouraged from making a complaint about an employee's conduct because they are concerned they will be identifiable to that employee. We heard from people who believed they were targeted by an employee because the person making the complaint was revealed to the employee.[202] At our stakeholder consultations in Launceston, we were told one of the problems with Launceston General Hospital's approach to complaints included allowing the identity of the person making a complaint to become known.[203] The State has since advised that the State-wide Complaints Management Overview unit has been established and the identity of complainants is kept strictly confidential.[204]

We do not consider that the complainant's identity must be revealed, although it appears to have been the practice.[205]

It is unclear why this practice has emerged. Employment Direction No. 5 requires a Head of Agency to write to an employee who is the subject of a complaint to inform them of the substance of the complaint. 'Substance', in this context, means 'the essential elements that have given rise to the allegation of the breach of the Code and the specific parts of the Code allegedly breached'.[206] The Employment Direction does not specify that the respondent be informed of the identity of the person making the complaint (or witness). The Integrity Commission's guidance on managing misconduct states that people (complainants) should be told that while confidentiality cannot be guaranteed, it should be maintained as far as possible. In a small jurisdiction such as Tasmania, where 'everyone knows everyone else', maintaining confidentiality, while difficult, can ensure people are not discouraged from coming forward to make a complaint.[207]

It is not intended that all witness statements produced for an investigation must be provided to the respondent in full to ensure procedural fairness. The Integrity Commission's guidance cautions that 'decisions about what to give or show the respondent needs to be balanced against other considerations', including 'confidentiality, privacy, security risks, and legal professional privilege'.[208] Departmental advice about Employment Direction No. 5 to principals and managers in the Department for Education, Children and Young People states that '[c]onfidentiality is critical to maintain the integrity of the process, provide privacy and protect all those involved'.[209]

In this chapter, we recommend that, in any investigation of alleged misconduct, government agencies should ensure they have appropriate measures to protect, where possible, people, including witnesses, who come forward with complaints or concerns. These measures should include the ability to make anonymous complaints in cases of child sexual abuse and related conduct, and clear guidance about maintaining confidentiality. We recognise there may be limitations with progressing an anonymous complaint, for example, where there is insufficient information or details outlined in the complaint to conduct an investigation. We also acknowledge the challenges the State faces where allegations are contained in information not specifically designed for conducting a disciplinary process. However, these difficulties should not prevent the State from pursuing an investigation of the allegations to the extent it is possible to do so.

6.3.3 Timely investigations

Disciplinary processes in relation to child sexual abuse and related conduct matters often take too long to resolve, leaving children or young people exposed to potential risks.[210] We heard of significant delays in starting investigations or where, once started, investigations took too long to complete. For example:

- There have been delays in the initiation of Employment Direction No. 5 investigations of employees at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.
- The original investigation into victim-survivor Rachel's matter by the Department of Education took more than two years to complete. Rachel told us the length of the investigation had a devastating effect on her.[211]

Not only do long investigations leave children other than the particular child affected exposed to risks, but they can be distressing and retraumatising for the person affected and witnesses. Delays can also be distressing for those under investigation.

In our hearings on education, Secretary Bullard told us that timeframes were not placed on Employment Direction No. 5 investigations when independent investigators were appointed.[212] However, Secretary Bullard later advised us that the Department had changed this practice to require the investigator to provide an expected timeframe to be met. Further, the Department now provided guidance on seeking extensions, and required investigators to provide monthly updates.[213]

We commend these changes and consider that the requirement to set timeframes for conducting investigations should be included in Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct. Instructions for seeking an extension for the investigation should also be incorporated into Employment Direction No. 5. All relevant parties should be kept informed of the progress of the investigation and, in the event of any delays, informed about revised timeframes for its completion. Heads of Agencies should report to the Head of the State Service on compliance with these timeframes, and the Head of the State Service should monitor and publicly report on this compliance.

6.3.4 Prioritising serious misconduct

Another problem with the State Service disciplinary processes is that Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct is used for all misconduct matters, regardless of their seriousness. As noted, there is a 'one-size-fits-all' approach to investigations in the State Service. This means that the investigation of minor misconduct matters can use up vital resources and lead to delays in investigations. Secretary Webster told us:

> I think, if some of the lower-level Code of Conduct issues were able to be dealt with more easily, then it would free up time and expertise to be able to focus on the more serious level of Code of Conduct issues that do require trauma-informed practice ...[214]

At the time of writing, the Government was in the process of implementing the recommendations of the Independent Review of the Tasmanian State Service. Relevantly, the Independent Review has recommended that Employment Direction No. 5 be rewritten 'to allow for a simple, local process to be used where the facts are clear and not disputed and the agency seeks to impose a low-level sanction (that is, reprimand or that the employee engages in counselling for their behaviour)'.[215] We support this restructuring of Employment Direction No. 5 in this way, as long as there is robust record keeping in any such 'local process', as discussed in the following section.

There is a risk in this approach that grooming and boundary breach behaviour may not be treated as serious. We discuss, in our institution-specific chapters, examples of cases where such behaviours were not taken seriously enough in institutions (such as James Griffin's case study in Chapter 14 and Brad's case study in Chapter 5). To avoid this risk, we recommend that all concerns about a staff member's interactions with a child or young person that could constitute grooming, a boundary breach or other related conduct be treated as potential serious misconduct.

6.3.5 Record keeping and monitoring

A key way to improve responses to child sexual abuse in government institutions is to ensure that accurate and comprehensive records are kept in relation to employee misconduct. In the context of employee misconduct (whether the misconduct be alleged, suspected, substantiated or unsubstantiated), a lack of appropriate record keeping can lead to a failure to identify and, therefore, respond to risks to the safety of children in government institutions, including when there is a pattern of behaviour.[216]

As noted, the Integrity Commission conducted an own motion investigation into misconduct in the State Service.[217] The investigation report recommended that public authorities:

> maintain an appropriately confidential register of all alleged and suspected misconduct committed by public officers.
> This is to include all misconduct matters, including those that do not proceed to investigation and those that are not substantiated.[218]

As the Integrity Commission recognised, such a register would help to identify multiple allegations made against an employee over time.[219] Importantly, maintaining a record of all allegations, whether substantiated or not, would also help to identify patterns of behaviour associated with child sexual abuse.

In materials provided to us, it appeared the Government supported this recommendation in principle.[220] However, it noted that a central register would only be supported for concluded investigations—it was suggested that unsubstantiated allegations 'be addressed at an agency level'.[221] Although the status of the document containing this information is unclear, it stated that the revision of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct would reference 'maintenance of a central register for defined and proven breaches'. In 2022, the Government introduced a register for breaches of the Code of Conduct. However, the register only includes matters where an investigation under Employment Direction No. 5 has resulted in termination of employment.[222]

We support this development. However, considering state servants move across departments, we consider there should be a cross-government register of misconduct investigations for serious and non-serious misconduct, not just for matters that result in termination of employment, or would have resulted in termination of employment had the employee not resigned. We understand the State Service Management Office considered such a register in response to the Integrity Commission's 2017 own motion investigation report.[223] We consider that this important initiative should be implemented. Any such register should include a record of unsubstantiated matters, including those that did not proceed to any sort of investigation. The Heads of Agency should report quarterly to the Head of the State Service about these matters. The Head of the State Service should report on misconduct across the State Service in their annual report.

6.3.6 Using evidence of past concerns or allegations—substantiated or not

As discussed, keeping a record of all misconduct-related matters is important to help identify patterns of behaviours. When an allegation is made, evidence of allegations of prior misconduct, whether substantiated or not, may lend weight to the assessment of whether misconduct has occurred. However, during our Inquiry, we understood there was concern (and confusion) in some government departments about the ability to use evidence of alleged prior misconduct in any investigation into a new allegation of employee misconduct. The State has since advised us that any relevant prior conduct will either be part of an allegation or be considered when determining the sanction.[224]

Whether evidence of prior concerns or allegations can be used in other misconduct matters does not appear to be well understood in the State Service. Evidence provided to us showed that government departments, and sometimes staff in the same department, took different approaches to this issue (and, consequently, different justifications for the use or non-use of prior conduct).

For example, in relation to Walter (a pseudonym)—a former employee at Ashley Youth Detention Centre who was the subject of at least 19 allegations before his resignation, and subject to disciplinary action on multiple occasions—then Secretary Pervan conceded that the inability to use information about prior disciplinary processes as well as information held by the Department as a result of allegations raised through redress claims was a 'system failure'.[225] He also told us that the wording of Employment Direction No. 5 itself provided the basis for the restriction on using prior allegations:

> it appears that the focus [of Employment Direction No. 5] is on allegations and those particulars, so if we're talking about bringing in other matters, the only way you could bring them in would be to add them as separate allegations, and have the whole lot investigated.[226]

In Chapter 14, we note the views of two former human resources staff members at Launceston General Hospital were that they were unable to consider unsubstantiated complaints or concerns cumulatively in disciplinary proceedings. Mathew Harvey, former Human Resources Consultant with the Department of Health, told us he was unable to use the content of previous unsubstantiated allegations as evidence in misconduct proceedings. He told us that this position had been confirmed by the Tasmanian Industrial Commission in a matter he had attended.[227] On the other hand, James Bellinger, former Human Resource Manager at the Department of Health told us in his statement that previous allegations of misconduct were considered in new matters to establish whether there is a pattern of behaviour.[228] However, Mr Bellinger did not specify whether this included unsubstantiated allegations.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks advised us she was establishing a complaints management oversight unit ('Statewide Complaints Oversight Unit') in the Office of the Secretary.[229] She said the unit will be responsible for recording and tracking the progress of complaints in a document management system, assessing complaints against previous complaints, and allocating the complaint to an appropriate business unit for action after identifying any potential conflicts of interest.[230]

The Solicitor-General's office has advised that, during investigations, procedural fairness to the employee under investigation requires that:

> [c]are must be taken to ensure the investigator does not have reference to any previous complaints with respect to the employee. That information would be irrelevant to the determination of the current investigation and could arguably adversely affect the employee's right to procedural fairness and natural justice.[231]

An approach excluding previous allegations appears to be influenced by the principles relating to the admission of tendency evidence in criminal trials. This approach is ill-suited to disciplinary proceedings and may result in risks of child sexual abuse not being sufficiently addressed. There is, at the least, confusion about whether prior concerns, complaints or allegations about an employee, whether substantiated or unsubstantiated, can be used in future misconduct proceedings. Variation in approaches to investigations is undesirable in and of itself. But it is more concerning that a valuable way to identify patterns of behaviour that may point to child sexual abuse is not being used, or at least is not being uniformly used, in relation to State Service disciplinary matters. We consider the safety of children in government institutions demands more. It requires a consistent approach—one that allows patterns of behaviour to be identified and used, where necessary, as evidence of that behaviour in future disciplinary proceedings.

In our view, where there are allegations of child sexual abuse and related behaviours, it is critical that prior substantiated and unsubstantiated complaints, allegations and disciplinary action, as well as suspected misconduct, can be considered both by the investigator and the Head of Agency. Any weight given to previous unsubstantiated concerns should consider that they have not been substantiated.

The Integrity Commission told us that prior allegations (including unsubstantiated allegations) should be considered at various stages of the disciplinary process, including:

- in determining the process to be used to deal with new allegations
- at the finding stage in determining, on the balance of probabilities, whether the conduct occurred—previous substantiated allegations should have more weight than unsubstantiated allegations
- in determining if misconduct has occurred
- the sanction to apply.[232]

We agree with this approach.

We understand there may be procedural fairness concerns about using prior matters in this way. However, these concerns would be addressed by amending clause 7.4 of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct to include a requirement that the Head of Agency notify the employee that any prior complaints, allegations and disciplinary action will be provided to the investigator and by putting the substance of these former complaints to the employee. Further, amending clause 7.9 of Employment Direction No. 5 to require that the investigator's report to the Head of Agency detail any reliance on prior complaints, allegations and disciplinary action would also help to address procedural fairness concerns. In this respect, we note that the investigator's report must be provided to the employee, and the employee is to be afforded an opportunity to respond to the report (refer to clause 7.10 of Employment Direction No. 5).

6.3.7 Summary dismissal

To protect children, it may be appropriate to summarily dismiss an employee for misconduct in some circumstances.

Currently, Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct allows an employee to be dismissed without investigation where they have been convicted of a crime that is 'punishable by imprisonment for a term of 6 months or more'.[233] Clause 9(d) of the Tasmanian State Service Award enables the summary dismissal of an employee for serious misconduct or serious neglect of duty. The Independent Review of the State Service has recommended that the State Service adopt the Fair Work approach to serious misconduct. Under Fair Work regulations, misconduct is defined as 'wilful or deliberate behaviour by an employee that is inconsistent with the continuation of the contract of employment'.[234] It is also defined as conduct that causes a serious and imminent risk to the health or safety of a person.[235]

According to the Independent Review, the test for termination of employment based on serious misconduct under the Fair Work framework is:

> whether the reason for the termination was 'sound, defensible or well founded'. The employer must be satisfied on the balance of probabilities that serious misconduct has occurred (a standard lower than criminal charges) and that summary dismissal is not a disproportionate response.[236]

We support this recommendation in principle because it may help to streamline the disciplinary process in uncontested cases of serious misconduct, and free up time and other resources. However, we note that in matters involving child sexual abuse, investigations can uncover important matters that may not otherwise be discovered, including that other children have been harmed or that systemic reform is needed. Even if an employee is summarily dismissed, the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should still investigate to determine if other children were exposed to risks and if system changes are required.

6.3.8 Interviewing children

As noted, Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct sets out matters that must be considered when interviewing a child or young person. Chapter 16 sets out the best practice approach to interviewing children and young people in the context of police investigations. In Chapter 6, we discuss how these principles should be extended to the interviewing of children by the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate we recommend. In summary, these principles include that interviewers should have appropriate qualifications and training in dealing with matters involving child sexual abuse and should:

- take a 'whole story' approach to interviewing victim-survivors or witnesses, to allow for a pattern of behaviour to be apparent

- ensure the environment of the interview is comfortable for the child or young person
- minimise multiple interviews through techniques such as video recordings.

These principles should also apply to investigations conducted in the employment disciplinary context for investigating child sexual abuse or related conduct. In addition to the considerations already required by Employment Direction No. 5 clause 7.3, we recommend it be amended to include these principles.

Recommendation 20.7

The Tasmanian Government should ensure investigations into misconduct in relation to child sexual abuse or related conduct by State Service employees of the Department for Education, Children and Young People and the Department of Health under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct are conducted by the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate.

Recommendation 20.8

The Tasmanian Government should amend Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, as it relates to child sexual abuse or related conduct, to:

a. ensure people making a complaint and children or young people who have been abused have the right to
    i. reply to any factual matters put forward by the alleged abuser
    ii. know the outcome of an investigation
    iii. seek a review of decisions in an appropriate forum
b. clarify timeframes for carrying out investigations, set out the process for seeking an extension of time for an investigation and the considerations involved, and require the granting of, and reasons for, an extension of time be communicated to the parties affected
c. provide that all matters of concern relevant to an employee's conduct with a child or young person pertaining to child sexual abuse or related conduct be treated as potential serious misconduct

d. note the importance, in circumstances where it is appropriate to summarily dismiss an employee for misconduct, of conducting an investigation to identify children who have been harmed and any systemic problems that need to be addressed

e. ensure investigations are conducted by people who have been trained in child development, child sexual abuse (including taking a Whole Story approach) and trauma-related behaviours.

Recommendation 20.9

The Tasmanian Government should maintain a central cross-government register of misconduct concerning complaints and concerns about child sexual abuse and related conduct. This register should contain records of substantiated and unsubstantiated matters, including those that did not proceed to investigation.

Recommendation 20.10

1. The Tasmanian Government should take measures to ensure that misconduct investigations under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct in relation to complaints and concerns of child sexual abuse are able to take into account prior substantiated, untested and unsubstantiated complaints, allegations and disciplinary action, in addition to the immediately alleged misconduct.
2. The Tasmanian Government should take measures to ensure that prior allegations (including unsubstantiated allegations) should be considered at various stages of the disciplinary process, including in determining:
    a. the process to be used to deal with new allegations
    b. whether the conduct occurred on the balance of probabilities, with previous substantiated allegations being given more weight than unsubstantiated allegations
    c. if misconduct has occurred
    d. the sanction to be applied.

Recommendation 20.11

1. The Head of the State Service should monitor and publicly report annually on the management of misconduct matters related to child sexual abuse or related conduct.
2. Heads of Agencies should report quarterly to the Head of the State Service on all misconduct matters related to child sexual abuse or related conduct, substantiated and unsubstantiated.

6.4 Employment Direction No. 6—Inability

Another way to help protect children in institutions is to require staff to have a working with vulnerable people registration. In addition, some staff such as teachers and health practitioners are required to have professional registration, which contains suitability requirements related to protecting the public. When staff no longer hold these registrations, employers need to be able to act.

Employment Direction No. 6—Inability allows for investigation of whether an employee can perform their duties, where the Head of Agency has reasonable grounds to believe that an employee may not be able to do so. Government departments can rely on Employment Direction No. 6 where an essential requirement of the employee's role has been suspended or revoked, for example, where their registration to work with vulnerable people or professional registration has been revoked.

Under Employment Direction No. 6—Inability, when the Head of Agency forms the requisite belief, an investigator must be appointed to investigate the alleged inability.[237] If the investigation finds the employee is unable to perform their duties, the employer can take one or more of the following actions:

- direct appropriate counselling
- direct appropriate retraining
- reduce salary within the range of salary applicable to the employee
- reassign duties
- reduce classification
- terminate employment.[238]

Ms Allen, former Acting Executive Director, People and Culture, Department of Communities, explained the Employment Direction No. 6—Inability, as follows:

> For allegations of professional boundary breaches, grooming behaviours or child sexual abuse, an investigation pursuant to [Employment Direction

> No. 6] is usually only appropriate in certain circumstances. For example, if an employee no longer holds one of the Essential Requirements to perform their duties, such as Registration to Work with Vulnerable People. By not holding a legislative requirement, the head of agency could form reason to believe that the … official could not efficiently or effectively perform their duties and therefore commences an investigation.[239]

We understand that, in addition to the former Department of Communities, the Department of Education and the Department of Health have relied on this Employment Direction in matters related to allegations of child sexual abuse or related conduct where an essential requirement of the employee's role has been suspended or revoked.[240]

In our view, appointing an investigator who must then adhere to strict processes is unnecessary if their role is simply to establish that an employee no longer has a certification required for their continued employment. As the Independent Review of the State Service noted, the investigative processes required by Employment Direction No. 6 are more suited to alleged inability due to reasons other than a loss of accreditation, for example, inability due to some form of physical or mental impairment.[241]

We agree with the Independent Review of the State Service that a separate, simplified, process should apply to the loss of an essential employment requirement under Employment Direction No. 6. If the requirement is needed so that the employee can work with children or young people, once it is established that the employee no longer satisfies the requirement (other than for administrative reasons, for example, a failure to pay a fee), then the Head of Agency should be able to terminate the employee.

Recommendation 20.12

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend Employment Direction No. 6—Inability to provide for:

a. a simplified process that applies to matters where the employee no longer has an essential employment requirement (for example, no registration under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013)

b. powers to immediately terminate a person's employment if the employee no longer meets an employment requirement for working with children or young people

c. any interview with a child or young person in line with Employment Direction No. 6—Inability to be subject to the same considerations as should apply under clause 7.3 of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct (Recommendation 20.8).

6.5 Advice and guidance

As is clear, there is confusion about the meaning of some provisions in the Employment Directions. Some people who engaged with our Inquiry suggested a guideline and procedures document should be developed to supplement the Employment Directions with 'overarching principles and specific guidance on approaches, responses and action'.[242]

We consider our recommendation that misconduct matters be investigated by the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate will help to resolve many uncertainties or confusion regarding the application of Employment Directions. However, we also consider that general guidance on the relevant considerations, applications and principles involved in State Service disciplinary processes will help to strengthen the safety of children and young people in government institutions. They will help by providing clear and consistent messages across the State Service about what is expected when misconduct issues arise, particularly for those involving child sexual abuse.

Earlier, we briefly noted the role that the Head of the State Service plays in public sector employment matters. Secretary Gale, Head of the State Service, described her role as being responsible for the employment framework and overarching guidelines with the State Service.[243] We also note that Heads of Agencies can seek advice from the State Service Management Office 'on matters relating to the approach of Employment Direction No. 5, and in relation to previous cases'.[244] Given this, we consider the Head of the State Service and the State Service Management Office are well placed to develop and implement guidelines and advice in relation to State Service disciplinary processes.

As noted, the Integrity Commission's Guide to Managing Misconduct provides helpful instruction on conducting preliminary assessments. It also provides useful and instructive information about managing the whole disciplinary process in the State Service. However, we consider the Head of the State Service and State Service Management Office are best placed to know what issues, including those we have identified in our report, require further explanation and guidance.[245]

Therefore, we recommend that guidance is developed on State Service disciplinary processes, containing key principles and procedures to be followed regarding Employment Directions. This guidance should be in line with any relevant child safety considerations, the relevant recommendations in our report and the guidance the Integrity Commission developed.

General principles relevant to handling complaints in government agencies, particularly in relation to complaints involving child sexual abuse and related conduct, could be included in the guidance.

Recommendation 20.13

1. The Head of the State Service should issue guidance on State Service disciplinary processes that contains key principles and procedures to be followed. This guidance should include information on:
    a. the steps involved in the process of dealing with disciplinary matters
    b. maintaining confidentiality
    c. setting timeframes for investigations and communicating timeframes to the parties
    d. preliminary assessments
    e. employee suspensions, in particular where matters are alleged to involve child sexual abuse
    f. considerations when interviewing children
    g. an employee's inability to perform a role due to the loss of employment requirements
    h. the rights of an employee and any complainant.
2. This guidance should be developed in line with relevant child safety considerations, relevant recommendations of this Commission of Inquiry and the Integrity Commission's Guide to Managing Misconduct in the Tasmanian Public Sector.

7 Cultural change

We heard evidence from the Head of the State Service Secretary, Jenny Gale, that, particularly regarding Employment Direction No.5—Breach of Code of Conduct, behaviour had largely been driven by custom and practice. She said:

> [I]t's one thing to enable through processes, legislation, and so on, but it is another to change the way in which people behave.[246]

Secretary Gale indicated her belief there was 'a lot more flexibility within it [Employment Direction No. 5] currently than people are using'.[247] She highlighted the importance of cultural and education initiatives in disciplinary process reform to ensure that risks to children were at the centre of State Service thinking.[248] Secretary Gale suggested the need for improvement in areas such as:

- modelling of agency values by senior leaders
- ensuring employees felt supported and encouraged when reporting improper conduct
- having confidence there would be no repercussions for making any reports.[249]

We agree that, besides legislative and policy framework reforms, it is critical to ensure a cultural shift in the State Service's interpretation and application of disciplinary processes. Anyone reporting improper conduct must feel supported, safe and encouraged and should not face repercussions. It is vital for staff to not only understand the disciplinary process and proposed reforms but actively and willingly foster a culture that promotes the safety and protection of children. We recommend funding for cultural change and educational initiatives to promote disciplinary practices that prioritise the safety and wellbeing of children and young people.

Recommendation 20.14

The Tasmanian Government should allocate funding for initiatives aimed at cultural change and awareness raising to promote a shared understanding and application of disciplinary processes across the State Service in a manner that ensures the safety and wellbeing of children at risk of child sexual abuse or related conduct.

8 Role of unions

Unions can have an important and influential effect on child safety matters in government workplaces, through advocacy on behalf of members who are subject to State Service disciplinary processes and by fostering a culture in the union that prioritises the safety of children and young people. In our hearings, Professor Richard Eccleston, University of Tasmania, noted that:

> … in terms of the important work that unions do in protecting and defending employee rights, that they too must be, and I'm sure are willing to be, part of the solution in terms of dealing with some of these issues around conduct and criminal abuse.[250]

To make the proposed changes we recommend to disciplinary processes, the Government will need the support of unions.

Throughout our Inquiry, we received evidence from several unions with membership in the Tasmanian State Service. These unions, and the officials that provided statements and evidence on their behalf, include the:

- Australian Education Union (Tasmanian branch)—Steven Smith, Senior Industrial Advocate
- Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (Tasmanian branch)—Emily Shepherd, Branch Secretary
- Health and Community Services Union (Tasmanian branch)—Lucas Digney, Assistant State Secretary
- Community and Public Sector Union (State Public Service Federation Tasmania) Inc—Thirza White, General Secretary.

Their evidence covered union approaches to child sexual abuse generally as well as how matters involving individual members who were subject to allegations were handled (particularly in health). The focus of this section is on how the unions with which we engaged generally approach child sexual abuse matters. Our case study chapters discuss union involvement in individual matters. Nothing in this discussion is intended to undermine the fundamental role of unions in protecting individual and collective employee rights.

8.1 Union policies and approaches to child sexual abuse matters

The materials we received in relation to unions revealed the variability in how they approached matters involving members who were subject to allegations of child sexual abuse. There appeared also to be considerable variance in the general approaches of unions to child sexual abuse. Some were proactive and developed policies and publicly available position statements about child sexual abuse, while others did not provide evidence of any materials that addressed this issue and were primarily focused on advocating in their members' interest, rather than considering issues raised by child sexual abuse matters.

8.1.1 Australian Education Union

Steven Smith, Senior Industrial Advocate with the Australian Education Union (Tasmanian branch) told us that the branch's perception was that child sexual abuse allegations against teachers in Tasmania are a significant issue.[251] Mr Smith told us the branch supported 'roughly one or two members a year' who have been the subject of a Department of Education investigation into allegations relating to child sexual abuse.[252] We were told the support provided in this context was primarily to ensure the members' rights were respected throughout any investigative processes.[253] Mr Smith told us that while providing support to a member would be similar for all matters, where there are allegations of child sexual abuse, the union's 'focus is heightened'.[254] Mr Smith said that this heightened focus was because:

> Firstly, … the potential consequences for the member include termination, loss of career, and criminal prosecution. Secondly, … because we are concerned to ensure that, as we support our member, we do not act in a way that could add to the child or children's trauma. Thirdly, the nature of these matters is that there is a natural desire to not risk letting an abuser to stay at work; this is appropriately part of the pressure on the decision maker.[255]

Mr Smith told us that the branch takes a neutral position in supporting members where allegations of child sexual abuse have been made against its members. He said the support provided is limited to helping the member navigate investigative processes. The focus of the support is on the member's welfare. Mr Smith said that if a member were to admit wrongdoing regarding the allegations, then the branch would cease to support the member.[256] He also told us that, in terms of supporting members, the union had so far never refused to support a member, even where child sexual abuse was alleged.[257]

Counsel Assisting our Commission of Inquiry asked Mr Smith whether he would characterise the union's support for its members in this context as falling short of advocacy, to which Mr Smith replied:

> Most of the time, yes. There are some occasions where we might step into a more advocacy role, but generally speaking we're trying to get them to advocate for themselves.[258]

When asked whether it would be appropriate to assume an advocacy role where there were allegations of child sexual abuse against a member, Mr Smith told us that, in those circumstances, the union's role would be in relation to advocating about deficiencies in the investigative process.[259]

The branch told us that it had developed a set of guidelines in 1999 that broadly outline notification responsibilities in relation to suspected child abuse. The guidelines were updated in 2004 to account for changes to mandatory reporting. This guidance document was not provided to us.

Mr Smith indicated the union is willing to 'be part of the solution' to issues concerning misconduct and child sexual abuse.[260]

8.1.2 Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (Tasmanian branch)

Emily Shepherd, Branch Secretary, Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (Tasmanian branch), told us the role of the Federation is to protect and promote the interests of its members and to 'provide professional, industrial and political leadership for the nursing and midwifery industries and the health sector'.[261]

In 2007, the Federation developed a National Position Statement on Child Abuse and Neglect that sets out what it considers best practice in protecting children who have been subject to abuse.[262] This position statement was last reviewed and re-endorsed in 2019.[263] It includes:

- recognition of the harm that is caused by child abuse
- requiring that nurses and midwives are able to assess, identify, report and implement intervention strategies where child abuse is suspected
- recognising the duty of care that nurses and midwives have to children and young people and that they have statutory notification obligations
- requiring employers to have in place policies, protocols and reporting guidelines 'that support a culture of reporting when children, adolescents and young adults are at risk of abuse or neglect'
- advocating that community education be provided to raise awareness about child abuse and that sufficient funding for investigations into alleged abuse be provided by governments.[264]

In our hearings, Counsel Assisting our Inquiry explored the role of the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation in the events that had occurred at Launceston General Hospital, where James Griffin, who was a nurse on Ward 4K (the former Paediatric Inpatient Unit) and a Federation workplace delegate, was accused of child sexual abuse perpetrated over a long period (refer to Chapter 14). In response to revelations about the allegations of child sexual abuse against Mr Griffin after his death, Ms Shepherd told us:

> … at that time we were shocked and horrified and certainly felt it was appropriate to undertake [an] immediate review to understand if there was any indication that [Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation] had any knowledge of these allegations so that we could obviously examine our own systems and processes to make sure that we did address those allegations appropriately.[265]

Ms Shepherd told us that, in response to the revelations about Mr Griffin, the Federation implemented changes to its workplace delegate processes, including to inform members that if they have concerns about a delegate (or a nominee for appointment as a delegate), they should raise those concerns with the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation.[266] However, Ms Shepherd conceded that encouraging members to raise concerns about nominees or incumbent delegates may not be enough to ensure that the Federation is made aware of any issues. To that end, she told us the Federation had developed and implemented a mandatory training policy for its staff in 2022. Ms Shepherd said:

> We have implemented a mandatory training policy internally to encourage our staff to raise concerns if any are made in relation to abuse of children, child sexual assault, et cetera …

> [W]e have reflected on the events of James Griffin and our support of members on Ward 4K, and we felt that it was important that we needed to be looking at our systems and our processes and understanding that, although we didn't have any knowledge of reports of inappropriate conduct or anything untoward, any disciplinary matters involving James Griffin, we felt that we needed to reflect and look at our systems to make sure that our systems and our policies were absolutely in line with best practice to support our staff in supporting members in these situations.[267]

We are encouraged by the broad, practical approach to child safety matters adopted by the Federation. We discuss the role that the Federation played in Mr Griffin's case in more detail in Chapter 14.

8.1.3 Health and Community Services Union

The Health and Community Services Union seems to have maintained a more traditional, industrial relations advocacy approach to its members who have been accused of child sexual abuse and related conduct.

Lucas Digney, Assistant State Secretary of the Health and Community Services Union, told us that 52 workers (all operational staff) at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were members of the union, making it the primary union representing employees at the Centre.

Mr Digney told us the union's role was to advocate on behalf of its members in industrial matters. He told us the union tried to 'ensure that procedural fairness and natural justice are upheld in the disciplinary process and that any outcome is proportionate to the alleged or proven misconduct'.[268] According to Mr Digney, this approach did not change if the disciplinary processes in question involved allegations of child sexual abuse.[269]

In his evidence at our hearings, Mr Digney told us that when disciplinary processes were initiated against union members, at times, the union would dispute whether the Head of Agency had 'the relevant information in front of them that would enable them to form a requisite belief'.[270] Mr Digney then said:

> That's not to say that allegations haven't been made, but that's to say that perhaps an allegation that there's been a breach of the Code of Conduct has been made prematurely before other enquiries are made.[271]

Mandy Clarke, former Deputy Secretary of the Children, Youth and Families division of the Department of Communities, told us that while the safety of young people in detention was a paramount concern for the Department, this concern had to be balanced with the need for a preliminary assessment that supported 'a plausible allegation when/if subjected to industrial scrutiny'.[272] More pointedly, Ms Allen, former Acting Executive Director, People and Culture, Department of Communities, told us that in relation to initial allegations against employees, the Department was:

> [o]perating against a background of unions who would lodge applications to review actions in the Tasmanian Industrial Commission, including about whether > the Secretary could form reason to believe that a breach of the State Service Act 2000 Code of Conduct.[273]

This may partly explain why preliminary assessments have become long, drawn-out processes.

In terms of the safety of children in government institutions, the approach of the Health and Community Services Union to preliminary assessments of the conduct of workers that potentially threatens the safety of children in government institutions could be better directed. We consider that the relevant information needed to form a reasonable belief that there may have been a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct should be confined to a basic assessment of the alleged facts. As discussed, there is a danger that a preliminary assessment can become a de facto investigation. Further, undue delays in the investigative process should be avoided. As discussed, given procedural fairness and a right of reply is permissible at the investigation stage, we do not view it as necessary for such rights to be accorded at the preliminary assessment stage.

