The way forward: Children in youth detention

1 Introduction

In this chapter, we make recommendations aimed at preventing child sexual abuse in youth detention and improving responses to such abuse when it occurs. Throughout this chapter, we draw on the seven case studies in Chapter 11, which paint a profoundly disturbing picture of youth detention in Tasmania over the past two decades—an institution where some children and young people experienced systematic harm and abuse. The case studies also highlight longstanding and entrenched problems with culture, leadership, staffing, policies and practices in the youth detention system. The Tasmanian Government has been aware of many of these problems for some time.

1.1 Our recommendations

Our recommendations in this chapter are informed by several principles, including the following:

- The most effective way to protect children and young people against the risk of sexual abuse in youth detention is to prevent them entering or re-entering detention—this should be achieved by prioritising strategies that divert children and young people from the youth justice system and from detention.

- To minimise risks to Aboriginal children and young people in detention, their substantial over-representation in detention and in the broader youth justice system must be urgently addressed through strategies underpinned by Aboriginal self-determination.
- Children and young people must be safe in youth detention. The risk of child sexual abuse in youth detention decreases when there is a child safe culture in detention that respects and promotes the rights of children and young people, and for which leadership is accountable.
- For children and young people to be safe in youth detention, staff must also be safe and their wellbeing supported. Staff must have the qualifications, attributes and skills to engage constructively with children and young people in detention. There must be enough staff to deliver a therapeutic model of care to children and young people and avoid lockdowns.
- If a child or young person experiences child sexual abuse in detention, they should feel able to speak up and know they will be listened to. Their complaints must be taken seriously and acted upon without them suffering any reprisal.

We also consider that an effective youth detention system is one that provides children and young people in detention with timely access to high-quality, developmentally appropriate therapeutic supports, education and health care, as well as support to address the underlying causes of their offending. We consider that these features are necessary to reduce reoffending and promote community safety.

We outline our recommendations below. Several of these recommendations will appear familiar from previous reviews of Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the youth justice system (discussed in Chapter 10). Too often these recommendations have been overlooked or implemented without achieving meaningful or enduring change. At other times they have been implemented through short-term initiatives that have later been discontinued.

System reform is urgently needed. We acknowledge that transforming a youth detention system that has been resistant to change over many years is not straightforward. It requires radical cultural change, strong leadership and a long-term commitment from the Government. It may take time, but we consider it is achievable.

Our recommendations include:

- closing Ashley Youth Detention Centre as soon as possible and creating a memorial to victim-survivors who experienced abuse at the Centre
- strengthening leadership in the youth detention system and improving governance arrangements for youth detention

- developing a participation and empowerment strategy for children in youth detention that includes establishing a new advisory group of children, young people and young adults with previous experience of detention
- ensuring staff in youth detention are appropriately qualified, trained and supported to deliver a therapeutic model of care to children in detention, with enough staff to keep children and staff safe
- increasing the minimum age of criminal responsibility to 14 years and working towards increasing the minimum age of detention to 16 years
- increasing opportunities for diversion and bail, and reducing the number of children and young people on remand
- ensuring a collaborative, multidisciplinary approach to meeting the complex needs of children and young people in detention, and providing access to high-quality mental health services and education
- establishing an integrated service for children and young people leaving detention to ensure they have safe and stable accommodation, access to physical and mental health support, and help with accessing education and/or employment after their release
- working with Aboriginal communities to develop an Aboriginal youth justice strategy, co-design new youth justice facilities and ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any replacement facilities are culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people
- establishing a policy framework to understand, prevent and respond to harmful sexual behaviours in detention, and providing access to timely, expert assessment and a range of appropriate, coordinated interventions, including therapeutic interventions
- improving laws, custodial procedures and practices for personal searches of children and young people in detention, isolation and the use of force
- ensuring children in detention, their family members and staff have appropriate mechanisms to raise child safety concerns and make complaints, and that all allegations against staff involving child sexual abuse and related conduct (including grooming and boundary breaches), or inappropriate searches, isolation or use of force are referred to the new Child-Related Incident Management Directorate for investigation and response (recommended in Chapter 6 at Recommendation 6.6)

- establishing an independent community visitor scheme to give children and young people in detention independent, trusted adults to whom they can speak regularly, with whom they can safely and confidently raise concerns, and who will advocate on their behalf (this scheme is also discussed in Chapter 9)
- strengthening and improving monitoring of Tasmania's youth detention system by giving the new Commission for Children and Young People (recommended in Chapter 18 at Recommendation 18.6) responsibility for inspecting detention facilities and monitoring the safety and wellbeing of children and young people in detention.

1.2 Structure of this chapter

This chapter is structured as follows.

Section 2 outlines the Tasmanian Government's proposed youth justice reforms over the next decade; these give important context for our recommendations.

Section 3 considers the legacy of abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and makes recommendations to close the Centre as soon as possible, establish a memorial to victim-survivors who experienced abuse at the Centre, develop a process to preserve historical records relating to children, young people and staff at the Centre, and audit past claims of abuse.

Section 4 examines the culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and considers the changes needed in the areas of leadership, governance, children's participation and staffing to implement a child safe culture in youth detention where the risk of child sexual abuse is minimised.

Section 5 discusses ways to reduce the number of children and young people entering the youth detention system, including remand, so fewer children and young people are exposed to the risk of child sexual abuse in detention, and community safety is better served.

Section 6 focuses on the improvements needed to create an effective, child-focused detention system that meets the complex needs of children and young people in detention, minimises the risks of child sexual abuse and reduces reoffending.

Section 7 makes recommendations to address the over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in detention and strengthen cultural safety in detention facilities, with a view to minimising the risk of sexual abuse for Aboriginal children and young people in detention.

Section 8 focuses on harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention (highlighted in Chapter 11, Case study 2) and makes recommendations to prevent these behaviours and significantly improve responses to them when they occur.

Section 9 examines the laws, standards, policies and procedures that apply to personal searches of children and young people in detention, isolation practices (highlighted in Chapter 11, Case study 3) and the use of force (highlighted in Chapter 11, Case study 4)—practices that sometimes involved or were connected to child sexual abuse.

Section 10 considers channels within the Department for Education, Children and Young People through which children and young people in detention, their families and staff of detention facilities can raise concerns or make complaints about child safety, including child sexual abuse, and the Department's responses to these concerns and complaints.

Section 11 examines independent oversight of the youth detention system and makes recommendations to strengthen independent advocacy for children and young people in detention and systemic monitoring of the youth justice system.

2 The Government's youth justice reform agenda

On 9 September 2021, the then Premier, the Honourable Peter Gutwein MP, announced that Ashley Youth Detention Centre would close 'in around three years' and be replaced by 'two new smaller facilities' because it was 'time for a major systemic change in our youth justice system'.[1] This announcement followed more than a decade of calls from stakeholders to close Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[2]

In August 2022, the Tasmanian Government reaffirmed its commitment to close Ashley Youth Detention Centre by the end of 2024.[3]

On 22 November 2022, the Minister for Education, Children and Youth, the Honourable Roger Jaensch MP, announced the Government's plans for reform of the entire youth justice system, stating that the Government was:

> … determined to build a nation-leading approach that engages at-risk young people early, directs them away from the youth justice system and supports young people who come into conflict with the law to become valued and productive members of our community.[4]

Minister Jaensch stated that, as part of these reforms, the Government would establish new youth justice facilities, including:

- a new statewide detention/remand centre in southern Tasmania that would 'provide intensive intervention and rehabilitation through a therapeutic model of care'
- two assisted bail facilities—one in northern Tasmania or the North West, and one in southern Tasmania—to 'reduce the number of young people remanded to a detention centre'

- two 'supported residential facilities'—one in northern Tasmania or the North West, and one in southern Tasmania—to support 'transition for young people from detention to independence'.[5]

We commend the Tasmanian Government for its decision to close Ashley Youth Detention Centre and for acknowledging the need to reform the youth justice system. We discuss the closure of Ashley Youth Detention Centre in Section 3.1.

In this section, we outline three documents the Tasmanian Government gave us towards the end of our Commission of Inquiry that describe the Government's planned reforms to the youth justice system, including youth detention. We discuss specific elements of these documents throughout this chapter.

2.1 Keeping Kids Safe Plan

In late October 2022, the Tasmanian Government gave us a document titled Keeping Kids Safe: A Plan for Ashley Youth Detention Centre until Its Intended Closure ('Keeping Kids Safe Plan').[6] This document details existing and proposed safeguards for children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

According to the Keeping Kids Safe Plan, existing safeguards include:

- the Children, Youth and Families Practice Manual ('Practice Manual'), which provides 'a comprehensive set' of policies, procedures and practice requirements relevant to custodial youth justice[7]
- the Ashley Youth Detention Centre Practice Framework, which was developed in 2020 to guide therapeutic approaches at the Centre—this framework 'utilises a strengths-based approach to assist in building relationships that foster safety, communication, respect and achievement of goals resulting in healthy children and young people and staff'[8]
- a Learning and Development Framework, which 'sets expectations for learning and skill development of all staff' at the Centre[9]
- upgrades to the Centre's facilities between 2019 and 2022 to increase safety and to effect a therapeutic approach to detaining children and young people[10]
- independent oversight of the Centre by the Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Custodial Inspector.[11]

The Keeping Kids Safe Plan commits the Tasmanian Government to implementing more safeguards through a safety plan comprising 22 actions to meet the following objectives:

1. increasing safety and security for children and young people
2. maintaining an appropriate level of staff with the right experience and competencies

3. delivering a therapeutic service model
4. implementing practice improvements.[12]

A working group will oversee the implementation of actions under the Keeping Kids Safe Plan.[13]

2.2 Draft Youth Justice Blueprint 2022–2032

The Government also gave us its Draft Youth Justice Blueprint 2022–2032: Keeping Children and Young People out of the Youth Justice System ('Draft Youth Justice Blueprint').[14] This document is not yet publicly available, but the Government advised us that it will be finalised after the Government receives our final recommendations.[15] We refer to the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint throughout this chapter as the most current outline of the Government's reform plans for the youth justice system over the next decade.

The overarching goal of the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint is 'to reduce the involvement of children and young people in the youth justice system'.[16] Its key objective is 'to create a contemporary youth justice system' that:

- prevents children and young people's contact with the youth justice system
- addresses offending behaviour
- addresses the over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in the youth justice system
- keeps children and young people in detention safe
- 'supports children and young people to re-enter the community through prosocial pathways'
- improves community safety.[17]

Eight principles underpin the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint. These principles emphasise the importance of children and young people's rights, safety and wellbeing.[18] The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint also notes the need to strengthen connection to family, community and culture for Aboriginal children and young people in the youth justice system and 'includes an increased focus on self-determination of Aboriginal communities'.[19]

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint lists the following five strategies:

1. prioritise prevention and early intervention to reduce engagement with the youth justice system
2. ensure diversion from the justice system is early and lasting
3. establish a therapeutically based criminal justice response for children and young people

4. integrate and connect whole of government and community service systems
5. provide an appropriately trained and supported therapeutic workforce.[20]

It also foreshadows the development of a 'Blueprint Monitoring and Evaluation Plan'.[21]

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint was developed in consultation with government agencies, representatives of Tasmania's Aboriginal communities, the Commissioner for Children and Young People, non-government organisations and children and young people with lived experience of the youth justice system, as well as their families.[22] The Government intends to engage with children and young people and Aboriginal communities to implement the Youth Justice Blueprint.[23]

Several action plans will support the Youth Justice Blueprint.[24] We give an overview of the Draft First Action Plan 2023–2025 ('Draft First Action Plan') in the following section.

2.3 Draft First Action Plan 2023–2025

We received the Department's Draft First Action Plan, produced in January 2023, which is the first in a series of action plans designed to implement the Youth Justice Blueprint.[25]

The Draft First Action Plan aims to deliver seven 'priority' actions by 2025:

1. 'Enhance the safety and therapeutic approach' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre—this action focuses on responding to the public hearings of our Commission of Inquiry.[26]
2. 'Develop and implement a Youth Justice Model of Care' to 'facilitate therapeutic, trauma informed and culturally safe service delivery to improve the wellbeing of children and young people to reduce their involvement in the youth justice system'.[27]
3. Review the Youth Justice Act 1997 ('Youth Justice Act')—this action includes legislative changes to implement the Government's commitment to increase the minimum age of detention from 10 to 14 years.[28]
4. 'Implement a range of diversion, bail support and community-based sentencing options'—this action includes developing a 'Diversionary Services Framework'.[29]
5. 'Design and construct new purpose-built youth justice facilities' to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[30]
6. 'Operationalise' the new youth justice facilities—this action includes defining workforce requirements and recruiting staff.[31]
7. 'Develop and implement an alternative education model'—this action involves designing new approaches to meet the needs of children and young people who are at risk of disengaging from education.[32]

The Department for Education, Children and Young People is the lead agency for all seven actions.[33]

We turn now to our recommendations for reform.

3 Addressing the legacy of abuse

In Chapter 11, Case study 1, we describe what we heard about the nature and extent of abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. While it was not possible for our Commission of Inquiry to test the veracity of every allegation outlined in victim-survivors' accounts, we were struck by the similarities and common themes across these accounts. In Case study 1, we find that, for decades, some children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre experienced systematic harm and abuse—that many children were systematically dehumanised, brutalised and degraded while at the Centre. This finding is based on all the evidence we reviewed—from victim-survivors and their families, current and former Centre staff, senior management in the Department, the many prior reports and investigations into the Centre, allegations made through civil and redress scheme claims, and the insights of relevant experts into organisational misconduct. It is a sobering finding.

Child sexual abuse can have a profound and lasting impact on victim-survivors. Case study 1 describes the devastating ongoing trauma that the abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre has had on victim-survivors' mental and physical health. We heard that many victim-survivors have attempted suicide, experience significant mental health conditions, struggle with addictions to drugs and alcohol, have difficulties forming and maintaining relationships and have been incarcerated during their adult lives.

Child sexual abuse in institutions, particularly at the scale we heard alleged at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, also has a profound effect on the people working in those institutions, who may have been colleagues with those who have offended, or against whom allegations have been made. We discuss the impacts on staff in Section 4.7. In this section, we focus on addressing the impacts of abuse of this scale on children and young people in detention.

As noted in Chapter 11, Case study 1, victim-survivors and their family members told us that they wanted an acknowledgment from the Tasmanian Government about what has happened to them. On 8 November 2022, the Tasmanian Parliament delivered an apology to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in government institutions, in which it:

> Expresse[d] its deep, unreserved sorrow on behalf of all Tasmanians, to all victims/survivors of institutional child sexual abuse and apologise[d] for the pain, suffering and trauma they have endured through previous actions and inactions by those in authority.[34]

The apology did not specifically refer to victim-survivors of abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

It is essential to ensure the systematic harm and abuse that occurred at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, and the pain, suffering and trauma endured by victim-survivors, are not forgotten. In his apology, the Premier, the Honourable Jeremy Rockliff MP, said:

> Over the past eight months throughout this inquiry we have heard about a very, very dark chapter in Tasmania's history. It is a chapter no-one should ever forget. Today we give a solemn undertaking to all Tasmanians to never allow a repeat of this abuse, of the secrecy and the suppression: to never allow a repeat of the failures that allowed such abuse to occur.[35]

In this section, we consider the legacy of abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and recommend that the Tasmanian Government:

- closes the Centre and creates a memorial to victim-survivors who experienced abuse at the Centre
- ensures any person who has previously been detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre is not detained or imprisoned at any new correctional facility on the same site (unless they so choose)
- preserves Ashley Youth Detention Centre records, so they are available for any victim-survivors who may wish to seek redress
- commissions an audit of allegations of child sexual abuse arising through state and national redress schemes, civil claims and complaints to ensure children and young people in detention, out of home care and other institutions are protected against any risks of child sexual abuse.

3.1 Closing Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Victim-survivors told us that Ashley Youth Detention Centre should be closed. One victim-survivor, Fred (a pseudonym), said:

> … just close this place down and start again, because … it's systemic, it's grown in that environment. You won't ever get rid of it by putting in new staff members or changing things: tear the place down and start again, the memories are too—just appalling.[36]

Similarly, Professor Robert White, Emeritus Distinguished Professor of Criminology, University of Tasmania, said:

> I would raze Ashley to the ground. I would destroy the physical infrastructure tomorrow, I wouldn't wait, and we don't have three years of transition: I would get rid of it immediately and transfer the children to other places, houses, secure houses or whatever, but I would certainly knock it down.[37]

As noted in Section 2, the Tasmanian Government has previously announced its intention to close Ashley Youth Detention Centre by the end of 2024. On 13 July 2023, Minister Jaensch cast doubt on this closure date. In evidence to a parliamentary inquiry on adult imprisonment and youth detention, the Minister said:

> When we announced our intention to not just replace Ashley with two smaller Ashleys, we also then realised that delivering this more sophisticated, better-practice model may take more time and so whilst we have remained committed to the ambition of closing Ashley as soon as possible, and 2024 is the date that was announced, we believe that is going to need to be updated. Now, what I do not want to do is to issue another political deadline. What I want to do, as soon as possible, and I hope to be able to do in coming months, is once we have confirmed the preferred site for the development of the southern detention facility, which is a critical component of the new facilities delivery model, once we have an actual site that we have locked in, then we can conduct the remaining site investigations, planning and design processes, then we will know how much it will cost and how long it will take to build that and my next step, in terms of clarifying time frames, will be to provide a firm, actual time frame based on those investigations, so I hope to do that in coming months.[38]

While we acknowledge the Government's restated commitment to closing Ashley Youth Detention Centre, we are gravely concerned by any suggestion of further delay. The Government must close Ashley Youth Detention Centre as soon as possible. We discuss the future use of the site in Section 3.3.

Recommendation 12.1

The Tasmanian Government should close Ashley Youth Detention Centre as soon as possible.

3.2 Creating a memorial to victim-survivors

As discussed in Chapter 15, child sexual abuse can constitute a collective trauma event, requiring a response that promotes community care and the restoration of trust. In acknowledging past wrongs and suffering, and providing space for grief, healing and remembrance, a memorial can be an important part of the response to such an event. The National Royal Commission observed that:

> Memorials can provide symbolic reparation and public recognition to victims and survivors in ways that can contribute to healing. Memorials honour those who have suffered and provide opportunities to remember the past and think about the future. They provide a specific place for families and wider society to reflect on the trauma > of survivors and mourn the victims lost. They may also serve to educate future generations about what occurred in a society's history and provide a space for public awareness and remembrance.[39]

The National Royal Commission recommended that the Australian Government commission a national memorial for victims and survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts to be located in Canberra and designed in consultation with victim-survivors.[40] A design for the national memorial was selected in January 2022.[41]

Memorials to victim-survivors of abuse have also been recommended in international inquiries on institutional child abuse, including inquiries in Ireland and Jersey.[42] In recommending a memorial to victim-survivors of child abuse in institutions, the Irish Commission to Inquire into Child Abuse said in 2009:

> It is important for the alleviation of the effects of childhood abuse that the State's formal recognition of the abuse that occurred and the suffering of the victims should be preserved in a permanent place …[43]

The Irish inquiry also recommended that the following words of apology be inscribed on the memorial:

> On behalf of the State and of all citizens of the State, the Government wishes to make a sincere and long overdue apology to the victims of childhood abuse, for our collective failure to intervene, to detect their pain, to come to their rescue.[44]

In 2017, the Independent Jersey Care Inquiry recommended 'some form of tangible public acknowledgment' for victim-survivors to 'allow experiences of those generations of Jersey children whose lives and suffering worsened because of failures in the care system to be respected and honoured in decades to come'.[45] That inquiry recommended that the form of this acknowledgment consider the views of victim-survivors.[46]

As noted, we heard that victim-survivors and their families wanted an acknowledgment of abuse that occurred at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and its devastating effects. As part of its apology to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutions, and in recognition of the protracted, widespread and systematic nature of the abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, we recommend that the Tasmanian Government creates a memorial to victim-survivors who experienced abuse at the Centre.

The Government should consult with victim-survivors to determine the form and location of the memorial—for example, a memorial garden could be established on part of the site, similar to the one established in memory of the 1996 Port Arthur massacre.[47] While we acknowledge the Government's plans to redevelop the Ashley Youth Detention Centre site (discussed in Section 3.3), we do not consider that this precludes creating a memorial at the site.

Once Ashley Youth Detention Centre is closed, the Tasmanian Government should establish a memorial to victim-survivors who experienced abuse at the Centre. The form and location of the memorial should be decided in consultation with victim-survivors of abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

3.3 Future use of the site—avoiding further trauma

In December 2021, the Honourable Elise Archer MP, Attorney-General and Minister for Corrections, released a statement indicating that the Department of Justice would begin a community consultation process to learn the views of the local community on the future use of the Ashley Youth Detention Centre site.[48] This statement revealed that an initial evaluation indicated the site would be 'well suited for a modern, state-of-the art correctional facility in Northern Tasmania with a rehabilitative focus'.[49] According to the Minister, the proposed correctional facility project would 'create jobs and investment in the North'.[50]

The Department of Justice is currently undertaking 'due diligence investigations required as part of the normal statutory planning process' for redeveloping the Ashley Youth Detention Centre site.[51] In particular, the Department of Justice has engaged 'social planning consultants' to prepare a social impact assessment for the project—this includes 'investigating issues raised by the community and … recommend[ing] ways to minimise potential impacts'.[52] At the time of writing, the Government had not published this assessment.

The community consultation undertaken by the Department of Justice in 2022 on the future use of the Ashley Youth Detention Centre site does not appear to have specifically sought the views of those who had previously been detained at the Centre.[53]

Victim-survivor Simon (a pseudonym) described his concerns at the prospect of converting the Ashley Youth Detention Centre facilities into a prison:

> Ashley shouldn't be put into a jail. What about people with memories, they're going to lay their head down and think they've been abused, you know what I mean?[54]

Media reports also indicate that some community members opposed the plan for a northern correctional facility at the Ashley Youth Detention Centre site during a consultation session held in February 2023.[55]

We are concerned by the Tasmanian Government's plans to turn the Ashley Youth Detention Centre site into an adult correctional facility. As discussed in Section 5.1.1, many children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre go on to serve a term of imprisonment in an adult prison. We are therefore concerned that victim-survivors of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre may, as adults, be sent to an adult prison located on the site where that abuse occurred. As Simon indicated, this is likely to be retraumatising.

For these reasons we recommend that the Tasmanian Government ensures no person who has previously been detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre be remanded or imprisoned at any adult correctional facility at the same site, unless they so choose—for example, to be close to family.

Recommendation 12.3

The Tasmanian Government should ensure no person who has been detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre is detained or imprisoned in any redeveloped facility at the same site unless the person expresses a preference for this to occur.

3.4 Preserving Ashley Youth Detention Centre records

As discussed in Chapter 17 on civil litigation and redress, records are critically important to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse because they can offer important corroborative evidence for redress claims and help victim-survivors understand their past experiences.[56] Records can also provide an important evidentiary basis for initiating criminal or disciplinary proceedings. Inadequate records and record keeping contribute to failures in identifying and responding to risks and incidents of child sexual abuse, and exacerbate distress for victim-survivors.[57]

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 7, we heard that record keeping at Ashley Youth Detention Centre was deficient. In particular, we heard that records at the Centre were 'hard copy' rather than electronic and were stored in various locations at the Centre, including cabinets, unlabelled boxes and 'random places'.[58] Stuart Watson, Manager, Custodial Youth Justice ('Centre Manager'), told us that, in 2020, '[t]here was an entire room the size of a garage full of paper files that went back for years and years and years' in the 'Training Cottage' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[59] He indicated that these records and others had since been sent to 'central archiving' for electronic filing.[60]

Mr Watson also told us that '[t]here just wasn't easily accessible information and people didn't know where information was', suggesting that records at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were not filed, indexed, catalogued or archived appropriately.[61] We heard that some items, such as 'photographs, maps and rosters', may not have been understood to be official records and were therefore not filed appropriately.[62] The Department advised us that it lacked documented policies and procedures for record keeping.[63]

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 7, we heard that the Department's poor record-keeping practices contributed to delays in responding to allegations of child sexual abuse.[64] In particular, we heard that, because records had not been catalogued or indexed, accessing relevant information to establish facts, timeframes and key events relating to allegations—for example, to determine whether a person was employed at Ashley Youth Detention Centre at the time of the alleged abuse—was time-consuming and labour-intensive.[65]

Deficiencies in record keeping also meant that victim-survivors experienced difficulties and delays in obtaining their records from Ashley Youth Detention Centre, which caused distress, trauma, pain and frustration.[66]

The Department acknowledged the poor quality of its record keeping, stating that incident-recording processes at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were 'likely to have been unreliable for some of the period from 2002–2020'.[67]

In May 2021, the former Department of Communities initiated the Records Digitisation and Remediation Project to centralise historical records, with an initial focus on Ashley Youth Detention Centre records.[68] According to the 'Project Initiation Document', '[i]nitially, the intent was simply to digitise all hard copy holdings, including those at the Archives office of Tasmania and with off-site storage holders'.[69] However, early work revealed more than 8,000 boxes and 150,000 hard copy records, with 'a large variety and volume of documents in formats that are difficult to digitise and impossible to render text searchable', which led to the project's scope being refined.[70]

The objective of the refined project was to ensure the Department could 'access its historical records and meet its obligations to the Commission of Inquiry, National Redress [Scheme], victims, and the community'.[71] Its scope was described as '[s]canning and remediation of relevant or potentially relevant records from 1 January 2000 or relating to alleged incidents lodged after 1 January 2000'.[72] Key outputs of the project were described as digitising hard copy records and remediating legacy electronic or hard copy records that were 'potentially of interest to the Commission of Inquiry or immediately relevant to information requests which have been received'.[73]

According to the National Royal Commission, '[d]igitising archival records can be expected to increase search ability and reduce risk of loss', but 'digital technology also presents new challenges and risks, including costs of upkeep and updating, corruption and security of files and technological obsolescence'.[74]

We commend the Department's Records Digitisation and Remediation Project and acknowledge the enormity of the task. However, it is not clear to us that the Department has digitised all necessary records. In particular, we note that the project does not include records created before 2000. Also, while we appreciate the need to focus on responding to our Commission of Inquiry and to other information requests received by the Department, we are concerned that important information in other records potentially relevant to future claims from victim-survivors may not have been captured. We are also unaware of what active steps are being taken to preserve records relating to children and young people in out of home care, some of whom may also have experienced youth detention.[75]

It is also not clear to us what the Department's plans are for retaining and maintaining the physical records it has digitised. Some physical records may hold tremendous personal significance for victim-survivors of abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. However, we also recognise that adequately maintaining large volumes of physical records for extended periods may be impractical for the Department. Physical files require storage in appropriate conditions to prevent damage or destruction (for example, by fire, floods or vermin).[76] The National Royal Commission indicated that '[n]ot all records are, or should be, archived and retained in perpetuity, and it may be appropriate that certain records be destroyed'.[77]

In line with the National Royal Commission's recommended principle for maintaining records, the Department should, at a minimum, ensure its records are:

> … up to date; indexed in a logical manner that facilitates easy location, retrieval and association of related information; and preserved in a suitable physical or digital environment that ensures the records are not subject to degradation, loss, alteration or corruption.[78]

More specifically, the Department must ensure it keeps records that may be relevant to future allegations of child sexual abuse. As outlined in Chapter 17, the National Royal Commission recommended that the National Archives of Australia and state and territory public records authorities guide government and non-government institutions on identifying records that, it is reasonable to expect, may become relevant to an actual or alleged incident of child sexual abuse, and on retaining and disposing of such records.[79]

In response to this recommendation, the Tasmanian Office of the State Archivist has outlined, for various institutions, the types of records 'that may become relevant for National Redress Scheme applicants, or for people taking legal action for abuse suffered when they were children'.[80] For youth justice, these records are:

- 'Youth offender case files, including investigations, prosecution, sentencing etc'
- 'Records of a youth offender's location, including custodial arrangements, community service activities and transport'
- 'Complaints and grievances'
- 'Records of at-risk youths'
- 'Restorative justice services to child victims of crime'.[81]

While these descriptions are broad, we consider that there are other records such as staff rosters and the daily roll that may include important information relevant to allegations of child sexual abuse in youth detention.

We recommend that the Department for Education, Children and Young People build on its Records Digitisation and Remediation Project by working with the Office of the State Archivist to establish an approach to preserving historical records relevant to children and young people and staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. A similar approach should be taken for records about other children in state care, including children in out of home care, as well as staff and carers connected with state care.

Managing this material will enable the Department to make all necessary reports to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme (this is discussed in Section 3.5).

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should work with the Office of the State Archivist to:

a. establish a process to identify, recover, restore, collate, digitise, index and catalogue all historical records relating to children and young people and staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, and all other children in, or staff or carers connected with, state care

b. ensure digitised records are searchable, retrievable, secure and protected against corruption or loss

c. determine which physical records should be retained following digitisation, and maintain these physical records in line with the National Royal Commission's record-keeping principles

d. determine protocols and guidance on how people who have been detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre can access their records.

3.5 Undertaking an audit of allegations

The Tasmanian Government holds substantial information about allegations of child sexual abuse by current and former staff of Ashley Youth Detention Centre. As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 1, this information arises from:

- claims made under the Abuse in State Care Program, which the Tasmanian Government ran between 2003 and 2013

- claims made under the Abuse in State Care Support Service, which the Tasmanian Government has run since 2013
- applications under the National Redress Scheme, run by the Australian Government since 2018
- civil claims made against the Tasmanian Government in respect of vicarious liability for the conduct of its staff, or liability for failing to protect a child from abuse
- complaints and allegations received by the Government directly from children and young people who are or were detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, or from others with knowledge of alleged abuse at the Centre
- sworn statements to our Commission of Inquiry from lived experience witnesses who were detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

A significant number of allegations made in claims under the Abuse in State Care Program also concerned abuse by staff and carers in the out of home care system.[82] This is discussed in Chapter 8. There were also claims made about abuse in other state institutions, including hospitals and religious organisations.[83] Claims under the Abuse in State Care Support Service and the National Redress Scheme and civil claims may also relate to staff and carers in the out of home care system and other state institutions.

As highlighted by Chapter 11, Case study 7, claims made through all these schemes provide important information for a number of state agencies to perform their functions in protecting children. This includes Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.

It is essential that the Department has processes in place to assess this information and to identify and act on any ongoing risks that may be posed by those who are the subject of allegations. We heard that the Government has previously taken steps to review allegations of child sexual abuse for these purposes. These are discussed in the following sections.

3.5.1 The 2020 'cross-check' review

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 7, the former Department of Communities undertook a review from September to November 2020 to crosscheck the names of alleged abusers identified in claims under the Abuse in State Care Program with current employees who had been working at Ashley Youth Detention Centre before 2010.[84] The review also identified what actions may have been taken where an employee had been named in an Abuse in State Care Program claim.[85]

The primary purpose of the review was to identify current staff who had been named in Abuse in State Care Program claims. The review did not cover all sources of information held by the Department. In particular:

- The review was limited to Abuse in State Care Program records and did not extend to allegations raised through the Abuse in State Care Support Service.[86]
- The Department limited its analysis to current employees who had been working at Ashley Youth Detention Centre before 2010. However, the Abuse in State Care Program ran until 2013 and the Department provided us with a spreadsheet indicating that the period of abuse that was raised in Abuse in State Care Program records spanned from 1995 to 2013.[87] This suggests there may have been current staff employed after 2010 who were not captured by the crosschecking exercise, and complainants may have raised allegations against staff members in respect of conduct that occurred between 2010 and 2013.
- The review did not include applications under the National Redress Scheme or civil claims.

It also did not consider out of home care system staff or carers, or staff in other government institutions.[88]

In September 2020, the Department identified that 127 Abuse in State Care Program claims had been made against Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff members (some of whom were named on multiple occasions) and that two current employees had been named as alleged abusers by multiple complainants.[89] While we understand that this review concluded in November 2020, it is unclear to us what more information was uncovered during this time.[90] Former Department Secretary Michael Pervan told us the review ultimately resulted in the identification of four current employees named in Abuse in State Care Program claims.[91]

3.5.2 The 2020 spreadsheet

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 7, in October 2020, a spreadsheet was prepared and circulated to various people in the Department that contained a list of all Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff named in the Abuse in State Care Program, the National Redress Scheme and in common law (civil) claims.[92]

We heard that the spreadsheet was then expanded to include allegations from information received from various sources about any alleged sexual, physical or emotional abuse, with the Department for Education, Children and Young People telling us the aim of the spreadsheet was to 'centralise all complaints/allegations to assist in identifying trends, patterns and cumulative allegations'.[93] The information sources included:

- allegations from the Abuse in State Care Program against Ashley Youth Detention Centre employees and from the Abuse in State Care Support Service where these were referenced in a National Redress Investigation Report

- National Redress Scheme applications and common law negligence claims (where there was an allegation against an Ashley Youth Detention Centre employee, Ashley Youth Detention Centre detainee or out of home care foster carer)
- allegations made directly through Ashley Youth Detention Centre (for example, historical records of detainee complaints made directly to Centre management or through the Ombudsman)
- a complaint made about an Ashley Youth Detention Centre employee that was made to the Children, Youth and Families Complaints Officer.[94]

We note that the source material for the spreadsheet did not include:

- all Abuse in State Care Program claims
- claims under the Abuse in State Care Support Service unless they were referred to in a National Redress Scheme Investigation Report
- claims under the National Redress Scheme or civil claims about staff in other government institutions.

We heard that the spreadsheet was held and maintained by the Department's Legal Services directorate.[95] The legal team performed checks through the online Government Directory Service to establish whether a particular person was still employed in the State Service, although concerns were raised that this was not a robust checking mechanism.[96] The Department indicated that discussions occurred between Mandy Clarke, former Deputy Secretary, Children, Youth and Families, and others about the employee status of those named in the spreadsheet.[97]

The Department also told us, in January 2023, that the Tasmanian Government and the Department were 'actively considering these issues and [would] work collaboratively to ensure that any risk to children is minimised'.[98]

Given the scope of these reviews and the variable exclusions in each, it appears the Department may not have identified all relevant allegations.

3.5.3 Child Sexual Abuse Joint Review Team

The Tasmanian Government set up the Child Sexual Abuse Joint Review Team in February 2021.[99] This team was tasked with 'conducting a multi-agency review to look for potential perpetrators from where there may be multiple information reports or references relating to an individual'.[100] An objective of this review was 'to identify potential child sex offenders in the community with a view to ensuring all avenues of investigation are exhausted so that offenders can be brought to justice'.[101] The Child Sexual Abuse Joint Review Team was led by Tasmania Police and overseen by a high-level steering committee.[102]

This review relied on data from the police intelligence database ('Atlas'), the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People database and the former Department of Communities Child Protection Information System and Children's Advice and Referral Digital Interface.[103] The review 'did not use a list of Officials from Ashley Youth Detention Centre as a base data set in the data matching work that was undertaken'.[104]

Jonathan Higgins APM, then Assistant Commissioner of Operations, Tasmania Police, told us the Child Sexual Abuse Joint Review Team's data-matching work involved comparing data and:

> ... where two or three point matches were identified, the information was reviewed. Reviews may have included individuals who were Officials from Ashley Youth Detention Centre however search parameters did not specifically target those individuals.[105]

Assistant Commissioner Higgins also stated that the Child Sexual Abuse Joint Review Team was not given separate material in respect of the Abuse in State Care Program.[106] As such, the Child Sexual Abuse Joint Review Team did not capture all relevant information pertaining to allegations of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre or in out of home care (or, indeed, across government institutions).

Former Commissioner of Police Darren Hine AO APM told us the Child Sexual Abuse Joint Review Team reviewed 136,000 people who were registered to work with vulnerable people in Tasmania and 'did not identify children at current risk due to Tasmania Police or Department of Communities inaction at a point in time'.[107]

3.5.4 Process for notifying relevant agencies

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 7, when the Tasmanian Government receives allegations of child sexual abuse, it is obligated to notify various authorities, including Tasmania Police (about suspected criminal conduct) and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme (about 'reportable behaviour' under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013).[108]

The former Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, Peter Graham, told us that 'a systemic review of past complaints or investigations' would likely reveal information that meets the definition of 'reportable behaviour'.[109] Notifying the Registrar of allegations that may constitute reportable behaviour is essential, so the Registrar can take appropriate action in respect of people who hold current registrations to work with children and young people.

There are also mandatory reporting obligations to report to Child Safety Services under sections 13 and 14 of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ('Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act') where there is a risk of child abuse or neglect.

In addition, a notification may be required to the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 ('Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act') about a 'reportable allegation'.[110] A 'reportable allegation' is information that leads a person to form a reasonable suspicion that a worker of a relevant entity (including a youth detention facility) has committed 'reportable conduct' (including sexual misconduct), regardless of whether the alleged conduct occurred before the commencement of the Act.[111] The Reportable Conduct Scheme is discussed in detail in Chapter 18.

We are concerned that notifications to authorities have not always occurred in a timely manner for allegations in National Redress Scheme applications. In Chapter 11, Case study 7, we find that:

- the Department of Justice does not have an appropriate process to ensure information in National Redress Scheme applications is shared in a timely manner to protect children
- the Department of Communities did not take appropriate steps to make appropriate notifications
- Tasmania Police should improve its information-sharing and referral practices to ensure other agencies (including Child Safety Services and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme) receive information, where appropriate, to enable those agencies to take steps to protect the safety of detainees.

The National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth) permits the disclosure of 'protected information' obtained by a government institution if required for the enforcement of criminal law, the safety or wellbeing of children, or investigatory, disciplinary or employment processes related to the safety or wellbeing of children (among other purposes).[112] This enables government institutions (such as the Department of Justice) to comply with mandatory reporting legislation and reportable conduct schemes.[113]

Within the Tasmanian Government, the Department of Justice is often the first recipient of information about National Redress Scheme applications and the holder of the most complete information from those applications available to the Government.

As outlined in Chapter 17 and Chapter 11, Case study 7, the Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit in the Department of Justice coordinates the Tasmanian Government's response to National Redress Scheme applications.[114] Ginna Webster, Secretary, Department of Justice, told us that when the National Redress Scheme Operator identifies the Tasmanian Government as potentially responsible for the alleged abuse, the Operator notifies the Tasmanian Government of the application and gives it a limited time in which to provide necessary information in response.[115]

The Government told us the Department of Justice does not receive the full application from the National Redress Scheme Operator; rather, it receives 'redacted and curated components of the application'.[116]

In June 2022, Secretary Webster told us that the Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit summarises the application and sends the relevant department a 'National Redress Scheme – Request for Information' form, which includes the summary of the application and requests a records search.[117] The form has questions about whether the department holds records that document the abuse, whether there are any records of a prior payment to the complainant (for example, an ex gratia payment) and whether there are records that show the alleged abuser is still a government employee or working in a child-related activity.

Secretary Webster told us:

> In referrals to an Agency/agencies, [the Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit] include[s] details of the alleged abuser to enable the Agency to undertake enquiries as to whether the abuser is a current employee or a continuing risk to children. If the abuser is identified and remains affiliated with the Agency the matter is dealt with through the Agency's own internal policies.[118]

The summary of the National Redress Scheme application that is prepared by the Department of Justice's Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit and provided to the relevant department may contain insufficient details for that department to identify whether an allegation involves suspected criminal conduct or reportable behaviour. This includes where there is a lack of sufficient detail within the initial National Redress Scheme application.

In July 2023, the Government told us that, from mid-late 2020, the Department of Justice changed its practice and started providing departments with the 'full' National Redress Scheme application that it receives from the National Redress Scheme Operator, rather than a summary.[119] The Government also told us that, in January 2021, the Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit undertook an audit of National Redress Scheme applications received to date and agency responses 'to ensure all details were matched'.[120] We welcome these initiatives.

In response to our question as to what action the Tasmanian Government takes in relation to information acquired during the National Redress Scheme process beyond responding to the individual application (for example, reporting to Tasmania Police), Secretary Webster told us:[121]

> The Department [of Justice] does not use the information obtained through redress applications for any purpose outside responding to the [National Redress] Scheme Operator save for reporting on de-identified figures in annual reports.[122]

The Government told us that the National Redress Scheme is responsible for reporting to Australian law enforcement agencies.[123] According to the National Redress Scheme's Operational Manual for Participating Institutions, the National Redress Scheme reports child abuse to police where the applicant consents to such a report being made.[124] Consent is sought '[d]uring initial contact with the applicant or at any other relevant time during the assessment process'.[125]

In addition, the National Redress Scheme reports child abuse to police, regardless of the applicant's wishes, where:

- the applicant is under the age of 18 years
- the abuse occurred in the last 10 years
- there is any other reason that children may be at risk of being abused
- the alleged abuser is still working with children, or
- the alleged abuser has their own children.[126]

We note that whether the alleged abuser is still working with children, or there is any other reason that children may be at risk of being abused, are matters that the relevant jurisdiction may be better placed to identify than the National Redress Scheme Operator. This means that, often, the Operator will not have reported to Tasmania Police when the Tasmanian Government is aware of these risks and could make a report.

The Government told us that requiring the Department of Justice to report to Tasmania Police based on the information it receives from the National Redress Scheme Operator would be 'ineffectual' because:

> the Department could only provide the information that it received from the [National Redress Scheme]—information that Tasmania Police should already [be] in possession of, and likely have been in possession of, for an extended period (that is, several months).[127]

The Government also told us that requiring the Department of Justice to notify Child Safety Services or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme of information from National Redress Scheme applications 'would have no impact at all as those entities are already in receipt of that information' following mandatory reporting triggered by the entry of allegations from the National Redress Scheme into Tasmania Police's intelligence system.[128] The Government said:

> Tasmania Police provides a broader capacity [than the Department of Justice] for the management of intelligence information (and has data arrangements with the registrar for registered persons).[129]

However, we note that the system for notifying police and other relevant authorities of information in National Redress Scheme applications has not always operated in the manner described by the Government. For example, in some cases we examined, the Department of Communities reported allegations from National Redress Scheme applications to Tasmania Police before Tasmania Police received the information from the National Redress Scheme Operator (refer to Case study 7).[130] We are not confident that the information-sharing framework for the National Redress Scheme is operating as intended.

We are also concerned that relying on other departments (such as the Department for Education, Children and Young People) to make appropriate notifications to relevant authorities may result in delay, which may create unnecessary risks to children and young people in institutions where alleged abusers may be currently employed or engaged, participate in sporting and social clubs with children, or have access to children in a familial context.

We understand the informational constraints under which the Department of Justice receives National Redress Scheme applications from the National Redress Scheme Operator. However, we consider that the Department of Justice should undertake its own reporting from the National Redress Scheme materials it receives (refer to Recommendation 12.5). This reporting should be additional to the existing reporting obligations of the National Redress Scheme Operator and others, and should not be limited by the possibility of duplicate reporting by other entities.[131] Such reporting should occur when the information received by the Department of Justice is, on its face, sufficient to meet established reporting thresholds.

3.5.5 Our recommendations

While we commend the Tasmanian Government for its attempts to review allegations of child sexual abuse among its various information holdings, the preceding discussion highlights that these reviews have not been comprehensive. We also heard that not all departments or agencies have undertaken such reviews.[132] As a result, we are concerned that there may still be people working with children who are the subject of child sexual abuse allegations.

This highlights the need for a comprehensive historical audit of all relevant records held by the Government to identify all allegations of child abuse, including child sexual abuse. Relevant records for the purposes of this audit should be claims made under the Abuse in State Care Program, the Abuse in State Care Support Service and the National Redress Scheme, and civil claims or complaints in relation to Ashley Youth Detention Centre or the out of home care system.

The purpose of the audit should be to identify all current and former staff in government institutions and carers in the out of home care system, so the Government can take steps to report to external authorities all information relating to current and former staff and carers, and consider disciplinary action for current staff members as well as prioritise the safety of children. This audit is critical to ensuring the safety of children and young people in detention and out of home care.

The audit should be conducted by a person with appropriate experience, legal standing, seniority and no conflict of interest. This may mean appointing a person or body external to government. The person who conducts the audit should be given full access to all necessary systems and information.

Information obtained from the audit on individuals who are the subject of allegations of child sexual abuse should be captured in a single, central location. Secretary Pervan said the Department generally does not track allegations that are not made directly to it because information received through redress schemes and civil claims are not kept on employee files. He noted that this is an area for reform and improvement.[133]

In Chapter 20 on State Service disciplinary processes, we recommend that the Government maintains a central cross-government register of misconduct concerning allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct (Recommendation 20.9). This register should contain records of substantiated and unsubstantiated matters, including those that did not proceed to investigation. We consider that information from the audit should be added to this register.

The Government also needs to ensure any reportable behaviour identified through the audit is reported to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and Child Safety Services, any suspected criminal behaviour is reported to Tasmania Police and any reportable conduct is reported to the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme, so those agencies can take appropriate action.

The Government should also establish processes to monitor and manage allegations arising from future redress claims. In Chapter 17, we recommend that the Tasmanian Government advocates at a national level for the National Redress Scheme to apply to child sexual abuse in institutions experienced on or after 1 July 2018, and, if such an extension does not occur, that the Tasmanian Government itself establishes a redress scheme for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions (Recommendation 17.1).

We consider that the Department of Justice should ensure it meets its obligations to make appropriate notifications to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme (despite the fact that the Department of Justice may not be the head of the relevant entity under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act).

To assist other departments to identify alleged abusers who may still be working with children, and to take appropriate disciplinary action and make appropriate reports, the Department of Justice should continue to pass on full details of National Redress Scheme applications to other departments, rather than a summary.

In addition, the Government should advocate nationally for a review of the information-sharing framework in the National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth) and the National Redress Scheme's Operational Manual for Participating Institutions to ensure information about current risks to children is reported to relevant authorities in the most timely manner and by the most appropriate entity, and to identify the most appropriate point in the process for the National Redress Scheme Operator to seek consent from applicants to share information with relevant authorities.

The Government should also make appropriate supports available to victim-survivors who disclose abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and who come to its attention through any State-based redress scheme, civil claim or complaint. These supports should include warm referrals, with permission, to sexual assault counsellors who have training and experience in working with victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. Warm referrals involve personally assisting victim-survivors to access a service rather than simply providing them with information about how to seek support themselves.

Recommendation 12.5

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. conduct an audit of allegations arising from

   i. claims made under the Abuse in State Care Program, the Abuse in State Care Support Service and the National Redress Scheme

   ii. civil claims in relation to Ashley Youth Detention Centre or the out of home care system

   iii. complaints regarding Ashley Youth Detention Centre or the out of home care system to identify any current or former staff in government institutions or carers in the out of home care system who are the subject of child abuse allegations, including child sexual abuse

b. ensure the names and details of any staff or carers identified by the audit are added to the cross-government register of misconduct (including unsubstantiated allegations) concerning child sexual abuse (Recommendation 20.9)

c. ensure all relevant information derived from the audit is provided to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, disciplinary action is considered, and the current safety of children in institutions prioritised

d. require the Department of Justice to

    i. pass on to the Department for Education, Children and Young People and other relevant departments as a matter of urgency the full details (rather than a summary) of any relevant National Redress Scheme application or claim under any future state redress scheme that the Department of Justice administers

    ii. make appropriate notifications to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 in relation to allegations in National Redress Scheme applications or claims under a future state redress scheme

e. advocate at a national level to review the information-sharing framework in the National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth) and the National Redress Scheme's Operational Manual for Participating Institutions to

    i. ensure information about current risks to children is reported to police, child protection authorities, authorities responsible for registration to work with children and administrators of reportable conduct schemes in the timeliest manner and by the most appropriate entity

    ii. identify the most appropriate point in the process for the National Redress Scheme Operator to seek consent from applicants to share information with relevant authorities

f. implement systems to enable future monitoring of National Redress Scheme applications, claims under any future state redress scheme and civil claims to identify current staff in government institutions or carers in the out of home care system who are the subject of child abuse allegations, including by adding relevant information to the recommended register of misconduct concerning child sexual abuse (Recommendation 20.9)

g. make appropriate supports available to victim-survivors who disclose abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, including warm referrals, with permission, to sexual assault counsellors who have training and experience in working with victim-survivors of child sexual abuse

h. remove any barriers to information sharing that would prevent the implementation of this recommendation.

4 Cultural change

In Chapter 11, Case study 1, we find that, for decades, some children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre experienced systematic harm and abuse. In this section, we examine the organisational culture at the Centre that may have contributed to this abuse. We also describe the significant cultural change that is needed to protect children and young people in detention against the risks of child sexual abuse. As noted in Chapter 3, 'organisational culture' consists of the 'assumptions, values and beliefs, and norms that distinguish appropriate from inappropriate attitudes and behaviours in an organisation'.[134]

We heard that the problems with the culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were profound—they are evident in every case study in this volume. We summarise them in Section 4.2. These problems are not new—they have been brought to the Department's attention on numerous occasions. Despite this, we heard that there is still a need for effective cultural change at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

As discussed in Chapter 18, the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act requires that Child and Youth Safe Standards be implemented in institutions engaged in child-related work, including youth detention.[135] These standards require, among other things:

- child safety and wellbeing to be 'embedded in organisational leadership, governance and culture' in detention[136]
- children and young people in detention to participate in decisions affecting them and to be taken seriously[137]
- staff in detention to be 'equipped with the knowledge, skills and awareness to keep children and young people safe'.[138]

Full implementation of the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the creation of a child safe culture in youth detention will require a transformation of the culture into one that respects children's dignity and human rights, and prioritises child safety. Such a transformation cannot occur without changes to the foundations of the youth detention system. As a former Deputy Secretary of Children and Youth Services told us, the problems in youth detention will not be solved 'unless you address the culture, the context, the skills and capabilities, the experience and the knowledge base of the staff'.[139]

We acknowledge that cultural change in detention is a monumental and complex challenge and will take time—experts told us it could take five to 10 years.[140] However, it is crucial to ensuring children in detention are safe from ill-treatment and abuse.

Many of the recommendations in other sections of this chapter will support cultural change in detention. However, in this section, we focus on the key areas of leadership, governance, children's empowerment, children's participation, staffing, and standards of professional conduct. In particular, we recommend measures to:

- strengthen leadership in the youth detention system
- improve governance arrangements for youth detention, including establishing means to ensure accountability for cultural change
- strengthen children and young people's participation in detention, including establishing a new advisory group of children, young people and young adults with previous experience of detention
- ensure youth workers are appropriately qualified, trained and supported to deliver a therapeutic model of care to children and young people in detention, with enough staff to keep youth workers, children and young people safe
- establish a professional conduct policy for all people working in detention facilities that specifies expected standards of behaviour.

Before turning to the evidence of cultural problems in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and our recommendations for change, we outline the specific cultural factors that can heighten the risks of child sexual abuse and ill-treatment in detention environments.

4.1 Identifying and addressing cultural risk factors in youth detention

As discussed in Chapter 3, child sexual abuse can occur in any institution, but some institutional contexts and cultures enable sexual abuse.[141] 'Closed' or 'total' institutions such as youth detention—which exercise full control over a child's day-to-day life and where children are isolated from the outside world and depend entirely on the institution—'present a high cumulative risk of child sexual abuse'.[142] This is, in large part, due to cultural risk factors in youth detention.

As outlined in Chapter 10, the National Royal Commission identified the cultural characteristics of contemporary detention environments that may increase the risk of child sexual abuse.[143] These included:

- failing to prioritise children's welfare and wellbeing[144]
- failing to give children the opportunity to communicate their views—this reflects a culture in which children are not listened to and their views are not respected[145]

- disrespecting children—where children are seen as 'less worthy', staff may show discriminatory attitudes towards them[146]
- tolerating humiliating and degrading treatment of children—'[w]hen children are dehumanised, staff can become desensitised to children's needs, and cease seeing them as children in need of care and protection'[147]
- engendering a strong sense of group allegiance among staff—children are less likely to disclose abuse and less likely to be believed in institutions with strong group allegiance between adults.[148]

Also, cultural norms not to speak out or 'snitch' decrease the likelihood of children making complaints, particularly where they are experiencing harm caused by another child or young person in detention.[149]

Some of these characteristics echo those identified in a 2015 paper on institutional culture in detention prepared by Penal Reform International, an international non-government organisation, as a resource tool for bodies that monitor places of detention.[150] That paper identified aspects of culture in detention facilities that constitute risk factors for torture and other ill-treatment of detainees.[151] These factors include:

- the view that people deprived of liberty don't deserve rights
- the loss of the detained person's status as an individual
- the view that security is paramount
- a culture of violence
- an 'us and them' attitude between staff and detainees
- a culture of impunity, where there is a general tolerance of human rights abuses.[152]

The case studies in this volume indicate that many of these characteristics have been present at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

The 2015 Penal Reform International paper listed the components of 'human rights culture change' in places of detention, defined as 'the process of moving an organisation to be more inclusive and to fully respect and accommodate the dignity, worth and rights of all people'.[153] These were:

- implementing change through participatory processes involving staff, detainees and (where appropriate) members of the community[154]
- ensuring leaders are committed to change[155]
- articulating and communicating a new organisational vision statement or management philosophy that is people-centred and based on human rights principles[156]

- adjusting the operational structure of the detaining organisation to ensure appropriate responsibility and accountability for the detention system[157]
- updating policies and procedures to reflect the wider purpose of the organisation and human rights principles[158]
- implementing a 'dynamic security' approach that recognises that 'positive staff-prisoner relationships combined with fair treatment and positive activities' enhance security and good order[159]
- changing symbols and language, where there is a need to break with the past—this could include changing the name of an organisation[160]
- improving the physical environment to support the implementation of human rights[161]
- recruiting staff whose skills and experience 'reflect the values, policies, new operational structures and roles' of the organisation and 'dismissing staff who are not suitable for the role or new organisation'[162]
- training staff to ensure they understand the new vision, policies and procedures[163]
- ensuring adequate supervision of staff and reinforcement of changes[164]
- addressing resistance and 'emphasis[ing] that a human rights culture will be better for everyone'.[165]

Several of these components are addressed by recommendations in other sections of this chapter. For example, in Section 6, we discuss the physical environment of detention facilities, the relationship between operational staff and children and young people, and implementing a therapeutic model of care in youth detention. In this section, we recommend changes that address the remaining components identified here.

Professor Donald Palmer, an expert on the causes, processes and consequences of wrongdoing in organisations, told us that cultural change to support implementing child safe policies and procedures can be hard to achieve. He said that it:

> … requires that attention be given to the complex process through which members of an organisation come to embrace … assumptions about the way the world operates, values and beliefs about what is good and bad, and norms about how people should think and act.[166]

According to sociologist Dr Samantha Crompvoets, organisational change requires examining power within organisational structures:[167]

> This means understanding how power operates within different levels of the organisation, asking who and what has power, and how does power shape, influence, and obstruct change. To enact organisational change, you cannot rely on the tools, mechanisms and structures already in practice that have been used to oppress the powerless. Organisational structures are comparable to the scaffolding which holds cultures of misconduct and existing power structures in place. To change culture, you need to change the rules that dictate the distribution of power.[168]

4.2 The culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

The following discussion identifies problems with the culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, including concerns expressed about operational staff. It is important to acknowledge that youth workers at Ashley Youth Detention Centre work in an extremely challenging environment. Many youth workers are deeply committed to supporting the wellbeing of children and young people in detention, many of whom have highly complex needs and challenging behaviours. The following discussion is not intended as a criticism of these youth workers.

4.2.1 Past reviews and recommendations

As noted in Chapter 10, the evidence and material available to our Commission of Inquiry included 17 reports, internal and external reviews and briefings about Ashley Youth Detention Centre since 2003. Many of these documents identified problems with the culture and/or staffing at the Centre.

In summary, we are aware of the following concerns that have previously been raised about the culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

- In 2007, a Legislative Council Select Committee examining the youth justice system and longstanding problems at Ashley Youth Detention Centre found that management 'struggle[d] to maintain a well-trained, professional, and committed staff' and that 'from time to time there [were] violent aggressive episodes involving both residents and staff'.[169] The committee made 32 recommendations. These included addressing the 'continuing low morale' among staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[170]
- In 2011, the Serious Incident Investigation Committee, established by the former Department of Health and Human Services to examine the circumstances of the death of a young person at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, found that: youth workers at the Centre were unprofessional; not all staff had completed the induction program; there was no ongoing culture of education and training; and the training provided to staff was inadequate for responding to critical incidents.[171] The committee also found that while there had been some changes to recruitment processes, 'there [was] a strong likelihood the pervading cultural norms and practices may be undermining this' change.[172] The committee recommended that the youth worker role be reviewed and that immediate action be taken to address concerns about the culture at the Centre.[173]

- In 2015, an independent review of Ashley Youth Detention Centre found that its culture leaned more towards punishment than restoration and rehabilitation, with a preference for using force to manage children and young people rather than the de-escalation techniques taught in training.[174] The review commented on the long tenure of staff and referred to a culture of 'passive resistance' to change and a lack of visibility and communication from leadership and senior management.[175] The review made 13 recommendations, including recommendations aimed at improving leadership and training.[176]
- In 2016, an options paper on potential custodial youth justice models prepared by Noetic Solutions noted that some staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were sceptical of a therapeutic approach to managing young people in detention.[177]
- In 2016, a 'Minute' prepared by a senior employee of the former Department of Health and Human Services for Secretary Pervan referred to the 'negative culture' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, attributable to multiple reviews of the Centre, uncertainty surrounding its future, an 'outdated understanding or lack of understanding from some staff that [sub]scribe to a punitive approach in dealing with young people' and 'a historical lack of transparent practice'.[178] The Minute also identified concerns about governance, leadership, staffing capability and compliance with legislation and human rights obligations and indicated that issues had remained 'embedded' at the Centre 'for a significant period'.[179] The Minute noted that a significant number of staff had been at the Centre for many years and recommended a 'significant change management process', including 'profiling of the required skill base … in order to establish staffing needs for the future'.[180] This Minute is discussed at length in Chapter 11, Case study 3.
- In 2016, a report prepared by the former Department of Health and Human Services to the then Minister for Human Services about violent incidents at Ashley Youth Detention Centre noted an apparent excessive use of force by a youth worker and made several recommendations, including appointing a senior change manager and developing a proposal to strengthen the use of multidisciplinary teams to support a therapeutic approach.[181] This report is discussed in detail in Chapter 11, Case study 4.
- In 2019, the Ombudsman submitted a report to Secretary Pervan after receiving a complaint about excessive use of force by staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre against a young person in December 2017. In this report, the Ombudsman noted that 'the training and the transition over recent years from a corrections focus to a rehabilitation and therapeutic focus [were] often at odds and despite significant training some staff continue[d] to operate from a corrections philosophy'.[182]

- In 2020, the former Department of Communities' Serious Events Review Team identified 'a toxic workplace culture at [the Centre] characterised by distrust, suspicion, conflict, and frustration'.[183] The review made 17 recommendations, including training and developing a strategy to address workplace culture 'as a matter of urgency'.[184] This review is discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 2.
- In 2020, the Australian Childhood Foundation prepared the Through the Fence report, which summarised consultations with a range of stakeholders about developing a trauma-informed operating model for Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[185] Consultations indicated that the Centre's culture was 'risk averse, focussed on containment and punitive in nature'; the operational environment of the Centre was reactive, ad hoc and unsafe for staff and young people; awareness and understanding of the Ashley Youth Detention Centre Model of Care (introduced in 2019) was very low; and support for change among staff was mixed, with a lack of support influenced by past ineffective efforts to facilitate change.[186] The report noted a 'significant paradigm shift' would be required to implement a trauma-informed practice framework in detention.[187]

Despite these reviews and recommendations, meaningful cultural change does not appear to have been achieved. This lack of change is evidenced in the following discussion.

4.2.2 What we heard about the culture in detention

The evidence we heard reflects many of the findings of the earlier reviews outlined in Section 4.2.1.

Security as the paramount consideration

Stuart Watson, the previously mentioned Centre Manager, told us that youth workers at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

> … represent a parent-like person who assists the young people to meet their daily goals, including making their beds, cleaning, laundry, pro-social conversation and recreational activities such as playing cards or kicking the football.[188]

By contrast, several other witnesses commented on the primary purpose of the youth worker role appearing to be to maintain security and keep children and young people contained. Mark Morrissey, former Commissioner for Children and Young People, observed that, during his time as Commissioner between 2014 and 2017, youth workers at Ashley Youth Detention Centre seemed to be primarily concerned with the custodial rather than the therapeutic aspects of their role.[189] Mr Morrissey referred to this as a '"detention centre" culture'.[190]

Professor White, who had extensive exposure to Ashley Youth Detention Centre from 2010 to 2012 as a member of the Serious Incident Investigation Committee (referred to in Section 4.2.1), commented on the inappropriateness of the title 'youth worker', given the security focus of the role:

> … they were called youth workers but I think … that's a euphemism … the so-called 'youth workers' saw their role [as]… basically to provide security and, in their terms security meant … to make sure that the kids are locked up and that there's secure movement through the institution … it's a misnomer to call them youth workers because the usual sense of the word 'youth worker' means it's a professional youth and community worker who works to support children and to address their immediate needs. This is by no means what we mean by youth worker in the case of Ashley.[191]

Similarly, Mr Morrissey referred to the youth workers as 'guards'.[192]

These observations are reinforced by the practices of the Department in engaging private security companies to address staff shortages in the recent past.[193]

Madeleine Gardiner, who worked at Ashley Youth Detention Centre until 2019 as Manager, Professional Services and Policy, reflected that the 'operational need [at Ashley Youth Detention Centre] appeared at times to take priority over the rehabilitation needs of the young people'.[194] She expressed concern that trauma-informed responses and therapeutic practices were not well understood by some operational staff.[195]

We heard that prioritising security over therapeutic practices and trauma-informed responses to children and young people contributed to conflict between operational staff and professional services staff in decision-making forums at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Ms Gardiner said that 'differences in professional opinion' about the care and management of young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were often the source of conflict between professional services staff and operational staff.[196] In Ms Gardiner's opinion, professional services staff operated from a 'theory and evidence base', but operational staff 'came from a practice of, "This is what we've always done and this is what we do to … operate the centre and to keep the centre safe"'.[197]

In Chapter 11, Case study 2, we observe that there was an apparent prioritising of operational concerns over protecting young people from the risk of harmful sexual behaviours. We also observed that the advice of staff, who had knowledge and experience of harmful sexual behaviours and the management of such behaviours, appears not to have been given as much sway as the concerns and views of operational staff.

A punitive culture

The case studies in this volume detail the extensive evidence we heard about alleged abusive practices by staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 1, we heard about a longstanding corrosive staff culture at the Centre that valued coercive and punitive responses to children and young people, including using force, strip searches and isolation techniques, and enabled abusive practices and human rights violations to occur. Those accounts suggest the culture at the Centre was at odds with a therapeutic model of care that supports trauma-informed responses to the challenging behaviours of children and young people in detention. In Section 6, we make recommendations for implementing such a model of care.

A former manager of Ashley Youth Detention Centre told us that when he first started in his role in the early 2000s, he observed that the Centre worked on a system run by fear and total control by staff and the belief that young people 'could only be managed through intimidation and coercion'.[198]

Professor White observed that using punishment, segregation and isolation at Ashley Youth Detention Centre was inconsistent with the care, understanding and mentoring that children and young people typically require when they act out.[199] Professor White told us he was particularly struck by 'the apparent lack of empathy' some staff showed towards residents, referring to a 'sense of coldness and indifference' among those staff.[200]

Professor White further stated:

> … there was no sense of a rehabilitation, welfare or restorative mission. The orientation was towards social control and a lock-up mentality, rather than attempting to make institutional conditions that would foster a more pleasant place in which to live and/or provide opportunities for individual betterment.[201]

Dr Michael Guerzoni, Indigenous Fellow—Academic Development, University of Tasmania, an expert in criminology and juvenile justice, told us that he understood the culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to be 'punitive', describing it as a culture that:

> … is informed by a view that the children in their care are bad people who do not deserve to be treated well. These views and assumptions are further strained by the difficulties of working in criminal justice, intensifying the default view of children in this context and contributing to a culture that routinely overlooks and disregards policies and procedures.[202]

Mr Morrissey told us he had observed the 'heavy handed and excessive' restraint of children and young people by certain staff when he visited the Centre as Commissioner for Children and Young People.[203] He also described verbal abuse from some staff towards children and young people detained at the Centre:

> On several occasions I witnessed incidents of verbal abuse and belittling of the young people by certain staff. I reported these incidents to management however was not advised of the outcome. The custodial staff involved in this abuse remained on staff at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre]. It concerned me that such verbal abuse had become normalised …[204]

Both Mr Morrissey and Professor White conveyed their astonishment and concern that some staff would engage so openly in poor behaviour towards young people.[205]

Alysha (a pseudonym), a former Clinical Practice Consultant at Ashley Youth Detention Centre from late 2019 to mid-2020, was critical of some staff at the Centre, describing them as 'highly punitive' and 'often verbally abusive, sometimes physically abusive or excessively forceful' towards children and young people.[206] Alysha recalled 'many instances of staff going out of their way to humiliate or belittle children'.[207] She said that it seemed to her that staff intended to show young people 'who was in control'.[208]

Alysha further stated:

> I felt like they [staff] … didn't respect the children; certainly didn't have—and again, not all staff, but the majority—I'm confident in saying that the majority did not look to meet their needs, did not care about what they could do to best support individual young people in their rehabilitation, how they could best support them; that wasn't something that entered the conversation.[209]

Alysha's impressions of the culture and approach at Ashley Youth Detention Centre largely echoed those of Professor White, despite their experiences at the Centre being several years apart.

Victim-survivors told us about their impressions of youth workers in detention, whom they also called 'guards'. Simon (a pseudonym), who was detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in the early to mid-2000s, said:

> I can sit here and tell you right now the guards at Risdon Prison are a lot better than the Ashley Youth Detention Centre ones; they treated people like shit. You shouldn't be doing that, you know what I mean, they're children at the end of the day.[210]

Victim-survivor Warren (a pseudonym), who was detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in the mid to late 2000s, told us:

> Other guards would bring their bad mood to work. If they didn't like you, they would be physical with you. If you gave them a little bit of lip, they would restrain you and nearly snap your arm behind your back.[211]

These comments are consistent with some of the accounts provided in the context of the research we commissioned to understand how children and young people perceived safety in institutional contexts, including youth detention.[212] Some young people spoke about being assaulted by staff members, often in the context of being restrained or after a critical incident.[213] These accounts are discussed in Chapter 10.

Inconsistent treatment of children and young people

An anonymous professional who worked at Ashley Youth Detention Centre from the mid to late 2010s told us that the Centre's Behaviour Development System, which assigned colour ratings to children and young people based on their behaviour, was at times misused by staff. They observed that staff 'favoured' some young people, with ratings assigned accordingly.[214] They also observed that the nature of a young person's offending or alleged offending often affected how incidents at the Centre were reviewed and ratings assigned—'a young person on rape charges at times was treated more harshly because staff didn't like the charges'.[215]

Similarly, Ms Gardiner told us she 'was aware that young people felt that some staff were harsher or more lenient on some detainees than others' in relation to the Behaviour Development System.[216] In Chapter 11, Case study 3, we discuss how, at times, the 'Blue Program', once a part of the Behaviour Development System, would have resulted in some children experiencing isolation practices as punishment. We discuss the Behaviour Development System and its later iteration, the Behaviour Development Program, in Section 6.3.

Socialisation of new staff into a longstanding culture

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 1, the longstanding tenure of many staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre contributed to entrenching problematic attitudes and normalising the poor treatment of children and young people. Dr Guerzoni told us he understood that 'the evidence suggests that new workers at Ashley Youth Detention Centre have been socialised into a punitive culture'.[217]

Mr Morrissey told us that, during his time as Commissioner for Children and Young People, new staff regularly entered Ashley Youth Detention Centre with energy and positive ideas, but were overwhelmed by the existing and longstanding culture:

> … I think they often had a choice of adopting the prevailing longstanding culture or moving on. It was a very—culture, as we know, is very critical, but the culture at Ashley was a very powerful culture that was very difficult for just a few people to overcome and change …[218]

Similarly, victim-survivor Max (a pseudonym), who was detained at the Centre for periods from the late 2010s to the early 2020s, told us that even if a youth worker started with positive intentions, they would soon be socialised into the dominant culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

> Like, the new ones, the new ones that they've brought, like, what I seen is, like, I don't know what they're like now, but after being there a year and that, they normally turn into the same as the other ones … Yeah, it was the best thing when a new one started because they were actually nice and they never used to do any of that, and the youth workers would gradually ease them into it, like, they'd sort of ease them into showing them all this stuff.[219]

In Chapter 11, Case study 1, we find that some staff likely felt peer pressure to conform to the poor practices of others (for example, in relation to strip searching) and took part reluctantly on this basis but, also, to avoid becoming targets for abusive or bullying behaviour from colleagues (refer to the following discussion). We consider that some of this behaviour reflects a highly traumatised and dysfunctional workforce.

Bullying and unprofessional behaviour

We heard evidence of bullying and unprofessional behaviour among staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Fiona Atkins, Assistant Manager at the Centre, agreed with a suggestion put to her by Counsel Assisting our Inquiry that there was a 'top-down command and control culture of management' at the Centre in 2019 when she was in operations and training roles.[220] She also said that she had personally been subjected to 'bullying behaviours' by some of the management group around this time.[221]

Mr Watson, who began in the role of Assistant Manager at the Centre in early 2020, told us about difficulties he experienced with a colleague.[222] He explained:

> [The colleague] didn't vacate the office for, I think it was four days, and when they did vacate the office they left it really dirty and grotty, and a voodoo doll hanging from the monitor with pins through the heart of the voodoo doll. I was also informed by staff up there that it was [the colleague's] belief that they could drive me out and then they could assume the position of Assistant Manager, and that that was their intention.[223]

Mr Watson also stated that, when he started as Assistant Manager, staff felt 'unsafe', 'oppressed' and 'bullied' by members of the management group and people were generally scared to speak up to that group at that time.[224]

Similarly, Veronica Burton, a former Serious Events Review Team reviewer, told us that staff felt 'very intimidated to raise issues' with this management group:[225]

> They described incidences of verbal abuse, being yelled at, being physically assaulted on a couple of occasions by being pushed, and prevented from leaving a room, and being spoken over the top of in meetings when they tried to express concerns about decisions that were being made in meetings.[226]

Alysha told us that, during meetings of the Centre Support Team (a decision-making forum discussed in Chapter 10 and Section 6.4), some staff engaged in 'voice raising, swearing, name calling, silencing, excluding, speaking over, belittling, eye rolling, finger pointing or other intimidating gestures', usually aiming such behaviours at professional services staff.[227]

A former Manager, Professional Services and Policy (not Ms Gardiner) told us that some staff, particularly those recruited many years ago, were 'not restrained and guided by professional value sets'.[228] Ms Burton described an interaction with a staff member who told her that he had made a comment to some young people in detention about their genitals.[229] Ms Burton said she was 'taken aback' because:

> … it's not a professional comment to make, it's not a way that you would talk to another professional from an external service reviewing, you know, the Centre; it just seemed at the very least inappropriate and uncomfortable. And at the worst, I guess, it felt uncomfortable that he would be talking about the boys' genitals and joking about that.[230]

Resistance to change

Mr Morrissey said the prevailing culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre had remained unchanged for decades.[231] He referred to a 'static institutional culture that was by its very nature unable to be forward thinking or offer therapeutic care that was in the best interests of children'.[232]

The unchanged culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre may have been related to the lengthy service of some staff members, which we discuss in several case studies in Chapter 11. We heard that several current staff have been working at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since the early 2000s.[233]

The entrenched culture may also have been reinforced by the fact that many of the staff at the Centre were drawn from the local community, where they were connected through sporting and social clubs.[234] As Professor Richard Eccleston, University of Tasmania, stated, strong social and professional connections can result in interdependencies that 'make it particularly difficult to maintain integrity and a commitment to process and ethical conduct'.[235] In Chapter 11, Case study 1, we find that familial and personal connections between some staff created strong social disincentives to challenge, question or report poor behaviour of staff towards children and young people.

Victim-survivor Erin (a pseudonym) commented on this dynamic:

> I would describe the staff at Ashley as being like a pack of animals. Some of them had been working there for 30 years. They all went to school together. They were all from [the local area], which was a small country town. They all looked after each other.[236]

Alysha expressed the view that ongoing failures to implement therapeutic approaches to managing children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were, in part, due to a general unwillingness among most staff to 'consider new approaches' and to change the way in which the Centre operated.[237]

Similarly, Adjunct Associate Professor Janise Mitchell, Deputy Chief Executive Officer, Australian Childhood Foundation, who authored the Through the Fence report (discussed in Section 4.2.1), referred to the absence of an 'authorising environment' to 'try to do things differently' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[238] She also referred to a lack of 'unity of vision' among some staff:[239]

> There are the 'old guard' as some would call them, and then there's the new guard. There's people who are more up for giving something different a go, and then there's the dyed in the wool, 'This is the way we've always done it, this is the way I'm going to keep doing it, this is what's going to make a difference'...[240]

Mandy Clarke, former Deputy Secretary, Children, Youth and Families in the former Department of Communities, told us the attitudes and practices of staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre may be difficult to shift:

> It is possible that [staff] may at times refer to stories of the old days which could be an ongoing challenge for the Centre management in their efforts to redefine a workplace culture characterised by therapeutic practice approaches.[241]

Secretary Pervan conceded that departmental leadership did not understand the extent of cultural issues at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and acknowledged some staff members' resistance to change:

> In retrospect, those cultural issues are far harder to change … I think myself personally didn't understand the depth and strength of, if not the culture of the institution, the culture around a group of individuals and their resistance to change.[242]

Staffing challenges and an unsafe environment for youth workers

As discussed in Chapter 10, longstanding systemic challenges related to staffing at Ashley Youth Detention Centre appear to have contributed to the persistent problems in the culture and in the treatment of children detained there. These challenges include difficulties in fully staffing the Centre due to resourcing, staff turnover and unplanned staff absences, and difficulties attracting, retaining and training an appropriately skilled and qualified workforce to work at the Centre. These challenges have also contributed to creating an unsafe work environment for youth workers, which in turn risks the safety of children and young people.

We received statements from current and former Ashley Youth Detention Centre employees that tell a story of staff trying to do their best in highly challenging operational circumstances. Several staff members told us that on-the-job training was haphazard, poorly attended and did not equip staff to effectively respond to workplace incidents. Sarah Spencer, a youth worker at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since 2011, provided evidence to us in August 2022. She told us:

> Staff are assaulted on site regularly, consistently … We're trying to get more staff: we're not supported. We don't get debriefings after critical incidents, we don't get breaks as I've already said. We do not get clinical supervision … We've got inexperienced staff who are not trained properly, who are only going to make more mistakes, and then it's going to be their fault again, and it shouldn't be.[243]

Ms Spencer added: 'We have not had the support, we have not had the care that we have required or the professional training or the professional supervision or anything that we needed'.[244] Ms Spencer said that she felt caught up in a persistent cycle of trauma at the Centre, which left little time for ensuring young people got the rehabilitative attention they needed to stop them being detained again.[245]

Colleen Ray, a youth worker who has been at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since 2002, told us that there had been ongoing staff shortages at the Centre, particularly in the previous four years, and that a significant cohort of staff worked multiple overtime shifts each week.[246] Similarly, Ms Spencer said that staff were often required to work long shifts with few or no breaks, to the point where some staff brought spare underwear to work in anticipation of a lack of necessary bathroom breaks.[247]

Ms Spencer told us that implementing restrictive practices (lockdowns) at the Centre due to staff shortages meant that when young people were eventually released from their rooms or units, they were considerably more difficult to manage, which created more risks to the safety of staff:

> Well, when you're working with staff who can't restrain aggressive young people, who at the moment due to the fact that we're in restricted practices, so rolling lockdowns because we don't have the staff, when they do come out, obviously they're heightened, and we get that, but we can't—the few people that were managing them couldn't manage them, and so, the whole shift was just horrific …[248]

In Chapter 11, Case study 1, we find that the highly pressured, stressful and occasionally frightening conditions in which staff sometimes had to work, coupled with inadequate training and professional development for some staff, made it more likely for staff to deviate from best practice when seeking to manage the behaviour of children and young people. We also find that difficult behaviours displayed by children and young people likely contributed to staff holding negative attitudes towards them. We consider that this context would facilitate new staff becoming absorbed into an existing punitive culture.