The Health and Community Services Union has shown concern about issues involving child safety; for example, we note its support for therapeutic approaches to residential care for young people in the youth justice system and its willingness to work with the government on reforms to disciplinary processes, so these processes are more trauma-informed.[274] The Health and Community Services Union states that its approach to advocacy is to simply enforce basic and fundamental rights regarding the proper conduct of disciplinary processes.[275]

8.1.4 Community and Public Sector Union

Thirza White, the General Secretary of the Community and Public Sector Union, told us the union provides general advice to its members who are subject to State Service disciplinary procedures about what will occur during process.[276] As with other unions, Ms White told us the Community and Public Sector Union was concerned to ensure the employer complied with the requirements of disciplinary processes, including that any sanctions imposed be 'reasonable and proportionate to any breaches found'.[277] As with other unions, Ms White said that where a member requested assistance with State Service disciplinary processes, the Community and Public Sector Union's approach to the 'industrial services provided' did not change based on the nature of the allegations, including allegations of child sexual abuse, against the member.[278] Ms White noted that '[i]nformation, advice, and representation is provided in respect of the Employer's compliance with the procedure that the Head of Agency has commenced'.[279]

Ms White's statement reveals a level of concern for matters that involve the safety of children. For example, she acknowledges that '[i]n workplaces where services are provided to vulnerable people, additional measures should be taken by the Employer to ensure safe staffing levels and to foster a workplace culture of complaint raising and reporting of incidents'.[280]

The Community and Public Sector Union informed us of the actions it has undertaken regarding how the union handles matters involving child sexual abuse. These include:

- a review of internal processes leading to introducing an employment policy on 'Disclosure of Child Safety Matters' (the Community and Public Sector Union did not include the policy in their response, but offered to supply it on request)
- new protocols in relation to the election of delegates that are similar to those outlined above in relation to the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation
- raising concerns formally and through the Independent State Service Review 'around the functionality of [Employment Direction No. 5] and the grievance procedure to adequately deal with inappropriate, and at times, illegal behaviour, as well as support a culture that encourages bystander action through reporting of inappropriate conduct'
- establishing, in 2021, 'a dedicated reporting webpage for employees who had witnessed or experienced sexual and gendered violence in the workplace to allow employees to submit a report and receive a call from the [Community and Public Sector Union] Member Advice & Support Team about their options and next steps'.[281]

8.2 Union support for child safety reform

We understand the difficulties that can arise for unions (and other industrial advocates) when a member is subject to disciplinary proceedings involving child sexual abuse and related matters. On the one hand, unions are concerned with ensuring disciplinary processes are followed and procedural fairness is accorded to the member. On the other hand, unions recognise the importance of the safety of children in the workplaces where their members are employed.

These difficulties aside, there are actions that unions can take to help improve the safety of children and young people. For example, unions can:

- provide resources to members on recognising and reporting child sexual abuse and related matters
- provide clear public statements about the union's position on child sexual abuse and how the union approaches matters involving child sexual abuse
- develop policies that direct how these matters are to be addressed in the union.

Together, initiatives such as these can help to improve the safety of children and young people in the workplaces where their members are employed by fostering a culture in the union and its membership that prioritises child safety.

To this end, we are heartened by the proactive stance that some unions have taken regarding matters concerning the safety of children and young people, for example, the developments in the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation. We also note that, generally, all unions we engaged with appear to recognise the importance of these issues and support changes to disciplinary processes that will help to keep children and young people safe in government institutions.

To help improve the safety of children and young people in government institutions where their members work, we invite unions to:

- develop a position statement on allegations of child sexual abuse and professional boundary breaches consistent with grooming. The statement should be publicly available and easily accessible
- develop and make available to their membership policies that address how the union handles matters involving child sexual abuse and professional boundary breaches consistent with grooming
- make training available to their members that covers topics including recognising, reporting and responding to child sexual abuse and related conduct. The training should include information about child trauma-related behaviours for union delegates or workplace representatives who represent members facing allegations of child sexual abuse.[282]

We also invite unions to support the changes we are recommending to State Service disciplinary processes in the interests of ensuring the safety of children and young people in government institutions. This could be done by issuing a statement of support.

9 Role of the Tasmanian Industrial Commission

Workplace actions taken by the State against an employee are subject to review by the Tasmanian Industrial Commission.[283] The Industrial Commission may not have direct responsibility for the safety of children in government institutions. However, its review of actions taken regarding government employees can influence how these matters are approached in government agencies.

In our hearings on health, the prospect of appeals to the Tasmanian Industrial Commission figured prominently with those in the Department of Health who were responsible for such matters. For example, Mathew Harvey, former Human Resources Consultant with the Department of Health, told us that regarding unsubstantiated allegations, the Tasmanian Industrial Commission had said such allegations could not be used in any 'claim in any forum going forward'.[284]

When asked whether the focus should be on the protection and safety of children and young people as opposed to industrial relations issues in these matters, Mr Harvey's view was:

> I mean, it's the same thing: if we were to find him [James Griffin] guilty and then he took it to, for instance, appealed it through the Industrial Commission, which is the way appeals can [progress], through our system, then [they] would have said, you've relied on unsubstantiated claims to make a finding and you can't do that, and it's a decision that would have most likely been overturned.[285]

As discussed, the ability to use past matters to establish patterns of behaviour that may indicate child sexual abuse is vitally important. We also noted above Ms Allen's suggestion that appeals to the Industrial Commission can shape the way a preliminary assessment or disciplinary process is conducted.

Similar to issues involving allegations of past misconduct, we heard that the question of whether inappropriate conduct could be considered to have occurred in the course of an employee's employment (for the purpose of the State Service Code of Conduct) presented challenges for the Department of Health. The Department of Health told us that it did not consider appeals a deterrent for taking action.[286] However, the Department said that where there were allegations or incidents were not subject to criminal charges and the relevant conduct was alleged to have occurred outside the course of employment, this could mean that 'actions have greater exposure to appeals' to the Tasmanian Industrial Commission.[287]

Affording procedural fairness to employees, including through appeal processes is, of course, essential. However, we are concerned the Tasmanian Industrial Commission's approach to matters that involve child sexual abuse and related behaviours is through a strict and technical industrial relations focus, rather than one that fully considers the issues raised by such matters. This strict focus may be due to the highly prescriptive nature of State Service disciplinary processes, which can lead Tasmanian Industrial Commission reviews to focus on technical details and procedural aspects. As stated previously, the 2021 report Critical Analysis Report on Termination in the State Service for the Department of Premier and Cabinet said:

> This focus, internally, on form over substance then unduly narrows the focus of the [Tasmanian Industrial Commission]. The [Tasmanian Industrial Commission] is reviewing strict procedures which already burden the [Tasmanian State Service] system and is not empowered, through legislation, to take a more practical or discretionary view of matters.[288]

Because the Tasmanian Industrial Commission is required to determine employment matters regarding child sexual abuse and related conduct, we consider it should regard the need to protect children and the impacts of child sexual abuse. We consider that training in the issues raised by child sexual abuse and related conduct will help to foster a more responsive approach to these issues when they arise in reviews of government actions by the Tasmanian Industrial Commission. This training will also help when the Government adopts our recommendation for increased rights for a complainant in cases of allegations of child sexual abuse (refer to Recommendation 20.8). We recommend in Chapter 16 that the Tasmanian Government funds the provision and/or development of training for judges on the dynamics of child sexual abuse and trauma-informed practice or funds judges to attend interstate programs such as those offered by the Judicial College of Victoria (refer to Recommendation 16.25).

Such training should be designed to raise awareness about the nature and impact of trauma and child sexual abuse, its prevalence and how to apply trauma-informed principles in judicial decision making. We recommend that Tasmanian Industrial Commission members also receive such training, either locally or by attending any relevant interstate program or training, such as the programs offered by the Judicial College of Victoria.

Recommendation 20.15

The Government should fund the Tasmanian Industrial Commission to enable its members to attend training on child sexual abuse either locally or through any relevant interstate program or training, such as the programs offered by the Judicial College of Victoria.

10 Conclusion

In this chapter, we have outlined many problems with the State's disciplinary framework in relation to responding to allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct, including the State Service Code of Conduct and employment directions. We have proposed many reforms relating to the application and implementation of the Code itself and to the employment directions related to suspensions, breach of code of conduct investigations and inability to perform duties. Fundamentally, we are calling for a shift in the focus of this disciplinary framework to allow for a prioritisation of the safety of children. It will take significant commitment and culture change to achieve this outcome. But it should be done.

45 Ian Watt, Independent Review of the Tasmanian State Service (Final Report, 2021) 201. The Review found that, in Tasmania, most terminations were for inability (65 per cent in 2019) whereas terminations for underperformance or State Service Code of Conduct breaches were only 24 per cent of the total in 2019. In the Australian Government, terminations for underperformance or misconduct were 40 per cent of all terminations.

82 Letter from Michael O'Farrell to Timothy Bullard, 11 June 2021, 5 [25], produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. The view of Mr Michael O'Farrell, the previous Solicitor-General, was based on the decision of the High Court in Comcare v Banerji (2019) 267 CLR 373, which dealt with a similar integrity provision in the Commonwealth Public Service Act 1999 (Cth). The issue in Banerji was whether the relevant provision in the Public Service Act fettered the implied freedom of political communication, in a case where a public servant had posted tweets criticising the government. The High Court did not clearly indicate that the obligations of Australian public servants could not extend beyond the workplace, so that the case does not necessarily confine the acts to which s 9(14) could apply.

93 Letter from Solicitor General of Tasmania to Senior Advisor, Legal Services Unit, 22 December 2005, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. We note that in terms of the vicarious liability of schools for the conduct of teachers, Gleeson CJ has said: 'where the teacher–student relationship is invested with a high degree of power and intimacy, the use of that power and intimacy to commit sexual abuse may provide a sufficient connection between the sexual assault and the employment to make it just to treat such contact as occurring in the course of employment. The degree of power and intimacy in a teacher–student relationship must be assessed by reference to factors such as the age of students, their particular vulnerability if any, the tasks allocated to teachers, and the number of adults concurrently responsible for the care of students. Furthermore, the nature and circumstances of the sexual misconduct will usually be a material consideration': New South Wales v Lepore; Samin v Queensland; Rich v Queensland (2003) 195 ALR 412, 434 (Gleeson CJ). On this topic, refer also to Prince Alfred College Inc v ADC (2016) 335 ALR 1, 17 (French CJ, Kiefel, Bell, Keane and Nettle JJ).

94 As explained in Chapter 17 Redress, Civil Litigation and Support, the State may now be held liable for child sexual abuse committed by employees in circumstances where vicarious liability might not apply.

21 Therapeutic services

1 Introduction

In this chapter, we consider the therapeutic service system in Tasmania, which has the potential to support victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse and children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours.

Without the right support and intervention, victim-survivors can be left to cope with their trauma in ways that are harmful to themselves and others—such as using alcohol and other drugs, engaging in violent or criminal behaviour, or self-harming. It can have an impact on their life opportunities, including their ability to engage in education and employment. They can also become vulnerable to more victimisation.[1]

We heard that the first contacts a victim-survivor has with a therapeutic service can affect their trajectory towards recovery. If they feel supported and validated, they are more likely to engage in therapeutic treatment and to seek justice. However, if they feel dismissed or minimised, they may be less likely to pursue recovery or justice for themselves.[2] Therefore, when a victim-survivor reaches out for help, referral pathways need to facilitate timely access to appropriate services. This service system needs to be informed by its users—adult and child victim-survivors.

While our terms of reference require us to inquire into the needs of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings, we consider our recommendations in this chapter will benefit all victim-survivors of child sexual abuse who have similar and complex therapeutic needs.

Victim-survivors may disclose their abuse at any time after it occurs and sometimes do so very late in their lives. Impacts of child sexual abuse can also manifest differently at various stages in a person's life—for example, when they enter adolescence or when they have their own children. Recognising these diverse needs across the lifespan, this chapter considers the different support needs of child and adult victim-survivors. We also consider victim-survivors who have extra needs or often experience barriers to receiving suitable support, such as those who have disability or are Aboriginal.

We discuss the needs of children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours separately in this chapter. These children need an added level of specialised help and intervention to address the harm that the behaviour does to their development, and to reduce the likelihood of them repeating the behaviour. Although children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours may experience criminal justice issues as a result, and cause harm to victim-survivors, we consider it vital to recognise that these children need help. We also consider that children who have been harmed by the sexual behaviours of another child need equivalent therapeutic supports to victim-survivors of other forms of child sexual abuse.

We do not explore therapeutic interventions available to adult perpetrators of child sexual abuse in this chapter, although we consider it briefly in Chapter 16.

This chapter is divided into four main sections, in addition to the Introduction (Section 1) and Conclusion (Section 6).

In Section 2, we outline the National Royal Commission's recommendations for an accessible, well-coordinated therapeutic service system designed to meet the needs of victim-survivors.

In Section 3, we describe the services available to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. We refer to these services as 'sexual assault services' in line with current practice, noting that they provide services for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and of adult-on-adult sexual assault (and do not limit services to abuse that meets a criminal definition of assault).

As outlined in Section 3, we found it difficult to get a handle on the therapeutic service system and how the various components of the service system intersect.[3] We note that it may be even more difficult for people who need these forms of support to understand how the service system works and what is available to them.

In Section 4, we consider the extent to which the therapeutic service system meets the needs of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and offers services that are accessible and appropriate. We identify several areas for improvement including:

- a need for government leadership to develop and fund a well-coordinated therapeutic service system for child sexual abuse

- a need for more sexual assault counselling services to enable adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse to access them easily and in a timely way
- an urgent need for more culturally appropriate Aboriginal healing services and for sexual assault services that accommodate diversity and disability in a natural and welcoming way.

In Section 5, we focus on the therapeutic service system for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours. We conclude that children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours need better access to therapeutic services, and that there needs to be a coordinated response across government agencies, which the Government should lead.

Overall, a well-functioning, trauma-informed, accessible, collaborative and appropriate therapeutic service system for child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours requires the Tasmanian Government to assume a higher level of responsibility for overseeing, funding and monitoring such a system.

2 National Royal Commission

The Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('National Royal Commission') dedicated volume 9 of its final report to 'advocacy, support and therapeutic treatment services' for victim-survivors. Five of the recommendations in that volume are relevant to the Tasmanian Government's responsibility for the funding and characteristics of the Tasmanian service system for child sexual abuse, namely:

- ensuring there is a system of integrated advocacy, support and counselling for child and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings (Recommendation 9.1)
- increasing funding to sexual assault services to improve their capacity to support adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings (Recommendation 9.6)
- funding Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander-specific healing approaches (Recommendation 9.2)
- funding for support services for victim-survivors with disability (Recommendation 9.3)
- ensuring government human services agencies' policy frameworks and strategies recognise the needs of victim-survivors and the benefits of trauma-informed approaches in their work (Recommendation 9.8).[4]

Since 2018, Tasmanian Government has reported annually on its implementation of the National Royal Commission's recommendations, most recently in the Fifth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2023.[5] From its progress report in 2020 onwards, the Government began referring to its action plans for family violence as also including 'sexual violence' and fulfilling many of the National Royal Commission's recommendations.[6]

The Government's fifth report suggested that its Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 has fulfilled the above five National Royal Commission recommendations, but it provided little information to address each recommendation.[7]

Our reading of the Government's third action plan and its predecessor—Safe Homes Families Communities: Tasmania's Action Plan for Family and Sexual Violence 2019–2022—revealed that only six of the 38 actions contained in the plans could be considered relevant to the sexual assault service system (depending on how they are implemented); the others relate to family violence.[8] The relevant six actions cover improved forensic testing technology (Action 4), increased core funding to sexual assault counselling services with five-year funding contracts (Action 12), establishing a peak family and sexual violence body (Action 14), 'strengthening' the Victims of Crime Service (Action 19), continuing the Sexual Assault Support Service's recently funded Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program for addressing harmful sexual behaviours (Action 28) and establishing two multidisciplinary centres (Action 1).[9]

We are concerned that the Government decided to incorporate the National Royal Commission's recommendations about child sexual abuse into the existing activities and frameworks for family and sexual violence. We recognise that child sexual abuse can co-occur with family violence, but this approach misses the intention of the National Royal Commission's recommendations; namely, that child sexual abuse, and particularly child sexual abuse in institutions requires a specific response. We consider this recognition requires the Government to lead, coordinate and fund therapeutic services specifically for child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours. We discuss these concerns further in Chapter 19.

3 The current service system

Tasmania's therapeutic service system for child sexual abuse took us some time to comprehend despite our own research activities and our notices to produce to the Government (discussed in Section 4). We benefited greatly from the information provided by local sexual assault services: the Sexual Assault Support Service and Laurel House.

Broadly speaking, the Tasmanian therapeutic service system for child sexual abuse appears to have evolved over time, often in silos and in response to local issues.

We identified its main components to be:

- the Strong Families Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line ('Advice and Referral Line') for concerns or suspicions about the sexual abuse of a child
- local sexual assault counselling services, which provide a crisis response and short-, medium- or longer-term support
- counselling support available through the National Redress Scheme
- local counselling support for victims of crime
- local therapeutic services for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours
- national online or phone sexual assault support services
- forensic services to collect evidence that may be used to prosecute a sexual crime (explored in Chapter 16)
- multidisciplinary centres where sexual assault services are co-located with other services that victim-survivors may need, such as police, the Child Safety Service or family violence assistance
- mainstream counselling or mental health services that often need to respond to disclosures of sexual abuse or its impacts while delivering therapeutic support.

In a collaborative and responsive therapeutic service system, as advocated by the National Royal Commission, all aspects of the service system communicate well and refer to each other easily.[10] In the rest of this section, we explore each part of Tasmania's service system in turn before examining areas requiring improvement in Section 4.

3.1 Advice and Referral Line

For people who are concerned about the welfare of a child, the Advice and Referral Line is often their first port of call for advice about what to do and where to go. As well as its statutory role in the child protection system, the Advice and Referral Line refers families and children to services that could assist with problems they are experiencing, including referring a family to sexual assault services to receive support for child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours.[11]

3.2 Local counselling services

3.2.1 MY SUPPORT helpline

In the first instance, Tasmanian victim-survivors can phone the State Government funded 24-hour 1800 MY SUPPORT helpline for support in relation to sexual assault or sexual abuse.[12] The MY SUPPORT helpline number is directed to counsellors employed at the Sexual Assault Support Service or Laurel House (described in the next section), depending on the caller's location.[13] Phone counsellors provide immediate crisis support for victim-survivors, assist them if they want to make a report to police and/or want a forensic medical assessment, and refer them for in-person counselling and support, including through Laurel House and the Sexual Assault Support Service.[14]

3.2.2 Sexual assault counselling services

The two main sexual assault counselling services generally service distinct geographical regions in Tasmania—Laurel House provides services to northern Tasmania and the North West, and the Sexual Assault Support Service provides services in southern Tasmania.[15] The Tasmanian Government funds both services to offer counselling and support for a wide range of victim-survivors, including victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse and children who have experienced harmful sexual behaviours from another child.[16] Following the disbandment of the Department of Communities on 1 October 2022, the Department of Premier and Cabinet began funding sexual assault services.[17]

There is a third, much smaller service—Enterprising Aardvark—in northern Tasmania, but it is not government funded.

Broadly speaking, the Sexual Assault Support Service and Laurel House appear to offer roughly equivalent services in many respects. Both agencies support victim-survivors of child sexual abuse (including harmful sexual behaviours) of all ages and genders, as well as 'secondary victims such as parents, siblings, friends and supporters' by a variety of means: in person, phone, online and outreach.[18] We concluded that both agencies employ experienced therapists who have degree-level qualifications in counselling, psychology or social work, and provide their staff with professional development and supervision.[19]

Laurel House and the Sexual Assault Support Service accept referrals from many different sources.[20] When a victim-survivor contacts either service directly, they speak to an intake counsellor who triages the case for allocation to a counsellor.[21] While a person is awaiting allocation, both services provide crisis assistance (refer to discussion about waiting lists in Section 4.3.1).[22]

The Sexual Assault Support Service has the advantage of having greater capacity, perhaps due to the larger population in southern Tasmania. The Sexual Assault Support Service has also secured the entire government funding for providing therapy to children and young people up to the age of 18 who engage in harmful sexual behaviours (the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program described in Section 5.2.1) and receives Commonwealth funding to provide counselling for victim-survivors seeking redress through the National Redress Scheme (refer to Section 3.2.3 and, for more detail, Chapter 17). It employs 48 staff, most of whom are part-time, and receives about 1,400 referrals a year.[23]

Laurel House provided counselling to just under 900 clients in the 2020–21 financial year.[24] The service did not provide staffing numbers, but its Chief Executive Officer, Kathryn Fordyce, advised us that the case load of a full-time counsellor at Laurel House was the same as for the Sexual Assault Support Service: about 30 clients at any one time.[25]

We learned of Enterprising Aardvark from a victim-survivor who had heard about the service from police.[26] According to its website, Enterprising Aardvark is a free counselling and support service in northern Tasmania for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and their families.[27] Its website says it relies on donations because it receives no government funding, employs two part-time counsellors and has provided about 1,500 hours of counselling each year since it started in 2017.[28]

We were told that, in 2020, Enterprising Aardvark provided education sessions for Ward 4K staff at Launceston General Hospital about profiles of abusers, grooming tactics and strategies.[29] Otherwise, we have little information about this service and we presume it is not well-publicised outside informal networks. It did not make a submission to us.

3.2.3 Redress support services

We discuss the National Redress Scheme in Chapter 17, but consider here the supports provided to victim-survivors as part of that scheme. Many of those involved in accessing the National Redress Scheme, or supporting those who access the scheme, told us that the process can be traumatising, and that support is vital while victim-survivors retell their experiences of child sexual abuse and go through the distressing process of having those experiences quantified against a scale of seriousness.[30]

In Tasmania the Commonwealth Government funds the Sexual Assault Support Service, Relationships Australia and the South East Tasmanian Aboriginal Corporation to provide redress support services, which are counselling services for victim-survivors in the National Redress Scheme.[31] Laurel House said it does not provide redress support services but aims to do so in the future.[32]

Under the National Redress Scheme, victim-survivors can also choose counselling services from approved counsellors to be included in their redress offer.[33] The Department of Justice coordinates this part of the service system.[34]

Civil legal action can be protracted and very stressful for victim-survivors (refer to Chapter 17).[35] Although there is no specifically funded support service for victim-survivors who take civil action over their abuse, sexual assault counselling services will support victim-survivors who are engaging in civil action.[36]

3.2.4 Victims of Crime Service

Provided by the Department of Justice's Victims Support Services (refer to Chapter 17), the Victims of Crime Service has offices in Burnie, Launceston and Hobart.[37] The service 'provides a counselling, support and referral service to victims of serious interpersonal violence and sexual offences'.[38]

This free service is generally used by victim-survivors who have reported their abuse to police.[39] Basic information about the service is available on the Department of Justice's website.[40]

3.3 Online and phone sexual assault support services

Phone and online sexual assault support services for victim-survivors strengthen Tasmania's service system. Victim-survivors can contact the free national 24-hour 1800RESPECT helpline, which offers immediate support and counselling for sexual assault and family violence via phone and online. The helpline has a referral database for local services and provides self-help information and apps to help victim-survivors access supports in a safe way.[41] Organisations, such as the Sydney-based Survivors and Mates Support Network for male victim-survivors and the national organisation Blue Knot Foundation, provide some support, information and referral services to victim-survivors and their supporters.[42]

3.4 Forensic medical assessments

The Tasmanian Health Service can undertake forensic examinations for victim-survivors after a sexual assault. These examinations can be conducted at the Royal Hobart Hospital, the Launceston General Hospital and the North West Regional Hospital (Burnie).[43] The victim-survivor's chosen service will conduct the medical examination, record injuries and collect biological samples if relevant. A victim-survivor does not need to have made a police report to have a forensic medical examination.[44] Counsellors from Laurel House or the Sexual Assault Support Service can support the victim-survivor during the examination.[45]

Chapter 16 discusses forensic medical examinations including the roles of police, medical and nursing personnel and specialist sexual assault services.

3.5 Multidisciplinary centres

Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 committed to piloting two multidisciplinary centres as a new action 'to provide survivor-centred, holistic and integrated responses to family and sexual violence'.[46] These centres, named Arch centres, should be up and running in 2023.[47] Tasmania Police has led development of these multidisciplinary centres to improve specialisation for police and coordinate responses to sexual violence in general.[48] In Chapter 16, we call for Tasmania Police to prioritise police specialisation. Refer to Section 4.2 for more on the new Arch centres.

3.6 Mainstream services

Not everyone who was sexually abused as a child will access only specialist sexual assault services. Many victim-survivors will seek support for the problems arising from experiencing child sexual abuse, such as post-traumatic stress disorder, alcohol and other drug misuse, suicidal ideation, depression, anxiety and relationship issues.[49]

The key mainstream services that we consider would have contact with victim-survivors for treatment or referral are:

- medical practitioners such as psychiatrists and general practitioners who can provide Mental Health Treatment Plans under Medicare
- private psychologists and mental health practitioners who see clients referred by general practitioners, often subsidised for a set number of sessions by Medicare under a Mental Health Treatment Plan
- public mental health services offered by the Tasmanian Health Service such as Adult Mental Health Services, Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services, the Alcohol and Drug Service and adult inpatient mental health units
- Aboriginal health organisations (discussed more in Section 4.4.7).

We discuss the need for government mainstream services to become more trauma-informed in Chapter 19.

4 Improving the therapeutic service system

As a basis for its recommendations (refer to Section 2), the National Royal Commission identified the key characteristics of a responsive service system for adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours:

- The system and its components need to be trauma-informed and knowledgeable about child sexual abuse.
- The system needs to work together to meet the range of potential needs of victim-survivors and the complexity of the service system.
- Enough services should be available for victim-survivors to access and be delivered for as long as necessary for each person.

- Services should be accessible for all victim-survivors regardless of their capacity to pay, geographical location, disability or cultural background.
- Services should be 'acceptable' to victim-survivors who have diverse needs; that is, they should be flexible enough to respond to victim-survivors from a variety of cultural and social contexts.
- The high quality of the services should be assured through ongoing evaluation of evidence-informed approaches.
- The service system should include Aboriginal healing approaches.[50]

The National Royal Commission's recommendations assigned responsibility to the state and territory governments to ensure the therapeutic service system has these characteristics.[51] We consider that the Tasmanian Government needs to do more to meet these requirements.

This section considers the extent to which the current therapeutic service system meets the needs of victim-survivors and provides services that are accessible and appropriate. We also identify several areas for improvement.

4.1 Developing a therapeutic service system for child sexual abuse

The Tasmanian therapeutic service system has evolved organically from the bottom up. Over time, separate non-government services have been established in communities to meet the needs of victim-survivors at that time. Gradually, services have sought and received government funding to expand into areas where they have identified gaps. Consequently, the service system is not particularly cohesive or equitable.

At the strategic level, we consider the Tasmanian Government has not taken responsibility for ensuring the therapeutic service system is adequately planned and funded. Instead, the task of service provision and leadership in the system has fallen to hard-working and dedicated non-government organisations. There has therefore been no coordination or overarching plan for developing the system that would ensure consistency in approach, coordination of services, appropriate coverage or equitable access.

We asked the Government to describe its service system in preventing, identifying, reporting and responding to allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including for:

- advocacy, therapeutic and social supports for victim-survivors
- therapeutic and social supports for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours

- targeted supports for
    - Aboriginal children
    - children with a culturally and linguistically diverse background
    - children in youth detention
    - children in out of home care
    - children with disability
    - children who identify as LGBTQIA+
    - any other groups that receive targeted supports.[52]

The Government's response did not demonstrate to us that there is a well-structured therapeutic service system for adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children who experience or display harmful sexual behaviours.[53] In the remainder of Section 4 and in Section 5, we outline gaps in the scope of sexual assault services for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours, as well as in a consistently coordinated approach to service delivery.

Given the difficulties we experienced trying to understand the therapeutic service system for child sexual abuse, it follows that victim-survivors would also find it difficult to understand the service system and access the services they need when they need them.

The Tasmanian Government should lead, coordinate and fund development of a therapeutic service system that includes responses for adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and for children who have experienced or displayed harmful sexual behaviours. This therapeutic service system should ensure coordination of services, appropriate service coverage and equitable access to quality services.

The Government should ensure the therapeutic service system is easily understood by victim-survivors and those affected by child sexual abuse, as well as mainstream services that may need to make or receive warm referrals.

The Government also needs to know the therapeutic service system is working and meeting the needs of victim-survivors. The National Royal Commission stated that 'a high-quality service system is informed by evidence, well-trained and supported, outcome focused, accountable and subject to ongoing evaluation'.[54]

We only heard about two of the services in Tasmania's sexual assault service system that are being actively evaluated, mainly because they are both pilot programs—the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program for harmful sexual behaviours and the Arch centres.

The Sexual Assault Support Service expressed concern about a lack of quality assurance or standards required in government funding contracts.[55] We identified a similar concern in the context of non-government out of home care provider funding agreements (refer to Chapter 9). Commissioning arrangements appear to have been problematic in several areas in the former Department of Communities.

The Department of Premier and Cabinet, in its new role of funding sexual assault services, should provide leadership, fill service gaps and ensure funding agreements with non-government sexual assault counselling services have governance requirements, service evaluation and child safe accreditation built in. The child safe accreditation will empower children to contribute to how the services provided for them are shaped.

It is important that in leading development of this therapeutic service system, the Government collaborates with all those affected by the service system including children and adult victim-survivors, specialist counselling services, police, government agencies and the peak body for the sexual assault service system recommended in Recommendation 21.3.

Recommendation 21.1

1. The Department of Premier and Cabinet should lead, coordinate and fund a therapeutic service system for child and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children who have experienced or displayed harmful sexual behaviours.
2. The Department should ensure the therapeutic service system:
    a. addresses service gaps and provides coordination of services, appropriate coverage and equitable access to quality services
    b. is easily understood and accessible to the public, state servants and other mainstream service providers.
3. The Department, in leading this work, should consult with:
    a. any relevant government departments, including the Department for Education, Children and Young People, the Department of Health and Tasmania Police
    b. sexual assault and abuse counselling services
    c. the Premier's Youth Advisory Council and the adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group (Recommendation 19.5)

d. the peak body for the sexual assault service system (Recommendation 21.3).

4. The Tasmanian Government should ensure funding agreements with non-government specialist services include appropriate governance requirements, sexual abuse service standards, service evaluation and child safe accreditation.

4.2 Creating a collaborative system

The National Royal Commission heard that services victim-survivors need 'span several sectors and can be difficult to navigate' and that those services '[do] not collaborate with one another, compounding the difficulties victims and survivors faced when navigating the complex policy and service environment'.[56]

Kylee's experience

One victim-survivor told us about her experience of having to tell nine people her story in order to report to police and receive therapeutic care.

> For someone who never wanted to tell anyone, the amount of people I then had to tell … One example is Victims of Crime, I was encouraged by the Detective to contact them, so I ring up to make an initial appointment, you're then speaking to a counsellor to do an extension of time application, that then goes to someone to be assessed. Then come in and see someone else to do an application … then I'm contacted by someone who says 'you need to see a counsellor' … They then organise me to see a phone link-up counsellor, she says, 'you do realise you're going to have to tell your GP?' … Then because the counsellor thought I had a diagnosis of moderate post-traumatic stress disorder, I had to then be referred on to a psychologist … Then I had an interview with a Commissioner [for Victims of Crime], and an assistant and they then determined whether I was eligible or not … nine people I had to share my experience with.[57]

The National Royal Commission recommended establishing:

> … dedicated community support services for victims and survivors in each jurisdiction, to provide an integrated model of advocacy and support and counselling to children and adults who experienced childhood sexual abuse in institutional contexts.[58]

The Blue Knot Foundation's Organisational Guidelines for Trauma-Informed Service Delivery also supports providing collaborative, integrated care:

> People living with the impacts of trauma often present to multiple services over a long period of time. The care they receive is frequently fragmented and not well coordinated between services. There are often inadequate referral and follow-up pathways. These failures in the system can mean that clients experience a 'merry go round' of unintegrated care. As a result, people are more likely to be retraumatised and their trauma is more likely to be compounded.[59]

We heard of local examples of close working relationships between services, such as in North West Tasmania. Community members there proudly reported that police, schools and the Child Safety Service in their area had developed a good working relationship to respond in a trauma-informed way to disclosures of child sexual abuse and, perhaps consequently, they reported an increase in disclosures.[60] Laurel House also noted the flow-on benefits for victim-survivors of developing positive working relationships with police and other services.[61]

The response to child sexual abuse in Tasmania includes some systems for collaboration, such as interagency case discussions and a memorandum of understanding to share information between police and the Child Safety Service. However, we were told that 'effective collaboration and therefore responses stem beyond this' and:

> ... the response to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts is complex and requires multi-agency collaboration, inclusive of co-located cross-agency teams, improved information sharing, appropriate specialised training and consultations between key agencies.[62]

Jillian Maxwell, Chief Executive Officer, Sexual Assault Support Service, noted that:

> Victim-survivors of all ages express feeling overwhelmed in respect of the number of agencies who they are meant to 'follow up with'. The onus is often placed on the individual, who has already experienced significant hardship and distress, to contact the Police, Child Safety Services and other State Government agencies ... [multidisciplinary centres] would be particularly beneficial given the way we work in Tasmania; a place which is built on relationships, trust and safety. Having a client, whether an adult or a child, attending at one place where they are supported by their counsellor in accessing the other services that are either co-located or coming onsite would also be much more trauma-informed than current 'siloed' approaches.[63]

For the past few years, the Sexual Assault Support Service and Laurel House have lobbied for the setting up multidisciplinary centres in Tasmania to better coordinate services and provide 'collaborative and integrated responses to victim-survivors in one location'.[64]

4.2.1 The Tasmanian model of multidisciplinary centres

As discussed above, the Government committed to piloting two multidisciplinary centres as part of its Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027.[65] On 2 December 2022 the Government announced that two

Arch centres, one in Hobart and one in Launceston, would be 'available in 2023'.[66] In conjunction with sexual assault services, Tasmania Police has led development of the centres as a means of improving specialisation for police and for coordinating responses to sexual violence more generally.[67] The Government has said that these multidisciplinary centres will enable victim-survivors to 'receive immediate and integrated support in a safe place'.[68] The intention is to facilitate a positive first contact with counselling and statutory services for victim-survivors.

We discuss the evidence for the effectiveness of multidisciplinary centres and the need for police specialisation in Chapter 16. This section focuses on the proposed Tasmanian model of multidisciplinary centres and how they might meet the therapeutic needs of victim-survivors.