The risks to staff safety at Ashley Youth Detention Centre appear to be ongoing. In a submission to a parliamentary inquiry into adult imprisonment and youth detention in Tasmania in March 2023, a former police officer who worked for several months at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in late 2022 described the Centre as 'an abusive and violent working environment where youth workers … are subjected to verbal and physical abuse [from young people] daily'.[249] This submission also referred to the prevalence of absenteeism among youth workers and the substantial proportion of youth workers who were suspended or on leave due to workers compensation claims.[250]

We discuss support for staff, staff shortages and a range of other issues related to staffing in Section 4.7.

Efforts to address cultural problems at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Ms Gardiner said a 'change manager' employed at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in 2018 undertook work to develop a therapeutic approach at the Centre and improve working relationships.[251] According to Ms Gardiner, this work was collaborative, staff were receptive to it and 'there was an energy and an appetite for making some significant improvements in the centre'.[252] However, the change manager role was defunded in June 2018.[253]

Mr Watson expressed the view that the culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre had changed in recent years:

> I believe that at this time at Ashley that [the] culture isn't as it's been suggested. I believe that it has been in the past, but the staff changes over the last two years that I've been there have been incredible. There's very few of the staff that were there when I started now.[254]

In August 2022, Pamela Honan, Director, Strategic Youth Services, told us that the relationship between operational staff and professional services staff had improved, describing it as 'respectful, supportive, collaborative and equal'.[255] Ms Honan attributed the improved relationship to appointing new senior managers in both teams, a 'shift to a more accountable and collaborative style of leadership and decision making' supported by the new Ashley Youth Detention Centre Practice Framework (discussed in Section 6.3.3) and increased accountability across all staff for case management, incident reporting and policy compliance.[256] Ms Honan said organisational change didn't 'happen overnight', particularly in the context of 'years and years of a poor culture'.[257] However, she believed positive change had begun.[258]

Similarly, Secretary Pervan told us positive change was already underway at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, although he acknowledged that genuine cultural change would take time:

> We're on the way. It'll take a decade before what you've got there is at least a benchmark facility and service, whether it's at Ashley or it's, you know, at the … new facilities. Changing those cultures are not just about changing people's attitudes; in many respects they're about changing the people themselves.[259]

Given the depth of the cultural problems identified in this section, we consider that more significant reform of the youth detention system is required to achieve meaningful cultural change. This should occur immediately, given the number of past reviews that have shown incremental reform to be ineffective.

4.3 The Government's proposed reforms

As noted in Section 2, the Tasmanian Government has announced plans to close Ashley Youth Detention Centre and 'transition to contemporary therapeutic facilities and models of care by the end of 2024'.[260]

The Government's Draft Youth Justice Blueprint, Draft First Action Plan and Keeping Kids Safe Plan each contain proposed reforms that broadly seek to address the cultural problems we have identified.[261] For example:

- A principle underpinning the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint is to 'create a culture that fosters child safety and wellbeing across the youth justice system in Tasmania'.[262]

- An aim of Strategy 5 ('Provide an appropriately trained and supported therapeutic workforce') of the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint is to develop 'an ongoing culture of learning, inquiry and continuous improvement, including collaborative opportunities for professional development, supervision, support; and opportunities for best practice to be shared and supported'.[263]
- The Draft First Action Plan refers to an 'increased culture of safety for staff and children and young people' and 'increased professionalism of [the] workforce' as expected outcomes of Action 1 ('Enhance the safety and therapeutic approach at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre]') and Action 2 ('Develop and implement a Youth Justice Model of Care').[264]
- The Keeping Kids Safe Plan states that the Department for Education, Children and Young People 'will continue to focus on delivering practice improvement, professionalisation of centre operations and the workforce, and importantly, culture change'.[265]

We refer to more specific proposed reforms from these documents throughout this section. We turn now to our recommendations for change.

4.4 Strong and active leadership

Strong and active leadership is critical to creating a child safe culture. Leaders should instil a culture that 'inhibits the perpetration of child sexual abuse, speeds the detection of abuse, and enhances the response to abuse'.[266] Professor Palmer stated that leaders 'demonstrate cultural content' in several ways—by the people they hire and fire; the behaviour they reward and punish; the matters they focus on; the way they respond to crises; and the attitudes and behaviours they display.[267]

4.4.1 Leadership roles in youth detention

As outlined in Chapter 10, the Secretary of the Department is responsible for the security and management of Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the safe custody and wellbeing of children and young people in detention.[268]

In October 2022, responsibility for youth justice services was transferred from the former Department of Communities to the Department for Education, Children and Young People.[269] Since this restructure, the position of Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice, which was created in August 2022, has been responsible for Ashley Youth Detention Centre and broader youth justice services.[270] Initially, the Executive Director reported directly to the Secretary; however, the Department has advised us that, since the restructure, the Executive Director reports to an 'Associate Secretary'.[271]

The current Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice is Christopher Simcock. In oral evidence, Mr Simcock told us that he has two direct reports—Ms Honan

(Director, Strategic Youth Services, sometimes also referred to as the Director, Youth and Family Violence Services) and the 'Director of Custodial'.[272] We understand this to be a reference to the Director, Custodial Operations—a new role that has been 'filled through a secondment from 5 September 2022 for a 12 month period to focus on additional staff and operational support at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre]'.[273]

We understand that, since the October 2022 restructure, the Manager, Custodial Youth Justice ('Centre Manager'), who is based at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, continues to report to the Director, Strategic Youth Services. The Centre Manager is responsible for managing the day-to-day operations of Ashley Youth Detention Centre, the development and leadership of a management team, and providing direction for programs at the Centre.[274] As at May 2022, the Centre Manager role was a Band 8 in the Tasmanian State Service and had four direct reports.[275]

4.4.2 Strengthening leadership

A paradigm shift is required in youth detention in Tasmania to move from a punitive, custodial model to a therapeutic model of care. The Government has outlined a major youth justice reform agenda for the next 10 years, including reviewing the Youth Justice Act, closing Ashley Youth Detention Centre and building new youth justice facilities. Effective and timely implementation of these measures will require active, expert and decisive leaders who are committed to achieving the necessary cultural change to support reform and create a child safe culture in detention.

Adjunct Associate Professor Mitchell stressed the importance of committed leadership in changing an entrenched culture:

> Leadership sets the environment within which the work happens. So, if you don't have leadership that is on board with what you're trying to achieve operationally, then you are doomed to fail.[276]

Ms Clarke told us that 'very, very strong leadership' was necessary to implement a therapeutic practice framework in youth detention and that such leadership 'must be grounded in understanding and an absolute commitment to therapeutic practice'.[277] Similarly, Ms Burton indicated that leadership in implementing a therapeutic framework in detention was crucial:

> … it needs to be a top-down approach to change, otherwise the barriers will remain. If the framework, whatever it ends up being, and the therapeutic service is not embraced by executive, it won't be successful.[278]

Objective 2 of the Keeping Kids Safe Plan refers to developing a Youth Justice Services Workforce Strategy (discussed in Section 4.7.2) with 'a strong leadership focus'.[279] The plan also refers to establishing several new leadership positions 'to manage specific areas' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, including Director, Custodial Operations (referred to in Section 4.4.1); Director, Clinical Services; Assistant Manager, Case Management; and Assistant Manager, Security, Risk, Training and Audit.[280] We are pleased to see these new leadership roles being introduced. We are unclear whether these roles will be located at the Centre or the Department or both, noting that strong leadership will be necessary in both the Department and Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility).

As noted in Section 4.4.1, the Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice reports to an Associate Secretary, who reports to the Secretary.[281] The Associate Secretary's three other direct reports are Deputy Secretaries.[282] We are concerned about this lack of parity in seniority among the leaders in the Department. In such a large department, it is vital that the youth justice leader has enough seniority to represent the significant risk carried by that portfolio involving Tasmania's most vulnerable children. However, we acknowledge that in a small jurisdiction such as Tasmania it may not be feasible to elevate this role to that of a Deputy Secretary.

At a minimum, we consider that the Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice must have knowledge and understanding of youth justice and therapeutic models of care in youth justice, as well as experience in providing strategic direction and leadership. This is essential to achieving meaningful cultural change in youth detention.

The Executive Director should be an active leader who frequently visits detention and other youth justice facilities to ensure they are aware of and understand the risks to children and young people in those facilities, and are accountable for addressing those risks.

The Executive Director should also be responsible for cultural change at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Cultural change in youth detention should be included in the Executive Director's key performance indicators and in those of the Associate Secretary and Secretary. We discuss governance arrangements in Section 4.5.

Also, we consider that the role of Centre Manager should be more senior than it currently is, reflecting the complexity and expectations of the role. As noted, detention is a highly complex and challenging environment. The Centre Manager's operational responsibilities for the day-to-day care, supervision and safety of children and young people in detention—many of whom have extremely complex needs—as well as for the safety and supervision of staff, are significant. The current classification of this role does not adequately reflect these responsibilities or the risks associated with them. We recommend a reclassification of this role to accurately reflect its responsibilities.

We also recommend that the Centre Manager's position description and performance measures include implementing cultural change in youth detention.

Recommendation 12.6

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. have appropriate processes in place to ensure leaders in youth detention have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability requirements to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation

b. ensure the person who holds the position of Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice, has knowledge and understanding of youth justice and therapeutic models of care in youth justice, and experience in providing strategic direction and leadership

c. ensure cultural change in youth detention is included in the key performance indicators of the Secretary, Associate Secretary and Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice

d. reclassify the position of Manager, Custodial Youth Justice from Band 8 in the Tasmanian State Service Award to at least a Senior Executive Service Level 1

e. ensure the position description and performance measures for the role of Manager, Custodial Youth Justice include implementing cultural change in youth detention.

4.5 Governance

Good governance is essential to creating a child safe culture in youth detention. As discussed in Chapter 9, the National Royal Commission defined 'governance' as 'encompass[ing] the systems, structures and policies that control the way an institution operates, and the mechanism by which the institution, and its people, can be held to account'.[283]

We consider that good governance for youth detention requires senior leadership to be aware of what is occurring in detention facilities and to be accountable for addressing risks to children and young people in detention. This, in turn, requires transparency from the facility's management and a clear understanding of what information should be escalated to whom and in what circumstances, particularly about adverse incidents in detention and the use of isolation, force, restraints and searches.

Good governance also requires structures and systems to enable monitoring and evaluation of progress towards clear goals for cultural change and broader system reform.[284] Professor White referred to the importance of monitoring reforms, stating:

> … you can have a whole bank of new standard operating procedures, but if you don't do your monitoring and auditing, then they can just be ignored like the previous ones were.[285]

Dr Crompvoets highlighted the need for 'tangible accountability'—for a particular role holder with 'skin in the game' to be ultimately responsible for implementing change.[286]

We asked Secretary Pervan to describe the Department's governance arrangements for Ashley Youth Detention Centre. He told us that:

- Senior executives in the Department undertake '[a]dministrative, managerial and operational oversight' of the Centre.[287]
- The Custodial Inspector and the Commissioner for Children and Young People provide external oversight.[288]
- 'Additional "external" resources may be provided for the review of significant incidents', including activating a Serious Events Review Team to undertake an investigation when a child or young person has experienced a 'serious event' (death, serious injury or a 'near miss' event).[289] The findings of a Serious Events Review Team would be provided to a 'multi-disciplinary panel of clinical and practice experts'—the Serious Events Review Committee—which includes members from external agencies and advises the Secretary on system-wide recommendations.[290]

We discuss external oversight in Section 11 and the Department's responses to critical incidents in detention in Section 10. In those sections, we make recommendations to strengthen independent oversight of youth detention and to improve departmental responses to allegations of child sexual abuse and other serious incidents in detention. In Section 9, we consider how certain incidents are reported in the Department.

Here, we discuss managerial and operational oversight of Ashley Youth Detention Centre by senior executives in the Department and mechanisms for monitoring cultural change and system reform.

4.5.1 A lack of transparency

Counsel Assisting our Inquiry asked Secretary Pervan how he satisfied himself that his delegates were exercising the powers delegated to them appropriately.[291] In his answer, Secretary Pervan referred to two processes—'the reporting line through the Deputy Secretary down to the Director and their reports back to me' and 'that assumption of competence and trust going down the line to exercise those delegations in accordance with the policies that are set for the relative power'.[292]

These processes rely on appropriate reporting by the facility to the Department, so relevant information about the facility can be conveyed to the executive. We heard that this has not always occurred. Ms Honan told us that the relationship between Ashley Youth Detention Centre management and the Department was 'pretty guarded' when she took up her role in 2019.[293] She described a closed culture at the Centre:

> I felt that … the Centre operated as a satellite … it was very inward facing; there wasn't a lot of connection with, not just the department, but other services in the community. It was very closed, very wary, and defensive, I would say …[294]

Ms Honan also referred to a lack of trust and transparency in reporting by the Centre Manager to the Department (and external oversight bodies):

> My impression was that there was also a high degree of mistrust and selectivity in what and how information was reported by the Manager up to the executive to ensure the operating of the centre was positively regarded. The relationship with independent statutory bodies appeared to be wary and uncooperative.[295]

Ms Clarke agreed with these assessments.[296]

In her statement to our Inquiry in August 2022, Ms Honan indicated that transparency at Ashley Youth Detention Centre had improved significantly since 2020 due to a range of measures.[297] These include:

- improved recording and reporting of information to the executive—Ms Honan told us she received 'monthly reports pertaining to searches, restraint, isolation or use of force'[298]
- improvements in incident reporting and the recording of information in isolation, restraint and search registers and in case notes—incidents are escalated to the Department if they involve injury or harm to a child or young person or 'if there is a significant event such as sexual/physical assault, damage to property, disturbance, self-harm, escape'[299]
- 'open and transparent reflection and review of incident management to continuously improve and support best practice'[300]
- the development and implementation of the Ashley Youth Detention Centre Practice Framework[301]
- weekly visits by Ms Honan to the Centre, during which she speaks and listens to staff and children and young people[302]
- appointment of a 'Senior Business Partner' (we did not receive more information about this role)[303]
- 'considerable investment in building staff (including managers') understanding and application of the Agenc[y's] values and expected workplace behaviours'.[304]

During the hearings, Ms Honan conceded that other, more significant improvements were needed to fully address the problems at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

> The changes we have put in place are still to some degree not enough. The entirety of reform that needs to happen for Ashley is systems reform. So, what we have managed to do is be more accountable, more transparent, increase the level of > safety around children … there are more CCTV cameras, there are better practices, I think people feel more comfortable in discussing things that they have concerns about as opposed to them being suppressed … there is more collaboration around decision making. All of those things help to reduce risk, but they are certainly not reform on the scale that needs to occur.[305]

We welcome the changes that have been implemented at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to improve reporting to the Department, transparency and accountability. However, we agree with Ms Honan that more improvements are needed to bring about meaningful cultural change in youth detention and create an environment that is safe for children and young people and staff.

The Keeping Kids Safe Plan refers to the Department establishing an 'Incident Review Committee' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in September 2022 to 'review incidents on a weekly basis for compliance with policy and procedure, follow up actions based on review findings and to identify learning areas to support staff'.[306] This committee is chaired by the Director, Custodial Operations, and its members include the Director, Youth and Family Violence Services and the Centre Manager.[307] We discuss this committee in Section 9.3.4.

4.5.2 Monitoring of youth justice reforms

The Tasmanian Government has developed a Youth Justice Reform Governance Framework to support youth justice reform in Tasmania.[308] This framework 'recognises [that] a transformed youth justice system requires a whole-of-government, all of service system, and whole-of-community approach'.[309] The governance framework comprises:

- the 'Children, Young People and Families Safety and Wellbeing Cabinet Sub Committee', whose role is to oversee the development and implementation of the Youth Justice Blueprint (among other matters)[310]
- the 'Youth Justice Reform Steering Committee', comprising Secretaries and/or Deputy Secretaries of all relevant departments—the role of this committee is to provide advice to the Cabinet Sub Committee and the Youth Justice Reform Project Team[311]
- the multidisciplinary 'Youth Justice Expert Advisory Panel', whose role is to provide advice to the Youth Justice Reform Steering Committee on the transition to a therapeutic model and the development of new custodial facilities in Tasmania, and whose members include representatives of relevant departments and non-government organisations—this panel 'has expertise in key areas relating to youth justice services, child and adolescent development, psychological research, child rights, education, trauma and abuse'[312]

- the 'Youth Justice Blueprint Community Consultative Working Group', whose role is to provide advice on implementing the Youth Justice Blueprint and to '[a]ssist the Tasmanian Government in monitoring the implementation of the Blueprint and Youth Justice Reform in the community'—members of this group include representatives of 'key youth at risk/youth justice community service organisations and stakeholders'.[313]

Also, as noted in Section 2.1, the Keeping Kids Safe Plan states that a 'Working Group' has been established to oversee and monitor that plan's implementation.[314] The plan does not specify the membership of this group, nor does it explain the relationship between this group and the governance framework outlined here.

According to the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint, a 'Blueprint Monitoring and Evaluation Plan' will be developed to measure progress 'against the intent of the Blueprint and short and long term outcomes across each of the five strategies'.[315] Annual reports will be released providing information on implementation and the effectiveness of actions.[316] Also, the Government's Draft First Action Plan refers to an 'Outcomes Framework that will increase our ability to track, monitor and report change over the life of the Blueprint'.[317]

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint states that some of the indicators of its success will include diversion of children and young people from the criminal justice system and completion of appropriate professional development by staff working in the youth justice system 'to ensure a children and young person centred, therapeutic and trauma informed response to youth offending'.[318]

It appears that these governance structures will not continue beyond implementing the youth justice reforms. In our view, ongoing governance structures to monitor the performance and culture of Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any future youth detention facilities are essential.

4.5.3 Accountability for cultural change

Given the history of cultural problems at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, and the continuing need for change in detention to create a child safe culture, we consider that measures are needed to monitor cultural change and to ensure leaders are accountable for change.

In particular, we recommend that the planned monitoring and evaluation of implementation of the Government's youth justice reforms specifically include monitoring and evaluation of cultural change in detention. As part of the proposed Outcomes Framework under the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint, objective metrics should be identified or developed to measure cultural change. These should include measures relating to adverse incidents in detention (such as assaults and self-harm), staff absences, workers compensation claims, sick leave, staff retention and grievance procedures.

Self-reporting measures such as staff surveys should also be included, but these should not be the sole measures of cultural change, given previously identified barriers to the reporting of concerns in detention. We also recommend that information from exit interviews conducted by independent community visitors with children and young people leaving detention should be used to measure cultural change (refer to Section 11.4 for a discussion of independent community visitors).

The Government should also ensure there is an ongoing governance structure to oversee and monitor the functioning of the youth justice system, including the performance and culture of youth detention, beyond the implementation of the youth justice reforms.

The Centre Manager (and the manager of any future detention facility) should be responsible for driving cultural change in detention and ensuring the environment is safe for children and staff. However, we consider that a position based at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to assist the Centre Manager in this function would be beneficial. As noted in Section 4.2.2, Ms Gardiner told us that when she started working at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in 2018, there was a change manager at the Centre whose work made a positive impact on the culture of the Centre.[319] She said that after this position was defunded, '[w]ithout someone driving the cultural change and relationship building from a leadership perspective, this cultural change was not maintained'.[320]

We recommend that the Department immediately appoints a culture change manager at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and that this position be maintained beyond the closure of the Centre for as long as monitoring indicates there is a need for this position.

Recommendation 12.7

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. develop measures to monitor and evaluate progress towards cultural change in youth detention and include these in the Outcomes Framework under the Youth Justice Blueprint and associated action plans

b. include monitoring and evaluation of progress towards cultural change in youth detention in the Youth Justice Reform Governance Framework

c. urgently begin data collection and monitoring of progress towards cultural change

d. ensure there is an ongoing governance structure to oversee and monitor the functioning of the youth justice system, including the performance and culture of youth detention, beyond the implementation of the youth justice reforms

e. fund the Department for Education, Children and Young People to immediately appoint a culture change manager at Ashley Youth Detention Centre reporting to the Centre Manager and whose role is to work with and support the Centre Manager to

   i. drive cultural change in youth detention

   ii. create a child safe organisation

   iii. establish a positive, collaborative and supportive working environment

f. maintain the culture change manager position or function beyond the closure of Ashley Youth Detention Centre for as long as monitoring indicates there is a need for it.

4.6 Empowerment and participation of children and young people in detention

As noted, a child safe culture is one in which children and young people are empowered to express their views about matters that affect them and where those views are taken seriously. In this section, we discuss children and young people's participation in systemic processes or decision making in youth detention. Children's participation in individual decision-making processes in youth detention (such as case planning, case management and exit planning) is addressed in Section 6.4.

4.6.1 Principles for children's participation

Principle Two of the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations requires organisations to ensure '[c]hildren and young people are informed about their rights, participate in decisions affecting them and are taken seriously'.[321] As noted earlier, the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act includes an identical principle as a Child and Youth Safe Standard.[322]

The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People has noted that to comply with the equivalent Victorian standard an organisation must ensure: children and young people are informed about their rights; support from peers and friendships is recognised and encouraged; and organisations have strategies in place to develop a culture that facilitates participation and responds to the input and contributions of children and young people.[323]

As noted earlier, we commissioned research into children and young people's perceptions of safety in government funded organisations in Tasmania.[324] This research—the Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report—highlighted the importance of children and young people's empowerment and participation in institutions. It found that:

> To feel confident, children and young people need to be respected, to be affirmed and to be equipped to identify and seek help when they are at risk of harm. This requires them to be informed and educated. It requires organisations to promote cultures that value children and young people and empower them as individuals and as a group.[325]

The report also found that 'to feel safe and to have confidence in adults and organisations children and young people need to feel involved':

> Groups of young people can also play a role in identifying the concerns of their peers and providing feedback on an organisation's approach to preventing and responding to abuse. Fundamental to individual and 'collective' engagement is for something to change. For 'participation' to be 'protective', children and young people must see how their views have been valued, acted on and how adults and organisations have built their appreciation of their needs and embedded them in their child safe strategies.[326]

Experts who gave evidence to our Commission of Inquiry also commented on the importance of children's participation in organisations. Professor Palmer stated that children should be explicitly involved in the design of child safety measures and have the same status, in terms of rights and obligations, as adults, particularly the right to be believed.[327]

As we discuss elsewhere in our report, in 2021, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People released Empowerment and Participation – A Guide for Organisations Working with Children and Young People.[328] According to this guide, the four key elements of participation for children and young people in organisations are:

- space—children and young people feel safe when they are in an environment where it is safe to speak up[329]
- voice—children and young people are not always used to being asked about their experience or about what they want, so organisations need to support them to feel comfortable speaking up and provide opportunities to do so[330]
- audience—adults and young people are effectively collaborating when adults in an organisation take young people's views seriously and allow them to inform the way the organisation works[331]
- influence—for participation to be meaningful, participants should know the intention is to make changes that keep children and young people safe in the organisation.[332]

The New South Wales Office of the Advocate for Children and Young People published A Guide to Establishing a Children and Young People's Advisory Group in 2021.[333] This guide identifies several principles for children's participation, including:

- Membership of any advisory group should reflect children and young people's diversity.
- Organisations should develop the capacity of children and young people to participate.
- Children and young people's participation must be voluntary and informed.
- Participation should bring children and young people no harm—for example, children and young people who become distressed during meetings may need psychological support.
- Organisations should anticipate ethical issues that might arise from children's participation, including keeping any information shared by children and young people confidential.[334]

We also note Youth Matter: A Practical Guide to Increase Youth Engagement and Participation in Tasmania, published by the former Department of Communities in 2019.[335]

4.6.2 Participation at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

We identified that Ashley Youth Detention Centre has a procedure about a Resident Advisory Group ('Resident Advisory Group Procedure').[336] This procedure explains that the Resident Advisory Group is a forum:

> … designed to give young people detained at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] a say about the things that affect them. This includes listening to their views on the physical amenity of the site, detention processes, standard of care, treatment and program options and how safe they feel.[337]

The purposes of this group include '[c]reating safety by ensuring young people's voices are heard', '[s]upporting quality improvement processes', '[p]roviding input into policy and procedure development' and '[i]nformation sharing around on-site developments'.[338]

The Resident Advisory Group Procedure states that the group meets every six weeks and is attended by the Centre Manager and two staff from the Department's Quality Improvement and Workforce Development unit (this unit no longer exists).[339] All children and young people are eligible to attend unless a risk assessment undertaken by the Operations Manager indicates otherwise.[340] Participation is voluntary.[341] A Resident Advisory Group meeting may comprise several small group sessions or, in some cases, a session with an individual child or young person.[342]

The Resident Advisory Group Procedure contains detailed rules for convening and conducting meetings, ensuring safety for children and young people and staff, and reporting and responding to issues that emerge in meetings.[343]

In particular:

- If a child or young person discloses abuse or neglect, the procedure directs staff to notify Child Safety Services.[344]
- If a child or young person makes a complaint during a meeting, the Centre Manager must instigate 'the complaints process' (this is discussed in Section 10.2).[345]
- The Centre Manager must prepare a response to all issues raised and provide this to the Department within five working days of the next Resident Advisory Group meeting.[346]

The Australian Childhood Foundation's Through the Fence report recommended strengthening the role of the Resident Advisory Group 'to ensure that young people have a voice in the [therapeutic practice] model development and within [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] generally'.[347] We did not receive any specific evidence about the operation of the Resident Advisory Group, or children and young people's experiences with this group.

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint states that the youth justice system should:

> … actively engage with, and seek the views of children, young people and their communities and provide ongoing opportunities for children and young people with lived experience to be heard.[348]

However, it does not specify how this will be achieved for children and young people in detention. None of the Government's reform documents refer to the Resident Advisory Group or any other participation or consultation mechanism for children and young people in detention.

4.6.3 Strengthening children's participation in the detention system

It is critical to develop a culture that empowers children and young people in detention and enables them to safely share their views on a range of issues, including policies, procedures, programs, services, system reforms and what makes them feel safe or unsafe. Such a culture should aim to build children and young people's awareness, skills and knowledge to support their participation.

Given the previous lack of children's participation at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, we consider that the Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in detention, in consultation with the new Commission for Children and Young People (recommended in Chapter 18 at Recommendation 18.6 and discussed in Section 11.3). In our view, the guides to children's empowerment and participation recently developed in Victoria and New South Wales provide appropriate tools to inform this strategy.

The Resident Advisory Group appears to be a positive way to seek feedback from children and young people in youth detention. However, there are several factors that limit its effectiveness as an ongoing consultation forum for children and young people to express their views. These include the vulnerability of children and young people in detention, the recent history of children and young people feeling unsafe or reluctant to raise concerns or express their views at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the fact that children and young people may only be in detention for a relatively short period, leading to a lack of stability in the group's membership.

Accordingly, we recommend establishing a separate advisory group comprising children, young people and young adults up to the age of 25 years with previous experience of detention. While the terms of reference for this group should be set in consultation with young people, it should provide a forum for those with lived experience of youth detention to share their views on measures to empower children and young people in detention and create a child safe culture.

Membership of this advisory group should reflect the diversity of the detention population, and in particular should include Aboriginal people and people with disability. The advisory group should be convened by the Department for Education, Children and Young People and be attended by a senior representative of the Department. However, the group should be chaired by a person who is independent of the Department and has experience in working and consulting with vulnerable young people.

We also recommend a review of the Resident Advisory Group to ensure it conforms with best practice principles for children's participation and provides a safe forum for children and young people in detention to provide feedback and express their views.

Recommendation 12.8

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should, in consultation with the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6), develop an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in detention, having regard to best practice principles for children's participation in organisations. The strategy should include:

a. the establishment of a permanent advisory group that

   i. includes children, young people and young adults up to the age of 25 years with previous experience of youth detention in Tasmania, including Aboriginal people and people with disability

   ii. has clear terms of reference developed in consultation with young people with experience of detention

iii. enables its members to participate in a safe and meaningful way and express their views on measures to empower children and young people in detention (including the role and purpose of the Resident Advisory Group) and achieve cultural change in detention

iv. meets regularly and is chaired by a person independent of the Department and attended by a senior departmental leader

v. is adequately funded and resourced

b. a review of the Ashley Youth Detention Centre Resident Advisory Group to ensure it conforms with best practice principles for children's participation and provides a safe forum for children and young people in detention to express their views, including on measures to achieve cultural change in detention, without fear of reprisal

c. a consultation forum for children and young people in any youth detention facility that replaces Ashley Youth Detention Centre

d. mechanisms to ensure children and young people in detention are aware of their rights

e. regular monitoring and evaluation of the effectiveness of the empowerment and participation strategy.

4.7 Staffing

Another key component of cultural change in detention is ensuring youth workers are appropriately qualified, skilled, trained, supported and resourced to engage with and respond constructively to children and young people in detention, and their attitudes and personal attributes align with a therapeutic model of care for youth detention.

As discussed in Section 6, the best-performing youth detention facilities have highly skilled staff who actively engage with children and young people, model positive behaviour and can manage difficult behaviours through trauma-informed responses and de-escalation techniques. In these facilities, staff engagement with children and young people is key to supporting them to address their behaviours.

In Section 6.3.1, we describe models:

- in Spain, where the staff who have the day-to-day care of children and young people in secure facilities run by the Diagrama Foundation are known as 'social educators'—these are specialists qualified to degree level who act as encouraging and supportive role models for children and young people, while setting 'consistent, clear and fair boundaries to help young people understand the positive and negative consequences of their behaviour'[349]

- in Missouri and elsewhere in the United States, where staff who are responsible for the care and safety of children and young people in secure facilities are known as 'youth specialists'—these staff undergo an intensive recruitment process to determine whether they are committed to helping children and young people succeed and have the necessary attributes for the role, and are also required to complete 236 hours of training in their first two years, including multiple sessions on youth development, family systems and group facilitation.[350]

In Section 6.3.4, we recommend that the Government ensures staff in youth detention facilities have the skills needed to undertake trauma-informed, child-centred interventions with children and young people, including the skills to anticipate, de-escalate and respond effectively to challenging behaviours without resorting to the use of force or restrictive practices (Recommendation 12.18).

In the following discussion, we consider the qualifications and professional development necessary for youth workers in Tasmanian detention facilities to meet this standard. We also discuss staff shortages and recruitment.

4.7.1 Staff qualifications and professional development

Youth workers' qualifications and training

Almost all the previous reviews into Ashley Youth Detention Centre summarised in Section 4.2.1 highlighted problems with youth worker capability, skills and training.

As noted in Section 4.2.2, we heard that most youth workers at Ashley Youth Detention Centre live in the local area. We also heard that many youth workers had minimal relevant qualifications (with a highest level of education of year 10 or year 12), had minimal previous relevant experience other than caring for their own children or being involved in a sporting club, and had found out about the youth worker position through word of mouth.[351]

According to Dr Guerzoni:

> … historically the workforce at Ashley Youth Detention Centre have not been required to hold appropriate qualifications. Further, I understand that they have not been trained in working with juveniles and the facilitation of healthy relationships with children.[352]

In contrast, we also heard that some youth workers had relevant qualifications and experience when they started working at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. For example, Ms Spencer had a Certificate IV in Youth Justice and had worked at a youth detention centre in another state, while Ms Ray had youth worker qualifications from New Zealand and experience in working with children and young people.[353]

According to Recommendation 15.8 of the National Royal Commission:

> State and territory governments should ensure that all staff in youth detention are provided with training and ongoing professional development in trauma-informed care to assist them to meet the needs of children in youth detention.[354]

Ms Ray told us that she was meant to have two weeks of training when she started at Ashley Youth Detention Centre (in 2002) but 'only got four days because there was a riot. So, after day four I got put into a unit with 15 boys and three staff … and 20 minutes later it all kicked off'.[355]

The Ashley Youth Detention Centre Learning and Development Framework ('Learning and Development Framework'), introduced in 2020, refers to a 'Beginning Practice program' for new staff, to be completed over six weeks, which includes:

1. Online introduction units, to be completed prior to first day of onsite training
2. Class based training sessions covering each competency unit
3. Class based and onsite introduction to the varying roles throughout the centre
4. Eight days of onsite 'buddy shifts' across all shift types working alongside mentors and opinion leaders who have been specifically selected for their practice abilities and leaderships skills (specific training provided to mentors)
5. Buddy shifts with Ashley Team Support to gain exposure to varying roles within the centre
6. Individual supervision sessions
7. Teamwork activities
8. Group supervision.[356]

The Learning and Development Framework also specifies several mandatory training requirements for Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff. These include units called 'Child and Adolescent Development', 'Respond Safely to Critical Situations' and 'Engagement, De-escalation and Restraint'.[357]

While we agree with the importance of training and professional development for youth workers, we are also conscious of the fact that many previous reviews have made recommendations for staff training and yet problems have continued to exist. We note, in particular, the Ombudsman's observations in 2019 that the various reports on Ashley Youth Detention Centre 'appear to be demonstrating that there has been training provided but that there is an underlying cultural issue affecting its adoption'.[358]

Qualifications and induction programs in other jurisdictions

In his evidence, Mr Simcock stated that the Department was seeing if it could 'replicate' some of the qualifications of the youth justice workforce in the Northern Territory, where he was previously employed.[359] In the Northern Territory, youth justice officers do not need to have a qualification before applying for the position, but all officers are employed first through a 12-month contract, during which time they must complete a Certificate IV in Youth Justice, which is funded by the department.[360] This was a recommendation of the 2017 Royal Commission and Board of Inquiry into the Protection and Detention of Children in the Northern Territory ('Northern Territory Royal Commission').[361]

In May 2022, the Northern Territory Government published its Northern Territory Youth Detention Centres Model of Care.[362] This document identifies several personal attributes as essential to enable youth justice centre staff to implement a therapeutic model of care.[363] These include:

- genuine care and compassion for young people in detention
- the belief that young people are in detention to be rehabilitated, not punished
- the capacity to build and maintain positive relationships with young people while maintaining professional boundaries
- the ability to model and uphold prosocial behaviour
- willingness to take a strengths-based approach and actively engage with and take part in all aspects of a young person's rehabilitation.[364]

Other jurisdictions adopt a variety of approaches to qualifications and induction programs for youth detention centre staff. For example:

- in New South Wales, no substantive qualifications are required to become a youth officer, and new recruits undergo three weeks of full-time training to prepare them for entry-level duties[365]
- in Queensland, no substantive qualifications are required to become a detention youth worker, but 'a Certificate IV in Youth Justice or a Diploma of Youth Justice are highly desirable' and new recruits 'must meet all competencies and standards' specified in five weeks of induction training before being confirmed in the role[366]
- in Victoria, the Department of Justice and Community Safety provides youth justice worker recruits with 'eight weeks of fully paid foundational training including a Certificate IV in Youth Justice' to prepare them for their first day—once they begin service, youth justice workers 'continue to earn [their] Certificate IV qualifications'[367]
- in South Australia, '[i]t is not essential to already have a Certificate IV in Youth Justice' and the Department of Human Services 'may be able to support eligible candidates to complete the required training'[368]

- in Western Australia, no substantive qualifications are required to become a youth justice officer, but new recruits must undertake a nine-month full-time training program that includes 'on-the-job' and 'off-the-job' training, and written and practical assessments.[369]

Alison Grace, Deputy Centre Manager, Bimberi Youth Justice Centre in the Australian Capital Territory, told us that '[i]ndividuals applying for employment do not require any previous training or experience, other than a willingness to work with young people and make a difference'.[370] She said that operational staff must complete a seven-week induction program to be eligible for permanent appointment.[371] This induction is followed by two weeks of 'buddy shifts' before staff start in their role.[372]

Ms Grace said that a dedicated Training Officer was appointed at Bimberi Youth Justice Centre in March 2020.[373] In addition, the 'Principal Practitioner' provides training to staff to ensure services are trauma-informed and therapeutic, including mandatory training for all new operational staff on 'professional boundaries and self-disclosure, self-care and resilience and working with [Child and Youth Protection Services]'.[374]

Efforts to strengthen youth worker qualifications and skills in Tasmania

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint and Draft First Action Plan acknowledge that an effective youth justice system requires a 'highly qualified and trained workforce', although the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint also notes that Tasmania's population size creates a challenge to ensuring suitably qualified staff.[375]

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint also refers to the goals of '[b]uilding capacity within the workforce so that all staff have the required skills and capabilities for their role' and '[s]trengthening professional learning opportunities in trauma-informed and therapeutic approaches to practice'.[376] The Draft First Action Plan refers to the '[i]ncreased professionalism of [the] workforce', '[i]ncreased staff training and skill development' and '[i]ncreased safety for staff, children and young people' as expected outcomes of key actions under the plan.[377]

According to the Keeping Kids Safe Plan, '[t]he intent is that all youth workers have appropriate qualifications for the roles they are undertaking, underpinned by a trauma informed therapeutic approach'.[378] The plan commits to providing the Certificate IV in Youth Justice, delivered by the Australian Childhood Foundation, to existing staff and 'any new staff who require the qualification'.[379]

During the hearings, Professor White observed that:

> … usually a Certificate IV is a basic qualification, and often, but not always, it's a tick and flick exercise … So it's substantively not particularly onerous and doesn't really do much more than provide minimal training, but it's not training as a youth worker, it's training as a custodial [worker], and there's a big difference.[380]

The 2016 Noetic Solutions options paper similarly indicated that stakeholders 'overwhelmingly suggested' that the Certificate IV qualification was not sufficient to support young people with complex needs in a custodial setting.[381] Professor White emphasised the need for both 'in-service and pre-service' education and training for youth workers.[382]

According to the Keeping Kids Safe Plan, the Department contracted the Australian Childhood Foundation in September 2022 to review the Learning and Development Framework and undertake a workforce analysis, which included examining '[m]inimum qualifications of all roles' and '[p]osition descriptions and core capabilities'.[383] We have not been provided with the results of this review or analysis.

Before turning to our recommendations on staff qualifications, we discuss staff shortages and recruitment.

4.7.2 Staff shortages and recruitment

Understaffing and resourcing challenges in detention

As noted in Section 4.2.2, we heard extensive evidence about understaffing and resource challenges at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

Fiona Atkins, who started working at the Centre in 2000, recalled in her evidence that staffing pressures emerged in the early 2000s as a result of reduced funding.[384] She explained that, around this time, Ashley Youth Detention Centre began relying more heavily on private security personnel to cover shifts in response to staffing shortages.[385]

The 2007 report of the Legislative Council Select Committee (referred to in Section 4.2.1) observed that mandated staffing levels at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were not being maintained or were inadequate to ensure the safety and security of young people and existing staff.[386]

We heard that staff shortages at Ashley Youth Detention Centre have only worsened since then and that understaffing has created unsafe conditions for staff and for children and young people in detention.[387]

Mr Morrissey told us that, during his time as Commissioner for Children and Young People (2014 to 2017), there were instances where he made unannounced visits to Ashley Youth Detention Centre to check on the children and young people detained there.[388] Mr Morrissey recalled there were occasions when he had difficulty accessing the Centre, and left without having spoken to any young people—a situation he assumed to be related, in part, to reduced staffing levels.[389] He also told us he was aware of children and young people being locked in their rooms alone for periods of up to two weeks or more due to staffing shortages, which he characterised as a 'form of torture'.[390]

Understaffing also inevitably leads to reduced supervision of children and young people by a smaller pool of staff. This increases the vulnerability of children and young people in detention to physical or sexual abuse by staff or other detainees—a fact acknowledged by Lucas Digney, Assistant State Secretary, Health and Community Services Union (Tasmania Branch), during our hearings.[391]

Victim-survivor Max told us about an incident where he alleged that he was physically abused by another young person while there was only one staff member available to supervise.[392] He told us that '[h]aving only one worker means that if there is an incident, they can't do anything other than call a code black and wait for other youth workers to arrive'.[393]

As noted in Section 4.2.2, Ms Ray referred to ongoing staff shortages over a period of several years before 2022:

> … you want the best out of a young person you need to nearly have one-on-one staff ratio to residents … there was always constraints over budget, over staffing, they never did enough recruitment, we couldn't keep enough people, so for a whole period of four years there was quite a cohort of staff who were working three and four 12-hour shifts a week. Now, under those circumstances, in a 24/7 alert level situation, that's a lot for the human brain to take on for a long period of time.[394]

Ms Spencer told us that, at the time of our hearings in August 2022, children and young people were on 'rolling lockdowns' due to staff shortages—this meant confining children and young people to their rooms or units for longer than usual and releasing them at staggered times rather than all together.[395] We discuss lockdowns in detail in Section 9.2.

Ms Atkins attributed recent staff shortages to several factors: the standing down or suspension of staff in response to allegations made against them; the forthcoming closure of Ashley Youth Detention Centre; COVID-19 restrictions; the perception among some staff that young people at the Centre may make false allegations against them; an increase in workers compensation claims; and negative depictions of Ashley Youth Detention Centre in media reporting.[396]

Mr Digney identified staff shortages as a management issue caused by under-resourcing, poor working conditions, employment-related injuries and a lack of staff retention.[397] He stated:

> Staff shortages damage employee morale and heighten workloads. It creates a significant safety risk. This consequentially harms the standard of service which employees can provide to detainees. Further, detainees see it as isolation, which, in the view of [the Health and Community Services Union], it is. This can often make them agitated and more difficult to engage with. It leads to frustration and confrontation between staff and detainees.[398]

At our hearings, Mr Digney said that, while there had been some recent improvement in the staffing situation at the Centre, the shortages continued, with the Centre relying on staff working overtime to cover the minimum shifts required.[399] This continued to place the safety of children at risk.

Secretary Pervan acknowledged that staff shortages had been a longstanding problem at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and referred to several barriers to recruitment:

> I do not recall a time when the levels of staff with the necessary skills [were in place] to support the transformation of the [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] service. This is a function of both available funding and our ability to recruit and retain staff with the necessary skills. Since I became Acting Secretary, we have similarly not had staffing numbers to support [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] staff to undertake substantial periods of training away from the workplace without leaving the Centre chronically understaffed. This is the practical reality within which we operate given our budget, the location of the facility, staff turnover levels, the difficulty of these jobs and the high levels of sick leave. It also reflects the financial reality of our State with Government having to determine funding from fixed revenues across intensely competing demands in health, education, justice and so on.[400]

Secretary Pervan expanded on his comments at the hearings:

> In an ideal world you would have sufficient staffing so that you could maintain full safe staffing while you had other staff away from the service undertaking training and development and bringing them up to speed with an emerging area which is therapeutic care. The dynamic at Ashley is that, because of staff turnover, we've never actually ever been able to get a full permanent workforce up there so that there has been times, as we all know, when we've been unable to maintain full safe staffing without using overtime and double shifts and things like that.[401]

We understand that, as recently as July 2023, lockdowns related to staff shortages continued at the Centre, with children and young people locked in their rooms or units for up to 23 hours each day.[402]

Efforts to address staff shortages in detention

In June 2022, a health and safety representative at Ashley Youth Detention Centre issued a Provisional Improvement Notice to the Centre on the basis that the Department was not taking enough action on staff shortages and there was an 'imminent risk to [union] members' health and safety'.[403] In August 2022, Mr Digney stated that there had been no support from the safety regulator WorkSafe Tasmania on this issue, nor had the Department provided immediate contingency staff.[404]

Correspondence from Mr Digney in June 2022 to Jacqueline Allen, former Acting Executive Director, People and Culture in the Department of Communities, stated that staffing at Ashley Youth Detention Centre was at a point where it was 'dangerous for workers and young people alike'.[405] In her response to this email, Ms Allen indicated that a number of measures were being implemented, including recruiting new youth workers, support from other service areas, health and wellbeing support and 'appropriate restrictions on movement of young people' in recognition of the current staffing levels.[406] The reference to 'restrictions on movement of young people' appears to be a reference to lockdowns.

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint refers to the aim of 'maintaining staffing levels with experienced and competent staff'.[407] Similarly, the Draft First Action Plan states that it aims to maintain an 'adequate staffing complement' and identifies '[i]ncreased staffing' as one of its intended outcomes.[408]

Objective 2 of the Keeping Kids Safe Plan is to maintain 'an appropriate level of staff with the right experience and competencies' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[409] This includes the following action items:

- developing and implementing a 'Youth Justice Services Workforce Strategy', to be implemented by January 2023[410]
- appointing a Director, Custodial Operations for 12 months from September 2022 (referred to in Section 4.4.1)[411]
- seconding five youth workers from the Northern Territory for 12 months from October 2022 to supplement staffing at the Centre[412]
- employing retired police officers from September 2022 to assist youth workers in a 'support and mentor capacity'[413]
- making a concentrated effort to recruit more youth workers[414]
- restructuring the workforce at the Centre from the end of 2022 to 'ensure all relevant roles are geared to a strong trauma informed and therapeutic service delivery approach'[415]
- appointing more leadership positions at the Centre from the end of 2022.[416]

In February 2023, Timothy Bullard, Secretary, Department for Education, Children and Young People, advised us that:

- two Assistant Managers, one Operations Manager and 13 youth workers had been appointed for 12 months 'to provide an immediate boost' to the workforce[417]
- in terms of ongoing recruitment, 10 youth workers had been appointed in October 2022 and had completed a five-week induction course in January 2023, with another 25 applicants to be interviewed 'shortly'[418]
- since 13 December 2022, Ashley Youth Detention Centre had been 'sufficiently staffed to cease restrictive practices, enabling school attendance and full daily programs for young people'.[419]

We have not been advised whether other pending action items under Objective 2 of the Keeping Kids Safe Plan have been completed.

On 12 July 2023, the Commissioner for Children and Young People, Leanne McLean, informed us that, since August 2022, there had been a deterioration of conditions for children and young people in detention, with 'isolation practices and unit-specific lockdowns, operating outside an accepted policy framework, and restrictive practices for operational reasons' continuing to be used at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[420] She advised that, over the previous six months, her office had observed (among other practices):

- An increase in incidents involving extensive damage to property (e.g., flooding cells, lighting fires, activating fire sprinklers) and/or self-harm (e.g., swallowing batteries, cutting) during extended periods of lockdown; and
- Young people's access to the school, programs, fresh air, exercise, medical treatment, contact with their legal representatives and visits being restricted due to lockdowns.[421]

Commissioner McLean also said that '[t]he promotion of children's human rights is trumped time and time again by staff shortages or workplace health and safety considerations, euphemistically referred to as "operational reasons"'.[422] This information is extremely concerning.

We note that Commissioner McLean has previously called on the Government to 'urgently establish a rapid response crisis team on the ground at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, inclusive of specialist leadership skills and child safe practitioner expertise', which should focus on 'the wellbeing of detainees and the wellbeing of the staff who remain at the centre'.[423]

In response to Commissioner McLean's July 2023 comments, the Government acknowledged that, despite the employment of additional staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, the Centre 'continue[d] to experience critically low staff numbers turning up to work on some days'.[424] Secretary Bullard stated that restrictive practices:

> are implemented only when absolutely necessary and are structured to ensure young people at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] have continued access to education, phone calls and health appointments.[425]

Secretary Bullard also said that the Government was continuing to work on measures to address staff shortages at the Centre, including commencing another recruitment round for youth workers, exploring the reasons for high rates of absenteeism and recruiting additional leadership roles into the Youth Justice portfolio.[426]

Support for staff

Institutional child sexual abuse has profound effects on the staff of an institution, who have been colleagues with those who have offended or against whom allegations have been made, and who have worked within the culture of the institution that enabled the abuse. The impact on staff is particularly acute in the context of Ashley Youth Detention Centre, where there are numerous staff who are the subject of allegations (refer to Chapter 11, Case studies 1 and 7).

Counsel Assisting our Inquiry asked Ms Honan what supports had been put in place for staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in response to the serious allegations against their colleagues.[427] Ms Honan said there was a health and wellbeing officer on site, staff had been accessing counselling and support services, and Ms Honan had also increased her presence on site to be available to speak to staff.[428]

As discussed in Chapter 15, the sexual abuse of a child in an institution, particularly by a staff member who has worked in that institution for an extended period, can be understood as a critical incident. In that chapter, we recommend that the Department of Health develops and implements a critical incident response plan for human-caused traumatic events, including incidents relating to child safety such as child sexual abuse (Recommendation 15.19). Among other matters, this plan should:

- identify who is responsible for leading the response to a critical incident and set out the applicable reporting arrangements
- provide for early communication of information about the incident
- provide psychological first aid to affected people and extra support from skilled psychologists on an 'as needs' basis
- facilitate communication and support among affected people as a means of social support
- provide for critical incident debriefing facilitated by a neutral and trained expert where appropriate
- provide for a review of the Department of Health's response to the critical incident
- provide for an evaluation of any actions to be implemented as part of the Department's response to the critical incident.

We note that the Department already has procedures for responding to incidents in detention, which we discuss in Sections 9.3 and 10.2. However, we consider that aspects of Recommendation 15.19 should be adapted to ensure staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre dealing with the ramifications of extensive allegations of abuse against colleagues and their subsequent suspensions (and actual or potential terminations) receive the necessary support.

4.7.3 Our recommendations

As noted throughout this chapter, most children and young people in detention have highly complex needs and challenging behaviours. The practice of employing youth workers at Ashley Youth Detention Centre with limited qualifications or experience in working with vulnerable children and young people has, without doubt, contributed to many of its cultural problems. Failing to equip unqualified staff with the skills needed to provide appropriate care and support for children and young people in detention has clearly exacerbated these problems.

Staffing is a critical component in implementing meaningful cultural change in youth detention—change cannot occur if youth workers resist it. As we have seen time and again, reviews and recommendations have failed to result in effective change to the culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. As Dr Crompvoets observed:

> Sometimes an organisation needs a complete reset, and there are definitely examples across the world where an organisation or a part of an organisation are actually completely shut down and rebuilt from the ground up to be fit for purpose …[429]

Staff who work with children and young people in detention must be appropriately qualified and trained, and have the necessary attributes, attitudes and skills to build positive relationships with children and young people and create a child safe culture. In our view, this cannot be achieved in Tasmania without a thorough review of current staffing qualifications, personal aptitudes, capabilities and training.

To this end, we recommend that the Department initiates a change management process that includes identifying the aptitudes, attitudes and capabilities expected of youth workers, and requires all current staff to reapply for their positions. We consider that such a process is essential to change the culture in youth detention. It will also enable staff who are reappointed to clearly identify themselves as being a part of Tasmania's future youth detention system, rather than its past. The Government should consider whether the change management process should also apply to other staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

As noted, the Australian Childhood Foundation is undertaking a workforce analysis in respect of Ashley Youth Detention Centre, which includes examining the minimum qualifications of all roles, position descriptions and core capabilities.[430] We welcome the Department's initiative to provide a Certificate IV qualification for youth workers. However, we are concerned that this qualification does not provide the right degree of skill to provide a therapeutic response to children with complex needs. Nevertheless, we accept that it may not be feasible at present to require all youth workers to hold a higher qualification.

In our view, youth workers should hold or be supported to obtain a relevant Certificate IV as a minimum qualification. The Department should also support youth workers to undertake further education such as a diploma or bachelor-level qualification, graduate certificate or micro-credentials. Youth workers who complete higher qualifications should be eligible for promotion to a new role of senior youth worker, with a higher level of remuneration. Senior youth workers must also have consistently demonstrated the attributes, attitudes and skills to build positive relationships and a commitment to rehabilitation and working therapeutically with children and young people in detention.

Existing staff reapplying for a youth worker position through the recommended change management process should not be required to hold a Certificate IV, but the Department should support reappointed youth workers to obtain such a qualification within 12 months of reappointment as a condition of continuing employment.

We also recommend adopting a more rigorous method of recruitment for youth workers that considers a person's attributes (such as empathy, care, compassion and listening skills), attitudes to children and young people in detention, and relationship-building skills.[431] As Adjunct Associate Professor Mitchell advised, relationship building is a critical skill for a youth worker:

> … a relationship-based approach would be part of a practice framework. It says to the youth workers or the custodial staff: Your job is not to stand back and watch; your job is to be engaged with and use your relationship as a vehicle for change; your job is not to stand back and do nothing until you have to intervene to de-escalate something. So it sets the tone and the orientation for how change happens, for how learning happens and how we set goals and measure success.[432]

We also welcome the Department's review of the Learning and Development Framework. Induction programs and ongoing training and professional development for youth workers should reflect best practice in youth detention. They should focus on children and young people's human rights, particularly in relation to the use of isolation, force and personal searches, with training in all custodial policies and procedures. However, they should also include approaches to setting fair, clear and firm boundaries for children and young people's behaviour. Youth workers should also benefit from supervision from qualified professionals and opportunities for reflective practice.

Newly recruited youth workers should not be eligible to start work until they have satisfactorily completed the induction program. This should be followed by two weeks of 'buddy shifts' before starting in their role.

Also, to support ongoing cultural change in youth detention, the Department should develop a clear policy on the appropriateness of providing training, counselling or direction to detention centre staff members who have repeatedly demonstrated resistance to change.

We recommend that the Department maintains a sufficient level of youth workers to implement the therapeutic model of care in youth detention discussed in Section 6.3 (Recommendation 12.18) and to support a child safe culture in detention. In particular, this level of staffing should be high enough to:

- ensure children and young people's human rights are respected (including their right not to be subjected to unlawful isolation or unnecessary lockdowns) and their health, cultural and educational needs are met
- support the safety and wellbeing of youth workers, including allowing time for rest breaks, reporting, debriefs on critical incidents and handovers
- enable youth workers to undertake ongoing professional development.

We also recommend that the Department undertakes an ongoing biannual recruitment process to maintain adequate staffing levels.[433]

We acknowledge that these recommendations, which are aimed at long-term reform, may not meet the urgent need to address immediate and ongoing staff shortages. We also acknowledge that our recommendation for a change management process may add to pressure on staffing levels in the short term. The Government must urgently develop a staffing contingency plan for youth detention to ensure children and young people in detention are not subjected to unnecessary lockdowns and that their rights are not trumped by 'operational' considerations.

The Government should also consider other ways to attract youth workers, such as a salary allowance or loading that reflects the regional location of Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the current high-risk environment of youth detention.

We also recommend strengthening the Department's support for staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in dealing with the fallout of the allegations of abuse against their colleagues and the intense scrutiny of the Centre arising from our Commission of Inquiry. More broadly, we recommend extra support for youth workers and other staff at detention facilities following critical incidents in detention, including riots, assaults, attempted suicide and self-harm. This should include providing psychological first aid, additional support from skilled psychologists on an 'as needs' basis and, where appropriate, critical incident debriefing facilitated by a neutral and trained expert.

Recommendation 12.9

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. initiate a change management process that includes identifying the aptitudes, attitudes and capabilities expected of youth workers, and requires all current youth workers to reapply for their positions

b. ensure individuals recruited to the youth worker role hold a relevant Certificate IV qualification before starting or complete such a qualification within a year of starting, and have appropriate attributes, attitudes and skills to build positive relationships and work therapeutically with children and young people in youth detention

c. create incentives for ongoing professional development by supporting youth workers to complete higher qualifications and providing for operational career progression to a senior youth worker role

d. maintain a sufficient level of youth workers to implement a therapeutic model of care in youth detention and to ensure the safety and wellbeing of children, young people and staff

e. establish an ongoing biannual recruitment process for youth workers

f. ensure the induction program and continuing professional development for youth workers are based on best practice principles and include

    i. expected standards of behaviour in interacting with children and young people

    ii. a focus on children and young people's human rights, particularly in relation to isolation, force, restraints and personal searches

    iii. approaches to setting fair, clear and firm boundaries for children and young people's behaviour within a therapeutic, trauma-informed framework

    iv. training in all custodial policies and procedures

g. ensure newly recruited youth workers are not eligible to start work until they have satisfactorily completed the induction program, followed by two weeks of 'buddy shifts'

h. develop a clear policy on the appropriateness of providing training, counselling or direction to detention centre staff members who have repeatedly demonstrated resistance to change

i. urgently develop a staffing contingency plan to ensure children and young people in detention are not subjected to lockdowns caused by staff shortages

j. consider introducing mechanisms to attract more youth workers, such as an allowance or loading that reflects the regional location of Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the current high-risk environment of youth detention

k. implement other supports for Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff in relation to allegations of child sexual abuse against their colleagues and strengthen support for youth workers and other detention centre staff following critical incidents in detention, such as riots, assaults, attempted suicide and self-harm, by providing psychological first aid, additional support from skilled psychologists on an 'as needs' basis and, where appropriate, critical incident debriefing facilitated by a neutral and trained expert.

4.8 A professional conduct policy

The National Royal Commission identified an increased risk of institutional child sexual abuse when expectations of conduct between staff and children are not clear or consistently enforced.[434] This clarity and consistency can be achieved through a code of conduct for staff. As part of an institution's governance framework, a code of conduct can contribute to creating a child safe culture and facilitate child safe outcomes for the children in an institution.[435]

As discussed in Chapter 20, the State Service Code of Conduct, contained in section 9 of the State Service Act 2000, and the State Service Principles, found in section 7 of that Act, establish standards of behaviour and conduct that apply to all State Service employees. In her evidence, Ms Allen acknowledged that one of the limitations on the People and Culture team's ability to investigate complaints or take disciplinary action was the absence of provisions in the State Service Code of Conduct relating directly to child safety or child abuse.[436]

In Chapter 20, we recommend that each Head of Agency whose department provides services to children develops a professional conduct policy for the department's employees (Recommendation 20.2). This policy should:

- explain what behaviours are unacceptable, including concerning conduct, misconduct or criminal conduct
- define and prohibit child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations
- acknowledge the challenge of maintaining professional boundaries in small communities and provide clear identification of, instructions about, and examples of how to manage conflicts of interest and professional boundaries in small communities
- provide guidance on identifying behaviours that indicate child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations relevant to the particular organisation
- outline behaviours that must be reported to authorities, including what behaviours should be reported to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme or other relevant agencies
- provide that not following reasonable directions is a breach of professional standards

- provide that a failure to report a breach or suspected breach of the policy may be taken to be breach of the policy
- outline the protections available to individuals who make complaints or reports in good faith
- provide and clearly outline response mechanisms for alleged breaches of the policy
- specify the penalties for a breach, including that a breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, without needing to assess whether a separate provision of the Code has been breached, and may result in disciplinary action
- refer to any other policies, procedures and guidelines that support, inform or otherwise relate to the professional conduct policy, for example, complaints handling or child protection policies, or other codes of conduct relevant to particular professions.

The professional conduct policy should also be:

- easily accessible to everyone in the agency and communicated by a range of mechanisms
- explained to, acknowledged and signed by all employees
- accompanied by a mandatory initial training session and regular refresher training
- communicated to children and young people and their families through a range of mechanisms, including on the agency's website.

There appears to be no professional conduct policy that applies to staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. There is also no mention of a code of conduct or professional conduct policy in the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint, Draft First Action Plan or Keeping Kids Safe Plan.

In implementing Recommendation 20.2, the Department should ensure it develops a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities. This professional conduct policy may specify general standards of behaviour as well as those specific to particular roles such as youth workers, education staff or health staff working in youth detention or other youth justice facilities.

The professional conduct policy for youth detention should specify expectations outlined in other relevant custodial policies and procedures, including those regarding personal searches of children and young people in detention and the use force and isolation (discussed in Section 9).

Recommendation 12.10

The Department for Education, Children and Young People, in developing a professional conduct policy (Recommendation 20.2), should ensure:

a. there is a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in detention facilities and other residential youth justice facilities

b. the professional conduct policy for detention facilities and other residential youth justice facilities, in addition to the matters set out in Recommendation 20.2, specifies expectations outlined in other relevant custodial policies and procedures, including those on the use of force, isolation and personal searches of children and young people in detention

c. the professional conduct policy for youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors

d. the Department uses appropriate mechanisms to ensure compliance by volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors with the professional conduct policy.

5 Reducing the number of children in youth detention

Children and young people in youth detention facilities are at increased risk of child sexual abuse by adult abusers and children and young people engaging in harmful sexual behaviours.[437] An important mechanism to minimise this risk is to reduce the number of children and young people entering detention. This requires a range of strategies to prevent children and young people becoming involved with the youth justice system, divert those who come into contact with police away from formal criminal justice processes, and ensure children and young people who do face criminal proceedings are supported to address their offending behaviour in the community rather than in detention.

As noted in Section 2, the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint and Draft First Action Plan emphasise prevention, early intervention and diversion. The broad directions of the Government's youth justice reform agenda are positive, but many of the proposed reforms are yet to be developed in detail.

Accordingly, in this section, we recommend specific measures to reduce the number of children and young people entering detention by:

- raising the minimum age of criminal responsibility to 14 years and working towards raising the minimum age of detention to 16 years

- updating the principles of the Youth Justice Act
- increasing opportunities for pre-court diversion
- improving access to bail for children and young people and reducing the number of children and young people on remand
- ensuring detention is a sentence of last resort for children and young people.

While these measures would apply to all children and young people who come to the attention of the criminal justice system, our view is that the heightened risk of child sexual abuse in youth detention justifies us making recommendations to keep children and young people out of detention.

5.1 Age-appropriate responses to children and young people

5.1.1 Minimum age of criminal responsibility

The minimum age of criminal responsibility in Tasmania is 10 years.[438] This means children as young as 10 can be arrested, questioned, searched, detained by police, charged, subjected to forensic procedures, remanded in custody, convicted of an offence and sentenced to a range of dispositions, including detention. While the legal presumption of doli incapax (meaning 'incapable of crime') applies to children under the age of 14 years, as it does across Australia, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People has observed that this is an ineffective safeguard for children aged 10 to 13 years against the harmful effects of criminal justice processes.[439]

According to data published by the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare in March 2023, there were five children aged 10 to 13 years in detention and seven children aged 10 to 13 years under community-based youth justice supervision in Tasmania during the 2021–22 year.[440] Ms Atkins told us that, in August 2022, at least one child as young as 11 was being held on remand.[441]

Research indicates that detaining children and young people is damaging, has a criminalising effect and does not reduce reoffending.[442] According to Vincenzo Caltabiano, former Director of Tasmania Legal Aid:

> An incredibly high number of children who are detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre find themselves back at Ashley Youth Detention Centre within a relatively short period of time. Over half of children aged 10–16 years return to supervised detention within 12 months of release. The general experience is that, if a child goes to Ashley Youth Detention Centre and spends any length of time there, their odds of staying in the system increase dramatically.[443]

There is a growing consensus among legal, human rights, medical and health organisations—in particular Aboriginal organisations—that such a low minimum age of criminal responsibility is harmful and unacceptable.[444] According to the Law Council of Australia:

> The current low minimum age of criminal responsibility is out of step with international human rights standards and the most recent medical evidence on child cognitive development. It also ignores the large body of social research highlighting the harmful effects of early contact with the criminal justice system, including entrenchment and recidivism, and a correlation with being less likely to complete education or find employment. Further, it ignores the social determinants that lead to certain cohorts, such as First Nations children, children in out-of-home care, and children with significant health issues, being disproportionately represented in the criminal justice system.[445]

In its 2021 inquiry into the over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in the Victorian youth justice system, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People found that Victoria's low minimum age of criminal responsibility—also 10 years—disproportionately harms Aboriginal children.[446] It recommended that Victoria's minimum age of criminal responsibility be increased to 14 years, without exceptions.[447]

This followed other Australian children's commissioners, including Tasmania's Commissioner for Children and Young People, recommending, in 2019, an increase in the minimum age of criminal responsibility to at least 14 years.[448] Tasmania Legal Aid and the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service have also advocated implementing this change in Tasmania.[449]

Also in 2019, the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child recommended that the Australian Government raise the age of criminal responsibility to the 'internationally accepted level … of 14 years'.[450] The former Council of Attorneys-General formed a working group to develop a nationally consistent approach to this issue and, in 2021, agreed to develop a proposal to raise the age of criminal responsibility from 10 to 12 years.[451] In December 2022, the Australian Government released a draft report prepared by the working group in 2020 for the Council of Attorneys-General that recommended the Commonwealth, state and territory governments raise the age of criminal responsibility to 14 years without exception, noting that jurisdictions did not reach consensus on this issue.[452]

Some jurisdictions have not waited for a national consensus to be reached. In November 2022, the Northern Territory Parliament passed legislation to increase the minimum age of criminal responsibility in the Northern Territory to 12 years.[453] In April 2023, the Victorian Government announced that Victoria would raise the minimum age of criminal responsibility to 12 years by late 2024, and to 14 years by 2027.[454] In May 2023, a Bill was introduced to the Australian Capital Territory Legislative Assembly, which was then referred to a committee inquiry, to raise the minimum age of criminal responsibility to 12 years upon commencement, and to 14 years by July 2025.[455]

The Tasmanian Government has committed to increasing the minimum age of detention to 14 years by the end of 2024 (discussed in Section 5.1.2), but has said that it will continue to consider the minimum age of criminal responsibility through the national Meeting of Attorneys-General, given the Tasmanian Government's preference for a nationally consistent position on this issue.[456]

In response to a request for advice from the Commissioner for Children and Young People, in April 2022, the Tasmania Law Reform Institute published a research paper examining the law reform considerations associated with raising the minimum age of criminal responsibility in Tasmania.[457] Among other questions, the Law Reform Institute considered what additional law reform would be required to ensure community safety and to promote the wellbeing of children under the minimum age of criminal responsibility who exhibit harmful behaviours.[458] The Law Reform Institute's recommendations included expanding the definition of when a child is 'at risk' under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, so a child protection approach could be taken to children under the age of criminal responsibility who are engaging in 'serious or persistent "offence like" conduct' and/or whose behaviour 'generates a risk' to the child or other people.[459]

In our view, children under the age of 14 years who are engaging in harmful or antisocial behaviour should receive a child protection or a health system response rather than a criminal justice system response. Criminalising children in this age group increases the likelihood they will 'become entrenched in the youth justice system'.[460] It also increases the likelihood they will serve a custodial sentence in adult prison.[461] Increasing the age of criminal responsibility to 14 years would help protect younger children against these risks and the increased risk of sexual abuse as a result of that exposure to the youth justice system.

In relation to exceptions for children under the age of 14 years who engage in certain categories of harmful behaviour, we note that the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child has indicated it:

> … is concerned about practices that permit the use of a lower minimum age of criminal responsibility in cases where, for example, the child is accused of committing a serious offence. Such practices are usually created to respond to public pressure and are not based on a rational understanding of children's development. The Committee strongly recommends that States parties abolish such approaches and set one standardized age below which children cannot be held responsible in criminal law, without exception.[462]

We agree with this approach.

5.1.2 Minimum age of detention

As noted in Section 5.1.1, the Tasmanian Government has committed to increasing the minimum age of detention to 14 years, with '[e]xceptions for serious crimes, and in the interest of community safety', to be identified during development.[463] As part of this commitment, the Government has indicated that it will develop new bail and sentencing options for children under 14 years, and that as 'new initiatives are developed and implemented, we will be able to remove detention as an option for this younger, more vulnerable cohort'.[464]

The United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child recommends that:

> … no child be deprived of liberty, unless there are genuine public safety or public health concerns, and encourages State parties to fix an age limit below which children may not legally be deprived of their liberty, such as 16 years of age.[465]

Tasmania Legal Aid and the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service both support an increase to the minimum age of detention to 16 years in Tasmania.[466] In 2021, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People also recommended that the minimum age of detention in Victoria be increased to 16 years.[467]

We agree with this approach, but note the need for alternatives to detention—for example, inpatient mental health or drug and alcohol treatment (discussed in Section 6.5.2)—to be developed for children aged 14 and 15 years who commit serious offences against the person before such a change can be implemented.

Recommendation 12.11

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. introduce legislation to increase the minimum age of criminal responsibility to 14 years, without exception

b. develop and provide a range of community-based health, welfare and disability programs and services that are tailored to meet the needs of children and young people under the age of 14 years who are engaging in antisocial behaviour, and to address the factors contributing to that behaviour

c. work towards increasing the minimum age of detention (including remand) to 16 years by developing alternatives to detention for children aged 14 and 15 years who are found guilty of serious violent offences and who may be a danger to themselves or the community.

5.2 Updating the principles of the Youth Justice Act

The Government has committed to reviewing the Youth Justice Act as a priority under its Draft Youth Justice Blueprint, with a Bill to be delivered by 2025.[468] The purpose of the review is to 'realign the legislation to a public health approach to youth justice and to be reflective of contemporary youth justice practice'.[469] The review will consider the following issues (among others):

- aligning the legislation with key human rights and youth justice principles
- adopting a trauma-informed, child-focused approach
- reflecting the importance of restorative justice and rehabilitation
- increasing the focus on early intervention and diversion away from the youth justice system
- expanding the range of community sentencing options.[470]

The review will also consider the legislative changes needed to increase the minimum age of detention to 14 years (as discussed in Section 5.1).[471]

We support the proposed review of the Youth Justice Act to achieve these purposes. We consider the review to be an opportunity to modernise the Act and include updated principles that emphasise rehabilitation, treatment and age-appropriate responses to children in the youth justice system.

Section 5 of the Youth Justice Act contains general principles that are relevant to the exercise of powers under the Act (refer to box).

Youth Justice Act 1997, section 5: General principles of youth justice

1. The powers conferred by this Act are to be directed towards the objectives mentioned in section 4 with proper regard to the following principles:
    a. that the youth is to be dealt with, either formally or informally, in a way that encourages the youth to accept responsibility for his or her behaviour;
    b. that the youth is not to be treated more severely than an adult would be;
    c. that the community is to be protected from illegal behaviour;
    d. that the victim of the offence is to be given the opportunity to participate in the process of dealing with the youth as allowed by this Act;

e. guardians are to be encouraged to fulfil their responsibility for the care and supervision of the youth and should be supported in their efforts to fulfil this responsibility;

f. guardians should be involved in determining the appropriate sanction as allowed by this Act;

g. detaining a youth in custody should only be used as a last resort and should only be for as short a time as is necessary;

h. any sanctioning of a youth is to be designed so as to give him or her an opportunity to develop a sense of social responsibility and otherwise to develop in beneficial and socially acceptable ways;

i. any sanctioning of a youth is to be appropriate to the age, maturity and cultural identity of the youth;

j. any sanctioning of a youth is to be appropriate to the previous offending history of the youth.

2. Effect is to be given to the following principles so far as the circumstances of the individual case allow:

a. compensation and restitution should be provided, where appropriate, for victims of offences committed by youths;

b. family relationships between a youth, the youth's parents and other members of the youth's family should be preserved and strengthened;

c. a youth should not be withdrawn unnecessarily from his or her family environment;

d. there should be no unnecessary interruption of a youth's education or employment;

e. a youth's sense of racial, ethnic or cultural identity should not be impaired;

f. an Aboriginal youth should be dealt with in a manner that involves his or her cultural community.

The current youth justice principles recognise, to some extent, that children are to be treated differently from adults in the criminal justice system, that responses to children must consider a child's age and that children's relationships with family members are important. However, we agree with Tasmania Legal Aid that the principles also place 'a heavy emphasis on sanction and punishment, rather than rehabilitation, restoration, and reintegration'.[472]

We consider that an updated Youth Justice Act should include principles that reflect contemporary understandings of effective youth justice systems. For example, in New Zealand, the Oranga Tamariki Act 1989 (NZ) ('Oranga Tamariki Act') includes general principles that apply to care and protection proceedings and youth justice proceedings.[473] These principles are closely aligned with international human rights instruments covering children and include the following:[474]

- The wellbeing of a child or young person must be at the centre of decision making that affects them.
- The child or young person's rights must be respected and upheld and the child or young person must be treated with dignity and respect at all times.
- The child or young person's need for a safe, stable and loving home should be addressed.
- A child or young person must be encouraged and assisted, wherever practicable, to participate in and express their views about any proceeding, process or decision affecting them, and their views should be taken into account.
- A holistic approach should be taken that sees the child or young person as a whole person, including their developmental potential, educational and health needs, cultural identity, gender identity, sexual orientation, age and any disability.
- The primary responsibility for caring for and nurturing the wellbeing and development of the child or young person lies with their family and cultural group and, wherever possible, those relationships should be strengthened and maintained.
- The child or young person's place within their community should be recognised and the impact of a decision on the stability of a child or young person (including the stability of their education and of their connections to community) should be considered.[475]

The Oranga Tamariki Act also lists additional principles to be applied in exercising youth justice powers.[476] These include:

- Unless the public interest requires otherwise, criminal proceedings should not be instituted against a child or young person if there is an alternative means of dealing with the matter.
- A child or young person who commits an offence or is alleged to have committed an offence should be kept in the community so far as that is practicable and consonant with the need to ensure the safety of the public.
- A child or young person's age is a mitigating factor in determining whether to impose sanctions in respect of offending by a child or young person and the nature of any such sanctions.

- Any sanctions imposed on a child or young person who commits an offence should take the least restrictive form that is appropriate in the circumstances and take the form that is most likely to promote their development within their family and cultural group.
- Any measures for dealing with offending by a child or young person should, as far as practicable, address the causes underlying their offending.[477]

In addition, the Oranga Tamariki Act requires a court or person exercising powers in relation to youth justice to weigh four 'primary considerations'—these are the wellbeing and best interests of the child or young person, the public interest, the interests of any victim, and the accountability of the child or young person for their behaviour.[478]

We consider that the updated Tasmanian youth justice legislation should include similar principles that reflect contemporary understandings of child development, children's antisocial behaviour and children's needs. These principles should apply to the exercise of any power under the new legislation, including sentencing, which is discussed in more detail in Section 5.5.

Recommendation 12.12

The Tasmanian Government should ensure legislation to replace or amend the Youth Justice Act 1997 contains updated general principles of youth justice that reflect contemporary understandings of child development, children's antisocial behaviour and children's needs.

5.3 Expanding opportunities for pre-court diversion

In this section, we focus on diversionary processes that are available in Tasmania once a child or young person comes into contact with police, although we agree with the Tasmanian Commissioner for Children and Young People that:

> Greater attention must be given to recognising that the concept of diversion … can and should begin before contact with police and before an offence or harmful behaviour has occurred … There are a range of non-government organisations that do, and can, play an important role in providing diversionary options for children and young people in this area. This needs to be better recognised and appropriately resourced.[479]

According to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child:

- Measures that divert children from the formal criminal justice system (and avoid resorting to judicial proceedings) 'should be the preferred manner of dealing with children in the majority of cases' because such measures avoid stigmatising children, produce positive results for them, are cost-effective and are 'congruent with public safety'.[480]

- ‘Opportunities for diversion should be available as early as possible after [initial] contact with the [criminal justice] system, and at various stages throughout the process’.[481]
- ‘States parties should continually extend the range of offences for which diversion is possible, including serious offences where appropriate’.[482]

Currently, a child or young person who is alleged to have committed an offence in Tasmania may be eligible for diversion from the criminal justice system under the Youth Justice Act by means of an informal caution, a formal caution or a community conference.[483] We discuss each of these mechanisms in the following sections. There is also a school-based process for ‘informal diversion for unlawful occurrences on school grounds within the behaviour management response of schools’.[484]

A child or young person who is alleged to have committed a ‘prescribed offence’ under the Youth Justice Act is not eligible for diversion.[485] Prescribed offences are offences in respect of which the Magistrates Court (Youth Justice Division) does not have jurisdiction, and which are instead determined by the Supreme Court or the Magistrates Court’s adult jurisdiction.[486] A child or young person found guilty of a prescribed offence by an adult court can be sentenced under the Sentencing Act 1997—including to a term of imprisonment—or the Youth Justice Act.[487]

For all children and young people, murder, manslaughter and attempted murder are prescribed offences.[488] Also:

- for children or young people aged 14 years or older, prescribed offences include rape, aggravated sexual assault, persistent sexual abuse of a child, armed robbery and aggravated armed robbery[489]
- for young people aged 17 years, prescribed offences also include driving offences such as negligent driving causing death or serious injury, reckless driving, drink driving, drug driving and offences for excessive noise or smoke for vehicles and racing a vehicle.[490]

We note that this is an extensive list of offences, not all of which can be described as serious. For example, the offence of operating a vehicle ‘in a manner that emits unnecessary and unreasonable noise’, ‘in an unnecessary execution of speed’ or ‘in a race against another vehicle’ is punishable by a maximum penalty of imprisonment for three months and/or a fine.[491] It is unclear why a young person alleged to have committed this offence should be automatically excluded from diversion.