Arch centres

The Tasmanian Government has indicated that the pilot Arch centres aim to be a 'one-stop shop' for victim-survivors of sexual abuse to access all the services they need in one location.[69] On the basis of available information at the time of writing, it appears that services at the centres may include:

- sexual assault counselling services
- specialist sex crimes police investigators
- child safety support workers
- family violence counselling support services
- witness intermediaries (as requested)
- facilities for tailored service provision (as required)
- State Service employees in investigative support roles.[70]

Arch centres are being co-designed with victim-survivor advocates and existing services in the family and sexual violence sector to ensure 'service delivery meets the needs of victim-survivors'.[71] As part of the process of ensuring these are child safe organisations, we encourage the Government to work with children to inform their design. We also caution the Government to ensure the design process goes beyond co-locating services to the purposeful systems, processes and practices that will support multidisciplinary collaboration, preventing victim-survivors from having to retell their story to each service in the Arch centre with which they engage.

Source: Sexual and Family Violence Project Newsletter, Issue 1 (July 2022).

The $15.1 million allocated to Arch centres for the two-year pilot includes funds for new full-time-equivalent positions:

- 15 specialist sex crimes investigators (10 in the south and five in the north)
- nine State Service employees in analytics and specialist roles (across the model)
- three Child Safety Officers (two in the south and one in the north)
- two family violence counselling support workers (one each in the south and north).[73]

It is unclear how many staff from sexual assault counselling services will be at the centres, but we note that, in addition to the above, $21 million has been allocated to the sexual violence sector and $51 million to the family violence sector 'to support the implementation of the Third Sexual and Family Violence action plan'.[74]

Key considerations

Although there are many potential benefits to the multidisciplinary centre model, its success depends on several factors. Professor Leah Bromfield, one of the Commissioners for our Inquiry, co-authored an article with James Herbert based on a national analysis of the multidisciplinary centre model. In the article, Commissioner Bromfield commented: 'There is often a difference between the stated models and how models operate in practice'.[75] The Victorian Law Reform Commission also recently identified some common challenges with multidisciplinary centres including:

- power imbalances between agencies
- tensions in agencies' purposes and goals
- information sharing and privacy concerns
- being responsible and accessible to victim-survivors with diverse and complex needs
- not having enough resources.[76]

There is an absence of evidence directly comparing models of cross-agency responses to determine what contributes to positive outcomes, which makes it difficult to work out the essential components for an effective response.[77] However, a recent scoping review identified 11 factors that may support quality cross-agency responses and outcomes in cases of child sexual abuse.[78] These are listed in Table 21.1. Arch centres will need to consider such factors in their design, implementation and evaluation.

Table 21.1: Factors that may support quality cross-agency responses and outcomes[79]

Process factors (factors reflecting the delivery of a cross-agency model)	Protocols	Clear and comprehensive cross-agency protocols that have been developed and agreed to by agencies taking part in the response
	Case review meetings	Provide an opportunity for decision making across agencies and disciplines and for participants to understand each agency's role
	Cross-agency training	Similar training is provided to different professional disciplines
	Co-location	Staff are easily accessible and can develop rapport with those from other agencies and disciplines
Individual factors (factors enabling workers to effectively collaborate with one another)	Professional skills and knowledge	Staff have the skills and knowledge to undertake their own work and to collaborate with others
	Mandates, vision, roles and priorities	Staff can reconcile their own professional responsibilities with their role in a cross-agency team
Enabling factors (factors supporting processes and collaboration)	Feedback and evaluation	Data is received from victim-survivors and staff to enhance responses
	Leadership and governance	Emphasises the importance of cross-agency leadership, teamwork and dispute resolution
	Resources	A lack of resources to support cross-agency collaboration is a barrier to models
Improved cross-agency collaboration factors (factors reflecting good practice)	Trust and respect	Relationships between staff centre on mutual trust and respect
	Communication and information sharing	There is frequent communication and exchange of quality information across agencies

Genuine collaboration

Although Arch centre materials indicate that the centres will be physically designed to facilitate collaboration and coordination, Jenny Wing, Chair, Victorian Harmful Sexual Behaviour Network, told us that co-location or proximity does not guarantee collaboration:[80]

> … [collaboration] is a constant relationship that needs to be maintained. Being co-located in multidisciplinary centres provides greater opportunities to maintain these relationships … there still needs to be a combined effort to meet and engage regularly for the relationship to work effectively.[81]

The New South Wales experience was similar. Peter Yeomans, Detective Chief Inspector, New South Wales Police Force, who leads the Child Abuse and Sex Crimes Squad, said that 'effective and regular communication between agencies is critical', whether the service is co-located or not.[82] Tasmania Police acknowledged that the effectiveness of multidisciplinary centres was 'dependent upon relationships at a practice level, these relationships need to be established prior to systems and structures being imposed'.[83] Former Commissioner Darren Hine AO APM from Tasmania Police commented that:

> … it's not having those people in one area; it's having the right people in that area. And that's one of the things we've learned from other states: some centres work better than others, and it comes down to … leadership, and it comes down to the people actually involved and we need to learn from that.[84]

Given the importance of coordination and collaboration, it is essential for Arch centres to facilitate these relationships in an ongoing way through strong leadership and deliberate and purposeful collaboration mechanisms that put victim-survivor needs at the centre.

Police presence

A police presence in multidisciplinary centres is pivotal to their success. Tasmania's sexual assault counselling services recommended that the police presence must be unobtrusive and inconspicuous.[85] Indications are that the Arch centres will reflect this principle. Commissioner Hine said: 'it's not connected to a police station, will not look like a police station'.[86]

Laurel House noted that those victim-survivors who do not want to engage with police or direct government services should still be able to access the other services—choice is critical.[87] Indeed, choice is a principle of trauma-informed care that must be central to the multidisciplinary centre model.[88] Arch centre materials indicate that they have:

> … carefully considered the choices clients might make at the centres and what this will mean for their movement within them. If you choose to see one particular service provider only, the design will help to ensure that you do not bump into any others. For example, we respect that some clients may not want to, or may not be ready to, see a police officer. With this in mind, police officers who work in the centres will not be in uniform and will use an alternative door.[89]

Family violence

Following their examination of the Victorian multidisciplinary centre model, Tasmania Police reported their impression that Victoria Police 'considered the integration of sex crimes and family violence appropriate given there is extensive research regarding the correlation between the two'.[90]

Victoria Police told us:

> … given the high prevalence of sexual offending in family violence, Victoria Police is continually looking for opportunities to align its responses to these crime themes when they co-occur. Family violence and sexual offence units are specialist units but will operate collaboratively in some instances, such as, when the sexual violence is intrafamilial. Some multidisciplinary centres … include both specialist teams but the key function of [multidisciplinary centres] is to provide specialist sexual offence responses.[91]

We also heard from several people who have worked in the sexual assault field across different jurisdictions that family violence can become 'the dominant force' and that it is better to not 'dilute the expertise of dealing with child sexual assault matters'.[92]

Commissioner Hine told us that Arch centres will not incorporate Tasmania Police Family Violence Units, nor will the Safe at Home model change.[93] We understand the Safe at Home model to be a cross-government partnership to coordinate responses to family violence.[94] Tasmania Police told us that the intention is for extra resources to be allocated to the Safe Families Coordination Unit to expand its role to include sexual violence, enabling it to 'coordinate information to deliver the Government's vision of a collaborative, multi-agency response to sexual violence'.[95] Commissioner Hine stated that:

> This approach provides confidence that high-volume family violence matters will not impact the priority afforded to sexual assault and it is acknowledged that this will need to be subject to evaluation as part of the pilot program.[96]

Arch centre materials indicate that 'offences or information relating to family violence' that require a response will be sent to local police as is the current system, which we take to mean matters will continue to be referred to local Family Violence Units. The material also indicated that if the matter includes 'sexual violence', it will be sent to an Arch centre.[97]

We welcome the commitment to ensure family violence matters do not overwhelm a specialisation in child sexual abuse.

Resourcing

Adequate resourcing of Arch centres will be essential. Ms Maxwell, from the Sexual Assault Support Service, noted that the funding allocated may not be enough to create ideal multidisciplinary centres.[98]

It is not yet known how the extra funding to the sexual and family violence sectors will be allocated, and whether it will be enough to resource the Arch centres and existing services. However, Arch centre materials indicate that choice will be paramount in terms of services accessed within and outside of the centres. Materials suggest that Arch centres will be an extra rather than a replacement resource and that 'established counselling and support services already available in the community will not change when the centres commence'.[99]

Evaluation

The National Royal Commission noted that while multidisciplinary models can achieve goals such as reducing retraumatisation, assisting victim-survivors to navigate the system and promoting effective collaboration between services, 'co-location and other models of collaboration are only tools to achieve a better service offering, not goals in themselves'.[100] Given the complexities of providing effective therapeutic and statutory services to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, evaluation of Arch centres must be independent, robust and ongoing.

Commissioner Hine told us that, as a pilot program, 'evaluation will be critical and commence from the program launch to ensure experience informs the future'.[101] This is supported by Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027, which indicates that 'learnings from the pilot will inform future considerations of the model'.[102] The evaluation should follow sound principles to provide an accurate picture of the impact of Arch centres.

We heard from stakeholders that multidisciplinary centres 'will not provide the solutions to all the issues and challenges that affect victim-survivors of child sexual assault in Tasmanian Government settings'.[103] Similarly, the Victorian Law Reform Commission recommended expanding multidisciplinary centres in Victoria, but acknowledged that they are only one feature of a much larger system.[104] We discuss other aspects of the service system, including sexual assault counselling services, in Section 4.3.

Recommendation 21.2

1. The Tasmanian Government should conduct an independent process and outcomes evaluation for the pilot multidisciplinary Arch centres and any future centres after three years of operation to inform the Government of any systems improvements that could be made to the centres and whether they have resulted in improvements in client outcomes. The evaluation should incorporate:

a. an evaluation and data outcomes framework established during the first year that includes required baseline and outcomes data for clients receiving services through the Arch centres, and considers how Arch centre outcomes can be compared with the outcomes of cases that have not received an Arch centre response

b. the collection of data in line with the data outcomes framework in the first year

c. the storing and retention of data in a format that can be provided to the independent evaluators.

2. The evaluation and data outcomes framework should include outcome measures for adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children who have experienced or displayed harmful sexual behaviours.

3. The Tasmanian Government should ensure multidisciplinary centres are not the sole response to the therapeutic needs of adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.

4.2.2 Peak body

Despite the small size of its service system, Tasmania's specialist sexual assault service providers can be relatively isolated from one another, and from interstate services, due to the north–south Tasmanian divide and the lack of a coordinated service system. Other states have peak bodies representing sexual assault services to coordinate services and advocate for system improvements, but Tasmania does not have such an organisation.[105]

The closest approximation in Tasmania is Providers of Sexual Assault Care. The organisation's website lists its main members as Tasmania Police, Sexual Assault Forensic Examiners at Launceston General Hospital, the specialist sexual assault support services of Laurel House and the Sexual Assault Support Service, and Forensic Science Service Tasmania.[106] Although its membership reflects a strong forensic focus, Providers of Sexual Assault Care has a broader stated purpose: to bring together the services that respond in the event of a sexual assault to support those involved in the care of victim-survivors of sexual assault, share multidisciplinary knowledge, facilitate 'expert total care' to victim-survivors and raise awareness of the problem of sexual assault.[107] The Providers of Sexual Assault Care administrator advised us that the organisation is funded through membership fees. The Tasmanian Government did not refer to it in its 'Tasmanian Government's current service system' response to our notice to produce, discussed in Section 3.[108]

The Government has recognised the need for a peak body in Action 14 of Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027, which committed the Government to funding the Tasmanian Council of Social Services to establish a peak family and sexual violence body.[109] The peak body would:

> ... streamline engagement between Government and the community sector, and support the sector in policy development, enabling it to focus on service delivery to the Tasmanian community.[110]

This is a promising move, but we remain concerned about the Government combining family violence with child sexual abuse. Such a peak body risks being dominated by a focus on family violence, given the sheer size of this important social problem.

The Tasmanian Government should establish a more active, supported peak body to improve the sexual assault service system in a more consistent and coordinated way and, in this, consider the existing Providers of Sexual Assault Care. The coordination function of a peak body would be important as the Government expands sexual assault services available to victim-survivors, as described in Recommendation 21.4. A peak body could also develop or adopt existing standards of practice to ensure consistent quality in sexual assault services, as the Victorian Harmful Sexual Behaviour Network has done in Victoria.[111]

Recommendation 21.3

1. The Tasmanian Government should establish a peak body for the sexual assault service system, including therapeutic interventions for children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours, to:
    a. ensure the needs of adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children who have experienced or displayed harmful sexual behaviours are met by the sexual assault service system
    b. represent sexual assault service providers in a coordinated way
    c. share evidence and experience
    d. develop or identify practice standards for sexual assault services and interventions for child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours
    e. coordinate service delivery for victim-survivors
    f. advocate for improvements in the sexual assault service system.
2. This peak body for the sexual assault service system should be distinct from, but work in cooperation with, a family violence peak body.

4.3 Building on sexual assault services

Our resounding impression is that there are not enough local sexual assault services available or accessible to Tasmanian victim-survivors of child sexual abuse or children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours. This shortage applies to timely, local forensic medical examinations, sexual assault counselling services, therapeutic interventions for children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours and counselling services available through the Victims of Crime Service.

Also, victim-survivors in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and more remote parts of the State experience particular difficulty in accessing suitable supports. The Government needs to address this shortfall in specific ways, which we describe in this section.

In Section 4.4, we discuss the problems of accessing services that meet the needs of some victim-survivors including victim-survivors with disability, or those wanting to access an Aboriginal service.

In Section 5, we consider and make recommendations about services for children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours.

4.3.1 Sexual assault services

Sexual assault counselling services

Ms Maxwell told us that victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings can be especially sensitive to a service's response because they have often experienced poor institutional responses.[112] Therefore, she said, quick access to services is important for those people because they can perceive delays as not being heard or supported.[113]

During sessions with a Commissioner and in consultations, we heard concerns about waiting lists for sexual assault counselling, which people attributed to lack of funding.[114] Victim-survivors told us how difficult it was to wait for sexual assault counselling once they had disclosed their abuse.[115]

In May 2022, the Sexual Assault Support Service told us that it had about 90 people on its waiting list and it expected some of those would need to wait six-to-eight weeks before they could start work with a counsellor.[116] At the same time, Laurel House said it had about 40 people on its waiting list and some were waiting up to 33 working days (more than six weeks) to see a counsellor.[117] This is too long to wait for services.

Laurel House and the Sexual Assault Support Service said they develop a plan with each person on the waiting list to ensure they have access to support while they wait to see a counsellor.[118] A child sexual abuse counsellor told us that there should not be a waiting time for a child victim-survivor and their family to access specialist support.[119] Both services said, where possible, they prioritise children on their waiting lists ahead of adults.[120]

It appears that a significant increase in referrals without a corresponding increase in funding has contributed to larger waiting lists.[121] Both services also told us that they can struggle at times to attract and retain qualified and experienced counselling staff, which has further increased waiting times.[122] Kathryn Fordyce, the Laurel House Chief Executive Officer, told us that one factor contributing to difficulties with staff attraction and retention is the short-term nature of government funding; staff can be anxious about continuing in a role if funding is not secure.[123]

In November 2022, the Tasmanian Government announced a 37 per cent increase in core funding to family and sexual violence services and has introduced five-year contracts to assist with funding certainty.[124] However, the Government did not specify how the funding will be allocated to services.[125] Because the funding increase covers family violence services as well as sexual assault services, it is not clear what proportion will be allocated to specialist services for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.

Victims of Crime Service

For a variety of reasons, some victim-survivors may prefer not to engage with the sexual assault service in their area. Having access to other free or low-cost counselling services offers victim-survivors some choice, which is an important characteristic of a trauma-informed sexual assault service system. The Victims of Crime Service provides an alternative counselling service option for those victim-survivors who cannot or prefer not to engage with the Sexual Assault Support Service or Laurel House.

Victim-survivors told us that they thought the Victims of Crime Service was underfunded.[126] However, Catherine Edwards, Manager, Victims Support Services, told us that the average waiting time for a victim-survivor to see a Victims of Crime Service counsellor was one-to-two weeks, which seems reasonable.[127] The service has one full-time counsellor in southern Tasmania, one almost-full-time counsellor in northern Tasmania and a 0.4 full-time-equivalent counsellor in the North West.[128] Ms Edwards also said there was 'an urgent pressing need' to increase the Victims of Crime Service counsellor position in the North West to full-time and, ideally, she would like to see two counsellors in each region.[129] She said the scope of the Victims of Crime Service is confined by its budget, and more resourcing would allow the service to provide more for victim-survivors.[130] We expect that more promotion of the service would increase demand, so it would seem wise to expand the service to at least Ms Edwards' ideal staff complement.

We welcome the Tasmanian Government's commitment to 'Strengthen the Victims of Crime Service' in Action 19 of Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027; however, we note that the plan has no information about what this might involve.[131] We recommend that it increases the number of counsellors available to support victims of crime and promotes the service to victim-survivors (refer to Recommendation 21.5). While some victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings will choose not to seek support from a government service, others will welcome an alternative among the limited range of options.

4.3.2 Geographical isolation

As a very small jurisdiction with a widely distributed population, Tasmania has always posed a significant challenge to the fair and equitable distribution of services. This challenge is amplified when trying to ensure all Tasmanians have access to sexual assault services. Such services might only be required intermittently and are more expensive to provide and access than in larger jurisdictions, which can benefit from the economies of scale associated with larger population centres. While this problem is not unique to Tasmania—victim-survivors in rural and regional areas across Australia are disadvantaged when it comes to accessing sexual assault services—the Government should address the need for these services across the State.[132] The situation appears to be particularly challenging in Tasmania's West Coast and North West. For example, in Queenstown we heard that a lack of transport options and difficulty attracting skilled staff make it difficult for victim-survivors to access sexual assault services.[133] In a general discussion about the challenges of reduced services overall, Aboriginal community members in the North West spoke of difficulties accessing sexual assault counselling for children.[134] In January 2023, the King Island Courier reported an increase in the number of people disclosing sexual abuse on the island and islanders wanted 'to develop structures and systems' to enable victim-survivors to access reporting and forensic services.[135] The article reported that the local council had attempted to fill the service gap but had struggled to find the resources.[136]

The two main Tasmanian sexual assault counselling services offer outreach services to parts of regional Tasmania. Laurel House has offices in Burnie, Devonport and Launceston and provides outreach services to some regional areas in northern Tasmania and the North West, such as George Town, Ulverstone, Beaconsfield and Smithton. However, they have found it harder to offer regular outreach to more remote locations such as Circular Head, the East Coast and the Bass Strait islands.[137]

In the south, the Sexual Assault Support Service has offices in Hobart and Huonville and will travel to locations such as the Southern Midlands to provide counselling when a client cannot travel to an office.[138] The Sexual Assault Support Service will also subsidise clients' travel to an office if cost is a barrier.[139]

Both services can provide online or phone counselling for people in remote areas.[140] However, some clients do not have access to a computer or a private space at home where they can take part in a session, so they may prefer to travel or meet a counsellor somewhere locally.[141] Some community members said phone support services were not personal enough.[142]

Located in Launceston and Hobart, the two pilot Arch centres will leave large areas of the State without ready access to that service. Commissioner Hine noted that many areas of Tasmania will be too small to have an Arch centre but that consideration is being given to how those areas will have 'the same service or a similar service'.[143] This will need to be carefully considered to ensure victim-survivors can access effective support, regardless of their location.

One of the challenges of holding outreach clinics or visiting clients in remote locations is the cost to the service of the counsellor's travel time, which makes it more expensive per client to conduct a remote outreach clinic than to provide in-house counselling services.[144]

However, having access to sexual assault counselling from agencies outside the local community through outreach clinics can be helpful for victim-survivors in small communities. Ms Fordyce said that when specialist services are delivered and located in the local community, service users have encountered difficulties with knowing a service provider in a personal capacity, conflicts of interest and a lack of privacy.[145] Ms Maxwell agreed that being external to a local community is a strength in some cases:

> It means people can address issues arising in the community without having to approach a member of the community, who might be linked to the issue or person involved in some way.[146]

Azra's experience

Azra's experience illustrates some of the difficulties victim-survivors face in seeking help in a small community:

> 'Abe' (a pseudonym) recommended a psychologist who was a friend of his to help me.[147] Initially I spoke to this therapist about Abe using a nickname for him. When I eventually mentioned that I was talking about Abe, the therapy broke down.
> I felt so used and discarded by Abe. I was let down by him and by the therapist he recommended. I had invested over 12 months into the therapy and thanks to Abe it was a waste of my time. I had to start again with a new therapist. Abe made something that was already traumatic worse.[148]

When increasing funding to improve access to sexual assault services, the Tasmanian Government should pay particular attention to improving access for those in regional and remote areas, particularly the far North West, Bass Strait islands and the West Coast. Based on the principle of retaining choice for victim-survivors, this should ideally involve a combination of outreach by sexual assault services to provide in-person counselling, phone and online services; improving transport for victim-survivors to service locations; and increasing the capacity of local mainstream health services to provide trauma-informed care.[149]

4.3.3 Ashley Youth Detention Centre

As discussed in Chapter 10, children at Ashley Youth Detention Centre often enter the Centre having experienced child sexual abuse. They may then experience sexual abuse or experience or display harmful sexual behaviours while at the Centre. As a result, they have a high need for sexual assault counselling services.

The Department of Health provides mental health support to children while they are in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[150] However, the Sexual Assault Support Service thought it was advantageous for an external specialist agency to offer outreach to the Centre because children can receive continuity of care in the community when they are discharged.[151] Tasmania Legal Aid agreed that this model would be better for their clients in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[152] It also affords children some privacy and oversight of care from a provider external to the Centre, which has been lacking.

Laurel House said it has sometimes given therapeutic support to children at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. The Sexual Assault Support Service said it had not previously had referrals and that it found it difficult to deliver interventions for harmful sexual behaviours in that setting.[153] Some people provided examples of a lack of action by staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to facilitate therapeutic supports for children in the Centre.[154]

In contrast with Ashley Youth Detention Centre, the Sexual Assault Support Service said that it had been visiting Risdon Prison since the National Royal Commission to provide sexual assault counselling to inmates. It said that demand has grown to the point where it now has almost three full-time counsellors for that site.[155] It said that over time, the prison has become more open to referring inmates who can now also self-refer to the Sexual Assault Support Service.[156]

Former Secretary of the Department of Communities, Michael Pervan, stated that since our hearings in May 2022, 'the Sexual Assault Support Service is now available to support young people who were victims or witnesses' of harmful sexual behaviours in Ashley Youth Detention Centre, and that a private psychology practice provides three hours per week of psychology services to residents via a digital platform.[157] He told us that a child who has experienced harmful sexual behaviours at Ashley Youth Detention Centre would receive therapeutic support from the private psychology practice, the Centre's nurse and the visiting doctor.[158]

Although it took our Inquiry to trigger them, these changes sound like progress for children in Ashley Youth Detention Centre who need therapeutic support for sexual assault. However, we consider more should be done. The Tasmanian Government should ensure sexual assault services receive enough funding to offer outreach services to children in detention or remand now and into the future. We discuss the need for Ashley Youth Detention Centre to embrace therapeutic supports for young people in Chapter 12.

4.3.4 Peer support

Some Tasmanians access support from peer support organisations such as the Survivors and Mates Support Network and the Care Leavers Australasia Network. The latter supports care leavers and their families via services that include advocacy, counselling and casework; in Tasmania, it also operates peer support groups in Hobart and Launceston.[159] We heard from the Care Leavers Australasia Network that the Tasmanian Government does not fund its services and that it would like to better support victim-survivors.[160] We also heard from a victim-survivor who received support from local peer support organisation Beyond Abuse and found this helpful.[161] We note that the Survivors and Mates Support Network is the only sexual abuse support specifically for male victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmania. Men can face different challenges when disclosing child sexual abuse and engaging with support services than women (discussed in Section 4.4) and would benefit from having the choice to access male-specific services.

The National Royal Commission 'highlighted the importance of peer support in helping victims and survivors to overcome feelings of guilt and betrayal, and reduce isolation through sharing their experiences with one another', particularly for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in residential institutions.[162] It recommended that dedicated community support services for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse be required and enabled to 'support and supervise peer-led support models' as part of their services.[163] It also suggested that services 'should provide practical assistance to peer-led support groups, including by providing professional supervision where required'.[164]

Given the potential of peer support groups to assist recovery and facilitate advocacy for victim-survivors, this area warrants more investigation and investment in Tasmania. Funding for specialist sexual assault services should include assistance for peer support groups.

Recommendation 21.4

1. The Tasmanian Government should increase the funding for free or low-cost sexual assault counselling services to:
    a. reduce waiting times to no longer than four weeks for victim-survivors, regardless of where they live in Tasmania
    b. enable fortnightly access to sexual assault counselling in Ashley Youth Detention Centre
    c. assist peer support groups.

2. The Department of Premier and Cabinet should adopt strategies to increase the number of professionals with skills to provide therapeutic responses to abuse-related trauma to address the challenge in attracting and retaining sufficient suitably qualified staff to fill vacancies and meet the need for therapeutic responses to child sexual abuse.

Recommendation 21.5

The Tasmanian Government should increase the capacity of the Victims of Crime Service by:

a. increasing the number of counsellors available in each of the Victims of Crime Service offices to at least three in southern Tasmania, two in northern Tasmania and two in the North West

b. promoting the availability of the Victims of Crime Service counselling service to victim-survivors of sexual assault.

4.4 Meeting the needs of specific groups of victim-survivors

We know from the National Royal Commission that children who are Aboriginal, have disabilities, are from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds or identify as LGBTQIA+ and who have experienced trauma or neglect are at higher risk of sexual abuse and are more likely to receive an inadequate response to sexual abuse than other children.[165]

The National Royal Commission described an 'acceptable' service system as one that:

> ... considers the diversity of individuals who have been affected by institutional child sexual abuse and is responsive to their lived, social and cultural contexts. Services should be culturally appropriate and aware of needs related to disability, gender and sexuality, particularly in regional areas where choice of services is limited.[166]

In this section, we consider the acceptability of the Tasmanian service system for sexual assault, and areas in which it might be improved for victim-survivors and children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours in the following cohorts:

- children—they require a more family-based and developmentally appropriate approach than adult victim-survivors
- people with disability or a mental health issue
- people who identify as LGBTQIA+
- male victim-survivors

- people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities
- Aboriginal people.

We also consider how the Arch centres can be designed to ensure they are acceptable to a diverse range of victim-survivors.

There is significant scope for the service sector in Tasmania to improve care provided to victim-survivors who have specific needs. For mainstream services, this includes equipping and training the workforce and collaborating with sexual assault services. Also, the National Royal Commission noted that there is 'very little research' on effective treatment for some of these groups and that more is needed to inform practice.[167]

4.4.1 Children as a subspeciality

The Sexual Assault Support Service told us that about one-third of the referrals they receive are for child victim-survivors.[168] As indicated above, the Sexual Assault Support Service and Laurel House prioritise children on their waiting lists.[169]

The National Royal Commission established that, to be effective, sexual assault services for child victim-survivors need to slightly differ from those for adult victim-survivors, namely:

- they should be flexible and appropriate for the child's developmental stage
- practitioners working with children 'need to have specialist expertise and be appropriately qualified'
- therapy needs to involve non-offending carers and family
- it can be helpful to involve the child's school
- traumatised children can benefit from programs in non-clinical settings that help build their sense of confidence more generally.[170]

We heard evidence to suggest that Laurel House and the Sexual Assault Support Service attempt to involve schools and families in a child victim-survivor's treatment and, in the case of harmful sexual behaviours, Mission Australia assists with case management.[171]

Such a systemic approach with a child victim-survivor is more time-intensive than the direct therapy usually provided to an adult victim-survivor. Therefore, services will need more funding to provide a suitable child-appropriate service than for the same number of adult clients.

4.4.2 Victim-survivors with disability

The limited evidence available about the prevalence of the child sexual abuse of children with disability suggests that these children are three times more likely to experience child sexual abuse than other children.[172] The rates are even higher for female children and children with intellectual and behaviour-related disabilities.[173]

A range of factors is thought to account for this increased risk:

- children with disability have more exposure to health, medical and other disability-related services, making them more susceptible to mistreatment from service staff
- children with disability are often socially isolated due to stigma and discrimination
- the increased risk arising from their disability is compounded by other risk factors common to many children with disability, such as gender, age, socioeconomic disadvantage and Aboriginality
- their disability may make it harder for them to communicate and disclose child sexual abuse
- families often depend on services and so are reluctant to complain
- the increased regular personal touch associated with physical therapies and personal care can cause a child to develop a 'broken touch radar' so they do not recognise inappropriate touch or realise that their bodies belong to them and they are entitled to privacy
- adults often expect children with disability to be more compliant than other children
- adults can misinterpret a child's attempts to communicate distress or attempts to disclose as disobedience or part of their disability.[174]

In response to the specific needs of victim-survivors with disability, the National Royal Commission recommended, as Recommendation 9.3, that:

> The Australian Government and state and territory governments should fund support services for people with disability who have experienced sexual abuse in childhood as an ongoing, integral part of advocacy and support and therapeutic treatment service system responses for victims and survivors of child sexual abuse.[175]

The Royal Commission into Violence, Abuse, Neglect and Exploitation of People with Disability may make more recommendations on providing sexual assault services to people with disability. In the interim, the National Royal Commission's Recommendation 9.3 needs to be fully implemented.

The Tasmanian Government reported its progress towards implementing this recommendation in its Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027.[176] This plan commits to a 'new Disability Action Plan' for the State and, more relevantly, to:

> Deliver funding for community-based projects to support inclusion, access and equity to support diverse Tasmanians who experience barriers for accessing support for family and sexual violence … This includes … Tasmanians with a disability …[177]

While we welcome recognition of the needs of people with disability, we found it difficult to understand the nature and extent of the Government's commitment. Moreover, it was the only action in the plan that related to victim-survivors of sexual assault who have disability.

Children with disability are also more likely to engage in or be subjected to harmful sexual behaviours.[178] We heard in the out of home care stakeholder consultation that it is difficult to find therapists in Tasmania who can deliver specialised interventions to these children.[179] This issue is not unique to Tasmania—there is generally a lack of trauma-informed resources and specially trained therapists to deliver such interventions.[180]

The National Royal Commission observed that the disability service system can be siloed from other service systems.[181] Consequently, disability services remain largely non-trauma informed.[182] Conversely, trauma and mental health services struggle to know how to respond to their clients who have disability.[183]

There are some examples of attempts to cross this divide. For example, Laurel House has a Disability Workforce Support Project to raise awareness of, and the responses of carers and professionals to, the sexual assault and abuse of people with disability.[184] It is designed to improve the response of those directly supporting victim-survivors who live with disability. The toolkit and resources webpage provides extensive information about sexual violence and people with disability, including communication guides, trauma-informed approaches, how to respond to a disclosure, referral pathways and links to advocacy services and specialist disability supports for victim-survivors.[185]

In view of the silos that exist, we suspect that a multipronged solution will be required to improve the quality of therapeutic services for children with disability who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours and sexual assault services for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse who have disability. This would likely include measures to increase the inclusiveness of sexual assault services, as well as to make disability services more trauma-informed and knowledgeable about child sexual abuse.

The Tasmanian Government should ensure victim-survivors with disability can access appropriate supports, including children with disability who need help with harmful sexual behaviours. On 13 September 2022, the Tasmanian Minister for Disability Services announced the appointment of 'the State's first Interim Disability Commissioner'.[186] We consider the new Interim Disability Commissioner should be closely consulted in achieving this outcome.

4.4.3 Victim-survivors who identify as LGBTQIA+

The National Royal Commission heard that there are:

> … particular barriers to disclosing child sexual abuse and seeking support faced by victims and survivors who identify as lesbian, gay, bisexual or transgender

> … marginalisation and a lack of understanding in the service system may act as a barrier to effective support.[187]

It also found that victim-survivors who identify as lesbian, gay, bisexual or transgender—due to experiencing significant levels of sexual violence, abuse, discrimination, shame, transphobia, homophobia, keeping a low profile and invisibility—may be less likely to access support services.[188]

We heard during hearings that children and young people who identify as LGBTQIA+ are more vulnerable to being groomed and sexually abused, as well as being less likely to report abuse, partly due to not feeling safe and accepted.[189] Also, in a school setting—where these children are at greater risk of experiencing harmful sexual behaviours—disclosures are often not responded to appropriately, further marginalising victim-survivors and dismissing their experiences.[190]

One transgender victim-survivor told us that the abuse she experienced, as well as the inadequate response she received when she disclosed to the institution and to police, were part of a broader context of her experiences of homophobic and transphobic bullying.[191] We also heard from a non-binary victim-survivor who experienced violence and sexual abuse by several abusers; this was partly linked to the vulnerabilities associated with not conforming to gender norms.[192] Over many years, they also experienced significant difficulties accessing effective services that accounted for gender identity and sexuality.[193]

In the absence of substantial research into effective treatment, at a minimum staff must have an awareness of the challenges faced by victim-survivors who identify as LGBTQIA+ and be adequately trained to meet their needs, either via their own services or effective collaboration. This is an area that warrants more attention from service providers in Tasmania.

4.4.4 Male victim-survivors

We heard from many male victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse in Tasmania, such as Robert, who bravely reached out for help.

Robert's experience

> … here I was, 6 foot 6, walk into [the Sexual Assault Support Service], and I was standing behind a lady with her daughter and they moved on, and the lady behind the counter looked up at me and she said, 'Oh, what do you want?', and, yeah, at that time I broke down because it was … and I said, 'I'm here, I've been sexually abused as a kid', and she went, 'Oh, oh', and ran off and grabbed someone, but it was that kind of reaction of, you know, obviously they don't get men or, you know, coming in all that often, let alone maybe sort of tall people that they would consider to be sort of strong enough to not go and get abused; yeah, everyone's a kid at some stage, yeah.[194]

Although overall, more females than males report child sexual abuse, there is still a substantial number of male victim-survivors who need to access the therapeutic service system.[195] Evidence suggests that historically more males than females experienced child sexual abuse in an institutional setting.[196]

The National Royal Commission observed that male and female victim-survivors of child sexual abuse often have different needs, and so sexual assault services must consider the needs of males who seek their services.[197] This could be particularly important for services set up to respond to gendered violence, where males are not immediately considered to be potential victim-survivors. The National Royal Commission heard that the greater number of female counsellors in sexual assault services can restrict males' access to a male counsellor, which some would prefer.[198]

Therefore, it is important that male victim-survivors are included in the adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group (refer to Recommendation 19.5 in Chapter 19) and that sexual assault services ensure they are set up to meet the needs of men and boys who seek help. Also, the Government must increase the visibility of sexual assault services as catering to male victim-survivors.

4.4.5 Victim-survivors from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds

The National Royal Commission heard that people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds face specific barriers to accessing appropriate services. These include:

- concerns around privacy, confidentiality and conflicts of interest in small communities
- inadequate cultural competence among practitioners, including lack of knowledge of culturally acceptable ways to discuss sex and sexuality
- racism and discrimination from service staff
- mainstream services offering individualised responses where community-based approaches may be more culturally appropriate
- multicultural organisations lacking training in child sexual abuse
- lack of appropriate referral pathways
- scarcity of interpreters able to work appropriately with victim-survivors who are independent of the victim-survivor's community
- failure to provide culturally appropriate information about child sexual abuse and available services in different languages.[199]

We received limited information about victim-survivors from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds overall. In Hobart and Launceston, we contacted agencies that support culturally and linguistically diverse communities.[200] We invited them to speak with us but, unfortunately, none provided information or attended stakeholder consultations.

However, given the findings of the National Royal Commission and our awareness of the needs of culturally and linguistically diverse people in Tasmania, we consider there is room for improvement in creating specialist sexual assault services for victim-survivors that can accommodate people from a variety of backgrounds in a culturally appropriate way, including greater collaboration. The National Royal Commission found that collaboration 'is particularly important for meeting the needs of victims and survivors from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds'; this can mean integrating specialist culturally and linguistically diverse services into mainstream services or coordinating victim-survivors' care in different parts of the service system.[201]

4.4.6 Diversity and inclusion at Arch centres

All victim-survivors should have choices and be able to access the specialist knowledge that Arch centres are designed to provide. Therefore, it is essential that Arch centres respect diversity and inclusion.[202] Laurel House Chief Executive Officer, Kathryn Fordyce, said that centres 'should be welcoming and engaging for children and adults regardless of gender, sexuality, disability, cultural background and experience'.[203] Tasmania Police Commissioner Hine indicated that:

> ... there will be services engaged to provide specialised advice and support who are not co-located but are within close proximity to the facility. These will include services specific to the individual needs of people with a disability, culturally diverse and indigenous cultural requirements.[204]

Given the centrality of collaboration to successful therapeutic care, it will be important for Arch centres to carefully consider how services directed at particular groups will work alongside those at the centres. It is not enough to engage specialist services; mainstream services must 'have the skills and capability to respond effectively to diverse needs or collaborate with other agencies to meet those needs'.[205]

Recommendation 21.6

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure that the needs of particular groups of victim-survivors are met by the therapeutic service system and related contracting of services, including the needs of:
   a. children who are victim-survivors or have displayed harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 21.8)
   b. victim-survivors with disability or mental illness

c. victim-survivors who identify as LGBTQIA+

d. male victim-survivors

e. victim-survivors who are from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.

2. The Tasmanian Government should consult on the therapeutic service system with relevant stakeholder groups, including the Interim Disability Commissioner, community groups and representative bodies.

4.4.7 Aboriginal healing centres

The National Royal Commission recommended that federal, state and territory governments fund Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander healing approaches as part of therapeutic services for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.[206] Despite this, in Tasmania there are no specific Aboriginal healing services for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. The Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre provides some therapeutic services via programs such as its health services, family services and children's services.[207] While victim-survivors are generally supported to access mainstream sexual assault counselling services, the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre also employs some practitioners 'with specialist experience in sexual assault treatment'.[208] Other Tasmanian Aboriginal organisations also support community members in various ways, including with healing from child sexual abuse, but do not have targeted programs.[209]

Heather Sculthorpe, Chief Executive Officer, Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre, told us that some of the barriers to providing Aboriginal healing services include inconsistent government funding as well as 'narrowly targeted funding' that does not 'recognise the importance of ongoing relationships in the Aboriginal community'.[210]

Adding to this, our research found no evidence to suggest that existing sexual assault services have sought to specifically develop culturally appropriate approaches. This may create a barrier for Aboriginal people to access sexual assault services because they appear intrinsically 'white', and limit the effectiveness of counselling provided to those Aboriginal victim-survivors who do engage. Participants in one consultation told us that the 'white' way of counselling not only differs from but it also 'undermines the First Nations approach'.[211] One Aboriginal victim-survivor told us that support services consistently failed to take into account cultural identity, which compounded their trauma.[212] We also heard that existing services do not necessarily have capacity: 'when abuse happens, you need timely support—there is a waitlist for everything'.[213]

When we conducted consultations with Aboriginal communities, we frequently heard about the lack of culturally appropriate therapeutic services in Tasmania. We heard about the following service needs:

- Aboriginal-led therapeutic services across the State that encompass an understanding of intergenerational trauma and are genuinely designed and led by Aboriginal people:

  > It has to be authentic co-design, not Aboriginal people being asked afterwards … You need to listen to our ideas because our communities worked for thousands of years. The government is always trying to come up with these innovative things, but the knowledge is already sitting there in Aboriginal communities … Let us mend and fix our community.[214]

- Aboriginal-run cultural healing centres on Country across the State where children and families can visit or stay to receive support (this is also discussed in Chapter 9): 'We need our kids to have a space where they can be with community members and still looked after'.[215]

- Training and development opportunities to support Aboriginal people to gain therapeutic skills to benefit their communities:

  > We need training for our mob.[216]

  > Our kids want to talk to someone from their community, work with someone from their community.[217]

- Consistent funding for therapeutic programs, including those that are already working well. Organisations 'have to have reliable funding, otherwise you are playing with people's lives'.[218]

Given the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care and in youth detention, and that harmful sexual behaviours often occur in those settings, these therapeutic programs also need to be equipped to address harmful sexual behaviours.

We heard that part of embedding culture is having programs that are Aboriginal-led and -controlled. Ms Sculthorpe stated that successful programs require 'Aboriginal decision-making in the context of Aboriginal community control'.[219] This approach is supported by the Healing Foundation, which, in response to the National Royal Commission, found that:

> … a culturally based approach to understanding trauma and to resourcing healing and recovery is required by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people who have been, or may in the future be, sexually abused in public and private institutions, and that healing is most effective when designed, developed and delivered by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people with and for their own communities.[220]

In Chapter 9 on out of home care, we recommend establishing recognised Aboriginal organisations (Recommendation 9.15). We also recommend implementing all elements of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle (Recommendation 9.15).[221] This recommendation includes investing in Aboriginal-led targeted early intervention and prevention services, transferring decision-making authority to Aboriginal organisations and establishing therapeutic residential programs for Aboriginal children. There is also a need for Aboriginal-led healing programs to be established more widely.

We are pleased that the Tasmanian Government has recognised this service gap and has committed in Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 to Aboriginal-led 'deep collaboration' with Aboriginal organisations to 'agree actions and strategies to prevent and respond to family and sexual violence in the Aboriginal community'.[222]

Models for Aboriginal services can be found nationally and may be useful to inform programs in Tasmania. For example, alongside community members, the Healing Foundation has developed resources, such as a guide to establishing 'healing centres' and a training program for communities working with victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.[223] The central tenets of these resources—such as strengthening connections to community and culture and emphasising design and implementation by and for Aboriginal people—are reflected in the ideas shared with us by local Aboriginal communities.[224]

It became apparent during our community consultations that the healing of Aboriginal victim-survivors is inextricably linked to colonisation and intergenerational trauma, as well as to cultural and family needs: 'when something happens to someone in our mob, it affects all of us'.[225] While this broader landscape extends beyond our terms of reference, we consider that to be effective and culturally appropriate, Aboriginal healing services developed for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse must be broad in scope and enabled to take a holistic approach.

Similarly, we heard from Aboriginal communities about how taxing it can be to be frequently 'consulted' by government, especially when consultation does not result in desired changes. One participant spoke about contributing to numerous consultation processes but never seeing change: 'look where we are. I'm tired. I'm so tired'.[226] In consultation processes, Aboriginal communities nationwide are generally 'asked to do a lot of work, a lot of which is unpaid or un-resourced'.[227] Consequently, developing existing and new healing services must be carefully planned, well-funded and Aboriginal-led to avoid unfairly adding to this burden.

In addition to Aboriginal-led healing approaches, existing sexual assault services should improve their cultural appropriateness for Aboriginal victim-survivors. For a variety of reasons, some Aboriginal people will prefer to seek support from non-Aboriginal-led services, so sexual assault services need to become more comfortable and effective for Aboriginal victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse. One important way of achieving this is to ensure these agencies have representation from Aboriginal communities on their boards of management or in their executive structures. In that way, sexual assault services would have an internal source of assistance to improve the cultural appropriateness of their services.

Recommendation 21.7

The Tasmanian Government should improve healing services for Aboriginal victim-survivors and their families and communities by:

a. fully resourcing and supporting recognised Aboriginal organisations across the state to design, develop and deliver Aboriginal-led healing approaches targeted to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse

b. ensuring Aboriginal representation on the boards of management or in the executive structures of sexual assault services.

5 Strengthening services for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours

Terminology and definition

We have adopted the National Office of Child Safety National Clinical Reference Group's draft definition of harmful sexual behaviours, which was proposed in December 2022, for general use across Australian jurisdictions:

> Harmful sexual behaviours are sexual behaviours displayed by children and young people that fall outside what may be considered developmentally, socially, and culturally expected, may cause harm to themselves or others, and occur either face to face and/or via technology. When these behaviours involve another child or young person, they may include a lack of consent, reciprocity, mutuality, and involve the use of coercion, force, or a misuse of power.[228]

We note that the National Office for Child Safety is continuing to work with the National Harmful Sexual Behaviours Clinical Reference Group, states and territories to finalise a nationally endorsed definition of harmful sexual behaviours. This definition, when finalised, should inform the definition in the whole of government harmful sexual behaviours framework (Recommendation 21.8) and related Tasmanian Government documents, policies and practice guidance.

For the following reasons provided by harmful sexual behaviours researcher Dr Gemma McKibbin, we have also taken care with the use of the terms 'victim', 'victim-survivor' and 'perpetrator' in this section, in keeping with the general view of the sector that children who engage in harmful sexual behaviours need help and assistance:

> The binary between victim and perpetrator in instances of harmful sexual behaviour is not always clear. For example, in situations of sibling sexual abuse that is, where two or more siblings engage in sexual behaviour with one another, the initiator of the behaviour can change, and one sibling can be the perpetrator in one instance and the victim in another. It is important to use person-centred language; this means that we talk about the problem behaviour and not the problem child. It is important that we do not use stigmatising language as this actually inhibits children from recovering from being sexually abusive. I always use the language 'child or young person displaying harmful sexual behaviour'.
> Perpetrator is not the right term to use in the context of children and young people who sexually harm because it is stigmatising and obfuscates the harm that children have often experienced themselves. I do tend to use the term 'victim-survivor' for children or young people who have been sexually harmed by other children or young people. However, in some cases of sibling sexual abuse, the victim may also be a child who sexually harms. Further, a child who sexually harms is likely to be a victim of abuse in their own right. In this way the victim/perpetrator binary does not hold in cases of harmful sexual behaviour and more sophisticated thinking is needed in this space that accounts for the complexity of victimisation experiences.[229]

For the purposes of highlighting the specific therapeutic needs of children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours, we have distinguished between children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours and those who have been subject to them. As mentioned, we have considered those children who have been subject to another's harmful sexual behaviours as 'victim-survivors' in terms of their therapeutic needs—that is, they will likely require sexual assault counselling in the same way as other victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. But the distinction is somewhat artificial because many children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours are themselves victim-survivors of sexual abuse. Such children will need a therapeutic approach that addresses both their harmful sexual behaviours and their sexual abuse experiences. Therefore, it is common in other jurisdictions, as in Tasmania, for the harmful sexual behaviours service system to exist within the broader child sexual abuse therapeutic service system.

The National Royal Commission recognised that harmful sexual behaviours can have similar negative effects on a child as sexual abuse by an adult.[230] Recognising the significance of the issue, the National Royal Commission dedicated an entire volume to the issue of harmful sexual behaviours.[231] It made seven recommendations about harmful sexual behaviours in general, which required the Australian and state/territory governments to fund primary and secondary prevention strategies or services, and tertiary therapeutic services. In relation to harmful sexual behaviours, in summary, the National Royal Commission recommended that:

- support services be accessible for all children and young people, regardless of age, incarceration, voluntary status, disability, cultural background, gender, sexual orientation, geographic location, setting or the nature of the sexual behaviour
- support be increased for generalist counselling services to improve their responsiveness to harmful sexual behaviours
- therapeutic services be safe, developmentally appropriate, trauma-informed, culturally informed, have clear referral pathways and provide a systemic intervention, with good staff training and supervision
- therapeutic services be evaluated to ensure effectiveness.[232]

We heard of significant problems with how institutions responded to harmful sexual behaviours in schools, out of home care and Ashley Youth Detention Centre (refer to Chapters 5, 6, 8, 9, 11 and 12). These institutions appear to be the most at risk of harmful sexual behaviours occurring.[233]

A mother's experience—the importance of timely intervention

A mother told us that her two primary-aged children were sexually abused by an older boy from school. They told her that he was coercive and violent. She described her children's traumatised responses of incontinence, emotional outbursts, self-harm and drawing sexual pictures.

Both children have disability, and the mother expressed fear for their mental health because they have told her they should kill themselves. She has experienced difficulty accessing timely and affordable services for them.

The older boy who displayed harmful sexual behaviours also has disability and has experienced violence in his home. The mother said she felt sorry for the boy, but she described the frustration of knowing that other parents had raised concerns about the older boy displaying harmful sexual behaviours before her, but the school took a long time to act, even after her complaint.

The mother said the school, because of privacy reasons, would not tell her if the boy was getting therapeutic help. She felt powerless to protect her children, so she changed schools, but she is worried for other students.[234]

5.1 Understanding harmful sexual behaviours

Understanding harmful sexual behaviours and how to address these behaviours effectively is a rapidly developing field. Most frameworks consider the behaviours as occurring along a continuum of increasing deviation from what is considered normal for a child's developmental age in terms of severity, duration and impact.[235] They also consider that children engage in harmful sexual behaviours for a combination of reasons; these reasons are often called 'pathways' to harmful sexual behaviours.[236]

Due to this variation in severity and motivation, not all children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours will benefit from the same form of therapeutic intervention, and responses to harmful sexual behaviours need to be 'both proportionate and appropriate'.[237] For example, for less severe incidents that are motivated by misguided curiosity about sex, setting boundaries and educating about consent and appropriate behaviours are likely to be sufficient interventions to prevent a child engaging in those behaviours again.[238] However, the more severe and persistent the behaviour, the more likely a child will need a more intensive specialised therapeutic response. Often criminal justice and child protection responses are also involved, depending on the circumstances of the behaviour.[239] If the behaviour has occurred in youth detention or in an out of home care or school environment, those settings also will need to be involved in the response.

While research has shown that most adult sex offenders started their offending as teenagers, experts in harmful sexual behaviour interventions generally agree that therapeutic intervention for most children who engage in harmful sexual behaviours is effective in stopping the behaviours.[240]

Therefore, early intervention to address harmful sexual behaviours is paramount to prevent recurrence and minimise harm.[241] Therapeutic intervention for harmful sexual behaviours requires specialist skills and training in addition to that required for counselling for child sexual abuse.[242]

In terms of the intensive specialised response required for children who have displayed behaviours further along the spectrum, recent literature reviews indicate that evidence for using any of the main approaches across a variety of settings is still being established.[243] The experts we heard from suggested that several approaches could be effective when responding to harmful sexual behaviours.[244] Rather than recommending a particular model, Dale Tolliday, a harmful sexual behaviours clinician, recommends that the Tasmanian Government adopts 'best practice principles for therapeutic intervention for children with harmful sexual behaviours, which are relevant to children of all ages', as identified by the National Royal Commission.[245] Mr Tolliday and researcher, Dr Gemma McKibbin, recommended that therapeutic interventions should have certain key characteristics, which we have consolidated and summarised. Interventions should:

- be accessible to all children with harmful sexual behaviours and delivered early
- be based on an individual assessment of each child, with tailored therapy that takes a contextual and systemic approach, recognising other problems in the child's life
- be safe, including through being non-punitive, trauma-informed and culturally safe
- assign accountability and responsibility for the harmful sexual behaviours
- focus on behavioural change and work towards broader outcomes than simply reducing harmful sexual behaviours
- use developmentally and cognitively appropriate interventions based on techniques that are specialised for treating harmful sexual behaviours
- be delivered by staff who have specialist training and supervision
- actively involve the parent or caregiver to support treatment.[246]

Mr Tolliday recommended that in developing its approach the Government considers these characteristics, as well as ensuring the model is suited to the way services are organised.[247]

In keeping with the National Royal Commission's findings, Mr Tolliday said specialist harmful sexual behaviours treatment should sit within a broader public health approach to improve knowledge about harmful sexual behaviours and how to respond to them:

> In particular, building service system capacity should include key general and focused prevention actions (primary and secondary prevention), building generalist service capacity to respond (such as schools, GPs, childcare services, child and youth counselling) as well as specialist services. Building only a specialist service limits [the] response to a limited number of children and families and the scale and scope of [problematic and harmful sexual behaviours] demands a larger and more comprehensive strategy.[248]

We agree.

5.2 The Tasmanian Government's response

The Department of Communities stated that the Government had responded to the National Royal Commission's recommendations by:

- contributing to and signing on to the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030 (released on 27 October 2021)

- funding the Sexual Assault Support Service for two years from 1 April 2021 to provide a statewide therapeutic program for children with harmful sexual behaviours (called Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment, discussed in Section 5.2.1), which the then Department of Communities said fulfils the principles in the National Royal Commission's Recommendation 10.5
- funding the Sexual Assault Support Service for two years from 1 April 2021 to provide primary and secondary prevention programs for children engaging in problematic sexual behaviours (under the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program)
- funding an independent evaluation of the Sexual Assault Support Service's Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program for harmful sexual behaviours
- the Department of Justice representing Tasmania on the Inter-jurisdictional Working Group on Therapeutic Responses for Children with Problematic and Harmful Sexual Behaviours.[249]

Apart from contributing to the two national initiatives, the Tasmanian Government's primary response to the National Royal Commission's recommendations about harmful sexual behaviours is to fund a non-government organisation (the Sexual Assault Support Service) to deliver the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program.

While recognising the outstanding efforts of the Sexual Assault Support Service in identifying a service gap and attempting to fill it, we are concerned that this approach is not enough, which we discuss in Section 5.4.

5.2.1 Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program

Before April 2021, as part of their normal service delivery, Laurel House and the Sexual Assault Support Service provided interventions for children up to age 11 or 12 who had displayed harmful sexual behaviours.[250]

In April 2021, the Sexual Assault Support Service received government funding to provide a free, statewide specialist harmful sexual behaviours prevention and therapeutic intervention program for children up to 17 years of age—the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program.[251] Laurel House also said it will still see children under 12 who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours in northern Tasmania and the North West, but it is not specifically funded for that work.[252] Victim-survivors of harmful sexual behaviours can access supports through the Sexual Assault Support Service's and Laurel House's usual sexual assault counselling services.

The prevention and early intervention element of the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program involves the Sexual Assault Support Service presenting training sessions for school staff, Child Safety Service staff and other community members about how to prevent harmful sexual behaviours and respond to them appropriately if they occur.[253] The service also presents sessions in primary and high schools about consent and respectful relationships that complement the sessions with school staff.[254]

We consider that the funding for this aspect of the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program is insufficient. The program is funded to provide the full set of harmful sexual behaviours awareness and response sessions to only four schools per year, although the Department for Education, Children and Young People funds another four.[255] Other schools can purchase the training from the Sexual Assault Support Service.[256] We calculate that, without schools purchasing the training themselves, it would take the Sexual Assault Support Service about 24 years to present government funded harmful sexual behaviours sessions to all 195 government schools in Tasmania.[257] In Chapter 6, we recommend mandatory child sexual abuse prevention education in all schools.

The therapeutic element of the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program is funded for one specialist harmful sexual behaviours counsellor to work three days a week in each region: southern Tasmania, northern Tasmania and the North West.[258] Mission Australia delivers case management for families alongside the Sexual Assault Support Service's therapeutic intervention to assist with other issues that are assessed as contributing to the behaviours—for example, assisting to gain access to National Disability Insurance Scheme supports for a child with disability whose needs are not being appropriately addressed.[259]

Initially the program was funded for two years as a pilot, but Action 28 of Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 states that the Government will 'continue to deliver' the program.[260] Although Action 28 lacks detail, we hope this means the program will be funded on an ongoing basis.[261]

In the year following the start of the program in April 2021, the Sexual Assault Support Service said it received 90 referrals for children who had displayed harmful sexual behaviours.[262] Many of the referrals were from schools, parents and the Child Safety Service.[263] As of 31 March 2022, the program had 29 active clients engaged with a therapist and an average waiting list of 10 children, who can wait from four-to-10 weeks for therapy.[264]

Despite the recent introduction of this therapeutic service for harmful sexual behaviours, we heard in submissions and at consultations that some people are still concerned about a lack of available therapeutic services in Tasmania for children exhibiting harmful sexual behaviours.[265] Renae Pepper from the Sexual Assault Support Service told us that they have not actively promoted the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program due to limited funding and said there have been plenty of referrals since starting the program; promotion would only exacerbate waiting lists.[266]

We consider that although funding the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program is a welcome start, the Government needs to increase the capacity of the therapeutic component of the service system's response to harmful sexual behaviours. In addition, for all the reasons outlined above in relation to appropriate sexual assault services, these therapeutic services need to be designed to meet the needs of particular groups of children, including those with disability, who identify as LGBTQIA+, who are from a culturally or linguistically diverse background, or who are Aboriginal. It should be accessible to children statewide.

5.2.2 Government agency responses

School-based responses

The Department for Education, Children and Young People has initiated its own response to the issue of harmful sexual behaviours among students in Tasmanian schools, including a flowchart to guide principals' responses, a working group focused on the issue and appointing extra senior support staff.[267] Timothy Bullard, Secretary of the Department, told us that the Department had received extra funding in the 2021–22 State Budget to equip staff to identify and respond to harmful sexual behaviours in schools.[268]

The Department's approach appears to be based on the same model of understanding harmful sexual behaviours as the Sexual Assault Support Service has used for the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program: Hackett's continuum of harmful sexual behaviours.[269] We anticipate that by using the same model and linking its response to the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program, the Department can develop a common understanding of harmful sexual behaviours and the roles of schools and Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment therapists when coordinating a response.[270]

Unfortunately, the Department's response for schools is not replicated elsewhere in Tasmanian Government institutions, because other areas that are often involved with children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours have not taken similar steps to improve their understanding of, or response to, harmful sexual behaviours.

Child protection responses

Many professionals and government employees are mandatory reporters and will advise the Advice and Referral Line of concerns about a child who has displayed harmful sexual behaviours. Concerned parties will also contact the Advice and Referral Line for advice and referral for a child's sexualised behaviours.

The National Royal Commission considered that a child protection response to harmful sexual behaviours (in Tasmania this would involve the Advice and Referral Line referring the matter to the Child Safety Service) is generally only appropriate where other children are at risk and there is no parent who can act protectively.[271]

However, the need for protection is not always immediately clear. While the child's behaviour may imply a risk to other children, research indicates that children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours may themselves be at risk of harm and in need of care and protection.[272] Consequently, staff taking calls at the Advice and Referral Line need to have a nuanced understanding of, and ability to enquire into, the circumstances of an incident of harmful sexual behaviours.

Despite this, we heard evidence that suggested Advice and Referral Line staff were not always knowledgeable enough about responding to harmful sexual behaviours, particularly in institutional settings.

In Chapter 8 on out of home care, we report the results of our analysis of the files of 22 children in out of home care and note that Child Safety Officers did appear to refer children for specialist harmful sexual behaviour interventions. However, at our consultation with out of home care providers, they suggested that this is not consistently the case.[273] They also considered that the Child Safety Service relied too heavily on Tasmania Police to respond to instances of harmful sexual behaviours.[274] Given that out of home care is a high-risk institutional environment for children experiencing harmful sexual behaviours, we identify in Chapter 9 that the Child Safety Service and out of home care providers, carers and volunteers should be supported to build their knowledge and skills concerning harmful sexual behaviours.[275]

As established in Chapter 9, the Advice and Referral Line and the Child Safety Service receive little mandatory specialised training in child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours, nor do they have a clear policy to guide staff when assessing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours.[276] The only real direction provided to the Advice and Referral Line staff by the Child Safety Service is the Assessing and Responding to Sexual Abuse Procedure.[277] The procedure instructs Advice and Referral Line staff to record a contact about a child's harmful sexual behaviours in the Child Advice and Referral Digital Interface and—if the child is 10 years of age or older—to record it as an 'incident' in the Child Protection Information System.[278] In some circumstances, the procedure suggests the Advice and Referral Line may refer a concern about a child who has engaged in harmful sexual behaviours to the Child Safety Service for assessment and/or to police, although the procedure is not clear about when this might occur.[279]

We are not confident that Advice and Referral Line staff have been supported with the skills and knowledge to ensure children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours or who are victim-survivors of harmful sexual behaviours are protected, as well as referred for appropriate therapeutic supports. The Government should address this gap in developing a whole of government framework to address harmful sexual behaviours and in drafting detailed and specific out of home care policies, protocols and practice guidance to support best responses to harmful sexual behaviours displayed or experienced in out of home care (Recommendation 9.28). There should also be mandatory induction and ongoing professional development about child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours, as well as policy guidance and access to the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit for assistance (refer to Recommendation 9.28).

Criminal justice responses

A criminal justice response will be relevant only for a minority of harmful sexual behaviours that meet the criteria for a potential criminal offence. These cases require that the child displaying the behaviours is old enough to be considered to have criminal responsibility for their actions under the law and for the behaviour itself to amount to the physical element of a criminal offence.[280] However, Tasmania Police will often need to be involved in a case of harmful sexual behaviours to determine if the behaviour meets the threshold for charges to be laid, and if there is enough evidence for a charge.

Police may receive a report about a child who has engaged in harmful sexual behaviours from the Advice and Referral Line, the Child Safety Service, a school or from a parent.[281] Our analysis of the 22 files of children in out of home care, set out in Chapter 8, confirmed that Tasmania Police and the Child Safety Service regularly refer incidents of harmful sexual behaviours to each other.

However, the Sexual Assault Support Service expressed concern about the coordination of referrals from Tasmania Police for therapeutic support services for victim-survivors of harmful sexual behaviours.[282] It said the service receives very few referrals for harmful sexual behaviours from police and that those they do receive may be inaccurate—for example, when a child is referred for harmful sexual behaviours, but upon inquiry the case is clearly one of child sexual exploitation.[283]

When deciding on a response, Tasmania Police indicated a preference for diversion in instances of harmful sexual behaviours.[284] We agree. But we acknowledge that there will be some children detained in youth justice due to engaging in sexual violence. In Chapter 16, we discuss the usefulness of a therapeutic component forming part of youth justice options for children who have been charged with or convicted of a sexual offence, using the court's diversionary powers.

The Keeping Children Safe Handbook outlines how Tasmania Police and the Child Safety Service will interact in response to child protection concerns.[285] Unfortunately, the handbook offers minimal direction to either agency in how to respond to harmful sexual behaviours, outside of referring one to the other in circumstances 'where a child is an alleged offender'.[286]

The use of terms such as 'alleged offender' or 'alleged perpetrator' are commonplace law enforcement terms. However, as discussed in 'Terminology and definition' above, such language stigmatises children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours and can interfere with providing a trauma-informed response and therapeutic intervention.

To improve the effective response by Tasmania Police and the Child Safety Service to harmful sexual behaviours, the Keeping Children Safe Handbook should be updated to include clear directions that are trauma-informed and use language that reflects modern understandings of harmful sexual behaviours. Having shared definitions and understandings of harmful sexual behaviours will also help achieve a consistent response to this behaviour across government agencies.

5.3 Involuntary treatment

Jenny Wing, Chair of the peak body Victorian Harmful Sexual Behaviour Network, told us that most children who receive therapeutic interventions in the Victorian Sexually Abusive Behaviour Treatment Services do so voluntarily.[287] However, occasionally a family and/or their child will not consent to treatment, thus placing other children and the child themselves at more risk because the concerning behaviour goes unaddressed.[288]

If the Child Safety Service decides that a child does not need care and protection and the matter is not pursued by police, it can be difficult to impose interventions without parental agreement.[289] The National Royal Commission identified that 'in most states and territories, there is no express legal basis upon which child protection agencies can respond'.[290] The exception would be if it can be proven that the child is at risk of abuse or harm as required by the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997.[291]

Dale Tolliday, the harmful sexual behaviours treatment expert previously mentioned, told us that compulsory treatment for harmful sexual behaviours can be necessary, but should be a last resort:

> [Treatment] should be therapeutic rather than punitive. More coercive strategies may be required for more serious and/or repeat cases, or where engagement strategies fail, but effectively dealing with these behaviours early on is the best form of prevention.[292]

Where the child is not facing criminal charges for the harmful sexual behaviours, there is a need for a mechanism that would allow children with harmful sexual behaviours to be treated when parents or carers are unwilling to engage voluntarily.

The most logical way would be to amend the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 to provide an explicit legislative power to allow the Magistrates Court (Children's Division) to order a child to receive therapeutic intervention for harmful sexual behaviours. This has been done successfully in Victoria with the introduction of therapeutic treatment orders and would empower the Child Safety Service to protect the child and other children in the complex context of harmful sexual behaviours.[293]

In Victoria, if a child appears before the Criminal Division of the Children's Court on a criminal charge and the court considers there are grounds to apply for a therapeutic treatment order in respect of the child, the Court can refer the matter to the Secretary of the Victorian Department of Families, Fairness and Housing for investigation.[294] In deciding whether to refer a matter to the Secretary, the Court must consider the seriousness of the child's sexually abusive behaviours, among other matters.[295]

If, on the application of the Secretary, the Family Division of the Children's Court makes a therapeutic treatment order in respect of the child, the Criminal Division must adjourn the criminal proceedings to enable the child to complete the therapeutic treatment order.[296] Once the child has completed the order, and the Criminal Division is satisfied that the child has attended and taken part in the therapeutic treatment program, the Court must discharge the child without any further hearing of the criminal proceedings.[297] We recommend that Tasmania adopts a similar mechanism (refer to Chapter 16).

The introduction of therapeutic treatment orders in Victoria has delivered secondary, and possibly more important, consequences for children with harmful sexual behaviours. Ms Wing observed better collaboration between statutory child protection, police, children's courts and the sexual abuse behaviour treatment services, as well as increased confidence in the effectiveness of harmful sexual behaviour interventions.[298]

5.4 A broader whole of government response

We are concerned that the Government's principal response to the issue of harmful sexual behaviours in Tasmania has been to fund a non-government organisation to provide a limited range of prevention and intervention services that does not meet demand. Apart from the Department for Education, Children and Young People's decision to improve its response to harmful sexual behaviours to align with the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program, the Government does not have a consistent response across agencies. This is far from sufficient to address the National Royal Commission's recommendations or, more importantly, to meet the needs of children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours.

Other jurisdictions are working to standardise responses to harmful sexual behaviours, such as New South Wales' Children First 2022–2031 shared whole of government framework for preventing and responding to problematic and harmful sexual behaviours by children and young people, which provides a sector-wide, multiagency public health approach.[299]

Other examples include Western Australia's Understanding and Guiding Responses to Harmful Sexual Behaviours in Children and Young People and South Australia's work towards an 'interagency response framework', which is underway with the University of South Australia (projects in which Commissioner Bromfield is involved).[300]

The Victorian Government has also developed a framework to respond to harmful sexual behaviours that includes prevention, early intervention and therapeutic intervention.[301] The Victorian Government has funded sexual abuse behaviour treatment services across the State since the early 2000s, which it 'attached' to its existing network of government funded non-government organisations that deliver specialist sexual trauma services across Victoria.[302] Ms Wing told us that the Victorian model of assigning harmful sexual behaviours services to geographical regions creates a more cooperative and better quality service system because it avoids the 'hostile environment' that can develop between agencies when funding is competitive.[303]

Ms Wing identified several advantages to harmful sexual behaviour interventions being delivered as part of the sexual assault service system, including harnessing existing expertise in child sexual abuse and the ability to adapt to local contexts.[304]

In addition to increasing the availability and accessibility of therapeutic services for children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours, the Tasmanian Government must also lead a whole of government response to harmful sexual behaviours. Undertaking this task will assist government agencies that have the greatest involvement with children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours to be equipped to prevent and respond to the issue. The response must be coordinated across departments, which requires a common understanding of the issue and an agreed approach between departments and the therapeutic service system for harmful sexual behaviours.