For eligible offences—that is, non-prescribed offences—a child or young person can only be diverted under the Youth Justice Act where they admit to committing the alleged offence.[492]

5.3.1 Informal caution

Where a police officer believes that a matter 'does not warrant any formal action' under the Youth Justice Act (and the child or young person admits to committing the offence), the officer may informally caution the child or young person against further offending, and no more proceedings may take place in respect of the matter.[493]

The Tasmania Police Manual states that children and young people must not be informally cautioned for 'any assault'.[494]

5.3.2 Formal caution

Where a police officer believes that a matter warrants a more formal action than an informal caution, the officer may require that the child or young person be formally cautioned against further offending.[495] The main difference between an informal caution and a formal caution is that the police officer may require the child or young person to enter an undertaking as part of a formal caution (described below), whereas this is not available for informal cautions.[496]

The Youth Justice Act specifies various procedural requirements that must be met before a formal caution may be issued—these include a requirement that the police officer explains to the child or young person that they are entitled to legal advice and to have the matter dealt with in court.[497] A formal caution cannot be administered unless the child or young person agrees to the caution.[498]

Where the child or young person to be cautioned is Aboriginal, the formal caution must, 'if practicable', be administered by an Elder of an Aboriginal community or a representative of a 'recognised Aboriginal organisation' in the presence of an authorised police officer.[499]

As part of a formal caution, the police officer may require the child or young person to enter into an undertaking to apologise to the victim, perform community service, pay compensation, make restitution or 'do anything else that may be appropriate in the circumstances'.[500]

Police keep a record of formal cautions and a formal caution may be treated as evidence of the commission of an offence by a police officer, community conference or court if the child or young person has to be dealt with for a subsequent offence.[501]

5.3.3 Community conference

Where a police officer believes that a matter warrants a more formal action than an informal caution, the officer may, as an alternative to a formal caution, require the Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People to convene a 'community conference' to deal with the matter.[502] A community conference cannot be convened unless the child or young person signs an undertaking to attend the conference.[503]

A community conference includes a facilitator, the child or young person and their guardians, any relative or other person with a close association to the child or young person who may be able to participate usefully in the conference, any victim(s) of the offence, the police officer who initiated the conference and a youth justice worker.[504] Where the child or young person is Aboriginal, an Aboriginal Elder or another representative of the child or young person's community must be invited to attend the conference.[505]

The Youth Justice Act does not specify the purpose or aim of a community conference, but it would appear to be to decide 'an appropriate sanction' for a child or young person.[506] A community conference may impose one or more sanctions on the child or young person, including:

- requiring the child or young person to apologise to the victim, perform community service or pay compensation to the victim for any injury suffered or any damage to property
- administering a caution to the child or young person, or
- requiring the child or young person to 'enter into an undertaking to do anything else that may be appropriate in the circumstances'.[507]

A child or young person cannot be prosecuted for the offence if they perform their obligations arising from the undertakings decided by the community conference.[508]

5.3.4 Declining rates of diversion in Tasmania

Data published by the Productivity Commission in its Report on Government Services indicates a downward trend in the use of diversion in Tasmania.[509] Overall, youth diversions (including informal cautions) as a proportion of alleged youth offenders aged 10 to 17 years fell from 52 per cent in 2012–13 to 43.3 per cent in 2021–22.[510] For Aboriginal children and young people, youth diversions as a proportion of alleged offenders decreased substantially from 45 per cent in 2012–13 to 22.5 per cent in 2021–22.[511] The Productivity Commission does not provide data on separate categories of diversion.

In 2021, the Sentencing Advisory Council reported that data from Tasmania Police showed a reduction between 2010–11 and 2018–19 in the proportion of youth files diverted, with reductions in the use of informal cautions and community conferences, and a corresponding increase in the proportion of briefs sent to prosecution.[512]

The Sentencing Advisory Council identified the following possible reasons for the decline in diversions over time:

- the involvement of schools for lower-level offending behaviour (presumably resulting in fewer low-level matters reaching the attention of police)[513]

- a decline in the overall number of young offenders, together with 'a corresponding concentration on a smaller cohort of more frequent youth offenders', meaning that matters escalated through the system more quickly[514]
- a '"class" factor', whereby the response of young people to police, and parental attitudes and support, may influence the use (or non-use) of diversion by police[515]
- the perception among some children and young people with knowledge of the youth justice system that there were likely to be 'harsher results' from the undertakings imposed through formal cautions and community conferences than from outcomes in the Magistrates Court[516]
- the absence of diversion programs across Tasmania.[517]

In relation to parental support for diversion, Commissioner McLean has observed that:

> ... the current model assumes a support network exists around the child or young person that is resourced to be able to support the child to lead a different lifestyle. For many children and young people, this is simply not their reality ... a family which has multiple risk factors may find it very difficult to support a young person through a diversionary process without strong support.[518]

Children and young people who do not have a family support network—for example, children and young people under the guardianship of the State—may not be able to access diversion for these reasons.

Commissioner McLean has also noted that the discretionary nature of diversion under the Youth Justice Act 'can result in variation between individual police officers, and regions'.[519]

5.3.5 The need for more diversion programs

The 2016 Custodial Youth Justice Options Paper produced by Noetic Solutions found that Tasmania did not have the 'breadth or depth' of diversionary services required to address the complex needs of children and young people.[520] More recently, Tasmania Legal Aid has advocated for diversionary programs to be made available in rural and regional areas of Tasmania, and for the development of 'universal programs' to 'avoid the postcode injustice that flows from a patchwork of options around the State'.[521]

In its 2021 report on sentencing young offenders, the Sentencing Advisory Council referred to a range of programs Tasmania Police uses to support diversion by way of caution or community conference.[522] These include prescribed courses at the Brain Injury Association of Tasmania, the 'Junior Fire Lighter Intervention Program' (through the Tasmanian Fire Service), the 'bike rebuilding program', Men's Shed programs and the First Tee program through the Police Citizens Youth Club.[523]

However, Mr Caltabiano told us that Tasmania does not have structured pre-court diversionary programs for children that apply uniformly across the State.[524] Children should be able to access effective diversionary programs regardless of where they live in Tasmania.

5.3.6 Youth justice reforms

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint includes a significant focus on diversion. One of its principles is to 'divert children and young people from the youth justice system wherever possible' and Strategy 2 is to 'ensure diversion from the justice system is early and lasting'.[525] The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint describes diversion as aiming to 'provide pathways through which children and young people with limited or no criminal history and who have committed low level offences can be directed away from the justice system'.[526]

The Tasmanian Government's diversion strategy aims to reduce the involvement of children and young people in the youth justice system by (among other commitments):

- providing a range of developmentally appropriate responses for children and young people under the minimum age of criminal responsibility, who are exhibiting behaviours that would otherwise be considered an offence
- providing a range of diversionary options and programs for children and young people who come into contact with the justice system
- ensuring Aboriginal children and young people have access to Aboriginal-led diversionary services
- ensuring children and young people have access to services to address their mental health, disability and alcohol and other drug dependence needs.[527]

Action 4 under the Government's Draft First Action Plan includes commitments to:

- review current diversionary options to 'identify what is working, what needs strengthening to ensure maximum impact and where there are service gaps'[528]
- develop a Diversionary Services Framework to 'guide and support the delivery of a range of diversionary programs across the continuum in Tasmania'[529]
- engage with Aboriginal communities to ensure a range of appropriate, culturally safe and Aboriginal-led services for Aboriginal children and young people[530]
- deliver new diversion programs by 2025.[531]

In February 2023, Secretary Bullard advised us that the Department for Education, Children and Young People had begun researching diversion programs in other jurisdictions.[532] We note that research indicates:

> While there is no 'one size fits all' approach to preventing youth offending, programs that have a strong theoretical basis, consider the individual needs of young people, are culturally sensitive to Indigenous Australians where relevant, and reflect on practice through iterative evaluation will be best placed to address the underlying causes of offending.[533]

5.3.7 Our recommendations

We note with concern the decreasing rates of diversion in Tasmania, particularly for Aboriginal children and young people. In Section 7.1, we recommend developing an Aboriginal youth justice strategy to examine and establish evidence-based, Aboriginal-led diversion programs for Aboriginal children and young people in contact with police (Recommendation 12.27).

We commend the Department for committing to create a Diversionary Services Framework and new diversion programs. In our view, this presents an opportunity to carefully examine the effectiveness of existing diversion processes to ensure opportunities for pre-court diversion in Tasmania can be maximised. In particular, the Government should examine the use of police discretion in referring children and young people to diversion and the use and effectiveness of undertakings imposed with formal cautions and sanctions imposed by community conferences.

The Government should also reconsider the current list of prescribed offences to ensure opportunities for pre-court diversion can be maximised. In addition, the Government should ensure prescribed offences do not exclude children engaging in harmful sexual behaviours from broader therapeutic and diversionary opportunities. We discuss other diversionary mechanisms in Chapters 16 and 21.

We note that the Commissioner for Children and Young People has advocated for repealing prescribed offences from the Youth Justice Act, so 'all types of offences including serious offending [can] be dealt with in a trauma informed, child centred way that is consistent with best practice'.[534] We discuss court specialisation for children and young people in Section 5.5.4.

1. The Tasmanian Government, in reviewing current diversion processes and developing a Diversionary Services Framework, should:

    a. examine the exercise of police discretion to determine whether opportunities for cautioning and community conferencing are being maximised, particularly for Aboriginal children and young people, and children and young people without a strong family support network

b. commission research to examine the effectiveness of formal cautions imposed with undertakings and the sanctions imposed by community conferences, to ensure they are proportionate to the alleged offending and not unnecessarily onerous

c. introduce legislation to widen the range of alleged offences in respect of which diversion may be pursued and create a presumption in favour of pre-court diversion for children and young people.

2. The Tasmanian Government should begin statewide delivery of new diversion programs under the Diversionary Services Framework by 2025.

5.4 Increasing access to bail for children and young people

A child or young person whom police do not consider suitable for diversion may be arrested and charged with an offence. Police must release the child or young person on bail 'unless there is reasonable ground for believing that such a course would not be desirable in the interests of justice'.[535] If police refuse bail, the child or young person must be brought before a magistrate or a justice of the peace 'as soon as practicable'.[536]

During business hours, the child or young person will appear before a magistrate for a bail hearing. After hours, the child or young person will generally be brought before a 'bench justice'—a justice of the peace who is rostered by the Chief Magistrate to deal with out of hours bail hearings (among other matters)—although magistrates can also sit out of hours at the discretion of the Chief Magistrate.[537] A child or young person who is refused bail by a justice of the peace is remanded into youth detention until they can be brought before the Magistrates Court (Youth Justice Division).[538]

A child or young person who is refused bail by a magistrate is also remanded into youth detention until the criminal charge against them is heard in court. A child or young person may also be remanded after they have been found guilty of an offence, while awaiting sentencing.

According to data published by the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, on an average day in 2021–22, there were eight children and young people aged 10 to 17 years in detention in Tasmania and, of these, six were on remand.[539] In August 2022, Ms Atkins told us that 10 of the 11 children and young people held at the Ashley Youth Detention Centre at the time were on remand.[540] Ms Atkins described this proportion of remanded children and young people as 'a regular occurrence'.[541] Other Australian jurisdictions have similarly high proportions of children and young people on remand.[542] In 2021–22, children and young people who were unsentenced (on remand) spent an average of 57.5 days in detention in Tasmania.[543]

We note that, more recently, there has been a substantial increase in the number of children and young people in detention in Tasmania. In June 2023, Commissioner McLean told us that, as at 5 June 2023, there were 21 children and young people held at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, of whom 18 were on remand.[544]

According to Tasmania Legal Aid, 'it is commonly the case' that once the charges against a child who has been remanded are heard, 'the child is released without serving any further time in custody'.[545]

Research has demonstrated that remand is disruptive and harmful to children and young people and has little rehabilitative benefit.[546] According to the Victorian Sentencing Advisory Council, for children and young people, remand:

> … can lead to separation from family and community, disruption to education and employment, association with sentenced young offenders, being held in inappropriate facilities, being unable to access therapeutic programs, having an increased chance of being placed on remand if arrested again, and having an increased chance of receiving a custodial sentence compared with young people who are granted bail.[547]

5.4.1 Drivers of remand

We heard from victim-survivors, lawyers and policy experts that the absence of safe accommodation and support options was a key reason that children and young people were being denied bail and remanded.

Professor White referred to the 'longstanding issue' in Tasmania of remanding children and young people 'mainly due to lack of adequate housing or alternative places to put kids'.[548] Similarly, Mr Caltabiano told us that magistrates often wished to include a condition of bail requiring the child or young person to reside at a specific address, and that where accommodation was not available, bail was harder to obtain.[549]

In its submission to the former Department of Communities on proposed reforms to the youth justice system, Tasmania Legal Aid stated that:

> Children in Tasmania are often refused bail because of problems with accommodation that are outside their control. This could include situations where the child is homeless, is under the care of child safety and without effective supervision, or because of mental health or drug problems.[550]

Hannah Phillips, a lawyer with experience working with youth in the Tasmanian justice and child safety systems, told us that children and young people with substance misuse, undiagnosed mental illness or with disability may be remanded because there were no available treatment facilities for children and young people in Tasmania.[551]

We also heard that whether a child or young person is granted bail may depend on whether they appear before a justice of the peace or a magistrate. Mr Caltabiano observed that children and young people refused bail by a justice of the peace at an after-hours bail hearing were 'commonly' granted bail when they appeared before a magistrate the following business day.[552] He indicated that this may be 'due to the Magistrates' broader understanding of the legislative framework and greater experience dealing with young people'.[553]

Similarly, research undertaken by the Australian Institute of Criminology on bail and remand for children and young people in Australia described some Tasmanian stakeholders as suggesting that the bail decisions of justices of the peace tended to be 'more punitive and risk averse in response to community attitudes towards youth crime'.[554] That research acknowledged that, in some jurisdictions, a more detailed case may be presented to a magistrate than to a justice of the peace and, while decisions by justices of the peace may seem punitive, it could be the case that magistrates are simply provided with more and better information with which to make decisions.[555] However, some stakeholders pointed to the need to educate justices of the peace on the role of bail in the criminal justice system and using detention as a last resort for children and young people.[556]

We also heard about the importance of legal representation for children and young people in bail hearings to minimise the risk of remand. Ms Phillips described a situation where the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service appeared out of hours for an Aboriginal young person who was on a child safety order and had multiple bail conditions across several matters:

> If I had not been there, the young person would have had to argue for their own bail, with only the Justice of the Peace, prosecutor, and a representative of Youth Justice present. Child Safety Service were not present at Court for the young person. The young female was ultimately bailed, but it was late at night and she had no way of getting home. If we were not there to advocate for this young person, it was highly likely she would have been remanded at Ashley Youth Detention Centre for the night … This highlights two things; the first is the importance of representation in out of hours Court but also the need to ensure guardians or parents are actively present for young people, when possible, in out of hours Court, in this instance Child Safety Service.[557]

The Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service is not funded to appear out of hours for Aboriginal children and young people, but does appear on occasions if it is 'particularly concerned for a young person's welfare and [has] capacity to assist'.[558]

Mr Caltabiano told us that there was only one after-hours duty lawyer service (for adults and children) operating in Tasmania—this service is funded by Tasmania Legal Aid from funding allocated by the Tasmanian Government and is provided by the Hobart Community Legal Centre at the Hobart Magistrates Court on Friday evening, Saturday and Sunday.[559] The Tasmanian Government's 2021–22 State Budget allocated $320,000 over four years to provide children and young people appearing in court after hours in Burnie, Devonport and Launceston with access to a duty lawyer.[560]

5.4.2 Bail support programs

Commissioner McLean has referred to a lack of appropriately resourced bail support programs for children and young people in Tasmania.[561]

Non-government organisation Save the Children provides the statewide 'Supporting Young People on Bail' program—a voluntary program where youth workers support children and young people aged 10 to 17 years on bail 'to achieve their recreational, educational and vocational/employment goals during their bail period and beyond' and to avoid further interaction with the youth justice system.[562] In its submission to the former Department of Communities on the proposed youth justice system reforms, the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service described the positive experience of an Aboriginal young person in this program, who was taken fishing on several occasions by a youth worker while on bail, which allowed them 'to create a bond and gave the young person something to look forward to'.[563]

Although it is a voluntary program, a magistrate may order a mandatory meeting of the child or young person with Save the Children workers, who create a bail support plan for the child or young person.[564] In her 2022 submission on the proposed youth justice reforms, Commissioner McLean indicated that, in some instances, young people had been remanded for several weeks to enable bail support plans to be prepared, in circumstances where a sentence of detention may not have been imposed—a practice that she noted appeared to be contrary to the aim of using detention as a last resort.[565]

Previously, the Save the Children bail support program was not available for children and young people with child protection involvement, but it is not clear whether this is still the case.[566] Bail support programs should be widely available to children and young people, regardless of their involvement with other service systems.

The Commissioner for Children and Young People, Tasmania Legal Aid and the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service have all advocated to expand bail support programs in Tasmania.[567] Commissioner McLean and Tasmania Legal Aid have indicated that this should include bail support workers who can coordinate support services and access brokerage funds for accommodation.[568]

5.4.3 Conditions of bail

Section 24B of the Youth Justice Act provides that a magistrate, justice of the peace or police officer who intends to admit a child or young person to bail must consider the youth justice principles in section 5 of the Act (extracted in Section 5.2) in deciding whether to impose any conditions of bail.[569]

Despite this provision, Commissioner McLean has drawn attention to the difficulties for many children and young people in complying with bail conditions requiring them to:

- submit to a curfew—such conditions can be particularly problematic for young people who are couch surfing, living in unstable accommodation or are otherwise at risk of homelessness
- not attend particular venues or locations—such conditions may restrict young people's access to essential areas such as bus terminals and supermarkets
- report to police or youth justice workers—such conditions can pose difficulties for young people due to a lack of transport and other practical challenges.[570]

Similarly, the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service has indicated that children and young people on bail may have difficulty keeping a mobile phone charged or maintaining mobile phone credit, which can be a barrier to accessing support services:

> In many instances, our lawyers are aware referrals have been made to support services for a young person but then they are non-contactable, leading to the referral being closed. This can mean little progress is made during adjournment periods in court to support and rehabilitate young people … [which] ultimately increase[s] the chance of young people ending up in detention.[571]

In the absence of coordinated and consistent support, such as support to get to appointments, children and young people may breach their conditions of bail and be remanded in custody.

5.4.4 Child-specific bail laws

With the exception of section 24B of the Youth Justice Act (outlined in Section 5.4.3), children and young people in Tasmania are essentially subject to the same legislation as adults in terms of bail.

Mr Caltabiano advocated for Tasmania adopting child-specific bail laws similar to those in Victoria.[572] Section 3B of the Bail Act 1977 (Vic) states that, in making a determination under the Act, a bail decision maker must take into account:

- the need to consider all other options before remanding the child in custody
- the need to strengthen and preserve the relationship between the child and the child's family, guardians or carers
- the desirability of allowing the living arrangements of the child to continue without interruption or disturbance
- the desirability of allowing the education, training or employment of the child to continue without interruption or disturbance
- the need to minimise stigma to the child resulting from being remanded in custody
- the likely sentence should the child be found guilty of the offence charged

- the need to ensure the conditions of bail are no more onerous than are necessary and do not constitute unfair management of the child.[573]

The Bail Act 1977 (Vic) also provides that:

- 'bail must not be refused to a child on the sole ground that the child does not have any, or any adequate, accommodation'[574]
- where a bail decision maker has to consider the 'surrounding circumstances', this must include 'any special vulnerability of the accused, including being a child or an Aboriginal person, being in ill health or having a cognitive impairment, an intellectual disability or a mental illness'.[575]

We note that, despite these provisions, the number of children and young people on remand on an average day in Victoria doubled between 2010 and 2019.[576] While child-specific bail laws alone are not sufficient to prevent or address concerningly high numbers of children and young people on remand, we see them as an important part of reducing remand numbers.

In 2021, the Tasmanian Government consulted on a draft Bail Bill, which did not include child-specific provisions for making bail determinations.[577] The Commissioner for Children and Young People expressed concerns about the likely impact of the Bill on children and young people in Tasmania.[578] At the time of writing, the Bail Bill 2021 had not been introduced into the Tasmanian Parliament.

5.4.5 Youth justice reforms

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint:

- acknowledges that appropriate bail support options, including accommodation options, are needed to avoid unnecessary detention[579]
- acknowledges that all other states and territories have some form of statewide bail assistance program, which includes three common key components—an after-hours support service, bail supervision and accommodation support[580]
- indicates that the Government aims to reduce the number of children and young people re-entering the youth justice system by 'delivering effective support that meets the individual needs and circumstances of children and young people on bail through a range of assisted bail options'.[581]

As noted in Section 2, the Government has committed to establishing two assisted bail facilities to:

> … provide safe stable accommodation, assistance managing bail conditions and support to address underlying issues that are contributing towards harmful, antisocial or offending behaviours.[582]

Information released by the Government on the proposed assisted bail facilities indicates that they will:

- be managed by the Government or a non-government organisation
- be 'semi secure to encourage compliance noting that [the] young person is not legally bound to stay there unless [this is a] condition of bail'
- have individual self-contained units, with one support and administration unit for staff and 'some recreational spaces'
- be targeted at young people who are 'likely to have no suitable bail address and/or require support for mental health, drug and alcohol, etc.', with charges for offences 'likely to be non-violent/lower seriousness', and who are unlikely to receive a custodial sentence if found guilty
- be available to a young person who is granted bail by a magistrate or a justice of the peace, including in situations where the young person has previously been remanded, and where the young person would otherwise not have been remanded but 'the extra support is warranted'
- have '24/7 onsite support provided by Government or [a non-government organisation]'.[583]

The Government advised us that 'the use of the term semi-secure in the proposed facilities model refers to the need to limit those who enter the facility to ensure the safety of all people onsite'.[584] We note that this is not entirely consistent with the above reference to 'encourag[ing] compliance'.

In February 2023, Secretary Bullard told us that planning consultants had been engaged to identify suitable sites across the State to accommodate all of the proposed new youth justice facilities (including the assisted bail facilities) and that an action plan for delivering the new infrastructure had been developed, with 'visioning' workshops scheduled for February 2023.[585]

5.4.6 Our recommendations

The high proportion of children on remand in Tasmania is extremely concerning. Remand should only be used in the most serious cases, where the child or young person poses an immediate danger to others, 'and even then only after community placement has been carefully considered'.[586] It must only be used as a measure of last resort and for the shortest possible period.[587]

We commend the Government for its intention to establish assisted bail facilities that will involve 24-hour onsite support for children and young people, including mental health and drug and alcohol support. We recommend that these facilities:

- have the capacity to deal with children and young people with complex needs
- include wraparound services such as health, education and employment
- engage specialist, therapeutically trained bail support workers to help children and young people attend programs and services, and to comply with conditions of bail.

Also, these facilities must be culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people (cultural safety is discussed in Section 7.3).

To ensure they do not become de facto remand centres, children and young people should not be prevented from leaving the assisted bail facilities (subject to any conditions of bail).

The size of the proposed assisted bail facilities has not yet been specified, but they are unlikely to accommodate every child or young person on bail who needs support. While we did not receive any evidence about the statewide Supporting Young People on Bail program run by Save the Children, we note that the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service is supportive of this program. As part of its youth justice reforms, the Government should examine the effectiveness of this program, consider the appropriateness of its eligibility criteria, and determine whether it needs increased funding, so more children and young people can be assisted with more intensive support, or whether additional bail support programs should be established.

The fate of a child or young person should not depend on whether their bail hearing occurs during business hours or after hours, or whether they appear before a magistrate or a justice of the peace. We recommend that the Government establishes a statewide 24-hour bail system for children and young people with bail decision makers (whether magistrates or justices of the peace) who have received specialist training in child development, trauma and disability (including communication deficits), and the issues faced by many Aboriginal children and young people, to ensure a consistent, trauma-informed and child-focused approach to decision making. Specialist training should contribute to ensuring bail conditions for children and young people are not unnecessarily onerous.

Children and young people should have access to legal representation in after-hours bail hearings. The bail system should also include access to bail support services after hours.

In Chapter 9, we recommend that, for children in out of home care, their child safety officer or another departmental representative with knowledge of the child attends any criminal proceedings involving the child in their role as the child's legal guardian, responsible for the child's care and protection (Recommendation 9.27). This should include bail hearings.

Finally, we recommend introducing child-specific bail laws that clearly outline the relevant considerations for bail decision making for children and young people.

Recommendation 12.14

The Tasmanian Government, to maximise opportunities for children and young people to be admitted to bail and minimise the number of children and young people on remand, should:

a. introduce legislation to

    i. require bail decision makers to consider the matters specified in section 3B of the Bail Act 1977 (Vic) when determining bail for a child, as well as the child's age (including their developmental age at the time of the alleged offence), Aboriginal status and any previous experience of trauma or out of home care

    ii. prohibit the refusal of bail to a child on the sole ground that the child does not have any, or any adequate, accommodation

b. examine the effectiveness of the existing bail support program with a view to expanding its capacity and funding additional bail support programs

c. establish and fully resource a statewide 24-hour bail system for children and young people with

    i. specialised and trained decision makers who have knowledge of children and young people, Aboriginal children and young people, and the impact of trauma

    ii. access to corresponding bail support services

    iii. access to legal representation for children and young people

d. ensure its proposed assisted bail facilities

    i. are small, homelike and, subject to bail conditions, do not place restrictions on the movements of children and young people

    ii. have the capacity to deal with children and young people with complex needs

    iii. are designed to include wraparound services, such as health, education and employment

    iv. are culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people

    v. include specialist, therapeutically trained bail support workers to help children and young people attend programs and services, and to comply with their conditions of bail.

5.5 Ensuring detention is a sentence of last resort

According to the Committee on the Rights of the Child, youth justice laws:

> … should contain a wide variety of non-custodial measures and should expressly prioritize the use of such measures to ensure that deprivation of liberty is used only as a measure of last resort and for the shortest appropriate period of time.[588]

5.5.1 Tasmania's sentencing framework

If a child or young person is found guilty of an offence by the Magistrates Court (Youth Justice Division), the court must sentence the child or young person under the Youth Justice Act, defer sentencing or make an order that the child or young person attend a community conference convened by the Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People.[589]

Section 47 of the Youth Justice Act lists sentencing orders that the court may impose. These are not expressed or described as a hierarchy. The court can:[590]

- dismiss the charge and impose no further sentence[591]
- dismiss the charge and 'reprimand' (formally warn) the child or young person[592]
- dismiss the charge and require the child or young person to enter into an undertaking to 'be of good behaviour'—this is a form of conditional, unsupervised release where the child or young person undertakes to do or refrain from doing acts specified in the undertaking for a period of no more than six months[593]
- release the child or young person and adjourn the proceedings on conditions—sentencing is postponed for a period of no more than 12 months on conditions set out by the court that must be 'reasonable in the circumstances'[594]
- impose a fine—maximum amounts vary depending on the age of the child or young person[595]
- make a probation order—this is an order supervised by a youth justice worker requiring the child or young person to report to, receive visits from and obey the instructions of the youth justice worker, and to comply with any 'special conditions' specified in the order, including attending school or rehabilitation programs, abstaining from drinking alcohol or using drugs, residing at a specified address, submitting to a curfew and undergoing drug counselling and treatment[596]
- make a community service order—this is an order requiring the child or young person to perform a 'community service activity' approved by the Secretary and assigned by a youth justice worker, and to comply with special conditions like those available for probation orders[597]

- make a detention order not exceeding two years—the court may also order that part or all of the period of detention be 'suspended' (enabling the child or young person to be released), subject to conditions including reporting to a youth justice worker, attending programs directed by the worker, submitting to drug and alcohol testing, as well as any special conditions that the court imposes[598]
- in the case of a family violence offence, make a rehabilitation program order—this is an order to attend and take part in a rehabilitation program and comply with the reasonable directions of a person employed or engaged to conduct such a program[599]
- adjourn the proceedings, grant bail to the child or young person and defer sentencing until a date specified in the order, for the purpose of assessing the capacity of the child or young person and their prospects for rehabilitation, allowing them to participate in an 'intervention plan' or for other purposes.[600]

Alternatively, as noted, instead of sentencing the child or young person, the court can order that the child or young person attends a community conference convened by the Secretary.[601] The procedure for the community conference is similar to the procedure for pre-court diversionary community conferences (discussed in Section 5.3.3).[602] If the child or young person fulfils all the undertakings entered into at the community conference, the court will dismiss the charge against the child or young person.[603]

In determining what sentencing order to make, the court must:

- ensure the rehabilitation of the child or young person is 'given more weight than is given to any other individual matter'[604]
- consider all the circumstances of the case, including the nature of the offence, the child or young person's age, any sentences or sanctions previously imposed on them and the 'impact any orders made will have on the youth's chances of finding or retaining employment or attending education and training'[605]
- not impose a sentence that is more severe than would be imposed on an adult who committed the same offence.[606]

Sentencers must also consider the 'general principles of youth justice' contained in section 5 of the Youth Justice Act (set out in Section 5.2 of this chapter). While most of these principles are potentially relevant to sentencing, we note in particular the following:

- Detention should only be used as a last resort and only for as short a time as necessary.[607]
- Any sanctioning is to be appropriate to the age, maturity and cultural identity of the child or young person.[608]

- Any sanctioning is to be designed to give a child or young person an opportunity to develop a sense of social responsibility and otherwise to develop in beneficial and socially acceptable ways.[609]

The Youth Justice Act does not explicitly require sentencers to consider any trauma or disadvantage experienced by the child or young person, although one of the objectives of the Act is to ensure that, 'whenever practicable, a youth who has committed, or is alleged to have committed, an offence is dealt with in a manner that takes into account the youth's social and family background'.[610] Trauma-informed sentencing is discussed in Section 5.5.3.

5.5.2 Sentencing children and young people in Tasmania

In October 2021, the Tasmanian Sentencing Advisory Council published a report on the sentencing of children and young people in Tasmania between 2014–15 and 2019–20.[611] The Sentencing Advisory Council found that, during this period:

- 90.7 per cent of sentencing orders made under the Youth Justice Act were non-custodial[612]
- the most frequently used sentencing order was 'release on conditions' (26 per cent)[613]
- supervised orders (probation and community service orders) accounted for 24 per cent of all sentencing orders[614]
- detention or suspended detention accounted for 9 per cent of sentencing orders.[615]

Data published by the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare indicates that there were 57.3 children and young people aged 10 to 17 years under community-based youth justice supervision in Tasmania on an average day in 2021–22, compared with 8.1 children and young people aged 10 to 17 years in youth detention on an average day in the same period.[616]

The number of children and young people under community-based youth justice supervision in Tasmania has decreased since 2012–13, when there were 144.9 children and young people aged 10 to 17 years under community-based supervision on an average day.[617] Despite this reduction, Tasmania has the fourth-highest rate of children and young people under community-based youth justice supervision after the Northern Territory, Queensland and Western Australia.[618]

According to Mr Caltabiano, '[i]t is a small step to go from a formal supervisory order to detention'.[619] This comment may refer to the fact that a child or young person who breaches a supervised sentencing order is at risk of being resentenced to detention.

Former Noetic Solutions consultant, Anthony McGinness, who has expertise reviewing youth justice systems nationally, told us that when the Tasmanian Government commissioned him to examine the custodial youth justice system in Tasmania in 2016, he observed the absence of a 'graduated model' in sentencing (which would give young people opportunities to be diverted from detention).[620] Mr McGinness referred instead to a 'blunt jump' between the sentencing options available and detention:

> From my experience working in youth justice, an ideal model would involve incremental steps in sentencing – however, young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were less likely to have been given these diversionary options, and more likely to quickly progress from warnings to custody. There are complex factors behind this, and it was not the primary focus of our analysis, but this is likely contributed to by the availability of alternatives and options, and practice by police and the justice system.[621]

We did not receive any specific evidence on the use of non-custodial sentencing orders under the Youth Justice Act, or the operation of Community Youth Justice (the area of the Department responsible for diversion and rehabilitation programs for young people under youth justice supervision in the community).[622] However, we note that the Youth Justice Act lists a range of community-based sentencing options for children and young people, all of which appear to be in use.[623] Without an analysis of the sentencing histories of individual children and young people, it is difficult to assess whether Mr McGinness's comment about the 'blunt jump' to detention is accurate. Nevertheless, we consider that there is scope to amend the Youth Justice Act to make it clearer that detention must be an option of last resort.

Also, we note that the Sentencing Advisory Council referred in its 2021 report to the absence of services to support conditions attached to community-based sentencing orders:

> In stakeholder consultations, concern was raised about the lack of services to support the conditions made in orders imposed by the court. There may not be the appropriate services at all or wait lists may be too long to allow the young person to access the program or service in a timely way.[624]

An effective youth justice system must deliver targeted therapeutic services to support community-based sentencing, including community-based education programs. An example is the Ignatius Learning Centre in Melbourne—a Catholic specialist secondary school operated by Jesuit Social Services for young men aged 15 to 17 years who are involved in the youth justice system and are disengaged, or at risk of disengaging, from education.[625] This program is available to young men who are being considered for a supervised community-based sentencing order (such as a youth supervision order or a youth control order) under the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) or who are on remand and facing a custodial sentence.[626] Attendance at the Ignatius Learning Centre may become a condition of the sentencing order.[627] The Ignatius Learning Centre

'provides a safe, holistic and therapeutic learning environment' and supports its students to complete the Victorian Certificate of Applied Learning.[628]

As well as the need for therapeutic services, the Commissioner for Children and Young People has, as discussed in Section 5.4.3, expressed concerns about attaching curfew conditions, reporting conditions and non-attendance conditions to bail orders. We note that similar concerns could apply to the conditions of community-based sentencing orders.

5.5.3 Trauma-informed sentencing

Between June 2019 and June 2020, the Victorian Sentencing Advisory Council published three reports on 'crossover kids', whom it defined as children who have been sentenced or diverted through the justice system and are also known to the Victorian Child Protection Service.[629] This research identified that children known to child protection were substantially over-represented among sentenced and diverted children, and Aboriginal children were 'substantially over-represented at the intersection of the child protection and youth justice systems'.[630]

These findings are broadly consistent with research published by Tasmania Legal Aid in its 2021 Children First report.[631] Tasmania Legal Aid found that, while only 10 per cent of its child clients who had a child safety file also had a youth justice file (defined in the report as 'crossover children'), crossover children accounted for 24 per cent of all youth justice files, and each crossover child had close to twice as many youth justice files as other children in the youth justice system.[632] Fifteen per cent of crossover children identified as Aboriginal.[633] Forty-one per cent of children first charged with an offence before the age of 14 years were crossover children.[634] In Chapter 9, we discuss the substantial crossover between children in out of home care and children in detention in Tasmania.

In its third report on crossover children, the Victorian Sentencing Advisory Council considered the sentencing of children who have experienced trauma, finding that:

> There is now broad consensus that trauma can affect children's neurological, psychological and even physical development. Children are particularly vulnerable to the effects of trauma: their brains are still developing, and trauma can interrupt or alter that process. In this context, trauma becomes a particularly relevant factor to consider in sentencing. It affects children's culpability, their ability to comply with court-ordered conditions and their capacity to be rehabilitated …[635]

In light of its research, the Victorian Sentencing Advisory Council suggested a range of other matters which courts should consider in sentencing children and young people in Victoria.[636] These included the child's experience of trauma; any child protection involvement; removal of the child from their family of origin (including siblings, extended family, culture and community); disruptions to the child's living situation or education;

any experience of out of home care; mental illness, neurological difficulties and developmental issues arising from, or exacerbated by, experiences of trauma; and the child's chronological age and developmental age at the time of sentencing.[637]

The Victorian Sentencing Advisory Council also suggested other considerations relevant to sentencing Aboriginal children, namely the consequences of intergenerational trauma; historical discriminatory policies; general and systemic racism; and any relevant cultural factors such as previous culturally inappropriate responses to Aboriginal children that may have worsened the effects of trauma.[638]

In addition, the Victorian Sentencing Advisory Council proposed several practical measures to reduce the over-representation of crossover children in the Criminal Division of the Children's Court and 'to strengthen the capacity of sentencing courts to be fully appraised of a child's [child] protection history and experience of trauma'.[639] These measures included:

- strengthening information sharing between the Family Division (which deals with child protection matters) and the Criminal Division of the Children's Court
- introducing a 'crossover list' in the Children's Court that would deal with the child protection and criminal matters of children involved in both systems
- providing dedicated child protection workers in the Criminal Division to facilitate access to reports about a young person's child protection history
- empowering the Criminal Division to compel child protection case workers to attend court and/or support a child in cases where the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services has parental responsibility for the child.[640]

As noted, in Chapter 9, we recommend that, in its role as guardian of a child in care responsible for the child's care and protection, the Department for Education, Children and Young People ensures a child safety officer or other departmental representative with knowledge of the child attends any criminal proceedings against the child in the Magistrates Court to support them in court and to inform the court of the child's background and child protection history (Recommendation 9.27). For the purposes of sentencing, this would give the court an understanding of any previous trauma the child has experienced. We consider court specialisation in the following section.

5.5.4 Court specialisation for children and young people

According to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child, the 'continuous and systematic training of professionals in the child justice system is crucial' to uphold the guarantees in the Convention on the Rights of the Child that every child receives a fair trial.[641] Such professionals should be 'well informed about the physical, psychological, mental and social development of children and adolescents, as well as about the special needs of the most marginalized children'.[642]

As noted, the Youth Justice Division of the Magistrates Court deals with most criminal charges against children and young people. A single magistrate in each registry hears all youth justice matters.[643] Also, the Youth Justice Division maintains a 'specialist list' of cases involving children and young people 'with alcohol and drug abuse, mental health problems, or any other particular problem or combination of problems where the Court might appropriately intervene'.[644] According to the Sentencing Advisory Council, the Youth Justice Division adopts a therapeutic, strengths-based, collaborative and 'largely non-adversarial' approach, with coordination and cooperation between the various agencies involved in the youth justice system.[645]

The Children's Division of the Magistrates Court, also referred to as the 'Children's Court', deals with child protection matters.[646] Professor White told us that there were two magistrates who are designated as Children's Court magistrates and who are 'essentially specialist magistrates'.[647] However, Commissioner McLean told us that she is not aware of any specialisation in respect of the Children's Division, and that—other than those magistrates who may be recused (unable to hear a matter) due to a conflict of interest—all magistrates deal with Children's Division matters statewide.[648]

The Magistrates Court does not appear to have a specific 'crossover list' for children and young people with criminal matters who also have child protection involvement. Commissioner McLean told us that where a child or young person is the subject of both child protection and youth justice proceedings:

> … different magistrates, in different courtrooms, may deal with each matter, which results in low confidence that the courts have a shared or consistent view on how best to address the offending behaviour and child protection needs of the young person.[649]

As noted in Section 5.3, charges for prescribed offences against children and young people are dealt with in the Supreme Court or the Magistrates Court's adult jurisdiction, and sentencing for such offences may occur under the Sentencing Act 1997 rather than the Youth Justice Act. In 2021, the Sentencing Advisory Council observed that:

> The low number of youth offenders sentenced in the Supreme Court has [a] bearing on infrastructure provision as well as the level of specialist knowledge of judges in dealing with young people.[650]

Some stakeholders consulted by the Sentencing Advisory Council expressed the view that 'the process in the Supreme Court generally treats children as "mini adults"'.[651]

Professor White said he would value 'more therapeutic oriented judges and magistrates in Tasmania who are specially trained, fostered by specialist court divisions that could support this'.[652]

Despite the existence of a Children's Division and a Youth Justice Division in the Magistrates Court, Tasmania Legal Aid has described Tasmanian courts as 'imposing, adult environments' where '[i]t is common for children to be waiting for their case in the same area with adults charged with criminal offences'.[653] Tasmania Legal Aid has advocated for establishing a separate, standalone Children's Court in Tasmania to deal with youth justice and child protection matters.[654] Mr Caltabiano said that a specialist Children's Court should be physically designed for children and staffed by dedicated magistrates.[655]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People has also indicated that 'serious consideration should be given to establishing a standalone Children's Court in Tasmania with jurisdiction to hear all matters involving children and young people', including charges for prescribed offences.[656] As noted, charges for prescribed offences are currently excluded from the jurisdiction of the Youth Justice Division of the Magistrates Court. We note that, before establishing the Youth Justice Division of the Magistrates Court in 1997, Tasmania had a separate Children's Court.[657]

We consider that a specialist Children's Court in Tasmania would significantly benefit children and young people. While separate court facilities for children and young people are ideal, we acknowledge that these may be impractical in Tasmania given its population size. In Section 5.5.6, we recommend establishing a new specialist division of the Magistrates Court to deal with child protection matters and criminal charges against children and young people.

5.5.5 Youth justice reforms

Strategy 3 of the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint is to 'establish a therapeutically based criminal justice response for children and young people' that 'provides a range of interventions and support options that address criminogenic needs, target the driving factors behind offending behaviours and build upon strengths'.[658] This includes '[e]nsuring the availability of graduated sentencing options' to reduce the number of children and young people re-entering the criminal justice system.[659]

Action 4 of the Draft First Action Plan is to '[i]mplement a range of diversion, bail support and community based sentencing programs'.[660] In his February 2023 update, Secretary Bullard advised that work had begun on:

- researching community-based sentencing programs in other jurisdictions
- implementing a pilot program within Community Youth Justice 'to trial an intensive care team support program with a small number of children and young people who are engaged with the youth justice system and have complex needs'.[661]

5.5.6 Our recommendations

The Government's proposed review of the Youth Justice Act offers an opportunity to reconsider the suite of sentencing options available for children and young people and to clarify the sentencing hierarchy. As well as the updated youth justice principles recommended in Section 5.2 (Recommendation 12.12), the new Youth Justice Act should include sentencing principles that identify rehabilitation as the primary purpose of sentencing. In determining an appropriate sentence for a child or young person, courts should be required to consider factors related to a child or young person's trauma background and their child protection and out of home care history.

In developing new community-based sentencing orders, the Government should ensure children and young people on such orders have access to appropriate rehabilitation programs and are supported to comply with the conditions of their orders.

To increase court specialisation for children and young people, we recommend establishing a new specialist division of the Magistrates Court to hear and determine child protection matters (currently heard by the Children's Division) and criminal matters against children and young people (currently heard by the Youth Justice Division). This new division should be constituted by at least three dedicated, full-time specialist magistrates—one based in Hobart, one in Launceston and one in Devonport and Burnie—drawn from the existing pool of magistrates. The specialist magistrates should have an understanding of child and adolescent development, trauma, child and adolescent mental health, children's cognitive and communication deficits, and Aboriginal cultural safety.

The Government should support the Magistrates Court to arrange for the new specialist children's division to be independently evaluated after three years to examine the adequacy of its resourcing.

The Government should also ensure any future redevelopments of Tasmanian court facilities consider modifications to make those facilities less formal and intimidating, and more child-friendly.

Finally, we recommend that the Government funds professional development for judicial officers in adult jurisdictions hearing criminal charges against children and young people.

Recommendation 12.15

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. ensure any legislation designed to amend or replace the Youth Justice Act 1997 provides that

i. rehabilitation is the primary purpose of sentencing a child

ii. the list of sentencing options is a hierarchy and a sentencer can only impose a sentence at a particular level of the hierarchy if satisfied that it is not appropriate to impose a sentence that is 'lower' in the hierarchy

iii. a sentence imposed on a child should be the minimum intervention required in the circumstances

iv. a custodial sentence must only be imposed as a last resort and for the minimum period necessary

v. in sentencing a child the court must consider the child's experience of trauma, any child protection involvement or experience of out of home care, disruptions to the child's living situation or education, any mental illness, neurological difficulties or developmental issues experienced by the child, and the child's chronological age and developmental age at the time of sentencing

vi. in sentencing an Aboriginal child, the court must consider additional factors including the consequences of intergenerational trauma, historical discriminatory policies, general and systemic racism, and any previous culturally inappropriate responses that may have worsened the effects of trauma on the child

vii. there is a presumption against imposing restrictive conditions (such as curfews and non-association conditions) with community-based sentencing orders, which may increase a child's likelihood of breaching a sentencing order and being sentenced to detention

b. ensure children who are sentenced to a supervised community-based order receive adequate support to comply with the conditions of the order from therapeutically trained, culturally competent staff

c. assist and support the Magistrates Court to establish a new division of the Court to hear and determine both child protection matters and criminal charges against children and young people, which should be constituted by at least three dedicated full-time magistrates with specialist knowledge and skills relating to children and young people

d. support the Magistrates Court to arrange for the implementation and operation of the Court's new specialist division to be independently evaluated after three years

e. fund the Magistrates and Supreme Courts to provide professional development for judicial officers hearing matters involving children and young people in the adult jurisdiction, in areas including child and adolescent development, trauma, child and adolescent mental health, cognitive and communication deficits, and Aboriginal cultural safety.

6 Creating a child-focused youth detention system

As discussed in Section 4.1, youth detention environments that deprive children and young people of their liberty, dislocate them from family and community, and impose strict rules, discipline and punishment expose children and young people to 'a unique set of factors that may heighten their risk of being sexually abused'.[662]

The case studies in this volume reveal the cruel, inhumane and degrading environment and culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, where some children and young people were subjected to human rights violations, violence, abuse and neglect, including child sexual abuse. In Section 3, we discuss measures to acknowledge this abuse. Here, we focus on measures to protect against such abuse occurring in the future.

In Section 4.2, we note stakeholder views that Ashley Youth Detention Centre resembles an adult correctional facility rather than a youth justice facility focused on rehabilitating children and young people. Former Commissioner for Children and Young People Mark Morrissey told us of a commonly held view among Centre staff that 'their role was to be custodians first and foremost, akin to prison officers', with rehabilitation 'very much a lower order priority'.[663]

We also heard evidence from multiple experts across the areas of law, psychology, social work and criminology that children and young people in detention have complex needs arising from cognitive disability, exposure to family violence, neglect, abuse, trauma, mental illness, substance misuse issues, homelessness, involvement in the child protection system, disrupted education and significant socioeconomic disadvantage.[664]

A detention environment that responds to such needs with punishment, bullying and intimidation—through isolation, force, restraints and unnecessary searches—rather than with trauma-informed, therapeutic care risks further traumatising and marginalising already vulnerable children and young people. It also significantly increases their risk of experiencing child sexual abuse in detention.[665] Such an approach is also ineffective in reducing offending and enhancing community safety.[666]

As noted in Section 5, to minimise the risk of child sexual abuse in detention, every effort must be made to divert children and young people from remand and custodial sentences.[667] However, where a child or young person cannot be, or is not, diverted from remand or a custodial sentence, it is essential that they receive the support and care they need while in detention to turn their life around and avoid returning to detention. This is necessary to protect children and young people against the continuing risk of child sexual abuse in detention, to reduce the risk that they will eventually enter adult prison and to increase community safety by reducing the likelihood of recidivism.[668]

> Every child deprived of liberty shall be treated with humanity and respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, and in a manner which takes into account the needs of persons of his or her age.[669]

In this section, we consider the reforms required in Tasmania to achieve a fundamental shift from a punitive, correctional approach to youth detention to an effective, humane, child-focused system that recognises that children and young people are developmentally different from adults and have the unique potential for rehabilitation, given the right support. The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint describes this as a 'therapeutic approach' that 'frames children and young people as vulnerable and in need of support and healing, as opposed to punishment or fear'.[670]

The Northern Territory Royal Commission examined international best practice for youth detention facilities and identified the following key features of effective systems, where violent incidents were rare and recidivism rates were low:

- small, 'normalised' facilities that reflect a residential design[671]
- intensive therapeutic services that address the immediate causes of a young person's offending and the problems in a young person's life, such as drug and alcohol misuse and homelessness, that make offending more likely[672]
- high-quality education (including vocational training) as a central part of the facility's operations[673]
- structured, full days and a wide range of activities to keep children and young people busy[674]
- highly skilled staff who actively engage with children and young people, model positive behaviours and can manage difficult behaviours[675]
- security that is achieved primarily through relationships between children and young people and staff, rather than through 'the use of fences, locks, isolation and restraints'[676]
- community involvement in the day-to-day operation of the facility[677]

- strong leadership from senior managers who are 'committed to the vision of reform'[678]
- evidence-based decision making in youth justice reform, noting that 'the evidence often points the opposite way to what many people intuitively assume is the best approach'.[679]

As outlined in Section 2, the Tasmanian Government has announced a substantial youth justice reform agenda, encapsulated in its Draft Youth Justice Blueprint, Draft First Action Plan and Keeping Kids Safe Plan.[680] This reform agenda follows several earlier reviews and unsuccessful attempts at youth justice system reform (outlined in Chapter 10), including attempts to implement a therapeutic model of care in youth detention in 2017 and 2018 via the 'Ashley Model' and the 'Ashley+ Model' (also referred to as the 'Ashley+ Approach').[681]

Given that we did not undertake a full inquiry into the youth detention system, we do not make detailed recommendations on all aspects of youth detention. Instead, we focus primarily on the issues that stood out in the evidence we received as the most relevant to preventing child sexual abuse while a child or young person is in detention. Our recommendations in this section address:

- the design of the detention facility intended to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre
- measures to increase safety for children and young people in detention through the use of closed-circuit television cameras, body-worn cameras and viewing panel swipe readers
- the need for highly skilled staff who can apply a trauma-informed and therapeutic model of care
- implementing a multidisciplinary approach to meeting the needs of children and young people in detention
- access to health care for children and young people in detention
- children and young people's access to high-quality education in detention
- promoting connections between children and young people in detention and their families and communities
- effective exit planning and support for children and young people after their release from detention
- the process for transferring children and young people from youth detention to adult prison facilities.

Our recommendations to ensure youth detention in Tasmania is culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people are in Section 7.3. We discuss leadership in the youth detention system in Section 4.4.

6.1 Designing a contemporary, best practice detention facility

As outlined in Section 2, the Government has announced that it intends to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre with several new facilities, including one 'detention/remand centre' in southern Tasmania.[682] According to the Government's Draft First Action Plan, this facility will be 'purpose-built' and will 'provide the opportunity for intensive intervention and rehabilitation through a therapeutic model of care'.[683]

We note that international human rights instruments require children and young people on remand to be separated from children and young people who have been convicted and sentenced.[684] We acknowledge that if the total package of our recommendations was implemented as intended, there would be a very small group of older children whose danger to the community could not be managed in community settings, who would be remanded in custody. Although it is undesirable for children on remand to be detained with children who have been sentenced, we recognise that the small numbers involved may make separating these groups impractical and could effectively result in isolation.

6.1.1 Physical design

According to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child, children deprived of liberty should be 'provided with a physical environment and accommodation conducive to the reintegrative aims of residential placement'.[685] As noted, the most effective youth detention facilities are those that have 'moved away from the institutional prison model … towards more normalised, home like facilities'.[686] This is in part because physical design affects behaviour. In a facility based on a residential design, young people and staff perceive themselves and others more positively than in an institutional design, and as a result, the atmosphere is calmer, stress is reduced and behaviour improves.[687]

Elena Campbell, Associate Director, Research, Advocacy and Policy at the Centre for Innovative Justice, referred positively to the approach of the Diagrama Foundation in Spain, which runs 35 centres for children and young people remanded or sentenced to custody.[688] According to a report prepared by the Diagrama Foundation for the Northern Territory Royal Commission:

> As far as possible we make our centres feel like a normal environment with young people engaged in their decoration, upkeep, gardening; with everyday furniture rather than 'prison' furniture and a daily rhythm that is appropriate to the age of the young person – a normal 9:30 or 10:00pm bedtime. This provides young > people with greater opportunities to learn and they go to bed tired and sleep better. We also have fewer problems caused by the frustration of boredom or loneliness. All of the above contributes to making our centres feel like safe, normal environments where disruptions and use of force are low. Young people can focus on their progression and build skills for successful life in the community.[689]

While the Diagrama Foundation report refers to six months as being the 'minimum time recommended' in its centres, it notes that 'even for young people who are with us for short periods, however, we expect some degree of progression towards developing positive behaviours'.[690] Its approach is therefore not inconsistent with an approach that also seeks to ensure detention is for as short a time as possible.

Anthony McGinness, former Noetic Solutions consultant, cited the example of the 'Missouri Model', which has been adopted in several United States jurisdictions and has recidivism rates as low as 15 per cent.[691] This model uses small, homelike secure facilities that are 'designed to look like schools rather than prisons' and incorporate pets and live plants.[692]

In recommending new secure facilities for Darwin and Alice Springs, the Northern Territory Royal Commission concluded that:

> Each facility should be designed on a campus model that has facilities for the accommodation, education, training and basic service delivery for the detained population within a secure perimeter. The facilities should be built and finished to a standard that would be considered acceptable in a new fee-for-service boarding school.[693]

The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People has also emphasised the importance of secure youth justice facilities closely resembling a home, where children and young people have ready access to communal spaces, including a kitchen, lounge area and outdoor spaces, and where soft furnishings, artwork, books and games contribute to a homelike environment.[694] We agree with these approaches.

Also, the physical design of the new facility should address the needs of girls and young women, gender diverse children and young people, and children and young people with disability. We discuss the needs of Aboriginal children and young people in detention in Section 7.

The new facility should also incorporate features that keep children and young people safe from sexual abuse. The National Royal Commission recognised that building and design features, such as the location of closed-circuit television cameras, could improve the observation of children's interactions with each other, as well as interactions with staff.[695] An expert in harmful sexual behaviours told us that there are design strategies available in various institutions to reduce the opportunity for harmful sexual behaviours—for example, positioning toilets in a central area where everyone can see who is entering and exiting, and locating staff near high-risk areas such as bathrooms or bedrooms.[696]

We discuss harmful sexual behaviours in detention in Section 8. We discuss closed-circuit television cameras and related issues in Section 6.2.

6.1.2 Size

The best-performing youth detention facilities tend to be small.[697] The largest secure facility in Missouri has 36 beds, while the Diagrama Foundation's centres range from small 12-bed facilities to larger facilities for around 70 young people.[698] The Northern Territory Royal Commission rejected any suggestion that a large facility be built 'for the sake of having spare capacity in case of an unexpected increase in the number of young people committed to detention'.[699] It recommended a total capacity of 46 beds across two proposed facilities (in Darwin and Alice Springs), with 'an additional 13 beds available to accommodate for higher than average days'.[700] It also recommended that each facility have small accommodation units with four to six bedrooms each.[701]

As noted in Section 5.4, on an average day in 2021–22, there were eight children and young people aged 10 to 17 years in detention in Tasmania.[702] Ashley Youth Detention Centre has 40 beds.[703] This is too large. Even with the more recent increase in remand numbers (outlined in Section 5.4), Tasmania's small youth detention population lends itself to establishing a smaller secure facility.

In Section 5.1, we recommend that the Government increases the minimum age of criminal responsibility to 14 years and works towards increasing the minimum age of detention (including remand) to 16 years (Recommendation 12.11). In that section, we also recommend adopting diversionary and sentencing processes to reduce the number of children and young people entering detention. The combined effect of these measures would be that, even in the short term, only young people aged 14 to 17 years would be eligible for remand or a custodial sentence, and the detention population would be smaller than at present.

As outlined in Section 5.1.2, the Tasmanian Government has committed to increasing the minimum age of detention to 14 years, although it will not do this until 'new bail and sentencing options [are] developed to better support children and young people under the age of 14'.[704] This is likely to take time because it appears to be intended to form part of the Government's proposed review of the Youth Justice Act.[705] Until such changes are implemented, children as young as 10 could continue to be remanded or sentenced to detention. Nevertheless, this does not alter our view that any new detention facility should be small.

6.1.3 Location

In March 2023, the Government announced that two sites had been shortlisted for the new detention facility, identified due to their:

> … substantial size, separation from major residential areas, their proximity to Hobart, the limited visibility (or with capacity for screening) from surrounding properties and their appropriate zoning under the relevant planning scheme.[706]

At the time of writing, a site for the new detention facility had not been selected. We note that one of the shortlisted sites is in Risdon. The Northern Territory Royal Commission said that new secure youth detention facilities should not be located on, or close to, adult prison precincts.[707] We agree. Locating youth detention facilities near adult prisons risks undermining the distinctive approach of effective youth detention systems, which focus on rehabilitation and recognise that children and young people have unique needs based on their age and stage of development.

We note that locating a new detention facility in or near Hobart will have the effect of dislocating some children and young people from their communities and families. As discussed in Chapter 10, in 2016, Noetic Solutions recommended establishing two new purpose-built detention facilities to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre to keep detained children and young people closer to their families and communities.[708]

However, we also note that the small Tasmanian youth detention population may not justify multiple detention facilities and that locating a single new facility in Hobart has the advantage of providing improved access to services and being more likely to attract a larger pool of professional staff than a regional location.[709] In Section 6.7, we discuss the need to support families to visit children and young people in detention.

Recommendation 12.16

The Tasmanian Government should ensure its proposed new detention facility (and any future detention facilities) are small and homelike and incorporate design features that reflect best practice international youth detention facilities. This includes features that:

a. promote the development of trusting and therapeutic relationships between staff and children and young people

b. facilitate and enhance trauma-informed, therapeutic interventions for children and young people

c. minimise stigma to children and young people

d. facilitate and promote connections between children and young people, and their families and communities

e. protect children and young people against the risks of child sexual abuse (including harmful sexual behaviours)—for example, by enabling line-of-sight supervision as far as possible, without infringing on children and young people's privacy.

6.2 Security measures to increase children's safety in detention

If therapeutic interventions are to be effective, children and young people in detention must feel safe. As noted, in best practice youth detention facilities, security—and therefore feelings of safety—are achieved primarily through positive relationships between staff and young people and through constant, active supervision by staff, rather than through security features such as surveillance that are common in adult prisons (refer to the discussion in Section 6.3.1). However, establishing such an approach in Tasmania is likely to take time, particularly in a system that has previously adopted a highly punitive approach to youth detention.

Surveillance cameras in youth detention facilities enable internal and external oversight of interactions in the facility, improve staff accountability and help to prevent potential abuses of power.[710] According to the Northern Territory Royal Commission, '[t]he availability of video evidence of use of force incidents provides the best objective evidence of what has occurred'.[711] It recommended that:

- closed-circuit television cameras cover all parts of youth detention centres other than bathroom facilities[712]
- all closed-circuit television camera footage be retained for at least 12 months[713]
- body-worn video cameras that record both video and sound be introduced in youth detention centres.[714]

As described in Chapter 11, Case study 1, several victim-survivors who had been detained in Ashley Youth Detention Centre told us they had been sexually abused in parts of the Centre where there were no surveillance cameras; they advocated strongly for extra cameras to keep children and young people safe. Some victim-survivors also told us that staff had watched them while they were showering through 'viewing panels' designed to enable observation of a child or young person at risk of suicide or self-harm.[715]

The Government's Keeping Kids Safe Plan commits it to making the following improvements to security and safety at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

- updating closed-circuit television coverage and installing more cameras to cover blackspots[716]
- installing a closed-circuit television control room with trained personnel to monitor coverage[717]
- developing and implementing a security risk management plan with supporting policies and procedures[718]
- investigating the use of body-worn cameras and 'viewing panel swipe readers', requiring an access control card to be read on a reader before the viewing panel can be opened[719]
- moving from paper records to an electronic records management system.[720]

Most of these actions were due to be completed by December 2022. Recommendations from the investigation into body-worn cameras were due to be implemented by July 2023.[721] In February 2023, Secretary Bullard advised us that the security risk management plan had been completed and that all other actions were 'underway'.[722]

In June 2023, the Department told us that although it has explored installing closed-circuit television across Ashley Youth Detention Centre, it has been advised that it is not possible to implement coverage across the entire current site.[723] The Department said it is investigating other forms of video and audio surveillance and that '[a]ppropriate surveillance will be a key consideration in the design of the new youth detention facilities'.[724] It is not clear to us why it is not possible to implement closed-circuit television coverage across the entire current site, nor what other forms of video and audio surveillance the Department may be exploring.

While we are encouraged by the Department's commitments and activities in relation to security at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the proposed detention facility, we are concerned that there are still parts of Ashley Youth Detention Centre that are not covered by surveillance cameras. The Department must ensure all public areas of the Centre are subject to effective electronic surveillance. This should not include children's rooms, bathrooms or other parts of the Centre where children's privacy may be infringed, such as spaces where children may be viewed undergoing a partially clothed search (although surveillance should cover staff who conduct the search).

We support introducing viewing panel swipe readers at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. We also support the introduction of body-worn cameras at the Centre to supplement closed-circuit television cameras because body-worn cameras have the advantage of recording sound, which we consider will provide more information on incidents, improve staff accountability and strengthen oversight of youth detention.

In recommending these security features, we are persuaded by the voices of victim-survivors who told us that more cameras were needed to keep children and young people in detention safe. However, we do not consider that such security features should be necessary indefinitely. We are mindful of the fact that a strong focus on surveillance is not consistent with the best practice approach of achieving security in youth detention facilities primarily through constructive relationships between staff and children and young people.

Therefore, we recommend that the continuing use of surveillance cameras in youth detention be the subject of regular annual reviews by the new Commission for Children and Young People (recommended in Chapter 18, Recommendation 18.6). These investigations should seek the views of children and young people in detention about whether surveillance cameras make them feel safe, and whether such mechanisms should be used in the proposed new detention facility intended to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

Footage from surveillance cameras needs to be properly managed to support effective oversight. We note that the Keeping Kids Safe Plan does not address the issue of management or retention of closed-circuit television camera footage.

The Ashley Youth Detention Centre procedure on 'CCTV Surveillance Cameras' states that the primary function of surveillance cameras is 'to provide recorded footage that may be viewed in the event of an incident or allegation' and that '[f]ootage will be reviewed, recorded and stored securely by the [Fire, Safety and Security Coordinator] on a regular basis'.[725] The procedure also indicates that footage of incidents required for investigation will be 'downloaded to disc' and 'retained footage will be transferred to portable hard drive on a regular basis'.[726] These requirements should be clarified and strengthened.

The National Royal Commission recommended that institutions that engage in child-related work implement a series of principles for record keeping, including creating and keeping full and accurate records of all incidents affecting child safety and wellbeing, and maintaining those records appropriately.[727] The National Royal Commission also recommended that public records authorities guide institutions on identifying records that may become relevant to an actual or alleged incident of child sexual abuse and on retaining and disposing of such records (Recommendation 8.3).[728]

In 2019, in response to Recommendation 8.3, the Tasmanian Office of the State Archivist issued a notice of a 'disposal freeze' on records relating to children.[729] The stated basis for the freeze was 'the complexity of identifying records that may be relevant for future disclosures of child abuse', noting that some children and young people take time to disclose abuse, and the State should ensure all relevant records are retained.[730]

The disposal freeze requires all organisations and agencies providing services to children to 'keep all records that contain the best information about children, services provided to them, and employees that provide the service, until 2029'.[731] We consider that this would include footage from surveillance cameras and body-worn cameras in youth detention. The Office of the State Archivist will review the disposal freeze before the National Redress Scheme ends.[732]

Recommendation 12.17

1. The Tasmanian Government, to enhance the safety of children and young people in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any new detention facility, should:
    a. ensure all public areas of the facility are subject to electronic surveillance
    b. introduce viewing panel swipe readers
    c. introduce body-worn cameras, supported by comprehensive policies and procedures for their use by staff
    d. develop and implement a policy for managing and retaining surveillance footage that i. takes account of the record-keeping principles identified by the National Royal Commission and the disposal freeze on records relating to children issued by the Office of the State Archivist
        ii. promotes transparency of staff conduct and enables regular audits of staff performance to be undertaken
        iii. requires footage to be made available on a timely basis on the lawful request of a government department or oversight body.
2. The Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) should annually review the use of electronic surveillance in detention to determine whether it increases children and young people's feelings of safety in detention and should continue to be used. The initial review should seek the views of children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre on whether electronic surveillance should be deployed in the proposed new detention facility.

6.3 Highly skilled staff applying a therapeutic model of care

6.3.1 Best practice

As noted, the best-performing youth detention facilities have highly skilled staff who actively engage with children and young people, model positive behaviour and can manage difficult behaviours through trauma-informed responses and de-escalation techniques.

At secure centres run by the Diagrama Foundation, highly qualified specialist staff known as 'social educators' work to 'build warm, parenting relationships' with young people by acting as encouraging and supportive role models, while setting 'consistent, clear and fair boundaries to help young people understand the positive and negative consequences of their behaviour'.[733] This reflects a model of care that is 'centred around the themes of relationships and emotions, cognition, behaviour and progression'.[734]

'Progression' in this context refers to a system of rewards and privileges used in Diagrama facilities that 'encourages young people to progress through a five-staged model from induction through to autonomy'.[735] Rewards include opportunities to work, study and socialise in the community. Young people can lose these privileges and then have to re-earn them.[736]

The Diagrama Foundation states that social educators 'genuinely care about the young people they work with' and support them throughout every aspect of their day.[737] Each Diagrama centre has separate security staff who 'act as a last resort in incident management' and 'stay in the background' as far as possible—they are not involved in the day-to-day care of children and young people.[738]

According to the Diagrama Foundation, its secure centres are:

> … stable and orderly places where young people feel safe and there are very low levels of disruptions. Therefore use of restraint and force are uncommon in our centres: in 2018, only 9.51% of young people across our centres were restrained and only 6.85% committed a serious incident [including verbal abuse and threatening behaviour] beyond their first two months in custody.[739]

In the Missouri Model, staff in detention facilities are known as 'youth specialists', who are responsible for the 'safety, personal conduct, care and therapy' of children and young people.[740] Staff undergo an intensive recruitment process to determine whether they are committed to helping children and young people succeed and have the necessary attributes for the role, such as good listening skills, empathy and an ability to create respect.[741] Youth specialists must complete 236 hours of training in their first two years, including multiple sessions on youth development, family systems and group facilitation.[742]

Youth specialists engage in constant, active, 'eyes-on, ears-on' supervision of children and young people—talking to them, engaging in activities with them and noticing any changes in their facial expressions and body language or in group dynamics that may indicate that intervention is required.[743] Youth specialists are also extensively trained in conflict management and techniques 'designed to defuse potential trouble and foster a safe environment'.[744]

We discuss the recruitment of a highly skilled workforce for Tasmanian youth detention facilities in Section 4.7.

6.3.2 Our evidence

In contrast with the approaches outlined in Section 6.3.1, the case studies in Chapter 11 describe the culture that existed at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, where we heard that some staff used threats of physical violence against children and young people, subjected them to unnecessary strip searches and sometimes placed them in forms of isolation, often as punishment and sometimes using force or restraints (refer also to Sections 4.2 and 9). As noted in Chapter 11, Case study 1, such practices may have further traumatised and criminalised children and young people.

In Chapter 10 and Chapter 11, Case study 3, we also describe the ways in which the Behaviour Development System—an incentive-based behaviour management protocol that allocated 'benefits' or 'restrictions' to a young person based on a colour ranking—and in particular the 'Blue Program', were used to punish and isolate children and young people. The Blue Program created another ranking that was lowest on the behaviour management spectrum and reserved for the children and young people displaying the most challenging behaviours. It took various forms over many years, but, in 2019, it was described as involving a young person being 'fully segregated from Ashley School, daily programs and activities, other young people in their Unit (subject to risk assessment) and the normal routine of the Centre'.[745]

Restrictions on the 'red' level in the Behaviour Development System included a bedtime of 7.30 pm (compared with a bedtime of 10.00 pm for a young person on the 'green' level), with young people confined to their rooms until breakfast at 8.00 am the following day.[746]

As discussed in Section 4.2.2, we heard concerns from staff that some children and young people were singled out by staff for unfavourable treatment through the Behaviour Development System because they were disliked.[747]

Also, as described in Section 4.2.2, we heard that some operational staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre saw themselves as being akin to prison guards. Professor White told us that, in his view, formed while taking part in an investigation into the death of a young person at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in 2010, the operational staff were:

> … basically "lockup people". Their role is essentially a prison guard role, and that role is reflected in both their approach and their training … It is not tied directly to the rehabilitation or restoration ideals which are commonly associated with youth justice.[748]

Our case studies illustrate that this observation is still relevant to more recent practices. Former Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff member Alysha (a pseudonym) indicated she did not observe in 'any way, shape or form' a culture at the Centre that valued rehabilitation and restorative practices.[749] We also heard that operational staff have historically not been required to hold appropriate qualifications.[750] We discuss the practices, qualifications, training, recruitment and impact of operational staff in Section 4.7.

6.3.3 Practice improvements

The Ashley Youth Detention Centre Practice Framework ('Practice Framework')—developed in 2020, with implementation starting in 2021—describes itself as a 'therapeutic, evidence-based framework' to guide how staff 'work in a therapeutic way with young people in detention'.[751] It includes a section on 'therapeutic and trauma-informed practice', which refers to the importance of staff working in ways that acknowledge children and young people's experiences of trauma, recognise their responses and provide opportunities to learn new responses and behaviours.[752]

The Practice Framework has six practice principles that emphasise building healthy and positive relationships, creating an environment where young people and staff feel safe and secure, providing opportunities for young people to connect with their families and communities, and giving young people a voice in decisions that affect them.[753] The Practice Framework is supported by the Centre's Learning and Development Framework, which specifies mandatory professional development requirements for staff.[754]

Pamela Honan, Director of Strategic Youth Services, said that implementation of the Practice Framework was in its 'early stages' and acknowledged that, without the appropriate skill set to work with children and young people demonstrating challenging behaviours, staff may fall back on punitive practices.[755] The Government has contracted the Australian Childhood Foundation to review the Practice Framework and the Learning and Development Framework.[756]

In 2021, Ashley Youth Detention Centre revised the Behaviour Development System and renamed it the Behaviour Development Program.[757] According to Ms Honan, the revised program was piloted and a new procedure for its use finalised in June 2022.[758] Secretary Pervan told us that the new Behaviour Development Program was 'a more positively focused and less punitive system'.[759]

The Government has also:

- contracted the Australian Childhood Foundation to deliver training for the Certificate IV in Youth Justice for staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre who do not already have qualifications in youth work (refer to Section 4.7.1)[760]
- engaged an external provider to deliver training for all staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in 'positive behaviour support', 'positive approaches to behaviour and safer de-escalation' and 'physical intervention' by June 2023.[761]

In addition, the Government has committed to developing and implementing standard operating procedures for security, including a review of existing procedures for using handcuffs.[762] The Department has also updated its procedure on personal searches of children and young people in detention in light of legislative changes to the requirements for searches in December 2022—these issues are discussed in Section 9.1.

More broadly, the Government has committed to developing a 'Youth Justice Model of Care' by 2025 to outline its approach to caring for children and young people across the youth justice system (not just in detention) and to establish an operating philosophy, service objectives and service standards based on therapeutic, trauma-informed care.[763]

6.3.4 Our recommendations

As noted, Tasmania's youth detention system needs to undergo a fundamental shift from a punitive approach to one that is centred on rehabilitation. Staff are central to this change. Operational staff must be equipped with the skills needed to undertake trauma-informed, culturally safe, child-centred interventions with children and young people, including the skills to anticipate, de-escalate and respond to challenging behaviours without resorting to force.

The Government's practice improvements described in Section 6.3.3 are positive, but more needs to be done. In Section 4.7.3, we recommend several changes to ensure staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any new detention facility are appropriately trained and qualified, and have the right skills and attitudes to work positively and effectively with children and young people in detention.

Also, in Section 7.3.5, we recommend that staff be equipped with the knowledge and skills to provide a culturally safe environment for Aboriginal children and young people, including through trauma-informed and culturally safe responses to children and young people engaging in self-harm or other challenging behaviours.

To support these recommendations, we consider that the Youth Justice Model of Care should include a specific custodial operating philosophy that is centred on rehabilitation and non-punitive, child-focused, therapeutic practice, and that recognises that this is the most effective strategy to support children and young people to make lasting behavioural changes, and thereby ensure community safety.

The Youth Justice Model of Care should also directly address the use of force, restraints and isolation in detention to ensure these tools are used minimally and only where other strategies in response to challenging behaviours have not worked. These tools should never be used as a punishment. This is discussed in Section 9.

Further consideration is needed on behaviour management programs in youth detention. As outlined in Section 6.3.2, the Behaviour Development System was used in a punitive way and does not appear to have been effective in promoting positive behaviour. We are not convinced that its replacement, the Behaviour Development Program, is different enough to warrant its continued use in Ashley Youth Detention Centre, or its use in any future youth detention facility.

However, we are also aware that carefully designed behaviour management systems based on incentives and rewards are in use in youth justice systems in jurisdictions with best practice detention facilities, such as those run by the Diagrama Foundation. We also note that the Northern Territory Royal Commission recommended that a 'continuum of behaviour management tools' be developed for youth detention 'to ensure that staff have a range of measures available to them to respond to inappropriate behaviour by young people without the use of force', including an incentive system designed to encourage responsible behaviours.[764] It indicated that behaviour management tools should be simple, fair and clear to staff and to children and young people, and that any incentive system should not restrict a young person's access to rehabilitation programs, education or physical exercise.[765]

We note that the Inspection Standards for Youth Custodial Centres in Tasmania include standards for behaviour management programs.[766] We recommend that these standards be reviewed in light of international best practice and research on age-appropriate responses to children and young people with trauma backgrounds and emotional regulation challenges.

Recommendation 12.18

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure:
    a. use of the Behaviour Development Program is discontinued in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and not adopted in any new detention facility
    b. the Youth Justice Model of Care planned to be developed by 2025 includes a specific operating philosophy, service objectives and service standards for detention facilities that are based on non-punitive, child-centred, trauma-informed, culturally safe practice and reflect international best practice in youth justice

c. staff in youth detention facilities have the skills needed to undertake evidence-based, trauma-informed, child-centred interventions with children and young people, including the skills to anticipate, de-escalate and respond effectively to challenging behaviours without resorting to force or restrictive practices

d. implementation of the Youth Justice Model of Care and updated Practice Framework for youth detention is monitored by the governance structure outlined in Recommendation 12.7.

2. The Custodial Inspector, or the body responsible for inspection standards for youth detention centres in Tasmania, should review standards and guidelines on the appropriate use in youth detention of behaviour management programs that incorporate incentives and rewards, having regard to international best practice and research on effective responses to children and young people with trauma backgrounds and emotional regulation challenges.

6.4 A collaborative, multidisciplinary approach to meeting children's needs

As noted, we heard that most children and young people in detention have highly complex needs arising from cognitive impairment, exposure to neglect or abuse, trauma and mental illness. Most also have drug and alcohol misuse issues.[767] Many have a history of involvement with the child protection system.[768] As discussed in Section 7, Aboriginal children and young people are over-represented in youth detention because of the impacts of colonisation and intergenerational trauma, and have distinct cultural needs.

We also heard that, over the past decade, the needs of children and young people in the youth justice system in Tasmania and elsewhere have become greater and more complex, and their offending has become more serious.[769] Professor James Ogloff AM, University Distinguished Professor of Forensic Behavioural Science, told us that youth justice systems across Australia have not kept pace with this changing cohort.[770]

An effective youth detention system must address the complex needs of children and young people, as well as the factors contributing to their offending behaviour.[771] This requires comprehensive assessments on admission, child-centred case planning and case management, and delivery of individualised therapeutic services that address health, wellbeing and criminogenic needs, including interventions to address offending behaviour. Such work requires a multidisciplinary approach.

Adjunct Associate Professor Mitchell told us that it is essential to look at 'the whole child' and adopt a common language and approach across all professionals (or disciplines) working with children in detention:

> If we … brought all of the key stakeholders (justice, disability, mental health, education and so on) together to support these kids in a way that is coordinated and collaborative, we will get better outcomes than if we try to work separately. These young people have complex needs across every domain of their life and it's going to require a concerted, comprehensive and sustained approach to guide them through the next chapter of their life if we want to change the trajectory from them ending up in adult prison.[772]

In Spain, each Diagrama secure facility has a 'technical team'—comprising teachers, psychologists and social workers—which is responsible for developing and delivering an individualised plan for each child or young person.[773] These plans are tailored to the child or young person's offending behaviour and include interventions that are a mix of one-on-one counselling, 'follow-up after an emotional outburst' and group work.[774]

6.4.1 Multidisciplinary approaches and case management at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Secretary Pervan told us that Ashley Youth Detention Centre 'operates as a multi-disciplinary centre' and that operational and other staff 'work collaboratively through multidisciplinary teams, weekly review meetings, and program meetings'.[775]

We heard about professionals, teams and policies that might have been able to support a multidisciplinary approach and case management at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, including:

- the 'Professional Services Team', whose role was to provide 'therapeutic supports and services to young people in detention', including developing case and care plans, arranging restorative case conferencing, making referrals to other services and advising operational staff on behaviour management strategies[776]
- a Case Management Officer or Case Manager who was part of the Professional Services Team[777]
- the 'Multi-Disciplinary Team', whose role was to provide 'clinical assessment, review, case planning and referral of the complex needs of young people in custody'[778]
- the 'Centre Support Team' (or, since 2022, the 'Weekly Review Meetings'), which met weekly to assess children and young people against the Behaviour Development Program, consider incidents at the Centre, make placement decisions and consider requests from young people[779]
- Case Management Guidelines, dated 2014, which outline that each child or young person must undergo, among other things, a 'Case Management Assessment' within two working days of admission, to be completed by the 'Case Manager'.[780]

It was not clear to us how these different roles, teams and policies operated in practice to achieve a multidisciplinary approach to meeting the needs of children and young people in detention. The extent to which children and young people experienced a highly skilled, professional, multidisciplinary response as part of their daily routine was also unclear.