The Tasmanian Government should develop a statewide framework for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. The framework should provide a common understanding of harmful sexual behaviours, high-level guidance on how to respond, and clear roles and responsibilities of different government provided and funded agencies in the response. The definition adopted in the framework should be informed by the work of the National Office for Child Safety in developing a revised national definition for harmful sexual behaviours.

In developing the framework, the Tasmanian Government should carefully consider when and for what purpose incidents of harmful sexual behaviours in government institutions should be reported to Tasmania Police and the Advice and Referral Line. This should consider the role of these agencies in responding to harmful sexual behaviours, different responses for children under and over the age of criminal responsibility, and the intention for harmful sexual behaviours to be responded to with diversionary and therapeutic responses in the first instance.

The Government should develop the framework in consultation with stakeholders and include the role of government funded services that form part of the State's harmful sexual behaviour response, such as the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program.

Services for children displaying harmful sexual behaviours should be considered in the Arch centres. We heard that such services are often co-located in multidisciplinary centres in Victoria, which facilitates collaboration and provides an advantage when dealing with in-family harmful sexual behaviours, because both the child who has experienced harmful sexual behaviours and the child who has displayed harmful sexual behaviours are seen in one location.[305] This means families do not need to 'tell their story multiple times' and staff develop 'a more sophisticated understanding of the dynamics of sexual violence'.[306] This practice would be possible at Arch centres.

The framework should be translated into action through detailed context-specific policies, protocols and guidance, including those we have recommended for education, out of home care and youth justice (refer to Recommendations 6.9, 9.28 and 12.30). We have identified several existing statewide frameworks developed for other jurisdictions above. While we do not recommend a particular framework, we note that the authors of these approaches appear to be open to making their work available and have made materials publicly available.[307] The Department would likely find it cost-effective to adapt material from existing approaches to the Tasmanian context.

Recommendation 21.8

1. The Tasmanian Government, in collaboration with key stakeholders, should develop a statewide framework and plan for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. The framework should:
    a. agree on a common definition and understanding of harmful sexual behaviours, including adopting a recognised, contemporary continuum of sexual behaviours from 'developmentally expected' to 'harmful'
    b. use an evidence-informed framework for understanding, preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours
    c. clarify the roles and responsibilities of the various agencies and departments involved in preventing and responding to the full continuum of harmful sexual behaviours, including programs delivered by non-government providers
    d. meet the needs of particular groups of children (Recommendation 21.6)

e. include structures to support ongoing engagement with emerging evidence regarding harmful sexual behaviours

f. include an evaluation framework.

2. The Tasmanian Government should ensure the therapeutic service system for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours:

   a. provides sufficient therapeutic services that can be accessed in a timely manner

   b. ensures timely access to therapeutic services for all children who need them, regardless of their age, identity or location in the state (including in youth detention)

   c. ensures specialist interventions for children with disability

   d. ensures all providers of therapeutic interventions for harmful sexual behaviours have Aboriginal representation in their governance structure.

3. The Tasmanian Government should provide ongoing and increased funding for specialist therapeutic interventions for harmful sexual behaviours that:

   a. ensures children who have displayed abusive or violent harmful sexual behaviours and their families need not wait more than two weeks for support when therapeutic treatment is required

   b. provides an advisory service for child-facing organisations, such as independent schools, childcare, disability and at-risk youth services and Tasmania Police (this service is not intended for the Department for Education, Children and Young People, which will have access to an internal Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28))

   c. contributes to the statewide plan for preventing harmful sexual behaviours and its agencies' responses to children who have displayed such behaviours.

Recommendation 21.9

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 and the Youth Justice Act 1997 to:

a. give the Magistrates Court explicit power to order that a child who has displayed harmful sexual behaviours (and their family) engage in a therapeutic intervention for harmful sexual behaviours

b. ensure the Magistrates Court has the power to divert from the criminal justice system a child who has been charged with a criminal offence and who has engaged in harmful sexual behaviours, by adjourning the criminal proceeding to enable the child to engage in a therapeutic intervention, and discharging the child where the intervention has been completed successfully.

Recommendation 21.10

Tasmania Police and the Department for Education, Children and Young People should update the Keeping Children Safe Handbook to reflect the Tasmanian Government's statewide framework and plan for addressing harmful sexual behaviours, including by:

a. modifying the language used when discussing children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours to align with the definitions developed through the National Office of Child Safety

b. clarifying the roles and responsibilities of the two agencies in responding to incidents involving harmful sexual behaviours, including the conditions under which each agency will lead the response

c. clarifying the involvement of specialist therapeutic services in responses to incidents.

6 Conclusion

Our Inquiry into Tasmania's therapeutic service system for victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse and children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours has revealed scope for improvement.

Specialist services for victim-survivors are few and staffed by hard-working, dedicated professionals who have advocated for increased services and better coordination for many years. Even after the National Royal Commission made many recommendations to create a responsive service system for victim-survivors, the Tasmanian Government has continued to adopt a passive position of responding with piecemeal funding offerings instead of assuming leadership for providing a robust service system.

It is vital that the Tasmanian Government leads the development and funding of a responsive service system. The Government must ensure services reach those who are missing out, such as children in Ashley Youth Detention Centre, victim-survivors with disability, victim-survivors who identify as LGBTQIA+, victim-survivors from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, male victim-survivors and those in isolated communities or Aboriginal victim-survivors.

For children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours, the Tasmanian Government has only recently responded to the National Royal Commission's recommendations by funding a single service to provide services across the State. This is not enough, and it lacks the government leadership required to provide a collaborative, effective therapeutic service system for children who have these difficulties. The Tasmanian Government should develop a cross-agency framework to prevent and respond to harmful sexual behaviours.

22 Monitoring reforms

1 Introduction

Our Commission of Inquiry shares the hopes we heard in evidence from victim-survivors, and their families, carers and supporters, that our Inquiry will result in meaningful change that benefits Tasmania and its children and young people. The Tasmanian Government has said it will implement our recommendations, and we expect this to occur. It would be a tragedy if our report were treated as the product of 'just another inquiry', to file and forget. The cost to taxpayers, the trust of the community and the toll on victim-survivors and whistleblowers that comes from telling their stories require a forceful and immediate response.

This chapter discusses ways to ensure our recommendations lead to positive change. We hope to see sustainable systemic improvements that will help prevent child sexual abuse in institutions and improve institutional responses to such abuse. We want better outcomes for children and young people who have been abused.

This chapter lists our recommendations and includes suggested timeframes for implementing them. It focuses on the monitoring and reporting needed to effectively implement these recommendations. We recommend the Tasmanian Government establishes the role of the Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor to oversee and report on the Government's progress in implementing our recommendations and the recommendations of previous inquiries and reviews.

2 Our recommendations

Our Commission of Inquiry had three main functions.

The first was to provide a safe place where victim-survivors and their families and carers could share their accounts of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions. These accounts informed our understanding of measures to prevent, identify and respond to child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions.

The second was to investigate the adequacy or otherwise of past and present responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions, and to identify systemic issues. Institutions investigated include schools, out of home care, health services and Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

The third was to recommend concrete and practical reforms to address any inadequacies identified, so children can be better protected against child sexual abuse in Tasmanian government institutions.

Our terms of reference directed us to make any recommendations arising from our Commission of Inquiry we consider appropriate. These include recommendations about any policy, legislative, administrative or structural reforms, and to focus our recommendations on systemic issues.

Our report represents the end of our Commission of Inquiry. We make 191 recommendations. During more than two years of operation, we examined more than 95,000 documents, held more than 120 sessions with a Commissioner, conducted hearings over nine weeks and engaged widely with the Tasmanian community. This enabled us to understand the systemic failings in the Tasmanian Government's response to child sexual abuse in institutional settings and to identify opportunities for lasting reform. Our recommendations represent an extensive reform agenda for Tasmania—the way to achieve a future where children and young people feel safe in government institutions, as they and their families have a right to expect.

Some of our recommendations focus on creating new structures to support a government-wide system where children are kept safe from child sexual abuse and where the Tasmanian Government is held to account for its responses to abuse. Other recommendations concentrate on ensuring the right care and support are available and accessible to children and young people and their families and carers, and to adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. Others focus on improving processes and procedures regarding child sexual abuse. However, at the core of all our recommendations is the view that the Tasmanian Government and State Service must be accountable for the safety and wellbeing of children and young people in government institutions.

We have articulated a six-year reform agenda that prioritises our recommendations into three waves of reform:

- short-term—by 1 July 2024
- medium-term—by 1 July 2026
- long-term—by 1 July 2029.

We consider this approach balances the need for urgent reforms but also acknowledges that implementing other reforms should and will take careful planning and require long-term investment and support. Our recommendations are listed at the end of this chapter, along with our suggested reform timeframes and role holders or agencies responsible, as a guide for the Tasmanian Government (refer to Table 21.1).

With this report representing the end of our Commission of Inquiry, it is now time for the Tasmanian Government to do the work necessary to implement our recommendations. We acknowledge this will take considerable effort and commitment. In the next section, we recommend establishing the Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor to hold the Tasmanian Government to this task.

3 Monitoring and reporting

The impact of our Commission of Inquiry will depend primarily on the Tasmanian Government implementing the recommendations in our report. Monitoring and publicly reporting on implementation is vital for:

- making real progress in preventing child sexual abuse in government and government funded institutions by learning from experience
- improving institutional responses to child sexual abuse
- improving outcomes for children and young people who have been abused.

This section discusses how implementing our recommendations, and those of other inquiries and reviews, should be monitored and reported against so the public can hold the Tasmanian Government and its institutions to account.

We are mindful the Tasmanian Government has held multiple inquiries and reviews on matters relevant to institutional child sexual abuse. It also has a history of:

- accepting and then not implementing recommendations
- not implementing recommendations in line with the intent of the inquiries or reviews
- failing to implement recommendations in a timely way.

For example, in Volumes 4, 5 and 6 of our report, we discuss how problems identified in previous reviews and inquiries into out of home care, the health system and Ashley Youth Detention Centre have not been addressed over many years. We are also conscious that key recommendations of the National Royal Commission have not been implemented, and it has been more than five years since those recommendations were made. Although the Tasmanian Government has made progress on reforms by introducing the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Bill 2022, which was passed by the Tasmanian Parliament and commenced as the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 in July 2023, the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme are still in the implementation stages.[1]

Ongoing monitoring is essential if our recommendations for reform are to be successfully implemented. Monitoring plays an important role in:

- maintaining momentum for reform
- embedding accountability for change
- ensuring progress is transparent
- mitigating and avoiding unintended consequences of reforms
- continuously improving and adapting reform efforts.

Jenny Gale, Secretary, Department of Premier and Cabinet and Head of the State Service, noted the need for independent oversight to ensure change occurs: 'I do think independent oversight is a very important factor in accountability and also in raising public awareness about what is happening and what needs to be improved'.[2]

Ginna Webster, Secretary, Department of Justice, who is responsible for the Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit, acknowledged the role public monitoring and reporting can play in building trust in government action:

> I think one of the barriers that I touched on at the beginning was the need to rebuild the trust and the confidence of the community, so I think that work will have to be done as well as we progress, and I think that's through regular reporting and monitoring.[3]

In this section, we discuss our recommended Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor, which would be the key mechanism to hold the Tasmanian Government to account for implementing our recommendations. We also discuss our expectation that the Government reports on its implementation of our and other inquiries' recommendations. Such reports should examine the implementation of particular recommendations, the broader outcomes of new policies, procedures and laws and the interaction between them.

3.1 An implementation monitor

In the final two days of hearings, we invited experts to advise us about the way forward, including how to ensure the Tasmanian Government effectively implements our recommendations for reform. Dr Samantha Crompvoets, Director of the Australian Human Rights Commission, told us it is important to monitor the implementation of recommendations to ensure they result in change:

> I think that it's important for people who are giving recommendations to build in a monitoring and evaluation part of it … Otherwise, what happens is in, say, two to three years after those recommendations come out and issues start to bubble up again and there's another review, and more recommendations, and no one really understands what happened to the initial ones.[4]

Tim Cartwright APM and Jan Shuard PSM shared their observations and experiences as former Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitors in Victoria, a role responsible for monitoring the implementation of the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence recommendations. Mr Cartwright was the inaugural Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor from August 2016 until August 2019 and Ms Shuard held the role from August 2019 until May 2023. The Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor concluded its monitoring work on 31 May 2023.[5]

The Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor was an independent statutory body. It was established in 2016 in response to the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence recommendation that an independent family violence agency be established to hold the Victorian Government to account.[6] As Mr Cartwright outlined in his statement to our Commission of Inquiry:

> Recommendation 199 concerned the establishment of an independent function to (among other things) monitor and report on implementation of the Commission's recommendations. That function was created through the establishment of the Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor (Implementation Monitor) under the Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor Act 2016 (Vic).[7]

Mr Cartwright and Ms Shuard observed that a key aspect of the Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor's role is to look at how recommendations have been implemented relative to the intended outcomes of the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence.[8] We note that a flexible approach is sometimes needed when assessing whether a recommendation has been effectively implemented. Mr Cartwright said that he sometimes needed to 'go behind' the intent of the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence recommendations to work out a better process: 'So that critical question I always asked was what would make this better for victim-survivors … is this working to produce the outcomes that the Royal Commission in that case wanted?'[9]

Importantly, Mr Cartwright and Ms Shuard highlighted to us how the Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor role allowed them to continue advocating for change on behalf of victim-survivors, beyond the life of the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence. Mr Cartwright said:

> The other important part of the role which surprised me a little was eventually becoming, in some ways, not an advocate for victim-survivors, but certainly the middle person between those implementing and those who were affected or advocating for change.[10]

Mr Cartwright's and Ms Shuard's evidence showed that the role of the Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor was effective in holding the Victorian Government to account and ensuring transparency in government actions.[11] We are of the view that Tasmania needs to establish a similar role to ensure the reform work our Commission of Inquiry and previous inquiries and reviews have begun continues.

We recommend below that a Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor be established. The Implementation Monitor should:

- be independent
- report publicly, through Parliament
- consult and work closely across the child sexual abuse sector, including with government, peak bodies and victim-survivors.

3.1.1 Independence

Mr Cartwright told us that the independence of Victoria's Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor was essential to the role's success: 'It is critical that the legislation establishing the role of Implementation Monitor gives the Implementation Monitor independence, and the ability to report free from interference'.[12]

When asked to expand on this at our hearings, Mr Cartwright said:

> The legislation removes any doubt that the voice of a critical Monitor or a critical person will be made public regardless of whether the bureaucracy or the government of the day agrees or disagrees with it, so that was very important to me … I still think that some protection of the Monitor's independence and right to speak publicly is very important as a foundational aspect.[13]

The Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor is a statutory role that reports directly to Parliament.[14] Mr Cartwright explained in his statement that the Implementation Monitor's independence was achieved by:

- the statutory nature of the role and the requirement to report directly to Parliament
- the establishing legislation, which gives the Implementation Monitor independence and the ability to report free from interference from the minister or others

- security of tenure of the role, with appointment by the Governor in Council and limited grounds on which the Implementation Monitor may be suspended or removed.[15]

Ms Shuard agreed about the importance of the Implementation Monitor's independence, while maintaining productive relationships.[16] She said that in order for independence to be maintained it is essential the Implementation Monitor's monitoring and reporting functions be separate from implementation functions: 'I think, if you're in charge of implementation, you can't possibly monitor, or if you're in charge of the framework for implementation and all the elements of it you can't possibly be an independent Monitor'.[17]

3.1.2 Public reporting

Ms Shuard explained the public reporting requirements of the Victorian Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor role in her statement:

> For the first four years after the Royal Commission [into Family Violence], the legislation required the Implementation Monitor to deliver an annual report to Parliament. The first three reports (tabled in Parliament in May 2018, March 2019 and February 2020) specifically looked at achievements from the previous year but the fourth report, being the last planned report (tabled in May 2021), looked back across all four years. I envisaged that, after delivery of the fourth annual report, the function would cease, as that was all the government had required. However, the Victorian Government has extended the reporting obligation for a further 18 months, although the requirement to table the report in Parliament has been removed and the resources of the office of the Implementation Monitor have been slightly reduced.[18]

We consider this public reporting requirement is essential to the effectiveness of the recommended Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor's role in holding the Tasmanian Government to account.

3.1.3 Consulting and working across government

We consider that the Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor should consult broadly when determining whether the Tasmanian Government has effectively implemented our recommendations and those of other inquiries and reviews. In the family violence context in Victoria, Ms Shuard said it was important for the Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor to establish strong relationships across the family violence sector and be transparent with all parties. Ms Shuard said:

> I think for me one of the absolute critical roles of the Implementation Monitor is the relationships that you can build with the government agencies, the service providers and the victim-survivors.... The Monitor is a small office relatively to the task, and you couldn't do your work justice without the absolute cooperation, transparency of the agencies that you're working with.[19]

The role of the Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor was to listen to and reflect all voices in the family violence sector when assessing the effectiveness of the implementation of recommendations, including government agencies, service providers and victim-survivors. Ms Shuard said:

> … I guess it was really important to me … to hear the voices of everybody involved. You know, I say you have the designers and the funders of the system, you have the service providers who deliver the services, and you have the victim-survivors who are most important in terms of experiencing the changes in the system but, more than that, influencing the design of the system so that it meets their needs and I think that's absolutely critical.
> I think a view that our job was … to add value to the outcomes for the family violence systems, so therefore to provide an independent view by listening to all of the voices that were involved in the system, and sometimes there's a difference, I guess, of view about how it's going, what's working, whether it's being effective in its implementation, and to be able to represent all of those voices so that the designers of the system and the users of the system and those delivering the services get a shared understanding of our independent view.[20]

Ms Shuard explained how she worked with the Victorian Government in practice:

> … when you form your independent view and you do a report, the process of providing that report to the government agencies that are affected, allowing those government agencies to have input into that report insofar as, not just factual errors, but if they think you've been unduly harsh perhaps or haven't captured a point correctly, then it should be—it's open for them to provide that advice back to the Implementation Monitor.[21]

Mr Cartwright and Ms Shuard emphasised the importance of a formal mechanism to ensure victim-survivors' views on the impacts of reform were heard and acted upon during implementation.[22] In Victoria, this was achieved through the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee, which was set up after the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence to advise the Government on family violence policy and service provision.[23]

In Chapter 19, we recommend the Tasmanian Government ensures children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse can contribute to policy and reform work through the Premier's Youth Advisory Group and through the establishment of an adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group (refer to Recommendation 19.5). We also recommend a peak body for the sexual assault service system in Chapter 21 (refer to recommendation 21.3).
The Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor should consult regularly with these entities about the effectiveness of the implementation of our recommendations and the recommendations of other reviews and inquiries.

3.2 Future reporting

The National Royal Commission recommended that each state and territory government reports on its implementation of the National Royal Commission's recommendations through five consecutive annual reports tabled in their respective parliaments.

Adhering to this recommendation, the Tasmanian Government issued its fifth and final annual report and action plan in December 2022.[24] The report indicated that, while the Government was committed to ongoing annual reporting on implementing reforms for the safety and wellbeing of children, it was considering changing the form of this reporting.[25] The report stated that, given the 'several inquiries and commissions' that have examined child sexual abuse in the Tasmanian institutional context in recent years, it proposed annual reporting shifts from a focus on completing the recommendations to outcomes-based reporting.[26]

While we support a focus on intended outcomes rather than superficial acquittal of recommendations, we are concerned this may result in reducing accountability for implementing individual recommendations, particularly considering evidence we heard from Mr Cartwright and Ms Shuard about the importance of accountability, transparency and reporting at all levels. Any focus on outcomes needs to identify how the intent behind the implementation of individual recommendations has been met.

We consider that implementing recommendations from our Commission of Inquiry and those of other reviews and inquiries across the child sexual abuse sector would benefit from being monitored and reported against by an implementation monitor model similar to the Family Violence Reform Implementation Monitor that was established in Victoria.

Recommendation 22.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to establish and fund an independent Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor to:
    a. monitor and report to Parliament annually on the implementation of
        i. the recommendations of this Commission of Inquiry
        ii. any recommendations of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse that were accepted by the Tasmanian Government and have not been implemented
        iii. the recommendations of the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse
    b. undertake independent evaluations of the effectiveness of the measures and actions taken in response to the recommendations identified above, especially the impact on the safety and wellbeing of children in government and government funded institutions and victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts.

2. Independent evaluations should enable assessment of change over time and involve:
    a. identifying an evaluation framework and baseline data requirements within the first year of the appointment of the Implementation Monitor
    b. commencing collection of data identified in the evaluation framework as soon as possible after the evaluation framework has been developed
    c. assessing the change against the evaluation framework at five- and ten-year intervals following the tabling of this report
    d. making independent evaluations publicly available.
3. The Tasmanian Government should protect the independence of the Implementation Monitor by:
    a. appointing the Implementation Monitor for a fixed term that cannot be prematurely terminated except in extraordinary circumstances
    b. maintaining the role of the Implementation Monitor until implementation of the recommendations identified above is substantively complete
    c. separately and directly funding the Implementation Monitor, rather than through a line agency.
4. The Tasmanian Government, through the Secretaries Board, should be required to report to:
    a. the Implementation Monitor as requested and in the form required by the Implementation Monitor
    b. the public on its implementation and reform activity through the Department of Premier and Cabinet's annual report.
5. The Implementation Monitor should consult as required with:
    a. the Premier's Youth Advisory Council
    b. the adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group (Recommendation 19.5)
    c. the peak body for the sexual assault service system (Recommendation 21.3)
    d. the institution-specific advisory groups established within Tasmanian government agencies (Recommendations 9.6, 12.8 and 15.7).

4 Hope for the future

Despite reforms having been made in response to the National Royal Commission, there is much more work to do. These reforms will not be easy. As noted in Chapter 19, the Tasmanian Government has committed to an extensive reform agenda regarding institutional child sexual abuse. The multiple systems involved in responding to institutional child sexual abuse are complex and so, too, are the causes of institutional child sexual abuse. Strong and committed leadership is required across government and institutions for change to occur. We saw this commitment during our Commission of Inquiry—the Premier, along with all major parties, made a public apology in Parliament. The Premier said:

> We have failed you; we are all accountable, and we are sorry.
>
> Our institutions have a responsibility to ensure the safety and wellbeing of children, and our institutions have clearly failed in that responsibility … [27]

In the same apology, the Premier committed to implementing our reforms:

> Over the past eight months—throughout this Inquiry—we have heard about a very dark chapter in Tasmania's history.
>
> It's a chapter no-one should ever, ever forget. And today we give a solemn undertaking to all Tasmanians, to never, ever allow a repeat of this abuse, secrecy and suppression.
>
> To never, ever allow a repeat of the failures that allowed such abuse to occur.
>
> Our Government is acutely aware of the enormous responsibility to act swiftly and decisively to implement the Commission's recommendations …
>
> This Parliament will be defined by the actions we take now to ensure that the injustices perpetrated by Tasmanian Government institutions can never ever happen again …
> We know there is still much more work to do, and we are committed to making the changes required to ensure Tasmania is a safer place for all children and young people.[28]

We are pleased the Premier has committed to implementing our recommendations and emphasise that the work is in ensuring that appropriate structures are set up to enable our recommendations and those of other inquiries and reviews to be not only accepted but effectively implemented.

Secretary Gale also committed to achieving change:

> It was difficult to listen to but very important and I sincerely thank all of the brave people who have spoken out as part of the Commission's proceedings, including our state servants, as hearing their stories, their sadness, their frustration, their anger and their feelings of powerlessness has highlighted that there are significant improvements that must be made across the service.

> The traumas that systemic failures has caused children, young people and their families has been palpable, and I commit to doing whatever I can to effect change.[29]

Although our Commission of Inquiry has focused on child sexual abuse in institutions, we also see the potential for our recommendations to have benefits beyond the scope of our Inquiry. These benefits include:

- enhancing responses to all victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse
- improving the safety of institutions in relation to all forms of harm that may be experienced by vulnerable people and the responses of institutions when this harm occurs
- providing increased transparency and accountability to change the culture of silence and fear that was so dominant in people who spoke to us.

Throughout our report we have raised the challenges facing a small island state in preventing and responding to institutional child sexual abuse. But these challenges can also be strengths. Having strong, local connections can enable change to be achieved quickly. As Sam Leishman, a victim-survivor, told us (and as we have quoted before):

> … we talk about Tasmania as being a small jurisdiction and a small island, and it's isolating and … we don't have the resources and how difficult all of that is …. I sometimes think, well, why do we look at it like that, why can't we look at Tasmania as being a small, isolated state and that's actually our advantage? We are small, we can set the standards and we can be the one that says, this is the benchmark that everyone else has to meet, and we can do that because we're small and because we're isolated. There's no reason why we can't do things better here than the rest of the country.[30]

We agree. There is much cause for hope that effective and lasting reform can and will be achieved.

23 Afterword

1 Introduction

This Commission of Inquiry was established to provide the Tasmanian Government with an opportunity to understand how to respond more effectively to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts.

In this chapter, we consider how the work of our Commission of Inquiry was shaped by the legislative context within which it operated. This legislative context is relevant to the outcomes of our Inquiry (namely this report and its findings and recommendations) and how we went about our work. We consider we should reflect on how to conduct such inquiries more effectively.

As with all human endeavours, there are aspects to the conduct of our Commission of Inquiry that we could no doubt have done better. Ultimately, this is for the judgment of others.

The Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 ('Commissions of Inquiry Act') governed the way our Inquiry was established and conducted, although other legislation was also relevant. Given the experience of conducting our Inquiry, we consider it is appropriate and useful to reflect on the ways in which the Commissions of Inquiry Act (and other legislation) could be improved for the benefit of future inquiries and the entire Tasmanian community.

2 Background

Our Commission of Inquiry is the first since the Commission of Inquiry into the Death of Joseph Gilewicz ('Gilewicz Commission of Inquiry') reported in 2000.[1] During its inquiry, the Gilewicz Commission of Inquiry identified difficulties with the Commissions of Inquiry Act.[2] As a result, the Commissions of Inquiry Amendment Act 2000 was introduced. The Gilewicz Commission of Inquiry went on to note other practical problems with the amended Commissions of Inquiry Act in its final report.[3]

In March 2002, the then Attorney-General requested the Tasmania Law Reform Institute ('Law Reform Institute') examine and report on the operation of the Commissions of Inquiry Act, including considering the experience of the Gilewicz Commission of Inquiry. In August 2003, the Law Reform Institute published its final report, recommending further amendments to the Commissions of Inquiry Act.[4]

In 2013, the Commissions of Inquiry Act was again amended to facilitate the work of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse.[5]

In anticipation of establishing our Commission of Inquiry, the Tasmanian Government had preliminary conversations with the Honourable Marcia Neave AO about the Commissions of Inquiry Act. A range of possible amendments to the Act—including because of the Gilewicz Commission of Inquiry's report, the Law Reform Institute's report and the experience of inquiries in other jurisdictions—were discussed ahead of our Inquiry. Ultimately, it was a matter for the Tasmanian Government and Parliament to decide the amendments that should be made to the Commissions of Inquiry Act.

On 1 March 2021, the Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act 2021 came into force ('Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act'). This Act amended the Commissions of Inquiry Act, including in response to the Law Reform Institute's report and in anticipation of establishing our Commission of Inquiry.[6] Among other changes, the amended Commissions of Inquiry Act enabled regulations to be made that disapplied other Acts (or certain provisions of those Acts) to any information collected or used by or on behalf of a commission of inquiry.[7]

On 15 March 2021, the Governor of Tasmania established the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, appointing us as Commissioners and enabling our Inquiry to begin.[8]

In early May 2021, our Commission of Inquiry proactively engaged with the Tasmanian Government regarding provisions we recommended should be disapplied (that is, those that would not operate) to enable our Inquiry to do its work and to make it easier for people, including State Service employees, to share information with us.

On 14 July 2021, the Commissions of Inquiry Regulations 2021, which disapplied certain Acts in relation to our Commission of Inquiry, commenced.

The amended Commissions of Inquiry Act and the regulations made up the legal framework within which our Inquiry operated.

The Law Reform Institute's report commented that the fact the Gilewicz Commission of Inquiry identified aspects of the Commissions of Inquiry Act as being problematic was 'a familiar chain of events'.[9] Other royal commissions and inquiries have routinely identified in their reports challenges with the legislation under which they operated and opportunities for reform, with the goal of improving the conduct of future inquiries.[10] Indeed, given the limited time available to royal commissions and inquiries to undertake their work and, therefore, the need for them to focus on the subject matter of their inquiry, it is impractical for them to pursue legislative reforms during their term. In this context, we consider it is appropriate for us, at the end of our Inquiry, to also reflect on opportunities for reform.

3 A commission's conduct of its own inquiry

A commission of inquiry should be empowered to decide how it conducts its inquiry subject to the legislation and orders under which it is established, other relevant legislation and common law rules such as procedural fairness. In recognising the need for the Commissions of Inquiry Act to offer greater flexibility, the Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act introduced provisions that gave a commission of inquiry the power to conduct its inquiry and obtain information in 'any manner that it considers appropriate' and to 'determine its own procedure in conducting its inquiry'.[11]

Importantly, the July 2021 regulations also provided that certain confidentiality provisions and other restrictions on sharing information in other Acts did not apply to information collected or used by or on behalf of our Commission of Inquiry.[12] As indicated, this removed barriers to State Service employees sharing information with us.

We recognise there is a delicate balance to be achieved between the important purposes of other Acts and whether such Acts should be disapplied in relation to a commission of inquiry to improve the conduct of its inquiry. This is a decision for the Tasmanian Government rather than any individual commission of inquiry, although the views of a commission of inquiry should be sought and carefully considered. The new regulations materially assisted our Inquiry, but we reflect below in Section 3.2 on the challenges presented by one particular provision that was not disapplied.

3.1 Adverse findings and misconduct findings

In Chapter 1, Section 2.3.4, we discuss the requirements imposed by the Commissions of Inquiry Act for a commission of inquiry to make findings of misconduct (section 18) and adverse findings (section 19), despite a commission of inquiry also being required by the Commissions of Inquiry Act and the common law to comply with the rules of procedural fairness. In a practical sense, these specific requirements make it more difficult to make such findings, where these requirements may be unnecessary, and indeed counterproductive, to appropriately protecting the rights and interests of those who might be affected by such findings. We do not repeat that discussion here.

In summary, we consider a commission of inquiry should be able to make any findings it wishes, subject to complying with the rules of procedural fairness. We do not consider that the legislation needs to set out any specific procedural requirements. It is not clear to us why the Commissions of Inquiry Act needs to have a specific regime for findings of misconduct, particularly when the equivalent legislation in other Australian jurisdictions does not have any such regime. This approach is inconsistent with contemporary inquiry practices. Ultimately, we are concerned that the Commissions of Inquiry Act creates legal complexities that prevent inquiries from being as effective and efficient as they might otherwise be.

We consider it appropriate and necessary for the Commissions of Inquiry Act to expressly provide that the rules of procedural fairness apply to a commission of inquiry.[13] However, one of the practical challenges of the specific procedural requirements for findings of misconduct in the Commissions of Inquiry Act is that it limited the ability of our Inquiry to determine how we conducted ourselves, as explained further below.

Under the current Act, a commission of inquiry must give a person notice of any allegation of misconduct (section 18(1)) and allow that person an opportunity to respond (section 18(3)). We consider giving a person notice about potential findings concerning them and an opportunity to respond is appropriate, but note that this would be required by the rules of procedural fairness anyway. The practical challenge is that the rights in relation to responding under section 18(3) could allow that person to effectively control the commission of inquiry's processes. Under section 18(3), the person may choose to make oral or written submissions, give evidence to a commission of inquiry, cross-examine the person who made the allegation or call witnesses. As a result, a person may compel a commission of inquiry to:

- conduct more hearings, even where the commission of inquiry's planned hearings have concluded
- call or re-call witnesses for cross-examination, even in circumstances where there may be other important reasons why this is not appropriate (for example, this could be retraumatising for some witnesses and the nature of the cross-examination may be inconsistent with trauma-informed practice).

The scheduling of hearings is complicated, requiring a wide variety of factors to be considered—among them, the availability of a venue, Commissioners, witnesses, parties, lawyers for all relevant parties, technical operators and other relevant supports (such as counselling). Hearings are resource-intensive, expensive and time-consuming. Therefore, it is better that commissions of inquiry control the calling of any hearings. Also, given that most inquiries continue to discover information throughout their term that may be relevant to findings they wish to make, the risk is that inquiries would need to hold repeated section 18 hearings to make findings that might constitute findings of misconduct, or otherwise artificially and prematurely conclude their information-gathering phases to allow enough time if any hearings related to section 18 may be required. It is also possible information that emerges from one section 18 hearing gives rise to new potential findings of misconduct that might require more section 18 hearings, meaning there is the potential for endless hearings unless the inquiry determines not to pursue findings based on information that is already before it. In addition, under the current Commissions of Inquiry Act, there is the risk that an individual might seek to 'run the clock' and delay providing information until after the commission's planned hearings conclude, and to then require a further hearing if the commission were to propose making a misconduct finding based on the information they subsequently provide.

While a commission of inquiry should certainly be required to consider a response from a person in relation to potential adverse content or findings about them, this could be achieved through written submissions and written evidence without requiring the substantial expense, delay and potential trauma of further public hearings. A person affected by a potential finding will usually only be motivated to consider their own position and possibly the position of any employer or organisation they represent. In contrast, a commission of inquiry must consider a raft of factors, including how to advance its inquiry for the benefit of the public, how to appropriately manage the public cost of its inquiry, how to sequence its work to meet its reporting deadline, how to weigh the information and position of each party and, of course, how to comply with the rules of procedural fairness. It is for these reasons that it is appropriate for a commission of inquiry to be able to control its own proceedings.