We heard that the Multi-Disciplinary Team had previously not worked effectively.[781] Ms Honan told us that, before 2021, meetings of the Multi-Disciplinary Team consisted mostly of operational staff, with limited representation from the Professional Services Team, and that, as a result, 'operational pressures dominated decision making and appear to have "trumped" the therapeutic needs of young people'.[782] Similarly, Ms Gardiner told us that, during her time at the Centre in 2018, meetings of the Multi-Disciplinary Team 'rarely made any therapeutic recommendations'.[783]

Ms Honan also referred to tensions between the operational and professional services staff on the Multi-Disciplinary Team:

> There was a noticeable lack of professional regard and collaboration between the two streams with little to no external involvement from stakeholders in Multi-Disciplinary Team (MDT) meetings. Because of this dynamic and the dominance of operational staff represented at MDT, the multi-disciplinary process was ineffective. Practices had become punitive resulting in the moving or containment of residents in response to incidents, rather than understanding and responding in a trauma informed way to triggers and escalating behaviours. The two streams were philosophically opposed and silo[ed]. I would describe much of the workforce as disempowered.[784]

Secretary Pervan told us that a Multi-Disciplinary Team meeting must be held in respect of each young person at Ashley Youth Detention Centre every four weeks, at minimum.[785] While this requirement was stated in an earlier version of the Multi-Disciplinary Team's terms of reference, it does not appear in the current terms of reference.[786] Rather, the current terms of reference only require that a young person be discussed at a Multi-Disciplinary Team meeting on admission 'if behavioural or concerning behaviours are identified' and three weeks before their release.[787] The Multi-Disciplinary Team's terms of reference do not explain what kind of behaviours might give rise to the need for such a discussion. The nature of this multidisciplinary response appears very different from the multidisciplinary approach to working with children and young people in Spain's Diagrama model (discussed previously).

According to Ms Honan, the Centre Support Team also did not work as effectively as it should have, with 'therapeutic interventions competing with operational pressures' and documentation relating to decisions and actions poorly recorded or not recorded at all.[788] Ms Honan acknowledged that the Centre Support Team had previously operated in a punitive manner.[789] Ms Gardiner observed that the Centre Support Team was 'driven by the agenda' of operational staff and did not consider or incorporate the views of the Multi-Disciplinary Team.[790]

The Ashley Youth Detention Centre Case Management Guidelines provide for the participation of children and young people in case management processes in the following terms:

> Young people are encouraged to participate in all Case Management processes. They should be included in decision-making forums and processes and the development, implementation and review of their Case Plans and casework strategies.[791]

Despite this, it is not clear to us that children and young people were given the opportunity to participate in case management processes at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

6.4.2 Practice improvements

Ms Honan said that when she began in her role in October 2019, there was a 'tense divide' between the Professional Services Team and operational staff, which was 'exacerbated by the command and control management style of senior managers'.[792] However, at the time of her statement to our Commission of Inquiry in August 2022, she described the relationship between the two teams as 'respectful, supportive, collaborative and equal'.[793] Ms Honan attributed the changes in the relationship to a range of factors, including implementing the Practice Framework, appointing new senior managers in both teams and 'the shift to a more accountable and collaborative style of leadership and decision making'.[794]

Ms Honan also told us that, following a review of its terms of reference in 2021, the Multi-Disciplinary Team became more broadly representative and was well attended by staff from the Ashley Youth Detention Centre School, the Department of Health and the then Department of Communities.[795]

In February 2023, the Department advised us that it:

- had contracted the Australian Childhood Foundation to provide 'clinical review and support services, including specialist clinical services for young people covering emotional regulation, trauma-informed counselling and therapeutic supports'[796]
- was establishing a multidisciplinary Clinical Services Team to deliver 'therapeutic clinical services for assessment, support and rehabilitation of young people in contact with the youth justice system, with a strong initial focus' on detention.[797]

These are positive steps, but it is not clear to us how the Clinical Services Team will fit within and work with existing groups at Ashley Youth Detention Centre—particularly the Professional Services Team, the Multi-Disciplinary Team and the Weekly Review Meetings.

6.4.3 Services for children and young people on remand

As discussed in Section 5.4, children and young people on remand make up a large proportion of the youth detention population in Tasmania. In that section, we make several recommendations aimed at increasing opportunities for bail and diverting children and young people from remand. We also recommend that the Tasmanian Government works towards increasing the minimum age of detention, including remand, to 16 years. Implementing these recommendations would significantly reduce the number of children and young people on remand in Tasmania.

Nevertheless, following these changes, there may still be a small number of young people who would be denied bail and remanded due to the complexity of their needs and their high risk of offending while on bail. While we acknowledge the practical challenges associated with providing services to children and young people who may only be on remand for a short period, in our view, remand presents an opportunity for therapeutic intervention that should be seized wherever possible. The United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (referred to as the 'Beijing Rules') require that children and young people on remand:

> … receive care, protection and all necessary individual assistance—social, educational, vocational, psychological, medical and physical—that they may require in view of their age, sex and personality.[798]

However, it is also important to note that, while all children and young people who are on remand have been charged with an offence, those whose charges have not yet been determined have not been found guilty of an offence and are therefore entitled to the presumption of innocence. Professor Ogloff referred to the need to ensure children and young people on remand can openly discuss their behaviour with clinicians without incriminating themselves.[799]

The 2017 review of the Victorian youth justice system undertaken by Professor Ogloff and Penny Armytage considered the issue of services for children and young people on remand.[800] The review report noted that, despite introducing education for children and young people on remand in Victoria, there remained 'a concerning lack of activity and programs' delivered to remandees, which, combined with the lack of an effective custodial operating model and daily routine, had 'led to a largely unsettled and tense environment for all young people—on remand and sentenced alike'.[801]

The Victorian review described the reluctance to address offending behaviour while young people were on remand as 'a missed opportunity to deal early and effectively with criminogenic risk and needs' and observed that programs could be delivered that address offending behaviours without needing to explicitly address offence types.[802] It recommended that rehabilitation programs and interventions be offered to children and young people on remand, with legislative protections to prohibit using disclosures made during such programs or interventions as evidence of guilt at trial.[803] We agree with this approach.

6.4.4 Our recommendations

An effective youth detention system requires a coordinated, multidisciplinary, child-centred approach to meeting the needs of each child or young person in detention, including—to the extent practicable—those on remand. All children and young people in detention should experience highly skilled, professional, multidisciplinary supports as part of their daily routine. A multidisciplinary approach must bring together all the services necessary to fully support each child or young person and must not allow operational concerns to trump rehabilitation and therapeutic interventions. It must also provide genuine opportunities for each child or young person to participate in the decision making that affects them.

While we are encouraged by the Government's recent and proposed practice improvements, we are concerned that case management processes are unclear. The large number of teams involved in the care and management of each young person in detention creates scope for confusion and disagreement. A clearer, simpler approach is needed.

We also recommend developing a memorandum of understanding between all key stakeholders across justice, health, education, child protection and disability support services to enshrine a therapeutic approach to caring for children and young people in detention. We note that there is an existing memorandum of understanding between departments, but it is limited to delivering health services to children and young people in detention.[804]

The new memorandum of understanding should set out each agency's role and responsibilities and should address assessment, case planning, case management and exit planning (discussed in Section 6.8). It should also address processes for reporting incidents, managing complaints (including those involving child sexual abuse) and resolving disputes.

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. establish clear processes and guidelines for assessment, case planning and case management for children and young people in detention, to enable the delivery of tailored, multidisciplinary, therapeutic responses to each child and young person as part of their daily routine, which meet their health and wellbeing needs and address the factors contributing to their offending behaviour

b. implement a collaborative, multidisciplinary approach to responding to each child and young person in detention that includes all relevant service providers and, to the greatest extent possible, the child or young person's family

c. develop a memorandum of understanding between agencies involved in delivering services to children and young people in detention, including child protection, health, disability support and education that

   i. describes the roles and responsibilities of each agency in case planning and case management

   ii. commits to agencies adopting a collaborative, child-centred approach

   iii. contains clear protocols for record keeping, information sharing, incident reporting and dispute resolution

d. ensure each child or young person in detention (and/or their representative) is given the opportunity to participate in case planning and case management processes, express their views and have those views given due weight

e. ensure each child and young person on remand has access to therapeutic services and supports, with statutory protections that prohibit using disclosures made during interventions and programs on remand as evidence of guilt.

6.5 Health services for children in detention

As discussed in Chapter 10, the death of a young person at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in 2010 triggered several reviews and inquiries into the Centre, including a coronial inquest. These reviews and inquiries identified problems with access to health care at Ashley Youth Detention Centre at the time and resulted in the Department initiating several positive, health-related reforms. In this section, we identify other changes that should be made to improve children and young people's access to health care in detention.

6.5.1 Current health services

Barry Nicholson, Group Director, Forensic Mental Health and Correctional Primary Health Services, told us that recommendations made after the death in detention were implemented by November 2013.[805] The recommendations included transferring the functions of the Ashley Youth Detention Centre health service to the then Department of Health and Human Services' Correctional Primary Health Services, increasing nursing capacity and establishing a health care information system to store and share all client information in one place.[806]

Mr Nicholson described the health services currently available to children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[807] Under the supervision of a Nurse Unit Manager who is based at the Centre, Correctional Primary Health Services provide:

- an initial health assessment of a child or young person on admission to the Centre to determine the level of health care they will need while in detention[808]
- management of 'active health problems including review of medications, treatment of existing conditions, drug and alcohol issues and mental health assessments'[809]
- drug and alcohol detoxification and relapse prevention, and management of injections, injuries and other conditions requiring low- to medium-level health care[810]
- outpatient allied health service referrals, including forensic mental health, physiotherapy, dental and optometry services[811]
- sexual health education, drug and alcohol education, immunisation and other preventive health programs.[812]

Nurse-led clinics staffed by 3.5 full-time-equivalent nursing staff are available from 7.00 am to 7.00 pm each day, and nurses are available on-call outside these hours.[813] A doctor, who also has responsibilities outside Ashley Youth Detention Centre, is available twice weekly and is on-call outside these sessions.[814]

Also, the Alcohol and Drug Service provides support, counselling and harm minimisation education for children and young people wanting to address their substance use.[815] Mr Nicholson told us that, at the time of his statement in August 2022, there was 'no [alcohol and drug service] coverage due to shortages' in the service.[816]

A forensic psychologist is based full-time at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to 'address young people's criminogenic needs and provide therapy'.[817] The forensic psychologist also 'provides risk assessments for suicide and self-harming ideation' and 'education on prosocial attitudes and behaviour modification'.[818] In his statement, Mr Nicholson told us that this position had been vacant since November 2021.[819] In oral evidence, he acknowledged the challenges of recruiting to such a position—including the various employment options available to psychologists and the negative media coverage of conditions at Ashley Youth Detention Centre—but indicated that an August 2022 recruitment process for the position had been successful.[820]

A child psychiatrist attends Ashley Youth Detention Centre one day a month to assess, diagnose, treat and review children and young people.[821]

6.5.2 Increasing access to mental health services

We consider the level of children and young people's access to mental health services while at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to be insufficient.

Professor Ogloff told us that, while not all children and young people in detention had 'conventional psychiatric illness', they all had 'significant behavioural or mental health problems or cognitive problems that required professional intervention'.[822]

Mental health challenges among children and young people in the youth justice system commonly co-occur with other complex health and social problems.[823]

The former Head of Department for Statewide Forensic Mental Health Services highlighted the importance of having a specialist child and adolescent psychiatrist and psychologist at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

> These mental health professionals have specific training, knowledge, skills and experience regarding normal childhood development and the complexities encountered in children and adolescents with mental health conditions in addition to their offending behaviours. This includes … specialty knowledge of mental illness, co-morbid Substance Use Disorders, +/- Intellectual Disabilities +/- Specific Learning Difficulties and trauma histories.
> They are best placed to assess a young person within their developmental stage, identify their specific risk factors for problematic behaviours, and assist the [Multi-Disciplinary Team] develop and implement specific management plans to mitigate these identified risk factors and minimise problematic behaviours. These interventions are targeted at treating and managing their complex mental health conditions, comorbidities and subsequent behaviours; the focus being on attempting to change their trajectory so that they do not become involved with the Adult Criminal Justice System.[824]

Professor Ogloff said that psychologists at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were 'often poorly trained' to manage the complex needs of children and young people in detention.[825] As noted in Section 6.5.1, we heard that the position of forensic psychologist at Ashley Youth Detention Centre had been vacant for some time.[826]

Professor Ogloff also referred to the limited psychiatric care available at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[827] The Nurse Unit Manager at Ashley Youth Detention Centre similarly commented that:

> More psychiatry services at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] would improve service delivery. [The psychiatrist] is funded for sessional work. By the time we have hand over and she goes through clinic notes it does not leave a lot of time. If she has court reports to complete as well this encroaches on her clinic time. [The psychiatrist] often has to write her clinic notes in her own time once she returns to Victoria. Fortnightly clinics would be beneficial.[828]

In 2018, the Custodial Inspector recommended that Ashley Youth Detention Centre 'increase the dedicated psychiatry time for young people in detention and links to external psychiatry services to assist young people on release' and 'increase the dedicated clinical psychology time for young people in detention'.[829]

The Director of Nursing, Statewide Forensic Mental Health Services, told us that children and young people in detention can be transferred to a psychiatric facility from Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[830] Under section 134A of the Youth Justice Act, the Secretary may direct that a detainee who, in the opinion of a medical practitioner or psychologist, appears to be suffering from a mental illness be removed from a detention centre to a 'secure mental health unit' if this is in the best interests of the detainee, other detainees or staff, or if the detainee has requested to be moved to a secure mental health unit.[831] The Secretary must have considered a report of the Chief Forensic Psychiatrist before making such an order.[832]

Tasmania has one secure mental health unit—the Wilfred Lopes Centre.[833] This is a specialised mental health facility for adults involved with the criminal justice system (including remandees, prisoners and those found not guilty by reason of being unfit to plead), with 35 beds located near Risdon Prison.[834] The Wilfred Lopes Centre does not provide specialist child and adolescent mental health treatment. It is highly problematic and inconsistent with human rights standards to send children and young people from detention to a facility accommodating adult prisoners.[835]

Hannah Phillips, a lawyer with experience working with youth in the Tasmanian justice and child safety systems, indicated that the absence of a dedicated mental health facility for children and young people in Tasmania means youth detention is instead being used to manage children and young people with mental health problems who are engaging in offending behaviours that risk community safety.[836]

Professor Brett McDermott, Statewide Specialty Director, Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service, told us that proposed reforms to the Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service included establishing a dedicated adolescent and youth inpatient facility and day hospital.[837] The 2020 Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services Review undertaken by Professor McDermott recommended a 'discrete mental health inpatient unit for children and adolescents' as part of Stage 3 of the Royal Hobart Hospital redevelopment.[838]

According to the review, the new mental health inpatient unit for children and adolescents should be 'for consumers who have severe and complex mental health challenges, who often present with an acute risk to themselves or others'.[839] It is not clear whether this new unit would have the capacity to receive children and young people from detention under section 134A of the Youth Justice Act.

Victoria has a Custodial Forensic Youth Inpatient Unit that is a three-bed ward located on the grounds of Footscray Hospital in Melbourne, providing 'acute inpatient services through a range of therapeutic interventions and programs to young people in custody'.[840] This service is delivered by Orygen Youth Health.[841] We consider that the proposed mental health inpatient unit for children and adolescents in Hobart should similarly provide for children and young people in custody.

More broadly, we heard that there have 'traditionally been many barriers to accessing mental health services for young people involved in the youth justice system'.[842]

Professor McDermott told us that, as part of the proposed reforms to child and adolescent mental health services in Tasmania, a dedicated specialist Youth Forensic Mental Health Service would be created for children and young people under the age of 18 years who are involved in the youth justice system, or are at risk of becoming involved in this system.[843] This was also a recommendation of the 2020 Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services Review.[844]

The new Youth Forensic Mental Health Service would 'offer specialist mental health assessment, treatment and support at multiple stages of a young person's journey via a number of avenues' and would comprise the following three elements delivered by a multidisciplinary team:

- a youth forensic 'consultation and liaison service' to provide services where the Magistrates Court (Youth Justice Division) exercises its power under the Youth Justice Act to adjourn a criminal proceeding to enable a child or young person who appears to be suffering from a mental illness to be 'observed and assessed' (among other situations)[845]
- a specialised multisystemic therapy program
- 'in reach assessment and treatment for youth in or exiting youth detention'.[846]

It is important that services provided by the proposed Youth Forensic Mental Health Service take account of any existing mental health plan that a child or young person may have.

In oral evidence, Professor McDermott told us that the 'in reach' services for children and young people in youth detention would address neurological as well as psychiatric issues:

> For instance, the rate of things like fetal alcohol syndrome in detention populations is actually very high. The rate of some types of genetic presentation are actually very high. The rates of … speech and language issues and the need for remedial education are high. So, the input to [detention] will be sort of neuropsychological as well as psychiatric, and hopefully the two arms of this service will talk to each other. For instance, you could get some assessment and work in detention and then be discharged to [a community-based multisystemic therapy] team.[847]

Professor McDermott indicated that a pilot Youth Forensic Mental Health Service would be in operation by December 2022.[848] At the time of writing, we had not received any information on whether this service had begun operating.

We are encouraged by these proposed reforms to mental health support for children and young people in detention and in the youth justice system more broadly, which we consider will offer another layer of protection for children and young people who are at risk of sexual abuse in those settings.

Recommendation 12.20

The Tasmanian Government should ensure:

a. there are appropriate mechanisms and pathways for children in contact with the criminal justice system to be diverted to the mental health system for assessment and treatment

b. the proposed Youth Forensic Mental Health Service provides timely referral and access to mental health treatment, care and support for children and young people when appropriate, whether they are under community-based supervision, in detention or not yet sentenced (including on remand)

c. children and young people in detention have daily access to an onsite child and adolescent psychologist and fortnightly access to an onsite child and adolescent psychiatrist

d. the proposed mental health inpatient unit for children and adolescents in Hobart provides for children and young people in detention.

Recommendation 12.21

The Tasmanian Government should ensure children and young people in detention (including on remand):

a. receive a mental and physical health assessment on admission to the detention facility, and when needed while in detention

b. have access to 24/7 medical care

c. have a say in their mental and physical health care.

6.6 Education in detention

According to the Beijing Rules, the objective of detention facilities should be to 'provide care, protection, education and vocational skills, with a view to assisting [children and young people] to assume socially constructive and productive roles in society'.[849] As noted, the best-performing youth detention facilities make education and training a central feature of their operating models and provide a full, structured day to keep children and young people busy. This reduces boredom, which can 'exacerbate negative outcomes and increase [the] likelihood of negative behavioural incidents occurring'.[850] We also consider that engaging in education in detention is likely to be a protective factor against the risk of child sexual abuse in detention.

6.6.1 Ashley School

In Tasmania, most children and young people in detention have experienced significant disruptions to their schooling, with some having completely disengaged from education.[851] Many have a diagnosed learning disability or other learning difficulties.[852]

Ashley School, which is a Tasmanian Government school on the Ashley Youth Detention Centre site, opened in 1999.[853] School classes run from 9.00 am to 2.30 pm each weekday, and there is an expectation that children and young people will attend classes if they can.[854] Each class has a maximum of four students, usually with one teacher and one teacher assistant (another teacher may attend depending on availability or the needs of students on a given day).[855]

Samuel Baker, Principal of Ashley School, told us that the curriculum at the school is based on the curriculum in mainstream Tasmanian schools, with literacy and numeracy making up about 30 per cent of each student's classes, and the remaining time used for specialist classes such as woodwork, cooking, physical education, health, 'fit gym' (weights and conditioning), art, Aboriginal studies and 'STEM' (science, technology, engineering and mathematics).[856]

Mr Baker told us that each school day has a physical education component 'to negate the confines of unit life, promote a healthy lifestyle … [and] develop social connections, team work and regulation'.[857] Ashley School offers no extracurricular activities outside standard school hours.[858]

We did not hear any evidence about vocational training programs offered to young people at Ashley School. The Custodial Inspector's 2019 Families, Community and Partnerships Inspection Report indicated that Ashley Youth Detention Centre had previously obtained 'start up' training from TasTAFE—such as Certificate I and II in Kitchen Operations courses—at no cost, but that these were no longer provided.[859] In his statement, Mr Baker referred to supporting vocational qualifications such as barista training or Responsible Service of Alcohol training for young people who did not wish to return to mainstream school after leaving detention.[860]

According to Mr Baker, teachers at Ashley School use a range of strategies to support student learning and create a calm and predictable classroom environment—these include individual student learning plans, high ratios of teachers to students and 'highly differentiated and individualised learning tasks'.[861]

Mr Morrissey described Ashley School during the time he was Commissioner for Children and Young People as 'an exemplar of high-quality teaching staff achieving good outcomes for highly disadvantaged and traumatised young people' and said that young people consistently told him 'how much they valued the school'.[862] Ms Phillips told us she had 'not had negative reviews about the schooling at Ashley Youth Detention Centre' from children and young people, and suggested that this was:

> … largely because the learning is at their level, they are around other young people who have low literacy and [low] previous education outcomes, and that they do not feel put in the back corner or 'different'.[863]

The current Commissioner for Children and Young People, Leanne McLean, has observed that, while Ashley School provides a positive experience for children and young people in detention, 'many positive educational gains that are made while a young person is detained … invariably end when they leave' because there are few or no links to education outside Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[864] Commissioner McLean indicated that any new custodial model must include detailed consideration of how young people can be supported to stay engaged with education once they leave detention, suggesting that much could be learned from Victoria's work on this issue (discussed in Section 6.6.3).[865]

6.6.2 Restrictions on access to education

We heard that there were restrictions on children and young people's access to some classes depending on their colour rating under the Behaviour Development Program. For example, Mr Baker told us that children and young people who were assessed as being on 'green', 'yellow' or 'orange' levels in the Behaviour Development Program were allowed to take part in 'Team Sport' on Fridays, whereas children and young people on 'red' were excluded from this activity.[866]

According to Mr Baker, for children and young people on 'red':

> There is the option to engage in a work pack from school if that's what they'd like to do. It's not any more punitive other than they miss out. So, certainly there's no other punitive measures put in place for that young person; they still would engage with their workers back there; that could be social games, it could be some kind of sport in their courtyard, it could be table tennis, it could be lots of other things that interest that particular person individually.[867]

Mr Baker also stated that children and young people on 'red' were not entitled to attend woodwork, art or 'fit gym' due to 'the availability of equipment that could be used as a weapon'.[868] Where students were excluded from these classes, there was alternative work available for them to do in their unit with educational staff, but Mr Baker told us that students rarely take this up.[869] Mr Baker acknowledged that children and young people on 'red' would not receive as many hours of educational programming as those on other levels.[870]

As noted in Section 6.3.2, we also heard that children and young people on the Blue Program under the previous Behaviour Development System were 'fully segregated from Ashley school'.[871] This is discussed in detail in Chapter 11, Case study 3.

Also, a child or young person may be excluded from school if a significant incident has led to the child or young person being assessed as 'not safe to attend' school for part of that day.[872] Mr Baker described this as 'a last resort and not a punishment but an essential mitigation strategy to keep everyone safe and ensure students are regulated and able to access learning'.[873]

We heard that access to face-to-face schooling for children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre was significantly reduced in 2022 due to staff shortages and 'rolling lockdowns'.[874] During that period, Ashley School allocated staff to units for one-on-one sessions with each young person, normally for only 45 minutes or an hour per day, which is significantly less than the legal requirement that young people attend school for the whole of each school day.[875] Depending on the availability of youth workers to supervise in-unit schooling, Ashley School staff were sometimes only present in one unit at a time.[876]

We also heard that during staff shortages the allocated time for education overlapped with the limited time that young people had outside of their rooms each day. As a result, Ashley School staff could not deliver the core curriculum to some young people at all and instead engaged them in social games or specialist work in art and other areas, or left the young person alone.[877] Mr Baker agreed with the assertion that even if a young person engaged in schooling for the 45 minutes to an hour available during staff shortages, this was not enough to deliver the curriculum.[878]

Ms Phillips told us that it was her understanding that the schooling provided to young people during the staff shortages was 'nowhere near sufficient' and she suspected many young people in detention cannot read or do not have the capacity to learn in their units on their own.[879]

As noted in Section 4.7.2, lockdowns related to staff shortages continued to occur at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in July 2023, with children and young people locked in their rooms or units for up to 23 hours each day.[880] We discuss staff shortages in more detail in Section 4.7.2 and lockdowns in Section 9.2.

6.6.3 Other models of education in detention

At the secure facilities operated by the Diagrama Foundation, children and young people have a full day of education and activities every day:

> Young people are involved in learning in every aspect of their day – how to get ready for the day, how to share meals together, play sports together, how to care for and decorate their environment – not just at formal classes and workshops. Supported by social educators, qualified teachers and vocational (VET) instructors there is vocational education and training as well as classes, daily sports, and constructive leisure activities – music, art, gardening, animal husbandry and cultural activities.[881]

Ms Campbell also referred positively to Parkville College, the school for children and young people in Victorian youth justice centres, which:

> … provides education by qualified teaching staff and makes education the predominant focus within the facility. The college's foundational principles take a strengths-based approach to supporting education, with all teachers trained in trauma-informed approaches. The college delivers the Victorian Certificate of Education and Victorian Certificate of Applied Learning, which the majority of its students undertake. It also has auspice arrangements to provide vocational training.[882]

Parkville College also delivers the Victorian Pathways Certificate, an inclusive year 11 and 12 standards-based certificate for students who require flexibility in their educational experiences, and the Victorian Certificate of Education—Vocational Major, a vocational and applied learning program designed to be completed over a minimum of two years, which provides students with a senior secondary certificate and notes that their educational pathway was centred around vocational learning.[883]

Parkville College students have six hours of structured classes each weekday, including literacy, numeracy, personal development skills, physical education, art and music.[884] On Friday afternoons, Saturdays and during term breaks, Parkville College operates an intensive vocational education and training timetable.[885]

Parkville College has developed the 'Parkville College Model', which it describes as:

> … a pedagogy underpinned by trauma theory, trauma-informed practice, attachment theory, culturally responsive practice, and an extensive research-base of knowledge about effective instructional practices. At the heart of the model is a critically conscious independent learner.[886]

The Parkville College Model articulates five practice principles that emphasise staff self-awareness and growth; strong, secure relationships and culturally safe spaces; responsive instructional practice; student empowerment and voice; and connection to community and culture.[887]

The Parkville Youth Justice Precinct also includes the 'STREAT café'—a partnership between Parkville College, the STREAT social enterprise and the Victorian Department of Justice and Community Safety—which delivers hospitality training and employment pathways for young people in the youth justice system.[888]

In addition, Parkville College has a Transitions Team, which is responsible for education transition planning for children and young people leaving detention.[889] This team seeks school records for each young person in detention, alerts their last known school that they are in detention, works with the young person and their parents or carers to establish educational goals, develops a student plan and an individual education plan for the young person, and engages with the young person's destination school, including alerting it of the young person's release date.[890]

Parkville College also operates 'O-Street', a flexible learning centre in the community that can support children and young people who have left detention to transition into mainstream schooling.[891]

6.6.4 Proposed reforms in Tasmania

As part of its recent commitments to prioritise prevention, early intervention and diversion of children and young people from the criminal justice system, the Tasmanian Government has committed to developing and implementing an 'alternative education model' for children and young people whose educational needs are not being met.[892] Alternative approaches to be explored may include 'continued emphasis on needs assessments and learning plans, flexible education models and vocational pathways'.[893]

According to the Draft First Action Plan, 'new alternative education programs' will be developed by 2024.[894] There is no discussion of whether these programs will also be delivered in detention, or what the Government's plans for education in its proposed new detention facility are more broadly.

6.6.5 Our recommendations

Education for children and young people in detention, including those on remand, is a right, not a privilege.[895] It should be the central feature of a young person's experience in detention.

While we acknowledge that the safety of students and educational staff is essential, we are concerned that access to education for some children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre has been unnecessarily limited by disciplinary measures imposed in response to challenging behaviours.

As discussed in Section 6.3.2, the Behaviour Development System was applied in a punitive manner, and we consider that the replacement Behaviour Development Program should not continue to be used (Recommendation 12.18). We also agree with the Northern Territory Royal Commission that any new behaviour management program or incentive system that may be adopted in future should not restrict children and young people's access to education, physical exercise or rehabilitation programs.[896]

We are also highly concerned about restrictions on children's access to education because of lockdowns relating to staff shortages. We discuss recruitment of staff in Section 4.7.2 and lockdowns in Section 9.2.

We also consider that more work is needed to support children and young people who leave detention to remain engaged with work, training or study. This is discussed in Section 6.8 in the context of exit planning and support after release from detention.

Recommendation 12.22

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. ensure the Youth Justice Model of Care emphasises the central importance for children and young people in detention of access to high-quality education and vocational training that is tailored to their individual learning needs and that includes learning life skills

b. make education programs and other structured activities accessible to all children and young people in detention (including on remand)

c. ensure a child or young person's access to educational programs or physical exercise in detention is not linked to, or limited by, their ranking in behaviour management programs

d. develop and establish partnerships with community organisations to create employment and training opportunities for children and young people leaving detention.

6.7 Facilitating links to family and community

Every child deprived of liberty has the right to stay in contact with their family and with the wider community.[897] Children and young people in detention need to be supported to maintain or build connections to their families and communities because such connections can provide important prosocial factors to help children and young people stop offending after they are released from detention.[898] It is particularly important for Aboriginal children and young people in detention to maintain connections with family, community and culture—this is discussed in Section 7.3.

As noted, many children and young people in detention have a history of involvement with the child protection system. Some have been removed from their families of origin by court order and may no longer be in contact with them. For such children and young people, contact with extended family and other trusted adults while they are in detention is particularly important. Support for rebuilding connections with immediate family should also be provided, where appropriate.

The primary mechanisms to enable children and young people in detention to stay connected to their families and communities are visits, temporary leave and phone calls.

6.7.1 Visits

Standard Operating Procedure No. 9 for Ashley Youth Detention Centre states that:

- all children and young people have the right to regular contact with identified family members, 'significant others' such as partners and children, members of the community and professionals such as lawyers[899]
- management can refuse a visit if it believes that the 'security, safety or good order of the Centre or the health or well-being of the young person may be adversely affected by allowing the visit'[900]
- when visits are not approved, the young person must be advised of the situation, including the reasons for non-approval[901]
- visits last 45 minutes and must be supervised closely by staff at all times unless approval has been given for an alternative form of supervision.[902]

The Inspection Standards for Youth Custodial Centres in Tasmania state that visits must not be 'withheld as a sanction as part of any behaviour management regime'.[903]

The Custodial Inspector's 2019 Families, Community and Partnerships Inspection Report found that, although Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff did not actively 'pursue' families and friends to visit children and young people in detention or review the frequency of visits to individual children and young people, the Centre's facilitation of visits by family and friends was 'commendable'.[904] However, the Custodial Inspector also observed that the visit room was 'sparse' and there were no outside facilities for visits or play areas for young children, recommending that the visiting facilities be updated to 'make visits more relaxed and family friendly'.[905]

The Department told us of infrastructure upgrades to Ashley Youth Detention Centre since the Custodial Inspector's 2019 report was published, which have resulted in a 'softening' of the visitors' entrance and a new purpose-built visit room with an adjacent covered outdoor area with a barbecue.[906]

We heard of two occasions in 2019 where Aboriginal young people in detention were denied visits that were therapeutically important for them (discussed in Section 7.3.3).[907]

The Custodial Inspector's 2019 report stated that 'there was nothing to indicate to the inspection team that visits are ever withheld, or used as a tool to manage the young person's behaviour'.[908]

As discussed in Chapter 10, Ashley Youth Detention Centre is in a location that is not accessible for many families. Upon induction to the Centre, children and young people are advised that if their family cannot afford to travel to Ashley Youth Detention Centre to visit, management can help with travel costs.[909] We did not hear whether families had been provided with such support in practice.

6.7.2 Temporary leave

Temporary leave can be used to ease a child or young person's transition into the community after release by enabling 'visits to specialist service providers within the community, and activities to maintain their connection to family'.[910] Exit planning is discussed in Section 6.8.

Standard Operating Procedure No. 22 provides for temporary leave from Ashley Youth Detention Centre for children and young people.[911] It states that all temporary leave applications must undergo a thorough risk assessment and be approved by the Centre Manager.[912] Risk factors to be considered include the nature of the young person's offending, the young person's 'behaviour and attitude at or near the time of the proposed leave', any history of threats or attempts to abscond, and the young person's 'recent and current colour status' under the Behaviour Development Program.[913]

6.7.3 Phone calls

As part of their induction to Ashley Youth Detention Centre, children and young people are told that they are allowed to make seven phone calls each week.[914] Phone calls are no longer than 10 minutes long.[915] Children and young people are entitled to extra calls if they achieve 'yellow' or 'green' status in the Behaviour Development Program.[916]

In 2019, the Custodial Inspector recommended that the (former) Department of Communities consider 'implementing video visits for young people at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] by means of communication tools such as Skype and FaceTime to further facilitate family and community contact'.[917] On our site visit to Ashley Youth Detention Centre we were told that there was no FaceTime in the visitors' room and families often did not use Zoom. We also observed a small screen on the wall in the visitors' room at a height that would have been uncomfortable for either sitting or standing. We were also told that there were problems with internet connectivity at the Centre.

6.7.4 Practice improvements

One of the practice principles in the Ashley Youth Detention Centre Practice Framework is to 'provide opportunities for young people, their families and communities to connect and support to heal and strengthen relationships'.[918] As noted in Section 6.3.3, the Practice Framework is under review.

According to the Keeping Kids Safe Plan, the Government has (as noted in Section 6.7.1) 'soften[ed]' the entrance to Ashley Youth Detention Centre, created a new reception area for visitors and improved visitor and family spaces.[919]

In June 2023, the Department informed us that it had 'recently procured mobile phones for young people within Ashley Youth Detention Centre', which would give them 'the ability to make personal and professional calls from the privacy of their bedrooms or the Centre's outside spaces or meeting rooms, outside of school hours'.[920] The mobile phones were expected to be provided to children and young people in July 2023.[921] We welcome this initiative. However, we did not receive information or guidelines on the proposed use of the mobile phones by children and young people in detention.

6.7.5 Our recommendations

More needs to be done to enable children and young people in detention to build and maintain connections with their families and communities. This is 'a key aspect of a therapeutic model of care'.[922] In our view, the Department should develop a policy on supporting children and young people in detention to remain connected to their families and communities via visits, temporary leave and phone and video calls. There should be no restrictions on contact between children and young people and their families arising from security classifications or rankings in behaviour management systems.[923]

We consider that, overall, moving the detention facility to Hobart will increase accessibility for family and friends. However, there will still be challenges for some families (such as those living in very remote areas) to visit children and young people in detention. In these circumstances, the Government should help family members or Aboriginal community members to visit children and young people in detention.

We also recommend in Section 6.1 that any new youth detention facility in Tasmania be designed to facilitate and promote connections between children and young people, and their families and communities (Recommendation 12.16).

We consider technology-facilitated family contact to be a practical suggestion to enhance children and young people's connection with their families. We recognise that children and young people in detention are more likely to have complex family structures such as separated parents and siblings living away from one or both parents, including in out of home care. Unlimited technology-facilitated access to family is an important aspect of any strategy designed to maintain and strengthen family connection for children and young people in detention.

Finally, we note Mr McGinness's suggestion that there may be opportunities for families and communities to become involved with service delivery in youth detention.[924] We agree that this should be explored.

Recommendation 12.23

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. develop and implement a policy that recognises the importance to children and young people in detention of maintaining or building connections with their family and community and

   i. specifies ways to promote such connections, including through visits, temporary leave and phone or video calls

   ii. clearly states that entitlements to visits, temporary leave and phone or video calls cannot be denied on the basis of a child or young person's behaviour

b. provide reasonable assistance (including financial help) to members of a child or young person's family or Aboriginal community to enable them to visit the child or young person frequently, where families or Aboriginal community members have barriers to accessing the youth detention facility.

6.8 Exit planning and support after release

Effective youth justice systems prioritise exit or transition planning and continuity of care following a young person's release from detention, often referred to as 'throughcare' services. The Northern Territory Royal Commission observed that:

> A well-planned and supported transition from detention can be the circuit-breaker in a cycle of reoffending. Without adequate planning for release, the system is [setting a young person up to fail]. Without post-release support, the likelihood of failure inevitably increases.[925]

The Northern Territory Royal Commission recommended establishing 'an integrated, evidence-based throughcare service' for children and young people in detention in the Northern Territory to deliver:

- adequate planning for release—including safe and stable accommodation, access to physical and mental health support, access to substance abuse programs and assistance with education and/or employment—with planning to start on entry into detention
- improved post-release services to be made available to all children and young people detained more than once or for longer than one week
- a comprehensive wraparound approach facilitated by cross-agency involvement.[926]

Mr McGinness similarly endorsed the notion of commencing exit planning 'from the moment a young person comes into custody', creating links to community-based service providers and families, and actively supporting young people in their transition back into the community.[927] He also referred to the benefits of an 'integrated model' that would allow:

> … caseworkers and youth justice personnel to assist [young people] in building connections with educators outside the youth justice system, so that the young person can maintain this relationship once they leave detention. The same concept applies to health services, such as psychologists and occupational therapists. Integrated Through Care delivered under a therapeutic justice model ensures continuity of care when a young person's detention ends.[928]

6.8.1 Exit planning and post-release support in Tasmania

Ashley Youth Detention Centre has a procedure on exit planning for children and young people that provides that:

- Wherever possible, exit planning must begin six weeks before the young person's earliest release date, and where this is not possible, it must begin 'with sufficient time to engage all relevant stakeholders and develop a formal plan'.[929]
- Exit planning meetings must identify services and supports that 'may enhance the young person's capacity to reintegrate into the community and reduce the risk of reoffending' and set out 'appropriate goals and case planning strategies to assist the young person reduce the risk of reoffending'.[930]
- While exit planning is to be coordinated by Ashley Youth Detention Centre case management staff, a Community Youth Justice worker must take part in exit planning meetings. Their role is to 'assist in the exit planning process'.[931]
- If the young person is subject to a child protection order, 'a Child Protection Worker' must be invited to take part in exit planning.[932]
- The young person's nominated parent, carer or guardian must be contacted and invited to attend exit planning meetings. Where this is not possible or appropriate, the young person's case manager and nominated Community Youth Justice worker must 'endeavour to identify and engage an appropriate and meaningful adult to support and assist the young person through the exit planning process and upon release from custody'.[933]

The exit planning procedure also states that, when a young person is not released under community supervision, 'every effort will be made in the exit planning process to connect the young person to a community organisation for support upon release'.[934]

The exit planning procedure does not indicate how the various other services required to support a child or young person in the community are to be involved in the exit planning process. We also note that the procedure requires 'a Child Protection Worker'—rather than the young person's current child protection worker, or one who knows the young person and their circumstances—to be 'invited to participate' in exit planning, suggesting that their attendance is not strictly required. This is problematic, given that some young people are released from detention without stable accommodation, which increases their risk of returning to detention.[935]

We heard that there was a lack of effective throughcare support for children and young people leaving detention in Tasmania.[936] Vincenzo Caltabiano, former Director, Tasmania Legal Aid, told us that children and young people needed more help to re-establish their lives following release from detention, as many find themselves returning there within 12 months of release.[937]

Similarly, Adjunct Associate Professor Mitchell told us that children and young people face various challenges on release from detention, noting that 'anecdotally … a lot of kids will offend again to get back to Ashley, because it's the closest thing to a bed and food that they have'.[938] We heard similar comments from participants in our consultations with Aboriginal communities, which we discuss in Section 7.4 on the lack of post-release support for Aboriginal children and young people.

Commissioner McLean has advocated for continuity of support for detained children and young people who are involved in the out of home care system. She has noted that:

> … there are some contractual arrangements that can prevent the provision of supports being continued by non-government providers once a young person is on a detention order and housed at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre].[939]

Also, as outlined in Section 6.6.1, Commissioner McLean has observed that substantial work needs to occur in Tasmania to ensure children and young people who leave detention stay connected to education.

Save the Children's Transition from Detention program is a voluntary mentoring program for children and young people leaving detention in Tasmania that 'bridges the gap between the detention centre and outside services that are not funded or are unable to provide services within the centre'.[940] According to Commissioner McLean, children and young people leaving detention 'value being able to participate in pro-social activities as part of this program', but current resourcing for the program has limited the ability of youth workers to attend Ashley Youth Detention Centre and engage with young people there.[941]

In its submission to the Tasmanian Government on the proposed youth justice reforms, Save the Children advocated for service providers to be granted greater access to detention centres throughout a young person's period in custody, 'so they can build trust and commence sustainability planning as early as possible'.[942]

6.8.2 Practice improvements

Strategy 4 of the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint is to 'integrate and connect whole of government and community service systems'.[943] An aim of this strategy is to achieve:

> … a throughcare approach for children and young people that facilitates and supports transition between services, facilities and the community in a responsive and children and young person-centred manner.[944]

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint adopts a broader approach to 'throughcare' than one focused solely on leaving detention:

> A throughcare approach that commences service planning at the earliest possible opportunity and follows the young person's engagement with youth justice services can provide stability for the young person. Consistent case management and client centred planning across the continuum, as well as ongoing access to support services with whom the young person is engaged enables the development of rapport and stability that is not dependent upon the young person's place within the continuum i.e., detention.[945]

Also, as noted in Section 2, the Tasmanian Government has announced it will establish two supported residential facilities as part of the suite of facilities that will replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[946] One pathway into this type of facility will be where the child or young person has left detention on a supervised release order with a condition to 'attend' the supported residential facility.[947] It would appear that the Government anticipates these facilities could serve as temporary or transitional accommodation for children and young people released from detention.

As noted in Section 6.6.4, the Government has also committed to developing new alternative education programs by 2024.[948] It is possible that these could be accessed by children and young people following their release from detention, but the Government's documentation does not specifically address this.

6.8.3 Our recommendations

The Government's proposed reforms to support children leaving detention are welcome. The proposed supported residential facilities are also promising, but more detail is needed about how they will operate to support children and young people after their release.

There is an immediate and urgent need for housing, mental health, education and other support for children and young people leaving detention. As discussed in Section 7.4, there is a particularly urgent need for post-release support for Aboriginal children and young people. We consider that the Government should prioritise developing effective, coordinated exit planning and post-release support services for children and young people leaving detention. This should be addressed in the Youth Justice Model of Care for detention recommended in Section 6.3.4 (Recommendation 12.18). Throughcare support services must be culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people and respond to their needs (refer to the discussion in Section 7.4).

We agree with Save the Children's call for community-based post-release service providers to have greater access to detention centres throughout a young person's period in custody to build trust with the young person and start planning for post-release as early as possible.

Providing exit planning and post-release services for children and young people should be supported by a comprehensive exit planning procedure and a memorandum of understanding that specify clear requirements for how the various services required to support an individual young person in the community must work together to ensure the young person has stable accommodation, links to education or work, and ongoing support for mental health, disability and other needs.

There is a particularly urgent need for coordination and collaboration with child protection services. Alison Grace, Deputy Centre Manager, Bimberi Youth Justice Centre in the Australian Capital Territory, referred to the model of 'single case management' provided by Child and Youth Protection Services, whereby children and young people under the guardianship of the state have the same case manager in the youth justice system, whether under community-based supervision or in custody.[949] She said this provided 'a consistent voice and seamless service delivery to young people throughout their involvement in the youth justice system'.[950] We consider that such an approach could have considerable benefit in Tasmania.

Considerable work is also needed to meet the educational needs of children and young people following their release from detention. In this respect, we note the benefits of schools such as Parkville College in Victoria (discussed in Section 6.6.3), whose Transitions Team supports children and young people to move from education in detention to education in the community, and the Berry Street School—a specialist independent school with four campuses across Victoria that offers a flexible and individualised learning approach and a transition program for students who have been excluded from education and who need support to re-engage.[951] We consider that engagement in education is a protective factor against child sexual exploitation in the community.

Recommendation 12.24

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. establish an integrated throughcare service for children and young people in detention that

   i. begins exit planning as soon as possible after a child or young person enters detention for the provision of safe and stable accommodation, access to physical and mental health support, and assistance with education or employment after release to facilitate their reintegration into the community

   ii. provides increased access to the detention facility for staff of community-based providers of post-release services

   iii. adopts a collaborative, child-centred, cross-organisation approach involving child protection, housing, health, disability support and education services, supported by a memorandum of understanding and clear policies and procedures

   iv. involves the child or young person and, to the greatest extent possible, their parent, guardian or other significant adult in exit planning

   v. includes post-release wraparound support services for children and young people

   vi. is culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people

b. deliver community-based schooling options for children and young people with complex behavioural challenges, including those who are or have been involved in the youth justice system, to provide appropriate learning environments for children to transition to when they leave detention.

6.9 Transfers to prison

Children and young people may be detained in an adult prison facility or transferred from Ashley Youth Detention Centre to an adult prison facility in certain circumstances. The Youth Justice Act states that a child or young person under the age of 19 years who is refused bail can be detained in an adult prison facility if the Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People determines it is not practicable to detain them in a youth detention centre.[952]

In this section, we focus on the transfer of children and young people from Ashley Youth Detention Centre to the adult prison system. While we have not examined the use of the Secretary's discretion under the Youth Justice Act to detain a young person in an adult prison facility at the time they are refused bail, we encourage the Government to consider our recommendation in relation to transfers broadly and implement it consistently in relation to all avenues by which children and young people may be detained in adult facilities.

The Youth Justice Act does not specify a process for transfers; rather, they are managed administratively under a memorandum of understanding between the former Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Justice.[953] The Manager of Ashley Youth Detention Centre can make a request to the Director of the Tasmania Prison Service to transfer a child or young person to a Tasmania Prison Service facility.[954] The Director may agree to accept the child or young person for a specified period.[955]

According to the memorandum of understanding, a transfer to prison may be appropriate for a child or young person requiring a 'high level of secure care', where:

> Secure care relates to the level of security required as a result of the low level of pro social behaviour demonstrated by the youth. These youths may be described as high risk/high needs.[956]

Under the memorandum of understanding, grounds for transferring a child or young person from detention to prison include:

- that the child or young person represents a high risk to the safety and security of themselves, other children and young people, staff, visitors, the facility or 'day to day management and operations of the site'[957]
- 'special reasons' listed in Schedule 2—these include '[v]iolence, disruptive behaviour or behaviour issues unable to be treated on site', 'escape attempts and actual escape' and 'serious detention centre offences'[958]
- that the child or young person requires specialist assessment or treatment not available outside major urban areas.[959]

Where a child or young person is transferred to prison for more than 14 days, a 'Transfer Assessment Panel' is convened to review the transfer and determine whether it should be continued.[960] This panel includes representatives of the Tasmania Prison Service, Youth Justice Services (including professional services staff from Ashley Youth Detention Centre) and Correctional Primary Health Services, but it does not include an oversight body or anyone who is independent of government.[961]

A transfer to prison may be continued where the Transfer Assessment Panel classifies the child or young person as '[n]ot benefiting from the Behavioural Development Program and [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] case management model' and as being 'not suitable for detention' at the Centre, having regard to several criteria.[962] These include age, gender, cultural background, 'security and safety assessment', 'level of social responsibility', the number and nature of incidents the young person has been involved in, and whether their behaviour indicates they are 'likely to create a serious management problem' at the Centre.[963] The criteria do not include the best interests of the child or young person.

This process can be contrasted with the process for transferring children and young people from youth detention to an adult prison in other jurisdictions. For example, in Victoria, the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) gives the Youth Parole Board the power, on the application of the Secretary of the Department of Justice and Community Safety, to direct that a young person who has been sentenced to detention in a youth justice centre be transferred to a prison.[964] The Youth Parole Board is chaired by a judge of the County Court of Victoria and includes two people with 'experience in matters relating to child welfare'.[965]

In determining whether to make a direction to transfer a young person, the Victorian Youth Parole Board must consider 'the antecedents and behaviour of the person', their age and maturity, as well as a report from the Secretary that sets out the steps that have been taken to avoid the need for the transfer to prison.[966] The Youth Parole Board must also be satisfied that the young person has 'engaged in conduct that threatens the good order and safe operation of the youth justice centre' and 'cannot be properly controlled in a youth justice centre'.[967]

In Victoria, only young people aged 16 years or older can be transferred to prison, unlike in Tasmania, where there do not appear to be any age limits on the transfer of children and young people.[968]

We did not request or receive any evidence on the frequency of transfers from Ashley Youth Detention Centre to adult prison facilities. However, in Chapter 11, Case study 2, we find that Ashley Youth Detention Centre was not equipped to meet the complex needs of children and young people, resulting in at least one being transferred to adult prison.

Housing children and young people with adults in the criminal justice system is contrary to international human rights instruments (discussed throughout this chapter). Children and young people with challenging behaviours and complex needs—particularly cognitive disabilities—are highly vulnerable to abuse, including child sexual abuse, in prison.

We are deeply concerned that children and young people can be transferred from youth detention to adult prison in Tasmania without any oversight from a court, tribunal, parole board or other independent body. We are also concerned that a child or young person can be transferred solely for operational reasons, or based on the young person's complex and difficult behaviours, without considering their best interests or the likely impact on them of being transferred to prison. This approach fails to recognise the effects of trauma on children and young people's ability to regulate their emotions and behaviour. It risks children and young people who have been abused or who have experienced neglect or other adverse childhood experiences feeling as though others consider they are beyond help. It may have the effect of punishing them for the failure of the youth justice system to support them to address their challenges.

As discussed in Section 6.3, we do not consider the Behaviour Development Program to be an appropriate or effective tool for responding to children and young people's complex behaviours in detention. A child or young person's failure to 'benefit' from this program is therefore not an appropriate basis upon which to transfer them to prison or to decide to keep them in a youth detention facility. We recommend that this program be discontinued in youth detention (Recommendation 12.18).

We recommend that the Tasmanian Government adopts a new process for managing transfers from youth detention, requiring approval from a body that is independent of government. Given Tasmania does not have a youth parole board, we recommend that the Department for Education, Children and Young People be required to seek approval from the Magistrates Court for any transfers. In Section 5.5.6, we recommend establishing a new specialist division of the Magistrates Court to hear child protection matters and children's criminal matters. Applications for transfers from detention to prison should be made to a magistrate of this new division, and until this division is established, to a magistrate of the Youth Justice Division.

Transfer applications should only be made in respect of young people aged 16 years or older. In determining whether to approve a transfer, the Magistrates Court should be required to consider (among other matters):

- what steps the Department has taken to avoid the need for the transfer
- whether the transfer is in the young person's best interests
- the views of the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) on the appropriateness of the transfer.

The Department should be required to notify the Commission for Children and Young People of any proposed transfer.

Also, we are concerned about the transfer to prison of young people aged 18 years or older who are serving their sentence in youth detention. Young adults are extremely vulnerable in prison. The Victorian Ombudsman has noted that 'young prisoners are at significant risk of post-traumatic stress disorder arising from the conditions of their detention, and at high risk of rape and assault from older prisoners'.[969]

In a 2019 report on the sentencing of young adult offenders, the Victorian Sentencing Advisory Council stated that:

> … holding young adults in adult prisons can be counterproductive to their treatment and rehabilitation. It can expose them to harms (such as risks to their safety from older adults) and can restrict their participation in mandatory prosocial, constructive activities that are typically available in youth-focused facilities (such as improved educational opportunities, targeted programs and specialist transition resources). This poses risks to the community, which is better served by approaches that maximise the potential for an offender's rehabilitation.[970]

The Tasmanian Government should consider allowing vulnerable young people aged 18 years or older who are serving their sentence in youth detention to stay in detention rather than being transferred to an adult prison. This would be consistent with broader trends to increase the age limit on services for vulnerable young people beyond 18 years—for example, extending out of home care services to the age of 21 years.[971]

The Tasmanian Government should introduce a new process for approving transfers of young people from youth detention to an adult prison facility that:

a. limits transfers to young people aged 16 years or older

b. requires the Department for Education, Children and Young People to notify the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) of any proposed transfer

c. requires the Department to apply to the Magistrates Court (Youth Justice Division) or the new specialist children's division of the Magistrates Court (Recommendation 12.15) for approval to transfer

d. requires the Magistrates Court, in determining whether to approve the transfer, to consider, among other matters, the steps the Department has taken to avoid the need for the transfer, whether the transfer is in the young person's best interests and the views of the Commission for Children and Young People on the appropriateness of the transfer.

6.10 Auditing custodial periods

In 2016, the Tasmanian Government issued a media release stating that prisoners had been released from Risdon Prison on the incorrect date on seven occasions due to 'administrative errors when dealing with and interpreting warrants issued by the Courts'.[972] These errors were said to be 'the result of long-term process issues within the Justice system', 'a heavy reliance on paper based forms used in Court operations' and the manual calculation of release dates by the Tasmania Prison Service.[973]

In 2021, a media report indicated that, in the preceding four years, nine prisoners had been released from Risdon Prison before or after their release dates.[974] We heard of similar concerns about youth detention from a former employee of the Department.[975]

In June 2023, the Department informed us that magistrates now calculate each young person's 'earliest release date'.[976]

We would be extremely concerned if children and young people were being detained for longer than is required by their custodial orders. The Government should take steps to ensure this is not occurring.

Recommendation 12.26

The Auditor-General should undertake an audit of the length of custodial stays at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to determine whether they align with sentencing orders.

7 Aboriginal children in youth detention

Aboriginal children and young people are vastly over-represented in Tasmania's youth justice system, particularly in youth detention. We understand this to be a direct and continuing impact of colonisation. As one participant in our consultations with Aboriginal communities told us, youth detention creates lasting damage for Aboriginal children and young people:

> A very high percentage of our young people have been to Ashley. Those young people then started getting into trouble as adults. Once they came out [of Ashley Youth Detention Centre], they should have been proud of who they are and have aspirations of what they want to do, but they were so mistreated in there. It's another layer of abuse—layer upon layer upon layer.[977]

According to data published by the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, on an average day in youth detention in Tasmania in 2021–22, Aboriginal children and young people aged 10 to 17 years accounted for 44 per cent of the detention population (sentenced and unsentenced) in that age group, despite constituting 10 per cent of all Tasmanian children and young people aged 10 to 17 years.[978] This figure is broadly consistent with what we heard in evidence.[979]

Aboriginal children and young people are similarly over-represented in the remand population. On an average day in youth detention in Tasmania in 2021–22, 42 per cent of children and young people aged 10 to 17 years on remand were Aboriginal.[980]

Aboriginal children and young people are also over-represented among children and young people who are known to the child protection and youth justice systems—known as 'crossover children'.[981] As noted in Section 5.5.3, Tasmania Legal Aid's 2021 Children First report—which examined how many of its clients had both a child safety file and a youth justice file—found that 15 per cent of children in this category identified as Aboriginal.[982]

According to the National Royal Commission, research shows that the over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in youth detention in Australia is a result of 'historical factors, systemic racism, policing practices and a range of socioeconomic factors'.[983]

Similarly, in its 2021 Our Youth, Our Way inquiry report, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People found that the over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in Victoria's youth justice system stemmed from colonisation, dispossession, the forced removal of children from their families, broken connection to Country and culture, intergenerational trauma, over-policing, systemic racism in service systems and ongoing government intervention in Aboriginal people's lives.[984] These factors can cause Aboriginal families to experience poverty and socioeconomic disadvantage, housing instability, low educational attainment, mental illness, drug and alcohol misuse, family violence and intergenerational cycles of child protection involvement, each of which increases the risk that a child will enter the youth justice system.[985]

The National Royal Commission observed that, while Aboriginal children were not inherently more vulnerable to child sexual abuse in institutions than non-Aboriginal children, Aboriginal children were:

> … more likely to encounter circumstances that increased their risk of abuse in institutions, reduced their ability to disclose or report abuse and, if they did disclose or report, reduced their chances of receiving an adequate response.[986]

Reducing the number of Aboriginal children and young people in Tasmania's youth justice system is essential to minimising the risk they will experience child sexual abuse in detention. The 2020 National Agreement on Closing the Gap aims to reduce the rate of Aboriginal children and young people in detention by at least 30 per cent by 2031 (Target 11).[987] The Tasmanian Government has committed to two actions to meet this target: a focus on police diversion and building partnerships with Aboriginal people. But much more needs to be done.[988]

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint (outlined in Section 2.2) is promising in its references to prevention, early intervention and diversion as strategies to 'change[e] the pathways for children and young people at risk of, or who are engaged in offending behaviours'.[989] However, there is scope for a greater focus on the specific needs of Aboriginal children and young people in this blueprint.

In Section 5, we make several recommendations covering all children and young people in detention that would contribute to achieving Target 11, namely:

- increasing the minimum age of criminal responsibility to 14 years and working towards increasing the minimum age of detention to 16 years (Recommendation 12.11)
- increasing pre-court diversion opportunities for children and young people (Recommendation 12.13)
- strengthening the bail system to increase the likelihood that children and young people charged with criminal offences will receive bail and comply with their bail conditions, and to reduce the number of children and young people on remand (Recommendation 12.14)
- ensuring sentencers have an appropriate hierarchy of community-based sentencing options, so detention is an option of last resort (Recommendation 12.15).

Further, in Chapter 9, we recommend changes to reduce the number of Aboriginal children entering the out of home care system, including more investment in Aboriginal-led targeted early intervention and prevention services for Aboriginal families (Recommendation 9.15). Improved support for Aboriginal families will also help reduce the number of Aboriginal children and young people entering the youth justice system.

In this section, we also recommend that the Tasmanian Government develops an Aboriginal youth justice strategy to ensure its proposed reform of the youth justice system includes a strong focus on the needs of Aboriginal children and young people and their families. This strategy should be founded on the principle of self-determination, and it should commit to actions that will prevent Aboriginal children from entering the youth justice system and divert them from detention.

For Aboriginal children who experience youth detention, the National Royal Commission recommended that state and territory governments consider strategies that would provide for their cultural safety, including:

- recruiting and developing Aboriginal staff to work at all levels of the youth justice system, including in key roles in complaints-handling systems
- ensuring all youth detention facilities have culturally appropriate policies and procedures that facilitate connection with family, community and culture, and reflect an understanding of, and respect for, cultural practices in different clan groups
- employing, training and professionally developing culturally competent staff who understand the particular needs and experiences of Aboriginal children, including the specific barriers that Aboriginal children face in disclosing sexual abuse.[990]

The Tasmanian Government is yet to fully implement this recommendation.

On the contrary, the evidence we received raises our concerns about cultural safety for Aboriginal children and young people in Ashley Youth Detention Centre. We heard that some Aboriginal children and young people received little or no cultural support in detention and, in some cases, were denied contact with family or community members.[991]

The Tasmanian Government has made announcements about the facilities that will replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre, but it has given little attention to the needs of Aboriginal children and young people in these announcements.[992] Similarly, the Keeping Kids Safe Plan does not refer to Aboriginal children and young people or include any specific plans to ensure their safety.[993]

It is important that any new facilities be co-designed with Aboriginal communities to ensure they are culturally safe and enable Aboriginal children and young people to connect with family, community and culture. However, Ashley Youth Detention Centre also needs to be culturally safe while it continues to operate.

Accordingly, in this section, we make recommendations for improving the cultural safety of Aboriginal children and young people who are remanded or sentenced to youth detention, covering:

- cultural support for Aboriginal children and young people in detention, including regular contact with family and community members, and access to cultural programs
- the recruitment of Aboriginal staff to support Aboriginal children and young people in detention
- appropriate professional development for staff of youth detention facilities to ensure they are aware of the unique experiences and needs of Aboriginal children and young people.

We also discuss support for Aboriginal children and young people leaving detention.

7.1 An Aboriginal youth justice strategy

As noted, Aboriginal children and young people are more likely than non-Aboriginal children and young people to encounter circumstances that increase their risk of abuse in institutions, including youth detention. It is therefore incumbent on the Tasmanian Government to take active steps to limit Aboriginal children and young people's entry into youth detention. This requires a commitment to prevention, early intervention and diversion strategies focused on Aboriginal children and young people and their families. As one participant in our consultations with Aboriginal communities told us:

> What about diversion programs rather than going to detention? To me it was pivotal that I went to a diversion program with Aboriginal Elders, instead of going to Ashley for 12 months. If I had been in there it would have changed my life in terrible ways, instead I got to stay with community and it helped me.[994]

As described in Section 2.2, the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint identifies five strategies of focus from 2022 to 2032. They are to:

- prioritise prevention and early intervention to reduce engagement with the youth justice system
- ensure diversion from the justice system is early and lasting
- ensure a therapeutically based criminal justice response for children and young people
- integrate and connect whole of government and community service systems
- provide an appropriately trained and supported 'therapeutic workforce'.[995]

Some of these strategies include specific goals for Aboriginal children and young people. For example, the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint aims to:

- support Aboriginal communities to develop programs that promote wellbeing and sustain connectedness with community and culture[996]
- ensure Aboriginal children and young people have access to Aboriginal-led diversionary services[997]
- provide Aboriginal children and young people with therapeutic responses that meet their needs[998]
- increase 'cultural competence across the youth sector to enable staff to identify and work in culturally appropriate ways' to support and respond to the needs of Aboriginal children and young people in the youth justice system.[999]

These goals are positive. However, they are general and do not identify specific actions to achieve them.

The Draft First Action Plan acknowledges that the approach to diverting Aboriginal children and young people from the youth justice system may be different from general diversionary processes. It states that engagement with Aboriginal children, young people and communities will be essential to ensure culturally safe, Aboriginal-led diversion services.[1000] The Draft First Action Plan also indicates that the proposed Youth Justice Model of Care (discussed in Section 6.3) will be co-designed with Aboriginal communities.[1001]

In February 2022, the Victorian Government published Wirkara Kulpa, Victoria's Aboriginal youth justice strategy, whose development was led by Victoria's Aboriginal Justice Caucus.[1002] The strategy is underpinned by Aboriginal self-determination and has a series of guiding principles, which are to:

- amplify the voice and participation of Aboriginal children and young people, and promote and protect their rights

- value the strengths of Aboriginal children and young people
- support child- and family-centred approaches
- embed trauma-informed healing approaches
- centre Aboriginal cultural values and connection.[1003]

Wirkara Kulpa identifies five key priorities or 'domains' for 2022 to 2032—including diverting Aboriginal children and young people from the youth justice system, addressing over-representation and working towards Aboriginal-led justice responses—and commits to more than 70 actions across these domains.[1004]

In its Our Youth, Our Way inquiry report, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People found that services designed, controlled and delivered by the Aboriginal community have the greatest potential to produce the best outcomes for Aboriginal children and young people.[1005] Aboriginal communities in Tasmania told us that Aboriginal input into services for and decisions about Aboriginal children and young people is essential.[1006]

We consider that the Tasmanian Government should build on the commitments in its Draft Youth Justice Blueprint by developing an Aboriginal youth justice strategy in partnership with Aboriginal communities. In its submission to our Commission of Inquiry, the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service recommended creating such a strategy.[1007] A carefully and collaboratively developed Aboriginal youth justice strategy would help the Tasmanian Government to achieve its goal of reducing Aboriginal over-representation in youth detention in line with Target 11.

The development of the Aboriginal youth justice strategy must be led by Aboriginal communities across Tasmania and underpinned by the principle of self-determination in the youth justice system, whereby Aboriginal communities have authority in respect of Aboriginal children and young people. We note that the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint refers to an 'increased focus on self-determination' and commits to partnering with Aboriginal communities to determine the most appropriate responses to address Aboriginal over-representation in the youth justice system.[1008] The Tasmanian Government should ensure Aboriginal communities and organisations are supported and resourced to participate in developing the Aboriginal youth justice strategy.

The Aboriginal youth justice strategy should identify actions that will prevent Aboriginal children and young people entering the Tasmanian youth justice system, enable early intervention for Aboriginal families whose children are engaging in antisocial behaviour, and divert those children and young people who are already in contact with police away from the youth justice system and, in particular, from detention. This should include:

- strategies to increase the use of cautions for Aboriginal children and young people
- the development of more pre-court diversion programs for Aboriginal children and young people, delivered by Aboriginal organisations

- strategies to minimise the number of Aboriginal children on remand through culturally safe supported bail accommodation and other bail assistance programs
- support for Aboriginal children and young people on community-based orders, aimed at helping them comply with the conditions of their orders and avoid escalation into custodial sentences.

In Chapter 9, we recommend an expanded role for 'recognised Aboriginal organisations' in child safety decision making under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act. In particular, we recommend that the Tasmanian Government partners with Aboriginal communities to develop models for transferring child safety decision-making authority for Aboriginal children to recognised Aboriginal organisations, and create a statutory framework to facilitate such transfer (Recommendation 9.15).

To enable this to occur, we recommend in Chapter 9 that:

- the new Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People in the Department for Education, Children and Young People promotes and facilitates the establishment of recognised Aboriginal organisations (Recommendation 9.7)
- the Tasmanian Government invests in capacity building to ensure recognised Aboriginal organisations are fully resourced and their workforces fully equipped and supported to participate in child safety and out of home care decision-making processes for Aboriginal children, and to manage any transfer of decision-making authority (Recommendation 9.15).

Recognised Aboriginal organisations also have a role under the Youth Justice Act, namely to administer formal cautions to Aboriginal children or young people where requested by authorised police officers (we discuss cautions in Section 5).[1009] However, as noted in Chapter 9, the Tasmanian Government does not appear to have declared any organisations to be 'recognised Aboriginal organisations' for the purposes of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act (or, consequently, the Youth Justice Act). In that chapter, we recommend that the Tasmanian Government partners with Aboriginal communities to promote and support the establishment of recognised Aboriginal organisations.

We consider there could be a broader role for recognised Aboriginal organisations in youth justice processes in respect of Aboriginal children and young people. This could include delivering local diversionary programs for Aboriginal children and young people, leading conferencing under the Youth Justice Act, and designing and administering community-based youth justice options, including alternatives to custody for Aboriginal children and young people. These options should be examined under the auspices of the proposed Aboriginal youth justice strategy.

Recommendation 12.27

1. The Tasmanian Government, to protect Aboriginal children and young people against the risk of sexual abuse in youth detention, should urgently develop, in partnership with Aboriginal communities, an Aboriginal youth justice strategy that is underpinned by self-determination and that focuses on prevention, early intervention and diversion strategies for Aboriginal children and young people. Aboriginal communities should be funded to participate in developing the strategy.
2. The strategy should consider and address, among other matters:
    a. legislative reform to enable recognised Aboriginal organisations to design, administer and supervise elements of the youth justice system for Aboriginal children and young people
    b. capacity building and funding for recognised Aboriginal organisations to participate in youth justice decision making in relation to Aboriginal children and young people, and to deliver youth justice services to Aboriginal children and young people
    c. the use of police discretion in the investigation and processing of Aboriginal children and young people, including cautioning, arrest, custody, charging and bail
    d. alternative pre-court diversionary options for Aboriginal children and young people
    e. mechanisms to increase the likelihood of Aboriginal children and young people receiving bail and minimise the number of Aboriginal children and young people on remand, including culturally responsive supported bail accommodation and other bail assistance programs, and legislative reform to require bail decision makers to consider a child's Aboriginal status
    f. mechanisms to support Aboriginal children and young people to comply with the conditions of community-based youth justice orders, to minimise their likelihood of breaching conditions and entering detention.

7.2 Design of new youth justice facilities

As outlined in Section 2, the Government intends to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre with a 'detention/remand centre', two assisted bail facilities and two supported residential facilities for children and young people leaving detention on a supervised release order (among other pathways in).[1010] The supporting documentation for these facilities does not indicate how they will meet the specific needs of Aboriginal children and young people.

Participants in our consultations with Aboriginal communities told us that, as a general principle, there should be institutions specifically for Aboriginal children, run by Aboriginal communities:

> We need our own Aboriginal people involved with a system to handle our Aboriginal children. Or at least have some Aboriginal Elders on these groups who can have some input. Trained professionals that have a cultural understanding and not just a textbook understanding—we need those people to guide and make and create those places.[1011]

One participant suggested establishing an alternative to Ashley Youth Detention Centre where children and young people are guided by Elders in a homelike environment:

> … where children are treated with respect, and treat us with respect … they need to be with their people … in a place where they are safe mentally and emotionally.[1012]

Another participant referred to a system where Aboriginal children and young people are 'sent to "healing" places for Aboriginal people rather than jail'.[1013] Other participants highlighted the need for an alternative to Ashley Youth Detention Centre, where Aboriginal children and young people can be 'reconnected with their culture'.[1014]

Some participants referred to an earlier program for Aboriginal children and young people that was run by the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre on Lungtalanana/Clarke Island in Bass Strait.[1015] There were mixed views among Aboriginal community members about this program. Heather Sculthorpe, Chief Executive Officer, Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre, told us that there were challenges in managing this program:

> … we got funding so that kids didn't have to go to Ashley, kids didn't have to get sent away. In the end the State defunded that because not enough kids were using it, and we tried to say, well, we can't just put people on that island to look after kids. When Ashley decides to let a kid leave, we can't just find people then, we have to have them all the time and equipped to look after the children who are there. There's also some difficulty in young people not wanting to be isolated there and wanting to spend time with their mates, so it was not well attended but it was certainly not well funded: I think it got $140,000 a year.[1016]

In 2007, a Select Committee of the Tasmanian Parliament recommended that the Government assess the 'efficiency and benefits of alternate strategies such as the diversion of Aboriginal youth to Clarke Island-based programs'.[1017] In its response to the Select Committee's report, the Government noted that retaining and developing programs such as those on Clarke Island was 'extremely important'.[1018]

Ms Sculthorpe indicated that after the Clarke Island program ended, the Tasmanian Government began sending Aboriginal children to the Many Colours One Direction program in the Northern Territory, which was highly problematic.[1019] That program is discussed in Chapter 9.

In its Our Youth, Our Way inquiry report, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People found that Victoria's youth justice centres were harmful, often unsafe environments for Aboriginal children and young people.[1020] It examined best practice youth justice facilities internationally and concluded that small, homelike residences could:

- reduce young people's stress, improve their behaviour and increase the likelihood that they will engage in rehabilitation
- allow staff to build relational security rather than relying on physical restraints, resulting in fewer adverse incidents
- provide the opportunity to place children and young people closer to their families
- enable flexibility for community members to be part of the daily life of the residence
- give children and young people more opportunities to build social skills and connections that could improve their chances of successfully returning to the community.[1021]

The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People recommended that, as a step towards having no Aboriginal child or young person in custody, the Victorian Government should work with Aboriginal communities to establish three small, homelike facilities for Aboriginal children and young people serving custodial sentences.[1022] The recommended facilities should each have no more than six beds and allow for Aboriginal children and young people to connect with their culture and community.[1023]

The facilities would need to provide therapeutic, trauma-informed care, including mental health support and drug and alcohol treatment, as well as access to education.[1024] They should also employ Aboriginal staff who are trained to resolve conflict through restorative justice approaches.[1025]

The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People indicated that, while there should be Aboriginal community involvement in setting up and managing these facilities—possibly via a 'joint government and community management model'—it was not aware of an Aboriginal community or Aboriginal organisation in Victoria that wanted to fully manage a closed facility for sentenced Aboriginal children and young people.[1026]

The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People separately recommended establishing two small, homelike, non-secure facilities to provide therapeutic and culturally appropriate care for Aboriginal children and young people with highly complex needs who were likely to be refused bail based on their high risk of further offending.[1027] These facilities would be based on the Oranga Tamariki remand homes in New Zealand.[1028]

In Chapter 9, we recommend that the Tasmanian Government works with Aboriginal communities to establish fully resourced, Aboriginal-led, therapeutic residential programs for Aboriginal children who have been removed from their families under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, and for whom an appropriate placement with an Aboriginal carer cannot be found (Recommendation 9.15). Such residential programs should be separate from any facilities designed for Aboriginal children who are on remand or serving a custodial sentence.

We acknowledge that creating residential facilities specifically for Aboriginal children and young people in the youth justice system may be impractical in a jurisdiction such as Tasmania, where the custodial sentenced and remand populations are small. There is a risk that Aboriginal children and young people would feel 'siloed' in such facilities. We also note that it may not be appropriate for an Aboriginal organisation to manage a secure facility for sentenced Aboriginal children and young people in Tasmania. These issues require more consideration, in partnership with Aboriginal communities.

Regardless of whether a detention or remand facility specifically for Aboriginal children and young people is established, it is important to ensure any new facilities are culturally safe and designed to meet the specific needs of Aboriginal children and young people.

Cultural safety (discussed in Section 7.3) is affected by the physical design of custodial facilities—well-designed indoor and outdoor cultural spaces can 'provide opportunities for education, reflection, sharing stories and mentoring' and promote strong connection to culture for Aboriginal children and young people.[1029] Such connection is essential for the wellbeing of Aboriginal children and young people and is a protective factor against child sexual abuse.

Poorly designed spaces can have the opposite effect. An Aboriginal Elder told us that when she visited Ashley Youth Detention Centre, she was not given a culturally appropriate space (for example, outdoors) to spend time with Aboriginal young people, describing the environment as 'too institutionalised'.[1030]

Cultural safety for Aboriginal children and young people in detention also requires:

- the availability of cultural programs delivered by Aboriginal organisations
- regular and consistent access to family and community members
- the presence and support of Aboriginal staff.

These issues are discussed in more detail in Section 7.3.

The Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service has recommended that:

> Tasmania's Aboriginal communities be included as co-designers of facilities, infrastructure, programs and intended outcomes for replacement(s) for the Ashley Youth Detention Centre in order to ensure that facilities are culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people as well as trauma- and sexual-abuse-informed and sensitive to other specific needs including disability and drug and alcohol problems.[1031]

We agree, and recommend that these issues be examined in the context of the Aboriginal youth justice strategy recommended in Section 7.1.

Recommendation 12.28

The Tasmanian Government should ensure:

a. any new facilities intended to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre are co-designed with Aboriginal communities and include culturally enriching environments for Aboriginal children and young people that promote connection to family, community and Country

b. the Aboriginal youth justice strategy (Recommendation 12.27) considers whether a small, homelike facility that has Aboriginal staff, provides trauma-informed care and enables Aboriginal children and young people to connect with culture through the involvement of local Aboriginal communities, should be established specifically for Aboriginal children and young people who are remanded or serving a custodial sentence. Careful consideration should be given to the most appropriate management model for such a facility.

7.3 Cultural safety in youth detention

According to SNAICC – National Voice for our Children, and the Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, 'cultural safety' is:

> … the positive recognition and celebration of cultures. It is more than just the absence of racism or discrimination and more than 'cultural awareness' and 'cultural sensitivity'. It empowers people and enables them to contribute and feel safe to be themselves.[1032]

A culturally safe environment for Aboriginal children and young people is one where they are supported to connect with their culture and develop their identity.[1033] As one participant in our consultations said:

> Culture is the way to come out of it. That's what makes me feel safe. I believe that culture is the answer.[1034]

The Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report we commissioned found that most Aboriginal children and young people interviewed for the report did not know what cultural safety was, which suggests that it is not embedded in the organisations with which they interact.[1035] That report concluded:

> Organisations need to foster environments that promote cultural safety and recognise the ways that culture and connection can be protective and act to empower children and young people from Aboriginal and culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.[1036]

As noted in Chapter 9, for Aboriginal children and young people, connection to culture through family and community can increase protective factors against the risk of sexual abuse by helping to develop identity and a sense of belonging and by fostering high self-esteem, emotional strength and resilience.[1037]

Conversely, Aboriginal children and young people who are disconnected from their family, community and culture are 'at great risk of psychological, health, developmental and educational disadvantage' and 'suffer as children and later as adults from the grief and loneliness of not belonging'.[1038] This includes Aboriginal children who are disconnected from their families, communities and culture when they are remanded or sentenced to detention.

It is therefore essential that Tasmania's youth detention facilities support Aboriginal children and young people to maintain or build connections to family, community and culture while they are detained. For Aboriginal children and young people in youth detention who have previously been removed from their immediate families by the child protection system, connection to extended family, kin and Aboriginal community members is vital.

7.3.1 Identifying Aboriginality

For youth detention facilities to be culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people, staff must accurately identify the Aboriginal status of those in detention.

As discussed in Chapter 9, in almost every meeting we had with Aboriginal communities, participants raised concerns about how Aboriginal status is determined in Tasmania and who is responsible for determining it. Ms Sculthorpe of the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre also raised these issues in her evidence.[1039] In Chapter 9, we note that it is beyond the scope of our Inquiry to make recommendations on these questions.

However, it is within our terms of reference to address the increased risk of sexual abuse that Aboriginal children and young people face in youth detention due to their over-representation in the youth justice system. To provide adequate protection and support to Aboriginal children and young people in detention in relation to the risk of sexual abuse, it is important to ensure the Aboriginal status of children and young people in detention is accurately identified and recognised, so all Aboriginal children and young people in detention can be supported to stay connected to family, community and culture.

The Department's written procedure for admitting a child or young person into detention states that if the person is known to Community Youth Justice, their Aboriginal status must be collected from the Youth Justice Information System, and this information must be added to the 'Admissions Checklist'.[1040] The former Department of Health and Human Services had a department-wide procedure that required all staff of Children and Youth Services to determine a client's Aboriginal status every time the client 'commence[d] an involvement with' Children and Youth Services.[1041] This procedure continues to apply to children and young people being admitted to youth detention.[1042]

Secretary Pervan told us that the 'admission and induction process ask[s] direct questions concerning [A]boriginality'.[1043] He also told us that Aboriginal status is recorded at Ashley Youth Detention Centre through self-identification and 'may be updated throughout a young person's involvement with Youth Justice, which results in data that is changeable over time'.[1044]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People has previously observed about the out of home care system that children's Aboriginal status is not always consistently identified or recorded.[1045] Secretary Pervan told us that the former Department of Communities was 'improving collection and completion of Aboriginal status for children at the Advice and Referral Line and Child Safety Service'.[1046]

Nevertheless, we recommend in Chapter 9 that the Tasmanian Government ensures the Aboriginal status of all Aboriginal children in contact with Child Safety Services is accurately identified and recorded at the earliest opportunity (Recommendation 9.15). We anticipate that this would also result in better identifying Aboriginal status for children and young people entering youth detention.

Secretary Pervan told us that the induction assessment at Ashley Youth Detention Centre identifies a young person's:

> … background, physical and mental health, literacy, drug use, disability, indigenous status, familial and personal relationships and the young person's identified gender and sexuality (as identified by them). The assessment then allows for meaningful supports to be put into place that address their specific needs, and that they are stable and informed about their rights and routine before moving into a unit with other young people.[1047]

He also said that 'connection with community [E]lders' is sought for Aboriginal children and young people.[1048]

Where a child identifies as Aboriginal, the custodial case management guidelines require admissions staff to contact the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre within 12 hours of the child's admission into detention.[1049] However, the guidelines do not specify what role the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre is to perform in respect of case management for the child, nor do they contemplate the possibility of the child wanting to be supported by an Aboriginal organisation other than the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre.

We understand that, in some cases, a worker from the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre has been involved in case management meetings, conferencing and exit planning for Aboriginal children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, but we did not receive detailed evidence on this.[1050]

The admission procedure and custodial case management guidelines should be updated to require custodial staff to:

- ask children and young people who identify as Aboriginal whether they would like the support of an Aboriginal organisation (whether a recognised Aboriginal organisation or otherwise) or an Aboriginal community member while they are detained
- notify the relevant organisation or individual within 12 hours of the child or young person's admission
- facilitate the involvement of the child or young person's nominated representative in case planning, case management and exit planning in respect of the child or young person.

7.3.2 Cultural support and programs

Several of the children and young people interviewed for the Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report indicated that they were Aboriginal, but none identified ways in which organisations were taking steps to ensure their cultural safety.[1051]

Victim-survivor Charlotte (a pseudonym), who is Aboriginal and was detained in the 2000s, told us she did not receive any cultural support when she was in Ashley Youth Detention Centre (refer to Chapter 11, Case study 1).[1052] Participants in our consultations with Aboriginal communities told us that the cultural needs of Aboriginal children and young people in Ashley Youth Detention Centre were not being met.[1053] One community member said:

> All the kids in jail are lost. They have lost their culture and community, and there is nothing for them to connect with when they are feeling low.[1054]

During our visit to Ashley Youth Detention Centre in August 2021 (discussed in Chapter 2), we observed only a few small signs or symbols to celebrate or recognise Aboriginal culture compared with the youth detention facilities we visited interstate, which had large, landscaped cultural outdoor areas and Aboriginal artwork and posters.

The Department provided us with a copy of its Guidelines for Working with Young Aboriginal People and Other Young People from Culturally and Linguistically Diverse (CALD) Backgrounds, dated August 2010.[1055] According to this document:

- case management staff will 'take responsibility for including any cultural needs in a young person's case plan and ensure that appropriate programs/practices are implemented and monitored'
- case management staff will 'seek and pay particular notice of cultural advice from family and the cultural community of the young person'
- a young person's cultural needs will be clearly conveyed to the unit staff responsible for day-to-day management and relayed to staff if the young person is transferred to another unit.[1056]

However, beyond a requirement to notify the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre of the child's admission to custody, this document does not include any detail on how to meet the cultural needs of Aboriginal children in detention.[1057] In particular, it does not require staff to determine whether an Aboriginal child or young person already has a cultural support plan, nor does it provide any guidance on how to identify the cultural support needs of an Aboriginal child in detention.

Also, by including children and young people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and referring broadly to 'cultural needs', these guidelines fail to acknowledge or identify the unique experiences and needs of Aboriginal children and young people in detention.

Counsel Assisting our Inquiry asked Secretary Pervan to describe the extent to which there were programs at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to meet the needs of Aboriginal children and young people.[1058] In response, Secretary Pervan said:

> My understanding is that it actually depends on the child and which particular community they are from. The involvement and engagement of some community-controlled organisations is at a higher level and more direct, particularly for some young people; with others it's less so; it depends on the engagement and capability of the community organisation that's most representative of the young people in Ashley. It's something that we have invited, it's something that we're very keen to increase, and is part of our commitment through the Closing the Gap national agreements.[1059]

Secretary Pervan did not offer any more detail on the cultural support provided to Aboriginal children and young people in detention—for example, on specific cultural programs that are being or have been run. We also note that the Custodial Inspector's 2019 Equal Opportunity Inspection Report on Ashley Youth Detention Centre failed to discuss this issue in any detail, finding that 'for the most part, young people at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] are treated fairly and equitably'.[1060]

Dr Michael Guerzoni, Indigenous Fellow—Academic Development, University of Tasmania, told us that it is important for Aboriginal children and young people in detention to receive cultural immersion and cultural support, and for 'their Indigeneity [to be] encouraged and supported'.[1061]

Participants in our consultations with Aboriginal communities also told us that connection with culture for Aboriginal children and young people in detention is essential.[1062] Several Elders indicated that they used to visit Aboriginal children and young people in Ashley Youth Detention Centre as part of various programs, with one commenting:

> I loved seeing the kids at Ashleys. They could just be themselves, have a yarn. Your heart broke when you left.[1063]

The Department did not provide us with any information about these programs, although it did provide a copy of a 2021 Ashley Youth Detention Centre newsletter that refers to '[c]ultural story sharing with … an Aboriginal Elder', which would 'lead to the design of a yarning circle [and] bush tucker garden to be developed in the outdoor area'.[1064]

Cultural programs such as visiting Elders programs are an important way to support cultural connection for Aboriginal children and young people in detention. In our consultations with Aboriginal communities, we also heard that on-Country programs can help Aboriginal children and young people 'feel proud of themselves, release emotions and learn about themselves'.[1065] However, participants also referred to the absence of cultural programs, such as men's or women's 'sheds' in some areas, noting that some earlier programs had been discontinued.[1066]

Connection to culture for Aboriginal children and young people in detention could also be facilitated through a mentoring program. The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People has highlighted the benefits of cultural mentors for Aboriginal children and young people who are in contact with the youth justice system, particularly where programs use mentors with lived experience of the youth justice system, who can be 'credible messengers' in providing support to Aboriginal children and young people.[1067] Mentoring programs for children and young people in contact with the youth justice system have also been shown to reduce offending behaviour.[1068]

The Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service has referred to the potentially 'huge impact' of positive role models with lived experience of the youth justice system acting as mentors for Aboriginal children and young people in contact with the system.[1069]

Participants at one of our consultations with Aboriginal community members referred to the positive contributions of an Aboriginal worker based in an Aboriginal organisation who has lived experience of the youth justice system and has developed a strong rapport with Aboriginal children and young people in detention.[1070] Madeleine Gardiner, former Manager, Professional Services and Policy at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, also referred to this 'respected Aboriginal mentor' who performs positive work in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1071]

7.3.3 Visits, temporary leave and phone calls

Visits, temporary leave and phone calls are also important means of enabling Aboriginal children and young people in detention to stay connected to family, community and culture.

As discussed in Section 6.7, children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

- have the right to regular contact with family members through personal visits, but management can refuse a visit if it believes that the 'security, safety or good order of the Centre or the health or well-being of the young person may be adversely affected by allowing the visit'[1072]
- can apply for temporary leave from the Centre—applications must undergo a thorough risk assessment, including consideration of the young person's 'behaviour and attitude at or near the time of the proposed leave', any history of threats or attempts to abscond, and the young person's 'recent and current colour status' under the Behaviour Development Program[1073]
- can make seven phone calls each week and are entitled to extra calls if they achieve 'yellow' or 'green' status in the Behaviour Development Program.[1074]

Ms Gardiner described two occasions where Aboriginal young people were denied visitation rights in circumstances where the visits were therapeutically important for these young people.[1075] The first occasion involved an Aboriginal young person being refused a visit from his brother in 2018, with no valid rationale apparent to Ms Gardiner.[1076] Ms Gardiner successfully appealed this decision.[1077]

In the second case, in 2019, Ms Gardiner's team had organised for a mentor from an Aboriginal organisation to visit Ashley Youth Detention Centre and sit with an Aboriginal young person while he viewed video footage from his father's funeral, which he had earlier been denied permission to attend.[1078] Although the mentor's visit was initially approved, Ms Gardiner later discovered that it had been cancelled by Ashley Youth Detention Centre management, without consultation, on the day it was scheduled to occur.[1079] The reason provided to Ms Gardiner for the cancellation was that there were not enough staff to supervise the visit.[1080] She described these decisions as 'not child-focused' and 'very insensitive'.[1081]

Were these situations to occur in future, we hope they would be approached with awareness of and sensitivity to the cultural needs of Aboriginal children and young people in detention on the part of Ashley Youth Detention Centre management and staff. Attendance at funerals can be an important way to maintain family connection and fulfil cultural obligations.[1082] Where this is not possible, every effort must be made to enable Aboriginal children and young people to take part in important cultural rituals in alternative ways.

We are also concerned that custodial policies allow the denial of an application for temporary leave to attend a family funeral based on a child or young person's recent behaviour and status in the Behaviour Development Program. The behaviour of a child or young person whose family member has recently died may be exacerbated by grief and trauma, and this should not be a reason to deny them access to their family.

We did not hear any evidence specifically about the ability of Aboriginal children and young people to make or receive phone calls from Ashley Youth Detention Centre. However, we consider that it is problematic to link a child's right to contact their family or community with the child's behaviour.

In Section 6.7.5, we recommend that the Department:

- develops and implements a policy on the importance to children and young people in detention of maintaining or building connections with their family and community that specifies ways to promote such connections and clearly states that entitlements to visits, temporary leave and phone or video calls cannot be denied on the basis of a child or young person's behaviour
- provides reasonable assistance (including financial help) to members of a child or young person's family or Aboriginal community to enable them to visit the child or young person frequently in detention (Recommendation 12.23).

7.3.4 Recruitment of Aboriginal staff

As noted, the National Royal Commission recommended that governments consider strategies for recruiting and developing Aboriginal staff to work at all levels of the youth justice system.[1083] Despite the substantial over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in youth detention in Tasmania, the staffing structure for Ashley Youth Detention Centre provided to us by Secretary Pervan does not include any role(s) dedicated specifically to the wellbeing of Aboriginal children and young people in detention, such as an Aboriginal liaison officer.[1084]

Victim-survivor Charlotte (a pseudonym) told us that there was no one in Ashley Youth Detention Centre in the 2000s who helped her to feel culturally safe.[1085] She said that it would have made a difference while she was in the Centre if she had been supported by an Aboriginal worker to whom she could have disclosed the abuse she had experienced:

> There was none at that stage for anyone that was Aboriginal. I've been to [adult] jails in the past, like after that, and the Aboriginal support, like, the support workers that help, they do so much for people. Like, they need more of it and they definitely needed someone like that in [Ashley Youth Detention Centre], like, that you could go to tell stuff like that.[1086]

In its 2021 Our Youth, Our Way inquiry report, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People found that Aboriginal liaison officers in Victoria's youth justice centres played an important role in supporting the cultural needs of Aboriginal children and young people in detention by contributing to the work of care teams, making sure Aboriginal children's voices are heard in decision making about them and generally supporting them.[1087] The Our Youth, Our Way report quotes the lead consultant forensic psychiatrist for Victoria's youth justice centres on the positive contribution that Aboriginal liaison officers make to therapeutic treatment for Aboriginal children and young people:

> Having [Aboriginal liaison officers] there completely changes the therapeutic results. The Aboriginal clients suddenly open up and the [Aboriginal liaison officers] do a ton of work explaining to the young person how it's going to work and that it's just a chat. If I was designing the perfect service, we would have one-on-one support for every Aboriginal young person.[1088]

However, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People also found that, despite the value placed in Aboriginal liaison officers by the youth justice system, these roles were overloaded and experienced high turnover.[1089] It recommended that the Victorian Department of Justice and Community Safety review the Aboriginal liaison officer program to assess how it could best meet the competing needs and demands placed on it.[1090]

Participants in our consultations with Aboriginal communities similarly told us that Aboriginal liaison officers in schools were overloaded and not adequately resourced, and that more training and support was needed for people to take on these and similar roles.[1091]

We consider that there would be considerable benefit in establishing an Aboriginal liaison officer role or roles in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any replacement detention facilities. The primary function of the Aboriginal liaison officer should be to support Aboriginal children and young people in detention. This should include involvement in case management and exit planning, and facilitating cultural support for Aboriginal children and young people. Aboriginal liaison officers should be identified positions.

In establishing these roles, the Tasmanian Government should ensure appointees are not overloaded and that they receive professional development, including training, in working with children and young people who have experienced trauma.

In Chapter 9 and Section 11.4 of this chapter, we recommend establishing an independent community visitor scheme for children and young people in out of home care and youth detention (Recommendations 9.34 and 12.36). This scheme would involve independent community visitors appointed by the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) undertaking weekly (or more frequent) visits to children and young people in detention, building trusting relationships with them, listening to any of their concerns about their treatment in detention and advocating on their behalf (this is discussed in Section 11.4). We recommend that, wherever possible, Aboriginal children and young people have access to an Aboriginal independent community visitor (Recommendation 12.36).

While Aboriginal liaison officers and independent community visitors would each be responsible for developing trusting relationships with Aboriginal children and young people in detention, we consider that their functions are different and that there is an important role for both. Aboriginal liaison officers would be employed by the Department and would be involved with Aboriginal children and young people on a day-to-day basis, providing them with cultural and other support. In contrast, independent community visitors would offer an external oversight mechanism for the safety and wellbeing of Aboriginal children and young people in detention and, where needed, advocate on their behalf to help to resolve their concerns.

7.3.5 Professional development for custodial staff

As noted, the National Royal Commission pointed to the need for culturally competent staff in custodial facilities who understand the needs and experiences of Aboriginal children in detention.[1092]

The Ashley Youth Detention Centre Learning and Development Framework (discussed in Section 4.7.1) indicates that staff undergo mandatory 'Aboriginal Cultural Awareness' training, and that '[c]ultural awareness will be embedded in all learning and development opportunities'.[1093] The evidence we heard (detailed in this section) indicates this training has not resulted in a culturally safe environment that responds to the specific experiences and needs of Aboriginal children and young people.

As discussed in Section 6.3, staff in detention facilities need to be equipped with the skills to undertake trauma-informed, evidence-based interventions with all children and young people in detention—many of whom have experienced significant trauma and may be engaging in challenging behaviours—without resorting to the use of force or isolation. However, to provide such interventions for Aboriginal children and young people, custodial staff also need to understand the nature and impacts of intergenerational trauma experienced by Aboriginal communities; the effects of dislocation from family, community and Country on Aboriginal children's wellbeing; and the need for Aboriginal children to be connected to culture while in detention.[1094] The training Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff receive does not appear to be equipping them with this knowledge or these skills.

Research indicates that, nationally, Aboriginal young people aged between 15 and 24 years are more than five times more likely to self-harm than non-Aboriginal young people and that the risk of self-harm is compounded for Aboriginal children and young people in detention, where there is also a high prevalence of self-harming behaviour.[1095]

The Ashley Youth Detention Centre Suicide and Self-Harm Prevention Procedure has only one reference to Aboriginal children and young people.[1096] This occurs in the context of discussion about the ongoing therapeutic management of a child or young person who has been the subject of a 'suicide and self-harm notification'.[1097] The procedure states that the 'risk intervention team' must discuss and agree on the type and level of interaction that the young person should have with parents, residents, staff members and other support people, noting that 'increased access to family may be an important protective factor' for Aboriginal children and young people.[1098]

In its Our Youth, Our Way inquiry report, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People found that Aboriginal children and young people were substantially over-represented in incidents involving attempted suicide and self-harm in Victoria's youth justice centres, possibly indicating that Aboriginal children and young people were experiencing high levels of distress at being incarcerated.[1099] The Commission for Children and Young People recommended that the Victorian Department of Justice and Community Safety develop a strategy to provide consistent and therapeutic responses to children and young people at risk of suicide or self-harm in detention, including specific elements to ensure a culturally safe response to Aboriginal children and young people.[1100]

The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint refers to the need for the youth justice workforce to be:

> … culturally competent so it can support and respond to the needs of Aboriginal children and young people in the youth justice system and work with Aboriginal communities across the continuum to help them support their children and young people.[1101]

Also, as outlined in Section 6.3.3, the Keeping Kids Safe Plan states that the Australian Childhood Foundation Centre for Excellence in Therapeutic Care started a review of the Learning and Development Framework in September 2022.[1102] This review was due to be completed by 31 January 2023.[1103] In June 2023, the Department advised that the review was progressing and was anticipated to be completed by 30 June 2023.[1104] We have not been provided with the review's findings or recommendations.

In updating the Learning and Development Framework, the Tasmanian Government should ensure the framework is designed to equip staff with the knowledge and skills to provide a culturally safe environment for Aboriginal children and young people, including responding in trauma-informed and culturally safe ways to Aboriginal children and young people who are engaging in self-harm or other challenging behaviours.

Recommendation 12.29

The Tasmanian Government should take steps to ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any replacement facilities are culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people. These steps should include:

a. updating admission procedures and case management guidelines to require staff to

   i. ask children and young people who identify as Aboriginal whether they would like the support of an Aboriginal organisation or an Aboriginal community member while they are detained

   ii. notify the nominated organisation or individual within 12 hours of the child or young person's admission

   iii. facilitate the involvement of the child or young person's nominated representative in case planning, case management and exit planning in respect of the child or young person

b. updating relevant guidelines and procedures to require staff to consult with an Aboriginal child or young person's community to determine how best to provide individual cultural support to the child or young person while they are in detention

c. working with Aboriginal communities to establish ongoing cultural programs for Aboriginal children and young people in detention, such as visiting Elders programs, on-Country programs and cultural mentoring programs

d. ensuring the new policy on supporting children and young people in detention to maintain connections to their families and communities (Recommendation 12.23) emphasises the central importance of connection to family, community and culture for the wellbeing of Aboriginal children and young people in detention

e. establishing the role of Aboriginal liaison officer in youth detention to support Aboriginal children and young people, including by facilitating cultural support and becoming involved in case planning, case management and exit planning

f. ensuring the updated Ashley Youth Detention Centre Learning and Development Framework is designed to equip staff with the knowledge and skills to provide a culturally safe environment for Aboriginal children and young people, including providing trauma-informed and culturally safe responses to children and young people engaging in self-harm or other challenging behaviours.

7.4 Support for Aboriginal children leaving detention

As discussed in Section 6.8, we heard about a lack of effective support for children and young people leaving detention ('throughcare support') in Tasmania.[1105] Many participants in our consultations with Aboriginal communities commented on the absence of support for Aboriginal children and young people who are released from Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1106] Some referred to the lack of safe and stable homes for Aboriginal children to return to:

> I remember one kid who couldn't go home afterwards because his dad and pop were on the drugs. There was nothing you could do.[1107]

Many participants commented that the absence of throughcare support for Aboriginal children and young people created a high risk that they would engage in further offending and return to detention:

> When our kids are in Ashleys, they've got nowhere to go, nothing to do, no follow up … that's a really big problem. They reoffend and go back in there again.[1108]

Another participant said:

> If they come out and go back to the same community, then what happens? They just go back to where they were before, and then end up back in Ashleys.[1109]

One Aboriginal community member suggested that, for some Aboriginal children and young people, the relative stability provided by Ashley Youth Detention Centre was preferable to their circumstances following release:

> … some kids would get themselves in trouble so they could go back there, because they don't have anywhere else to go, they just go home to drugs and abuse … for some of them it's a roof over their heads, it's meals three times a day.[1110]

These comments raise serious concerns about the Tasmanian youth justice system and related service systems, most notably the housing, child protection and out of home care systems. There is clearly an urgent need to address the lack of support for Aboriginal children and young people leaving detention in Tasmania.

Participants in our consultations with Aboriginal communities felt that support for Aboriginal children and young people following their release from youth detention should include housing, cultural support, drug and alcohol services and educational support.[1111]

As outlined in Section 6.8.2, the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint refers to the commencement of service planning at the earliest opportunity for a young person in contact with the youth justice system.[1112] This is welcome, but it is concerning that the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint does not refer to throughcare support specifically for Aboriginal children and young people, given the substantial over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in detention.

We also welcome the Government's proposed supported residential facilities as temporary or transitional accommodation for children and young people released from detention (refer to Section 6.8.2). However, again, we note that the limited information provided about these facilities does not include any detail on how they will meet the particular needs of Aboriginal children and young people.[1113]

The North Australian Aboriginal Justice Agency provides a throughcare program for Aboriginal children and young people in youth detention in the Northern Territory.[1114] Case managers in this program support Aboriginal children and young people preparing to leave detention to 'help young people and their families develop strong and holistic post-release plans that address their goals, risks and transitional needs'.[1115] The program provides case management support following release for as long as the young person wants to remain involved, and there is an identified need.[1116]

The Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency manages the Youth Through Care program for Aboriginal children and young people aged 10 to 17 years in detention in Victoria. This program is funded by the National Indigenous Australians Agency.[1117] The program works to reduce reoffending by supporting Aboriginal children and young people through an 'intensive, holistic, client-centred, culturally appropriate and trauma-informed model with strong connection to family and Country'.[1118]

Youth Through Care program workers provide individual case management that starts from an Aboriginal child's or young person's entry into detention and continues for up to 24 months following their release.[1119] Post-release support can include helping children and young people attend Centrelink appointments, providing transport to and from drug and alcohol services, and visiting them in residential care or at home to provide social and emotional wellbeing support.[1120] Program workers may also provide outreach to the families of Aboriginal children and young people where the child or young person has not had recent contact with their family or if the worker has concerns about the welfare of a parent or carer of the child or young person.[1121]

We recognise the significant benefits of these programs but acknowledge that in a small jurisdiction such as Tasmania it may not be feasible to establish a separate throughcare support service for Aboriginal children and young people. In Section 6.8.3, we recommend that the Government establishes an integrated throughcare service for children and young people in detention that starts exit planning as soon as possible after a child or young person enters detention. This service should plan for safe and stable accommodation, access to physical and mental health support and help with education and employment after release to facilitate children and young people's reintegration into the community (Recommendation 12.24). This service must be culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people, and responsive to their needs.

8 Harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention

Harmful sexual behaviours are highlighted as a concern in several chapters of our report. In Chapter 6 on education and Chapter 9 on out of home care, we explore the need for appropriate prevention and intervention responses for harmful sexual behaviours in those settings. In Chapter 21, we discuss the need for a statewide approach to therapeutic interventions for children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours.

As discussed in these other chapters, harmful sexual behaviours are generally considered to be:

> … sexual behaviours displayed by children and young people that fall outside what may be considered developmentally, socially, and culturally expected, may cause harm to themselves or others, and occur either face to face and/or via technology. When these behaviours involve another child or young person, they may include a lack of consent, reciprocity, mutuality, and involve the use of coercion, force, or a misuse of power.[1122]

Harmful sexual behaviours are a known risk in youth detention and there must be measures in place to address this risk.[1123] In this section, we consider the significant improvements that must be made for Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any future detention facilities to better prevent and respond to harmful sexual behaviours among children and young people in these facilities.

We recommend that the Department develops a clear policy for preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention. This policy must consider the full range of harmful sexual behaviours that may occur in those settings, so all children and young people involved can receive assistance. While we focus on youth detention in this section, the policy should also apply to other residential youth justice facilities such as the Government's proposed assisted bail facilities (discussed in Section 5.4) and supported residential facilities (discussed in Section 6.8).

8.1 National Royal Commission

The National Royal Commission found that harmful sexual behaviours can often occur as a result of trauma, which many children in youth detention have experienced.[1124] The National Royal Commission also identified an increased risk of harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention, noting:

> The risk of children sexually abusing other children may be high in youth detention because children who have harmful sexual behaviours or have engaged in criminal or antisocial behaviour are disproportionately clustered in youth detention institutions, and placement decisions involving highly complex children with serious backgrounds of offending are challenging for administrators. Many children with harmful sexual behaviours may also model their behaviour on how they see adults or older children behave in institutions.

> Research also suggests that many children with harmful sexual behaviours act impulsively rather than in a premeditated manner. They may also be motivated by exerting power over or perpetrating violence towards other children.[1125]

The National Royal Commission made several recommendations relevant to harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention, including:

- Institutions need policies and procedures to understand, prevent and respond to harmful sexual behaviours.[1126]
- Children and young people should be assessed for risk for vulnerability to engaging in, or being subject to, harmful sexual behaviours before being placed in a detention centre. Placement decisions and supervision should be informed by these risk assessments to ensure the safest possible placements are provided for children.[1127]
- Children and young people who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours should have access to timely, expert assessment and a range of appropriate, coordinated interventions, including therapeutic interventions.[1128]
- Staff should receive training and ongoing professional development in trauma-informed care, including identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours and the needs of children and young people at risk of engaging in, or being subject to, harmful sexual behaviours.[1129]
- The facility should incorporate building and design features that reduce opportunities for harmful sexual behaviours to occur and monitor interactions between children and young people without infringing on children's privacy.[1130]
- Child-focused measures should exist to assist disclosure of harmful sexual behaviours such as children and young people having access to 'maximum contact' with trusted adults such as family, friends and community, and access to effective internal and external complaints-handling systems.[1131]

We discuss some of these issues—such as building design, increased access to trusted adults and effective complaints processes—in other sections of this chapter, as they relate to reducing the risk of all types of child sexual abuse in youth detention. In this section, we focus on recommendations specifically related to preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours in this setting.

We consider it useful to move beyond the National Royal Commission recommendations on risk assessments for harmful sexual behaviours to differentiate between screening assessments to accurately identify harmful sexual behaviours and clinical assessments for harmful sexual behaviours where risk is one component of the assessment. We elaborate on this approach in Section 8.4.2.

8.2 Harmful sexual behaviours at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

In her hearing evidence, the Director of Strategic Youth Services in the former Department of Communities acknowledged that Ashley Youth Detention Centre has had a longstanding problem with harmful sexual behaviours and has failed to address these behaviours through appropriate responses.[1132]

Since those hearings, the issue has remained a difficult one to address. In a submission to a parliamentary inquiry on adult imprisonment and youth detention, a staff member who worked at Ashley Youth Detention Centre between September and December 2022 stated that harmful sexual behaviours were commonplace and were directed at other young people as well as staff.[1133] The staff member described young people in the Centre as dismissing these incidents as 'just playing, joking around', with no complaints being made by the young people who experienced the behaviour.[1134]

In Chapter 11, Case study 2, we discuss several accounts of harmful sexual behaviours at Ashley Youth Detention Centre of which we were made aware. We identified systemic problems that contributed to the risk of harmful sexual behaviours among young people at the Centre, such as:

- a lack of assessment of the risk of harmful sexual behaviours for young people entering the Centre
- tensions between staff or teams within the Centre who held different views about how to manage the safety of young people
- staff lacking the knowledge to identify and respond appropriately to harmful sexual behaviours
- not always having a skilled investigative team available to the Centre when serious incidents occur.

Many of these problems are addressed by our recommendations in Section 8.5.

8.3 Clinical leadership

We consider that the therapeutic and wellbeing needs of the children and young people involved in harmful sexual behaviours are most likely to be given priority if professional staff with clinical expertise in harmful sexual behaviours are involved in assessing, monitoring and managing harmful sexual behaviours and in placement decisions.

This is a successful approach at Bimberi Youth Justice Centre in the Australian Capital Territory, where the Principal Practitioner, a clinical psychologist, oversees and is involved in decisions about risk, support needs and therapeutic interventions provided to children and young people at that centre.[1135]

Some progress has been made towards increasing clinical input at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. We heard that the Centre's Practice Manager had started meeting weekly, from 18 May 2022, with a Sexual Assault Support Service clinician to discuss any incidents or concerns about harmful sexual behaviours of children and young people in detention.[1136] The Practice Manager position has also been upgraded in pay classification in recognition of its specialised clinical role.[1137] The role includes 'clinical supervision' with operational staff to ensure they respond to disclosures of child sexual abuse in alignment with the advice provided by the Sexual Assault Support Service.[1138]

In its Keeping Kids Safe Plan, the Department stated that it had engaged a Senior Advisor from the Australian Childhood Foundation to provide a range of clinical review and support services for staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1139] We hope these services relate to harmful sexual behaviours as well as other risk and safety issues, and that this move precipitates a more cooperative relationship between those with clinical expertise and operational staff, as we recommend in Section 6.4.

To achieve greater clinical leadership on harmful sexual behaviours, staff in detention facilities and other residential youth justice facilities need to have ready access to harmful sexual behaviours specialists. In Chapter 9, we recommend establishing a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit in the new Office of the Chief Practitioner (refer to Recommendations 9.17 and 9.28).

The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit should support best practice responses in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities through:

- tele-consults with staff at the facility to assist them in confirming the level of risk posed by behaviours and/or to assist the facility in developing a response plan for inappropriate or concerning sexual behaviours that can be addressed through a local area response without clinical intervention
- assistance in responding to critical incidents involving harmful sexual behaviours, including guidance on reporting, record keeping, clinical assessments and safety planning (including placement and supervision plans)
- support in accessing therapeutic treatment for children displaying harmful sexual behaviours, where this is clinically assessed as appropriate.

Given the unique characteristics of youth detention and the youth justice system, detailed youth justice-specific policies, protocols and practice guidance will be required.

The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit should support or lead development of these policies, protocols and guidance.

Allied health professionals working on site in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities could support local clinical leadership in responding to harmful sexual behaviours. In Chapter 9, we recommend that more advanced professional development offerings be made available to relevant staff in the Child Safety Service, schools and youth justice (Recommendations 9.11 and 9.28).

8.4 Preventing harmful sexual behaviours

8.4.1 A proactive approach to sexual safety

Adolescence is a significant period in a child's sexual development. During puberty, adolescents are developing their sexual identity, which often involves consensual sexual exploration with peers. As noted, however, several factors increase the risk of inappropriate and harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention facilities.[1140] At the same time, children in detention are disproportionately likely to have experienced extensive school absenteeism or to have disengaged from education and are consequently less likely to have engaged in sexual health, respectful relationships and sexual safety education in schools.[1141]

These circumstances mean it is essential for youth detention to provide sex education tailored to the needs of a high-risk population. We heard that young people receive the 'Consent is a conversation' program through Ashley School, which promotes 'healthy, respectful intimate relationships'.[1142] We consider, however, that the National Royal Commission's observations indicate that sex education for children and young people in detention should go further. Similar to our recommendation for children and young people in out of home care (refer to Recommendation 9.28), sex education for children and young people in detention should be tailored to that setting and cover issues such as consent and what constitutes sexually abusive behaviours by adults and other children, as well as pornography and its impacts on children's views about relationships, sexuality and gender.[1143]

Further, we consider that a proactive approach for staff and young people in detention should form part of the Department's policy on harmful sexual behaviours in residential youth justice facilities.[1144] As discussed in our out of home care volume (Chapter 9), 'Power to Kids' is an example of a program designed for residential out of home care that could be adapted for use in detention and other residential youth justice facilities. Power to Kids is a multifaceted program proven to reduce the risk to children in residential care of sexual abuse in the form of harmful sexual behaviours, child sexual exploitation and dating violence.[1145] The Power to Kids model includes respectful relationships and sexuality education for the whole facility, including staff and young people, and guidance about responding appropriately to harmful sexual behaviours when they occur.[1146] Such strategies support a shared understanding of appropriate behaviours and a culture that reduces the likelihood that harmful sexual behaviours will occur.[1147]

8.4.2 Identification and assessment

The Government's Fifth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan on implementing the recommendations of the National Royal Commission ('Fifth Annual Report') describes 'new admission practices' whereby children and young people entering Ashley Youth Detention Centre 'undertake the admission induction program in their first week of custody in which a full risk and needs assessment is carried out'.[1148] The Government stated that '[s]afety is ultimately the deciding factor for each individual unit and program placement' and that sexual and physical safety is taken into account during the risk assessment.[1149]

However, the Centre's current admission process does not include a screening assessment for harmful sexual behaviours.[1150] What is needed is a screening assessment based on an accepted contemporary model of harmful sexual behaviours that admission staff can use—in conjunction with proper training—to identify children and young people who may be likely to engage in harmful sexual behaviours. Those children and young people should immediately be referred to clinical staff for a clinical assessment to understand the child's risks and needs and inform placement decisions, safety planning and therapeutic interventions. The 'Assessment Intervention Moving on (AIM)' assessment framework currently used by the Sexual Assault Support Service is an example of a clinical assessment.[1151]

Also, given the heightened risks of harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention populations, policies and practices need to go beyond an initial assessment and instead provide a framework for recognising and responding to inappropriate and harmful sexual behaviours young people may display throughout their time in detention. The Hackett Harmful Sexual Behaviours Continuum, True Relationship Traffic Lights continuum or Paton and Bromfield Layered Continuum are examples used in Australia that provide a framework for understanding children's sexual behaviours and recognising where those behaviours have the potential to be harmful to the child displaying the behaviours or others.[1152]

8.4.3 Placement decisions

The National Royal Commission recommended that state and territory governments ensure placement decisions in youth detention are informed by an assessment that includes a child's vulnerability to sexual abuse or displaying harmful sexual behaviours.[1153] It identified that children and young people were more at risk from harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention when they were placed with older children and young people or when female children and young people were housed in a predominantly male environment.[1154]

The National Royal Commission acknowledged how challenging placement of children and young people in youth detention centres can be, particularly where there are limited accommodation options, such as having only one detention centre or one that is very small.[1155] We also acknowledge that staff shortages and high detainee-to-staff ratios can complicate placement decisions.

On 31 May 2022, the Department introduced a new Unit Commissioning, De-Commissioning and Allocation to a Young Person Procedure ('Unit Placement Procedure').[1156] The Unit Placement Procedure acknowledges that decisions about unit placement are 'critical, as placement decisions can affect a young person's health and wellbeing by either increasing or decreasing the risk of immediate or future harm'.[1157] The following 'critical requirements' are identified in the Unit Placement Procedure 'in order to ensure the safety of young people':

> All new arrivals will be housed in the admission induction unit.
> Male and female detainees will be housed separately. Detainees that identify as transgender will guide their unit placement.
>
> If deemed safe, young people from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander backgrounds should room share.
> Placement decisions about young people must be made in the best interests of all young people at the Centre.[1158]

The Unit Placement Procedure describes the responsibility of the 'Risk Assessment Process Team' to consider 'the best interests of all affected young people' when determining placements for children and young people in the Centre.[1159] While the team must generally consider '[s]afety and security needs or risks', and gender and '[r]elationship dynamics in the Unit', the Unit Placement Procedure does not mention the risk of harmful sexual behaviours.[1160] We also consider that the Unit Placement Procedure lacks clarity on what 'operational considerations' may influence decisions about unit placement and who will make and review such decisions.

As acknowledged in the Fifth Annual Report, safety considerations should outweigh operational needs in making decisions about the placement of children and young people within detention facilities.[1161] As discussed, we consider that a screening and assessment process that informs the approach to unit and program assignments should occur at admission to minimise risk of the child experiencing or displaying harmful sexual behaviours.

8.4.4 Supervision

The National Royal Commission found that inadequate supervision in youth detention facilities provided more opportunity for harmful sexual behaviours.[1162] Poor supervision was a factor that contributed to a number of the incidents of harmful sexual behaviours in Ashley Youth Detention Centre described in our case studies, especially where other risk factors were present—such as younger children being left unsupervised with older children, or a girl being left unsupervised with boys.[1163]

Installing closed-circuit television cameras could be an alternative to in-person supervision. However, a number of the instances of harmful sexual behaviours described in the case studies occurred in the presence of closed-circuit television cameras, which may indicate that this form of supervision is less effective at deterring harmful sexual behaviours and should not be relied on as a preventive practice in preference to in-person staff supervision. In Section 4.7, we discuss staffing shortages at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and make recommendations for staff recruitment.

8.5 Responding to harmful sexual behaviours

There must be a clear process for responding to incidents of harmful sexual behaviours when they occur in youth detention or other residential youth justice facilities.

The National Royal Commission stated that an institution's response to an incident of harmful sexual behaviour should involve:

- monitoring the safety and wellbeing of the children and young people involved as well as any children and young people who witnessed the incident
- complying with reporting obligations
- communicating with the children and young people involved and their carers
- documenting and sharing information where necessary.[1164]

We discuss each of these elements of a good response to harmful sexual behaviours in the following sections.

In its Fifth Annual Report, the Tasmanian Government said 'work has been undertaken to ensure that a risk sensible approach is applied to sexualised behaviours onsite with these behaviours not normalised' in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1165] It is not clear from that report what specific actions the Tasmanian Government has taken to ensure that outcome.

We note that sexualised behaviours occur on a continuum and, therefore, the response should be appropriate to the severity and chronicity of the behaviour.[1166] Lower-level behaviours such as sexualised talk and simulated masturbation in public settings can be managed by staff redirecting and reminding young people of what is appropriate behaviour. In so doing, staff support a norm for the culture of the facility that discourages young people from displaying more harmful sexualised behaviours.[1167] However, more serious behaviours require a more therapeutic response for the young people involved. The following principles should guide the response.

8.5.1 Child wellbeing

We heard that when Erin (a pseudonym) was sexually assaulted in Ashley Youth Detention Centre by a group of young people, she received no therapeutic response to the trauma.[1168] Children and young people who have been affected by harmful sexual behaviours—whether they engaged in, experienced or witnessed the behaviours—need to have timely, clinically supervised access to appropriate support for their wellbeing following an incident.[1169] As discussed in Chapter 21, there are many benefits associated with sexual assault counselling and therapeutic interventions for harmful sexual behaviours being delivered to children in detention by community-based services. For example, with effective treatment, children's risk of continuing to display harmful sexual behaviours is significantly reduced.[1170]

Secretary Pervan told us that, following evidence from the Sexual Assault Support Service at our hearings in May 2022, senior staff from Ashley Youth Detention Centre established a formal arrangement for consulting with the Sexual Assault Support Service 'to provide recommendations for identifying, preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviour, and child sexual abuse more generally'.[1171] He said that 'the Sexual Assault Support Service is now available to support young people who were victims or witnesses' of harmful sexual behaviours in the Centre and that a private psychology practice provides three hours per week of psychology services to those young people via a digital platform.[1172] He told us that a child who has experienced harmful sexual behaviours would receive therapeutic support from the private psychology practice, the Centre's nurse and the visiting doctor.[1173]

While this information is promising, we remain cautious. Renae Pepper, Senior Practitioner and Psychologist, Sexual Assault Support Service, expressed concern that the punitive approach at Ashley Youth Detention Centre (discussed in Section 4.2.2) was at odds with a therapeutic approach to responding to harmful sexual behaviours.[1174] This tension must be resolved if children and young people in detention are to receive appropriate interventions for harmful sexual behaviours.

Ideally, where longer-term sexual assault and harmful sexual behaviours clinical supports are required, they should be provided by clinical specialists outside the facility, who can continue to provide treatment following the young person's release from detention. This is important given the need to develop a therapeutic relationship for successful intervention and given that many young people are in detention for relatively short periods.[1175]

8.5.2 Communicating with children, young people and their carers

As discussed in Section 10, a child-focused complaints process involves the child and keeps them informed of the outcome.[1176] Furthermore, parents and guardians should also be kept informed of the wellbeing of their child in detention or another residential youth justice facility. The harmful sexual behaviours policy should outline how staff at such facilities will communicate with parents, carers or guardians of the children involved.[1177]

8.5.3 Reporting obligations

The current procedure for reporting incidents at Ashley Youth Detention Centre directs staff to record the incident and report it through the Centre Support Team and to the Centre Manager for more serious incidents.[1178] The procedure instructs only the Centre Manager to 'make notifications to relevant parties', although it does not specify the parties involved.[1179] However, as discussed in Section 10.2.7, the Department's Reporting Concerns fact sheet advises staff of their mandatory obligations to report suspected child abuse or neglect to the Advice and Referral Line under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act.[1180] The fact sheet specifically includes harm that can occur 'between children and young people in any setting' as reportable to the Advice and Referral Line, and '[i]f the concerning behaviour is criminal in nature, then it must also be reported to Tasmania Police'.[1181]

To ensure incidents of harmful sexual behaviours are reported, the harmful sexual behaviours policy should include how mandatory reporting requirements are to be fulfilled. This should be aligned with the role and responsibilities of different agencies in responding to harmful sexual behaviours outlined in the statewide framework for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours, which we recommend in Chapter 21 (Recommendation 21.8). These requirements should then be reinforced through staff training and professional development. However, as neither the Advice and Referral Line nor Tasmania Police are likely to have cause to respond in all situations of harmful sexual behaviours, a facility-led, clinically directed response is also required. The detailed policy, protocols and guidance on harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities should describe this response.

Also, there should be appropriate departmental oversight of responses to harmful sexual behaviours in detention and other residential youth justice facilities. We recommend that management of the facility reports all incidents of harmful sexual behaviours to the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to access advice, support and guidance from the unit and to enable data on harmful sexual behaviours in residential youth justice facilities to be included in the Department's monitoring and oversight of harmful sexual behaviours through the new Quality and Risk Committee (refer to Recommendation 9.5 in Chapter 9).

Given the history of inadequate responses by previous departments to such incidents, independent oversight is also required. In Chapter 18, we recommend establishing a new Commission for Children and Young People, which will oversee youth detention and the youth justice system. We consider that the Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People should notify the new Commission for Children and Young People of incidents involving harmful sexual behaviours in detention and other residential youth justice facilities, and of the Department's responses. The new Commission for Children and Young People should have the power to compel the Department to provide information on its responses to such incidents.

8.5.4 Staff training and professional development

Staff in a residential youth justice facility need to understand trauma-informed care, how to identify and prevent harmful sexual behaviours, and how to respond to the needs of children and young people in that setting who have displayed or experienced inappropriate and harmful sexual behaviours.[1182]

We heard from former clinical staff that Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff lacked understanding of what constituted normal, inappropriate or harmful sexual behaviours among children and young people.[1183] We heard that staff relied on personal opinion to decide whether a behaviour was concerning, leading to an instance of harmful sexual behaviour being dismissed as 'locker room' behaviour and not serious.[1184] Consequently, children and young people at the Centre have not always received the help they needed in relation to harmful sexual behaviours, which increases the risk of future harmful sexual behaviours.[1185]

We were told that there had been no training for staff about harmful sexual behaviours until after the beginning of our Commission of Inquiry in late 2021, when the Sexual Assault Support Service provided some training sessions and consultations to Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff through its newly funded 'Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment' program.[1186] Feedback from staff at that time was that the training did not translate appropriately to a custodial environment.[1187]

We are pleased to hear that staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre have now received training in harmful sexual behaviours. However, based on the feedback reported to the Sexual Assault Support Service, we remain concerned about how this training has been received or how effective it has been. We agree with Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff that training in harmful sexual behaviours needs to be tailored to the detention population and context. To be most effective, such training should be part of a wider strategy to create a child safe culture in youth detention, including transitioning to a therapeutic, child-focused youth detention system (refer to Section 6) and implementing measures to address staff culture and resistance to change (refer to Section 4.7).

8.5.5 Policy and procedures

A former Manager, Professional Services and Policy at Ashley Youth Detention Centre advised that during her time at Ashley Youth Detention Centre (2017 to 2019), the Centre did not have any policies or procedures to guide staff responses to harmful sexual behaviours.[1188] She told us that notifications of incidents to Tasmania Police or the Advice and Referral Line were not supported and she did not believe that 'officials in [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] were clear on [their mandatory reporting] obligations'.[1189]

Secretary Pervan told us that Ashley Youth Detention Centre 'does not have a policy specifically concerning child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours' but that the 'existing practices and policies concerning incidents and reporting cover instances of harmful sexual behaviour'.[1190] The Department told us that the Practice Framework and the Learning and Development Framework are the policies underpinning the Centre's approach to harmful sexual behaviours.[1191]

These documents indicate that trauma-informed care is to be provided to children and young people in Ashley Youth Detention Centre. However, they do not address understanding and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. As noted in Section 6.3.3, the Australian Childhood Foundation is reviewing the Practice Framework and the Learning and Development Framework.[1192]

As discussed in Section 10.2.4, the purpose of the AYDC Incident Reporting Procedure is to outline the steps that staff must take 'following an incident that has arisen from the behavior/s of a young person or multiple young people'.[1193] A central focus of this procedure is determining whether any young person involved in the incident has committed a 'detention offence' under the Youth Justice Act.[1194] We do not consider the AYDC Incident Reporting Procedure to be appropriate to guide responses to prevent and respond to harmful sexual behaviours.

Harmful sexual behaviours were a well-known risk for children and young people in institutional settings before the National Royal Commission and became even more clearly recognised after that Commission published its final report in 2017. It is concerning, however, that training for Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff on harmful sexual behaviours did not begin until August or September 2021 as discussed above, well after the start of our Commission of Inquiry. Children and young people in detention deserve protection from other children and young people who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours. Moreover, children and young people in detention who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours need and deserve access to interventions to help them change.

The absence of a clear policy on harmful sexual behaviours at Ashley Youth Detention Centre reflects the Tasmanian Government's general lack of a coordinated approach and response to harmful sexual behaviours (as discussed in Chapter 21 on therapeutic services). This omission needs to be rectified as a matter of priority to protect children and young people in detention and for children and young people who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours to receive appropriate treatment and support. In detention, attention must be paid to fundamentally shifting the culture from normalising and minimising harmful sexual behaviours to assuming responsibility for preventing and responding therapeutically to harmful sexual behaviours.

This changed culture should be supported by a comprehensive policy, protocols and practice guidance on addressing harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention that complements the child-focused, therapeutic model of care for detention that we recommend in Section 6.3.4.

Policies and procedures should include processes:

- for operational staff to screen young people for harmful sexual behaviours during their induction to the facility, identifying those young people who need further assessment and referring them for clinical assessment
- for clinical staff to assess young people identified during screening for their risks and needs in relation to harmful sexual behaviours, and develop a management plan that includes safety planning and therapeutic responses
- by which placement decisions and supervision requirements are informed by clinical assessment and safety planning in relation to harmful sexual behaviours.

Policies will need to balance the safety of young people in detention with the risks of imposing restrictive practices on the young person who has displayed harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Section 9 of this chapter for more information about restrictive practices).

Recommendation 12.30

1. The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28) should develop detailed youth justice-specific policies, protocols and practice guidelines to support best practice responses to harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities.
2. All incidents of harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention or other residential youth justice facilities should be reported to:
    a. the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to enable data on harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities to be included in the Department for Education, Children and Young People's monitoring and oversight of harmful sexual behaviours through the new Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5)
    b. the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6).
3. The Department should explore the potential to implement Power to Kids (or another program or approach with comparable components) in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities as a supplementary strategy to address the heightened risk of harmful sexual behaviours in those settings and take a proactive approach to prevention.

4. The Tasmanian Government should ensure measures are in place to facilitate timely access to specialist therapeutic interventions for children in youth detention displaying or harmed by harmful sexual behaviours. Where treatment is likely to extend beyond their custodial sentence this should be provided by a clinician external to the detention centre who can continue the treatment after the child is released from detention.

9 Searches, isolation and use of force in youth detention

As highlighted throughout this volume, the National Royal Commission referred to the ways in which closed institutions such as youth detention facilities can become 'alternative moral universes', whereby norms and rules are established and maintained wholly within the institution.[1195] Where the institution fosters a culture of tolerance for humiliating and degrading children and young people, routinely using force or violence, or otherwise normalises aggression, acts of sexual abuse against children and young people are more common.[1196] Research also reveals that in institutions where the routine use of force or violence against children and young people is permitted, staff can become desensitised, making it easier for them to minimise or tolerate ongoing harm, including sexual harm, to children and young people.[1197]

As described in Chapter 11, Case studies 1, 3 and 4, it was apparent that the inappropriate and, possibly unlawful, use of searches, isolation and force at Ashley Youth Detention Centre occurred as part of a broader culture that enabled abuse, including sexual abuse, of children and young people in detention. We heard from victim-survivors that searches, isolation, use of force and child sexual abuse rarely occurred discretely; rather, two or more of these practices were often part of the same interaction with a child or young person. As identified in victim-survivor accounts outlined in the case studies:

- Strip searches described to us were, at times, a form of sexual abuse.
- Strip searches were often conducted prior to a child or young person being isolated and during their isolation.
- Force and restraints were used on children or young people when conducting strip searches and to isolate them.
- Force and restraints were used to disable a child or young person, so they could be sexually abused.
- Isolation and violence were threatened if a child or young person refused to comply with staff directions, including directions to submit to sexual abuse.

- Isolation and violence were threatened or used as punishment of a child or young person if they reported sexual or physical abuse.

These case studies suggest that the powers to search, isolate or use force against a child or young person in detention—which may be legitimately exercised in narrow and clearly defined circumstances—can be abused if the culture in detention enables it, staff do not have the necessary skills to avoid restrictive practices, oversight is impeded or lacking, children and young people feel unable to complain about mistreatment, and authorising laws and procedures do not include adequate safeguards.

Recommendations in other sections of this chapter are designed to achieve cultural change in youth detention (Section 4), ensure staff have the necessary skills to engage with children and young people constructively (Sections 4 and 6), improve complaints mechanisms and the Department's responses to incidents affecting children's safety in detention (Section 10) and strengthen external oversight of practices in detention (Section 11). In particular, we recommend changes to:

- ensure youth workers are appropriately qualified, trained and supported to deliver a therapeutic model of care to children and young people in detention, with enough staff to keep children and young people safe (Recommendation 12.9)
- ensure staff in youth detention facilities have the skills needed to undertake trauma-informed interventions with children and young people, including the skills to anticipate, de-escalate and respond effectively to challenging behaviours without resorting to force or other restrictive practices (Recommendation 12.18)
- establish an independent community visitor scheme for children and young people in detention (Recommendations 9.34 and 12.36)
- strengthen leadership in the youth detention system (Recommendation 12.6).

In addition, in Section 4.6.3, we recommend that the Department develops an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in detention that includes mechanisms to ensure children and young people in detention are aware of their rights (Recommendation 12.8). This should include awareness of their rights in relation to searches, isolation and use of force.

The regulatory framework for searches, isolation and use of force comprises the Youth Justice Act, the Inspection Standards for Youth Custodial Centres in Tasmania ('Inspection Standards') and custodial policies and procedures issued by the Department. In this section, we examine this framework, together with practices in relation to searches, isolation and the use of force in youth detention. We recommend measures to:

- clarify and strengthen relevant legislative provisions and custodial procedures
- improve reporting and oversight of searches, isolation and use of force

- ensure staff who use these practices and those who monitor and oversee their use have a strong understanding of relevant legislative, procedural and practice requirements.

As noted in the introduction to Volume 5, the Order establishing our Commission of Inquiry directed us to inquire into responses to allegations of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. However, we note that children and young people are also detained in adult custodial facilities that have been declared to be youth detention centres, including Hobart Reception Prison, Launceston Reception Prison and Risdon Prison.[1198] Children and young people can also be transferred from Ashley Youth Detention Centre to an adult prison facility or otherwise detained in an adult prison facility in certain circumstances (this is discussed in Section 6.9). We also note that the provisions of the Youth Justice Act in relation to searches of children and young people apply to prisons, reception prison watch-houses and police watch-houses, as well as detention centres.[1199]

Children and young people detained in custodial facilities other than Ashley Youth Detention Centre are subject to procedures and practices relating to searches, isolation and the use of force that may carry the same risk of abuse as in the Centre.[1200] While we have not inquired into the treatment of children and young people in adult custodial facilities, many of the issues raised in this section will also have implications for children and young people in those settings. We encourage the Government to consider our recommendations broadly and approach implementation consistently in relation to children and young people in all custodial settings in Tasmania.

We consider searches, isolation and use of force in turn.

9.1 Searches of children and young people

This section considers searches of children and young people in detention. It does not consider other searches carried out in detention, such as searches of children and young people's rooms.

As noted in Chapter 10, we sometimes use the term 'strip search' in this volume because this is the phrase victim-survivors commonly use when referring to a search involving any removal of clothing, whether partial or full. However, we note that in the Youth Justice Act and custodial standards and procedures, this practice is commonly referred to as an 'unclothed search', with a distinction drawn between partially clothed and fully unclothed searches. In this section, we refer to 'strip searches', 'fully unclothed searches' and 'partially clothed searches', depending on the context. We also refer more broadly to 'personal searches' in our discussion of current custodial procedures.

9.1.1 What we heard about strip searches in detention

As outlined in Chapter 11, Case study 1, victim-survivors told us about their experiences of strip searches at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. These experiences included:

- being routinely strip searched on admission to the Centre
- being strip searched while in isolation or while restrained
- being threatened with strip searches to ensure compliance with staff commands
- female detainees being strip searched by male staff
- staff inserting their fingers into the anus of young people during a strip search
- strip searches contributing to long-term adverse effects on a young person's mental health and wellbeing.

As noted in Chapter 11, Case study 1, many of these practices amount to child sexual abuse.

We received evidence from the Commissioner for Children and Young People, Leanne McLean, that, in the six-month period from 1 June 2018 to 30 November 2018, there were 203 strip searches conducted on children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1201] Despite this alarmingly high number of strip searches, no contraband was recovered from any of the searches.[1202]

The Custodial Inspector completed an inspection of youth custodial services in Tasmania in 2018.[1203] The Custodial Inspector's report recommended that the (former) Department of Communities:

- consider installing metal detectors and x-ray machines at the Admissions Unit to prevent contraband entering Ashley Youth Detention Centre and to minimise the need for personal searches
- carry out unclothed searches of children and young people on the basis of a rigorous risk assessment rather than on a routine basis.[1204]

9.1.2 Youth Justice Act

As outlined in Chapter 10, the Youth Justice Act contains provisions relevant to searches of children and young people in detention.

Before December 2022, the Youth Justice Act allowed a detention centre manager to submit a child or young person to a search for prohibited items as soon as possible after admission or return after a temporary leave of absence from the detention facility, and at any other time when there were reasonable grounds to believe that the child or young person may have had contraband in their possession, or in the manager's opinion, it was necessary to conduct the search in the interests of security.[1205] As a result of December 2022 amendments to the Youth Justice Act, references to searches being conducted on admission or after temporary leave have been removed.[1206]

Under the new provisions, a 'search officer' (a person authorised to conduct a search) must not conduct a search of a child or young person unless the search officer believes on reasonable grounds that the search is 'necessary for a relevant search purpose' and the type and manner of search are proportionate to the circumstances.[1207]

The Youth Justice Act defines a 'relevant search purpose' as follows:

- to ensure the safety of the child or young person or another person
- to obtain evidence relating to the commission of an offence or to prevent the loss or destruction of evidence relating to an offence
- to ascertain whether the child or young person has possession of a concealed weapon, or another article capable of being used as a weapon, to inflict injury or to aid in escape from custody
- to ascertain whether the child or young person has possession of drugs or prohibited items, or
- for a clothed search, to remove into safe keeping any articles in the possession of the child or young person.[1208]

The Youth Justice Act now includes the following 'hierarchy' of searches, from the least to the most intrusive:

- a search (which may be a search by way of a scanning device) that involves no touching of a child or young person or of clothing they are wearing
- a search that includes 'minimal touching' of the child or young person or their clothing
- a search that includes removing some clothing
- a search that includes more than minimal touching of the child or young person or their clothing
- an 'unclothed search', which is defined as a search that requires the child or young person's torso or genitals to be exposed to view, or their torso or genitals, clothed only in underwear, to be exposed to view.[1209]

A 'body cavity search' is not permitted.[1210]

The Youth Justice Act provides that a search officer must not conduct an unclothed search of a child or young person unless the 'relevant authorising officer' (the Secretary or the detention centre manager) has authorised the search.[1211] A relevant authorising officer must not authorise an unclothed search unless they believe on reasonable grounds that:

- the search is necessary for a relevant search purpose
- the type of search, and the manner of search, are proportionate to the circumstances
- despite being the most intrusive type of search, an unclothed search is necessary and reasonable to achieve a relevant search purpose
- the search is to be conducted in the least intrusive manner that is necessary and reasonable to achieve a relevant search purpose.[1212]

The Youth Justice Act also includes principles for carrying out searches. Among other matters, the search officer must ensure:

- the search is conducted in a manner that is consistent with retaining the child or young person's dignity and self-respect, and that minimises any trauma, distress or harm
- the search is the least intrusive type of search and is conducted in the least intrusive manner necessary and reasonable to achieve a relevant search purpose for which the search is conducted
- the search is completed as quickly as is reasonably possible
- the search is conducted in circumstances that allow reasonable privacy for the child or young person
- they do not remove, or require the child or young person to remove, more clothing than is necessary and reasonable.[1213]

The Youth Justice Act now also requires that a search involving touching or the removal of any clothing be conducted by a search officer of the same gender as the young person, or if the youth is transsexual, transgender or intersex, a person of the gender requested.[1214] For unclothed searches conducted in the presence of another person (an observer), the same gender requirements apply to that observer.[1215] The only exception to these requirements is where it is 'not reasonable or practicable' for them to apply 'because of the urgency with which the search is required in order to address the risk of harm or trauma to the youth or another person'.[1216]

The Youth Justice Act permits a search officer to use force to conduct the search, but only where this is 'the only means, in the circumstances, by which the search can reasonably be conducted'.[1217] The officer must ensure that, if force is used, it is the least amount of force that is reasonable and necessary to enable the search to be conducted.[1218]

Under the 2022 amendments to the Youth Justice Act, a record of each search must be kept in a search register established and maintained by the Secretary, with details including the degree of the intrusiveness of the search and any force used to conduct the search.[1219] The register must be made available for inspection by the Ombudsman, the Custodial Inspector and any approved or prescribed person or body (of which there are none currently).[1220]

9.1.3 Inspection standards on searches

Following the 2022 amendments, the Youth Justice Act now more closely reflects the Inspection Standards on searches. According to these standards:

- Searches of a young person must be conducted safely and 'only when reasonable and necessary', and they must be proportionate to the situation.[1221]
- Pat searches and searches using metal detectors should be undertaken first. Unclothed searches should be a last resort, and cavity searches should never be conducted.[1222]
- Unclothed searches should not be routinely conducted on entry and exit to a detention facility where a young person has been in a secure vehicle while off the premises.[1223]
- Staff should be appropriately trained to conduct unclothed searches.[1224]
- The staff member conducting the unclothed search should be the same sex as the young person unless the young person identifies as transgender, in which case the young person should nominate the gender of the person they want to conduct the search.[1225]

9.1.4 Custodial procedures on searches

The Department's Personal Searches of Young People Detained at AYDC Procedure ('Search Procedure'), effective from February 2023, sets out requirements for 'personal searches' of children and young people in detention.[1226] This procedure replaced an earlier procedure on searches dated September 2019, which in turn replaced a procedure introduced in 2012.[1227] We acknowledge that there have been several significant changes to search procedures since 2012, many of which occurred in 2019—these included introducing the requirement for 'reasonable grounds' for a search, prohibiting fully unclothed searches and requiring modesty gowns for children and young people if they are asked to remove clothing.[1228] Nevertheless, here we focus on the current procedure.

One of the purposes of the Search Procedure is to ensure that, 'when required, searches of young people are conducted in a safe and least intrusive manner, while maintaining the privacy, dignity and rights of the young person'.[1229] The Search Procedure recognises that '[a] search is an infringement on a person's right to privacy' and that a search that does not comply with legal and procedural requirements 'has the potential to be considered trespass and/or assault'.[1230]

The Search Procedure defines a 'personal search' as:

- a metal detector search, which involves a child or young person walking through a large metal detector while fully clothed and does not require them to be touched[1231]
- a wand search, which involves using an approved hand-held metal detector on a fully clothed child or young person and does not require them to be touched[1232]
- a pat search, which involves 'the careful patting down of a young person's clothed body after the removal of outer garments (such as a coat or jacket) and shoes and socks' to feel for any hidden items[1233]
- a partially clothed search, which involves 'visual examination of the upper body after removal and searching of upper garments, followed by visual examination of the lower body after return of the upper garments and the removal of lower garments'.[1234]

The Search Procedure:

- prohibits '[f]ully [u]nclothed' searches, defined as asking a child or young person to remove all their clothing at the same time[1235]
- prohibits cavity searches, defined as 'a visual, manual or instrument inspection of a young person's body cavities including mouth, ears, vaginal, or anal orifices'[1236]
- prohibits any personal search being undertaken 'automatically', instead requiring all personal searches to be based on 'reasonable grounds'[1237]
- specifies that the type of search undertaken 'must be the least intrusive in accordance with the risk posed'[1238]
- states that partially clothed searches 'must only be undertaken as a last resort, in circumstances where all reasonable grounds indicate that the young person is carrying a prohibited and/or unauthorised item' and can only occur with approval from the Director, Custodial Youth Justice[1239]
- enables force to be used to undertake a search, but only as a last resort, where 'all other strategies, such as negotiation, have failed', and subject to 'prior approval of the Director with sufficient intelligence to support the request'.[1240]

The Search Procedure requires operational staff to take the following steps:

- Assess whether reasonable grounds exist for a personal search—in undertaking this assessment, staff must consider 'the history, behaviour and situational factors associated with the young person', including their age and gender, their behaviour or demeanour on admission and whether they have a history of drug or alcohol use.[1241]
- '[C]onsider the level of risk' associated with the search—this is 'a matter of professional judgement made on a case-by-case basis' and involves using a 'hierarchy of risk assessment tool' (we were not provided with this tool).[1242]
- Determine the most appropriate type of search to be conducted based on the risk—as noted, this must be 'the least intrusive that is necessary and reasonable in the circumstances'.[1243]
- Seek approval for the search from the 'relevant Delegate'—for partially clothed searches, this is the Director, Custodial Youth Justice, and for other personal searches this is the 'Youth Worker, Operations Coordinator'.[1244]
- Inform the young person of the intent to conduct a search and the reasons for the search, explain how the search will be undertaken and offer an opportunity for the young person to ask questions.[1245]
- Carry out the search 'in a location and manner that maintains the young person's dignity' and meets specified requirements—for example, two staff must be present for all searches.[1246]
- Record information about the search, including the grounds for the search, the type of search based on the risk assessment, and approval for the search in 'the Search Register located in each unit folder on O: Drive', which is presumably a shared drive.[1247]

The requirements in the Search Procedure about the gender of the staff members carrying out or observing a search do not entirely reflect the requirements in the Youth Justice Act. For example, for partially clothed searches, the Search Procedure provides that:

> Every effort should be made to ensure that two staff of the same gender [as the young person] are available. In exceptional circumstances, the Observer may be of the opposite sex if two same-sex officers are not available.[1248]

The Search Procedure does not define 'exceptional circumstances'.

In contrast, as noted in Section 9.1.2, the Youth Justice Act requires an observer to be of the same gender as the young person (or of the gender requested if the young person is transsexual, transgender or intersex), subject only to a limited exception based on the urgency of the need for the search 'in order to address the risk of harm or trauma' to the young person or another person.

According to the Department's Keeping Kids Safe Plan, Ashley Youth Detention Centre provides the search register to the Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Custodial Inspector on a monthly basis.[1249]

The Keeping Kids Safe Plan also states that, once updated, the Search Procedure would be implemented with staff.[1250]

9.1.5 Understanding and implementation of search procedures in detention

We asked managers and staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre about their understanding of procedures and practices in relation to searches of children and young people at the Centre, noting that the procedures have changed over time.

Former Centre Manager Patrick Ryan told us that when he first started working at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in 2017, the policy on strip searches was 'prescriptive' and required children and young people to be strip searched 'when they're coming in from Police custody, they'd had a visitor, when they'd been off site'.[1251] Mr Ryan commented that 'the policy was too rigid'; that is, staff 'were strip searching residents too often'.[1252]

We asked the Assistant Manager at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, Fiona Atkins, about the changes introduced in 2019 for strip searches at Ashley Youth Detention Centre (outlined in Section 9.1.4). She responded:

> One major change was in relation to requiring reasonable cause to perform a search of young people instead of automatically searching young people. For example, in respect of a new admission, you would have to provide a reason for the search such as a history of contraband. The other major change was the introduction of the vanity gown for searches and ensuring that young people were asked if they wanted to use it if a search was required.[1253]

Consistent with this, Centre Manager Stuart Watson, who started in the role in 2020, told us that 'searching is something that is evidence-based or information-based, or there's got to be a reason. Searching is not mandatory, it's something that is not routine'.[1254]

When queried about the safeguards in place at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to protect young people from being subjected to searches that were not authorised, Mr Watson told us that if a child or young person at the Centre was subjected to an unauthorised search, '[t]hey can pick up the phone pretty much at any time and ring the Commissioner [for Children and Young People] directly'.[1255] He explained that a young person can also complain to the staff members conducting the search, the Operations Coordinator or other members of Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff.[1256] Mr Watson told us that '[e]nsuring that a young person has multiple avenues for complaining about an inappropriate or unauthorised search is an important part of a system of checks and balances on searches'.[1257]

Mr Watson also said that 'if staff see something that's not appropriate, they can complain'.[1258]

We also received evidence from current and former Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff about their understanding of strip searches. A staff member told us that although reference to modesty gowns was included in the procedure introduced in 2019, the gowns were not available to children and young people until 2021.[1259]

A Department of Communities issues briefing to the then Minister for Children and Youth, unsigned but noted as 'cleared' by Secretary Pervan in December 2021, referred to the following allegation raised by the then Leader of the Tasmanian Greens Party, Cassy O'Connor, in December 2020 regarding strip searches at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

> A PIN [Provisional Improvement Notice] should go to WorkSafe, when breaches occur. Policy is when children are searched, modesty gown must be used (re Children's Commissioner recommendation). Workers lodged a PIN because there are no gowns (in last 12 months).[1260]

The briefing stated that, in January 2020, an Ashley Youth Detention Centre Health and Safety Representative had lodged a Provisional Improvement Notice about concerns that the security of the Centre and the safety of staff were 'potentially at great risk as a new search procedure [had] allegedly [been] implemented without adequate consultation or training'.[1261] According to the briefing, the Health and Safety Representative withdrew the notice following a meeting with Mr Watson 'where additional strategies were agreed to address any training concerns'.[1262]

In his statement to our Commission of Inquiry, Mr Watson told us that modesty gowns were not being used when he started working at the Centre in January 2020 but that he later ensured staff were trained and the gowns were used.[1263] In May 2022, a staff member told us she had 'only recently' been informed by the 'legal team in Hobart' that her interpretation of the procedure introduced in 2019 was not correct and that a modesty gown was to be given to a young person to put on, so they could undress and dress again under it. This staff member stated that '[u]ntil then scrutiny from the legal department had been amiss'.[1264]

In October 2022, Secretary Pervan confirmed that routine strip searching of children and young people in detention had ceased and referred to funding for new technology to conduct searches:

> Searches are sometimes required for safety and security reasons to prevent harmful items such as drugs and weapons from entering custodial facilities. The practice of routine strip searches of youth has already ceased in all custodial facilities in Tasmania. Changes to the Youth Justice Amendment (Searches in Custody) Bill 2022 formalises reform on searches of children. The Government is also investing in alternative security strategies such as body scanners that will minimise the reliance on more invasive search types. $1.3 million was allocated in the 2022–23 State Budget to implement this technology in Tasmanian correctional facilities, including Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1265]

9.1.6 Improving search practices in detention

We welcome the 2022 amendments to the Youth Justice Act and the recent changes to the custodial procedure on searches of children and young people in detention. We note that the Search Procedure includes some safeguards that are not contained in the Youth Justice Act—in particular, the requirement for authorisation for a partially clothed search to be sought from the Director, Custodial Youth Justice, rather than from the Centre Manager. While we consider that the higher level of approval is appropriate at this time, it may be that as the culture of Ashley Youth Detention Centre changes, it would be appropriate for authorisation for partially clothed searches to be provided by the Centre Manager. In Section 4.4.2, we recommend that the Centre Manager role be reclassified to at least a Senior Executive Service Level 1 (Director level) in the Tasmanian State Service (Recommendation 12.6). For these reasons, we do not recommend that the Youth Justice Act be amended to require the higher level of approval required by the Search Procedure.

The Search Procedure also includes a prohibition on fully unclothed searches, which we recommend be included in the Youth Justice Act.

We consider that the Search Procedure should be strengthened by: defining fully unclothed searches as a form of child sexual abuse; explicitly outlining a hierarchy of search options; aligning gender requirements for staff who conduct or observe searches with requirements in the Youth Justice Act; and specifying reporting requirements for searches (discussed below). The Search Procedure should also be made publicly accessible on the Department's website.

We welcome the Government's investment in body scanner technology to facilitate less intrusive searches of children and young people in detention. In implementing this technology at Ashley Youth Detention Centre or any future detention facility, the Government should ensure its use is balanced against respect for children and young people's privacy and dignity.

We also welcome the use of a 'hierarchy of risk assessment tool' to help operational staff assess the level of risk associated with a proposed search and to determine the least intrusive type of search necessary and reasonable in the circumstances. Staff must be properly trained in how to use this tool and it should be included in the Department's Practice Manual.

We are concerned about the lack of understanding of search procedures among staff, particularly in view of significant changes to procedures in and since 2019. It was not clear to us that staff had been properly trained on earlier updates to the procedure to ensure consistent understanding and practice for searches. We also note that, despite references to providing modesty gowns in the 2019 updates to the procedure, in practice, these were not provided until concerns were raised. In Section 9.4, we recommend joint training on searches for Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff, staff at any new detention facility and relevant staff of the Youth Justice Services directorate of the Department for Education, Children and Young People, to ensure a shared understanding across detention facilities and the broader Department of laws, policies and procedures.

We consider that care should be taken not to place the onus on young people to complain after an unlawful or inappropriate search (although this option should always be available to them—refer to Section 10); rather, the onus must be on the Department and facility management to ensure searches are carried out lawfully and in line with custodial procedures, and to take prompt action if they are not.

Departmental and independent oversight of searches of children and young people in detention is essential. In Section 4.5.1, we discuss the previous lack of transparency in Ashley Youth Detention Centre's operations, which limited the Department's ability to monitor the safety of children and young people in detention.

We recommend that Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) provides a monthly report to the Secretary on searches of children and young people in detention.

In Chapter 9, we recommend that the Department establishes a Quality and Risk Committee that is chaired by the Secretary and has monitoring functions for the out of home care system (Recommendation 9.5). We consider that this committee should also have some monitoring functions for youth detention and should receive quarterly reports on searches. These reports should include enough information to enable the Quality and Risk Committee to analyse and monitor trends in searches and identify any concerns in the treatment of children and young people. This should include the number of searches carried out, the type and purpose of each search, the grounds for each search, the risk assessment associated with each search, information on search authorisations and identification of any items recovered from the search.

We welcome the legislative requirement to maintain a search register that must be made available to oversight bodies. As noted, the Department provides the search register on a monthly basis to the Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Custodial Inspector. In Chapter 18, we recommend establishing a new Commission for Children and Young People, with monitoring and oversight functions for youth detention—we discuss these functions in Section 11.6 of this chapter. We recommend that the search register be provided to the Commission for Children and Young People, at a minimum, on a monthly basis to enable it to monitor searches of children and young people in detention.

Recommendation 12.31

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Youth Justice Act 1997 to ensure the Act expressly prohibits fully unclothed searches of children and young people in detention.
2. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:
    a. introduce body scanner technology at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and include such technology in any facility designed to replace the Centre
    b. update the Department's Personal Searches of Young People Detained at AYDC procedure to
        i. define a fully unclothed search as a form of child sexual abuse
        ii. explicitly outline the hierarchy of search options, from the least to the most intrusive
        iii. align gender requirements for staff who conduct or observe searches with requirements in the Youth Justice Act 1997
        iv. specify internal and external reporting requirements in relation to searches
    c. publish the personal searches procedure on the Department's website
    d. consider what search policies and procedures, if any, should apply in the proposed new assisted bail and supported residential facilities
    e. ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) provides
        i. monthly reports on searches of children and young people in detention to the Secretary
        ii. quarterly reports on searches of children and young people in detention to the Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to enable it to monitor trends and identify any areas of concern
        iii. the search register and all relevant supporting documentation to the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) on a monthly basis or more frequently, as agreed with the Commission for Children and Young People.

9.2 Isolation

'Isolation' of children and young people in detention is defined in different ways and can cover a range of situations involving confining, secluding, separating or segregating a child or young person from other children and young people. In a 2016 report on human rights standards in youth detention facilities in Australia, the Australian Children's Commissioners and Guardians distinguished between the following practices:

- 'Seclusion', 'isolation', 'confinement' or 'separation'—this involves the involuntary placement of a child or young person in a room from which they are not able to leave.[1266]
- 'Segregation'—this involves limiting a child or young person's contact with certain peers in the facility (for example, by changing the child or young person's education and recreation times, so they do not encounter another child or young person) but does not necessarily involve placing added restrictions on their movements.[1267]
- 'Lockdown'—this involves keeping large groups of children in their rooms for periods of time, which is frequently used as part of a detention facility's safety and security management regime.[1268]

According to the Australian Children's Commissioners and Guardians, seclusion and segregation 'should not be used in any form on children with known psychosocial issues, indicators of self-harm, mental illness or other related vulnerabilities'.[1269]

As outlined in Chapter 10, under the Youth Justice Act, isolation is defined as 'locking a detainee in a room separate from others and from the normal routine of the detention centre'.[1270] We discuss this definition in Section 9.2.4.

According to international human rights standards:

- The solitary confinement of a child in detention and any other punishment that may compromise the physical or mental health of a child are strictly prohibited.[1271] The United Nations has defined solitary confinement as confinement for 22 hours or more a day without meaningful human contact.[1272]
- Any separation of a child in detention from others must be 'for the shortest possible time and used only as a measure of last resort for the protection of the child or others'.[1273]
- Any disciplinary measures and procedures in detention should be consistent with upholding the inherent dignity of the child and 'the fundamental objective of institutional care, namely, instilling a sense of justice, self-respect and respect for the basic rights of every person'.[1274]

9.2.1 What we heard about isolation practices in detention

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, we heard a range of evidence about isolation practices at Ashley Youth Detention Centre from victim-survivors and their families. They described various experiences, including recollections of:

- different degrees or kinds of isolation, ranging from being held in a room alone to being confined to a unit with only staff
- at times, lengthy periods of isolation, including for a number of weeks
- inappropriate isolation being used for a range of reasons, including as part of the induction process, as a form of punishment for bad behaviour or self-harm, against victims of assault, or as retribution for making complaints
- poor isolation conditions, often with limited or no access to therapeutic programs, education, health care or enough food or bedding
- handcuffs and physical restraint being used to place a child or young person in isolation, or while they were in isolation
- isolation that traumatised and confused children and young people, including contributing to long-term negative effects on their mental health and wellbeing.

In Chapter 11, Case study 3, we also describe evidence of several practices used at Ashley Youth Detention Centre that involved separating children and young people from others, but which were not formally labelled as isolation or treated in line with legal requirements for the use of isolation. Labels used to describe such practices included 'unit bound', 'individualised programs', 'separate routine' and the 'Blue Program'.