In this context, we consider section 18 does not achieve an appropriate balance between facilitating a commission of inquiry controlling its own proceedings (while complying with the rules of procedural fairness) and protecting the rights of a person subject to an allegation or potential finding of misconduct. We consider that further amendments to section 18, or the definition of 'misconduct', will not redress this imbalance. The Tasmanian Government should consider simply repealing section 18 and that definition.

Similarly, a commission of inquiry must give a person a notice of any adverse finding and allow the person at least 10 business days to respond (section 19).[14] While less prescriptive and, therefore, less problematic than the specific procedural requirements for findings of misconduct, we do not consider it is necessary for this procedure to be specified in the legislation. Our Commission of Inquiry complied with these requirements in relation to all people subject to an adverse finding. Indeed, we provided the State with the opportunity to comment on content even where it was not an adverse finding. We also routinely provided the State and other people and entities with much more than 10 business days in which to respond, recognising that a longer period was sometimes fair and reasonable in the circumstances. Therefore, these are matters that a commission of inquiry should determine as part of its compliance with the rules of procedural fairness.

As stated above, we consider it appropriate and necessary for the Commissions of Inquiry Act to expressly provide that the rules of procedural fairness apply to a commission of inquiry.[15] We do not, however, consider the relevant legislation should set out any specific procedural requirements for making findings or complying with such rules of procedural fairness. We consider section 18, in particular, imposes requirements that are unnecessary, counterproductive, onerous and not in the public interest.

3.2 Legislative restrictions on certain information

Given the subject matter of our Commission of Inquiry, there was a range of other legislation that applied to the sensitive information (including about child sexual abuse) that we considered. Some of this legislation appropriately imposes restrictions on dealing with such information in the interests of achieving important purposes, while other provisions limited our Inquiry's effectiveness.

The National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth) ('National Redress Scheme Act') limits the use and disclosure of protected information in relation to the National Redress Scheme but allows it to be used and disclosed in certain circumstances.[16] As the National Redress Scheme Act is a Commonwealth Act, the Commissions of Inquiry Act and any regulations under it cannot override or disapply the National Redress Scheme Act. Our Commission of Inquiry complied with these limitations and relevant exceptions to them where appropriate.

The Evidence Act 2001 also imposes relevant restrictions. Originally, section 194K created an offence for a person, in relation to any proceeding in any court, to publish identifying information about a person in respect of whom specific crimes involving a sexual offence were alleged to be committed (that is, a victim-survivor) and any witness or intended witness in those proceedings, without a court order. In 2020, a new section 194K was introduced making it an offence for a person, in relation to any proceeding in any court, to publish identifying information in respect of certain specified crimes involving a sexual offence.[17] The offence applies regardless of whether the criminal proceedings have been finally determined.[18] It is a defence to this offence if the information is about a person against whom the crime is alleged to have been committed (that is, a victim-survivor) and that person consents to the disclosure (and the information does not identify any other victim-survivor unless that person has also consented). The change flowed from a campaign led by victim-survivors who wanted to speak about their own experiences of child sexual abuse. The legislation still does not, however, allow any witness or intended witness in those proceedings (other than the defendant) to be identified without a court order (that is, even if the victim-survivor and the witness both consent to being identified).

In conducting our Commission of Inquiry, our approach was to appropriately empower and protect victim-survivors; this included respecting their preferences for how their information would be shared and used. As part of our engagement with victim-survivors, if we proposed to identify them in our hearings or our report, and section 194K might apply, we asked for their consent.

Similar provisions to section 194K apply in other Australian jurisdictions and aim to achieve the important purpose of providing victim-survivors with the ability to share their experiences and control whether they are identified. As our Commission of Inquiry worked through applying section 194K, we identified a range of challenges. These included limitations on our ability to conduct hearings and include content in this report in circumstances where such limitations were not necessary to achieve the purpose of the provision (including empowering victim-survivors with the choice to be identified and how they can share their experiences).

First, a range of terms used in section 194K are not defined and are, therefore, uncertain. Section 194K does not spell out what constitutes 'proceedings in any court' and continues to apply regardless of whether the proceedings have been discontinued, finally determined or otherwise disposed of. Section 194K applies to any witness or intended witness in the proceedings. These terms are also not defined. It is not always readily apparent who is, or was, a witness or intended witness in any proceeding, and there can be practical difficulties in identifying all people for whom section 194K might apply. For example, James Griffin was charged with sexual offences against young people, but following his death by suicide, these proceedings were never finally determined. Relevantly, however, section 194K continues to apply in relation to those proceedings and anyone who was an intended witness in them.

Second, there is no way for a witness or intended witness to be identified (without a court order), even in circumstances where the relevant victim-survivor has consented to being identified in line with section 194K and might wish for the relevant witness to also be identified. This could lead to the strange outcome that a victim-survivor could be identified but an immediate family member who gave (or might have given) evidence in the proceedings (and who might also wish to be identified) or a professional witness, such as a police officer, could not be identified. It would also seem possible to identify professional witnesses without necessarily identifying a victim-survivor or other witnesses, so would not be inconsistent with the purpose of the provision, but this would also not be permitted without a court order.

Third, section 194K specifies that only a victim-survivor aged 18 years or older can provide consent. Unlike other Australian jurisdictions, there is no way younger victim-survivors with appropriate capacity can give consent.[19]

Finally, although an application can be made to the Supreme Court for an order to allow identifying information to be published, this process risks being expensive, time-consuming and potentially traumatic for multiple parties. In circumstances where the relevant inquiry is directly engaging with the victim-survivor and any relevant witnesses, and the purposes of the provision are being facilitated, it appears to us that it would be better to avoid applying for such an order.

Two solutions to these practical challenges could be considered. First, section 194K could be redrafted to address the issues we have identified above, taking into account the more precise drafting in other Australian jurisdictions. Second, section 194K should be disapplied by regulations relating to any relevant commission of inquiry.

Our Commission of Inquiry complied with section 194K. We adopted a cautious approach and did not identify anyone if there was a risk that section 194K might apply and it was not possible to seek their consent to identification under section 194K.

We liaised with the Director of Public Prosecutions to consider any issues with section 194K applying to our work, as well as to try to avoid, in keeping with the order establishing our Commission of Inquiry, prejudicing any current or future criminal proceedings. We are grateful to the Director and his office for their assistance with these matters.

4 Flexibility with powers and privileges

In October 2009, the Australian Law Reform Commission ('ALRC') conducted a review of the Royal Commissions Act 1902 (Cth) and presented its findings in its Making Inquiries: A New Statutory Framework report.[20] Although the ALRC's review focused on the Commonwealth Act, it led to legislative reform in other Australian jurisdictions.[21] The review is relevant to reforms to the Commissions of Inquiry Act, including because the Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act was said to implement the work undertaken by the Law Reform Institute and the ALRC.[22] Relevantly, the Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act did not implement all the recommendations of either.

One important recommendation of the ALRC was to establish two tiers of public inquiry—namely, royal commissions and official inquiries—within a single statute.[23]

It was suggested this would 'enhance clarity, transparency and accountability, and preserve, as far as possible, the rights of individuals'.[24]

As the ALRC noted in its report, a royal commission is the highest form of inquiry, established to look into matters of substantial public importance, whereas an official inquiry looks into other matters of public importance.[25]

The ALRC noted key differences between these two tiers:

- A royal commission has a wide range of coercive powers of entry and search and seizure, whereas an official inquiry has fewer powers.
- A royal commission overrides legal professional privilege and the privilege against self-incrimination, but these continue to apply in an official inquiry.[26]

We agree that the purpose and nature of each inquiry is different and the powers and privileges that apply to each inquiry might also need to differ, so each inquiry can appropriately conduct its work while also appropriately balancing the rights of those involved with, or potentially affected by, its processes.[27]

In New South Wales, Victoria and the Australian Capital Territory, relevant legislation provides for these different tiers of inquiry.[28] For example, the Inquiries Act 2014 (Vic) provides for establishing a royal commission, a board of inquiry or a formal review, with each having different powers. A royal commission overrides legal professional privilege and the privilege against self-incrimination, but a board of inquiry does not.[29] A royal commission and a board of inquiry also generally override statutory secrecy provisions in other legislation.[30] A formal review preserves legal professional privilege, the privilege against self-incrimination and statutory secrecy provisions. Other Australian jurisdictions also expressly override legal professional privilege and the privilege against self-incrimination in relevant inquiries.[31]

In Tasmania, commissions of inquiry have been far less frequent than in other Australian jurisdictions. Possibly because of this, the Commissions of Inquiry Act does not reflect the ALRC report approach of having different tiers of inquiry with flexibility in the powers and privileges that might apply to those different tiers.

While the Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act amended the Commissions of Inquiry Act to empower a commission of inquiry to decide if a claim of privilege is valid, it does not expressly override legal professional privilege (although it does override the privilege against self-incrimination).[32]

Our Commission of Inquiry worked with the Tasmanian Government to manage State claims of privilege and was grateful for the approach adopted by the Tasmanian Government of seeking to confidentially share such material with us and, in some cases, waive privilege where it was possible to do so. Otherwise, we respected the State's claims for privilege. Nonetheless, it would be appropriate to consider whether the Commissions of Inquiry Act should be amended to create greater flexibility in the powers and privileges that apply to future inquiries, including abolishing legal professional privilege in relevant inquiries.

5 Other opportunities for reform

As noted, the Commissions of Inquiry Act was amended in 2021 to empower a commission of inquiry to conduct its work and obtain information in any way it considers appropriate.[33] As reflected in this report, our Commission of Inquiry informed itself in several ways, including through public hearings.

The Commissions of Inquiry Act was originally enacted when public hearings were a—possibly the—primary vehicle by which evidence was obtained. Part 3 [Conduct of Inquiries], Division 1 [General powers and procedures] reflects this historical focus on public hearings. While amendments to the Commission of Inquiry Act make it clear that commissions of inquiry can get information in other ways, the Act still has various terms including 'information', 'evidence', 'documents' and 'thing'. None of these terms are defined.

In conducting our Inquiry and considering the relevant protections and offences that apply under the Commissions of Inquiry Act, we approached these terms broadly to ensure all who provided information, gave evidence or produced a document or thing—whether at a public hearing, during a session with a Commissioner, in a submission or as part of a consultation—were afforded these protections and rights.

More generally, however, the Act using different terms raises the question of whether any legal difference between them is intended. This requires careful consideration of each use of the different terms and creates the possibility of different interpretations and, therefore, greater legal complexity. Given a commission of inquiry can obtain information in any way it considers appropriate, we do not consider using different terms is necessary. The legislation could be simplified by using the same terminology consistently.

A commission of inquiry also has powers to control its proceedings, determine whether its hearings are open to the public, and prohibit or restrict the public reporting of a hearing or the publishing of any evidence it takes or receives.[34] A few comments might be made about these provisions. First, by their language, they reflect the historical focus of the Commissions of Inquiries Act on hearings, as opposed to empowering a commission of inquiry to make orders (including prohibitions or restrictions) relating to any information that it might receive. Second, before a commission of inquiry decides to close its hearings, or to make a prohibition or restricted publication order, it must announce that intention or make such an order at a hearing that is open to the public.[35]

While our Commission of Inquiry was able to close hearings and to make orders to prohibit or restrict the publication of evidence as part of our main hearings, such processes could be disruptive and inefficient. In the context of contemporary inquiry practices, we consider there may be more efficient ways of making such decisions and orders public without needing to do so during public hearings. For example, it might be possible to require such notices to be published at any relevant commission of inquiry office or hearing venue, or on the commission of inquiry's website, a reasonable period before they take effect.[36]

6 Conclusion

Our experience in conducting our Commission of Inquiry highlighted several ways in which the Commissions of Inquiry Act should be improved to enable future inquiries to achieve their objectives effectively, efficiently and in a way that is fit for purpose. We see opportunities for holistic reform of the Commissions of Inquiry Act rather than piecemeal amendments or amendments that react to circumstances surrounding establishing any given commission of inquiry. We hope our experiences and reflections might usefully inform any such reform for the benefit of future inquiries.

We encourage the Tasmanian Government to actively pursue the following potential framework for legislative reform:

1. Amend the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 to:
    a. establish greater flexibility in the powers and privileges applying to different inquiries, including expressly abrogating legal professional privilege in relevant inquiries
    b. repeal the definitions of 'adverse finding' and 'misconduct' (section 3) and sections 18, 19(2A) and (2B)
    c. use consistent terminology and achieve drafting coherence across the various ways in which a commission of inquiry might obtain, manage and protect those who provide information
    d. provide for more practical ways in which to make decisions about closing hearings and making prohibition or restricted publication orders.
2. Amend section 194K of the Evidence Act 2001, considering equivalent provisions in other Australian jurisdictions and the practical challenges identified in this report.

Appendices

Appendix A: Order establishing the Commission of Inquiry

Order Under the

Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995

WHEREAS all children deserve a safe and happy childhood.

AND Tasmania recognises that Australia has undertaken international obligations to take all appropriate legislative, administrative, social and educational measures to protect children from sexual abuse and other forms of abuse, including measures for the prevention, identification, reporting, referral, investigation, treatment and follow up of incidents of child abuse.

AND all forms of child sexual abuse are a gross violation of a child's rights to this protection and a crime under Tasmanian law and may be accompanied by other unlawful or improper treatment of children, including physical assault, exploitation, deprivation and neglect.

AND child sexual abuse and other related unlawful or improper treatment of children have a long-term cost to individuals, the economy and society.

AND government institutions, including child-care, educational, and other non-government institutions, provide important services and support for children and their families that are beneficial to children's development.

AND it is important that claims of systemic failures or responses by government and non-government institutions in relation to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse are explored, and that best practice is identified so that it may be followed in the future both to protect against the occurrence of child sexual abuse and to respond appropriately when any allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse occur, including holding perpetrators to account and providing justice to victims.

AND it is important that those affected by child sexual abuse can share their experiences to assist with healing and to inform the development of strategies and reforms in relation to systemic failures by government institutions in relation to child sexual abuse and related matters.

AND noting that the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse did not specifically examine, make findings or recommendations about Tasmanian Government institutions.

AND noting that the findings and recommendations of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse substantially addressed issues relating to matters outside government institutional contexts.

AND as the Tasmanian Government expected from the findings and recommendations made by the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse the Tasmanian Government continues to receive reports of child sexual abuse in government institutions.

AND noting that, it is also important to continuously improve the response to all forms of child sexual abuse in all contexts.

AND the Tasmanian Government has expressed its support for, and undertaken to cooperate with, an inquiry into its responses to child sexual abuse and related matters.

I, the Governor in and over the State of Tasmania and its Dependencies in the Commonwealth of Australia, acting with the Advice of the Executive Council, being satisfied that it is in the public interest and expedient to do so, by this my order made under Section 4 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 –

(a) Direct that an Inquiry be made into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings.

(b) Establish a Commission to conduct and report, with such recommendations as it may consider appropriate, on Inquiry.

(c) Appoint

The Honourable Marcia Neave AO

Professor Leah Bromfield

The Honourable Robert Benjamin AM

as members of the Commission.

(d) Appoint the Honourable Marcia Neave AO as President of the Commission.

AND I require and authorise you, to inquire into the Tasmanian Government's responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, and in particular, without limiting the scope of your inquiry, the following matters:

(i) what the Tasmanian Government should do to better protect children against child sexual abuse in institutional contexts in the future;

(ii) what the Tasmanian Government should do to achieve best practice in the reporting of, and responding to reports or information about, allegations, incidents or risks of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts;

(iii) what the Tasmanian Government should do to eliminate or reduce impediments that currently exist for responding appropriately to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including addressing failures in, and impediments to, reporting, investigation and responding to allegations and incidents of abuse;

(iv) what the Tasmanian Government should do to address, or alleviate the impact of, past and future child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including, in particular, in ensuring justice for victims through, processes for referral for investigation and prosecution and support services.

AND I direct you to make any recommendations arising out of your inquiry that you consider appropriate, including recommendations about any policy, legislative, administrative or structural reforms.

AND I direct you, for the purposes of your inquiry and recommendations, to have regard to the following matters:

(i) the experience of people directly or indirectly affected by child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, and the provision of opportunities for them to share their experiences in appropriate ways while recognising that many of them will be severely traumatised or will have special support needs;

(ii) the adequacy and appropriateness of the responses by the Tasmanian Government, and its officials, to reports and information about allegations, incidents or risks of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including, without limiting the generality of your inquiry:

i. the adequacy and appropriateness of the responses by the Department of Education to allegations of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government Schools;

ii. the adequacy and appropriateness of the responses of the Tasmanian Health Service and the Department of Health to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in the matter of James Geoffrey Griffin (deceased 18 October 2019);

iii. the adequacy and appropriateness of the responses of the Department of Communities Tasmania to allegations of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre;

(iii) the need to focus your inquiry and recommendations on systemic issues, recognising nevertheless that you may be informed by individual cases and may need to make referrals to appropriate authorities in individual cases;

(iv) changes to laws, policies, practices and systems that have improved over time the ability of government institutions to better protect against and respond to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts.

AND I further declare that you are not required by this Order to inquire, or to continue to inquire, into a particular matter to the extent that the matter has been sufficiently and appropriately dealt with by the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse or another inquiry or investigation or criminal or civil proceeding.

AND, without limiting the scope of your inquiry or the scope of any recommendations arising out of your inquiry that you consider appropriate, I direct you, for the purposes of your inquiry and recommendations, to consider the following matters, and I authorise you to take (or refrain from taking) any action that you consider appropriate arising out of your consideration:

(i) the need to establish mechanisms to facilitate the timely communication of information, or the furnishing of evidence, documents or things, in accordance with section 34A of the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 or any other relevant law, including, for example, for the purpose of enabling the timely investigation and prosecution of offences;

(ii) the need to establish investigation units to support your inquiry;

(iii) the need to ensure that evidence that may be received by you that identifies particular individuals as having been involved in child sexual abuse is dealt with in a way that does not prejudice current or future criminal or civil proceedings or other contemporaneous inquiries;

(iv) the need to establish appropriate arrangements in relation to current and previous inquiries, in Australia and elsewhere, for evidence and information to be shared with you in ways consistent with relevant obligations so that the work of those inquiries, including, with any necessary consents, the testimony of witnesses, can be taken into account by you in a way that avoids unnecessary trauma to witnesses;

(v) the need to ensure that government and non-government institutions and other parties are given a sufficient opportunity to respond to requests and requirements for information, documents and things, including, for example, having regard to any need to obtain archival material.

AND I declare that in this Order:

child means a child within the meaning of the Convention on the Rights of the Child of 20 November 1989.

child sexual abuse means

i. any act which exposes a child to, or involves a child in, sexual processes beyond their understanding or contrary to accepted community standards. Sexual abusive behaviours can include the fondling of genitals, masturbation, oral sex, vaginal or anal penetration by a penis, finger or any other object, fondling of breasts, voyeurism, and exhibitionism and exposing a child to or involving the child in pornography. It includes child grooming, which refers to actions deliberately undertaken with the aim of befriending and establishing an emotional connection with a child, to lower the child's inhibitions in preparation for sexual activity with the child; and

ii. any related matters.

Department of Communities Tasmania means the Government department referred to in Part 1 of Schedule 1 of the State Service Act 2000 as the Department of Communities Tasmania, including its predecessors.

Department of Education means the Government department referred to in Part 1 of Schedule 1 of the State Service Act 2000 as the Department of Education, including its predecessors.

Department of Health means the Government department referred to in Part 1 of Schedule 1 of the State Service Act 2000 as the Department of Health including its predecessors, and includes Ambulance Tasmania within the meaning of the Ambulance Service Act 1982 and all other publicly funded health services other than health services provided by the Tasmanian Health Service under the authority of the Tasmanian Health Service Act 2018.

government institution means any agency or statutory authority of the Crown in right of Tasmania, or local government entity.

non-government institution means any non-government institution that undertakes, or has undertaken, activities on behalf of the Tasmanian Government or is funded by the Tasmanian Government to provide services for children.

institutional context: child sexual abuse happens in an institutional context if, for example:

(i) it happens on premises of a government or non-government institution, where activities of the institution take place, or in connection with the activities of the an institution; or

(ii) it is engaged in by an official of a government or non-government institution in circumstances (including circumstances involving settings not directly controlled by the institution) where you consider that the institution has, or its activities have, created, facilitated, increased, concealed or in any way contributed to, (whether by act or omission) the risk of child sexual abuse or the circumstances or conditions giving rise to that risk; or

(iii) it happens in any other circumstances where you consider that a government or non-government institution is, or should be treated as being, responsible for adults having contact with children.

law means a law of the Commonwealth or of a State or Territory.

official means:

(i) any member, officer, employee, associate, contractor or volunteer (however described) of a government or non-government institution; and

(ii) any other person who you consider is, or should be treated as if the person were, an official of a government or non-government institution.

related matters means

(i) any unlawful or improper treatment of children that is, either generally or in any particular instance, connected or associated with child sexual abuse;

(ii) assisting a person to avoid detection for child sexual abuse or any other unlawful or improper treatment within the meaning of paragraph (i) of this definition.

statutory authority means a body or authority, whether incorporated or not, which is established or constituted by or under an Act or under the royal prerogative, being a body or authority which, or of which the governing authority, wholly or partly comprises a person or persons appointed by the Governor, a Minister or another statutory authority and includes the governing authority of a statutory authority.

Tasmanian Government means the executive government of Tasmania, and includes its agencies and statutory authorities.

Tasmanian Health Service means:

(a) the Tasmanian Health Service within the meaning of the Tasmanian Health Service Act 2018, and includes any subsidiary of the Tasmanian Health Service and all its predecessors;

(b) a Health Organisation under the Tasmanian Health Organisations Act 2011.

AND I:

(a) require you to begin your inquiry as soon as practicable; and

(b) require you to make your inquiry as expeditiously as possible; and

(c) require you to report to appropriate authorities where you have identified a risk or potential risk to the welfare of a child or children generally; and

(d) require you to submit to me:

(i) as soon as possible, and in any event not later than 31 August 2022, your final report of the results of your inquiry and your recommendations; and

(ii) authorise you to submit to me any recommendations or interim reports that you consider appropriate.

Appendix B: Terms of reference

TERMS OF REFERENCE

The Commission is to inquire into the Tasmanian Government's responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, and in particular, without limiting the scope of its inquiry, what the Tasmanian Government should do to:

I. better protect children against child sexual abuse in institutional contexts in the future
II. achieve best practice in the reporting of, and responding to reports or information about, allegations, incidents or risks of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts
III. eliminate or reduce impediments that currently exist for responding appropriately to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including addressing failures in, and impediments to, reporting, investigation and responding to allegations and incidents of abuse, and
IV. address, or alleviate the impact of, past and future child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including, in particular, in ensuring justice for victims through, processes for referral for investigation and prosecution and support services.

For the purposes of its inquiry and recommendations, the Commission is to have regard to:

I. the experience of people directly or indirectly affected by child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, and the provision of opportunities for them to share their experiences in appropriate ways while recognising that many of them will be severely traumatised or will have special support needs
II. the adequacy and appropriateness of the responses by the Tasmanian Government, and its officials, to reports and information about allegations, incidents or risks of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including, without limiting the generality of its inquiry, the adequacy and appropriateness of:
    i. the responses by the Department of Education to allegations of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government schools
    ii. the responses of the Tasmanian Health Service and the Department of Health to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in the matter of James Geoffrey Griffin (deceased 18 October 2019)
    iii. the responses of the Department of Communities Tasmania to allegations of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Appendix D: Tasmanian Government's Keeping Children Safer Interim Response to the Commission of Inquiry (actions)

1. Announce and implement Keeping Children Safer Premier's Priority.
2. Improve the Right to Information process, including providing training across the State Service to ensure more consistent responses.
3. Explore options to expand the scope of regulated activities under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People legislation to ensure Tasmania's worker screening scheme for people who work or volunteer with vulnerable people.
4. Make arrangements in Heads of Agency Performance Agreements to clarify expectations and improve accountability, making sure child safety and wellbeing is embedded in organisational leadership, governance and culture.
5. Investigate rolling out trauma-informed training across the State Service starting with those in leadership positions including Heads of Agency.
6. Encourage and support staff to raise child safety concerns.
7. Review the structure and processes across civil litigation to ensure our approach is trauma informed and that all our legal practitioners recognise evidence-based understandings of the nature and impact of child sexual abuse.
8. Review and rewrite Employment Direction 5.
9. Fast track response to the remaining recommendations of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse.
10. Develop a Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework including comprehensive legislated standards and the establishment of a Reportable Conduct Scheme.
11. Appoint a Safeguarding Officer in every Government school.
12. Require mandatory professional development for all Department for Education, Children and Young People (DECYP) staff.
13. Employ an additional four full time equivalent senior support staff (two psychologists and two social workers) to increase support for children and young people affected by harmful sexual behaviours or child sexual abuse.
14. Employ additional professional support staff, including eight full time equivalent psychologists and eight full time equivalent social workers to further support student wellbeing and safety.
15. Establish an Out of Home Care Accreditation Framework and an independent statutory body for accrediting and monitoring Out of Home Care Services, and develop a Carers' Register.

16. Draft legislation to create a new crime of 'failing to protect a child or young person' for people in authority within an organisation who fail to safeguard a child from substantial risk of sexual abuse by an adult associated with that organisation.
17. Amend the Criminal Code to introduce a new crime of 'penetrative sexual abuse of a child [or young person] by a person in authority', including a presumption that children under the age of 18 cannot consent to sexual intercourse when a person is in a position of authority over them.
18. Consider legislative solutions and other initiatives that will make it easier to share information about risks to children, including looking at whether issues of custom, practice and culture are creating unnecessary barriers.
19. Develop clear information regarding the circumstances where Agencies can and should share information about the status of investigations and/or investigative material.
20. Make trauma informed practice professional learning mandatory for investigators and other state servants involved in ED5 investigation processes.
21. Create a shared capability for the investigation of serious Code of Conduct breaches. Ensure the pool has a gender balance.
22. Establish a central register of employees who have been terminated as a result of an ED5 investigation.
23. Draft a formal apology on behalf of the parliament.
24. Provide information to all state servants on special two-day Commission of Inquiry leave.
25. Establish a Whole-of-Government Commission of Inquiry Response Unit.
26. Undertake a Child Safe Governance Review of the Launceston General Hospital and its Human Resources department informed by an advisory panel consisting of independent experts in child trauma, governance and hospital administration and human resources.
27. Establish a central complaints office to handle all future complaints about misconduct—including claims of child sexual abuse.
28. Establish two pilot multidisciplinary centres, one in the north and one in the south. Youth Justice Reform.
29. Develop a website to publicly report progress on implementation of the interim response actions and expected delivery dates.

FOREWORD

The South Australian government and non-government education sectors have jointly developed all policies of a child protection nature since an agreement established in 2004. The policies and practices developed under that agreement help ensure that staff, children and parents can expect the same standards of child protection practice no matter which sector they access. This document joins that collection of guidelines and affirms that learning about child safety in education and care settings will continue to be shared across the government and non-government sectors.

This document is very closely adapted from Chapter 15 of the Royal Commission 2012–2013 Report of Independent Education Inquiry. The adaptations give effect to recommendation 39 of the Report that the guideline be applicable to government, Catholic and independent education sectors. Grateful acknowledgment is made of the advice provided by the Hon Bruce Debelle AO QC in his drafting of Chapter 15, specifically his setting out of the application of various laws to the considerations to be made by education and care sites when responding to allegations of sexual misconduct by adults against children or young people.

An important feature of these incidents is that they involve the concerted and coordinated efforts of a number of professionals from different agencies. For this reason, it is unlikely that a site leader will undertake responses to an incident of this kind in isolation from other professionals. Site leaders can expect a high level of support and advice from their relevant sector office.

Education and care settings are meant to be safe environments for everyone who attends them. A range of processes and systems are utilised by the education sectors to prevent unsuitable individuals from working or volunteering in those settings. As leaders of the education sectors, we strongly support the ongoing development of legislative schemes to enable the most thorough assessments of an individual's suitability to work or volunteer with children and young people.

However, the best screening schemes are unlikely to remove all possibility of an adult exploiting his or her role in order to offend against children or young people. Education and care communities can help in limiting this risk by recognising and reporting all inappropriate adult behaviour towards children and young people. The introduction that follows strongly reinforces this responsibility and outlines the place of this guideline alongside other child protection responsibilities.

Finally, allegations against adults of sexual misconduct towards children and young people are complex matters. This guideline cannot be assumed to provide the appropriate directions for every case. It does not cover the full range of circumstances that an education or care site will encounter when assessing whether an individual is suitable to work or volunteer with children and young people. Therefore, in any situation of this kind, it may be necessary to seek legal advice. Nevertheless, it is hoped that this guideline will provide general assistance by removing confusion about the matters to be considered and actions that may need to be taken at different stages when allegations of sexual misconduct are made. In doing so, it is hoped that the guidance will help reduce any additional trauma for the affected children, young people, families and staff.

CONTENTS

SECTION 1: Introduction

1.1 A note for site leaders

Managing an allegation of adult sexual misconduct is a highly complex task for a site leader to face. This guideline document is designed to provide site leaders, their parent community and their respective sector offices with improved clarity about the actions to be taken and matters that require considerations at each stage. It is important to remember that the obligation to report and respond to allegations of sexual misconduct applies irrespective of whether the accused person is still working, volunteering or undertaking a role in connection to an individual site. The person may have moved, resigned, taken leave, or may be deceased. The obligation to report and respond remains.

In managing situations of this kind, site leaders can assume that sector office decisions impacting their school or care community will be made consultatively and that their local knowledge and professional judgment will contribute to those decisions. They can also assume that they will be kept informed of new information as it becomes available and of relevant actions undertaken by others. No two cases will be identical so matters such as whether and when to send a letter to parent communities, who signs letters, the content of letters or the facilitation of a parent meeting may differ in every circumstance and will always require consultation. Site leaders of independent schools should expect the same kind of collaboration with those from whom they seek support.

The information in Section 3 and the checklists provided as Appendices 1 and 2 give site leaders the scope and general sequence of actions they and their sector office will need to undertake. At the time parents of a victim are informed that a matter of this kind is being managed, they should also be informed that this guideline will be followed. If and when other parents are informed of the matter, they should also be advised that the guideline is being followed.

1.1.1 Associated responsibilities

This guideline is closely linked with two other intersectoral child protection policies summarised below. The role of these two policy documents in helping prevent inappropriate adult conduct and in contributing to safe environments cannot be over-emphasised. Both documents are incorporated in the mandatory staff training used by the three sectors. However, it is assumed that site leaders routinely refer to these documents as part of their site-based professional development programs. Copies of both documents should be held in all education and care sites and can be downloaded from each sector's website.

Protective practices for staff in their interactions with children and young people

The Protective Practices document outlines the professional boundaries within which all staff members are expected to operate in their relationships with children and young people. Meeting the requirements outlined in Protective Practices is critical to helping prevent the circumstances of adult sexual misconduct. The Protective Practices policy requires all staff to act if they observe or are told about adult behaviour that represents a breach of a professional boundary. This point cannot be overstated: 'It is not acceptable to minimise, ignore or delay responding to such information. For the wellbeing of all members of the education or care community, the site leader must be informed as a matter of urgency …' (p 14).

Immediate actions in response to inappropriate behaviour may enable more serious underlying behaviour to be identified, and may prevent sexual misconduct. The more vigilant and transparent an education or care community is in complying with the Protective Practices document the more likely it will be that sexual misconduct can be prevented—through early identification, intervention, and deterrence.

Responding to problem sexual behaviour involving children and young people

This guideline is to be followed in all circumstances where a child or young person is alleged to have engaged in problem sexual behaviour. The responsibilities staff members have in these circumstances are significantly different from those involving allegations of sexual misconduct by adults. They reflect the different rights and needs of children and young people and the different legislation within which staff must operate. The guideline applies to and is available in all sectors.

1.1.2 Differences between the sectors

One significant difference between the three sectors' implementation of this guideline is in the seeking of legal advice. In the government and Catholic sectors, seeking legal advice will occur through the respective sector office. An independent school can seek legal advice on its own behalf. Generally, the different responsibility that is carried by the site leader and governing authority of an independent school is identified, wherever appropriate, throughout the guideline and in the definition of 'sector office' in Section 1.3.

1.2 Purpose

This guideline document:

- Informs leaders in education and care settings of the procedures for managing and reporting allegations of sexual misconduct at an education or care site.
- Ensures that parents are informed at the appropriate time of allegations of sexual misconduct by an adult against a child or young person enrolled or previously enrolled, where relevant, at an education or care site.
- Assists parents to understand the process that is followed in managing allegations of sexual misconduct by an adult against a child or young person enrolled or previously enrolled, where relevant, at an education or care site.
- States the respective duties of site leaders and sector offices in managing allegations of sexual misconduct at a site.
- Provides a transparent policy that enables early intervention, effective management and provision of the support required in these complex and serious matters.

1.3 Definitions

'accused person' means a current or past employee of an education or care site or any other adult who has a connection to a site against whom allegations of sexual misconduct have been made

'an adult who has a connection to a site' means and includes current and past employees of the education or care site; current and past volunteers, contractors, professional service providers, other paid education and care participants, governing authority members, and tertiary students and supervisors; and any adult who has engaged with children and young people enrolled at the site

'CARL' means Child Abuse Report Line

'child or young person' means persons up to the age of 18 years and includes young adults with developmental disabilities attending education settings

'governing authority' means a site or service's Governing Council or School Board

'parent' means and includes natural parents, step parents, foster parents, guardians, grandparents and any other relative or other person caring for a child

'relevant date' means the relevant date as defined in section 71A(5) of the Evidence Act 1929, provided in Section 2.3.1 below

'sector office' in this document means the policy, legal, case management support and/or direction provided through the:

- central office of the South Australian Department for Education
- central office of Catholic Education South Australia
- Office of the Association of Independent Schools of South Australia

Note: The relationship between sites and their sector offices differs. It may be one of direct governance and accountability or a partnership in which the individual site retains ultimate responsibility with its governing authority.