In that case study, we find that the use of isolation as a form of behaviour management, punishment or cruelty and contrary to the Youth Justice Act has been a regular and persistent practice at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since at least the early 2000s, and the conditions that enabled this practice still exist today. We also find that:

- Isolation practices often involved segregating children and young people from other detainees and denying them the right to take part in the usual educational programming offered through Ashley School.
- The Department, and sometimes the Tasmanian Government, have been on notice about potentially unlawful isolation practices at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since at least 2013, and have not taken sufficient action.
- The Department demonstrated, at best, naivety in repeatedly addressing poor and potentially unlawful isolation through training and policy change, and accepting lack of staff knowledge as an explanation, despite many staff, including operational leaders, having long employment histories at the Centre.

As noted in Section 4.7.2, in July 2023, Commissioner McLean informed us that, since August 2022, there had been a deterioration of conditions for children and young people in detention, and that isolation practices continued to be used at the Centre.[1275] She advised that, over the previous six months, her office had observed (among other practices):

- Individual young people being referred to as 'unit bound' by staff during conversations, on office noticeboards, and in Weekly Review Meeting … minutes;
- The extended use of unit-specific lockdowns … and the extended isolation of individual young people, with one young person likening these practices to the 'Blue Program';
- Moving or threatening to move young people to units that experience more frequent lockdowns as a means of responding to and/or managing behaviour;
- The reintroduction of 'quiet time,' which sees young people restricted to their rooms every day between 12:30pm – 1:15pm, sometimes without staff being present in the unit …[1276]

This is extremely concerning.

In response to Commissioner McLean's comments, the Government acknowledged that restrictive practices continued at Ashley Youth Detention Centre due to staff shortages (discussed in Section 9.2.2).[1277] Secretary Bullard also stated:

> The [Commissioner for Children and Young People] has expressed concern that young people at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre], particularly those in the Franklin Unit, have been locked down in response to their behaviour. I am advised that young people in the Franklin Unit have been subject to the same restrictive practices as other young people at [the Centre]. I understand that some residents may perceive that they are being treated differently if they are in their rooms while others are out of theirs. This is not the case, as restrictive practice means that young people are out of their rooms at different times of the day, depending on the number and experience of staff present in [the Centre] and the need to accommodate any association issues between young people.[1278]

We note that the Government's response did not address Commissioner McLean's observations:

- that staff were referring to individual children as 'unit bound'
- of extended isolation of individual young people
- that daily 45-minute 'quiet time' had been reinstated.

As such, the Government's response did not address all our grave concerns about the continuing use of isolation at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. As we only became aware of these concerns in July 2023, we were unable to continue to explore these specific matters.

Given the focus on isolation practices as human rights violations within our hearings—including a specific focus on 'unit bound' and the Blue Program—we find it astounding that these practices would persist or be reinstated during our Commission of Inquiry. Commissioner McLean's observations suggest a culture that has continued to be punitive and has remained impervious to change. We remain gravely concerned that human rights abuses of children have occurred at Ashley Youth Detention Centre during our Inquiry and persist at the time of writing.

9.2.2 Lockdowns related to staff shortages

As discussed in Section 4.7, we also heard evidence about lockdowns involving children and young people being kept in their rooms for extended periods and unable to take part in normal programs, such as school, as a result of not enough staff being available to safely cover the normal operations of the Centre.[1279] We heard that, to ensure the Centre's minimum staff-to-detainee ratios were maintained during staff shortages, only one child or young person per unit could be out of their room at a time, usually on an hourly rotation.[1280]

In November 2021, a young person detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre made a complaint to the Ombudsman alleging they had been unable to attend school programs due to staff shortages.[1281] The Ombudsman's investigating officer noted that it was concerning that a young person could not attend school programs for about a week due to the inability of staff to provide the necessary coverage, and the issue had not been proactively identified or addressed.[1282] We discuss restricted access to education during lockdowns in Section 6.6.2.

Commissioner McLean informed us that, between February and August 2022, her office had received 45 requests for advocacy about restrictive practices and lockdowns, making such practices the most common concern in the requests received during that time.[1283]

We also received concerning evidence from Vincenzo Caltabiano, former Director of Tasmania Legal Aid, and Hannah Phillips, a lawyer with experience working with youth in the Tasmanian justice and child safety systems, that restrictive practices at Ashley Youth Detention Centre have had the effect of limiting children and young people's access to legal representation.[1284]

Lucas Digney, Assistant State Secretary, Health and Community Services Union (Tasmania Branch), told us that the restrictive practices flowing from understaffing resulted in isolation of children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre:

> … they are being kept in their rooms for extended periods of time, and if one of our members wanted to place a young person in their room and they did it without authority, well, they would be disciplined for that because that young person is being isolated. And, I'm sure that most people would agree that that's > an intolerable situation, that we are detaining young people and we're placing them in a regime of restrictive practice simply because we can't resource the facility where we're housing them.[1285]

Mark Morrissey, former Commissioner for Children and Young People, told us that isolation and lockdowns at Ashley Youth Detention Centre could be construed as constituting torture in the context of the United Nations' Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ('OPCAT'):

> So, I understand within the OPCAT context … the use of isolation to some people's minds would actually be a form of torture … and we've heard evidence, I think, when I've been listening, of young people being locked in their cells for a week or two or longer alone, often on weekends due to staffing, short staffing, whatever reasons they were locked in their rooms as well. For a young person to be locked in a room, in my view, that does constitute a form of torture …[1286]

In December 2022, the United Nations Committee against Torture (responsible for monitoring the implementation of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment) stated that it was 'seriously concerned' about 'solitary confinement' practices at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and two other youth detention centres in Australia.[1287] The committee also stated that it considered current practices contravened the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and the associated United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (also known as the Nelson Mandela Rules).[1288]

In July 2023, the Commissioner for Children and Young People told us that 'rolling lockdowns' continued to occur at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1289]

9.2.3 The Department's views on lockdowns

In August 2022, Pamela Honan, Director, Strategic Youth Services in the Department, told us that the increased use of 'restrictive practices' was not satisfactory and that efforts had been made to communicate the context surrounding these restrictions to children and young people in detention:

> I am not happy with staff having to implement restrictive practices, however, it has been explained to detainees that this is not their fault, and it is not a punishment. Staff on site are working with youth workers to ensure young people are rotated out of their rooms and units as much as possible to engage in educational learning, recreation activities and exercise. This occurs for several hours a day on most days but requires a number of staff to work significant overtime.[1290]

Secretary Pervan was asked whether he was aware of the opinion expressed by Mr Morrissey, and with which the Ombudsman agreed, that confining children to their rooms for prolonged periods could constitute torture.[1291] Secretary Pervan responded:

> Without wanting to go to a specific case, only because I don't have the detail in front of me, as I understand—and it's a superficial understanding—the definition of 'torture' in that document goes to intent, and there was, I believe, looking at the past, a use of restrictive practice to—it would be argued by the staff involved it was used as a disciplinary measure, but yet the intent was to cause people to feel bad, it wasn't for their safety, it wasn't for any other purpose but to punish them.[1292]

Secretary Pervan distinguished between lockdowns caused by staff shortages and using isolation as torture:

> There are two profound differences between isolation or restrictive practice being used as torture and what we've seen recently. One is that cognisance that it's damaging to the wellbeing of people to have them in isolation, and that in this instance when we haven't been able to get the young people out for the time that they've been required, the staff there, up to and including Ms Honan, have explained to them what the context is, why it's happening and what we're doing to try and fix it. So they haven't just been locked in their rooms and not told anything; it's been explained to them that its only because we're short of staff and we're doing everything we can to get them out of their rooms, and as soon as we've had more staff on deck they've been back to normal programs and access to services and activities.[1293]

Confining children and young people to their rooms for prolonged periods has serious detrimental effects on their health and wellbeing, regardless of the reason or justification for the confinement. Mr Watson told us that he is:

> … very concerned when young people are restricted to their rooms due to staff shortages. I am concerned that their access to face-to-face schooling is reduced. I am concerned that their access to outside areas is reduced as well as their access to exercise, each other and their families is reduced. I am concerned that young people may have their mental health impacted.[1294]

9.2.4 The Youth Justice Act and inspection standards

As noted, isolation is defined in the Youth Justice Act as 'locking a detainee in a room separate from others and from the normal routine of the detention centre'.[1295] The Youth Justice Act does not define 'normal routine' or 'separate from others'. As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the Department distinguished some practices, such as 'unit bound', from isolation under the Youth Justice Act on the basis that these practices were part of the normal routine of the Centre. We do not agree with this interpretation of the legislation.

Also as discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the Department suggested that practices involving locking a young person in a unit with a youth worker did not constitute isolation under the Youth Justice Act on the basis that this is not separation 'from others'.[1296] We consider that the relevant question should be whether a child or young person has been separated from other children and young people, rather than from staff.[1297]

As outlined in Chapter 10, section 133 of the Youth Justice Act gives the detention centre manager the power to authorise the isolation of a child or young person:

- if their behaviour presents an immediate threat to their own safety or the safety of any other person or to property, and all other reasonable steps have been taken to prevent the child or young person from harming themselves, any other person or damaging property, but have been unsuccessful, or[1298]
- 'in the interests of the security of the centre' (this would appear to be the power generally relied on to authorise lockdowns of Ashley Youth Detention Centre).[1299]

The Youth Justice Act also provides that:

- If necessary, reasonable force may be used to place a child or young person in isolation.[1300]
- A child or young person in isolation must be 'closely supervised and observed' at intervals of no longer than 15 minutes.[1301]
- The detention centre manager must ensure the particulars of every use of isolation are recorded in an isolation register.[1302]
- Using isolation as a punishment is prohibited, 'except as provided' in section 133 of the Act.[1303]

The Inspection Standards refer to 'separation, segregation or isolation' but state that 'isolation' is 'the term generally used by Ashley Youth Detention Centre and Children and Youth Services for instances of separation and segregation of young people'.[1304]

According to Standard 8.9:

- A young person should only be separated or segregated in response to an 'unacceptable risk to themselves or others and only when all other means of control have been exhausted' (although this standard contemplates that separation, segregation or isolation may also be necessary 'for the good order of the detention centre').[1305]
- Separation, segregation and isolation should never be used as a sanction or to obtain compliance with staff instructions.[1306]
- Separation, segregation or isolation should be for the minimum time necessary.[1307]
- Staff should closely supervise a child or young person in separation or segregation, who should not be left for long periods with nothing to occupy them.[1308]
- The conditions of separation or segregation should 'provide no less amenity than normal accommodation', except where a child or young person is separated due to a serious risk of suicide or self-harm.[1309]

- A register recording details of the separation and the young person's routine while in separation should be maintained.[1310]

9.2.5 Custodial isolation procedures

The key policy and procedure document currently in place to guide the isolation of children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre is the Use of Isolation Procedure dated 1 July 2017 ('Isolation Procedure').[1311] The Isolation Procedure defines 'isolation' in the same way as the Youth Justice Act, but specifies considerably more detailed requirements for using isolation than the Youth Justice Act and the Inspection Standards.[1312] As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre do not appear to have applied the Isolation Procedure to some practices that involved the isolation of children and young people, such as 'unit bound'.

According to the Isolation Procedure:

> Isolation is a prohibited action, except for in very specific circumstances. All other reasonable steps must be taken before its use is considered. Where it is authorised it must be kept to the minimum time necessary to ensure the safety of individuals or property. The goal is to help the young person reintegrate into the group as safely and as quickly as possible.[1313]

The Isolation Procedure:

- requires youth workers to 'make every effort' to help a young person whose behaviour is escalating to regain control of their behaviour before resorting to isolation[1314]
- includes a (non-exhaustive) list of actions youth workers can take in response to a young person's escalating behaviour—these include identifying and removing the trigger for the behaviour, redirecting the young person's attention, offering a task such as exercising or listening to music, and asking another youth worker to take over supervision of the situation[1315]
- states that authorisation of isolation under the Youth Justice Act 'in the interests of the security of the centre' might include isolation 'to prevent or control a security breach' such as a riot, power failure, breach of the perimeter, or an escape, or 'to allow order or control to be restored to the Centre (or to prevent its anticipated loss)'[1316]
- requires isolation to be authorised by the Centre Manager or their delegate (discussed below) in person, by phone or in writing[1317]
- states that, to authorise isolation, the Centre Manager (or their delegate) must be satisfied that 'isolation is a reasonable intervention under the circumstances and is in accordance with the legislation and this procedure'[1318]
- prohibits the commencement of isolation until authorisation is obtained.[1319]

Before or as soon as possible after isolation has been authorised, the Centre Manager (or their delegate) must undertake an assessment to determine the conditions for the care and treatment of the young person while in isolation, in consultation with health services staff and members of Ashley Youth Detention Centre's Multi-Disciplinary Team (discussed in Section 6.4.1) who are on site at the time.[1320] The assessment must consider matters such as the needs of the young person, any trauma history, their response to previous isolations, the risk of suicide or self-harm and their relationships with particular staff and other children and young people.[1321]

The Centre Manager (or their delegate) sets the conditions of isolation, which must be recorded on the authorisation form, in relation to:

- the period of isolation—this must be the shortest period that is appropriate in the circumstances and can involve an initial period of 30 minutes, an extension of the initial period to three hours and further extensions subject to an approval process (outlined below), but the total time in isolation cannot exceed 12 hours[1322]
- supervision and observation requirements—an observation must occur at least every 15 minutes and more often where there are concerns for the young person's wellbeing, and observations must be recorded and signed by the observer[1323]
- medical reviews—a young person in isolation must be checked by the Correctional Primary Health Services nurse every three hours and by a medical practitioner after seven hours (or earlier on the advice of the nurse)[1324]
- 'other conditions'—this may include specifying safe and therapeutic items to be left with the young person (such as playing cards or drawing materials) or access to a support person, cultural advisor or youth worker[1325]
- arrangements following the young person's release from isolation—for example, whether they should be referred to 'an appropriate health service'.[1326]

To extend isolation beyond a three-hour period, the Centre Manager (or their delegate) must:

- review the observation records prepared during the period of isolation
- consult with the Correctional Primary Health Services nurse or medical practitioner and available members of the Multi-Disciplinary Team
- consult with the Director, Strategic Youth Services on the outcome of these consultations
- complete the 'Authorisation for Extension of Isolation' form, noting any new conditions of the isolation or change to conditions.[1327]

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, in December 2021, the instrument dealing with delegation of authorities and powers at Ashley Youth Detention Centre was revised. The 2021 delegation instrument provides as follows:

- The Assistant Manager of the Centre may exercise the power to isolate a young person under the Youth Justice Act.[1328]
- The Director, Strategic Youth Services or the Operations Manager may exercise the power to isolate a young person under the Youth Justice Act if the Centre Manager and the Assistant Manager are 'on leave, uncontactable, or unable for any other reason to perform the relevant function'.[1329]
- An Operations Coordinator may authorise isolation for a period of 30 minutes.[1330]
- A youth worker may exercise the power to isolate a young person under the Youth Justice Act, only for an initial period of 30 minutes and only if the youth worker is performing the duties of the Operations Coordinator.[1331]

The Centre Manager (or their delegate) must ensure 'the particulars of every use of isolation' are recorded in the isolation register.[1332] Since 2017, the isolation register has been recorded electronically.[1333] Each month, a report that includes the isolation register 'and associated documents' is sent to the Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Custodial Inspector.[1334] Commissioner McLean told us that:

> … the quality and reliability of the [Ashley Youth Detention Centre isolation] data is questionable and there can be inconsistencies between the reports we receive from children and young people about the use of such practices, and the data.[1335]

In response to this comment, the Department told us that it was continuing 'to look at the collection and reporting of data sets that relate to youth justice, with a view to improving both the integrity and timeliness of that data being reported'.[1336]

The Isolation Procedure requires the Centre Support Team (now known as 'Weekly Review Meetings'—refer to the discussion in Section 6.4.1) to conduct monthly reviews of the use of isolation. These reviews must focus on any patterns of use, any strategies that have been useful in reducing isolation use or reducing the length of time someone is in isolation, and how that information can be used to inform staff training, supervision and program scheduling.[1337] The Centre Support Team must forward this information to the Centre Manager (if they were not at the meeting) and the Director, Strategic Youth Services.[1338]

Secretary Pervan told us that isolations data is analysed monthly for the Director and that 'if a pattern is identified' for a particular young person or staff member, 'the Director will ask the Manager, Custodial Youth Justice for more information to determine whether there is an issue with the young person or staff member'.[1339] Secretary Pervan also told us that the Commissioner for Children and Young People is provided with copies of minutes from Weekly Review Meetings and with monthly isolation summaries.[1340]

The Isolation Procedure states that the Quality Improvement and Workforce Development Team randomly selects incidents that involved isolation to assess whether isolation was appropriately authorised, observations were carried out appropriately, the period of isolation was appropriate, and if isolation use was accurately recorded in the isolation register.[1341] This team no longer exists, so this safeguard is now missing.

Secretary Pervan also told us that, following an isolation, an evaluation of the isolation episode is conducted at the next meeting of the Multi-Disciplinary Team.[1342]

9.2.6 Our recommendations on isolation and lockdowns

Definition of isolation and amendments to the Youth Justice Act

We consider that any practice involving a child or young person in detention being confined to their room or unit and prevented from having contact with other children and young people (outside the normal overnight routine) constitutes isolation and should be managed in accordance with the law, standards and procedural requirements for isolation, regardless of the label used to refer to the practice. In particular, a practice should be considered isolation even if a child or young person is confined to a unit with a member of staff. This should be made clear in the Youth Justice Act. This change should ensure all isolation practices (broadly defined) are authorised and recorded according to the appropriate procedure.

Isolation must not be used as punishment for perceived poor behaviour. As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, many instances of isolation of children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre were connected to the Behaviour Development System (later renamed the Behaviour Development Program) and were, ultimately, used as a form of punishment for perceived inappropriate or poor behaviour. In Section 6.3.4, we recommend that the Behaviour Development Program be discontinued.

The list of 'prohibited actions' in the Youth Justice Act refers to 'the use of isolation, within the meaning of section 133, as a punishment except as provided in that section'.[1343] In our view, as currently worded, this provision can be read as allowing isolation as a punishment where it is carried out in line with section 133. This can be contrasted with the equivalent Victorian provision in the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic), which simply lists as a prohibited action 'the use of isolation (within the meaning of section 488) as a punishment'.[1344] We recommend that the Youth Justice Act be amended to state more clearly that isolation must not be used to punish a child or young person.

We note that, in New South Wales, the Children (Detention Centre) Act 1987 (NSW) makes it a criminal offence for a person to punish a detainee or cause a detainee to be punished by 'segregating' them in contravention of section 19 of that Act.[1345] We recommend that the use of isolation as a punishment be made a criminal offence in Tasmania.

We also recommend that the Youth Justice Act explicitly refers to the principle that isolation should only be used as a measure of last resort and for the minimum time necessary.

Changes to the Isolation Procedure

We recommend that the Department clarifies delegations for the purposes of authorising isolation and extensions of isolation, and that these delegations be specified in the Isolation Procedure. In particular, the circumstances in which the Centre Manager or Assistant Manager are 'uncontactable, or unable for any other reason to perform the relevant function' should be clarified, so all staff and managers of detention facilities and others in the Department have a clear understanding of authorisation processes for isolation. As described in Chapter 11, Case study 3, the need to clarify this was highlighted by the independent investigation of an incident that occurred at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in December 2019 involving the isolation of children and young people at the Centre.

We also recommend that the Department alters the Isolation Procedure to require authorisation to extend a period of isolation beyond three hours to be provided by a senior departmental official, rather than by the Centre Manager. We consider such oversight to be necessary given the serious and detrimental effects of extended isolation on children and young people's mental health and wellbeing.

We also recommend that the Department publishes the Isolation Procedure on its website.

Staff understanding and implementation of isolation procedures

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, we are concerned about inconsistencies in Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff and managers' understanding of isolation procedures, particularly in relation to which circumstances amounted to isolation and the authorisation processes when the practice was identified as isolation.

It is vital that departmental and detention centre managers and staff understand what practices amount to isolation and the procedures for authorising and implementing lawful and appropriate isolation of children and young people.

It is also important to ensure isolation is not being used as a primary or default response to children and young people who display difficult, challenging or complex behaviour, or as a punishment for negative behaviour. The Draft Youth Justice Blueprint refers to the fact that the best-performing youth justice systems achieve safety and security 'primarily through relationships' rather than isolation.[1346] This requires, at a minimum, comprehensive, ongoing training and professional development for operational staff in de-escalation techniques and the appropriate use of isolation. Our recommendation for training on the use of isolation is discussed in Section 9.4.

However, we also consider that cultural change may be required to ensure staff comply with isolation laws and procedures in detention. As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, we hold concerns that a punitive culture may have been supported and applied by some staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, who may have taken opportunities, whenever they arose, to nullify reforms to isolation procedures and return to more punitive isolation practices.

In Section 4.2, we discuss resistance to change among some staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. To address this issue and achieve meaningful cultural change in youth detention, in Section 4, we recommend significant reforms in the areas of staffing, leadership, governance and children's participation.

Changes to reporting and oversight

We consider that there needs to be greater Department oversight of isolation in detention. As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 3, it is not clear that the Centre Manager routinely reported all uses of isolation to the Department, as opposed to doing so only in instances where isolation formed part of a response to a critical incident on site. Secretary Pervan told us that '[t]he Director is informed contemporaneously with any periods of isolation that extend beyond three hours', but this is not reflected in the Isolation Procedure.[1347] Updating the Isolation Procedure to require authorisation for isolation longer than three hours from a senior departmental official (as recommended) will improve departmental oversight of isolation.

The Isolation Procedure refers to monthly reviews of isolations at Ashley Youth Detention Centre being provided to the Director, and regular audits of isolations being undertaken by the Department's Quality Improvement and Workforce Development Team. As mentioned in Section 9.2.5, this team no longer exists and we are not aware that its functions for monitoring isolations are currently performed by any other team in the Department.[1348]

The Department should provide monthly reports on isolation to the Secretary. This is important for effective internal oversight of youth detention, particularly given the previous lack of transparent reporting from Ashley Youth Detention Centre to senior officials in the Department.

The Department should not rely solely on Ashley Youth Detention Centre's analysis of isolations data. As with searches, we recommend quarterly reporting on isolations to the new Quality and Risk Committee, which should monitor trends and patterns in isolation use and identify any areas of concern.

We also recommend, at a minimum, monthly reporting of isolation data—including the register and all relevant supporting documentation—to the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6). In response to a draft of this chapter, Commissioner McLean proposed that the Department be required to report isolations to the Commission for Children and Young People within 24 or 48 hours of each isolation incident.[1349] We have not tested the feasibility of this proposal with the Government. The Government should work with the Commission for Children and Young People to determine an appropriate regime for the reporting of isolation data that prioritises the safety of children and young people.

In addition, to acknowledge the importance of these issues and to strengthen transparency and accountability, we recommend that the Department publishes quarterly data about isolation in youth detention.

Changes to address lockdowns

We acknowledge that, even in a well-run detention facility, occasional lockdowns may be unavoidable. However, we are deeply concerned about the prolonged, rolling lockdowns that have occurred at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in recent years due to chronic understaffing and the seriously detrimental impact of these lockdowns on the mental and physical wellbeing of children and young people in detention. We understand that, as recently as July 2023, lockdowns brought on by staff shortages continued at the Centre, with children and young people locked in their rooms or units for up to 23 hours a day.[1350]

We acknowledge that there was no suggestion made to us by the Department or Ashley Youth Detention Centre management or staff that lockdowns were beneficial or did not present a significant cause for concern. We also acknowledge that, to some degree, especially in relation to the COVID-19 pandemic, understaffing has been beyond the direct control of the Centre's management and the Department. However, as discussed in Section 4.7.2, while sometimes framed by management and departmental officials as a recent phenomenon, staff shortages have been a longstanding issue at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

As discussed in Section 4.2.2, understaffing damages staff morale, increases workloads and creates risks to staff safety. Lockdowns imposed when there are not enough staff can make children and young people 'agitated and more difficult to engage with' when they are released from their rooms, which 'leads to frustration and confrontation between staff and detainees'.[1351] This can, in turn, lead to further reductions in staff numbers, creating a cycle that is difficult to break.

The persistent nature of staff shortages at Ashley Youth Detention Centre requires the Department to take steps to ensure the Centre is appropriately staffed to provide therapeutic responses to children and young people and avoid the need for lockdowns. We make recommendations to improve staff recruitment and retention in Section 4.7.3. We anticipate that implementation of these recommendations will reduce the need for lockdowns.

We understand that the power to authorise a lockdown of a youth detention facility arises from the power in the Youth Justice Act to authorise isolation of a child or young person 'in the interests of the security of the centre'.[1352] Isolation under this provision is covered by the Isolation Procedure, although the relevant part of the procedure does not refer to lockdowns.

We made a number of requests for information about the policies and processes under which children and young people in detention are isolated and how the use of isolation is monitored.[1353] Although we did not receive evidence on the process for authorising lockdowns at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, it was not clear to us that the Isolation Procedure was followed. That procedure would require individual assessments to be undertaken for every child or young person to be subjected to a lockdown before it could be authorised, with individual plans for how each child or young person's isolation during the lockdown should be managed. It would also require the isolation of each child and young person as part of a lockdown to be entered on the isolation register.

While we acknowledge that the Isolation Procedure focuses primarily on 'behavioural' isolations, and does not appear to contemplate facility-wide lockdowns, it is concerning if proper procedures are not being followed for the isolation of children and young people through lockdowns. In recognition of the serious impact of lockdowns on children and young people in detention, we recommend that Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) records information about lockdowns, including unit-specific lockdowns, separately from isolations occurring in response to behaviour. This should include the reason for the lockdown, the number of children and young people subjected to the lockdown, the duration of the lockdown and the measures taken to meet children's and young people's needs, and support their health and wellbeing during the lockdown.

Lockdown data should be provided to the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6), monthly or more frequently, and be published regularly on the Department's website. We note that, in Victoria, the Department of Justice and Community Safety publishes quarterly data on 'behavioural based' isolations and 'isolations based on the security of the centre concerns' (lockdowns) in youth justice centres.[1354]

Recommendation 12.32

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Youth Justice Act 1997 to ensure the Act:
    a. makes clear that confining a detainee in their room or unit and preventing them from having contact with other detainees (other than overnight) constitutes isolation, regardless of the label used to refer to the practice
    b. clarifies that the use of isolation as a punishment is a prohibited action and makes it a criminal offence for a person to punish a detainee by isolating them or causing them to be isolated
    c. refers expressly to the principle that isolation should only be used as a measure of last resort and for the minimum time necessary.
2. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:
    a. update the Department's Use of Isolation procedure to
        i. make clear that confining a detainee in their room or unit and preventing them from having contact with other detainees (other than overnight) constitutes isolation, regardless of the label used to refer to the practice
        ii. specify clearly who is a delegate of the Secretary or the detention centre manager for the purpose of authorising isolation and extensions of isolation
        iii. require isolation beyond three hours to be authorised by a senior departmental official such as a Director
        iv. specify internal and external reporting requirements in relation to isolation
    b. publish the updated Use of Isolation procedure on the Department's website
    c. ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) records information on lockdowns, including the reason for the lockdown, details of authorisation processes, the duration of the lockdown, the number of children and young people isolated during the lockdown, measures adopted during the lockdown to meet the needs of children and young people and support their health and wellbeing, and steps taken after the lockdown to address its effects on children and young people

d. ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) provides

   i. monthly reports on isolation and lockdowns in detention to the Secretary

   ii. quarterly reports on the isolation of children and young people in detention and lockdowns to the Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to enable it to monitor trends and identify any areas of concern

   iii. the isolation register (with all relevant supporting documentation) and separate data on lockdowns to the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) on a monthly basis or more frequently, as agreed with the Commission for Children and Young People

e. publish quarterly data on isolation and lockdowns in youth detention.

9.3 Use of force

As outlined in Chapter 10, according to international legal instruments, the use of force in detention is only permitted when it is strictly necessary—that is, where the child poses an imminent threat of injury to themselves or others—and where other methods of control have been exhausted.[1355] When force is deemed necessary, it must be used: by properly trained staff; for the shortest possible time or a limited time; without causing humiliation and degradation; and only in self-defence, in response to attempted escape or in response to active or passive physical resistance.[1356]

9.3.1 What we heard about the use of force in detention

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case studies 1 and 4, we heard evidence about some staff regularly using force against children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Some of the experiences shared by victim-survivors about the use of force included:

- force and restraints being used to effect strip searches
- children and young people being restrained as part of isolation practices
- force, restraints and violence being used to punish children and young people for not following orders or for reporting abuse
- staff using violence against children and young people, and encouraging violence amongst them, as a form of humiliation
- force, restraints and violence being used to facilitate staff members' sexual abuse of children or young people, or in connection with sexual abuse.

As detailed in Chapter 11, Case studies 1 and 4, we heard allegations that children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre had been pinned down by staff members for relatively minor infractions, had their heads deliberately slammed against furniture and walls, been handcuffed for hours at a time, been dragged while handcuffed, had bones broken by staff, and had staff target them for physical violence. We discuss the punitive culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in Section 4.2.

In Chapter 11, Case study 4, we find that:

- Most, if not all, the accounts we heard describe an excessive, unreasonable or likely illegal use of force by some staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.
- Victim-survivors' accounts, viewed as a whole, suggested a pattern of some staff using force instead of de-escalation techniques to manage young people's behaviour.
- Various reviews of inappropriate uses of force at Ashley Youth Detention Centre from 2016 to 2017 identified that force was used other than as a last resort or when there were no obvious threats to staff or others.
- The excessive use of force has been a longstanding method of abusing children and young people by some staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, and the Department and Tasmanian Government have not always responded appropriately.

Commissioner McLean told us that children and young people in custody consistently raise concerns with her regarding the excessive use of force and that:

> use of force incidents against children and placing the child in isolation are closely interrelated, often causally and cyclically: an isolation event leading to behaviour of a child where force is used, causing further isolation, and so on.[1357]

At our hearings in August 2022, Mr Watson indicated that he believed that the use of force had decreased recently due to increased closed-circuit television camera coverage and hard drive capacity to store the footage, but conceded that force was still used too often:

> My Director's Executive Assistant has been in her role for 25 years and I can recall her saying to me on two months in a row, this is the first time in her 25 years that she can recollect no use of force and no isolation for the centre … That's something that, you know, when I first started, use of force and isolation were reasonably common and it's something that I'm—I believe is far less common today; however, it's still too high. We're still working to reduce it further.[1358]

We discuss the limited coverage of closed-circuit television cameras at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in Section 6.2.

9.3.2 The Youth Justice Act and inspection standards

As outlined in Chapter 10, the Youth Justice Act prohibits the use of physical force against a child or young person unless it is reasonable and:

- necessary to prevent the child or young person from harming themselves or anyone else, or from damaging property
- necessary for the security of the centre, or
- otherwise authorised under the Youth Justice Act or at common law—reasonable force may be used to carry out a search or to place a child or young person in isolation.[1359]

The Youth Justice Act also prohibits any action that inflicts, or is intended to inflict, physical pain or discomfort on a child or young person in detention as a punishment.[1360]

If force is used in the context of a search, this must be reported to the person in charge of the facility.[1361]

The Inspection Standards set a higher standard than the Youth Justice Act for when force can be used and the conditions of its use. The standards state that force must only be used 'when it is necessary to prevent an imminent and serious threat of self-harm or injury to others, and only when all other means of control have been exhausted'.[1362] The Inspection Standards also state that:

- force must only be used for 'the shortest time required'[1363]
- force should never be used as a sanction or to obtain a young person's compliance with staff instructions[1364]
- the use of force should not cause humiliation or degradation[1365]
- all instances of force should be recorded, investigated and reported[1366]
- a young person who has been subjected to force should be provided with health care following the incident and offered the opportunity to discuss the incident with a staff member who was not involved[1367]
- parents and carers are notified of incidents of restraint or force where appropriate.[1368]

9.3.3 Custodial procedures on the use of force

The key policies and procedures on the use of force at Ashley Youth Detention Centre are the:

- Use of Physical Force Procedure dated 10 December 2018 ('Use of Force Procedure')[1369]

- Minimising the Use of Physical Force and Restraint Practice Advice dated 1 July 2017 ('Use of Force Practice Advice')[1370]
- Use of Mechanical Restraints (Handcuffs) Procedure dated 21 October 2019[1371]
- Use of Mechanical Restraints Practice Advice dated 21 October 2019.[1372]

Together, these documents prohibit:

- using 'excessive force', which is defined to include 'any force when none is needed', 'more force than is needed', 'any force or level of force continuing after the necessity for it has ended', and 'knowingly wrongful use of force'[1373]
- using a technique or hold 'that is not proportionate to the level of risk present' or for longer than required, use of positions that make it difficult for the young person to breathe, and use of body weight to sit or lie across a young person's back or stomach[1374]
- applying direct pressure to the neck, thorax, abdomen, back or pelvic area[1375]
- using handcuffs except where 'it is reasonable and necessary to prevent harm to a person, property or for the security of the Centre and all other means of control have been exhausted and failed' (handcuffs 'must never be used as a punishment')[1376]
- using any type of mechanical restraint other than handcuffs[1377]
- using force against a young person to facilitate compliance with an order or direction from a staff member.[1378]

The Use of Force Procedure advises staff that, where excessive use of force is suspected, they may be subject to 'internal and/or external investigation' and 'disciplinary and/or criminal proceedings'.[1379]

According to the Use of Force Practice Advice, '[t]he use of force is considered a severe measure that should only be carried out as a last resort'.[1380] If a young person appears unsettled or anxious, or if an incident is escalating, the Use of Force Procedure requires staff to 'alert the Operations Coordinator and other relevant staff' to discuss and assess the level of risk, and strategies to reduce the chance of an incident occurring or escalating.[1381] When undertaking a risk assessment, staff are encouraged to consider matters such as what is going on in the young person's life as well as the young person's developmental age, mental or physical traits, substance use, history of incidents and previous reactions to the use of force.[1382]

The Use of Force Practice Advice emphasises the importance of communicating with the young person, using non-threatening body language, listening, asking open-ended questions, guiding them towards making positive behaviour choices and being 'specific and gentle, but firmly directive' about the desired behaviour.[1383]

To assess whether force is an appropriate response, staff must consider whether it is 'proportionate', 'lawful', 'accountable' (staff must be able to justify using force and explain why other options were not used), 'necessary' (the force must be required to fulfil a staff member's duty of care), and 'ethical' (the use of force must 'reflect human rights principles').[1384]

When force is required, staff must:

- 'apply the minimum amount of physical force necessary using an approved technique to gain control of the young person's behaviour'[1385]
- continuously monitor the young person for signs of distress and continue talking to the young person throughout the incident, making it clear that the use of force will stop when it is no longer necessary to protect the young person or others[1386]
- 'discontinue the use of force as soon as the young person has become compliant'.[1387]

Following a use of force, the Operations Manager must review closed-circuit television camera footage of the incident as soon as practicable and the Operations Coordinator must:[1388]

- report the use of force to the Centre Manager[1389]
- put in place a plan to debrief the young person if required, review the young person's 'behaviour goals and strategies' and address the need for any 'post incident intervention'[1390]
- ensure any injured staff have been attended to and 'conduct a debrief for all staff involved in the incident to ensure they are safe and well before they go home'.[1391]

The Correctional Primary Health Services nurse must 'sight every young person who has been restrained, assess for possible injury and treat as required'.[1392]

Relevant staff must record the details of the use of force on the 'Use of Force Register' and 'follow the Incident Reporting procedure'.[1393] We understand this to be a reference to the AYDC Incident Reporting Procedure dated 1 July 2018 ('Incident Reporting Procedure').[1394] The purpose of that procedure is to 'outline the steps that staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre must take following an incident that has arisen from the behavior/s of a young person or multiple young people'.[1395] The Incident Reporting Procedure does not define 'incident'.

According to the Incident Reporting Procedure:

- Staff must report information about the incident and the young person—this includes identifying 'whether restrictive practices were used and what type (use of force, mechanical restraints, isolation)' and recommending 'a level of seriousness (recorded incident, minor incident or detention offence)' for the incident.[1396]

- The Centre Support Team (now known as 'Weekly Review Meetings') must review the circumstances of the incident.[1397]
- The Centre Manager must review the incident, decide on further actions required and advise the Director, Strategic Youth Services 'as appropriate'—if notified, the Director must decide whether an independent investigation is called for and the type of investigation.[1398]

Ms Honan told us that incident reporting is escalated to her 'if there is a significant event such as sexual/physical assault, damage to property, disturbance, self harm, [or] escape' and that she is notified of '[a]ll incidents of injury or harm to a young person'.[1399] This list would not cover all uses of force. Ms Honan also told us that, in 2020, the 'Ashley Incident Management System'—a centralised system for electronic recording of incidents—was implemented and all staff were trained in using this system.[1400]

The Use of Force Procedure requires the Centre Support Team to conduct monthly reviews on the use of force and to forward this information to the Centre Manager and the Department.[1401] Ms Honan told us she receives monthly reports on the use of force.[1402]

The Use of Force Procedure also contemplates the review of an agreed number of randomly selected incident reports involving the use of force to establish whether force was appropriate and accurately recorded in the use of force register, but does not specify who should conduct these reviews or how often they should be conducted.[1403]

9.3.4 Recent reforms

The Keeping Kids Safe Plan refers to the Department establishing an 'Incident Review Committee' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, in September 2022, to 'review incidents on a weekly basis for compliance with policy and procedure, follow up actions based on review findings and to identify learning areas to support staff'.[1404] This committee is chaired by the Director, Custodial Operations, and its members include the Director, Strategic Youth Services and the Centre Manager.[1405] The committee reports to the Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice.[1406]

According to the Incident Review Committee's terms of reference, its functions are to review 'all serious/major incidents that occurred over the last 7 calendar days' and 'agree actions to be undertaken or make recommendations arising from the serious/major incident'.[1407] The terms of reference anticipate that 'relevant footage will be downloaded, reviewed and discussed by the committee members during the meeting'.[1408]

We are unsure how the work of the Incident Review Committee intersects with or complements the work of the Risk Assessment Process Team, which also reviews serious incidents (refer to Chapter 10).

Further, the division of responsibility between the Incident Review Committee and the Weekly Review Meetings in reviewing incidents weekly at Ashley Youth Detention Centre is unclear to us. It may be that the Incident Review Committee is responsible for reviewing only 'serious/major' incidents, while all other incidents are considered at the Weekly Review Meetings. It would be beneficial to clarify this in the Incident Reporting Procedure.

The Keeping Kids Safe Plan also states that Ashley Youth Detention Centre 'reports all critical incidents and follow up actions to both the [Commissioner for Children and Young People] and Custodial Inspector on a real time basis'.[1409] However, Commissioner McLean told us that she does 'not receive reports of all critical incidents' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and that, when she is notified of incidents, it is 'certainly … not in "real time"'.[1410] She also stated that she is 'not generally provided with sufficient detail to understand what has occurred and what has been done in response to the incident'.[1411]

9.3.5 Minimising the use of force in detention

The Inspection Standards impose a more stringent standard than the Youth Justice Act for the use of force in detention by not permitting force solely to prevent damage to property or where 'necessary for the security of the centre'.[1412]

We recommend amendments to the Youth Justice Act to more closely reflect the Inspection Standards. In particular, the Youth Justice Act should provide that force should only be used against a child or young person in detention when reasonable and necessary to prevent an imminent and serious threat of harm to the child or young person or to others, or to prevent an imminent escape, and when all other means of control have been exhausted. Force should be used for the shortest time necessary and should never be used to punish a child or young person or to secure their compliance with an instruction or direction. We consider that these changes would enable the use of force to prevent an assault, harmful sexual behaviours or the destruction of property that involves an imminent threat of serious harm to a person.

We do not recommend any changes to the existing provisions of the Youth Justice Act in relation to the use of force to carry out a search or to place a child or young person in isolation, noting we make recommendations in Section 9.2.6 directed at minimising the use of isolation.

We also recommend that the Youth Justice Act makes it a criminal offence for a person to use force against a child or young person in detention in contravention of the Act. We note that section 22 of the Children (Detention Centres) Act 1987 (NSW) makes it a criminal offence to subject a detainee to a range of punishments, including striking them or subjecting them to any other form of physical violence, or to handcuff or forcibly restrain a detainee without reasonable excuse.[1413]

The Use of Force Procedure is considerably more comprehensive than the Youth Justice Act in terms of controls, checks and balances on the use of force. However, we consider that it could be strengthened to reflect extra safeguards in the Inspection Standards, namely:

- the requirement to provide every child or young person who has been subjected to force with health care (as opposed to the current requirement for the nurse to 'sight every young person who has been restrained')[1414]
- the requirement to offer every child or young person who has been subjected to force the opportunity to discuss it with a staff member who was not involved (as opposed to the current requirement to '[d]ebrief the young person … if required')[1415]
- the requirement to notify parents and carers of incidents of force or restraint where appropriate.

We also recommend that the Use of Force Procedure be updated to require all uses of force to be reported immediately to a senior departmental official such as a Director.

Consistent with our recommended approach to reporting on searches, isolation and lockdowns, we recommend monthly reporting on the use of force to the Secretary, and quarterly reporting to the Quality and Risk Committee to monitor trends and patterns in the use of force.

Data on the use of force should also be reported to the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6). The Commissioner for Children and Young People proposed that such reporting occur within 24 or 48 hours of each use of force incident.[1416] However, we have not tested the feasibility of this proposal with the Government. We recommend monthly reporting, at a minimum, on the use of force to the new Commission. The Government should work with the Commission for Children and Young People to determine an appropriate frequency for the reporting of data on the use of force in youth detention.

Finally, we are concerned that incidents examined in Chapter 11, Case study 4, reveal that staff did not follow procedure. We address this in the next section.

Recommendation 12.33

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Youth Justice Act 1997 to provide that:
    a. subject to sections 25E and 133, force may only be used when reasonable and necessary to prevent an imminent and serious threat of harm to a person or to prevent an imminent escape, and when all other means of control have been exhausted
    b. force must be used for the minimum time necessary
    c. force must never be used to punish a child or young person, or solely to secure their compliance with an instruction or direction
    d. using force in contravention of the Act is a criminal offence.
2. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:
    a. update the Department's Use of Force procedure to
        i. require all uses of force to be immediately reported to a senior departmental official, such as a Director, in addition to identifying the use of force as part of an incident report
        ii. require every child or young person who has been subjected to the use of force to be provided with health care and offered the opportunity to discuss the incident with a staff member who was not involved
        iii. require parents and carers of a child or young person who has been subjected to the use of force to be notified
        iv. specify internal and external reporting requirements in relation to the use of force
    b. publish the updated Use of Force procedure on the Department's website
    c. ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) provides
        i. monthly reports on the use of force in detention to the Secretary
        ii. quarterly reports on the use of force in detention to the Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to enable it to monitor trends and identify any areas of concern
        iii. the use of force register and all relevant supporting documentation to the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) on a monthly basis or more frequently, as agreed with the Commission for Children and Young People.

9.4 Training on searches, isolation and use of force

In Section 4.7.3, we recommend continuing professional development for youth workers on: expected standards of behaviour in interacting with children and young people; the human rights of children and young people in detention; approaches to setting fair, clear and firm boundaries for children and young people's behaviour within a therapeutic, trauma-informed framework; and training in all custodial policies and procedures.

As noted throughout this section, there is a particular need for ongoing training and professional development for youth detention centre staff in laws, policies and procedures on searches, isolation and the use of force. We consider that it is also important for staff of the Department's Youth Justice Services directorate (including leadership) who are not based at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to be familiar with the laws, policies and procedures for these practices. This would ensure consistency of understanding across the Department, strengthen internal oversight of restrictive practices in detention and improve those practices.

Accordingly, we recommend joint training for staff of youth detention facilities and other relevant youth justice staff in the Department on the laws, standards, policies and procedures on isolation, the use of force and personal searches of children and young people in detention. While we consider that such training will help change practices at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, training alone is not enough. In Section 4, we make recommendations designed to achieve broader cultural change in youth detention and ensure past harmful practices do not continue.

There is also a need to ensure police understand legislative and procedural requirements for restrictive practices in youth detention. In Chapter 11, Case study 7, we find that Tasmania Police should improve its responses to allegations of child sexual abuse made by current and former detainees at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Our suggestions for improvement include ensuring police have ready access to guidance on Tasmanian law in relation to personal searches, isolation and the use of force so they can readily identify when alleged conduct falls outside the parameters of acceptable professional conduct and may indicate that a crime has occurred. We make a recommendation to this effect here. We consider that this guidance will also assist police who carry out searches of children and young people in police custody.

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should provide regular joint training and professional development for staff who have contact with children and young people in youth detention facilities and relevant staff of the Youth Justice Services directorate on laws, standards, policies and procedures regarding the use of isolation, the use of force and searches of children and young people in detention to ensure consistency in understanding and application. This training should be mandatory.
2. Tasmania Police should ensure its members receive regular training and guidance on laws and procedures on the use of isolation, the use of force and searches of children and young people in detention to enable police to readily identify conduct that falls outside the parameters of acceptable professional conduct among staff and may constitute a criminal offence.

10 Responding to concerns, complaints and critical incidents in youth detention

Effective complaints processes are critical to creating a safe detention environment. Children and young people in detention who have a concern—for example, about the services they have received or not received while in detention, or about the behaviour of staff or other children and young people, including child sexual abuse—need a clear, safe and accessible process to raise the concern and make a complaint, and to have confidence that it will be taken seriously and responded to appropriately. Effective processes are also required for the family members of children and young people in detention or detention facility staff who want to raise a concern about the treatment or safety of a child or young person in detention.

Complaints from or about a child or young person in detention can be responded to 'internally' (by the detention facility or by the Department) or 'externally' (by an independent oversight body). In Section 11, we discuss the role of external oversight bodies in supporting children and young people in detention to raise concerns about their treatment (including making a formal complaint about the Department to the Ombudsman) and advocating to resolve their concerns.

In this section, we examine the internal processes of Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the Department for identifying and responding to concerns and complaints from or about children and young people in detention, including those involving child sexual abuse and other serious allegations.

The case studies in this volume indicate serious problems with the Department's responses to concerns, complaints and critical incidents in detention involving risks to the safety of children and young people in detention. In Chapter 11, Case study 2, we find that Ashley Youth Detention Centre has been aware of harmful sexual behaviours at the Centre and has not taken steps to protect children and young people from these behaviours. As discussed in that case study, when harmful sexual behaviours occurred, staff or Centre management often failed to respond appropriately—whether by not removing the risks, not supporting the victim-survivor, or punishing them for making a complaint.

In Chapter 11, Case study 6, we find that Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the Department did not respond appropriately to a serious allegation from Max (a pseudonym) of misconduct against a staff member. As discussed in that case study, we consider that the response to Max's allegation suggests systemic problems in how Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the Department respond to serious allegations, including by children and young people against staff members. We observed similar problems in the Department's response to allegations of child sexual abuse against staff (discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 7) and in a complaint from Alysha (a pseudonym), a former staff member at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, about the safety of children (discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 5).

Overall, the evidence detailed in our case studies indicates shortcomings in the Department's responses to complaints, including not:

- creating a culture where complaints by staff or children and young people are encouraged
- recognising complaints involving child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours
- appropriately escalating and formalising complaints
- adequately and appropriately investigating complaints
- responding to complaints in a way that maintained safety and confidentiality and managed fear of reprisal for the complainant
- addressing safety risks raised by complaints.

The National Royal Commission recommended that institutions have 'a clear, accessible and child-focused complaints handling policy and procedure that sets out how the institution should respond to complaints of child sexual abuse'.[1417] The National Royal Commission's final report set out a list of actions that should form part of an effective institutional response to a complaint of child sexual abuse. These were: identifying a complaint; assessing risk; reporting to police, child protection and other bodies; investigating the complaint; communicating and providing support to those affected by the complaint; maintaining records; completing a 'root cause analysis' to identify systemic factors that may have contributed to the complaint; and monitoring and reviewing outcomes.[1418]

The National Royal Commission also recommended that state and territory governments review internal and external complaints-handling systems concerning youth detention to ensure they are capable of effectively dealing with complaints of child sexual abuse.[1419] According to this recommendation, the review should ensure (among other matters) that children can easily access child-appropriate information about complaints processes, complaints-handling systems are accessible for children with literacy difficulties or who speak English as a second language, and children are regularly consulted about the effectiveness of complaints-handling systems, so systems are continually improved.[1420]

In our view, the Department's processes for identifying and responding to complaints and serious incidents in youth detention, including those relating to child sexual abuse, require significant reform. In this section, we recommend that the Department implements measures to:

- address structural barriers in complaints systems and create a culture in which complaints and critical feedback from staff, children and young people in detention and family members are encouraged (broader cultural change in youth detention is discussed in Section 4)
- provide for concerns and complaints about child sexual abuse and related conduct by staff to be referred to and investigated by a new Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, recommended in Chapter 6 (Recommendation 6.6)
- ensure concerns and complaints related to harmful sexual behaviours are reported to the Department's new Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit and managed in line with a separate policy recommended in Section 8.5 of this chapter (Recommendation 12.30)
- ensure children and young people in detention feel safe to raise concerns, are aware of their rights to make a complaint and understand complaints processes
- ensure staff are aware of their role in responding to concerns raised by children and young people in detention and have clear processes for raising concerns about other staff
- update and strengthen custodial policies and procedures for complaints processes.

10.1 What we heard about complaints processes in detention Victim-survivors told us about their experiences in making, or attempting to make, complaints at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. They reported significant barriers to making complaints. Some said that they did not complain for fear of repercussions from staff or other detainees; others told us they tried to complain but felt discouraged from going further because of the responses they received.[1421] We acknowledge that the complaints policies and procedures in place at the time of these experiences differed from those currently in place (described in Section 10.2); however, we consider that this evidence is still highly relevant to reforming complaints handling for children and young people in detention.

One victim-survivor, Fred (a pseudonym), said he received no feedback at all after making a complaint:

> So, I wrote down my experience on a piece of paper and put it in an envelope with – I believe I was told to put 'complaints' on it – and slipped it under my door; it was picked up by passing officers, like, as all mail would go out, and I never heard anything. I put two complaints in in my time at Ashley and I never heard anything about either of them.[1422]

Victim-survivor Warren (a pseudonym) described never making a complaint due to fear of the repercussions:

> I never made a complaint about anything that happened while I was in Ashley. The process of making a complaint was to write it down and give it to the workers. If someone ever complained about something it would always get back to the workers and they would tell each other about it. They would make your life hell and you suffered more. Because of this, no-one really made any complaints.[1423]

Some victim-survivors spoke of feeling complaining was futile because they would not be believed. Max said:

> Yeah, even if me and my mate had've made a complaint, still, that's only two criminals against, like, four or five or, like, five or six staff members that have all got good records and that, and they're youth workers, they're not—the way we seen it as, there's nothing we can do, no-one's gonna believe us.[1424]

These experiences are reflected in the Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report, which found that some children and young people (with experiences in detention, out of home care, education and health systems) felt unsafe raising concerns or making a complaint. Young people in detention described a culture 'where "snitches" were frowned upon or where their adult and peer harassers retaliated when their behaviours were raised'.[1425]

When asked what they would do if they were unsafe or had been harmed, most children and young people interviewed for the Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report said they would turn to someone outside the institution to raise their concern or make a complaint.[1426] In Section 11.4, we recommend establishing an independent community visitor scheme to enable every child or young person in detention to have regular, frequent access to a trusted adult who is independent of the Department and who can advocate on their behalf.

In her submission to our Inquiry, Angela Sdrinis, a lawyer who specialises in institutional abuse claims, outlined multiple barriers to children and young people reporting child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1427] These included children and young people: being unaware of complaints procedures; having an 'ingrained distrust of authorities'; fearing being ridiculed, accused of lying or not being believed; being denied access to or avoiding external supports such as family visits; being intimidated by staff; and fearing being known as someone who reports.[1428] Ms Sdrinis also referred to children's illiteracy, poor communication skills, lack of self-esteem and disempowerment due to intergenerational trauma as barriers to reporting.[1429]

Mark Morrissey, former Commissioner for Children and Young People, also referred to children and young people being reluctant to complain:

> One thing I observed: often the culture that existed in an adult prison would reach back into the young people at Ashley. So, some of these children came from the generational situation where other family members had been in jail and they learnt the culture and the rules of a prison … which meant not being a dog or speaking up …[1430]

Mr Morrisey also highlighted the problems he observed with complaints processes at Ashley Youth Detention Centre after starting in his role in 2014. He explained that, at that time, a child or young person wishing to make a complaint had to put the complaint in writing and place it in a brightly coloured public complaints box that was in a prominent position in the Centre's dining room.[1431]

Mr Morrissey stated that this was problematic because many of the children in detention were illiterate and because, in an environment where the dominant ethos was 'don't dob', the public location of the complaints box was a major disincentive to making a complaint.[1432] As he outlined in his statement:

> The chances of a young person placing a complaint or concern in the box were close to zero. Interestingly I was advised by [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] management that 'the young people rarely if ever make complaints so I was not to expect very much'… I was not made aware of any complaints going into the complaint box between 2014 and 2017.[1433]

We note that, according to the Feedback, Concern & Complaints Info Sheet given to children and young people in detention, there are now multiple 'post boxes' for feedback and complaints located throughout Ashley Youth Detention Centre, rather than a single complaints box (this is discussed in Section 10.2).[1434]

10.2 Complaints processes at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

The Youth Justice Act gives children and young people in detention the right to complain about their treatment in detention. Section 129 of the Youth Justice Act provides that a child in detention can complain to the Secretary of the Department (or the Ombudsman) about the standard of care, accommodation or treatment they are receiving in a detention centre.[1435]

More broadly, section 137 of the Youth Justice Act provides that a child in detention, a member of the child's family or a guardian can complain to the Secretary about any matter affecting or connected with a child in detention. Section 138 states that, on receiving a complaint, the Secretary must provide the complainant and child with written notice detailing the complaint and how the complaint will be dealt with.[1436] The Secretary does not have to deal with a complaint reasonably believed to be 'trivial' or 'made only to cause annoyance'.[1437]

10.2.2 Ashley Youth Detention Centre policies and procedures

We asked the Tasmanian Government to provide the policies and procedures applied to complaints made by or on behalf of children at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1438] In June 2022, we received three Ashley Youth Detention Centre complaints policies and procedures, each of which was undated:

- Responding to Feedback, Concerns and Complaints Procedure ('Complaints Procedure')
- Feedback and Complaints Practice Advice ('Complaints Practice Advice')
- a Make a Complaint form for children and young people.[1439]

The Complaints Procedure and Complaints Practice Advice were updated with effect from October 2022 and we refer to these updated versions in our discussion.[1440] The Department's Practice Manual now also includes a new Feedback, Concern & Complaints Info Sheet ('Information Sheet') for children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre (effective from October 2022) and a new Help Form for children and young people in detention to seek help or provide feedback (effective from September 2022) ('Help Form'), which we also discuss in Section 10.2.3.[1441]

In addition, there are custodial policies and procedures that guide staff who have concerns about the safety of a child or young person in detention, including concerns about the behaviour of a colleague. These are discussed separately in Section 10.2.7.

We also note that the Department's website includes a page called 'Complaints—Child Safety and Youth Justice Services', which states that a person can make a complaint about a youth justice service if they are: a client of the service; a 'friend, relative or guardian of a client'; a service provider; or 'anyone who has a valid interest in an issue'.[1442] Complaints can be made to any staff member or emailed or mailed to the Department.[1443] The website indicates that the Department will treat complaints confidentially and try to resolve any formal complaint within four weeks of receiving it.[1444]

10.2.3 Information provided to children and young people about the complaints process

On admission to Ashley Youth Detention Centre, children and young people are given a booklet called Information for Young People and Families.[1445] This booklet advises children and young people that:

- they can complain about services at Ashley Youth Detention Centre or about the behaviour or conduct of a staff member or another young person
- they can complain to any staff member, who 'can start the process to deal with your complaint'
- they 'should not feel scared about making a complaint' and can choose to 'have a support person who can provide emotional and administrative support, make sure the complaint is dealt with fairly and promptly, and help you understand the process and the outcome'
- they have a choice as to whether their complaint is dealt with by Ashley Youth Detention Centre (in which case staff will refer the complaint to the Centre Manager) or by the Secretary of the Department (in which case staff can provide contact information, but the young person must contact the Secretary themselves)
- the Centre Manager may decide not to investigate if they believe the complaint is 'trivial or made to cause annoyance'
- complaints referred to the Centre Manager will usually be investigated within 21 days and the young person will receive a letter telling them the outcome of their complaint
- they can ask for a review by the Secretary or the Ombudsman of a decision made about a complaint if they are not happy with it.[1446]

Custodial procedures also require staff to explain this information verbally to children and young people on admission.[1447]

The Information Sheet (also provided on admission) advises children and young people that if they want to provide feedback to Ashley Youth Detention Centre management or make a complaint they can:

- fill out a Help Form, which can be found in each unit, at Ashley School and in the 'Health Corridor' (discussed in Chapter 10)—once completed the form can be placed in one of several 'post boxes' located in the young person's unit, at Ashley School or in the corridor near the health services
- join the 'Resident Advisory Group', which is a fortnightly forum designed to give children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre 'a say about the things that affect them', including their views on the 'physical amenity of the site, detention processes, standard of care, treatment and program options and how safe they feel' (the Resident Advisory Group is discussed in detail in Section 4.6.2)
- contact the Ombudsman or the Commissioner for Children and Young People by using the phone in their unit or writing to them.[1448]

The Help Form is a relatively simple, two-page form that invites children and young people to write their 'issues, problems, feedback or suggestions' in relation to a range of areas, including safety, phone calls, food and clothing, and to tick a box indicating whether they would like the form to go the Centre Manager, the Secretary or the Ombudsman.[1449]

The Complaints Procedure requires Ashley Youth Detention Centre managers to ensure each unit's meeting area displays 'promotional feedback and complaints resources'.[1450]

10.2.4 Process for responding to complaints from children about sexual abuse

According to the Complaints Practice Advice, where a child or young person discloses harm by a staff member, this is to be addressed by a different process—'not the complaints process'—and staff who receive such a disclosure 'must immediately report that to an Operations Coordinator or Manager for follow up'.[1451] Staff must also 'ensure that the young person is kept safe from further harm and follow procedures regarding the notification of harm'.[1452]

The different process to be followed where a child or young person discloses harm is not clear to us. The Complaints Procedure refers to a separate procedure called When a Young Person Discloses Harm, but this document was not provided to us and we could not find it in the Department's Practice Manual.[1453]

According to the Complaints Procedure:

> If the young person discloses abuse (verbal, physical or sexual) by another resident or staff member, an incident report must be raised (see incident procedure).[1454]

This would appear to be a reference to the AYDC Incident Reporting Procedure ('Incident Reporting Procedure'), although this procedure does not address harm by staff.[1455] The purpose of this procedure is to outline the steps that staff must take 'following an incident that has arisen from the behavior/s of a young person or multiple young people'.[1456] A central focus of the procedure is determining whether any young person involved in the incident has committed a 'detention offence' under the Youth Justice Act, rather than responding to the needs of young people affected by the incident.[1457]

Secretary Pervan's view was that any allegation of harmful sexual behaviours at Ashley Youth Detention Centre fell within the definition of an 'incident' for the purposes of the Incident Reporting Procedure.[1458] While the Incident Reporting Procedure may apply to concerns involving harmful sexual behaviours (because these could be described as constituting an incident 'arising from the behaviour' of a young person), we do not consider this procedure to be suitable to guide responses to such concerns. Viewing harmful sexual behaviours solely through the lens of 'detention offences' is inconsistent with a contemporary understanding of such behaviours (refer to Chapter 21 for a discussion of these issues). We discuss the Department's response to harmful sexual behaviours in detention in Section 8 and recommend developing a separate departmental policy to prevent and respond to such behaviours in detention (Recommendation 12.30).

As noted, the Incident Reporting Procedure does not refer to or contemplate reports or allegations of child sexual abuse or other allegations of abuse or human rights violations by staff. In her August 2022 statement to our Inquiry, Pamela Honan, Director, Strategic Youth Services, told us that she was not aware of any policy governing the Department's response to allegations of child sexual abuse as these matters are 'managed by People and Culture'.[1459]

In his June 2022 statement, Secretary Pervan told us that if a complaint is made about the sexual abuse of a child or young person in detention by a current staff member, 'it may be referred to the Department's People and Culture Division', which notifies Tasmania Police and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme; undertakes an initial risk assessment (also referred to in this volume as a 'preliminary assessment') that may result in action to remove the staff member from the workplace; and prepares advice for the Secretary about whether a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct may have occurred.[1460]

The Secretary may then appoint an investigator to investigate the allegation in line with the procedure in Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct.[1461] The Secretary considers the investigation report prepared by the investigator and the staff member's response to the report, and makes a determination as to any breaches of the Code of Conduct and sanctions, which may include terminating the staff member's employment.[1462]

Secretary Pervan said that the governance process of the People and Culture Division ensured that 'the safety of a child or young person [was] the primary consideration when responding to an allegation' and that support was made available to the complainant.[1463]

However, former Acting Executive Director of People and Culture, Jacqueline Allen, told us that the Department's People and Culture team:

> … [did] not have documented or approved Communities Tasmania policies and procedures, relating to supporting complainants and victims; assessing and taking steps to ensure the safety of detainees; notifying other agencies of allegations; conducting investigations; decision making regarding outcomes and disciplinary processes; informing affected parties of outcomes; and record keeping.[1464]

Ms Allen explained that this was because the People and Culture team was not directly in contact with complainants and victim-survivors because contact was typically made through the Department of Justice (for claimants through the National Redress Scheme) or the Office of the Solicitor-General (for civil litigation complainants).[1465]

Ms Allen told us that, despite this, there were many informal policies and procedures that People and Culture adopted in relation to the notification process.[1466] For example, Employment Direction No. 5 specifically outlined how People and Culture were to conduct investigations, including how to involve a young person.[1467] Ms Allen also told us that, from around November 2020 onwards, once the People and Culture team was made aware of an allegation, it would inform other agencies of allegations associated with an employee.[1468]

Ms Allen also stated that 'People and Culture provided advice and guidance around employee related matters in the department, not resident, children or youth related matters'.[1469] She told us that while she had responsibility for managing parts of the complaints process, such as collecting and organising information that forms part of a preliminary assessment, neither she nor the People and Culture team had decision-making authority for Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1470] Instead, Ms Allen said that the Centre's management was responsible for 'receiving and acting on complaints, allegations, and concerns regarding conduct of [Centre] officials'.[1471] She indicated that the People and Culture team was not directly responsible for the safety of children and young people because this responsibility sat with Ashley Youth Detention Centre management.[1472]

Ms Honan stated that her role was to report these matters to People and Culture.[1473] A discussion would occur with People and Culture about who was best to handle the complaint or allegation depending on the nature of it.[1474] She said that any allegations about harm of a young person by an official were referred to and managed by People and Culture.[1475] Ms Honan added that she did not hold an investigative role; rather, her role was to support the investigation by providing any information or documentation available to assist enquiries.[1476]

As illustrated here and in Chapter 11, Case study 7, the lack of clarity about the process for responding to complaints involving child sexual abuse in detention is highly problematic and places children and young people in detention at increased risk of child sexual abuse.

10.2.5 Process for responding to other complaints from children

In summary, the Complaints Procedure provides that the process for responding to complaints (other than those involving the disclosure of harm or abuse) is as follows:

- The Ashley Youth Detention Centre Senior Management Team discusses the complaint and appoints an 'Investigator' (presumably a member of staff, although this is not specified) to 'follow up on the complaint and manage the response process', although 'sensitive matters (such as staff misconduct) [are] handled separately by the Director and Executive Director', while complaints about Ashley School or the health service are referred to the manager of the relevant service.[1477]
- The Investigator (or their delegate) reads the complaint and speaks to the complainant 'for further clarity', then speaks to other 'parties' and 'gathers relevant details in order to make an informed decision'.[1478]
- If the complaint is 'complex', the Investigator can 'table it at the next [Senior Management Team] morning meeting for further consultation'.[1479]
- The Senior Management Team discusses the 'final recommendation' and determines the outcome, and the young person is informed of the outcome verbally and in writing.[1480]
- The outcome is recorded in the 'complaints register'.[1481]

According to the Complaints Procedure, a child or young person who has made a complaint must receive an acknowledgment letter within 72 hours of lodging the complaint and a follow-up letter every 10 days until the complaint is resolved. They should also be offered support in relation to the complaint.[1482]

10.2.6 Strengths and limitations of complaints processes for children and their families

There are some positive features of the complaints processes, policies and procedures described in the preceding sections. In particular, we commend the requirement in the Complaints Procedure to provide support to a child or young person making a complaint, and to keep them informed of the investigation process.

However, we note the following structural limitations of current complaints processes and barriers to making complaints:

- Many children and young people in detention have low literacy levels. This severely limits the effectiveness of detailed written information provided to them about how to make a complaint. We are not convinced that children and young people read the information booklet given to them on admission to detention.

- While staff are also required to verbally explain complaints processes to children and young people when they are admitted to detention, admission can be an overwhelming experience and there is a risk that the child or young person will not understand or retain a verbal explanation of how to make a complaint.
- The Help Form, while simple, relies on a child or young person being able to express their concern or complaint in writing, which they may be unable or unwilling to do.
- While there are now several 'post boxes' throughout Ashley Youth Detention Centre for receiving written complaints, they appear to still be located in shared spaces, which may make some children and young people reluctant to use them, for fear of being perceived as a 'snitch'.
- As noted in Section 11.4, while children and young people in detention can make phone calls to the Commissioner for Children and Young People or the Ombudsman to raise concerns or make complaints, it is not clear that such calls can always be made in private.

In an environment where there has previously been a strong culture of non-disclosure, strategies are required to overcome these structural barriers to children and young people raising concerns or making complaints.

We also note the following concerns with the current Complaints Procedure and Complaints Practice Advice:

- They do not define child sexual abuse and related conduct, including harmful sexual behaviours.
- As noted, they do not clearly explain the procedure to be followed where a child or young person discloses a safety concern (such as sexual abuse by staff or harmful sexual behaviours by another child or young person), nor do they refer to another procedure that does so.
- They do not define or provide guidance on what might constitute a 'sensitive matter', other than 'staff misconduct' (noting that, in any event, the Complaints Procedure and Complaints Practice Advice do not apply to complaints about abuse of a child or young person by a staff member).
- They do not refer to the procedure for notifying Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme of relevant concerns (refer to Section 10.2.7).
- They do not include mechanisms to conduct a risk assessment or undertake a root cause analysis to enable systemic improvements to be implemented following the investigation of a complaint.

- While the Complaints Procedure directs staff to record complaints in the complaints register, Secretary Pervan did not refer to this register when explaining the Centre's complaints process.[1483] Secretary Pervan said that staff have recorded 'incidents' in the 'Ashley Incident Monitoring System' since January 2021.[1484]
- They are not publicly accessible. As noted, the Department's website explains that complaints can be made by any person who has a 'valid interest in an issue' relating to a decision, a service provided or the behaviour of Child Safety and Youth Justice Services staff.[1485] However, aside from a short explanation of 'what you can expect when making a complaint', the website does not provide any policy or procedure outlining how the Department handles complaints, concerns or allegations involving children and young people in detention.[1486]

10.2.7 Complaints from staff

The Complaints Procedure and the Complaints Practice Advice are concerned with responding to complaints from children and young people rather than from staff. The Department's Practice Manual includes the following documents to guide staff who have concerns about the safety of children and young people in detention:

- The Contacting the SFSK Advice and Referral Line Procedure requires staff to contact the Advice and Referral Line where they believe, suspect or know that a child or young person is at risk of, or is experiencing, abuse or neglect.[1487] This procedure advises staff who become aware of historical or current concerns about the conduct of another employee 'as it relates to the safety of children and young people' to immediately report those concerns to their supervisor and contact the Advice and Referral Line.[1488]
- The Reporting Concerns fact sheet advises staff 'to report any conduct or behaviour which is of concern to you, and that could compromise the safety and wellbeing of a child'.[1489] Concerns about the conduct of another staff member must be reported to the Department's People and Culture team, to the Advice and Referral Line and, '[i]f the concerning behaviour is criminal in nature', to Tasmania Police.[1490] Staff should also discuss their concerns with their supervisor or manager as soon as practicable.[1491] The fact sheet acknowledges that 'these matters can cause significant distress for employees and can be confronting and disturbing' and indicates that '[e]xtensive support is available to all employees', including support from the employee's manager and from 'Health and Wellbeing Officers'.[1492]
- More broadly, the Transparency and Accountability policy requires staff to comply with the State Service Code of Conduct, to '[c]ommunicate when things go wrong so that matters can be addressed at the earliest possible moment' and to '[f]oster a no blame culture to promote practice improvement'.[1493]

None of these documents defines or explains child sexual abuse, harmful sexual behaviours, grooming or professional boundary breaches.

Even where there are clear policies and procedures requiring staff to report concerning behaviour on the part of colleagues, staff may be unlikely to report where the culture does not enable or encourage this—for example, where staff feel that they may be labelled 'difficult' or 'hysterical', their concerns may be minimised by management, or they may experience reprisals. In Section 4, we make a series of recommendations aimed at creating a child safe culture in youth detention. We also consider that there are opportunities to encourage and empower staff in youth detention to report concerning conduct on the part of their colleagues. These are discussed in Section 10.3.1.

10.2.8 Planned reforms

The Keeping Kids Safe Plan, released in October 2022, indicated that the Department was '[d]eveloping and implementing a robust internal complaint system (for both children and young people and staff)' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1494]

In February 2023, Secretary Bullard advised us that the Department had begun a 'complaints management review project' with a view to aligning its approach with other government agencies such as the Department of Health.[1495] The Department for Education, Children and Young People's Project Initiation Plan – Complaints Management Review states that a review of complaints functions has occurred in the Children and Families and the Education portfolios, but has yet to be undertaken for 'functions within Youth Justice'.[1496]

We also note that the Department's Safeguarding Framework describes broadly how the Department will implement Standard 6 of the Child Safe Standards—'Processes to respond to complaints and concerns are child-focused'—including ways for people and children to report concerns, for providing trauma-informed support following disclosure, for record keeping and for transparent communication.[1497] However, it is not clear how this will be applied to children and young people in detention.

10.3 Improving complaints processes

The Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report found that, for children and young people to feel able to raise a concern or disclose abuse or mistreatment, they needed:

- to know what complaints processes were in place and how to access them[1498]
- to have at least one trusted adult they could turn to[1499]
- to have confidence that they would be believed[1500]
- to know that adults and organisations would take their concerns seriously and respond quickly and effectively, so things would change for the better[1501]
- to know they would be protected from any consequences or repercussions.[1502]

As noted in Section 11.4, we recommend establishing an independent community visitor scheme for children and young people in detention. This would give each child and young person a trusted adult to speak to regularly and frequently, who would be independent of the Department and would have the power to advocate on the child or young person's behalf. The other features identified by children and young people in the Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report are addressed in the following discussion.

10.3.1 Encouraging complaints and critical feedback

The Department needs to take active steps to create a culture in which complaints and critical feedback are encouraged. This is essential to overcome children's and young people's mistrust of and lack of confidence in complaints processes and the dominant culture of not 'dobbing'.

It is important to ensure children and young people in detention understand the complaints process and feel safe making a complaint. This requires them to know what to expect when making a complaint, what steps the Department or the facility will take in response to a complaint and how complainants will be protected against repercussions.

As outlined in Section 10.2.6, there are several structural barriers to children and young people in detention making complaints, including low literacy levels and a heavy reliance on information provided to children and young people during admission. The Department should ensure its complaints processes address these barriers.

In our view, children and young people in detention should be regularly, actively reminded about feedback and complaints processes throughout their time in detention, using a variety of developmentally appropriate mechanisms. These could include visual materials displayed in every unit and regular information sessions on how to make a complaint. Implementation of the independent community visitor scheme recommended in Section 11.4 will also provide a regular reminder to children of their right to make a complaint.

Children and young people also need to be empowered and feel confident to make complaints. We acknowledge that such confidence may only develop once children and young people begin to use the complaints process and see quick, decisive, effective action taken in response to their complaints, without negative repercussions for them. Building this confidence may take time.

Nevertheless, as Mr Morrissey stated, it is important as part of a therapeutic environment to give children and young people the 'skills and permission to have a voice'.[1503] In Section 4.6, we make recommendations aimed at promoting the voices of children and young people in detention and empowering them to have input into detention centre operations and processes. In particular, we recommend that the Department reviews and strengthens the Ashley Youth Detention Centre Resident Advisory Group.

The families and guardians of children and young people in detention also need to be made aware of, and have confidence in, departmental complaints processes. In the Australian Capital Territory, the complaints management policy for responding to a complaint about youth detention is publicly available.[1504] We recommend that the Department develops and publishes a guide to making a complaint about youth detention, so anyone with a concern about a child or young person in detention has an easily accessible complaint pathway.

Staff in detention facilities also need to be encouraged to report concerns about their colleagues, make complaints and provide feedback without fear of reprisal. In Chapter 15, we discuss programs used in the health sector to improve organisational culture and encourage staff to speak up if they observe concerning actions or behaviour—in particular, the 'Speaking up for Safety' program, which is being implemented at Royal Hobart Hospital.[1505]

In Chapter 15, we also discuss the Ethos Program, which is a peer-based early intervention program designed to recognise staff who demonstrate positive behaviours, remove barriers from speaking up about concerns that affect patient or staff safety, and allow for a quick, fair and transparent response to all staff, including those making a complaint and those with concerning behaviours.[1506] Under the Ethos Program:

- staff are trained on how to 'speak up' effectively and can use an online messaging system to submit feedback for recognition (to acknowledge positive behaviour) or reflection (to offer feedback for improvement)[1507]
- feedback is delivered by a trained 'Ethos Messenger', who is generally a peer of the staff member, via an informal conversation[1508]
- trained staff triage reports received through the Ethos messaging system across four levels, depending on the seriousness of the incident.[1509]

In Chapter 15, we recommend that the Department of Health considers integrating features of the Ethos Program into its cultural improvement program (Recommendation 15.4). A similar reporting system that applies to all staff could also be a valuable initiative for creating a culture that enables the giving and receiving of feedback in youth detention.

10.3.2 Responding to complaints—the role of the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate and the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit

In Chapter 6, we recommend establishing a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate to receive, assess, investigate, coordinate and oversee the Department's responses to allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct (including grooming and professional boundary breaches), and other harms to children and young people by staff (Recommendation 6.6).

The Child-Related Incident Management Directorate would have three functions:

- an incident report management function, which would be responsible for assisting child-facing services in the Department (such as Ashley Youth Detention Centre) with managing incidents or allegations against staff, including being the point of contact for these services—this function should be responsible for ensuring the relevant government institution takes appropriate actions in relation to matters referred to the Directorate
- an investigations function, comprising appropriately trained and skilled investigators who would undertake preliminary assessments, investigate incidents of alleged misconduct (including allegations of child sexual abuse) and prepare reports for misconduct adjudicators to consider
- a misconduct disciplinary advice function that involves misconduct adjudicators examining reports prepared by investigators on incidents of alleged misconduct, assessing whether misconduct has been established and, where there may have been a breach of departmental policies, preparing a report recommending a course of action for the Secretary.

The recommended approach is based on the South Australian Department for Education's system for responding to and investigating complaints of child sexual abuse.[1510] In our view, the South Australian model embodies many of the features that the National Royal Commission recognised as being instrumental to an institution's ability to respond to concerns or complaints of child sexual abuse in a way that is sensitive and child-focused. These include:

- investigations being conducted by impartial, objective, trained investigators[1511]
- children being interviewed by people with relevant specialist skills (for example, knowledge of child development, trauma-related behaviours, indicators of abuse and investigative techniques)[1512]
- responding to complainants in a sensitive, supportive and protective way and ensuring affected parties (including the subject of the complaint) have access to support, therapeutic treatment services and advocacy.[1513]

The Child-Related Incident Management Directorate would be responsible for leading the response to allegations of child sexual abuse by staff across all portfolios of the Department, namely education, out of home care and youth justice.

In relation to youth detention, we recommend the following:

- All concerns and complaints involving allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct (including grooming and boundary breaches) or other harms to children (including the inappropriate use of force, isolation or searches) by staff should be referred immediately to the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate.

- The incident report management function of the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should be responsible for ensuring detention centre management communicates appropriately with children and young people affected by an allegation against a staff member, as well as their parents or carers.
- The incident report management function and the investigations function of the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should be performed by staff with knowledge and understanding of the youth justice system, and an understanding of the characteristics of abuse and mistreatment of children and young people in detention. This is particularly important in view of the widespread and systematic abuse experienced by some children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, as illustrated in Chapter 11, Case study 1.

In the case of concerns or complaints about harmful sexual behaviours, in Chapter 9 we recommend that the Department establishes a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28) in the new Office of the Chief Practitioner (Recommendation 9.17). We recommend that this unit supports all child-facing services in the Department, including youth justice services, to manage harmful sexual behaviours through the provision of advice, guidance and support. The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit should work closely with the new Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to ensure systemic risks, practice issues and opportunities for improvement are identified.

In Section 8.5 of this chapter, we recommend (in Recommendation 12.30) that:

- the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit develops detailed policies, protocols and guidelines to support best practice responses to harmful sexual behaviours displayed in youth detention or other residential youth justice facilities
- all complaints about harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention or other residential youth justice facilities be reported to the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit and to the new Commission for Children and Young People.

The question then arises as to whether other, non-serious concerns and complaints about youth detention should also be automatically escalated within the Department. We note that in the Australian Capital Territory, the complaints management policy for children and young people in detention aims to 'resolve complaints quickly and effectively and at the lowest level of formality possible', stating that:

> In many cases, concerns and complaints can be resolved quickly and effectively through informal communication with young people, their family members or significant others. In some cases a young person may simply want to have the reasons for a decision clearly explained to them, or may want an opportunity to have their views and concerns listened to and taken seriously.[1514]

Alison Grace, Deputy Centre Manager, Bimberi Youth Justice Centre, in the Australian Capital Territory, told us that '[a]s much as possible young people are encouraged to speak with their supervising Youth Worker, Team Leader and/or Unit Manager to address their concerns'.[1515]

The Australian Capital Territory's complaints management policy places clear obligations on staff to 'take the time to stop, listen and respond' to any concerns raised by children and young people in a supportive and consistent manner because this may 'reduce the need for complainants to escalate their concerns into formal complaints'.[1516] However, the policy also states that '[u]nder no circumstances should staff try to talk a child or young person out of making a complaint'.[1517] If the child or young person wants to make a complaint, staff should help them to do so.[1518] Unit Managers will typically investigate complaints, but serious matters must be escalated to the Manager and the Director, Child and Youth Protection Services Operations.[1519]

We are mindful of the voices of victim-survivors who spoke of feeling there was no point in making a complaint to Ashley Youth Detention Centre because they felt they would not be believed or would suffer reprisals. We note that most of the matters about which victim-survivors remained silent would constitute serious complaints that would be escalated to the new Child-Related Incident Management Directorate under our recommended complaints-handling system.

We are also mindful that it may be impractical and not in a child's or young person's best interests for all minor concerns or complaints about youth detention to be escalated within the Department for investigation; for example, it may delay resolving the complaint. On this basis, we recommend that the primary responsibility for responding to non-serious concerns and complaints remains with management and staff of the detention facility.

10.3.3 Other recommended improvements to complaints processes

The Complaints Procedure and Complaints Practice Advice should be updated to reflect the changes recommended in Sections 10.3.1 and 10.3.2 and to:

- demonstrate the ways in which specific barriers to making complaints in detention settings have been addressed
- clearly define child sexual abuse and related conduct, including sexual misconduct, (consistent with the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act—discussed in Chapter 18), grooming and boundary breaches
- set timeframes for responding to complaints
- specify any voluntary or mandatory reporting obligations
- specify requirements for communicating with and providing support to complainants and other affected people

- include procedures for formalising complaints received verbally, via email or other means where it is clear that the intent of the person is to make a complaint
- clarify requirements for recording complaints and investigation outcomes
- ensure complaints processes apply to any new detention facility designed to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre, as well as other residential youth justice facilities, including the proposed assisted bail facilities and supported residential facilities (discussed in Sections 5.4.5 and 6.8.2 respectively).

The role of detention centre staff in complaints processes should be to respond supportively and proactively to concerns raised by children and young people, explain complaints processes to them and support them to make a complaint. They should understand which concerns and complaints must be referred immediately to the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, and their mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations.

Staff receiving a complaint need to consider the intent of the person raising the issue—if it is clear they are making a complaint or reporting a serious incident, it needs to be treated as such, regardless of whether it is raised verbally, via email or using another mechanism, and regardless of whether it is made using the right form.

In Section 4.7.3, we recommend that professional development for staff includes training on all departmental policies and procedures (Recommendation 12.9). This should include training on complaints processes. In Section 4.8, we recommend that the Department develops a professional conduct policy that sets out the standards of behaviour expected of those who work in youth detention and other youth justice facilities, including contractors and volunteers (Recommendation 12.10).

Recommendation 12.35

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. update its complaints procedure and practice advice for youth detention to

   i. address structural barriers to making complaints in detention and include developmentally appropriate communication methods at all stages

   ii. require concerns, regardless of the form in which they are raised, to be recognised, recorded and actioned as a complaint where the person raising the concern wants to make a complaint

   iii. define child sexual abuse (including sexual misconduct, grooming and harmful sexual behaviours) and boundary breaches

iv. require all complaints and concerns involving allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct or other harms to children (including the inappropriate use of force, isolation or searches) by staff, breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct or the professional conduct policy for youth detention (Recommendation 12.10) and reportable conduct as defined by the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 to be referred immediately to the new Child-Related Incident Management Directorate for response (Recommendation 6.6)

v. require all incidents involving harmful sexual behaviours to be reported to the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28)

vi. clearly specify mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations for staff in relation to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023

vii. set timeframes for responding to complaints

viii. specify requirements for communicating with and providing support to complainants and other affected parties, including parents or carers of affected children and young people

ix. clarify the requirements for recording complaints and outcomes of complaint investigations to enable the monitoring of trends for quality, safety and governance purposes

x. include procedures for making and responding to complaints in relation to other residential youth justice facilities, including the proposed assisted bail and supported residential facilities

b. ensure staff in detention and other residential youth justice facilities understand and comply with their role in responding to complaints, including complaints about child sexual abuse, and have a clear process for raising safety concerns about other staff

c. use a range of child-friendly tools to ensure children and young people in detention and other residential youth justice facilities are aware of complaints processes and understand the steps facility staff and the Department will take in response to a complaint, including a complaint about child sexual abuse

d. ensure a child-friendly guide to making a complaint and explaining complaints procedures, including the circumstances under which complaints made to oversight bodies may be referred to the Department, is readily accessible on the Department's website, as well as a guide for adults wishing to make a complaint on behalf of a child in detention or another residential youth justice facility

e. ensure there are staff in the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate with expertise in youth justice, including an understanding of the risks of child sexual abuse in detention and the characteristics of mistreatment and abuse in detention environments.

11 Independent oversight of youth detention

Independent external oversight is a vital component of safeguarding children and young people held in a closed facility such as Ashley Youth Detention Centre, where contact with people outside the facility is heavily controlled, regulated and limited.

To help identify and minimise the risks of child sexual abuse, children and young people in detention must have access to regular visits from the staff of an independent oversight body who have the interpersonal skills, cultural competency and professional background to build rapport and trust with them.[1520]

Children must also be empowered to engage with and participate in complaints and monitoring mechanisms while in detention.[1521] They should feel confident to raise concerns with an oversight body and to make a formal complaint where necessary. This requires oversight bodies to be reliable, trustworthy and adequately resourced, and to communicate effectively with each other so children and young people in detention get useful responses to complaints, without negative repercussions.[1522]

Youth detention oversight bodies must also be proactive, particularly where children and young people may be reluctant to raise concerns or make complaints.[1523] According to Stephen Kinmond OAM, former New South Wales Deputy Ombudsman (Human Services) and current New South Wales Children's Guardian with responsibility for overseeing reportable conduct:

> … if a particular agency or sector has demonstrated low reporting rates, it is important for the oversight body to take timely action. Indeed, for the [New South Wales reportable conduct scheme], the Ombudsman's ability to undertake auditing activities was a critical function in assisting an agency to improve its systems and practices for providing safe environments for children in its care.[1524]

As the National Royal Commission noted, oversight bodies such as inspectors of custodial services, visitor schemes, children's commissioners and guardians, and ombudsman offices can mitigate the heightened risks of child sexual abuse associated with a secure, locked youth detention facility and ensure greater transparency and accountability.[1525]

The National Royal Commission recommended that:

> State and territory governments should ensure they have an independent oversight body with the appropriate visitation, complaint handling and reporting powers to provide oversight of youth detention. This could include an appropriately funded and independent Inspector of Custodial Services or similar body. New and existing bodies should have expertise in child-trauma, and the prevention and identification of child sexual abuse.[1526]

As mentioned in Section 10, the National Royal Commission also recommended that state and territory governments review existing external complaints-handling systems concerning youth detention centres to ensure they are capable of effectively dealing with complaints of child sexual abuse, so:

- children can easily access child-appropriate information about external oversight
- children have confidential and unrestricted access to external oversight bodies
- staff involved in managing complaints internally and externally include Aboriginal people and professionals qualified to give trauma-informed care
- complaints-handling systems are accessible for children with literacy difficulties or who speak English as a second language
- children are regularly consulted about the effectiveness of complaints-handling systems and systems are continually improved.[1527]

The Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report confirmed the importance of all children and young people in detention having access to external advocates who could proactively seek their views and respond when they had safety concerns.[1528] However, as outlined in Section 10.1 and described in Section 11.2, some victim-survivors who were or had been in detention told us that they did not know who to contact to make a complaint, they did not feel safe making a complaint and, when they did complain, there was no action or response.

As noted, it is essential for children and young people in detention to feel safe to disclose sexual abuse or other mistreatment to an independent oversight body. However, it is not enough for an oversight body to rely solely on disclosures or complaints from children and young people in detention for the proper performance of its functions. An effective oversight body in the youth detention context is one that understands that youth detention exposes children and young people to a higher risk of sexual abuse and is cautious if there are low rates of complaints.[1529]

We note that the youth justice reforms outlined in the Keeping Kids Safe Plan, Draft Youth Justice Blueprint and Draft First Action Plan do not indicate any intention to reform current youth justice oversight mechanisms.[1530]

In this section, we recommend:

- establishing an independent community visitor scheme for children and young people in detention, to give them an independent, trusted adult to whom they can speak regularly, with whom they can safely and confidently raise concerns, and who will advocate on their behalf
- improving the Ombudsman's processes for handling complaints containing allegations of sexual abuse involving children and young people in detention
- strengthening and improving systemic monitoring of Tasmania's youth detention facilities.

11.1 Tasmania's system of oversight for youth detention

Several bodies in Tasmania are responsible for independently monitoring the safety and wellbeing of children and young people in youth detention. Collectively, the Commissioner for Children and Young People, Ombudsman and Custodial Inspector provide independent, external oversight for children and young people held in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1531] Their roles are described in the following sections.

Also, in February 2022, the Tasmanian Government announced that it had appointed Richard Connock as a Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism following the enactment of the OPCAT Implementation Act 2021 in November 2021.[1532] Mr Connock is also the Ombudsman, Custodial Inspector, Tasmanian Health Complaints Commissioner, Energy Ombudsman and de facto Information and Privacy Commissioner.[1533] The National Preventive Mechanism, established in line with OPCAT, is an independent body tasked with preventing torture. Its key function is:

> … to regularly examine the treatment of persons deprived of their liberty in places of detention with a view to strengthening, if necessary, their protection against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[1534]

The role does not investigate complaints.[1535] The Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism is discussed in Section 11.7.

In this section, we discuss oversight functions exercised over individual children and young people in youth detention and the youth detention system itself. For individuals, we distinguish between advocacy on behalf of an individual child—including visiting a child in detention, helping them to raise any concerns about their experience in detention and seeking resolution of those concerns—and the formal investigation of a complaint about detention made by a child or young person.

As discussed in Chapter 18, the current oversight arrangements for institutions responsible for children and young people are complex and fragmented. This is true of youth detention. Table 12.1 summarises the functions of the Commissioner for Children and Young People, the Ombudsman and the Custodial Inspector in respect of youth detention. These functions are then discussed in the following sections.

Table 12.1: Overview of current youth detention oversight system

11.1.1 Commissioner for Children and Young People

The Commissioner for Children and Young People is an independent statutory officer appointed by the Governor on the advice of the Minister for Education, Children and Youth under the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016 ('Commissioner for Children and Young People Act').[1536] As mentioned earlier, the Commissioner for Children and Young People is Leanne McLean, who was appointed in November 2018.[1537]

The general functions of the Commissioner for Children and Young People are described in Chapter 18. These functions are broad and include advocating for all children and young people, as well as promoting, monitoring and reviewing the wellbeing of children and young people in Tasmania.[1538]

The statutory functions of the Commissioner for Children and Young People do not specifically refer to monitoring the wellbeing of children and young people in youth detention or monitoring the operation of the youth justice system more broadly. However, the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act specifies that it must be administered in line with several principles, including that the interests and needs of 'vulnerable' children and young people—defined to include detainees and former detainees—should be given special regard and serious consideration.[1539]

The Act also requires the Commissioner for Children and Young People to act 'as advocate for a detainee under the Youth Justice Act 1997'.[1540] This entails:

a. listening to, and giving voice to, the concerns and grievances of the detainee and facilitating the resolution of those concerns and grievances

b. seeking information about, and facilitating access by the detainee to, support services appropriate to the needs of the detainee

c. assessing whether the detainee has been provided with adequate information about his or her rights

d. assessing, in the Commissioner's opinion, the physical and emotional wellbeing of the detainee.[1541]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People is a 'prescribed officer' for the purposes of section 135A of the Youth Justice Act.[1542] This entitles the Commissioner to access, at any reasonable time, any detention centre for the purposes of performing functions under the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act, and to visit any detainee at a centre for the purposes of performing functions under the Youth Justice Act in relation to the detainee.[1543] The detention centre staff and manager must allow the Commissioner for Children and Young People to conduct an interview with a detainee 'out of the hearing of any other person' and must not, without the approval of the detainee, open, copy, remove or read any correspondence between the detainee and the Commissioner.[1544]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People does not have the power to investigate or review decisions made about individuals. An exception applies where the Minister for Education, Children and Youth requests that the Commissioner investigates or reviews a decision or recommendation made, or an act or omission, under any Act.[1545] In these circumstances, the Commissioner can undertake an investigation or review that is outside of their general jurisdiction.[1546] Commissioner McLean told us that she had not been asked to undertake such an investigation during her term as Commissioner for Children and Young People.[1547]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People can: provide a child, or the child's family, with information about relevant government and non-government programs or services; refer a child to such programs or services; or investigate or otherwise deal with any matter affecting the wellbeing of children generally when it is raised through a matter relating to a specific child.[1548] This general power in relation to all children applies equally to children in detention. The Commissioner for Children and Young People can also refer any matter to the Ombudsman or Custodial Inspector if the Commissioner considers it appropriate.[1549]

Commissioner McLean indicated that she visits Ashley Youth Detention Centre every three weeks and that during 2020–21 she visited 15 times.[1550] She said she meets with children and young people in a quiet space if they request this, and with or without a youth worker present.[1551] She also advised that she participates in programs, visits young people in their units and can move through the Centre unaccompanied.[1552]

Commissioner McLean explained that she can assist children and young people to make a complaint to relevant authorities, which most commonly involves raising a complaint directly with Ashley Youth Detention Centre management, the Secretary of the Department, the Ombudsman or Tasmania Police.[1553]

In February 2022, an Advocate for Young People in Detention was appointed to assist Commissioner McLean to perform her youth detainee advocacy functions and meet the demand for help with making a complaint:[1554]

> … we now have a full-time advocate for young people in detention who lives in the North West of the state, who's present on site very regularly and has a mobile phone whose number is available to all detainees from admission. So, since the instigation of that additional resource we have seen a dramatic increase in the call on our advocacy and also an increase in the call upon us to facilitate a complaint.[1555]

However, despite her regular visits to Ashley Youth Detention Centre, Commissioner McLean told us that, as at 12 April 2022, no child or young person detained there had raised with her allegations of child sexual abuse perpetrated by staff.[1556]

In her statement to our Commission of Inquiry, Commissioner McLean identified four instances where she had been made aware (from a source other than a child) of child sexual abuse allegations involving children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1557] These instances largely related to potential harmful sexual behaviours displayed by young people or historical allegations of abuse.[1558] Commissioner McLean told us that she generally responded by referring the matters to other relevant authorities, discussing issues with the (former) Department of Communities, monitoring progress and outcomes of any reviews and, in one case, providing advocacy for a young person.[1559]

We acknowledge that the Commissioner for Children and Young People currently has no statutory power to investigate such incidents on her own motion, or to investigate departmental responses to such allegations. Nevertheless, the handling of these incidents highlights the limitations of, and weaknesses in, Tasmania's current system of oversight of youth detention, where the Commissioner for Children and Young People is reliant on the assurances of the Department and lacks the power to inquire into the accuracy of those assurances.

We note that if these or similar incidents occurred in future, those involving allegations against staff would be subject to the Reportable Conduct Scheme under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act (discussed in Chapter 18). Under this scheme, an allegation that a 'worker' at Ashley Youth Detention Centre engaged in 'reportable conduct' (such as sexual offences, sexual misconduct or grooming) against a child or young person in detention would need to be notified to the Independent Regulator and investigated by the head of the detention facility (as the 'relevant entity').[1560] This is the Secretary of the Department, or their delegate.

Under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme would be responsible for monitoring the investigation. It would receive: a copy of investigation findings, with reasons for the findings; details of any disciplinary or other action taken by management against the worker; and, where no action was proposed, the reasons for this decision.[1561] The Independent Regulator would also have the power to investigate an allegation of reportable conduct on the Independent Regulator's own motion, if it considered that this was in the public interest.[1562]

We strongly support the introduction of a reportable conduct scheme in Tasmania. In Chapter 18, we recommend establishing a new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6), which should assume the functions of the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme. We discuss the new Commission for Children and Young People in Section 11.3.

We note that concerns about children and young people in detention who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours against other children and young people in detention would not be subject to the Reportable Conduct Scheme because that scheme does not extend beyond reportable conduct by a 'worker' (defined as a person aged 18 years or older). In Section 8.5, we recommend that the Department be required to notify the new Commission for Children and Young People of incidents involving harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention, so the Commission has a complete picture of what is occurring in youth detention (Recommendation 12.30).

As discussed in Chapter 18, despite the statutory requirement that the Commissioner for Children and Young People acts 'independently, impartially and in the public interest', we heard evidence that cast doubt on the operational independence of the role.[1563] In particular, former Commissioner for Children and Young People Mark Morrissey recounted several experiences where he felt the independence of his office had been undermined by the Government (these are described in Chapter 18). Mr Morrissey referred to:

> … an apparent attempt to undermine the raison d'etre of the [Commissioner for Children and Young People]—namely as an independent voice legitimately advocating for children and young people, particularly vulnerable and at-risk children.[1564]

Mr Morrissey said that, following these experiences, he found it increasingly difficult to have his message accepted about child protection reform work and decided to retire.[1565] He also indicated that his two predecessors had not continued in their roles for the full intended duration of their appointments, but did not specify or speculate as to why.[1566]

As discussed in Chapter 18, lack of control over resourcing can also impede the independence of an oversight body. Commissioner McLean noted that, in contrast to the Ombudsman, who has control of his own budget and has a separate appropriation, the budget for the Commissioner for Children and Young People is an output item from the (former) Department of Communities budget.[1567] Commissioner McLean also told us that resourcing for her office 'has remained a constant challenge' and resourcing constraints have limited her ability to fulfil her functions.[1568] The funding allocated to the Commissioner for Children and Young People was $1,386,000 in 2021–22.[1569] In Chapter 18, we discuss independent resourcing of the new Commission for Children and Young People.

11.1.2 Ombudsman

The Ombudsman is an independent statutory officer appointed under the Ombudsman Act 1978.[1570] The Ombudsman has a role both in relation to individuals and the youth detention system (refer to Table 12.1). As noted, the position is currently held by Richard Connock.[1571]

The primary role of the Ombudsman is to investigate the administrative actions of public authorities to ensure they are lawful, reasonable and fair.[1572] The Ombudsman may receive complaints from people who are aggrieved by the administrative actions of public authorities if they have not been successful in resolving their complaint directly with the authority.[1573] This includes complaints from children and young people in detention about their treatment in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1574]

Under the Youth Justice Act, a child or young person detained at a youth detention centre is entitled to complain to the Ombudsman about the standard of care, accommodation or treatment they are receiving in the detention centre.[1575] Where a child or young person in detention wants to make a complaint to the Ombudsman, staff of the detention centre must take all steps necessary to facilitate the complaint and must send the Ombudsman an unopened, sealed envelope containing the complaint.[1576]

The Ombudsman's 2021–22 annual report indicates that most complaints across all public authorities are resolved by way of 'preliminary inquiries'—this involves a 'co-operative approach' where authorities provide information and work with the Ombudsman to address complaints and improve processes.[1577] However, where appropriate, the Ombudsman may conduct an investigation on the basis of a complaint or on the Ombudsman's own motion.[1578] Following an investigation, a report is prepared for the public authority and this may contain recommendations to remedy actions.[1579] The report may also be provided to the relevant Minister and to Parliament.[1580] The Ombudsman does not have the power to compel a public authority to adopt any recommendations, although these 'are ordinarily accepted and acted upon'.[1581]

The Ombudsman advised us that his office receives 'very few, if any' complaints about child sexual abuse.[1582] The Ombudsman's most recent annual report indicates that the Ombudsman received two complaints about Ashley Youth Detention Centre in 2021–22, up from one complaint in 2020–21.[1583] The annual report provides no more information on the nature of these complaints.

Case studies 1 and 7 in Chapter 11 examine the former Ombudsman's response to a complaint made by Erin (a pseudonym) in 2012 about the sexually inappropriate behaviour of a male youth worker at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. The then Ombudsman referred the allegations to Ashley Youth Detention Centre management and finalised the complaint.[1584]

We are aware of other complaints about the behaviour of staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre that the then Ombudsman classified as 'minor' and referred in error to Centre management for internal review between 2009 and 2013.[1585] In our view, the allegations in these complaints were not minor in nature. In Chapter 11, Case study 7, we observe that this historical arrangement between the Office of the Ombudsman and the Department, at least on occasion, resulted in serious matters being erroneously referred back to the Centre in and around 2012. In that case study, we also express our concern about the integrity of the processes which were in place in the Office of the Ombudsman at the time to ensure inappropriate referrals were not made.

The current Ombudsman advised us that this arrangement is no longer in place.[1586] Mr Connock said that the Ombudsman's Office now conducts preliminary enquiries for 'any complaint' it receives.[1587] We have not been advised about how this process has been formalised.

We also understand that Ashley Youth Detention Centre management has, in the past, advised staff that they should not have direct contact with the Offices of the Ombudsman or Custodial Inspector, and that all enquiries from those offices must be escalated to senior management.[1588]

11.1.3 The Custodial Inspector

The Office of the Custodial Inspector was established by the Custodial Inspector Act 2016 ('Custodial Inspector Act') and commenced operation in November 2016.[1589] The purpose of the office is to 'provide independent, proactive, preventive and systemic oversight of custodial centres', including Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1590] The Custodial Inspector must act independently, impartially and in the public interest.[1591]

As noted, the current Custodial Inspector is Mr Connock, who also holds several other appointments.[1592]

The Custodial Inspector's functions include:

- preparing and publishing guidelines and standards for conducting inspections[1593]
- carrying out a mandatory inspection of each custodial centre against all inspection standards at least once every three years, and any occasional inspections of the Custodial Inspector's own accord or as requested by the Minister for Corrections and Rehabilitation[1594]
- reporting to the Minister or Parliament on the inspections, and any particular issue or general matter relating to the functions of the Custodial Inspector, if it is in the public interest to do so, or if requested by either House of Parliament or a Committee of either House of Parliament[1595]
- providing an annual report to Parliament[1596]
- providing advice or making recommendations that the Custodial Inspector thinks appropriate, including advice or recommendations relating to the safety, custody, care, wellbeing and rehabilitation of prisoners and detainees.[1597]

The Custodial Inspector has published Inspection Standards for Youth Custodial Centres in Tasmania, comprising standards under nine themes: governance and procedural fairness; informed advice; service delivery; family and community; partnerships; infrastructure; workforce; security; and health and wellbeing.[1598]

The Custodial Inspector does not respond to individual complaints.[1599] However, if the Custodial Inspector considers that a matter raised by, or during, a mandatory or occasional inspection should be investigated, the Custodial Inspector may refer the matter to the Ombudsman or any other such person or body for investigation.[1600]

The Custodial Inspector is also entitled to visit or speak to a detainee at all reasonable times.[1601] The person in charge of a custodial centre, each member of staff of the custodial centre and any person providing services in a custodial centre must allow the Custodial Inspector (like the Commissioner for Children and Young People) to conduct an interview with a detainee out of the hearing of any other person, and must not, without approval of the detainee, copy, remove or read any correspondence between the detainee and the Custodial Inspector.[1602] These requirements are reflected in the Youth Justice Act.[1603]

The Custodial Inspector's 2020–21 annual report indicated that the Custodial Inspector held 'few concerns about the operations at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre]'.[1604]

Mr Connock told us that his many other responsibilities limited his ability to visit Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1605] Mr Connock also indicated that the Office of the Custodial Inspector was 'not well enough resourced to do a full omnibus inspection most of the time', so it undertook themed inspections instead.[1606] The permanent staffing of the Office of the Custodial Inspector is the Inspector, one Principal Inspection Officer, one Senior Inspection Officer and one Administration and Research Officer.[1607] Given the other demands on his time, the current Custodial Inspector has formally delegated all of his functions and powers under the Custodial Inspector Act to his staff.[1608]

In the Custodial Inspector's 2021–22 annual report, the Custodial Inspector noted that, despite receiving extra funding for the Administration and Research Officer position, the Inspectorate's resources were 'still limited'.[1609] He noted that, due to the departure of two staff members in late 2021 and difficulties in recruiting staff, there was a backlog of inspections.[1610] He also indicated that the Inspectorate was unlikely to meet its three-year legislative timeframe for inspecting all custodial centres against all standards.[1611]

The Custodial Inspector has prepared eight reports into Ashley Youth Detention Centre, covering the themes of health and wellbeing; education and programs; custody; families, communities and partnerships; equal opportunity; food and nutrition; resources and systems; and environmental health and hygiene.[1612] These reports were published between October 2018 and February 2022. They relate to inspections undertaken between May 2017 and February 2021.

There is only one reference to child sexual abuse in the Custodial Inspector's reports on Ashley Youth Detention Centre—in the 2019 Custody Inspection Report.[1613] That report referred to the National Royal Commission's recommendation that state and territory governments review legislation, policies and procedures to ensure best practice for personal searches. The Custodial Inspector's report recommended that the (former) Department of Communities consider 'best practice processes for conducting personal searches of young people including providing clear information, including illustrations, about how the search will be performed'.[1614] As discussed in Section 9.1.4, the Department updated its procedure for personal searches of children and young people in detention in February 2023.[1615]

In oral evidence, Mr Connock indicated that the standards related to safety, security and health would be particularly important for managing allegations of child sexual abuse.[1616]

The security standards refer to 'the importance of ensuring that the environments in which young people are lawfully detained are safe, secure, and developmentally appropriate'.[1617] They specify (among other matters) that:

- detention centres are to be adequately staffed at all times[1618]
- the use of force, including any form of restraints, should not cause humiliation or degradation and should be used for the shortest possible time (refer to Section 9.3)[1619]

- behaviour management schemes should have incentives to promote effort and good behaviour and use fair sanctions for poor behaviour (these schemes are discussed in Section 6.3)[1620]
- young people should be separated or segregated only in response to an unacceptable risk to themselves or others, and only when all other means of control have been exhausted (isolation is discussed in Section 9.2)[1621]
- young people, staff and visitors should understand that bullying and intimidating behaviour are not acceptable and be aware of the consequences of such behaviour.[1622]

The health and wellbeing standards 'provide guidance to youth justice services about ways that optimise the health and wellbeing of young people'.[1623] They state that young people in custody should have their health needs addressed by appropriate health and ancillary services, and they should have a minimum of 10 hours out of their rooms each day.[1624]

We agree that these standards are relevant to ensuring an environment that protects children and young people from the risks of child sexual abuse. However, we consider that other standards are also relevant to minimising the risks of child sexual abuse in youth detention, such as the service delivery standard, which states that 'young people in detention centres have the right to be safe and free from abuse'.[1625]

In oral evidence, Mr Connock told us that his office received 'all sorts of internal documentation now' about Ashley Youth Detention Centre, including 'numbers about residents, where they're housed [and] various incidents'.[1626] According to the Tasmanian Government's most recent progress report on implementing the recommendations of the National Royal Commission, Ashley Youth Detention Centre has 'implemented changes to ensure that the Custodial Inspector is notified of all significant incidents' at the Centre.[1627] This is a positive development. However, it is not clear that the Custodial Inspector is resourced well enough to analyse or act on these reports.

Further, while we acknowledge the Custodial Inspector's resourcing constraints, we consider that thematic inspections are less likely to identify abuse or mistreatment of children and young people in detention than full, open-ended inspections that take a broad view of children's safety, health and wellbeing.

Chapter 11, Case study 1 reveals recollections of victim-survivors who said they had been sexually abused at Ashley Youth Detention Centre from the early 2000s to as recently as the early 2020s.[1628] In that case study, we find that, for decades, some children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre experienced systematic harm and abuse. In Chapter 11, Case study 3, we find that the use of isolation as a form of behaviour management, punishment or cruelty and contrary to the Youth Justice Act has been a regular and persistent practice at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since at least the early 2000s, and the conditions that enabled this practice still exist today. While the Custodial Inspector's 2019 Custody Inspection Report commented on the use of isolation, that report did not identify any abusive practices in relation to this issue.[1629]

In oral evidence, Mr Connock conceded he was unaware of the extent of the abusive practices at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and accepted that more needed to be done to empower children and young people experiencing sexual or other abuse to make complaints.[1630]

We acknowledge that, as outlined in Sections 10.1 and 11.2, many children and young people felt it was unsafe to raise concerns with oversight bodies about child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre for fear of reprisals or punishment from staff or other young people in detention. Nevertheless, we consider that a proactive oversight body should understand the risks of child sexual abuse in the institution it is overseeing and not accept the absence of reports of abuse as an indication that abuse is not occurring. Rather, as noted, an effective oversight body should treat low reporting rates in a high-risk institution as grounds for further action and investigation.

11.2 Experiences of children and young people

We heard evidence from children and young people in detention and former detainees that suggests that external oversight of youth detention has not been effective. We acknowledge that some of these experiences predate the creation of the statutory Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Custodial Inspector.

Some children and young people in detention or formerly in detention were unaware that they could ask an external entity for help. For example, Warren (a pseudonym), a victim-survivor who was first admitted to Ashley Youth Detention Centre in the mid-2000s when he was 13 years old, told us:

> I didn't know if there was anyone outside Ashley we could make a complaint to. Now I know I can make a complaint to the Ombudsman but I didn't know that when I was at Ashley.[1631]

We also heard that where young people in detention did make a complaint, they did not receive effective responses from the oversight body in question, or faced negative repercussions from Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff for doing so. Erin, whose experiences we describe in Chapter 11, Case study 1, told us that the complaint she made to the Ombudsman about highly concerning sexual behaviour towards her from a male youth worker in 2012 was referred to the Centre and that the Ombudsman's Office did not contact her again.[1632] Erin said she was not notified of any outcome by the Department or the Ombudsman and said other staff were 'pissed off' at her for speaking up. Subsequently, she felt it was pointless to make a complaint.[1633]

As discussed in Chapter 11, Case study 6, when Counsel Assisting asked Max (a pseudonym), a victim-survivor who was detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, how he was treated by staff after speaking to the Commissioner for Children and Young People in the late 2010s, he said:

> They treated me like shit. They weren't giving me any, like, toasties, they'd only give me drinks when I was allocated drinks. Like, before that they'd give us drinks sort of whenever, like toasties whenever, and then they just started just restricting everything. They tried to do it all by the rules, but like, they were just being real—they were just being real, like, real strict about everything, when they hadn't been like that, then after that they just started doing it.[1634]

When Counsel Assisting asked Max if he felt like he was being punished because he had spoken to the Commissioner for Children and Young People, he replied 'Yeah, yeah, it was obvious what they were doing'.[1635]

We did not ask the Tasmanian Government or the Commissioner for Children and Young People to give extensive evidence to reject or support Max's evidence. However, the Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff member against whom the allegation was made denied the allegation during hearings.[1636]

Children and young people consulted for the Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! report said they were aware that the Commissioner for Children and Young People could help them make complaints.[1637] However, some children and young people reported that they were not always allowed or encouraged to contact independent entities, while others noted that there were repercussions for doing so:[1638]

> That's another thing that Ashley [Youth Detention Centre] hates as well. They put all these posters up and that, but deep down they hate it. If you say, 'I want to call the Commissioner,' they're just like, 'Oh, you're going to do that, are you?' Because most times people do it to complain about a certain staff member. And then that staff member doesn't do shit for you. They say, 'Well, if you call the Commissioner, then I'm not doing shit for you.' They're like, 'I'll give you what I have to, I'll give you your food and that, but only because I have to by law, but I'm not going to sit there and like you. If you do that, you're just a scumbag.' The amount of times I've had that said to me, then like, 'No, I'm only joking'.[1639]

In Section 4, we make recommendations aimed at transforming the culture in youth detention, including ensuring children and young people are aware of their rights, empowering them to speak up and ensuring staff in detention facilities comply with a professional conduct policy that specifies standards of acceptable behaviour. In Section 10.3, we recommend measures to encourage complaints and critical feedback in youth detention from children and young people, and staff.

We also consider that there is scope to strengthen Tasmania's system of external oversight for youth detention.

11.3 A new Commission for Children and Young People

In Chapter 18, we set out our recommendations to establish a new, independent Commission for Children and Young People that would subsume the functions of the current Commissioner for Children and Young People and have additional functions (Recommendation 18.6). These would include regulatory functions under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act in relation to the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

The new Commission for Children and Young People would have three statutory officeholders, each appointed by the Governor for a term not exceeding five years:

- a Commissioner for Children and Young People, who would also be the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act
- a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People (discussed in Chapter 9)
- a Child Advocate (Deputy Commissioner) (discussed in Chapter 9).

To be effective, a youth detention oversight body should have expertise in relation to children and be independent—in its composition, resources, legal status and powers—of the institutions or agencies it is responsible for overseeing.[1640] As discussed in Section 11.1.1, we heard evidence that cast doubt on the ability of the role of Commissioner for Children and Young People to be performed independently and effectively.

To maximise the independence of the new Commission for Children and Young People, we recommend in Chapter 18 that:

- Commissioners for Children and Young People and Deputy Commissioners be appointed following an externally advertised merit-based selection process to ensure they have relevant professional qualifications and substantive experience in matters affecting children (Recommendation 18.7)
- before making a recommendation to the Governor for an appointment to the Commission for Children and Young People, the Minister be required to consult with the leader of any political party that has at least two members in either house of Parliament (Recommendation 18.7)
- the Commission for Children and Young People be separately and directly funded, like the Ombudsman, rather than through the Department for Education, Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.8)
- the performance of the functions of the Commission for Children and Young People be monitored by a joint standing committee of the Tasmanian Parliament (Recommendation 18.9).

The new Commission for Children and Young People would not be a general complaints-handling or investigation body but would have a new individual advocacy function for children in out of home care and youth detention through a new independent community visitor scheme, and functions and powers to monitor the out of home care and youth justice systems (refer to Chapter 9 and the discussion in Sections 11.4 and 11.6 of this chapter).

11.4 Strengthening individual advocacy for children in detention

It is vital that children and young people in youth detention are supported to express any concerns about their treatment and that those concerns are treated confidentially.[1641] It is also essential that such support remains in place until those concerns are resolved. The South Australian Guardian for Children and Young People, Penny Wright, told us that, despite not having a direct complaints-handling function for children in youth detention, her office's most important mechanisms for protecting children in detention against the risk of sexual abuse were regular visits to detention facilities, regular sighting of all children in detention and the opportunity for children to speak to advocates confidentially.[1642]

As noted, the Commissioner for Children and Young People also has an individual advocacy function for children and young people in detention, which involves the Commissioner regularly engaging with children in detention and providing them with an opportunity to speak with advocates confidentially. While we consider that this function could be strengthened, we acknowledge that the performance of the Commissioner's advocacy role has been enhanced since the appointment of a fixed-term dedicated Advocate for Young People in Detention in the office of the Commissioner for Children and Young People (noted in Section 11.1.1).[1643]

We heard evidence about the operation of independent community visitor schemes in Queensland and Victoria.[1644] The Queensland scheme applies to children in out of home care and youth detention, while the Victorian scheme only applies to children in youth detention centres.[1645] We also heard from Ms Wright about her role as Training Centre Visitor.[1646] We were impressed by the capacity of these mechanisms to identify issues of concern to children and young people in detention—including concerns about child sexual abuse—and to effectively advocate on behalf of children and young people in detention for the resolution of their concerns.

In Chapter 9, we recommend that the Tasmanian Government introduces legislation to establish an independent community visitor scheme for children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities, based on the Queensland Community Visitor Program (Recommendation 9.34). The key features of that program, which is administered by the Queensland Public Guardian, are:

- Community visitors are appointed for up to three years by the Public Guardian.[1647] They must have the 'knowledge, experience or skills needed' to perform the functions of the role.[1648] They are not volunteers and are not employees of the public service.[1649]
- Community visitors have a range of statutory functions, including developing a trusting and supportive relationship with each child they visit, advocating on behalf of the child, inspecting detention centres, and ensuring the child's needs are being met.[1650]
- Community visitors must visit children in detention 'regularly'.[1651] One Queensland youth detention centre is visited twice a week, while the remaining two are visited weekly.[1652] A child in detention can also request a visit from a community visitor.[1653]
- Community visitors have various statutory powers, including the power to enter a detention centre without notice, inspect the centre, talk to a child in private and require a staff member to answer questions and produce documents.[1654]

In Chapter 9, we also recommend that the independent community visitor scheme be administered by the new Commission for Children and Young People and led by the new Child Advocate. The Child Advocate should be responsible for appointing community visitors based on their skills, knowledge and expertise, including in the areas of child development, working with vulnerable children and young people, and the experiences and needs of Aboriginal children and young people. The Child Advocate should appoint at least one independent community visitor who is Aboriginal.

In relation to youth detention, we consider that community visitors should be responsible for:

- developing trusting and supportive relationships with children and young people in detention and assisting them to understand their rights
- advocating on behalf of children and young people in detention by listening to, giving voice to and helping to resolve their concerns and grievances
- facilitating access to support services for children and young people in detention
- inquiring into and reporting on the physical and emotional wellbeing of children and young people in detention
- inquiring into whether the needs of children and young people in detention are being met
- conducting exit interviews with children and young people leaving detention.

The independent community visitor scheme should be funded to enable every child and young person in detention to be visited weekly or whenever a child requests a visit. Ideally, a child would be visited by the same visitor each week, to build a relationship of trust. Children and young people in other residential youth justice facilities, such as the proposed assisted bail facilities (discussed in Section 5.4.5) and supported residential facilities (discussed in Section 6.8.2), should also receive regular visits.

Aboriginal children in detention should have access, wherever possible, to an independent community visitor who is Aboriginal. Alternatively, an Aboriginal child or young person in detention may request the involvement or assistance of the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People. Where such a request is made, the Child Advocate should work closely with the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People to arrange this.

We also consider that a child or young person who is transferred from youth detention to adult prison before they turn 18 should continue to receive visits from an independent community visitor until they turn 21. This will ensure continuity of the relationship between the visitor and the child or young person and recognise the increased vulnerability to sexual abuse of children and young people in prison.

Interviews between independent community visitors and young people in detention should be conducted in a safe environment, and out of the hearing and sight of detention centre staff and other young people to ensure privacy and confidentiality.[1655] We heard evidence that, occasionally, the environment at Ashley Youth Detention Centre was not always safe for discussions with oversight bodies. Commissioner McLean told us that, during periods when the Centre was under restrictive practices or lockdowns (discussed in Sections 4.7.2 and 9.2.2), she had to conduct advocacy through the door of children and young people's rooms:

> My understanding today is that we have moved back to restrictive practices, that young people may be cycling in and out of their rooms on an hourly basis … When you visit the facility to speak to young people and advocate for them through a small window hole in the door, it is really awful … I don't think it would meet the safety requirements of the centre for a worker, because they're so thin on the ground, to come off the floor to supervise a young person out of their room to engage with the Commissioner or the Advocate.[1656]

We also heard that phone calls at Ashley Youth Detention Centre are monitored and are within a sight line of a youth worker.[1657] We heard that a phone with prerecorded numbers had been installed at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, but these did not include the numbers of all oversight bodies.[1658]

In 2019, the Custodial Inspector observed that, for a phone call to be made from Ashley Youth Detention Centre, a child or young person needed to ask a staff member to provide a phone, which would then be plugged into a connection point on the wall.[1659]

In some units, such points were available in rooms separate from the common area; however, the Custodial Inspector noted that sound travelled around these rooms and 'little privacy [was] afforded for the young person making the call'.[1660] In other units, the only phone connection point was in the common area, which provided 'no privacy whatsoever'.[1661] The Custodial Inspector recommended that the then Department of Communities consider:

> … options for installing private spaces with appropriate confidential settings in each unit at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] for young people to make professional and personal telephone calls.[1662]

The Tasmanian Government's most recent annual Action Plan in response to the recommendations of the National Royal Commission states that:

> … all children and young people detained at [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] can contact the [Commissioner for Children and Young People] by telephone at any time, in a physical location that offers the detainees increased privacy.[1663]

As noted in Section 6.7.4, in June 2023, the Department informed us that it had 'recently procured mobile phones for young people within Ashley Youth Detention Centre', which would give them 'the ability to make personal and professional calls from the privacy of their bedrooms or the Centre's outside spaces or meeting rooms, outside of school hours'.[1664] The mobile phones were expected to be provided to children and young people in July 2023.[1665] We welcome this initiative because it is essential that children and young people be able to make private phone calls, including to oversight bodies.

In Chapter 9, we recommend that the independent community visitor scheme includes funding for a small number of legally trained child advocacy officers—also appointed by the Child Advocate—to help children and young people in out of home care and youth detention with more complex concerns. These officers could assist children and young people in detention to make a formal complaint to the Ombudsman, where the concern cannot not be resolved informally. The Ombudsman's processes are discussed in Section 11.5.

Recommendation 12.36

The Tasmanian Government, in establishing and resourcing the new independent community visitor scheme (Recommendation 9.34), should ensure:

a. independent community visitors visit children and young people in detention facilities weekly, at a minimum

b. Aboriginal children and young people in detention or other residential youth justice facilities have access, wherever possible, to visits from an Aboriginal independent community visitor or from the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, depending on the child's preference

c. independent community visitors have the necessary statutory powers to perform their functions, including the power to enter the facility, have access to children and young people in the facility and inspect the facility

d. each facility where children and young people are detained or reside has a safe, dedicated space where independent community visitors can meet with children and young people and discuss concerns without being observed or overheard by staff or other children and young people.

11.5 Complaints to the Ombudsman about children's experiences in detention

From 1 January 2024, under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, complaints about child sexual abuse and related matters against staff in youth detention will constitute a 'reportable allegation' and fall within the scope of the Reportable Conduct Scheme. If the Ombudsman's Office received such a complaint, it should be able to share this information with the Independent Regulator of the scheme, so a reportable conduct investigation can be undertaken (refer to Chapter 18 for a discussion of information sharing between oversight bodies).

For complaints about administrative actions or departmental decisions, such as the placement of a child or young person in a particular unit in a detention facility, we consider that the Ombudsman is the appropriate body to continue to receive such complaints, rather than the new Commission for Children and Young People. However, there is scope to improve the Ombudsman's processes.

Currently, a complaint to the Ombudsman must be made by the person who is 'personally aggrieved' by the administrative action, unless that person has died or cannot act for themselves, in which case the complaint may be made by a personal representative suitable to represent them.[1666] We heard from Mr Connock that if a child or young person has the capacity and wants to make a complaint, then 'it should probably come from the young person, but we would treat everything on a case-by-case [basis]'.[1667]

In Chapter 9, we recommend that the new Child Advocate be given the power to make a complaint to the Ombudsman on behalf of a child in out of home care, youth detention or another residential youth justice facility (Recommendation 9.35). In that chapter, we also propose that the Office of the Ombudsman works with the new Commission for Children and Young People to establish an accessible, child-friendly complaints process and develop specialisation among investigators in managing complaints from or involving children in out of home care, youth detention or other residential youth justice facilities.

In Chapter 18, we recommend that the Ombudsman, the Commission for Children and Young People, the Integrity Commission and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme develop a memorandum of understanding relating to the management of reports, complaints and concerns about child sexual abuse (Recommendation 18.15). This memorandum of understanding should provide for permissive information-sharing practices that prioritise the safety of children. We discuss this recommendation in Section 11.8 of this chapter.

In Chapter 18, we also recommend that the Ombudsman, the Commission for Children and Young People, the Integrity Commission and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme work jointly to develop a user-friendly guide for the general public that describes (among other matters):

- how each of these agencies can assist with complaints and concerns about how organisations respond to child sexual abuse
- the process they will adopt to respond to reports, complaints and concerns
- how information provided by a person lodging a report, complaint or concern will be shared and managed
- how agencies are committed to a 'no wrong door' approach to complaints, so people are reassured that all reports, complaints and concerns will receive a response from an agency (Recommendation 18.14).

We also recommend that a child-friendly version of this guide be developed and publicised widely in youth justice, out of home care and health settings and schools. Both guides should be available on the agencies' websites and form part of their child safety community education and engagement activities.

To improve the Ombudsman's internal processes, we recommend that it develops guidelines for its staff on managing complaints involving child sexual abuse in youth detention, other residential youth justice facilities or out of home care.

Recommendation 12.37

The Ombudsman should develop written guidelines for its staff on managing complaints it receives containing allegations of child sexual abuse involving children in youth detention, other residential youth justice facilities or out of home care. Among other matters, these guidelines should include:

a. the definition of child sexual abuse and related conduct, including sexual misconduct, grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and boundary breaches

b. the process for reporting relevant allegations to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023

c. guidance on referring an allegation or complaint to an agency named in the complaint

d. guidance on communicating with child complainants on the referral of their complaints to other entities and the progress of investigations into their complaints

e. processes for sharing information with other oversight bodies regarding the management of complaints (Recommendation 18.15).

11.6 Systemic monitoring of youth detention

The Custodial Inspector is responsible for inspecting and monitoring Tasmania's custodial centres. As such, the Custodial Inspector is not focused solely on youth detention and does not have specialist expertise in children or the youth justice system. To date, the Custodial Inspector has not identified any specific risks of child sexual abuse in Ashley Youth Detention Centre, even though such risks have clearly existed.

Mr Connock, the current Custodial Inspector, holds six other statutory roles and has limited capacity to devote to inspecting Ashley Youth Detention Centre. We received evidence that the Office of the Custodial Inspector is under-resourced.[1668] We are concerned that the current system for monitoring youth detention is ill-equipped to identify or prevent risks of child sexual abuse to children and young people in detention.

In our view, the oversight body responsible for systemic monitoring of youth detention should be child-focused and should specialise in working with children and young people. It should have expertise in child trauma and in preventing and identifying child sexual abuse.[1669] It should be resourced to engage in regular and frequent monitoring of youth detention facilities.

In Victoria, the Commission for Children and Young People has functions in relation to 'vulnerable children and young persons'.[1670] These include children and young people detained in a youth justice centre or a youth residential centre under the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) and children involved in the youth justice system more broadly.[1671] One of these functions is to 'monitor and report to Ministers on the implementation and effectiveness of strategies relating to the safety or wellbeing of vulnerable children and young persons'.[1672]

According to its 2021–22 annual report, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People monitors the safety and wellbeing of children and young people in Victoria's two youth justice centres. It does this by reviewing all serious incidents (such as assaults or self-harm) that occur in those centres, by conducting onsite inspections and by monitoring custodial population data and incident trends. It also tracks the use of isolation, force and restraints.[1673] The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People operates an independent visitor program for children and young people in youth justice centres and conducts exit interviews with children and young people leaving youth justice centres.[1674]

The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People also has specific inquiry powers in relation to children in youth detention. For example, it has a systemic inquiry power that enables it to conduct an inquiry into the provision of youth justice services to vulnerable children if it identifies a persistent or recurring systemic issue in the provision of those services and considers that a review will improve those services.[1675] In 2021, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People published its Our Youth, Our Way inquiry report on the over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in Victoria's youth justice system (discussed in Section 7).[1676] That inquiry was conducted using the Commission for Children and Young People's systemic inquiry power.[1677]

The Victorian Commission for Children and Young People can also conduct an inquiry into the safety and wellbeing of a vulnerable child or group of vulnerable children, where the inquiry relates to the services provided or omitted to be provided to that child or group of children.[1678]

Similarly, the Northern Territory Children's Commissioner has the power to undertake investigations into systemic issues in youth detention under Part 5 of the Children's Commissioner Act 2013 (NT).[1679] In 2021–22, the Children's Commissioner used its own-motion investigation powers to conduct preliminary inquiries into the detention of children under the age of 14 years in the Alice Springs Youth Detention Centre and Don Dale Youth Detention Centre.[1680] The Children's Commissioner also has the power to inquire into the services provided to an individual child in youth detention.[1681]

In Tasmania, Commissioner McLean told us that she is provided with data about children and young people held at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, including the daily roll, minutes of Weekly Review Meetings and monthly reports of incidents, isolation, use of force and searches.[1682] She conceded that her office is constrained in its ability to analyse this data in significant detail due to a lack of resources.[1683] Commissioner McLean also referred to her role in advocating for a therapeutic approach to youth justice and noted that she had observed a strong emphasis on a shift to a therapeutic model since she started in the role.[1684]

We consider that the new Commission for Children and Young People, as an oversight body dedicated exclusively to issues relating to children and young people, should be given functions and powers to monitor the wellbeing of children and young people in detention and the youth justice system more broadly. The Commission for Children and Young People should have expertise in working with vulnerable children and a deep understanding of the many challenges faced by children and young people in detention.

Giving the new Commission for Children and Young People systemic monitoring functions for youth detention would be complemented by the proposed independent community visitor scheme (refer to Recommendation 12.36). Through this scheme, the concerns expressed to visitors by children and young people in detention during regular visits would provide early and valuable insight into any systemic problems arising in youth detention centres.[1685]

This recommendation would also be consistent with our recommendation in Chapter 9 to give the Commission for Children and Young People expanded powers and resources to oversee and monitor the out of home care system. As noted in that chapter and in Section 5.5.3 of this chapter, many children in detention are also involved in the out of home care system—we consider it logical and appropriate for a single oversight body to monitor the experiences of these vulnerable children.

The Commission for Children and Young People should also have the power to enter adult prisons to monitor the safety and wellbeing of children and young people in those facilities. This is essential because of the increased vulnerability of children and young people to sexual abuse in prison.

We acknowledge that implementing these recommendations will require additional resourcing for the new Commission for Children and Young People. However, we consider that this is essential to ensure that a body with the necessary specialisation and expertise is responsible for systemic monitoring of youth detention.

Systemic monitoring by the Commission for Children and Young People should replace the inspection and monitoring of youth detention centres currently undertaken by the Custodial Inspector. However, the Tasmanian Government should consider whether the Commission for Children and Young People should assume responsibility for maintaining and reviewing the Inspection Standards for Youth Custodial Centres in Tasmania or whether they should remain the responsibility of the Custodial Inspector, given the Custodial Inspector will continue to be responsible for the standards for adult custodial facilities. If the Custodial Inspector retains responsibility for the youth detention standards, the Office of the Custodial Inspector should liaise with the new Commission for Children and Young People in updating and maintaining the standards.

Recommendation 12.38

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6):

a. has functions and powers to monitor the operation of youth detention centres and other residential youth justice facilities, and the safety and wellbeing of, and the provision of services to, children and young people in detention, and in the youth justice system more broadly, by

   i. regularly monitoring and reviewing custodial population data and information on serious or adverse incidents (such as child sexual abuse, assaults, attempted suicide, self-harm, riots, escapes and property damage) and the use of isolation, force, restraints and searches

   ii. conducting regular onsite inspections of youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities

   iii. conducting own-motion systemic inquiries into issues that are identified through monitoring

   iv. conducting own-motion inquiries into the youth justice services received by an individual child or group of children

b. has the power to enter adult prison facilities to visit children and young people in those facilities to monitor their safety and wellbeing

c. is adequately resourced on an ongoing basis to fulfil its systemic monitoring functions.

11.7 Appointing a child-specific National Preventive Mechanism

As noted in Chapter 10, Australia is a party to the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ('OPCAT'), which it ratified in 2017.[1686]

Article 3 of OPCAT contains an obligation on States Parties to set up, designate or maintain, at the domestic level, one or several visiting bodies for preventing torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, known as the National Preventive Mechanism.[1687] The key functions of the National Preventive Mechanism are to visit and inspect places of detention, and to provide advice and make recommendations to the State to prevent torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.[1688]

Article 17 of OPCAT requires States Parties to maintain, designate or establish the National Preventive Mechanism no later than one year after ratification of the protocol.[1689] Australia sought to delay its obligation to establish a National Preventive Mechanism, with 20 January 2023 set as the date for compliance.[1690]

OPCAT also requires States Parties to facilitate visits by the United Nations Subcommittee on the Prevention of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ('Subcommittee on Prevention').[1691] The Subcommittee on Prevention comprises 25 independent human rights experts who serve in their personal capacity and monitor States Parties' adherence to OPCAT.[1692]

The National Royal Commission recommended that the National Preventive Mechanism(s) be provided with:

> ... the expertise to consider and make recommendations relating to preventing and responding to child sexual abuse as part of regularly examining the treatment of persons deprived of their liberty in places of detention.[1693]

In October 2022, the Australian Human Rights Commission published a 'road map' to compliance with OPCAT.[1694] This followed a national symposium in September 2022 that brought together relevant stakeholders from the Australian, state and territory governments.[1695] That document recommended that governments ensure National Preventive Mechanisms are designed and operate in a way that reflect the needs of vulnerable cohorts who are disproportionately represented in places of detention.[1696]

The Tasmanian Parliament passed the OPCAT Implementation Act 2021 in November 2021. The purpose of the Act is to enable the National Preventive Mechanism to be appointed and maintained, and for the Subcommittee on Prevention to fulfil its mandate as set out in OPCAT.[1697] Significantly, the Act provides for the appointment of 'a person, or more than one person' as a Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism.[1698]

The functions of the Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism include:

- regularly examining the treatment of people deprived of their liberty in places of detention, with a view to strengthening, if necessary, their protection against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment
- requiring the provision of, or access to, information held by any person concerning detainees, including the number and treatment of detainees
- accessing, inspecting and reviewing places of detention
- interviewing detainees
- making recommendations and providing advice to the relevant authorities, to improve the treatment and conditions of people deprived of their liberty and prevent torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment
- developing and publishing guidelines and standards in respect of detainees or places of detention.[1699]

In February 2022, the Tasmanian Government announced that Richard Connock had been appointed to the position of a Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism for two years.[1700]

In the Ombudsman's 2021–22 annual report, Mr Connock referred to his appointment as a Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism and indicated that he was not required to report publicly on the performance of these functions.[1701] He also stated that 'little work' has been undertaken by the Australian, state and territory governments to progress implementation of OPCAT—for example, to establish monitoring standards—which 'renders the making of [a National Preventive Mechanism] office Budget Submission impossible at present'.[1702]

The Ombudsman's annual report also observed that implementing the National Preventive Mechanism would require 'significant resourcing and funding'.[1703] Mr Connock reiterated during our hearings that this additional appointment constituted a further stretching of his capacity, explaining that 'with OPCAT I've now got seven jurisdictions, and it's becoming increasingly difficult to keep track of everything'.[1704]

The Subcommittee on Prevention suspended a visit to Australia in October 2022 after it was unable to gain unrestricted access to all places of deprivation of liberty in Queensland and New South Wales.[1705] Subsequently, it announced that it had decided to terminate its suspended visit to Australia.[1706] However, before the visit to Australia was suspended, the Subcommittee on Prevention visited Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[1707] In February 2023, the Subcommittee on Prevention indicated that it would share a report with the Australian Government on what was observed during its October visit 'as soon as possible'.[1708] The Australian Government has not disclosed whether it will release the report publicly.

We note that other jurisdictions have appointed multiple National Preventive Mechanisms for different detention contexts.[1709] In the Northern Territory, the Office of the Children's Commissioner has been proposed (though not yet appointed) as a child-specific National Preventive Mechanism, alongside the Northern Territory Ombudsman.[1710]

Given Mr Connock's many statutory roles, we consider that there would be considerable benefit in the Tasmanian Government appointing another National Preventive Mechanism with expertise in children and young people to focus on examining facilities where children and young people are detained. Given our recommendation to transfer systemic monitoring functions for youth detention from the Custodial Inspector to the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 12.38), we also recommend appointing this body as a Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism for children and young people. The two National Preventive Mechanisms should work together closely.

We acknowledge that a small number of children may be sentenced to adult imprisonment, or may be transferred from youth detention to adult prison, and that the Commission for Children and Young People will not be a body with general expertise in the adult correctional system. Despite this, we consider that the significant number of children in youth detention who are also involved in the out of home care system makes the new Commission—a body with responsibility for monitoring the out of home care and youth justice systems—an appropriate National Preventive Mechanism for children and young people.

According to Article 18 of OPCAT, States Parties must 'guarantee the functional independence of the national preventive mechanisms as well as the independence of their personnel'. To achieve this, the Commission for Children and Young People's National Preventive Mechanism function should be funded and resourced separately from its other functions.

Recommendation 12.39

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. appoint the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) as an additional National Preventive Mechanism under the United Nations Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (OPCAT), with expertise in child rights, child trauma, the prevention and identification of child abuse, the needs of Aboriginal children and young people and the needs of children and young people with disability, and with power to inspect places where children and young people are detained

b. resource Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanisms sufficiently to allow them to effectively fulfil their functions under OPCAT.

11.8 Collaboration among oversight bodies

As discussed in Chapter 18, effective information sharing is a crucial part of any child-centred system to ensure oversight bodies are clear about their respective roles and responsibilities in responding to any concerns about child safety. A child (or their advocate) should be able to make a complaint to, or raise a concern with, any of these oversight bodies and have it actioned or redirected appropriately without the child or young person needing to understand which type of complaint or concern should be raised with which body.

In Chapter 18, we describe the evidence we heard from Commissioner McLean, Mr Connock and Michael Easton, Chief Executive Officer, Integrity Commission, about the way the Commissioner for Children and Young People, Ombudsman and Integrity Commission work together on matters concerning children and young people. We heard that there are no consistent formal arrangements for information sharing or clear roles and responsibilities between these entities, with the determination of who is best placed to deal with a complaint often managed on a case-by-case basis.[1711]

In discussing the information-sharing relationship between these entities, Mr Connock said:

> So, while there's no protocol or memorandum of understanding, we all have a high level of understanding of our various functions … As the Commissioner has said, she doesn't have the individual complaint-handling thing, but our two offices have a really good relationship, I think, and a good understanding, and we will take the complaint if it's within our jurisdiction.[1712]

Commissioner McLean noted that if a child or young person wanted to make a complaint, she would assist them to make that complaint to the Ombudsman.[1713] However, she indicated that there had been times when she had been unclear about whether a particular complaint would constitute a matter over which the Ombudsman had jurisdiction:

> And it's those good relations that we have with [Mr Connock] and his office that clear that up. I largely agree with what [Mr Connock] has said in that regard; there are no formal arrangements.[1714]

Commissioner McLean also indicated that there were no formal arrangements for sharing outcomes of individual cases referred to the Ombudsman:

> So, we don't have a formal record-keeping system in that regard, but we do check in with young people very regularly, including whether or not they have heard about the progress of their complaint.[1715]

Subsequently, in August 2022, Commissioner McLean told us that her office had negotiated an information-sharing arrangement with the Ombudsman's Office, noting that it can be confusing for children and young people to determine the responsible oversight body:

> … I acknowledge that it can be a bit confusing for young people and we often find ourselves in that explanatory position and saying, 'Look, we're not going to handle this complaint but we will make sure that the Ombudsman gets the complaint'. And just recently between the Ombudsman's Office and our office we have negotiated an information-sharing arrangement that, with the use of a consent form, enables information about the outcome of the complaint to also come through my office so that we can help to communicate the outcome of the complaint to the young person.[1716]

We do not consider that relying on goodwill between oversight bodies is sufficient to protect the rights of vulnerable children and young people. We commend the information-sharing arrangement that has been agreed between the Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Ombudsman.

No child or young person should be turned away from an oversight body; rather, an oversight body that is approached by a child or young person should determine where they will receive the most appropriate assistance.

We consider that establishing the independent community visitor scheme for children and young people in detention (refer to Recommendation 12.36) will go a considerable way to ensuring children and young people feel confident to raise concerns about their treatment in detention, are aware of their rights, and understand the roles of the various oversight bodies and the process for making a formal complaint. As outlined in Section 11.4, independent community visitors would be responsible for assisting children and young people in detention to raise concerns and make complaints, and would keep children and young people informed of the progress of these matters.

Also, as noted in Chapter 18, we consider that there would be benefit in oversight bodies developing clear and formalised information-sharing agreements to underpin their practices. This is particularly important considering the new Commission for Children and Young People's recommended oversight functions and powers in relation to Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

In that chapter, we recommend that the Commission for Children and Young People, the Integrity Commission, the Ombudsman and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme develop a formal memorandum of understanding for managing and overseeing reports, complaints and concerns relating to child sexual abuse that:

- defines the roles, responsibilities, functions and limitations of each agency and describes where these overlap or intersect
- requires consultation prior to the initiation of systemic reviews or inquiries where the subject of that inquiry relates to areas of common interest or intersecting functions
- provides for permissive and enabling information-sharing practices that prioritise the safety and welfare of children for individual matters and ensure each party receives from others de-identified trend data necessary to perform its functions (Recommendation 18.15).

12 Conclusion

We remain gravely concerned about the culture at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the safety and wellbeing of the children and young people detained there.

Children in detention are among the most vulnerable children in the community. Many have experienced violence, abuse, neglect and trauma, and have been failed by multiple service systems—education, health, housing and child protection—before coming into contact with the criminal justice system. The detention system must not harm them further. It must keep them safe from sexual abuse. It must also provide the children in its care with the support they need to turn their lives around.

In this chapter, we have described the extensive reforms needed to divert children from detention wherever possible and to create a child safe culture in youth detention—a culture where children are aware of their rights, they are listened to, their views are taken into account, and their rights are respected. Implementing these reforms will require strong leadership, a long-term commitment to change from all involved, and staff who have the right attributes and skills to build constructive and therapeutic relationships with children in detention. Resistance to change among staff must be overcome to achieve meaningful reform.

Implementation of our recommendations will also require a genuine commitment to listening to the voices of children in detention and those with experience of detention and, in particular, to the voices of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in detention.

We acknowledge that reform of youth detention and the youth justice system is a monumental task. Those responsible for implementation will face challenges and setbacks. We agree with the Northern Territory Royal Commission that:

> Progress is not always linear, especially during a process of major reform and when dealing with a vexed social issue such as young people who have offended. Critics of the system may seize on these moments to discredit it, but they are both normal and inevitable. They are not a reason to abandon the change. The leaders of the reform should acknowledge the possibility that missteps will occur … The test for those administering the system and their leaders is how they respond to challenges when they arise.[1717]

We urge the Tasmanian Government and future governments to maintain the commitment to implementing our recommendations to ensure the safety of Tasmanian children in youth detention and the youth justice system.

978 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Youth Justice in Australia 2021–22 (Report, 31 March 2023) Tables S81a, S144. Table S81a indicates that there were 8.1 children and young people aged 10 to 17 years in detention on an average day in 2021–22, of whom 3.6 were Aboriginal. According to the Productivity Commission, the average daily number of children and young people aged 10 to 17 years in detention in Tasmania in 2021–22 was eight, four of whom were Aboriginal: Productivity Commission, Report on Government Services: 17 Youth Justice Services (Report, 24 January 2023) Table 17A.5 <https://www.pc.gov.au/ongoing/report-on-government-services/2023/community-services/youth-justice>.

979 Hannah Phillips, a lawyer with experience working with youth in the Tasmanian justice and child safety systems, told the Commission of Inquiry that she contacted Ashley Youth Detention Centre every month to ask the number of children and young people in detention who identified as Aboriginal and that 'the number [was] regularly just under half': Statement of Hannah Phillips, 13 July 2022, 12 [58].

980 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Youth Justice in Australia 2021–22 (Report, 31 March 2023) Table S109a. According to the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, this data should be interpreted with caution due to 'potential issues with recording and updating of custodial order details in Tasmania'.

981 In 2022, the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare reported that, nationally, Aboriginal children and young people under youth justice supervision in 2020–21 were more likely than non-Aboriginal children and young people to have had an interaction with the child protection system in the preceding five years: Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Young People Under Youth Justice Supervision and Their Interaction with the Child Protection System 2020–21 (Report, December 2022) vi.

The way forward: Children in health services

Introduction to Volume 6

This volume—Volume 6—focuses on children in Tasmania's health system and how the Department of Health prevents and responds to child sexual abuse. The terms of reference for our Commission of Inquiry specifically require us to have regard to:

> The adequacy and appropriateness of the responses of the Tasmanian Health Service and the Department of Health to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in the matter of James Geoffrey Griffin (deceased 18 October 2020).[1]

Health services, particularly hospitals, are often assumed to be inherently safe places for children and young people. They are imagined as busy places, humming with staff who have been professionally trained and rigorously screened by oversight bodies to confirm their suitability to work with children and young people. The public naturally assumes that those working in health services will place the best interests of patients at the centre of what they do.

There has been limited research to test the assumption that hospitals are inherently safe for children and young people, and there is little evidence available about the risks of child sexual abuse in health services. However, based on the available research and the limited evidence we heard, there are inherent risks posed to children and young people in health services.

Health workers can have intimate contact with children, sometimes without supervision. Children and young people who seek treatment often feel unwell or may have disabilities or mental health concerns that create a dependency on health workers for their care. Children and young people often have less social power than adults and are therefore less able to advocate for themselves. Parents and carers typically take for granted that they can safely leave their children unsupervised in the care of a health worker and that any intimate procedures are warranted or necessary.

The overwhelming majority of health workers do an outstanding job in providing safe, empathetic and high-quality care to children and young people. We met many such health workers across Tasmania during our Commission of Inquiry. We consider the trust and goodwill extended to health workers to be well founded. However, a significant reason that our Commission of Inquiry was established was the shocking and devastating revelations that James Griffin, who was a paediatric nurse on Ward 4K at Launceston General Hospital for nearly 20 years, perpetrated child sexual abuse inside and outside the hospital. Sadly, these revelations were not so shocking to those who knew of Mr Griffin's abuses first-hand or had tried, with little success, to raise the alarm about his concerning behaviour over the years.

While it may be tempting to view Mr Griffin's abuses as an anomaly, they are not. The risk of child sexual abuse in health services must be recognised and addressed. We heard from several people who had reported allegations of abuse within, or connected to, health services across Tasmania, including at Royal Hobart Hospital.[2]

However, our Commission of Inquiry received a substantial amount of evidence about allegations of child sexual abuse connected to Launceston General Hospital. For this reason, we focus primarily on Launceston General Hospital in this volume.

As part of our examination of Launceston General Hospital, we focused on three case studies—those of Mr Griffin and two other individuals who were accused of child sexual abuse at Launceston General Hospital prior to Mr Griffin's employment there or before there were complaints about his conduct. Launceston General Hospital's failure to identify and respond to the red flags raised about Mr Griffin over his long tenure at the hospital are indicative of an institution that did not learn from its previous experience in responding to allegations of child sexual abuse.

We do not discuss the first case study in our report because it is subject to a restricted publication order, which means it will not be made available to the public or media. We are committed to being open and transparent and have sought to examine the prevention, identification, reporting of and responses to child sexual abuse. During our Inquiry, we heard evidence that, too often, people, including victim-survivors, have felt silenced or unable to come forward and be heard. At the same time, we have sought to avoid prejudicing any current investigation or proceedings. Not only was this required by our terms of reference, but we are acutely aware of ensuring we did not prejudice the ability of victim-survivors to seek justice and ongoing attempts to keep children safe. It is in this context that we made a restricted publication order in relation to the first case study. We made this order because we were satisfied that the public interest in the publishing of evidence contained in the first case study is outweighed by relevant legal considerations, including avoiding prejudicing current investigations and proceedings.

Zoe Duncan (now deceased) alleged that she was sexually abused by Dr Tim (a pseudonym) as an 11-year-old in 2001.[3] Her incremental disclosures were met with scepticism and disbelief from the hospital, which set in train a sequence of wrongful assumptions that neither she nor her parents could overturn, despite their best efforts. Zoe remains deeply loved and missed by her family, who were generous in giving us an insight into her life and the abuse she suffered, as well as the disbelieving responses to her allegations by the hospital and other investigatory agencies. The agreement of Zoe's parents to allow us to consider her experience in more detail reflects their desire for Zoe's legacy to be one of protecting other children and young people from abuse and ensuring they are believed when they report concerns. We document the case study relating to Dr Tim in Chapter 14.

Because previous matters, such as Dr Tim, did not act as 'wake-up calls' to the hospital and broader Department of Health, Mr Griffin tested and overstepped boundaries early in his tenure at the hospital and continued to do so until a victim-survivor eventually reported him to police in 2019.

We were overwhelmed by the extent of Mr Griffin's abuse. In line with our terms of reference, we considered in detail the history of complaints and concerns raised about this nurse at Launceston General Hospital. The length of the case study about Mr Griffin reflects the volume of material we received and evidence we heard, much of which was already available to the hospital and other agencies and had been for some time. The amount of information about Mr Griffin's offending points to numerous missed opportunities—by Launceston General Hospital, Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services—to intervene earlier.

We heard from many victim-survivors, former patients and current and former hospital staff, some of whom shared their anguish and frustration that their reports and concerns about Mr Griffin had been ignored. We are indebted to all the victim-survivors, former patients and current and former staff who shared information with us. Without the public participation of some of these witnesses, particularly victim-survivors Kylee Pearn and Tiffany Skeggs and whistleblower Will Gordon, we would not have been able to make the findings we have. These witnesses went to extraordinary lengths to draw attention to systemic failures to protect children and young people from Mr Griffin. We were humbled by their actions, their generous assistance to our Inquiry and their unwavering commitment to children's safety.

We document the case study of Mr Griffin in Chapter 14.

Some of the witnesses who gave evidence to us were wary of doing so. The Tasmanian Government encouraged witnesses to provide information to our Commission of Inquiry. In particular, the Premier, the Honourable Jeremy Rockliff MP, stated that the Government sought to 'reassure all Tasmanians that we absolutely encourage people to come forward'.[4]

In August 2022, the Tasmanian Government also recognised the contribution of victim-survivors and state servants who had provided information to our Commission of Inquiry. The Premier stated:

> I want to once again thank victims and survivors for having the courage to share their experiences, along with State Servants who have come forward in an effort to make things better for children and young people in Tasmania. I want to again reiterate today that all State Servants have my full support to come forward and shine a light on these matters.[5]

The Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 also reflects the importance of protecting those who provide information to a commission.

We note the statement of Kathrine Morgan-Wicks PSM, Secretary, Department of Health, in our hearings, who welcomed the courage of some current and former staff in giving evidence to our Commission of Inquiry:

> To our employees, to Will Gordon, to Maria Unwin and Stewart Millar, to Annette Whitemore, and may I also include Amanda Duncan as an employee that has spoken out for her sister: thank you for your bravery in coming forward as whistleblowers and for your continued efforts to try to alert the department to serious misconduct by other Health employees.
> I am sorry that it has taken a Commission of Inquiry for you to be believed or for your complaints and our lack of action to be publicly known.[6]

We consider the commitment of these individuals, who were vulnerable in their own reflections about their past actions (some of which were described with some regret), should be viewed within the context of their broader actions at the time and subsequently. We agree with the Premier and the Secretary that they should be commended for coming forward and sharing their experiences.

Taken together, the case studies show a fundamental failure of leadership at Launceston General Hospital to respond to potential risks to child safety over more than three decades, contributed to by the associated failures of Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services. The accounts in these case studies cannot be categorised as 'one-off' or 'rare instances' of inappropriate responses by the hospital to allegations of unprofessional behaviour.

We heard about the absence of effective protocols to protect children and young people at the hospital, the poor attitudes of managers to complainants and the inadequate responses of the hospital to disclosures.

These systemic failures at Launceston General Hospital have existed for decades and are likely endemic to the Tasmanian health system. Our recommendations—which we summarise below—are therefore relevant to all health services.

This volume comprises three chapters; Chapter 13—Background and context: Children in health services, Chapter 14—Case studies: Children in health services, and Chapter 15—The way forward: Children in health services.

In Chapter 13 we provide the context for our case studies. We outline Tasmania's health system (particularly as it relates to child safety) and summarise previous reviews of the health system that identified some of the same problems we discovered through our Commission of Inquiry. As previously noted, Chapter 14 focuses on our case studies—those of Dr Tim and Mr Griffin. In these case studies we identify systemic and individual failings within Launceston General Hospital relevant to the hospital's response to these allegations.

In holding individuals to account, we have tried to be fair and balanced, recognising that none of us are immune from imperfect responses and that we hold the benefit of knowledge that was not available to some at that time. We are also mindful that people operated in a broader context and that it was, in part, the hospital's lack of leadership and protocols, as described in the case studies, that enabled the unsatisfactory response of some to concerns and complaints about misconduct.

We are also conscious that some people were subject to greater scrutiny than others because of their roles in responding to complaints about Dr Tim and Mr Griffin, or because these people were more prominent in the information we received. We acknowledge that we may have not identified the relevant conduct of others because we were not made aware of it or did not have enough evidence to substantiate it. In considering the actions of individuals, we carefully considered their relative roles and responsibilities, and whether we considered their conduct justified our particular focus.

In these case studies we identify individual and systemic failings. These inform our understanding of the broader problems that need to be addressed in health services to protect children and young people from sexual abuse in the future, and to ensure health services respond better when abuse does occur.

In Chapter 15 we make recommendations for reform.

We recommend that the Department of Health develops and publicly communicates a policy framework and implementation plan for reforms to improve responses to child sexual abuse in health services. This policy and plan should explain the purpose and need for the reforms; the role, responsibilities and interactions of bodies established by the Department of Health as part of the reforms; how the reforms will work together to provide a system-wide response to child sexual abuse in health services; how the reforms are being prioritised for implementation; who is responsible for their implementation; and the expected timeframes for implementation.

Of national significance, recognising the risks we have identified of child sexual abuse in health settings, we recommend that the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations should be a mandatory requirement for accrediting health services against the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards under the Australian Health Service Safety and Quality Accreditation Scheme, and the Tasmanian Government should advocate for this reform at the national level.

We recommend that the Department of Health's cultural improvement strategy ensures clear organisational values, has strong governance, and ensures accountability of senior managers and executives. We recommend the Department of Health establishes processes and forums to facilitate the participation of children and young people in decisions affecting the delivery of health services, including a health services advisory group. The advisory group should comprise young people of varying ages and backgrounds, but who share significant experience with health services. Through the advisory group young people should have a say in departmental strategies, policies, procedures and protocols that affect them.

We recommend that the Department of Health develops a professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in health services. The policy should provide examples of behaviour that is inappropriate in clinical and non-clinical contexts, such as engaging with children through online social networks and having unnecessary contact with children outside the professional relationship. It should also reference existing professional and ethical obligations held by registered health practitioners.

The development and implementation of a clear complaints management, escalation and investigation process is critical. Noting the specialised context in which health workers operate, the Department of Health may choose to establish a standalone Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate or to partner with the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate we recommend in Volume 6 (Recommendation 6.6).

The Department of Health, Launceston General Hospital and Tasmania Police must ensure ongoing assistance to known and as yet unknown victim-survivors of child sexual abuse by Mr Griffin. The Department of Health should also develop and implement a critical incident response plan to ensure that measures are in place to communicate with clarity and consistency, and to support the affected members of the community, in the event of a future critical incident, such as a serious breach to children's safety within the public health system. The plan should identify who is responsible for leading the response to the critical incident, facilitate psychological first aid, support and critical incident debriefing and provide for a review of how the Department of Health responded to the critical incident.