'site' means a school; preschool; children's centre; a junior primary, primary, secondary or senior secondary school; an Out of School Hours Care service; and the home of a Family Day Care provider

'site leader' means the principal or director and any other person who has ultimate responsibility for the welfare of children and young people on that site

'staff' means all adults who have a duty of care to children and young people at the site and includes volunteers

'victim' means the child or young person against whom an act of sexual misconduct by an adult who has a connection to a site has been alleged

1.4 Scope

The procedures in this guideline apply to allegations of sexual misconduct made against any adult who has a connection with the site where the allegations affect the suitability of that adult to work or volunteer with children and young people.

These procedures apply to allegations of sexual misconduct where any of the following situations exist:

- the allegation is disclosed at or off the site
- the incident is alleged to have occurred at or off the site
- at the time of the alleged incident, the victim was or was not in the direct care of the site.

This guideline applies only to allegations of sexual misconduct by an adult against a child or young person. For incidents involving sexual harm between children and young people, please refer to the document Responding to problem sexual behaviour in children and young people, available at each site and located on each sector's website.

1.5 Sexual misconduct

Sexual misconduct may take many forms. It includes, but is not limited to, sexual assaults of all kinds and other forms of unlawful sexual behaviour including such offences as being in possession of child pornography and acts of gross indecency. A sexual assault ranges from indecent assault through a number of offences to rape.

In some cases, a particular behaviour may become unlawful only by virtue of repeated instances.

Note: This definition is provided for general information. It is not necessary for staff to determine whether an alleged behaviour is sexually motivated. It is simply necessary that staff report all inappropriate behaviour as per the Protective Practices guidelines. Those guidelines identify any behaviour of a potentially sexual nature between an adult and a child or young person as a breach of professional conduct. In meeting that reporting obligation, it is then the site leader's task to consult with his or her sector office regarding all allegations so that the appropriate response is made at all times.

SECTION 2: Legislative framework

2.1 Underlying principles

Teachers and site leaders owe to the children and young people in their care a duty to take reasonable care to protect them from a reasonably foreseeable risk of injury. That duty is not necessarily confined to events on the site or during site hours. In addition to observing sector policy, staff must comply with a number of statutory duties or obligations.

Note: Appendix 8 provides links to relevant legislation.

2.2 Mandatory notification

Section 31 Children and Young People (Safety) Act 2017 (SA) imposes a duty on employees and volunteers in education and care settings to notify CARL if, in the course of their work, they suspect on reasonable grounds that a child or young person is, or may be, at risk. The child or young person will be taken to be at risk if the child or young person has suffered harm or there is likelihood that the child or young person will suffer harm (being harm of a kind against which a child or young person is ordinarily protected). In practical terms, the duty to notify the Department for Child Protection is a duty to notify the Child Abuse Report Line (CARL) on 131 478.

If an allegation is made to staff, or the staff member has a suspicion on reasonable grounds that a child has been or is being abused or neglected, he or she must notify CARL as soon as practicable after he or she forms that suspicion or learns of the allegation. It is an offence to fail to do so.

All staff members in government, Catholic and independent schools are required to undertake training in their child protection responsibilities, both when they are first employed and every three years thereafter. This training is jointly developed by the three education sectors and describes this responsibility in detail.

An outline of the process for documenting mandatory notifications in education and care settings is provided at <https://www.education.sa.gov.au/child-protection>.

2.3 Prohibitions on disclosure of identity

2.3.1 Restrictions on publication of identity

When a person has been, or is about to be, charged with a sexual offence, it is necessary to comply with the legal obligations imposed by section 71A of the Evidence Act 1929. Section 71A restricts publication of the identity of the alleged victim and of the alleged offender who, in this guideline document, will be called 'the accused person'.

Where the alleged victim is a child or young person under the age of 18, the name of the alleged victim or anything that might identify the victim can never be published. Therefore, care must be taken to ensure that nothing is said or published that might identify the alleged victim.

The name of the accused person can be published but only after certain events have occurred and if there are no suppression orders in force (see section 2.3.2 "suppression orders"). Those events are identified in section 71A(5) of the Evidence Act. They are called 'the relevant date'. The definition of 'relevant date' in the Evidence Act is as follows:

relevant date means

(a) in relation to a charge of a major indictable offence or a charge of a minor indictable offence for which the accused person has elected to be tried by a superior court—the date on which the accused person is committed for trial or sentence; or

(b) in relation to a charge of any other minor indictable offence or a charge of a summary offence—the date on which a plea of guilty is entered by the accused person or the date on which the accused person is found guilty following trial; or

(c) in any case—the date on which the charge is dismissed or the proceedings lapse by reason of the death of the accused person, for want of prosecution, or for any other reason.

The relevant dates are listed below according to the kind of offence with which the accused person has been charged.

The relevant sector office will be informed by SA Police of the kind of offence with which the accused person has been charged, that is, whether it is a major indictable offence or other kind of offence. This information should be provided to the site leader.

It is lawful to publish the name of the accused person after any of the following relevant dates.

- Major indictable offences
  1. The date on which the accused person is committed for trial or to be sentenced.
  2. The date on which the charge is dismissed or that proceedings lapse by reason of the death of the accused person or for want of prosecution or for any other reason.

  These dates are also applicable to minor indictable offences for which the accused person has elected to be tried in the District Court.

- Minor indictable offences and summary offences
  1. The date on which the accused person pleads guilty.
  2. The date on which the accused person is found guilty following a trial.

3. The date on which the charge is dismissed or that proceedings lapse by reason of the death of the accused person or for want of prosecution or for any other reason.

Appendix 7 to this document gives a brief outline of the steps in a criminal prosecution. That outline will assist in understanding the relevant dates.

2.3.2 Suppression orders

Suppression orders are made by a court pursuant to section 69A of the Evidence Act. A suppression order is an order forbidding publication of whatever is the subject matter of the order. The order will state that it forbids publication of the subject matter of the order. For example, the order might read:

> The name or anything tending to identify the accused be suppressed from publication in the interests of justice until further order.

A suppression order is not a statement made by a judge or magistrate that he or she does not intend to name a person or a school in order to protect the victim.

Before sending a letter to parents, the relevant sector office should inquire of the Registrar of the relevant court whether a suppression order exists. If an order exists, the sector office should examine the terms of the order and consider whether the order forbids the kind of letter under consideration. If there is any uncertainty about what is prohibited, legal advice should be sought.

It is still possible to give some information to staff, the governing authority and parents while complying with these restrictions. Section 3 of this guideline provides advice as to how and when that information is to be provided.

2.3.3 Avoiding defamation

When allegations of sexual misconduct have been made, care must be taken to avoid stating anything that might defame the person against whom the allegations have been made. If a site wishes to send a letter before a person has been arrested and charged with an offence, it is desirable to obtain legal advice as to the terms of the letter to ensure that nothing is said that defames that person. If that person has been arrested and charged, it is lawful to state that fact but nothing should be said that would suggest the person is in fact guilty of the alleged misconduct.

SECTION 3: Managing allegations of sexual misconduct

Allegations might be made against a member of the teaching staff, administration or other support staff, employees of a governing authority, or against volunteers at a site. In most cases, the steps to be taken by the site leader will essentially be the same.

It must be emphasised that these are guidelines only. The manner in which a site will learn of allegations will vary. Different circumstances may require a variation of the sequence of these actions. It is not possible to draft guidelines that will address every possible variation of fact. The fundamental steps that should always be observed are to notify immediately:

- SA Police
- Child Abuse Report Line
- parents of the victim, unless a parent is the accused person, and with due regard for the victim's wishes
- the relevant sector office.

3.1 Importance of note taking

Memories fade and recollections of events will be difficult at a later date when site leaders or members of staff are asked to recall events or conversations.

It is essential that site leaders and all other members of staff involved keep a written record of all conversations relating to the allegations. The notes should, if possible, be made in the course of the conversation or immediately after. In addition, site leaders and other members of staff should complete the 'Record of allegation' and 'Record of meeting' forms contained in Appendices 3 and 4. They can be downloaded from the sector's website. These forms should be completed in addition to the site leader's own notes of conversations.

Staff and volunteers should be aware that they may be called to give evidence in court proceedings. Contemporaneous notes will then be very helpful in assisting the recollection of events and conversations. It is also important to be aware that notes may be subpoenaed for court proceedings and, therefore, should be completed in a legible and professional manner.

The notes and forms should be placed in a file marked 'Confidential' and held in a secure cabinet. The only person with access to the cabinet should be the site leader or the site leader's delegate. At a relevant time, the site leader will provide this documentation to the sector office, if required by that office.

3.2 Immediate action

Allegations of sexual misconduct might be made either to the sector office or directly to a member of staff at the site or to the site leader. The allegations may be made by a child or young person, a staff member, a parent, a volunteer or a member of the public. On other occasions, the first knowledge that either the sector office or anyone at the site has of the allegations is when police state that they have arrested a person and charged him or her with a sexual offence.

The following is a list of the steps that should be taken by the site leader when allegations of sexual misconduct have been made. Which step a site leader begins with will vary according to whether the site leader is responding to the allegation 'first hand' or acting on information and instructions from the police or the sector office. Nevertheless, all the steps are important and need to be attended to immediately. The site leader has responsibility to undertake or, if tasks are undertaken by others, to oversee and confirm the execution of all the steps. Some steps can be taken simultaneously and most will be undertaken through consultation with, or by direction from, police and the sector office.

3.2.1 Actions of site leader

Reminder: The steps outlined are not necessarily sequential (see above).

Step 1: Obtain medical assistance for child or young person if required

The site leader should attend immediately to any medical treatment that the victim might require and attend to the victim's emotional needs in all ways appropriate until he or she is in the care of parents.

Step 2: Receive report of allegation

If an allegation of sexual misconduct is made to a member of staff or a volunteer at the site, it should be reported to the site leader immediately. The member of staff or the volunteer to whom the allegation is reported should record the allegations on the form in Appendix 3.

If the allegation involves the site leader, the report should be made to the relevant sector office or, in the case of an independent school, the chairperson of the governing authority.

Step 3: Report to SA Police

Once the site is aware of an allegation of sexual misconduct, the site leader must immediately report the allegations to police on 131 444. If the site leader is the person against whom the allegation is made, it is the sector office (or governing authority of an independent school) that has responsibility to make this report to police.

During this report, the site leader should seek and note SA Police's immediate advice on:

- restricting the staff member's access to children and young people (very important to executing step 7)
- preservation of evidence
- contact with parents of the victim
- police contact number to provide to parents of victim.

This will help inform the strategy discussions that the sector office, the site and police will undertake. Site leaders should expect that police will not normally interview children or young people at a site except as a matter of urgency or immediate necessity. In the ordinary course, children and young people should be interviewed at a place nominated by police that is off-site.

Step 4: Notify the Child Abuse Report Line

The site leader should, as soon as practicable, notify CARL on 131 478 and ensure the report is documented using the mandatory report form used by the relevant education sector and securely stored in the site leader's file.

Step 5: Preservation of evidence (if applicable)

The site leader should immediately take basic steps to secure the place where the alleged offending occurred, if that is on the site, until police arrive. An example is blocking access to the site's network if an allegation regarding child pornography is made, or locking the room in which an incident is alleged to have occurred. Electronic material of any kind must not be deleted but must be quarantined as far as practicable for handover to SA Police. The police will properly secure the crime scene on arrival. The site leader should seek advice from police on this issue when making the initial report.

Step 6: Inform the sector office and establish who will be assisting

The site leader should inform the relevant sector office and establish who will be assisting the site (eg a nominated case manager) in its management of the allegation and begin discussions immediately regarding the steps below.

Step 7: Preventing access to children and young people

When it is necessary to prevent the accused person from having any further contact with children or young people at the site, the site leader should take steps to prevent the accused person from attending the site, on directions from SA Police and the sector office. The responsibility of SA Police and the relevant education sector to work together in managing this circumstance is outlined in Appendix C of the Interagency Code of Practice—Investigation of suspected child abuse or neglect.

In some circumstances, the sector office or SA Police may ask the site leader not to indicate to the accused person that an allegation has been made until SA Police are able to complete their own preparations. The site leader will discuss with the sector office the most appropriate plan to either re-direct the individual from their teaching or care duties or to allocate another adult to the teaching or care situation in order to provide supervision until the end of the day. Each situation will provide different options and challenges for site leaders and their sector office to consider in managing this situation.

Step 8: Inform parents of victim

Unless a parent is the accused person, the site leader should immediately seek the approval of SA Police to inform the parents of the victim of the allegations if the parents are not already aware. This should be done in a sensitive manner, taking into consideration the victim's wishes. Information about counselling services and support for the victim and family should be provided at this time.

When the victim is a child under the Guardianship of the Chief Executive Department for Child Protection, the Chief Executive and his or her delegates are responsible for case management and planning for the safety, care and wellbeing of that child or young person. The Department for Child Protection has the additional responsibility to advise the Guardian for Children and Young People about sexual abuse involving children under the Guardianship of the Chief Executive Department for Child Protection. For these reasons, it is essential that the social worker is immediately informed so the special circumstances of the child or young person can be properly considered and managed.

Step 9: Inform the accused person of his or her immediate work requirements

In consultation with the relevant sector office and SA Police, the site leader should determine which leave/employment/contract options are appropriate and available for the accused person. These will vary across the three sectors but the intent is that the accused person does not attend the site while an investigation proceeds.

Step 10: Complete sector specific reporting requirements

These reporting requirements vary across the three sectors:

- Department for Education: critical incident report through the Incident Response Management System
- Catholic Education SA: critical incident report through the relevant Principal Consultant
- independent schools: school-based procedure.

Step 11: Document all information/ discussions/observations

The template provided in Appendix 3 should be used to document all information, discussions and observations relating to the incident. They should be signed, dated and placed in a confidential, secure site leader's file and provided to the sector office as required.

3.2.2 Actions of sector office

Step 1: Liaise with SA Police

Under the Interagency Code of Practice, SA Police will provide the relevant sector office with the following information:

- the name, date of birth and address of the person who has been charged
- details of the charge and apprehension report
- the condition upon which the accused person has been bailed
- the court bailed to and the date of the first court appearance
- the education or care site involved whether there is a reasonable suspicion that there might be other victims
- whether there are any complicating factors that would affect disclosure to parents
- the contact details of the investigating officer
- whether the offence is a major or minor indictable offence or a summary offence.

Step 2: Create a central file and appoint a manager

The sector office, through its relevant divisions or personnel, will ensure that a central file is established and that a case manager is identified to support the site in its management of the allegation. In an independent school, this will be the responsibility of the school principal.

Step 3: Assist the site in establishing appropriate leave for the accused person

The sector office will assist the site leader to manage these arrangements. It will ensure that the accused person is directed not to attend the site but it will assist the accused person to have personal materials delivered to him or her that have been approved by SA Police as appropriate. In an independent school, this will be the responsibility of the school principal.

Step 4: Check that all immediate responsibilities have been met

The sector office needs to check that the immediate responsibilities of the site have been met; for example:

- contact with parents
- contact with a social worker if the alleged victim is under the Guardianship of the Chief Executive Department for Child Protection
- provision of counselling
- report to the Child Abuse Report Line
- documented notes and secure file established.

In an independent school, this will be the responsibility of the school principal.

Step 5: Alert others as required

This responsibility varies across the three sectors but will include, as appropriate:

- relevant Minister (confirmed in writing)
- relevant Chief Executive/Director
- chairperson of the governing authority
- other education sectors, as per the Intersectoral Information Sharing Protocol
- Education Standards Board in the case of early childhood and care settings
- any other agency/organisation where risks to children's or young people's safety are identified.

Step 6: Alert media unit

The sector office should alert its media unit or advisor as appropriate:

- Department for Education: 8226 7904
- Catholic Education SA: 8210 8147
- Association of Independent Schools of South Australia: 8179 1400.

Step 7: Collate notes

The sector office should ensure that the site leader and other staff have made notes of any relevant events and conversations, using the record templates provided as Appendices 3 and 4, and ensure copies are placed on the sector office's central file.

In an independent school, this will be the responsibility of the school principal.

3.3 Further action

As soon as the sector office has satisfied itself that the steps listed in Section 3.2 'Immediate action' have been carried out, liaison should occur with the site in considering the following:

- the future employment of the accused person
- providing counselling and support
- undertaking a risk assessment
- responsibly giving out appropriate information.

The previous section (Section 2 Legislative Framework) outlines actions that must be taken immediately. The tasks under this 'further action' section should be undertaken as promptly as possible without compromising the consultation, risk assessment and information gathering that is required for those tasks to be undertaken appropriately. It is understood that maintaining an unqualified focus on the protection of children and young people will mean varying lengths of time are taken to complete the required actions. However, the guiding principle for sites and sector offices is that all the steps outlined in Section 3.3 must be maintained as priority actions and shown to be so by the records kept.

3.3.1 Future employment of accused person

Where the accused person is a staff member, the site leader should consult the relevant sector office to ascertain whether the accused person can be suspended from duty pending the outcome of the investigations.

If the accused person is suspended, the site leader or sector office should send that person a formal letter of suspension.

If the accused person is a volunteer, the services of that person should be terminated immediately.

If the accused person is a contractor, legal advice should be obtained whether the contract can be terminated.

If the accused person is an employee of the governing authority, the site leader and the governing authority should seek advice from the sector office on suspending that person.

In the event of the charges being withdrawn or in the event of an acquittal, the sector office should inform the site leader about what is to occur in relation to the future employment of the accused person.

In an independent school, this will be the responsibility of the school principal.

3.3.2 Counselling and support

Appropriate support should be provided as required to:

- the victim and his or her parents
- other children or young people and parents of the school or care community
- staff members
- relatives of the accused person who are employees or enrolled students at the site or in the sector and who identify their needs.

Generally speaking, that support will be in the form of counselling.

Victim and victim's parents

The site leader should meet with the parents of the victim to discuss continuing support for him or her. Details of counselling services with contact numbers should be provided to the victim and his or her parents as part of this first meeting. After the meeting, the site leader should complete a written record and have it signed by the parents. A sample is provided as Appendix 4.

Over the following days, a support and safety plan should be finalised covering all aspects of the victim's and the family's ongoing needs and agreed actions (see Appendix 6). Copies of the plan, and all updated versions, should be provided to the victim and the family. A copy of the plan/s should also be provided to the sector office as required. The verbal offer of counselling to the victim and the family should be followed by a letter re-stating the offer and the specific service options. If these services have been taken up by the victim and the family and recorded as part of the support and safety plan, the letter should simply confirm those agreed arrangements and attach the support and safety plan. The site leader should consult with the sector office on drafting this letter.

The site and the sector office must continue to monitor the wellbeing of the victim and his or her family through regular reviews of the support and safety plan. Particular attention must be given to significant dates where court proceedings are likely to prompt further stress and emotional burden.

Other children or young people and parents of the school or care community

The nature of the support or counselling that may be appropriate for other children or young people and parents in the school or care community will vary depending on the circumstances of each incident. If the risk assessment indicates the appropriateness of informing a wider group of parents then, generally speaking, the same services as outlined above should be offered. This may happen via a letter, face-to-face meeting or small-group meeting, as appropriate. These actions will be undertaken in consultation with SA Police, the sector office and an appropriate provider of such counselling, for example Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services. Copies of letters and records of meetings must be stored with the site leader and provided to the sector office as required.

Staff members

Staff members may be profoundly impacted by sexual misconduct allegations. Consideration must continue to be given to the wellbeing of staff, particularly those who were in some way associated with the accused person (eg co-class teachers, friends, relatives), and to the site leader on whom the additional burden of ultimate responsibility for the safety of the site rests.

Particular care should be taken in explaining the restrictions that may be placed on the accused person to staff who are friends of the accused. Individual staff members may need specific help in knowing how to respond to requests for emotional or other support from the accused person without complicating their own obligations at the site or unwittingly complicating matters for the accused. It is reasonable and important that staff members are able to offer emotional support to others and that accused persons have access to the support of friends. However, staff will need clear guidance on how to respond to particular requests such as acting as a witness. Site leaders should seek sector office support in clarifying the advice they give in these circumstances.

As with any other kind of serious critical incident, the site or sector office may need to deploy additional personnel to the site to ensure that it can operate without placing staff wellbeing or the care of children and young people at risk. Staff members may not immediately appreciate the impact on their wellbeing so reminders about the availability of the relevant sector counselling service should be given to staff on a number of occasions in the weeks or months that follow. Important events such as the outcome of court proceedings can trigger new points of stress and need which the sector office must anticipate and monitor.

Relatives of the accused person who are employees or enrolled students at the site or in the sector

A sensitive plan of support may need to be developed with and for relatives of the accused person who make their needs known to the site leader or sector office. Each circumstance will differ but the site leader and sector office will need to consider the best ways to support relatives who identify their needs, including the provision of counselling and the option of alternative placements if requested.

In some instances, relevant information may need to be shared between the sector office and site leaders so that appropriate monitoring of an employee's or enrolled student's safety and wellbeing is maintained. The impact on relatives of media coverage or letters to the community should be anticipated and protected against wherever possible. The details of support plans for relatives should be provided to the sector office as required and filed by the site leader.

3.3.3 Risk assessment

A risk assessment will be made by the relevant sector office in consultation with the site leader and will draw on information provided by SA Police. In an independent school, this will be the responsibility of the school principal. The risk assessment will consider whether there is a reasonable suspicion that there might be other victims and the most appropriate way of addressing that risk through informing identified people. Where necessary, the relevant sector office or independent school principal should consult experts.

Note: It is likely that processes for identifying and assessing risk will change as the work is informed by further research and experience. Sectors will share learning and updated risk assessment resources to inform practice and maintain consistency.

The risk assessment should consider relevant factors, including:

- the nature of the offending
- the circumstances in which the offending occurred
- the place or places where the offending occurred
- the age and gender of the victim
- the age and gender of the accused person, whether the accused person had regular and frequent contact with other individual children or young people, or a group or groups of children or young people, and the nature and circumstances of that contact
- the opportunities that were available to the accused person on which to offend against other children or young people.

3.3.4 Informing responsibly

Although a suppression order and section 71A of the Evidence Act forbid publication of the name of the accused person generally to the public, it is proper for those with a legitimate interest in the matter to be informed of the alleged offending. Those who have a legitimate interest in the offending are the staff at the site, the members of the governing authority of the site and parents of children or young people who are likely to have been in contact with the accused person.

As considerable care must be taken when informing staff, the governing authority and parents of the incident, site leaders and sector offices should follow the advice below.

It is necessary to consider the question of providing information at three stages. They are:

1. when no more is known than what is contained in the allegations
2. after the accused person has been charged
3. after the committal or other appropriate relevant date.

Note: As with all other parent communications, site leaders should ensure that, wherever required, letters are translated and interpreters are available at meetings. Written communications should be marked 'Confidential' and signed either by the site leader or a senior official of the relevant sector office. The decision about who signs letters will be taken consultatively and will respond to the unique circumstances of each case.

Stage 1: When allegations only are known

Informing staff

It might be necessary for the site leader to make arrangements to replace the accused person who has been placed, for example, on special leave, and to make other consequential administrative arrangements. The site leader is at liberty to inform the staff involved in the administrative arrangements of the allegations but should not inform other staff at that stage. Those staff members who are informed of the allegations should be asked to keep the information confidential and if contacted by the accused person they should not discuss the allegation. Other staff members should be told that the member of staff is on special leave, or another kind of leave using a neutral term applicable to processes utilised in the relevant sector.

Once the decision of the relevant sector has been taken to suspend the accused person, the site leader should call a staff meeting and inform all staff that the accused person has been suspended.

It might be necessary to state that the accused person has been suspended because his or her conduct is being investigated but nothing should be said that might indicate that allegations of sexual misconduct had been made against the accused person.

Staff should be informed that the accused person is not allowed on the site and if the accused person is seen at the site to report it to the site leader. See Section 3.3.2 regarding support for staff in managing this circumstance. Staff should be instructed to keep the information confidential and to refer any parents with questions to the site leader (see section on managing rumour, misinformation and curiosity below).

Staff members should be instructed that, if they have any information that will assist the police investigation, they should contact police and provide that information. If that information is relevant to the safe operation of the site, it should also be provided to the site leader. If the identity of the victim is known and consent is obtained from the victim or the victim's parents, specific staff members such as the victim's class teacher or school counsellor may be told who the victim is on a confidential basis in order to provide appropriate support for the victim.

Informing governing authority

The members of the governing authority should be informed by the site leader. They should be given the same information as staff, namely, that the accused person has been suspended until further notice and that the accused person has been directed not to attend the site. They should be asked to keep the information confidential and to refer any questions from parents to the site leader.

Informing parents

Generally speaking, while allegations are being investigated, it is not appropriate to inform parents of those allegations. The allegations might prove to be false, may not be substantiated, or there may be insufficient evidence to warrant criminal proceedings. A letter that named the accused person and reports what are no more than allegations has a real potential to be defamatory. As a general rule, the site should not, therefore, inform parents of allegations.

Generally speaking, if there is an occasion when it is necessary to send a letter to parents referring to allegations, for example as a means of managing serious and harmful misinformation, that letter should not name the person against whom the allegations have been made. Legal advice through the sector office should be obtained before sending such a letter. It will be necessary, also, to consult SA Police.

Managing rumour, misinformation and curiosity

In some cases, sites can anticipate that discussion will occur within their parent community once a member of staff has been suspended. It is appropriate that staff be provided with instructions for dealing with potential queries or comments. That instruction should be to refer all inquiries to the site leader.

If an inquirer asks the site leader why the suspended person is no longer at the site, the site leader should give the inquirer an answer that is as neutral as possible and one that does not disclose the nature of the alleged offending. One example of an appropriate answer is 'The person has been suspended. I am sorry I cannot give you any further information at this stage. As soon as I am in a position to do so, I will let you have more information'. If the inquirer persists, the site leader should do no more than state that the person has been suspended because his or her conduct is being investigated by police and more information will be given when the outcome of the police investigation is known.

Staff members should also be instructed to alert the site leader immediately if they become aware of accusations or threats by community members that pose risks to the safety or wellbeing of individuals or the broader site community. The site leader should consult with the sector office and SA Police about the best course of action. In some circumstances, this may prompt the need for a letter to the whole community. However, as stated above, this should occur only through consultation with the sector office and SA Police and legal advice must be sought.

The prompt actions of the site leader and sector office in facilitating all of the actions required in this guideline will help prevent rumour and misinformation in the community.

Stage 2: After accused person has been charged

Informing staff

Following the arrest of a member of staff, the site leader should convene a meeting of staff for the purpose of:

- informing them that a member of staff has been arrested and to name that person and the offence
- informing them of changes to staff required by the absence of the accused person
- informing them that the accused person is not permitted on the site
- asking staff to inform the site leader if the accused person is seen at or near site grounds so that the site leader may take appropriate action
- informing them that, if they have any information that will assist the police investigation, to report that information to police and to the site leader if relevant to the safe operation of the site.
- informing them that if they are contacted by the accused person they should not discuss the allegation.

Staff should also be instructed to keep the matter confidential in order to protect the confidentiality and identity of the victim and also instructed that it is an offence to publish any material identifying the accused person at this stage of the criminal proceedings.

See Section 3.3.2 regarding advice for staff members in managing their contact with or support of the accused person.

If new staff join the site, the site leader should give the same information to those new members of staff. Information should be given to a relieving teacher only if that teacher will be teaching the victim.

If the identity of the victim is known and consent is obtained from the victim or the victim's parents, specific staff members, such as the victim's class teacher or school counsellor, may be told on a confidential basis who the victim is in order to provide appropriate support for him or her.

Informing governing authority

The most suitable means by which to inform the governing authority is at an extraordinary general meeting called for that purpose. The site leader is at liberty to inform members of the governing authority of the same facts as revealed to staff members. Governing authority members should be given the same instructions regarding the requirement to maintain confidentiality and to inform SA Police and the site leader of any information relevant to the safety of the site.

The site leader should also advise the governing authority of parent communications (see below). Wherever practicable, this advice should be given ahead of the communications occurring.

Informing parents

The manner in which information is given to parents and the kind of information given to parents will depend on the result of the risk assessment (see Section 3.3.3).

Particular care must be taken when informing parents of the fact that a staff member has been arrested and charged with an offence. Parents will be advised either by letter, email or at a meeting, as described below.

Letters

As a general rule, the accused person should not be named in the letter to parents. The letter must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable.

There is no one letter that will be suitable for all occasions. With the assistance of the sector office, the site leader will have to prepare a letter suitable to the occasion in question.

Before finalising the contents of the letter with the site leader, the sector office must consult with police as to the timing and content of the letter.

The letter to be sent to parents should have regard for the following five factors:

- the presumption of innocence
- the fact that section 71A of the Evidence Act restricts publication of the name of the alleged offender until committal or 'relevant date' pursuant to section 71A of the Evidence Act. If, contrary to the recommendation in this guideline document, it is decided to name the accused person and, if the letter is to be sent to a large number of parents, advice should be taken as to whether the letter is permitted by section 71A
- the fact that a person who receives the letter might post it on Facebook or another internet site
- the fact that the name of the person alleged to have committed the offence can lawfully be published once that person has been committed for trial or sentence or after the 'relevant date'
- whether a suppression order has been made by a court.

The purpose of a letter is twofold: to inform parents of the fact that a person connected to the site has been charged with a sexual offence and to state whether there is any concern for the safety and welfare of children and young people other than the victim.

The letter should be sent by post or email as per the sector's or site's established process. It should not be sent home with the child or young person. It should not be posted on the site's noticeboard or published in a newsletter. It is strongly recommended against placing these communications on any social media or internet platform.

No other victims

If the result of the risk assessment is that there is no suspicion that there might be other victims, a letter should be sent to all parents at the site stating that fact. The letter should state that a person connected to the site has been arrested and charged with an offence, naming the offence but not naming that person. An example of this type of letter and a list of the topics the letter should contain are set out in Example 1 of Appendix 5.

When a group is identified

If the result of the risk assessment is that there is a group of children or young people who might include victims, two letters should be sent to parents. Neither letter should name the accused person.

The first of these two letters should be sent to the parents of those children or young people in the group in which it is suspected that there might be other victims. It will inform those parents of the fact that a person connected to the site has been arrested and charged with committing an offence, naming the offence but not naming that person. It would inform those parents if a meeting is being called to give information to parents, or if parents are being invited to meet personally with the site leader. At the same time, the letter should not suggest that the children or young people of those parents who received the letter are, in fact, victims.

An example of this type of letter and a list of the topics the letter should contain are set out in the first letter of Example 2 of Appendix 5.

The second letter to be sent should be addressed to all other parents at the site. It will contain essentially the same information as the first letter except that it will state that, while there is no evidence that any child or young person at the site apart from the victim is involved, a group meeting or individual meetings are occurring with parents whose children or young people have been in contact with the accused person. The letter may state that the site is holding such a group meeting and the recipient may attend the meeting if he or she wishes to do so.

An example of this type of letter and a list of the topics the letter should contain are set out in the second letter of Example 2 of Appendix 5.

When a particular group cannot be identified

In those cases where there is a reasonable suspicion of other victims but it is not possible to narrow down the group of children or young people because the accused person has had contact with most of the children or young people at the site, a communication process with all parents must be planned.

It will be necessary for only one letter to be sent to all parents. An example of this type of letter is Example 3 of Appendix 5.

Contact with parents

Where, as a result of the risk assessment, there is a reasonable suspicion that there might be other victims, contact should be made with the parents of those children or young people. Through that contact (eg telephone, individual meetings, group meetings), parents should be given information and instruction that cannot be given in a letter.

The information and instruction provided should deal with such matters as informing parents of the kind of behaviour that is indicative of a child having been the victim of abuse, the appropriate way to provide opportunities for the child or young person to talk about what has been a traumatic experience, and how to support the child or young person and manage the situation. The information and instruction should be directed to the type of offending that had been alleged. It should include a strong message that the parents should be available to their child but not to interrogate him or her.

The discussions should be planned with and attended by a qualified and experienced expert such as a psychologist with experience in assisting children who have been victims of child abuse and who would be able to answer any questions parents might have. The discussions should include giving parents appropriate advice on how to deal with any disclosures made by their child. Parents should be provided with the contact details for the relevant support services.

The site leader may name the accused person and answer any questions parents might have.

The site leader should ask parents to treat the information as confidential. They can be told that publication of the name of the accused person would be in breach of section 71A of the Evidence Act. It is recommended to encourage parents to treat that information as confidential by stating that it is in the interests of the victim and the parents of the victim to keep the matter confidential.

It should be stressed in the discussions that nothing should be said or done that might identify the victim.

Following the discussions, parents should be provided with an information sheet containing information about good parenting practice when dealing with a victim or possible victim of sexual abuse. That document should also include guidance as to how best to respond to a disclosure by a child or young person who has been abused.

The information sheet should also be made available to those parents who cannot or do not wish to attend the site.

Stage 3: After committal (or other relevant date)

After the accused person has been committed to stand trial or been sentenced, or after any other relevant date, there are no restrictions on informing either staff, members of the governing authority or parents of the fact that the accused person has been charged with a sexual offence. Any information given to people in those groups can name the accused person and state the offence with which the accused person has been charged. At this stage, there is no need for confidentiality about any of those facts.

However, if a suppression order has been made, legal advice should be obtained on the question as to whether it is possible to give information to staff, members of the governing authority or parents. It should also be noted that publication of any information that tends to identify a victim may still be prohibited under section 71(A) of the Evidence Act.

Informing parents of previous students

In consultation with the sector office and where appropriate based on the risk assessment undertaken earlier, a site leader should ascertain the names of children or young people who in previous years would have been in contact with the accused person. Having done so, the site leader should send a letter to the parents of those children or young people whose addresses are known or to the young people themselves if they are now adults.

This information should be given to those parents after committal or other relevant date, unless their child is identified during the risk assessment as being at risk of having been abused. They should then be informed in accordance with the procedure in the last part of Stage 2 above.

Informing other sites

Where the accused person has been employed at other education and care sites, the sector office will notify those other sites so that they can consider whether it is necessary to inform parents in the same way as described in Stage 2 above.

Informing other authorities

This responsibility to inform other authorities about changes to the situation and actions taken varies across the three sectors but will include, as appropriate:

- relevant Minister (confirmed in writing)
- relevant Chief Executive/Director
- chairperson of the governing authority
- other education sectors, as per the Intersectoral Information Sharing Protocol
- the Education Standards Board in the case of early childhood and care settings
- any other agency/organisation where risks to children's or young people's safety are identified.

3.3.5 Monitoring court proceedings

The sector office should monitor the court proceedings and inform the site leader of the stage the prosecution has reached. In an independent school, this will be the responsibility of the school principal.

Unless a suppression order has been made, the site leader should inform parents by letter of the fact that the prosecution has reached any of the following stages:

- when a plea of guilty has been made
- at the end of a trial, whether the accused person has been acquitted or convicted
- after the accused person has been sentenced
- after any appeal.

Any letters should be drafted in consultation with the sector office. Before sending any letters, it is necessary to check whether a suppression order has been made.

3.3.6 Responding to the media

All media inquiries should be referred to the relevant sector's media unit or advisor:

- Department for Education: 8226 7904
- Catholic Education SA: 8210 8147
- Association of Independent Schools of South Australia: 8179 1400.

3.3.7 Reporting the outcome

It is desirable to inform the staff, members of the governing authority and parents of the outcome of the criminal proceedings.

If the accused person is acquitted or if the charges against him or her are withdrawn or if the proceedings lapse for any reason, it is essential to inform staff, members of the governing authority and parents of the fact. The letter should be drafted by the sector office and signed by a very senior leader. In an independent school, this will be the responsibility of the school principal.

Should the accused person be acquitted or if the charges against him or her are withdrawn or if the proceedings lapse for any other reason, the sector office or the independent school principal will have to make a number of decisions in relation to the future employment of the accused person. They include:

- whether the accused person will be subject to any disciplinary proceedings under section 26 of the Education Act 1972, or any other sector specific policies or contractual arrangements
- whether the accused person will return to the site where he or she had been employed
- whether the accused person should be employed at another site.

APPENDIX 1: Checklist for site leaders

Note: These steps are not necessarily sequential. Different circumstances will dictate a variation in the sequence of actions. It is assumed site leaders will delegate responsibilities to ensure they are undertaken in a timely fashion. Many of the actions are undertaken under advice from SA Police or the sector office.

1. Attend to immediate welfare needs of victim. (Section 3.2.1) ❑
2. Receive report of allegation and make notes of complaint. (Appendix 3) ❑
3. Call SA Police on 131 444 to report allegations. Obtain appropriate police contact number for parents to use, and seek advice re steps 4, 5 and 6. ❑
4. If SA Police approves, take steps to preserve evidence. (Section 3.2.1) ❑
5. Following SA Police/sector office advice, prevent accused person from having access to children and young people. (Section 3.2.1) ❑
6. Following SA Police advice, contact parents of victim, taking into consideration victim's views. (Section 3.2.1) ❑
7. Notify CARL on 131 478. ❑
8. Inform victim and victim's parents of counselling and support options. Inform social worker if victim is under the Guardianship of the Chief Executive Department for Child Protection. Document allegations, meetings and support and safety plan. (Section 3.3.2 and Appendices 3, 4 and 6) ❑
9. Follow sector reporting procedures regarding critical incidents. (Section 3.2.1) ❑
10. Place accused person on sector specific leave as per sector office guidance. (Section 3.2.2) ❑
11. Consider the support needs of relatives of the accused person who work or are enrolled at the site and who identify their needs. (Section 3.3.2) ❑
12. Consider the support/advice needs of staff, in particular those closely associated with the accused person. (Section 3.3.2) ❑
13. Provide written offer of counselling support to victim and victim's family and formalise the support and safety plan for the victim. (Section 3.3.2 and Appendix 6) ❑
14. Inform staff and governing authority, in consultation with the sector office and in accordance with guideline (Section 3.3.4) ❑
15. Write letters to parents, in consultation with sector office and SA Police, and in accordance with the guideline. (Section 3.3.4 and Appendix 5) ❑
16. If appropriate, hold meeting of parents as outlined in the guideline. (Section 3.3.4) ❑
17. Inform site community, staff and governing authority of progress of the prosecution. This is especially important if there is an acquittal. (Section 3.3.4) ❑
18. Ensure all documentation is stored in a locked, confidential file and copies are provided to sector office as required. (Appendices 3, 4, 5 and 6) ❑

APPENDIX 2: Checklist for sector office

Note: These steps are not necessarily sequential. Different circumstances will dictate a variation in the sequence of actions. The involvement of Association of Independent Schools of South Australia in supporting its independent member schools will be at each individual school's request, however the Association of Independent Schools of South Australia recommends that its member schools adopt this checklist as best practice.

1. Receive the following information from SA Police, as per the Interagency Code of Practice:
   - (a) the name, date of birth and address of the person who has been charged ❑
   - (b) details of the charge and apprehension report ❑
   - (c) the condition upon which the accused person has been bailed ❑
   - (d) the court bailed to and the date of the first court appearance ❑
   - (e) the school or schools involved ❑
   - (f) whether there is a reasonable suspicion that there might be other victims ❑
   - (g) whether there are any complicating factors that would affect disclosure to parents ❑
   - (h) the contact details of the investigating officer ❑
   - (i) whether the offence is a major indictable offence, a minor indictable or a summary offence. ❑
2. Create file and appoint a person to supervise and manage the matter to its conclusion. ❑
3. Assist site leader to manage the immediate placement of the accused person including preventing him/her from having access to children/young people as necessary. ❑
4. Meet reporting obligations to other authorities and information sharing with other sectors/organisations in accordance with the guideline. ❑
5. Inform media unit. ❑
6. Conduct risk assessment drawing on SA Police information and decide whether letter should be sent to parents in accordance with guideline. ❑
7. Determine employment status of accused person. ❑
8. Ensure site leader has met all responsibilities, including notification to CARL and offer of counselling to victim and parents of victim. The offer should be made orally and be confirmed in writing. ❑
9. Assist site leader to support/advise relatives of the accused person, who identify their needs and staff who are friends of the accused person as appropriate. ❑
10. Check that relatives of the accused person who are employed or enrolled at different sites, and who identify their needs are supported as appropriate. ❑
11. Work with site and SA Police to draft letter/s to parents. ❑
12. Consider whether legal advice is needed on letter/s, especially if the matter is complex. ❑
13. Collate notes of site leader and other staff and place copies of these and victim's support and safety plan on central file. ❑
14. Assist site leader and other relevant child health professionals to facilitate a meeting with parents as relevant. ❑
15. Notify parents of children/young people of past years and other sites as relevant. ❑
16. Monitor court proceedings and the existence of suppression orders, and continue to consider the appropriateness of all actions as matters progress or new information comes to light. ❑
17. Inform site leader of the progress of the prosecution, and assist site leader in keeping staff, governing authority members and relevant parents similarly informed. ❑
18. Continue to meet reporting obligations to other authorities. ❑

APPENDIX 3: Record of allegation

Note: The staff member who first received information regarding the allegation must complete this record. It must be stored in a secure, confidential file in the site leader's office.

Record of allegation of sexual misconduct

Name of person making the allegation (complainant)

Date and time that allegation was reported

Age, gender and role of complainant

Name of accused person

Role of accused person

Name of victim (if not the complainant)

Age and gender of victim

Allegation details

Do not interrogate the victim. Complete in direct speech what was reported to you.

Name: (person who received the complaint)

Signature: Date:

APPENDIX 4: Record of meeting

Note: This record should be completed after all meetings or conversations relating to the management of allegations of sexual misconduct by adults and stored in a confidential file.

Date of meeting
Location of meeting
Attendees	Include full names and titles of attendees Example: John Smith Principal, Ms Jones mother of Marcus

APPENDIX 5: Sample letters to parents

Example 1: Where no other victims are suspected

The letter to all parents when there is no suspicion that there might be other victims would deal with the following topics:

1. a statement that the accused person has been arrested and charged but not naming the accused person
2. a statement of the offence with which the accused person has been charged
3. a statement indicating that the site does not suspect that there are other victims
4. an assurance that the Department/Catholic Education SA/Association of Independent Schools of South Australia will keep parents informed
5. a request to keep the matter confidential in order to protect the victim and the victim's family
6. contact numbers of support services for concerned parents
7. a statement that those who have questions or concerns may contact the site leader
8. a statement that the accused person has been removed from the site
9. an assurance that the site is managing the issue without impairing the provision of education and care at the site
10. a request that parents with information that may assist the police investigation to contact police and provision of a contact number.

The letter below uses a teacher as an example of an 'accused person'.

Confidential

Dear Parent/Caregiver

I regret to inform you that a teacher from our school has been arrested by police and charged with [NAME THE OFFENCE].

Police are investigating the matter. The teacher has been suspended from duty pending the outcome of the police investigation and prosecution. The teacher has been instructed not to attend the school. I will keep you informed of the progress of the prosecution.

The information available to the school suggests that there is no need for any concern for any other children at the school.

For the sake of the victim and the victim's family and especially to protect the identity of the victim, please keep this information confidential. I ask you not to distribute this letter, to post it or to display it in any public way including on Facebook or on any other internet site.

If you have any information that may assist the police investigation, please contact [PROVIDE NAME AND TELEPHONE NUMBER OF INVESTIGATING OFFICER].

A relief teacher has been appointed and the classes will proceed as normal.

If you have concerns about the safety and welfare of your child, please feel free to contact me directly at the school. Alternatively, you may seek advice from one of the services below:

- Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services (CAMHS) on 8161 7198
- Kids Helpline on 1800 55 1800.

If you have any questions or concerns, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Yours faithfully
Principal

Example 2: When a group is identified

Where the risk assessment has determined that there is a reasonable suspicion there might be other victims among a group of children or young people who have had contact with the accused person, two letters will be sent.

One letter will be sent to parents of the children or young people who have been identified in the risk assessment process as possible victims.

The other letter will be sent to all other parents at the school.

Both letters will refer to the meetings to be held to give information and instruction to parents. Both letters would deal with the following topics:

1. a statement that the accused person has been arrested and charged but not naming the accused person
2. a statement of the offence with which the accused person has been charged
3. a statement that the accused person has been suspended from duty and directed not to attend the site
4. a statement that a meeting is being called for parents whose children had contact with the accused person, including the purpose of the meeting
5. a statement that there is no evidence at this stage that, apart from the victim, any other child or young person at the site is involved
6. a statement that any parent with information that may assist the investigation should contact police, with provision of contact details of the investigating officer
7. a statement that the site is managing the issue without impairing the provision of education and care at the site
8. a request to keep the matter confidential in order to protect the victim and the victim's family
9. contact numbers of support services for concerned parents
10. a statement that parents who have a concern should contact the site leader or, if the site has one, the school counsellor.

The letters below use a teacher as an example of an 'accused person'. The first letter (to parents of the identified group) can be in the following or similar terms.

Confidential

Dear Parent/Caregiver

I regret to inform you that a teacher from our school has been arrested by police and charged with [NAME THE OFFENCE].

Police are investigating the matter. The teacher has been suspended from duty pending the outcome of the police investigation and prosecution. The teacher has been instructed not to attend the school. I will keep you informed of the progress of the prosecution.

There is no evidence at this stage that any child at the school other than the victim is involved. However, I am concerned about the welfare of those children who have had contact with the teacher. Your child might have had contact with the teacher. I invite you to attend a meeting which will be held at 6.00pm on [INSERT DATE] in the School Hall.

I appreciate that this is short notice but I urge you to attend the meeting. Alternatively, if you are more comfortable meeting with me privately, please contact the school directly.

The meeting will be addressed by a psychologist who has experience working with victims of child abuse. The psychologist will inform you of behavioural signs and possible effects of child abuse and will answer any questions you might have.

For the sake of the victim and the victim's family and especially to protect the identity of the victim, please keep this information confidential. I ask you not to distribute this letter or post this letter on Facebook or on any other internet site.

A relief teacher has been appointed and classes will proceed as normal.

If you have any information that may assist the police investigation, please contact [PROVIDE NAME AND TELEPHONE NUMBER OF INVESTIGATING OFFICER].

Principal

The second letter (the letter to all other parents at the school) can be in the following or similar terms.

Confidential

Dear Parent/Caregiver

I regret to inform you that a teacher from our school has been arrested by police and charged with [NAME THE OFFENCE].

Police are investigating the matter. The teacher has been suspended from duty pending the outcome of the police investigation and prosecution. The teacher has been instructed not to attend the school. I will keep you informed of the progress of the prosecution.

There is no evidence at this stage that any child at the school other than the victim is involved. However, I am concerned about the welfare of some children who have had contact with the teacher and am writing separately to their parents and inviting them to attend a meeting. The meeting will be held at 6.00pm on [INSERT DATE] in the School Hall. If you wish, you may also attend the meeting.

The meeting will be addressed by a psychologist who has experience working with victims of child abuse. The psychologist will inform parents of behavioural signs and possible effects of child abuse and will answer any questions parents might have.

For the sake of the victim and the victim's family and especially to protect the identity of the victim, please keep this information confidential. I ask you not to distribute this letter or post it on Facebook or on any other internet site.

Principal

It might be necessary to adapt each of these letters to the particular circumstances of each case.

Example 3: When a particular group is not identified

When a risk assessment determines that there is a reasonable suspicion of other victims but it is not possible to identify a specific group because all children and young people at the site might have had contact with the accused person, the letter to parents should be in the following or similar terms.

The letter below uses a teacher as an example of an 'accused person'.

There is no evidence at this stage that any child at the school other than the victim is involved. However, I am concerned about the welfare of all children at the school because they have all been in contact with the teacher at one time or another. For that reason, I invite you to attend a meeting to be held at 6.00pm on [INSERT DATE] in the School Hall.

I appreciate that this is short notice but I urge you to attend the meeting.

The meeting will be addressed by a psychologist who has experience working with victims of child abuse. The psychologist will inform you of behavioural signs and possible effects of child abuse and will answer any questions you might have.

APPENDIX 6: Support and safety plan for child/young person

Support and safety plan

Note: The following is a guide to the actions and considerations that should be made in supporting a victim. It should be adapted to the age and needs of the victim.

Support categories	Support strategies	Responsible person/s
Internal support	Who has discussed, as appropriate for age, all features of this plan with the child/young person? Has the child/young person been given full opportunity to share his/her view and has this view been respected to the fullest degree possible? What changes to the child/young person's routine are in place to support him/her? For example: – yard duty arrangements – before/after school – timetable – work expectations (special provisions if year 11/12) – attendance arrangements – site-based counselling support. What is the child/young person advised to do if he/she feels unsafe at any time at the site? For example: – advise yard duty teacher – move to front office – report directly to director/principal – go to counsellor's office – access nominated friend – contact parent/caregiver. Which adult at the site will be available for the child/young person to talk with at any time and act as the 'support person'? How does the child/young person access the support person? What signs of stress in the child/young person will be reported immediately by staff to parents/caregivers? How will this communication be made and by whom? What is the agreed verbal response the child/young person will make to questions from others (eg staff, students, parents, friends)? What information is to be given to other relevant staff who must support the child/young person but for whom it isn't necessary or appropriate that they know the details of the underlying event? For example: – other class teachers – relief staff – yard duty staff – front office staff. Who is responsible for informing other relevant staff? Who will keep the child/young person's support person informed of upcoming events, such as court hearings?

Support categories	Support strategies	Responsible person/s
	How will the child/young person's support person and the parent/caregiver contact person (see below) liaise with each other, if the one staff member does not undertake both roles? Has the child/young person consented to external professionals sharing information with the support person at the site, where relevant to the child/young person's safety and wellbeing?
Parent/caregiver support and liaison	Who has provided parents/caregivers with counselling support services, verbally and in writing? Which staff member is the contact person for parents/caregivers on all matters associated with the support for the child/young person? How can parents/caregivers contact/access this staff member? What actions are being taken at home to help restore the child/young person's sense of safety and wellbeing? Are the actions at the site complementary to the parents/caregivers' actions? What signs of stress in the child/young person will parents/caregivers immediately report to the nominated parent/caregiver contact? Have parents/caregivers given permission for external professionals to share information with the support person at the site, where relevant to their child/young person's safety and wellbeing?
Teaching and learning support	Are there any curriculum issues that need to be addressed? For example: – a proposed teaching plan that must be modified to avoid distress to the child/young person – the introduction of a teaching program in order to reinforce particular behaviour. Have these plans been discussed with other professionals supporting the child/young person?
External support	Which other agencies or professionals are involved with the child/young person or his/her family? What is the nature and length of their support? For example: – How do they liaise with the site? – Have they contributed to the development of this plan/been given a copy? – Have they agreed to liaise with the site? – How is this liaison to occur and through which staff member?
Plan review	When will the plan be reviewed? Who is responsible for setting a review date? How can the site, child/young person or parents/caregivers initiate a meeting outside of the scheduled review? Have parents/caregivers and child/young person been informed of whom they can raise concerns with if they are not happy with the actions of the site in providing support? Do they have the contact details?

Support categories	Support strategies	Responsible person/s
Others with a duty of care	Who else needs to know about the plan? For example: – OSHC/vacation staff – Family Day Care provider – boarding/residential staff. What do the child/young person and parents/caregivers agree will be the information given to these individuals? What is necessary or relevant for them to know in order to follow the plan?
Signatures	The plan is signed by key stakeholders, in particular: – child/young person – parent/caregiver – site leader.

APPENDIX 7: Course of a criminal prosecution

Note: This is a brief overview only of the steps involved in prosecuting a person accused of a criminal offence. A more detailed account can be found in Chapter 3 of the Royal Commission 2012–2013 Report of Independent Education Inquiry. The accused person is called 'the defendant'.

Common to any criminal offences

1. Police investigation

SA Police will investigate alleged crimes that have been reported to them. In the ordinary course of an investigation, police will take statements from the victim/s involved and other witnesses and will interview the defendant. Police need sufficient evidence before the defendant can be prosecuted.

2. Defendant is charged

When the police have reached the stage that they have reasonable cause to suspect that the crime has been committed, they will either arrest and charge the defendant or summons the defendant to appear in the Magistrates Court on a date stated in the summons.

When the defendant has been arrested and charged, he or she will be either remanded in custody or bailed to a date to appear in the Magistrates Court.

3. Classification of the charge

Criminal offences can be classified as summary offences, minor indictable offences and major indictable offences. Generally, summary and minor indictable offences are tried in the Magistrates Court, unless joined with a major indictable offence. Major indictable offences are tried in the District Court and in the Supreme Court.

Summary and minor indictable offences

4. Magistrates Court

The defendant may either plead guilty or not guilty. If he or she pleads guilty, the magistrate will then determine the appropriate penalty.

If the defendant pleads not guilty, the matter will be adjourned for a pre-trial conference. At the pre-trial conference, the magistrate will endeavour to clarify and limit the matters in dispute between the prosecution and the defendant and list the matter for trial on another date. The court may grant such adjournments as are necessary prior to the trial.

A magistrate will conduct the trial and decide whether the defendant is guilty or not guilty. If the magistrate finds the defendant guilty, the magistrate will then determine the appropriate penalty.

The prosecution has a right to appeal against acquittal where the magistrate has made an error of law or fact. A defendant has a right to appeal against his or her conviction, sentence or both. Appeals against a decision made by a magistrate will be heard by a judge of the Supreme Court.

Major indictable offences

5. First appearance in Magistrates Court

Although trials for major indictable offences are heard in either the District Court or the Supreme Court, the first step in the prosecution of a person charged with a major indictable offence is the preliminary examination which is conducted in the Magistrates Court. The purpose of a preliminary examination (or committal hearing) is to determine whether there is sufficient evidence to put the defendant on trial for a major indictable offence.

6. Declarations date

This is the date, usually within ten weeks from the first appearance of the defendant in the Magistrates Court, set for the prosecution to file in court and serve on the defendant the statements of all the witnesses on whom the prosecution relies to establish the guilt of the defendant. Those statements are called 'declarations'.

The court may grant the prosecution more time to obtain declarations. When all the declarations have been filed, the magistrate will set a date, four weeks after the declarations date, for the defendant to answer the charge/s. That date is referred to as the 'answer charge date'.

7. Answer the charge

On the answer charge date, the defendant will be asked to enter a plea. If the plea is guilty, the defendant will be sentenced by the magistrate* or be committed for sentence to the District Court or the Supreme Court.

If the defendant pleads not guilty and the magistrate finds that the prosecution has established a case to answer, the defendant will be committed for trial in the District Court or the Supreme Court.

If the magistrate is not satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to put the defendant on trial, the magistrate will reject the information and discharge the defendant.

8. Arraignment

The first appearance of the defendant in the District Court or the Supreme Court is called the arraignment. That is when the defendant is charged formally. The charge stated on the information is read out and the defendant will be asked to plead guilty or not guilty. The arraignment will be fixed four weeks after the committal.

If the defendant pleads guilty, the matter will usually be adjourned to a later date for submissions to be made as to the appropriate sentence to be ordered against the defendant.

If the defendant pleads not guilty, the matter will be adjourned to a directions hearing which is held four to six weeks after the date of the arraignment.

9. Directions hearing

Directions hearings are held for the purpose of resolving all the procedural matters that must be attended to before the trial begins. Directions hearings also give the judge the opportunity to explore with the prosecution and the defendant whether the matter can be resolved without having to go to trial. If it cannot be resolved, a trial date will be set. The judge will also hear any preliminary applications; for example, an application by the defendant to be tried by a judge alone. Directions hearings involve only the judge, legal counsel and the defendant. It is not uncommon for a number of directions hearings to take place before the trial.

10. Trial

The prosecutor has to present sufficient admissible evidence to the jury (or judge in a 'judge alone' trial) to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the offences with which he or she has been charged. If not, the defendant will be found not guilty.

If the defendant is found guilty, the judge will hear sentencing submissions from both the prosecutor and the defence lawyer and will then sentence the defendant.

When the jury is not able to agree on a verdict ('hung jury'), there will be a re-trial.

Occasionally, a trial may result in a mistrial because some prejudicial event has occurred during the trial. The trial will then start again with a new jury.

The relevant parts of the* Statute Amendment (Courts Efficiency Reforms) Act 2012*, which makes provision for the defendant to be sentenced by a magistrate in certain circumstances, commenced on 1 July 2013.*

11. Appeals

The rights of appeal against a conviction or sentence are a little complicated. Broadly speaking, a defendant has to apply for permission to appeal against the conviction and the sentence. The appeal is heard by the Court of Criminal Appeal (CCA), which comprises three judges of the Supreme Court.

The Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) has no right to appeal against a jury verdict of acquittal. The DPP may, in certain circumstances, apply for permission to appeal against the decision of a judge acquitting a defendant. The DPP may apply for permission to appeal against a sentence that is manifestly inadequate.

Where the CCA allows an appeal against conviction, the conviction will be quashed and the court will either order an acquittal or that the defendant be tried again.

In exceptional circumstances, the High Court of Australia will grant permission to appeal against a decision of the CAA.

This guideline provides advice for leaders in education and care settings when responding to allegations of sexual misconduct by adults against children and young people. It outlines the actions to be taken and matters to be considered at different stages of the response. The guideline is designed to provide a transparent process to help support the people impacted by sexual misconduct incidents.

Appendix H: Methodology used for the calculation of disciplinary process numbers referred to in our report

1 Source data

During our Commission of Inquiry, the State provided us with nine Excel spreadsheet Employment Direction trackers labelled 'ED trackers'.[1] These ED trackers contain department-specific information on disciplinary processes conducted in response to allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct. We used the latest versions of the ED trackers from the three child-facing agencies—Department of Communities, Department of Education and Department of Health—to calculate numbers in relation to the following:

- Suspensions (both since January 2000 and the announcement of our Inquiry in November 2020)
- Preliminary assessments
- Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension (defined by the State as a subset of the overall number of suspensions)
- Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct
- Employment Direction No. 6—Inability.[2]

The ED trackers all included the same information:

- Relevant Agency (Column A)
- Agency's internal reference (Column B)
- Name of alleged perpetrator (Columns C and D)
- Output of Agency (Column E)
- Name of complainant(s) (victim-survivor) (Column F)
- Source of complaint (Column G)
- Date Agency received complaint (Column H)
- Date alleged conduct occurred (Column I)
- Preliminary assessment undertaken (Y/N) (Column J)
- Date of preliminary assessment (Column K)
- Date recommendation of ED4, ED5 or ED6 to Head of Agency (Column L)

- Type of ED—ED4, ED5 or ED6 (Column M)
- Date stood down (Column N)
- Position title (Column O)
- Primary location of employment at time of stand down (Column P)
- Describe process of standing down (Column Q)
- Provide reasons for stand down (Column R)
- Provide terms of stand down (Column S)
- Describe allegation(s) against employee (Column T)
- Action taken or outcomes after stand down (Column U)
- Date of action taken or outcome (Column V)
- Associated actions (for example, referral to Tasmania Police or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme) (Column W)
- Date of associated action (Column X)
- Investigator (Column Y)
- Status (finalised, ongoing) (Column Z).

There were, at times, discrepancies between the data provided to us by the Tasmanian Government through the ED trackers and the numbers provided by Secretaries of the Departments in their evidence and statements, or differences in the methodology adopted to calculate figures.[3] We have highlighted these discrepancies throughout our report as relevant.

2 Suspension numbers from January 2000 to February 2023

We applied the following methodology to determine the number of suspensions that occurred from the period January 2000 to February 2023 by respective department.

2.1 Department of Communities

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Communities.[4] Column 'S' (labelled 'Provide terms of stand down') was filtered to include all cells referencing the terms 'suspended', 'suspension', 'CD8' (which was the predecessor to ED4) or 'ED4', and to exclude all blank cells and cells containing the terms 'NA', 'N/A' or 'alternative duties' as it was unclear whether those entries recorded a suspension.

The number obtained was 23.

To obtain the number of suspensions specifically relevant to out of home care, column 'S' (labelled 'Provide Terms of Stand Down') was filtered to include all cells with references to the terms 'suspended', 'suspension', 'CD8' or 'ED4'. Blank cells and cells containing the terms 'NA', 'N/A' or 'alternative duties' were excluded as it was unclear whether those cells recorded a suspension. Then column 'E' (labelled 'Output of Agency') was filtered to include all cells referencing the terms 'Child Protection', 'Child Safety Services' or 'Rostered Carer and Support Worker', and to exclude all cells referencing the term 'AYDC'.

The number obtained was 4.

2.2 Department of Education

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Education.[5] Column 'S' (labelled 'Provide Terms of Stand Down') was filtered to include all cells referencing the terms 'suspended', 'suspension', 'CD8', 'ED4' or 'remain away from workplace', and to exclude all blank cells and cells containing the terms 'N/A', 'NA', 'RWVP registration suspended' or 'advised of substance allegation, asked to immediately leave workplace' as it was unclear whether those entries recorded a suspension.

The number obtained was 43.

2.3 Department of Health

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Health.[6] Column 'S' (labelled 'Provide Terms of Stand Down') was filtered to include all cells referencing the terms 'suspended', 'suspension' or 'ED4', and to exclude all blank cells, cells containing the term 'N/A', 'NA' and cells where there was no mention of suspension or ED4 as it was unclear whether those entries recorded a suspension.

The number obtained was 26.

Refer to Figure H.1 for a graphical representation of these numbers.

3 Suspension numbers from November 2020 to February 2023

We applied the following methodology to determine the number of suspensions that occurred from the period November 2020 (the date of the announcement of our Inquiry) to February 2023 by respective department.

3.1 Department of Communities

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Communities.[7] Column 'S' (labelled 'Provide Terms of Stand Down') was filtered to include all cells referencing the terms 'suspended', 'suspension', 'CD8' (which was the predecessor to ED4) or 'ED4', and to exclude all blank cells and cells containing the terms 'N/A' 'NA' or 'alternative duties' as it was unclear whether those entries recorded a suspension. Then column 'N' (labelled 'Date Stood Down') was filtered and all dates from November 2020 onwards were selected.

The number obtained was 10.

3.2 Department of Education

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Education.[8] Column 'S' (labelled 'Provide Terms of Stand Down') was filtered to include all cells referencing the terms 'suspended', 'suspension', 'CD8', 'ED4' or 'remain away from workplace', and to exclude blank cells and cells containing the terms 'N/A', 'NA', 'RWVP registration suspended' or 'advised of substance allegation, asked to immediately leave workplace' as it was unclear whether those entries recorded a suspension. Then column 'N' (labelled 'Date Stood Down') was filtered and all dates from November 2020 onwards were selected.

The number obtained was 20.

3.3 Department of Health

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Health.[9] Column 'S' (labelled 'Provide Terms of Stand Down') was filtered to include all cells referencing the terms 'suspended', 'suspension' or 'ED4', and to exclude blank cells, cells containing the term 'N/A', 'NA' and cells where there was no mention of suspension or ED4 as it was unclear whether those entries recorded a suspension. Then column 'N' (labelled 'Date Stood Down') was filtered and all dates from November 2020 onwards were selected. The entry '05/05/2021 Note employee was already stood down for separate matter (not child related)' was included.

The number obtained was 8.

Refer to Figure H.1 for a graphical representation of these numbers.

4 Preliminary assessment numbers

We applied the following methodology to determine the number of preliminary assessments from the period January 2000 to February 2023 by respective department.

4.1 Department of Communities

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Communities.[11] Column 'J' (labelled 'Preliminary assessment undertaken (Y/N)') was filtered to include 'Yes', 'No', 'unknown' and blank cells were excluded.

The number obtained was 24.

4.2 Department of Education

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Education.[12] Column 'J' (labelled 'Preliminary assessment undertaken (Y/N)') was filtered to include 'Y' and 'Yes'. Blank cells, 'NA' and 'N' were excluded.

The number obtained was 48.

4.3 Department of Health

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Health.[13] Column 'J' (labelled 'Preliminary assessment undertaken (Y/N)') was filtered to include anything with 'Y', 'No', 'Pending' and blank cells were excluded.

The number obtained was 9.

5 Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension numbers

We applied the following methodology to determine the number of Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension that were conducted from the period January 2000 to February 2023 by respective department.

5.1 Department of Communities

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Communities.[15] Column M (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6') was filtered to include 'ED4' and 'CD8'. The terms 'N/A' and 'referral for ED4/ED5', 'suspended with pay' without a reference to ED4 or CD8, and blank cells, were excluded.

The number obtained was 19.

5.2 Department of Education

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Education.[16] Column 'M' (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6') was filtered to include 'ED4 suspension', 'ED4', 'ED4/ED5', 'ED4, ED5', 'ED4 & ED5', 'ED4 and ED5', 'ED5 & ED4', 'ED5 and ED4', 'ED5, ED4', 'ED5/ED4'. The terms 'NA' and 'referral for ED4/ED5', and blank cells, were excluded.

The number obtained was 38.

5.3 Department of Health

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Health.[17] Column 'M' (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6)' was filtered to include 'ED4 suspension' or 'ED4' and 'ED4 suspension – pending ED5/5 investigation (not commenced)'. The terms 'N/A', 'Pending', 'Stood down (not suspended)' and 'ED4 not applied', and blank cells, were excluded.

The number obtained was 26.

Figure H.3: Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension numbers by department from January 2000 to February 2023[18]

6 Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct numbers

We applied the following methodology to determine the number of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct that were conducted from the period January 2000 to February 2023 by respective department.

6.1 Department of Communities

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Communities.[19] Column 'M' (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6') was filtered to include 'ED5', 'ED6', 'ED5 investigation' and 'CD5 investigation'. The term 'No CD5 process', and blank cells, were excluded.

The number obtained was 26.

6.2 Department of Education

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Education.[20] Column 'M' (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6') was filtered to include 'Commissioners Direction No. 5', 'Commissioner's Declaration No. 5' , 'ED5', 'CD5', 'ED4/ED5', 'ED4, ED5', 'ED4 & ED5', 'ED4 and ED5', 'ED5 & ED4', 'ED5 and ED4', 'ED5, ED4', 'ED5/ED4'. The terms 'Referral for ED5' and 'NA', and blank cells, were excluded.

The number obtained was 50.

6.3 Department of Health

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Health.[21] Column 'M' (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6') was filtered to include 'ED5' and 'ED5 investigation'. The terms 'pending ED5', 'ED5/6 pending', 'N/A', 'Pending' and 'Stood down' were excluded.

The number obtained was 7.

7 Employment Direction No.6—Inability numbers

We applied the following methodology to determine the number of Employment Direction No. 6—Inability that were conducted from the period January 2000 to February 2023 by respective department.

7.1 Department of Communities

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Communities.[23] Column 'M' (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6') was filtered to include 'ED6'.

The number obtained was 0.

7.2 Department of Education

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Education.[24] Column 'M' (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6') was filtered to include 'ED6'.

The number obtained was 1.

7.3 Department of Health

Analysis was conducted on the most recently provided version of the ED tracker for the Department of Health.[25] Column 'M' (labelled 'Type of ED – ED4, ED5 or ED6') was filtered to include 'ED6'. The term 'ED5/6 pending (not commenced)' was excluded.

The number obtained was 0.