Further, the Tasmanian Government should ensure a review of the Health Complaints Act 1995 is completed and considers the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner in relation to addressing systemic issues within health services related to child safety.

Although the case studies in Chapter 14 focus on conduct that occurred at Launceston General Hospital, the aim of our report and recommendations is to prompt and facilitate change across the broader Tasmanian Health Service, the Department and agencies that work alongside those services, such as Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services.

Although most health services are places of healing and safety for children, our Commission of Inquiry has identified the high cost of complacency about the risks of child sexual abuse in these settings. The issues at Launceston General Hospital can and doubtlessly do occur within other health services. Services beyond the immediate remit of our Inquiry are encouraged to reflect on their own understanding and decision making about child safety and to take steps to make their organisation safe for children and young people. We trust the evidence presented in this volume of our report provides compelling reasons to do so.

13 Background and context: Children in health services

1 Introduction

In this chapter we summarise what is known about child sexual abuse in international and Australian health services, including through the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('National Royal Commission') and our own research into children and young people's perceptions of safety in government health institutions in Tasmania. We briefly describe the Tasmanian health system and the key regulatory bodies that play a role in overseeing health services and the people who work within them. We also summarise four key reviews that have examined aspects of the Tasmanian health system relevant to our Commission of Inquiry, including organisational culture, governance arrangements and the reporting and management of misconduct.
We conclude the chapter by highlighting what we heard about the organisational culture at Launceston General Hospital, which as noted earlier is the primary focus of the remainder of this volume, including our case studies in Chapter 14.

2 Understanding the health context

Health services and health workers have a duty of care to patients, including children and young people, that extends to keeping them safe from harm while they are under their care.

Because people often assume health services are highly controlled, supervised and public environments, the risk of sexual abuse to children in these settings can be underestimated. People rightly expect that health workers will act in the best interests of patients and according to their professional obligations.

We reviewed a key report examining child sexual abuse in healthcare contexts published in the United Kingdom (discussed in Section 2.1.1), as well as research we commissioned into the experiences of Tasmanian children (discussed in Section 2.1.2), to learn more about the vulnerability of children and young people in health services. We also learned from the lived experience of victim-survivors and people working in these settings about the specific factors that can increase the risks of abuse to children in health services.

2.1 Research into child sexual abuse in health services

Unlike other government or government funded institutions of interest to our Commission of Inquiry, child sexual abuse within health services has not been the subject of significant research. There is limited data on the prevalence and incidence of child sexual abuse perpetrated within health services.[7] Consequently, the extent and nature of child sexual abuse that occurs in these institutions is not well understood.

Although the National Royal Commission heard evidence from some people who had experienced child sexual abuse in health services, child sexual abuse in health institutions was not a specific focus of the National Royal Commission.[8] Nonetheless, the National Royal Commission made the following general observations about child sexual abuse in health contexts:

> Medical practitioners, health professionals and hospitals are responsible for improving and maintaining the health of their patients. Patients, who are in a vulnerable state of illness, place their trust in health care providers. Patients, and the parents of child patients, place such trust in medical practitioners that they permit those medical practitioners to view and touch intimate parts of the patient's anatomy. Patients permit these acts because of the close nature of the health practitioner–patient relationship and because they believe that a health practitioner is acting in pursuit of a higher purpose of assisting the patient with his or her illness or injury and not out of personal sexual gratification.
> Children often follow instructions from health care providers without question and the private one-on-one nature of therapy places children in a vulnerable position.[9]

This observation extends beyond medical practitioners—it applies to all health workers within the health system, some of whom will use their position to abuse or manipulate children and young people.[10]

2.1.1 Truth Project thematic report into child sexual abuse in healthcare contexts

In 2020, as part of the Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse in the United Kingdom, the Truth Project published a thematic report that included findings about the experiences of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in healthcare contexts.[11] The report described the research into health workers as sexual abusers of children as 'dated and sparse'.[12] The report also stated that it is difficult to estimate the prevalence of health workers breaching sexual boundaries, particularly in relation to children, because most child sexual abuse is hidden.[13]

The Truth Project report considered power dynamics that exist between health workers and patients, including the power dynamics between children and the health workers upon whom they rely to treat them.[14] The report described health services (particularly mental health facilities) as 'strong institutions'; that is, the power imbalance between patients and staff, coupled with the depersonalisation of patients that can occur in such institutions, creates an environment that enables abuse to occur.[15] This can be exacerbated when there is a workplace culture that prevents people from speaking up about wrongdoing.[16] We found similar problems through our Inquiry.

Key qualitative findings from the Truth Project report included:

- The vulnerability of patients in health settings was heightened because of patients being alone and without chaperones, and due to the 'unique nature of the position of trust and authority' held by health practitioners.[17]
- Although there were examples of children, their parents and staff being manipulated by abusers, overall, there was little evidence of grooming from health workers, which was attributed to the fact that such workers often did not need 'special' explanations to perpetrate their abuse.[18]
- Abusers were most commonly men with routine access to children, with many abusing children under the guise of medical procedures or examinations, sometimes involving medication.[19]
- Many (but not all) abused children had experienced abuse and neglect at the hands of family members and had experienced other difficulties (for example, bullying) that contributed to their health problems and made them particularly vulnerable to abuse within health services.[20]
- Only a quarter of the children who were abused felt they could disclose their abuse. Those who did disclose were often not believed, particularly if they were experiencing mental health problems at the time of their treatment. There were also limited processes or pathways for young people to disclose sexual abuse, particularly if they were inpatients.[21]
- For victim-survivors, abuse in a health setting sometimes contributed to a lifelong fear and mistrust of health workers.[22]

2.1.2 Commission of Inquiry's research into children and young people's perceptions of safety in government health institutions in Tasmania

As part of our Commission of Inquiry, we commissioned research that explored children and young people's perceptions of safety in government organisations in Tasmania, including hospitals.[23] This research enabled us to learn directly from the views and experiences of children and young people.

As part of this research, children and young people described two factors that contributed to making a health institution or hospital feel safe. The first was the presence of an adult who was 'friendly and kind', who 'showed interest' and who asked children and young people what they needed.[24] The second was the protective role parents or carers play in a child or young person's home life and engagement with institutions. For example, one young person reported feeling a lot more at ease in hospital knowing that his parents were there to make sure he was getting the care he needed, as well as to help him raise concerns and to advocate on his behalf.[25] Other children and young people who had spent time in hospital held a similar view:

> When there were issues, my mother had to go to the front counter, the main hub desk of the paediatric unit, and voice her frustration on behalf of not only my parents, but also me.[26]

Another participant in the research said:

> It does help to have someone to talk to. They said parents could sleep on a couch in the room. If I needed something I would ask my mum to ask them because I was too scared to talk to nurses. I was a real timid little kid. I just felt really little and [I would] just get Mum to do it.[27]

Several young people who had experienced a stay in hospital reported not feeling safe due to the physical characteristics of the hospital environment. They talked about how hospitals could feel 'creepy' and 'sterile'. One young person described the hospital environment in the following way:

> My room was dark. I didn't have access to a window. It felt like solitary confinement. It was quite horrible: that situation, I didn't feel safe. I didn't feel like I could flourish in an area like that. I didn't feel like I could get better in an area like that. It really wasn't useful until I was moved into a room where there were three windows and where I had different nurses, where I felt like, 'okay, I'm starting to get better. I can do this. I can get out of here'.[28]

Another young person talked about how having their own space in hospital was important:

> I've had a few surgeries and sometimes I am in a room by myself, sometimes I am in a room with someone else and that doesn't feel comfortable being in a room with someone you don't know. It's being in a room with strangers.[29]

One young person discussed the experience of being Aboriginal and having contact with a health institution. This person said the hospital made no attempts to acknowledge their culture or to support them to stay connected to their culture while they were in hospital:

> I didn't really feel represented or supported in terms of my cultural identity. I wasn't even asked if this was something I wanted, or if this was something that I valued about myself. It wasn't until I had been mentioning parts of my culture to nurses that that was a topic of conversation.
> [Question (from researcher): So, you would've been able to tell if it was culturally safe for you. In what way? How would it have been culturally safe for you?]
> If I had an Aboriginal youth worker come over. I didn't feel support in that aspect. And also, even whether there was access to national indigenous TV on the television, whether there was an Aboriginal mural in the hospital or things like that.[30]

These views from children and young people show how hospitals can feel unsafe and unwelcoming for many and how difficult it can be to raise concerns with staff, particularly if a young person does not have protective family or carers to advocate for them. The views referenced above reinforced for us the importance of hearing directly from children and young people about what is needed to facilitate and enhance their safety.[31] We discuss empowering children and young people in health services in Chapter 15.

2.2 Evidence of the risk factors for child sexual abuse in hospitals

Catherine Turnbull, Chief Child Protection Officer, SA Health, Department for Health and Wellbeing, told us that children and young people can be at risk of abuse or neglect perpetrated by adult patients, visitors, health workers or other children and young people in hospital settings.[32] She identified several risk factors that can make children and young people more vulnerable to abuse and neglect in hospital settings. These risk factors include:

- children and young people recovering in rooms that are not closely monitored by staff and/or closed-circuit television[33]
- placing children and young people in group rooms without enough regard for their suitability to be placed together[34]
- inpatient services that have a mix of child and adult patients[35]
- health workers treating children and young people without other people present (such as a parent/carer or other staff member)[36]
- failure to offer a chaperone where treatment is provided by a staff member of a different gender[37]

- the length and regularity of children and young people's attendance at hospital, and the degree of familiarity between children and young people and their treating health workers[38]
- feelings of disempowerment and dependency that arise in children and young people who have been hospitalised for long periods (or who have been hospitalised repeatedly), which can affect their ability to disclose concerns.[39]

Kathryn Fordyce, Chief Executive Officer, Laurel House, also described the vulnerability of young people in health services, stating that, '[u]nfortunately, there are social norms that mean we condition children, especially those with disabilities and health conditions, to be compliant and submissive'.[40] She described that trying to empower children to speak up when they are harmed is:

> … even more complicated for a child with a disability or a health condition who has been poked and prodded their whole life, and had their personal space invaded many times for legitimate medical or care reasons. All too often adults ignore a child's attempt to maintain their bodily autonomy, and then those same adults are surprised when children are abused and do not report it.[41]

3 Tasmania's health system

The Tasmanian Government provides a range of healthcare and health support services to the community. These services are delivered through major hospitals, district hospitals and community health services across three service areas—North, North West and South.[42]

The four major government hospitals that service the Tasmanian community are Launceston General Hospital, Mersey Community Hospital, North West Regional Hospital and Royal Hobart Hospital. Launceston General Hospital, North West Regional Hospital and Royal Hobart Hospital each have a paediatric unit and offer outpatient services to children and young people.[43] The smaller Mersey Community Hospital provides emergency paediatric services. District hospitals and community health services also provide healthcare and support services to children and young people.

3.1 Department of Health

The Department of Health is the system-wide administrator of the public health system and its attendant organisations in Tasmania. The Department is one of the largest public sector agencies in Tasmania, employing around 15,500 people who work across approximately 330 sites statewide.[44] The Department's workforce includes medical practitioners and specialists, allied health professionals, dental practitioners, paramedics, nurses and midwives, facilities officers, administration and support staff and contracted locum and agency staff.[45] A large base of volunteers also contribute their time and efforts across health services.[46]

The Department of Health has undergone several 'machinery of government' changes since the late 1990s.[47] These have resulted in substantial modifications to the Department's organisational structure and governance arrangements.[48] The recent Independent Child Safe Governance Review of the Launceston General Hospital and Human Resources (discussed in Chapter 15) found that this restructuring has contributed to 'some confusion around management roles, responsibilities and accountabilities' and a level of 'restructuring "fatigue"'.[49]

As noted, Secretary Morgan-Wicks leads the Department of Health. Secretary Morgan-Wicks started in the role on 2 September 2019.[50] The Secretary has a range of duties including planning health services and overseeing the performance of executive and senior staff.[51] The Secretary is also responsible for the performance of the Tasmanian Health Service and the Health Executive.[52]

A note on language

Unless otherwise stated, further references to 'the Department' in this volume are to the Tasmanian government department responsible for 'hospitals, ambulances, community health, and related areas such as primary healthcare'.[53] During the period under examination by our Commission of Inquiry (that is, responses to reports of child sexual abuse since 1 January 2000) this Department has been called the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Health.

3.2 Tasmanian Health Service

In line with the Tasmanian Health Service Act 2018, the Tasmanian Health Service is a statutory entity responsible for delivering health services to the community. Its functions are:

- to manage the operations of health services, including at public hospitals
- service planning
- budget management
- ensuring the Minister for Health's policies are implemented.[54]

3.3 Health Executive

The purpose of the Health Executive is to 'lead the strategic direction and provide oversight of the Department's key responsibilities'.[55] It includes the Secretary as well as a range of other senior roles, including the chief executives of Tasmania's hospitals, the Chief People Officer, the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Nurse and Midwife.[56]

The functions of the Health Executive are to:

- administer and manage the Tasmanian Health Service
- perform and exercise the functions and powers of the Tasmanian Health Service
- ensure the services the Tasmanian Health Service provides are delivered in line with Tasmanian Health Service standards and within budget
- manage and monitor, and report to the Secretary on, the administration and financial performance of the Tasmanian Health Service
- monitor and report to the Secretary on the outcomes, for people, of providing health services to those people
- set up appropriate management and administrative structures for the Tasmanian Health Service
- perform any other functions specified by the Secretary.[57]

Various subcommittees and local health service managers across the State support the Health Executive.[58]

Some of the members of the Health Executive also serve on the Tasmanian Health Service Executive, which is responsible to the Secretary for administering and managing the Tasmanian Health Service.[59]

4 Oversight of the Tasmanian health system

As in other states and territories, external agencies oversee aspects of Tasmania's health system. These agencies are:

- the Office of the Health Complaints Commissioner Tasmania, which responds to systemic complaints about Tasmanian health services
- the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency ('Ahpra') and the National Health Practitioner Boards, which respond to notifications about registered health practitioners, including those in Tasmania
- the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care ('Safety and Quality Commission'), which accredits Tasmanian health service organisations against the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards.

A core function of these oversight bodies is ensuring the safety of patients, including children and young people, who receive healthcare or health support services.

We briefly outline below the role of these bodies in overseeing aspects of Tasmania's health system.

4.1 Office of the Health Complaints Commissioner Tasmania

The Office of the Health Complaints Commissioner Tasmania was established in 1997 under the Health Complaints Act 1995. The Health Complaints Commissioner (at the time of writing) is Richard Connock, who was appointed to the role in July 2014.[60]

The functions of the Health Complaints Commissioner include to receive, assess and resolve complaints and to enquire into and report on matters relating to health services, at their discretion or as directed by the Minister for Health.[61]

The Health Complaints Commissioner performs their functions independently, impartially and in the public interest.[62] The Commissioner is not subject to the direction of any person about the way their functions are performed.[63]

4.2 Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency and National Health Practitioner Boards

In 2008, Australian states and territories agreed to develop a National Registration and Accreditation Scheme for health practitioners. This scheme replaced individual practitioner regulation in each jurisdiction.[64] The Health Practitioner Regulation National Law Act 2009 ('National Law') began in all states and territories in 2010. Tasmania adopted the National Law through the Health Practitioner Regulation National Law (Tasmania) Act 2010.[65] The National Law established Ahpra and 15 National Health Practitioner Boards ('National Boards') for 16 health professions.[66] The National Law applies to all health practitioners who are registered in any one of these 16 health professions.[67]

Ahpra is the national organisation responsible for administering the National Registration and Accreditation Scheme.[68] Ahpra has a range of functions, but it primarily provides administrative support to the National Boards in performing their functions under the National Law.[69] Ahpra also establishes procedures for receiving and assessing applications for registration and notifications about registered health practitioners and maintains the national register of registered health practitioners.[70] This register, which can be searched on Ahpra's website, contains information about registered health practitioners, including information about current restrictions that apply to their registration.[71] An Agency Management Committee oversees Ahpra's work.[72]

The National Boards for the 16 health professions have a range of functions including:

- determining requirements for registration within the health professions
- approving accredited programs of study for registration in the health professions
- registering suitably qualified people in the health professions

- working with Ahpra to ensure the national register of health practitioners is up to date
- developing standards, codes and guidelines for the health professions
- overseeing notifications about people who are or were registered in the health professions
- overseeing the management of health practitioners registered in the health professions
- referring matters about people who were or are registered in the health professions to a relevant tribunal.[73]

In Tasmania, the relevant tribunal is the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal.[74]

4.3 Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care

The Safety and Quality Commission was established by the former Council of Australian Governments in 2006 and is jointly funded by the Commonwealth and states and territories.[75] It started as an independent statutory authority on 1 July 2011.[76] The objectives of the Safety and Quality Commission are to 'contribute to better health outcomes and experiences for all patients and consumers and improve value and sustainability in the health system by leading and coordinating national improvements in the safety and quality of health care'.[77]

The Safety and Quality Commission has a range of functions in relation to healthcare safety and quality, which are set out in the National Health Reform Act 2011 (Cth).[78] As part of its role, the Safety and Quality Commission develops the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards ('National Standards').[79] The National Standards 'provide a nationally consistent statement on the level of care that consumers can expect to receive from health service organisations'.[80]

There are eight National Standards, including a Clinical Governance Standard, a Partnering with Consumers Standard and a Communicating for Safety Standard.[81] The primary aims of the National Standards are to protect the public from harm and to improve the quality of health service delivery.[82] We consider how the National Standards should relate to child safety (including the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations) in Chapter 15.

5 Previous reviews examining the Tasmanian health system

Over the past two decades the Tasmanian health system has been the subject of several reviews and investigations. These reviews and investigations have considered issues of performance, efficiency, organisational culture and misconduct committed by State Service employees. Although none of the reviews have specifically examined child sexual abuse in health services, many have identified some of the same problems that we found through our Commission of Inquiry as exacerbating the risks of child sexual abuse.

These problems include:

- ineffective governance arrangements and a lack of clarity about roles and responsibilities among staff in health services
- an absence of scrutiny over staff conduct and decision making and a lack of accountability for senior managers and executives
- organisational cultures characterised by poor leadership and toxic behaviour, including misconduct by State Service employees in relation to conflicts of interest, underperformance and mistreatment of staff
- failures to report misconduct due to fear of retribution
- instability because of changes in organisational and governance structures.

These reviews are relevant to our Inquiry because the available research into the risks of child sexual abuse in health services shows that workplaces with dysfunctional cultures—particularly those that allow poor conduct to go unaddressed—contribute to, or at least hinder, the identification of child sexual abuse.[83] These reviews also show that problems with governance, culture and misconduct within the Tasmanian health system are longstanding.

5.1 Report of an Investigation into Ward 1E and Mental Health Services in Northern Tasmania (March 2005)

In March 2004, the then Minister for Health and Human Services directed the then Health Complaints Commissioner to investigate Ward 1E at Launceston General Hospital and its associated Oldaker and Spencer clinics. At the time of the investigation, Ward 1E and its associated clinics were managed by Mental Health Services as part of the Community, Population and Rural Health Division of the Department of Health and Human Services and was not managed through the Launceston General Hospital.[84]

The investigation was prompted by several complaints to the Health Complaints Commissioner and Nursing Board of Tasmania about the treatment of patients in these units.[85] The complaints raised serious concerns about the standard of care and treatment provided to patients and alleged sexual misconduct by two nurses and a ward attendant against highly vulnerable adult patients.[86]

The Health Complaints Commissioner was tasked with examining the incidents and the Department's response to these complaints.[87] The Health Complaints Commissioner was also tasked with making recommendations for improvement, including in relation to complaints management, governance and risk management, performance oversight and the protection of patients.[88]

Two investigations addressed the terms of reference—one into the specific complaints about the behaviour of individual staff (which included sensitive information about patients) and the other into the broader systemic issues highlighted in the complaints.[89] We summarise the findings of the latter investigation below, noting that many of the problems identified are similar to those we heard about nearly 20 years later through our Commission of Inquiry.

5.1.1 Investigation into systemic issues

The Health Complaints Commissioner's investigation explored how reported incidents were managed, whether the individual performance of staff members was monitored, whether standards set by regulatory bodies were complied with, and whether systemic problems were identified and addressed.[90]

The report found that Ward 1E and its associated clinics did not, in many respects, provide an appropriate model of care for mental health patients nor foster an environment consistent with best practice.[91] The report also described serious sexual misconduct by staff at the facilities.[92]

The Health Complaints Commissioner made 26 recommendations, all aimed at improving the standard of care at the facilities.[93] These recommendations related to nursing practice, governance and incident reporting within a safety and quality framework, and the importance of spelling out appropriate professional conduct and accountability.[94]

Key recommendations included:

> 1. Ethical and appropriate workplace conduct
>
> That Area Management, HR [Human Resources] and non-nursing personnel receive education and training in relation to the State Service Code of Conduct and its operation, with particular reference to the sort of conduct that could constitute a breach of its terms.

2. Appropriate professional conduct

That guidelines, educational units and protocols be developed and implemented in relation to professional boundaries for MHS [Mental Health Service] health professionals, and operate in conjunction with a governance and professional mentorship model.

3. Training — incident reporting, complaints and grievances

That all ward staff and area management officers receive education and training in relation to the procedures for the reporting of incidents, concerns and complaints and their investigation and resolution; with particular reference to the need to have regard to any clinical and clinical risk management issues raised by incidents, concerns or complaints.

4. Clinical supervision and mentorship

4.1 That if feasible, clinical supervision be delivered by both internal and external supervisors.

4.2 That the model of care formulated clearly articulate[s] the governance arrangements for the service. These governance arrangements need to incorporate both the unit specific governance and the broader hospital or health service governance arrangements. Clear lines of accountability and minimal duplication should be established.

4.3 Clinical leadership should be reflected in the governance arrangements and the role of clinical leaders determined by the model of care implemented.

4.4 Any amendments to clinical leadership should be implemented as an interim measure until a model of care is agreed.

4.5 That a Ward Management committee be part of the governance model.

20. Complaints

20.1 Implementation of policy and procedures for a continuum that addresses information notification of complaints through to sentinel events. The policy should cover resources required, governance arrangements, legislative requirements, staff development, timeframes and quality improvement cycles.

20.2 Any complaints [about] sentinel events and associated investigations or responses should be recorded on a database to allow trend analysis to occur and corrective action implemented.

20.3 That the skills base of managers and HR staff in relation to complaint handling be strengthened through the provision of additional training, with a focus on the importance of timeliness in responding to these types of matters.[95]

The Health Complaints Commissioner concluded that systemic failures can create a workplace culture that is conducive to misconduct or unprofessional conduct. This in turn has the potential to have an adverse effect on clinical practice and professional workplace relationships.[96]

5.1.2 Implementation

In April 2005, the then Minister for Health and Human Services established a taskforce to oversee implementation of the 26 recommendations.[97] The taskforce submitted a final report to the Minister in November 2006, which stated that 22 of the 26 recommendations had been implemented.[98] The report noted that the four outstanding recommendations were to be implemented over the following year by senior mental health service staff on Ward 1E as part of the broader Mental Health Services Strategic Plan 2006–2011.[99]

In June 2007, following more allegations about staff behaviour on Ward 1E, an external reviewer was engaged to undertake an audit. The purpose of the audit was to assess whether the Health Complaints Commissioner's 26 recommendations had, in fact, been implemented.[100] The external reviewer found that the recommendations had been implemented and that actions beyond the recommendations were taken.[101] However, the external reviewer identified that a persistent negative culture within the service and failures to adequately change this culture were having an ongoing adverse impact on practice.[102]

The external reviewer made a further 38 recommendations with respect to leadership, clinical governance, practice development, human resources management, partnership development, mental health promotion and information management.[103] The Department of Health and Human Services undertook a range of actions in response to the external reviewer's report.[104]

In December 2008, the external reviewer was invited to evaluate the progress the Department had made in implementing the 38 recommendations.[105] A final report, which was not publicly released, noted significant progress. However, the external reviewer also made another seven recommendations, some of which were addressed as part of a workforce review of Mental Health Services in 2009.[106]

5.1.3 Parallels between the 2005 investigation and evidence before our Commission of Inquiry

At our hearings, Mr Connock, current Health Complaints Commissioner, told us it was 'concerning' that very similar issues to those identified in the investigation of Ward 1E had emerged before our Inquiry.[107] He said there were 'very strong parallels' between the circumstances giving rise to the investigation into Ward 1E and the evidence that had emerged at our hearings, particularly about the nature of the misconduct, inadequate record keeping of complaints, poor communications about what had occurred, and inadequate support for those affected.[108]

5.2 Report to the Australian Government and Tasmanian Government Health Ministers, Commission on Delivery of Health Services in Tasmania (April 2014)

In September 2012, the Australian and Tasmanian governments set up the Commission on Delivery of Health Services in Tasmania ('Delivery of Health Services Commission'). The purpose of the Delivery of Health Services Commission was 'to investigate health service delivery in Tasmania, identify inefficiencies, and make recommendations on opportunities for lasting improvements in quality, efficacy, and system sustainability'.[109]

The Delivery of Health Services Commission's report documented far-reaching problems and called for a 'fundamental reform and redesign' of the Tasmanian health system.[110] The report noted that the health system had been the subject of several previous reviews, including Tasmania's Health Plan 2007 and The Tasmanian Hospital System: Reforms for the 21st Century (2004), and that many of the issues identified in these previous reviews had not been rectified.[111]

The report also documented deficiencies in the clarity of roles and responsibilities between the Department of Health and Human Services (as it was then) and the former Tasmanian Health Organisations, finding that these deficiencies had negatively affected performance management, clinical governance, safety and quality, service planning, integration, engagement with the community and leadership and culture.[112]

Comments in the report on the culture of the health system were particularly concerning. The report described a 'deeply engrained culture of resistance to change, evidenced by the system's inertia in the face of several reviews recommending reform'.[113] The culture, as described, was characterised by varying degrees of denial about the problems within the health system and cynicism about the ability to implement initiatives designed to improve efficiency and sustainability.[114] The report stated that decisions made by some health practitioners or administrators appeared to be based on political convenience and self-interest rather than what was in the best interests of patients.[115]

Further, the report expressed serious concerns about the conduct of some staff within the health system:

> We have observed a lack of respect amongst key stakeholders, competition and a lack of cooperation, and resistance to routine performance measures. While there are capable and committed individuals within the health system, there are administrators and clinicians in leadership positions who behave in an unduly territorial manner. Personal animosities appear to override professional considerations and what should be universally accepted codes of conduct.[116]

We are particularly concerned about the reference to territorial disputes because such disputes can lead to problems being concealed to protect the reputation of a division or staff contingent.

The Delivery of Health Services Commission further noted in its report that the lack of leadership and accountability mechanisms within the Tasmanian Health Organisations had created 'a culture where behaviour that falls far outside acceptable professional conduct' was tolerated without consequence and was therefore allowed to thrive.[117] The Delivery of Health Services Commission also found that the Tasmanian Health Organisation model, whereby staff misconduct was the responsibility of local governing councils, shielded misconduct and the response to it from broader scrutiny by the then Department of Health and Human Services.[118]

The report concluded that 'poor leadership and bad behaviour [was] at the heart of Tasmania's inability to achieve both effective governance and sustainable change in its health system'.[119] The report stated that cultural problems needed to be addressed before any system reform or clinical redesign could be effectively undertaken.[120]

The Delivery of Health Services Commission made six recommendations, focusing on:

- governance arrangements, including positive leadership and collaboration
- requiring leadership roles to be performed according to a code of conduct
- making cultural change and leadership a top priority
- delivering whole of system leadership training to managers within the health system
- requiring leaders within the Tasmanian Health Organisations to take part in performance management
- implementing a change management process informed through staff consultation.[121]

The website that housed the Delivery of Health Services Commission's report has been decommissioned. The extent to which the Tasmanian Government accepted the Delivery of Health Services Commission's recommendations is unclear because no formal response to the recommendations is publicly available.

Subsequent reforms to the health system appear to have at least partially responded to the Delivery of Health Services Commission's report and prior reports. However, we note that the culture of leaving unprofessional conduct unaddressed and unscrutinised was evident in all our case studies, in particular our case study of Mr Griffin, which we discuss in Chapter 14.

5.3 An Investigation into Allegations of Nepotism and Conflict of Interest by Senior Health Managers (2014)

The Integrity Commission investigated senior health managers in 2014 following a complaint from a member of the public. The complaint alleged that two senior officers at the North West Area Health Service (as it was then) had used their positions to employ family members and associates.[122]

The Board of the Integrity Commission found that the two officers had not disclosed significant conflicts of interest and had failed to comply with the applicable policies for employment.[123] Significant gaps were also found in record keeping relevant to the recruitment of these roles.[124]

A key issue the Board of the Integrity Commission considered was how the organisational culture at North West Area Health Service had influenced attitudes and responses to inappropriate behaviour. The Board commented that:

> A good workplace culture which promotes the values, code of conduct and principles of the State Service can improve morale, boost productivity, and improve an organisation's reputation with the community, suppliers and its own employees. Equally, an organisation whose leaders consistently breach the principles, code of conduct and applicable policies, and who demonstrate inappropriate and improper conduct, risks producing a workplace culture that fails to implement or even understand the principles.[125]

The Integrity Commission observed that the improper conduct had been instigated by senior officers, who should have known that such conduct was improper and contributed to an unhealthy culture that discouraged staff from raising concerns.[126] The Integrity Commission noted it was significant that a member of the public had to complain about the conduct before any action was taken.[127]

The Integrity Commission's report, which had 11 recommendations to prevent future misconduct, was referred to the then Premier and Auditor-General for action. Broadly, these recommendations were about keeping health service staff accountable for their recruitment practices.[128]

The Integrity Commission also noted that as part of a 2013 investigation into allegations of misconduct in recruitment within the Department of Health and Human Services, it had recommended to the Department of Premier and Cabinet that a mandated process of declaration of knowledge or association be established in State Service selection processes.[129]

In a media release issued in response to the 2014 Integrity Commission report, the Premier stated that the Government had acted on the recommendations.[130] In 2020, the Integrity Commission again inquired into the misconduct of public officers in the Tasmanian Health Service, North West Region.[131] The report noted that management can dictate culture. It highlighted that a similar culture existed in 2020 to that which it had identified in its 2014 report, noting that employees failed to report conduct even though they had significant concerns about the integrity of management's actions.[132]

5.4 Performance of Tasmania's Four Major Hospitals in the Delivery of Emergency Department Services (May 2019)

In 2019, the Tasmanian Auditor-General reported on the findings of an assessment of the efficacy of emergency departments in Tasmania's four major hospitals, from the perspective of patients.[133] These four hospitals were the Launceston General Hospital, Mersey Community Hospital, North West Regional Hospital and Royal Hobart Hospital.[134]

In his report, the Auditor-General concluded that the Tasmanian hospital system was not working effectively to meet the growing demand for emergency department care, inpatient beds and performance obligations in relation to emergency department access and patient flow, as required by the Tasmanian Health Service Plan.[135] This failure was found to be due to capacity constraints and longstanding cultural and process weaknesses within the hospitals, which impeded effective discharge planning, bed management and coordination between emergency departments and inpatient areas.[136] The Auditor-General made 10 recommendations.

Although most of the Auditor-General's report concerned service delivery within emergency departments, it also referenced the culture within the Tasmanian Health Service. The report acknowledged that:

> Successive reviews by the Tasmanian and Australian governments over the last decade have highlighted dysfunctional silos, behaviours, process barriers and resistance to change from some clinicians and administrators within hospitals as major drivers of inefficiencies.[137]

The Auditor-General further observed, while conducting the assessment, that hospital staff had described longstanding cultural and governance challenges as factors contributing to poor coordination between emergency departments and inpatient wards. These challenges included:

- the ongoing presence of dysfunctional operational 'silos'
- the lack of effective whole of hospital leadership and action to drive change
- the effects of disruptive governance role 'churn' at the senior executive level
- perceived inadequate planning, governance and resourcing to implement past reforms
- lack of accountability among staff.[138]

Reference was again made to the findings of the Delivery of Health Services Commission in its 2014 report.[139]

To address the cultural issues raised, the Auditor-General recommended that:

> [The] Tasmanian Health Service and [the Department of Health and Human Services] urgently implement a culture improvement program and initiatives with clearly defined goals, accountabilities and timeframes to:
>
> - eliminate the longstanding dysfunctional silos, attitudes and behaviours within the health system preventing sustained improvements to hospital admission, bed management and discharge practices
> - ensure that all Tasmanian Health Service departments and staff work collaboratively to prioritise the interests of patients by diligently supporting initiatives that seek to optimise patient flow.[140]

A media release from the then Minister for Health indicated that the Tasmanian Government had noted the recommendations and was considering opportunities for reform.[141]

6 Poor culture at Launceston General Hospital

Just as previous reviews have identified a dysfunctional culture across some of Tasmania's health services, we heard from several current and former staff members about a longstanding dysfunctional culture at Launceston General Hospital. Staff members told us of their concerns about entrenched cultural problems at the hospital, including practices of favouritism in recruitment and the manipulation of recruitment processes, and deliberate attempts to suppress or conceal complaints of misconduct.[142] A sample of the evidence we heard in relation to the dysfunctional culture at Launceston General Hospital is summarised below.

One former staff member, who worked at Launceston General Hospital in the late 1990s, described the hospital's culture during their time of employment as 'grotesque' and 'distorted'.[143] They said the culture was:

> Grotesque in that it prioritised reputations and institutional interests over staff and patient safety. Distorted in that it punished those who sought to protect staff, patients and children. I believe that patients are not safe if staff don't feel safe.[144]

Maria Unwin told us of learning about an incident of alleged abuse from her colleagues when she started working at Launceston General Hospital in the 1990s. She said that, in the period she worked in Ward 4K, the response of hospital management to this incident left a clear message for staff:

> I was always shocked that even when someone was caught in the act of child sexual abuse they would only be moved on and that would be covered up.[145]

Ms Unwin also stated that those who spoke up about issues at Launceston General Hospital were considered by management to be 'trouble-makers'.[146]

Another nurse who had worked at Launceston General Hospital since the early 1990s told us she believed Ward 4K had a 'culture of fear and insecurity' that 'allowed staff concerns about Jim Griffin's behaviour to be ignored'.[147]

A current employee of the hospital told us she thought there was a 'distinct cultural lack of regard for clinical governance', resistance to change and narrow-mindedness.[148] This employee also noted what she understood to be a resistance from management to receiving and acting on feedback, and that management had promoted 'a culture of dismissing complaints'.[149]

At our consultation in Launceston, several former and current staff members independently raised concerns about the culture at Launceston General Hospital. These concerns included:

- a poor complaints process that lacked transparency
- management minimising staff concerns when reporting those concerns to senior management or the executive
- preferential treatment for some staff, including disclosing the identity of staff members who had complained about them
- victimising complainants
- managers not responding to complaints causing people to stop raising concerns
- a hierarchical, chauvinistic culture that normalised sexualised bullying of staff
- some staff members bullying, ostracising and intimidating colleagues so they would not make complaints against them
- staff being so fearful of management that they had physical traumatic reactions when management was nearby
- the hospital silencing dissent by 'weaponising the legal system' such that people were scared to speak up for fear that a defamation or breach of confidentiality action, or reprimands for failing to personally make a mandatory report, would be the consequence
- staff feeling as though they could not report poor conduct because they owed their jobs to those people exhibiting the conduct, or the allies of those people
- staff not making complaints due to fear of reprisal

- management being motivated by a desire to protect the reputation of the institution over the needs of children
- rumours that destroying incriminating records was a regular practice within the hospital.[150]

While we have not established that each of these concerns are true, when considered as a whole they paint a picture of a culture that discourages complaints and fails to respond to complaints when they are made and may allow poor conduct to go unaddressed. Such a culture increases the risk of child sexual abuse occurring or being ignored.

The cultural issues described above give context to what we heard about the ways in which Launceston General Hospital, its executive and senior managers responded to complaints about, and the alleged conduct of, staff at the hospital such as Dr Tim and Mr Griffin. We make a range of findings about the collective leadership of Launceston General Hospital in its response to Mr Griffin's abuses within that case study.

In the next chapter—Chapter 14—we present our case studies.

14 Case studies: Children in health services

1 Introduction

In this chapter, we present three case studies relating to allegations against staff in health settings. Our terms of reference specifically required us to have regard to allegations of child sexual abuse against James Griffin.[1] We received evidence about other allegations in health settings and examined some of these more closely. We did this to acknowledge the efforts of the victim-survivors involved and their families to improve the safety of other children and young people, and to bring to light that Mr Griffin's abuse, and the hospital's failures to respond to it appropriately, were not an anomaly.

Case study 1 examines a complaint made by an individual in respect of receiving a health service. We make findings in relation to this case study, but it is subject to a restricted publication order.

Case study 2 examines a 2001 complaint by 11-year-old Zoe Duncan (now deceased) and her parents alleging sexual abuse by Dr Tim (a pseudonym), a former doctor at Launceston General Hospital. It outlines a series of wrongful assumptions and inadequate investigations, each infecting the next. We make several findings in relation to this case study.

Case study 3 examines at length the evidence we received about Mr Griffin's abuse throughout his tenure at the hospital. Over the course of Mr Griffin's offending, there were numerous and consequential missed opportunities—by Launceston General Hospital, Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services—to intervene earlier. The number and scale of findings we make in this case study is reflective of the magnitude of the failures to keep children and young people safe from Mr Griffin for almost twenty years, until he was finally suspended from his employment in mid-2019 after losing his registration to work with vulnerable people following a police report. They also reflect a series of response failures—in the systems and processes, and in the conduct of individuals, once Mr Griffin's offending was known. We carefully considered the responsibilities of individuals at the hospital relative to their roles in addressing Mr Griffin's behaviour, and in the context of the dysfunctional environment in which they were operating. In some cases, the conduct and omissions of individuals in response to known risks and incidents of abuse by Mr Griffin were not justified and we make findings accordingly.

Case study 2: Response to complaint about Dr Tim (a pseudonym)

1 Overview

In a written statement and at our hearings, Anne and Craig Duncan told our Commission of Inquiry about the experiences of their daughter Zoe at Launceston General Hospital. While we refer to Mr Duncan for much of this case study, because the statement is written in his voice, we acknowledge that this was a task Mr and Mrs Duncan undertook together with great care and dignity. We also acknowledge that Zoe's sister, Amanda Duncan, contributed to our understanding of Zoe and her experiences.

Zoe Duncan experienced many health issues as a child, including epilepsy, chronic asthma and juvenile arthritis.[137] Although she was resilient and considered these issues 'just a part of life', they did result in regular visits to Launceston General Hospital.[138]

In 2001, when Zoe was 11 years old, she made allegations about sexual abuse perpetrated against her at Launceston General Hospital by an emergency department doctor who we will refer to as Dr Tim (a pseudonym).[139] Mr Duncan said that these events changed Zoe, describing his daughter prior to her admission to Launceston General Hospital in the following way:

> Prior to May 2001, Zoe was a carefree child. She had a well-developed sense of humour and laughed often. Zoe could see the funny side of life, even when unwell. She enjoyed sport and played hockey, basketball and football. Zoe was a prolific reader and loved writing. She enjoyed jazz and national dancing as well as learning to play the piano. Zoe deeply appreciated and often expressed awe at the beauty of nature. Annual camping holidays at the Mersey Bluff, Devonport were always eagerly anticipated and provided Zoe with many happy and relaxed occasions with family and friends. From a young age Zoe had a deep insight into people and could generally read others extremely well. She was loving and loyal to her family and friends. Zoe was extremely honest, bright, well-mannered and delightful company. A gentle, kind and caring person, who was grateful for, and content with, life's smallest pleasures. We would describe Zoe as an easy child to parent.[140]

This description contrasts significantly with how Mr Duncan described Zoe after she was discharged from Launceston General Hospital in May 2001:

> Following her abuse at [Launceston General Hospital], Anne and I didn't have the same daughter anymore, nor Amanda her sister. The girl who went into hospital was not the same girl who returned home. Zoe withdrew from me for many months. She had been hurt by a man and found it difficult to be around men and boys. She would > stay in her bedroom crying. She was withdrawn, angry, had a lack of energy and interest in life. I would describe Zoe as having a complete change in personality. She started having suicidal thoughts and suffering from insomnia. Zoe began to wet the bed which had not occurred prior to her admission to [Launceston General Hospital]. She began having periods lasting in excess of 20 days, which her [general practitioner] stated was due to stress. Zoe was prescribed Xanax to help her manage the overwhelming anxiety she experienced. The experience at [Launceston General Hospital] caused significant emotional dulling and stress. In addition to Zoe, every member of the family was in incredible emotional pain.[141]

In 2002, Zoe wrote a letter that described what she said happened at the hospital and how it had affected her:

> The hospital experience with the man, [Dr Tim], has changed me in ways I don't want it to. My thoughts, my dreams and the way I feel about things. I find this all too much and what people might think about me. I feel so terrible but it keeps getting worse. People say I'll get over it but I don't feel I will. I'm falling apart and I'm struggling to keep my head above the water. I'm trapped, scared, nowhere to go. I can't go on like this. I'm trying to do my best but I'm being held down and I just want to wither away.[142]

2 Zoe's admission to Launceston General Hospital in 2001

On 18 May 2001, Zoe was taken to the Launceston General Hospital emergency department after an asthma attack.[143] Mr Duncan told our Commission of Inquiry that at the hospital he and Mrs Duncan met Dr Tim, who said they 'had a very beautiful daughter'.[144]

On 19 May 2001, Zoe was again taken to the emergency department after another asthma attack.[145] This time, Dr Tim was assigned as Zoe's treating doctor.[146] Late that afternoon, Dr Tim told Mr and Mrs Duncan that Zoe would need to remain under observation in the emergency department for a few hours and then stay overnight in the paediatric ward, Ward 4K.[147] Mr Duncan recalled that Dr Tim commented that Zoe's younger sister, Amanda, looked tired and suggested the family go home and collect some personal items for Zoe's stay.[148] Mr Duncan also recalled that before leaving the hospital Dr Tim asked how far away they lived and how long it would take for them to drive home to collect the items.[149]

While Mr Duncan was driving back to the hospital with the items, he got a phone call from Dr Tim, who said Zoe was upset and wanted to speak with her dad.[150] The call disconnected before Mr Duncan could speak with Zoe so he contacted Mrs Duncan and asked her to find out what was going on before he continued the drive to the hospital.[151]

When Mr Duncan arrived at the emergency department, he saw Dr Tim emerging from behind the curtains of Zoe's cubicle.[152] Mr Duncan recalled that Dr Tim reiterated that he had called because Zoe was upset.[153] On entering the cubicle, Mr Duncan saw Zoe 'curled up on the bed in the foetal position'.[154] Mr Duncan told us that Zoe said: 'Dad, Dad get that man away from me, he's dangerous, he's a madman'.[155] Zoe told him that Dr Tim had said he loved her, wanted to marry her and had been touching her all over.[156] Mr Duncan told us Zoe also said Dr Tim had squeezed her breast, tugged her ears and put his fingers in her mouth.[157] He said Zoe also reported fearing Dr Tim would follow her to Ward 4K.[158]

Mr Duncan told us that he reported what Zoe had said to a nurse on duty. Not wanting to falsely accuse Dr Tim of wrongdoing, and hoping that there had been a misunderstanding, Mr Duncan indicated at that stage he did not want to take things further.[159] Despite his reservations, Mr Duncan said the nurse reported Zoe's allegations and set up a meeting between Mr Duncan and four members of staff, including the after-hours nurse coordinator and the registrar on duty.[160] Mr Duncan said he was told that Zoe would be transferred to Ward 4K and Dr Tim would be instructed not to see her.[161] Shortly after this meeting Zoe was moved to Ward 4K.[162]

Later that night, the after-hours nurse coordinator notified the former Executive Director of Medical Services, Dr Peter Renshaw, of Zoe's allegations.[163] Dr Renshaw was Dr Tim's line manager at the hospital.[164]

Dr Renshaw's file note of matters relating to Zoe ('the Zoe Duncan file note') records that the initial allegations made by Zoe on 19 May 2001 were that Dr Tim had given Zoe a hug, kissed her hand, said she was a pretty girl and that if she were older, he would marry her.[165] The Zoe Duncan file note is generally consistent with the incident report made by the nurse on duty, which records Zoe's allegations as: 'the doctor kissed my hand, cuddled me and said if I was older he would marry me. Please don't tell anyone'.[166] Neither the Zoe Duncan file note nor the nurse's incident report refer to Dr Tim touching Zoe's left breast, tugging her ears or putting his fingers in her mouth.

The Zoe Duncan file note states that staff indicated to Dr Renshaw that these events were 'a highly unusual situation' and that 'no one was certain how it was to be handled'.[167] The Zoe Duncan file note also states that Mr Duncan wanted the complaint to be dealt with 'quietly', that he was concerned for Dr Tim's reputation and that he had asked that no formal complaint be documented. According to the Zoe Duncan file note, nursing staff were not to approach Dr Tim until the Duncans had spoken to Dr Renshaw.[168]

Dr Renshaw gave evidence to us that when he was notified of Zoe's initial allegations on 19 May 2001 he did not perceive them to involve an assault but rather a 'professional boundary violation which could be, but may not have been, child sexual abuse'.[169] Dr Renshaw also said he did not consider that the behaviour reported was at a level that required Dr Tim to be prevented from continuing to work in the emergency department.[170] Dr Renshaw said there was 'no necessity for sudden knee-jerk actions' on this night.[171] Dr Renshaw confirmed that he did not speak with Dr Tim about Zoe's allegations or take any other steps at that time.[172]

In his evidence to us, Dr Renshaw said that 'Dr Tim was actually told by the after-hours nurse manager' on the night of 19 May 2001 to not visit Zoe.[173] The documentary evidence is unclear as to what time Dr Tim was given this instruction. A Medical Council of Tasmania investigation report (discussed in Section 5.2) notes that the nurse manager 'left instructions' sometime after 9.00 pm that Dr Tim was not to see Zoe.[174]

Mr Duncan said that later that night, while Zoe was on Ward 4K, he retrieved some items from his car.[175] When he returned, Zoe told him that Dr Tim had been to see her.[176] Mr Duncan recalled that Zoe said Dr Tim had been there for 'about 30 seconds' and had said he hoped she was okay and to remember 'this is our little secret'.[177]

Mr Duncan told us that, on the morning of 20 May 2001, he reported Dr Tim's visit to the after-hours nurse coordinator, who suggested he speak with Dr Renshaw.[178] An appointment with Dr Renshaw was arranged for the next day.[179] Mr Duncan recalled encountering the registrar from the previous night, who asked him how Zoe was before saying they had been at Dr Tim's house the night before.[180] Mr Duncan told us that the registrar said to him: 'The doctor is a very nice man, and you better hurry up and decide what you are going to do. I don't think the doctor will take it any further and see his lawyer as he is not that sort of person'.[181] Mr Duncan perceived this as a 'thinly veiled threat' and believed that the registrar was attempting to protect a friend and colleague.[182]

We did not seek or receive evidence from the registrar or the after-hours nurse coordinator who were on shift the night Zoe made her allegations.

Later that day, Mrs Duncan arrived at Launceston General Hospital and Mr Duncan returned home.[183] Mr Duncan told us that, while washing some of Zoe's clothing from the hospital, he noticed blood on Zoe's underpants.[184] Zoe did not have her period.[185]

Later that night, Zoe told Mrs Duncan that Dr Tim had 'put his front bottom on her front bottom'.[186] At the time, Mrs Duncan thought this meant Dr Tim had leant across Zoe.[187]

3 Launceston General Hospital's response to Zoe's allegations

On 21 May 2001, the Duncans met with Dr Renshaw.[188] Mr Duncan recalled telling Dr Renshaw what Zoe had disclosed and who was involved.[189]

The Zoe Duncan file note states that, at the meeting, the Duncans 'thanked me for the way the hospital had dealt with the matter thus far' and indicated that Zoe had raised a further concern about Dr Tim that involved 'touching'.[190] The Zoe Duncan file note records that the Duncans believed 'something unusual had gone on' but were not sure what it was.[191] The file note also records that Dr Renshaw asked the Duncans whether they thought Zoe would be willing to speak to him directly, in the presence of a family member, so he could 'assess' her story.[192]

The Zoe Duncan file note states that Dr Renshaw told the Duncans that the hospital had 'absolutely no previous problems with [Dr Tim]' but that he would, 'as a matter of urgency', reinforce the hospital's chaperone policy and that the hospital would continue to 'closely but discretely' monitor Dr Tim.[193] At our hearings, Dr Renshaw conceded that there was no suggestion at this point that he would preclude Dr Tim from treating children.[194] When asked at the hearings whether he should have prevented Dr Tim's access to children while he considered the issue, Dr Renshaw said that it would have been 'premature' but conceded that it 'should have been considered'.[195] Dr Renshaw also conceded that he should have reported the incident to Child Safety Services at this time.[196] He agreed that one of the factors that influenced his decision not to report was the reluctance of the Duncans to report, but later conceded that their views should not have influenced his decision.[197]

The Zoe Duncan file note further states that, later that afternoon (at about 4.00 pm), Dr Renshaw spoke with Zoe in the presence of Mr Duncan, a resident medical staff coordinator and a nurse on Ward 4K.[198] According to Mr Duncan, Zoe told Dr Renshaw exactly what she had told Mr Duncan the night before.[199] Mr Duncan recalled that Zoe explained and demonstrated that Dr Tim had tugged at her ears, put his finger in her mouth and touched her like 'this' while flicking her hands down her chest and legs. Mr Duncan also recalled that Zoe told Dr Renshaw about the comments Dr Tim made about her being beautiful and wanting to marry her, as well as Dr Tim telling her: 'This is our little secret'.[200]

Dr Renshaw told us it was during this meeting that Zoe disclosed Dr Tim had touched her left breast during an examination and that it felt 'different' to other examinations.[201] Dr Renshaw told us at our hearings that at the time he accepted what Zoe had told him was true, including that Dr Tim had touched Zoe's breast, kissed her hand, hugged her, spoken about her appearance and said he wanted to marry her.[202] We note that these allegations, taken together, are an allegation of child sexual abuse. Despite Dr Renshaw accepting these allegations as a truthful account, they were not treated as an allegation of child sexual abuse. Dr Renshaw did not report Zoe's allegations to Tasmania Police or Child Safety Services at that time. Instead, Dr Renshaw told Zoe that it was important for her to feel safe and that she had a right to have another person present when she was being examined.[203] Dr Renshaw told us he did not see any difficulty in asking an 11-year-old child under the hospital's care to take steps for her own protection.[204]

Dr Renshaw told us that Zoe also revealed at this meeting that Dr Tim had visited her on Ward 4K in the evening of 19 May 2001.[205] Dr Renshaw told us he explained to Zoe that doctors sometimes follow their patients to check on them after they have been admitted, but that he also 'agreed' at the meeting that Dr Tim's behaviour constituted a 'further professional boundary issue'.[206]

At our hearings, Counsel Assisting asked Dr Renshaw whether he should have stood Dr Tim down after this discussion with Zoe. Dr Renshaw responded:

> I don't know. I actually don't know that I actually would have had the power to stand him down, but regardless of the [human resources] processes that are required, at that time I don't think it was appropriate to do that, but yes, today I would do that.[207]

When Dr Renshaw was asked if he saw this as an error of judgment at the time, he conceded that it was an error of judgment that arose because he was inexperienced in his role.[208]

Mr Duncan told us that after the meeting he asked Dr Renshaw what he thought about Zoe's allegations. Mr Duncan recalled that Dr Renshaw responded that 'Zoe wasn't upset enough to have experienced sexual misconduct of any kind'.[209] The Zoe Duncan file note records that during this meeting Zoe's 'affect did not seem to reflect the degree of awkwardness or distress that she was describing'.[210] When Counsel Assisting asked Dr Renshaw about this observation in the Zoe Duncan file note, he said he was making a clinical observation.[211] We note that Dr Renshaw's clinical observation and his evidence outlined above that he accepted Zoe's allegations as being true are somewhat contradictory.

Dr Renshaw told us in his statement that, after he spoke with Zoe, he 'deemed that there had been a breach of professional boundaries' but that he 'was not clear that the nature of the breach was sufficient to justify immediate notification to [Child Safety Services]'.[212] Dr Renshaw later told us that, although he discussed the option of reporting with Zoe's family, he did not consider it was necessary to report the matter to Child Safety Services.[213] Dr Renshaw said he did not accept that the allegation Dr Tim touched Zoe's breast, without more, amounted to assault or child sexual abuse.[214] Dr Renshaw also told us he considered a mandatory report was unnecessary for several reasons, including that there was no sexual assault reported.[215]

Claire Lovell, Executive Director, Children and Family Services within the former Department of Communities, gave evidence that it is best practice to report boundary breaches, inappropriate behaviour and sexual abuse as soon as they are observed or reported.[216]

Dr Renshaw conceded at our hearings that, at the time he became aware of the further disclosure that Dr Tim had touched Zoe's left breast, he should have escalated the complaint as a matter of child safety, and taken steps to ensure Dr Tim did not have access to children.[217] These concessions are the subject of findings we make later in this case study.

Mr Duncan told us that on 22 May 2001, he spoke with Dr Renshaw to again put aspects of Zoe's disclosures to him for a response.[218] Mr Duncan recalled that in response to Zoe's disclosure that Dr Tim had touched her breast, Dr Renshaw said that Dr Tim could have been trying to locate the heart.[219] In response to Zoe's disclosure that Dr Tim had put his fingers in her mouth, Mr Duncan recalled that Dr Renshaw said that Dr Tim may have been feeling for ulcers.[220] In response to Zoe's disclosures that Dr Tim had visited her on Ward 4K, Mr Duncan recalled that Dr Renshaw said he encouraged doctors to follow up with admitted patients as good practice.[221] In response to the disclosure that Dr Tim had told Zoe 'this is our little secret', Mr Duncan recalled that Dr Renshaw said this was a silly thing to say and that the standard of English among foreign doctors needed to be addressed.[222] Mr Duncan recalled telling Dr Renshaw that 'one of the parties concerned here has been tragically aggrieved but nevertheless I'm troubled by the nature of Zoe's allegations and the tenuous responses to them'.[223]

The Zoe Duncan file note makes no reference to this exchange. Instead, it states that Mr Duncan 'thanked me for the way the matter had been handled' and records that Mr Duncan asked Dr Renshaw to convey to Dr Tim the Duncans' apologies for having to raise the matter.[224] The file note also states that Mr Duncan 'appeared satisfied with the monitoring plan', although this monitoring plan is not outlined in the Zoe Duncan file note.[225] At our hearings, Dr Renshaw maintained that this file note was an accurate record of the meeting with Mr Duncan.[226] It is apparent to us that Dr Renshaw does not accept Mr Duncan's account of events. It is not necessary to resolve this for the purpose of our Inquiry and we make no finding in this regard.

In his statement to us, Dr Renshaw said that he also met with Dr Tim on 22 May 2001 and 'spoke with him about professional boundaries and the need to observe the hospital's guidance on chaperones'.[227] On one account in Dr Renshaw's statement, he indicated that he counselled Dr Tim about the complaint, provided him with a copy of the hospital's chaperone procedure and told Dr Tim that further complaints would need to be referred to Child Safety Services or to the police.[228] In another account in the same statement, Dr Renshaw said that he mentioned the possibility of police involvement but not the involvement of Child Safety Services.[229] In oral evidence at our hearings, Dr Renshaw told us that at the time of Zoe's allegations he had assumed there was a chaperone policy in place at Launceston General Hospital, but when he went looking for one to explain it to Dr Tim, he discovered the hospital only had an informal policy in place.[230] As a result, he wrote a new chaperone policy (which we discuss in Section 4.1).[231] Dr Renshaw's varying accounts of this meeting are internally inconsistent and consequently impeach the reliability of his account of this meeting.

At our hearings, Dr Renshaw gave evidence that Dr Tim 'was off duty earlier that week' and that he 'didn't get around to actually talking to [Dr Tim] until the week after' Zoe's disclosures.[232] Dr Renshaw told us that the first meeting with Dr Tim occurred on 29 May 2001. Dr Renshaw made a file note of this meeting ('the Dr Tim file note'), which records:

'I explained to [Dr Tim] that a complaint had been made against him from the Duncans' and '[Dr Tim] was immediately distressed and vehemently denied any wrong doing'.[233] Due to the varying accounts across Dr Renshaw's statement and the evidence he gave at our hearings, we cannot be certain that a meeting with Dr Tim took place prior to 29 May 2001 and we make no finding in this regard.

4 Reporting, incremental disclosures and investigations

4.1 Multiple contacts about making a report

On 24 May 2001, after Zoe had been discharged from Launceston General Hospital, Zoe's general practitioner contacted Dr Renshaw. Zoe's general practitioner asked whether a report had been made to Child Safety Services about her allegations.[234] Dr Renshaw told us that he had mentioned the possibility of a report to the Duncans, but they had been reluctant to proceed.[235]

Dr Renshaw stated that Zoe's general practitioner told him Zoe had since made additional allegations against Dr Tim.[236] Dr Renshaw gave evidence that because Zoe's general practitioner was not forthcoming about what the allegations were, he asked them to write to him formally about the concern and that he would confirm 'current actions' about any notifications in writing.[237]

On 25 May 2001, Zoe's general practitioner wrote a letter to Dr Renshaw seeking confirmation that he was 'acting on this matter including reporting, if appropriate to relevant authorities'.[238] It is not clear to us whether Dr Renshaw responded to this letter.

Mrs Duncan also contacted Dr Renshaw on 25 May 2001 to ask if he had reported Zoe's disclosures because Zoe's psychologist needed the matter to be reported before speaking with Zoe.[239]

The Zoe Duncan file note records the conversation with Mrs Duncan on 25 May 2001. It states that Mrs Duncan was 'concerned by Zoe's behaviour, and mentioned crying in school and problems sleeping', that Mrs Duncan had told Zoe's teachers about the 'problem at the hospital', that Mrs Duncan was trying to arrange counselling for Zoe, and that she had contacted Laurel House but:

> ... had not provided full details to Laurel House, because they had told her that they would have to report the matter to [Child Safety Services]. The family was not sure that was the way they wanted it handled.[240]

Further, the Zoe Duncan file note states that Dr Renshaw told Mrs Duncan that 'the hospital would be willing to proceed with the report to [Child Safety Services] if she so desired'.[241]

The Zoe Duncan file note indicates that four days later, on 29 May 2001, Laurel House contacted Dr Renshaw 'to check as to how the reporting process was going'.[242] The Zoe Duncan file note states that Laurel House indicated Mrs Duncan had been reluctant to provide information to them because of the need to advise Child Safety Services.[243] The Zoe Duncan file note also records that Dr Renshaw told Laurel House he would immediately make a report to Child Safety Services given the matter 'had already been mentioned to at least four professionals outside the hospital'.[244] This was the third time that Dr Renshaw had been contacted about reporting Zoe's allegations.

In his statement to us Dr Renshaw wrote that, until 1 September 2021:

> … I had no knowledge, nor had I received any information from Mr and Mrs Duncan, the GP or Laurel House that the investigated complaint against [Dr Tim] extended to physical sexual assault (i.e. well beyond a professional boundary transgression).[245]

Dr Renshaw's evidence suggests a lack of understanding and insight in relation to allegations of child sexual abuse. We note that although it was not apparent to Dr Renshaw at the time, it was apparent to Zoe's general practitioner and Laurel House that the nature of Zoe's allegations about Dr Tim were serious and warranted reporting to Child Safety Services.

On 29 May 2001, before making a report to Child Safety Services, Dr Renshaw met with Dr Tim. The Dr Tim file note states that Dr Renshaw explained to Dr Tim that the Duncans had made a complaint.[246] Dr Renshaw told Dr Tim that further details about the complaint had been provided to others, but that as far as Dr Renshaw was aware, they concerned an allegation that Dr Tim had 'spoken improperly to Zoe and touched her unnecessarily'.[247] The Dr Tim file note records that Dr Tim denied any wrongdoing and stated he would 'cooperate fully with any investigation'.[248]

Dr Renshaw also recorded in the Dr Tim file note that he indicated to Dr Tim that 'the hospital did not have, and had not been provided with, any evidence to support the allegations'.[249] When asked about this by Counsel Assisting our Inquiry, Dr Renshaw said he was not quite sure how telling Dr Tim this could potentially compromise subsequent investigations.[250]

On the same day, after meeting with Dr Tim, Dr Renshaw said that he made a verbal report to Child Safety Services about Zoe's allegations.[251] When speaking with the intake officer at Child Safety Services, Dr Renshaw elaborated on his observation that Zoe's 'affect did not seem to reflect the degree of awkwardness she was describing'.[252] The investigation report from Child Safety Services (discussed in Section 4.3) records that Dr Renshaw told the intake officer that Zoe could not remember whether Dr Tim had a stethoscope when he examined her and that she was smiling when talking about being touched on the chest.[253] It is further recorded that when the intake officer asked Dr Renshaw whether Zoe may have been embarrassed, he said he 'didn't think so', and that Zoe was 'giving very mixed messages' and was 'not as upset as the parents claimed'.[254]

The Zoe Duncan file note states that, after making the report to Child Safety Services, Dr Renshaw phoned Mrs Duncan to advise her that the report had been made. The file note further states that Mrs Duncan 'expressed mixed emotions about this' but 'thanked me once again for our help'.[255]

Dr Renshaw told us that he had 'no further direct involvement' in the investigation of Dr Tim after he made the verbal report to Child Safety Services on 29 May 2001.[256]

The protocol that applied at the time of Zoe's allegations was the Protocol for Hospital-Based Medical and Nursing Staff for the Reporting and Management of Cases of Suspected Child Abuse or Neglect ('Protocol').[257]

The Protocol contained 'Essential practice guidelines' ('Guidelines'). Under the heading 'consultation', the Guidelines state:

> No decisions or actions in respect of suspected actual or potential child abuse or neglect are to be made by any health worker in isolation unless there is a concern for the immediate safety of the child.
>
> Whenever child abuse is suspected or identified the matter must be given top priority. The most senior medical officer on duty in the unit should be advised at once and the Paediatric Registrar must be contacted immediately ...[258]

We understand that Dr Renshaw was the most senior medical officer on duty at the time.

Under the heading 'Response to Disclosure', the Guidelines state:

> Information volunteered by the child should be fully and accurately recorded. However, no in depth interview of a child, especially regarding sexual abuse should be attempted.
>
> Authorised officers in the Department of Community and Health Services (DC&HS) located in Intake and Assessment units (formerly known as Child Protection Units), and the police, have statutory responsibility for the investigation of child abuse.[259]

Under the heading 'Notification to DCHS Intake & Assessment/Child Protection Unit or the Police', the Guidelines state:

> DCHS Intake & Assessment/Child Protection Units are located in all regions with "after hours" telephone numbers and should be contacted in all cases of suspected child abuse or neglect. However, not all situations will require immediate action by child protection staff. In some cases where there is concern about the child's situation but the child has not been abused, effective preventative interventions supportive to a family environment may be provided after full investigation and assessment.
>
> Decisions about whether to refer, and where, must not be made in isolation. Discuss concerns you may have with an immediate senior colleague and follow the procedure in 6 below.
>
> If you believe a child is in immediate danger do not hesitate to call the Intake & Assessment/Child Protection Unit and a decision can then be made in consultation as to whether it is necessary to call the police.

The procedure in 6, titled 'A general approach for child abuse', states:

- In all cases where child abuse is suspected or identified, make an initial brief assessment and discuss concerns with an immediate senior colleague.
- In all cases of suspected child abuse the Paediatric Registrar must be notified and this person must notify the paediatric consultant on call.
- Standard hospital procedures for medical examination will follow with compilation of history, physical examination, conduct of investigation if necessary, provision of appropriate health care and admission, if required.
- The paediatric team should in all such cases ensure contact is made (if it has not been already) with the 'on call' Intake & Assessment/Child Protection Unit duty officer.[260]

At our hearings, Dr Renshaw told us that contact with the paediatric registrar was not clinically required at the time.[261] He gave evidence that he did not consider it 'clinically appropriate' that Zoe be seen by a paediatric doctor because she had already been examined by the paediatric registrar on admission to the hospital and was already under the care of a paediatric doctor.[262] He said that no examination was undertaken in response to Zoe's allegations because the alleged abuse occurred 'in the context of a normal clinical examination' and 'a touch does not leave a mark'.[263] Elizabeth Stackhouse, former Chief Executive Officer, Launceston General Hospital, told us the requirement to contact the paediatric registrar was included in the Protocol 'because you're dealing with a child'.[264] She indicated it is important to have a doctor with familiarity in paediatrics assist children in cases of potential abuse.[265]

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw failed to comply with Launceston General Hospital's protocol for reporting and management of cases of suspected child abuse

On 19 May 2001, Zoe's allegations were that Dr Tim had given her a hug, kissed her hand, said she was a pretty girl and that, if she were older, he would marry her.[266] We note that Dr Renshaw gave evidence that when he was notified of Zoe's initial allegations on 19 May 2001, he understood them to be 'a professional boundary violation which could be, but may not have been, child sexual abuse'.[267] On his own evidence, this was an allegation of potential child sexual abuse, which should have activated the Protocol and Guidelines in place at the time.

Dr Renshaw failed to comply with the Protocol and Guidelines in several respects. First, he did not contact the paediatric registrar about Zoe's allegations. This was a missed opportunity to receive assistance from specialist staff.

Second, Dr Renshaw failed to comply with the Protocol because, contrary to what its Guidelines required, he spoke to Zoe about her allegations in circumstances where he did not have the statutory responsibility or authority for investigating whether abuse had occurred. Dr Renshaw's file note indicates that he spoke with Zoe to 'assess her story'. Dr Renshaw later described this as a brief assessment.[268] In our view, however, Dr Renshaw's meeting with Zoe constituted an 'in depth' interview under the Protocol because it extended beyond merely accurately recording 'information volunteered by the child' and involved Dr Renshaw assessing Zoe's 'affect'. The Protocol specifically recommended against undertaking an 'in depth' interview. By this stage, the Duncans had told Dr Renshaw that Zoe had raised further allegations about Dr Tim touching her.

Although our view is that Dr Renshaw's interview with Zoe should not have taken place at all, we also highlight that Dr Renshaw did not have any training in child abuse or experience in interviewing children.

Third, Dr Renshaw failed to consult a senior colleague and consider making a report to Child Safety Services. The Protocol says: 'Decisions about whether to refer, and where, must not be made in isolation. Discuss concerns you may have with an immediate senior colleague and follow the procedure … below'. Having such a discussion may have resulted in a mandatory report being made to Child Safety Services earlier.

We consider that Dr Renshaw's failure to comply with the Protocol—by failing to immediately alert the paediatric registrar of Zoe's allegations, his failure to discuss reporting to Child Safety Services with a senior colleague, and his subsequent interview of Zoe—may have contributed to delaying Zoe's disclosure of more serious allegations against Dr Tim, including that he had raped her. Furthermore, the failure to comply with the Protocol meant that a forensic examination was never entertained as an option. Dr Renshaw told us that he considered 'a forensic examination or detailed interview was simply not required'.[269] This was a missed opportunity to collect forensic evidence that may have been relevant to Zoe's allegations.

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw failed to comply with his mandatory reporting obligations in a timely manner, which impacted on the ability to gather evidence and future investigations

Ten days passed between Zoe's initial disclosures on 19 May 2001 and Dr Renshaw's verbal report to Child Safety Services on 29 May 2001. During this time, Dr Renshaw received more information about Zoe's disclosures. On 21 May 2001, Zoe told Dr Renshaw that Dr Tim had touched her on the breast, inserted a finger in her mouth, made comments about her appearance and expressed a desire to marry her. Taken together, this was an allegation of child sexual abuse.

At the time of Zoe's allegations, Dr Renshaw had mandatory reporting obligations (as a medical practitioner) under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997. Specifically, under section 14 of the Act, he was required to report to Child Safety Services as soon as practicable if he knew or believed or suspected on reasonable grounds that a child had been abused.[270] We are of the view that in the circumstances we have outlined, any professional would, on reasonable grounds, form a suspicion that child sexual abuse had occurred and make a mandatory report as required under the Act.

Dr Renshaw could have reported the matter to Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services when he first became aware of it on 19 May 2001, but he should have reported it to these authorities after the Duncans raised the concern about Dr Tim touching Zoe on 21 May 2001. Compounding this, Dr Renshaw did not report the matter after speaking to Zoe in the afternoon of 21 May 2001 when she told him directly that Dr Tim had touched her on the breast, inserted a finger in her mouth, had made comments about her appearance and expressed a desire to marry her.

Dr Renshaw conceded that on 21 May 2001 he should have made a report to Child Safety Services.[271]

Dr Renshaw was also contacted individually, after the initial allegations, by three separate parties (Zoe's general practitioner, Mrs Duncan and Laurel House) before he made a report to Child Safety Services. It is significant that two professional parties and Mrs Duncan were expressing serious concerns about Zoe and her contact with Dr Tim.

Dr Renshaw's inaction had an adverse impact on later investigations. As discussed later in this case study, subsequent investigation reports from Child Safety Services and the Medical Council of Tasmania refer to Dr Renshaw's delay in reporting. They suggest that a more timely report and advice from Child Safety Services may have resulted in a clearer picture of what occurred while also preventing the potential contamination of Zoe's story and reducing the emotional trauma for Zoe.[272]

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed to consider and take active steps to stand down Dr Tim while Zoe Duncan's allegations were investigated

At no time after Zoe's allegations were made or while subsequent investigations by Child Safety Services or Tasmania Police were underway was Dr Tim stood down from his employment at Launceston General Hospital.

Dr Renshaw gave evidence that he took no steps to limit Dr Tim's access to children. He stated that he believed this step would have been 'premature' and 'an overreaction'.[273] Dr Renshaw also said that standing down a doctor would be 'very hard to do' in a general hospital emergency department, and that he did not know whether he would have had the power to stand Dr Tim down at the time.[274] He conceded that if a similar complaint was made today, this would be a step he would take.[275] As indicated, during examination by Counsel Assisting our Inquiry, Dr Renshaw ultimately conceded that his failure to consider whether to stand down Dr Tim was an error of judgment, which arose because he was in a role where he was inexperienced.[276]

Ms Stackhouse told us that she was not aware of any steps taken against Dr Tim while Zoe's allegations were being investigated.[277] She said that 'upon reflection' Dr Tim should have been 'stood aside while the allegation was investigated by an independent party, not a member of [Launceston General Hospital] staff'.[278]

The failure of Launceston General Hospital to take steps to stand down Dr Tim while the matter was investigated meant that Dr Tim continued to work in the emergency department with no restriction on his ability to treat children. Launceston General Hospital failed to consider this risk and then failed to take steps to mitigate the risk. We received no evidence to suggest that consideration was given to this course of action. The failure to consider and take steps to stand down Dr Tim while Zoe's allegations were investigated also represents a poorer pattern of practice than occurred when immediate steps were taken several years earlier to remove a health professional after an allegation of child sexual abuse was made against them.

As noted, at our hearings Dr Renshaw also told us that at the time of Zoe's allegations he had assumed there was a chaperone policy in place at Launceston General Hospital. However, when he went looking for one to explain it to Dr Tim, he discovered the hospital only had an informal policy in place.[279] As a result, he wrote a new chaperone policy.[280]

This evidence is consistent with evidence given by Ms Stackhouse, who told us that while it was accepted professional practice at the time that patients be offered a chaperone during clinical examinations, the hospital's chaperone policy 'was largely implied' and only appeared in some of the hospital's guidelines for surgical medical staff.[281] Ms Stackhouse said that because of investigations into Zoe's allegations, the hospital drafted a chaperone policy, along with a revised protocol for reporting and managing suspected cases of child abuse and neglect. Ms Stackhouse said that the hospital adopted these documents in 2002.[282]

The relevant draft chaperone policy (drafted by Dr Renshaw) stated:

> It is hospital policy that clinical examinations of children shall not occur, except in circumstances of extreme urgency, without the presence of a chaperone. This will generally be a member of the child's family or a health professional.[283]

The Launceston General Hospital Executive approved and implemented the policy in June 2002.[284]

Finding—Launceston General Hospital should have formalised, implemented and enforced a chaperone policy as soon as practicable after Zoe Duncan's May 2001 disclosure and not waited until June 2002

Launceston General Hospital's failure to formalise, implement and enforce a chaperone policy at the time of Zoe's disclosure affected Zoe's safety and the safety of other patients in the hospital's care. It also meant there was no formal policy against which Dr Tim could have been sanctioned had this been pursued.

The hospital should have formalised, implemented and enforced a chaperone policy as soon as practicable after Zoe's May 2001 disclosures and not waited until June 2002 to do so.

4.2 Zoe's continuing distress

In mid-2001, Zoe, aged 11, wrote:

> I'm also having problems with a man that I was uncomfortable with. He was telling me he loved me and wanted to marry. He kissed my hand, smothered me and felt me all around the top half. He whispered to me, stuck his fingers in my mouth and felt my tongue, tugged my ears and kept squeezing my hand. And he kept saying sick things. There's more but it's just horrible![285]

Zoe would go on to make further incremental and more serious allegations about Dr Tim, which we describe later in this case study.

4.3 Child Safety Services investigation

On 13 June 2001, Child Safety Services wrote to Mrs Duncan and to Dr Renshaw, advising that Zoe's matter would be investigated.[286] It was stated in that letter that the investigator 'will be following the policy re allegations against an employee of the agency' and that 'this policy is in draft but in use'.[287]

At the time, the relevant policy was the Department of Community and Health Services' Procedure to be Followed where there is an Allegation of Maltreatment of a Client (who is a Child) by an Employee of the Agency (June 1997). The procedure stated that any incident of maltreatment, including sexual maltreatment, by a staff member in the performance of their duties was to be investigated and actioned under the Tasmanian State Service Act 1984.[288] The procedure also stated that an initial inquiry was to be undertaken by an agency nominee with the assistance of a child protection officer.[289]

According to the procedure:

> 3.4.1 The purpose of this initial inquiry is to determine whether there is 'reason to believe' that maltreatment may have taken place, and that proper arrangements are made for the care and protection of the child.

> This investigation should not be lengthy nor should it involve the gathering of evidence needed to satisfy either a police inquiry or a State Service inquiry. It should provide enough information only to ensure that the agency nominee can write a report for the Secretary.
>
> This inquiry will normally include:
>
> 1. An interview with the child
> 2. An interview with the employee against whom the allegation has been made
> 3. Consideration of the manager's report
> 4. Any other investigation that the Agency nominee or the Intake and Assessment Officer/Child Protection Officer believe to be necessary in order to make an assessment of the allegation.[290]

The procedure further provided that 'on receipt of the report from the Agency nominee and the Child Protection Unit, the Director, Child Youth and Family Support is to determine future action'.[291] Recommended actions were outlined in relation to the following circumstances:

- where there is no case to answer
- where a criminal offence may have been committed
- where action under provisions of the Tasmanian State Service Act is required
- where no action is to be taken under the Criminal Code or the State Service Act
- where the case cannot proceed to any action beyond interviewing the client.[292]

On 20 June 2001, Dr Renshaw made an addition to the Zoe Duncan file note stating that an investigator from Child Safety Services had contacted him about the Zoe Duncan case. Dr Renshaw recorded that the investigator told him Zoe had made 'fresh allegations' the week before that may require police investigation.[293] It is not clear to us what allegations are being referred to here.

According to Dr Renshaw's file note, the investigator asked Dr Renshaw whether he was aware of the policy on investigations involving departmental employees, to which he replied that he was not.[294] The investigator then faxed a draft copy of the policy dated 1997 (noting it was now June 2001), before supplying a final version and asking the hospital to nominate a person to assist Child Safety Services with its investigation.[295]

Dr Renshaw recorded in the Zoe Duncan file note that, after liaising with Ms Stackhouse, he notified Child Safety Services of the hospital's nominee, who was a different employee of the hospital.[296]

In a request for statement, Michael Pervan, former Secretary, Department of Communities, was asked why Child Safety Services was tasked with the initial investigation and assessment of Zoe's allegations instead of Tasmania Police.[297] Secretary Pervan responded that according to the Child Safety Services investigation report (discussed below), protocols at the time (and prior to his tenure) 'did not provide instruction for referring matters of a possible criminal nature to Police prior to the Department establishing the facts of a case and interviewing the involved parties'.[298]

At our hearings, representatives from Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services agreed that Zoe's allegations should have been investigated by Tasmania Police. Darren Hine AO APM, former Commissioner, Tasmania Police, told us that Zoe's allegations should have been referred to Tasmania Police, which has primary authority over investigations of this nature.[299] Ms Lovell also told us that where allegations are made, Tasmania Police should be notified straight away to determine who has responsibility for particular aspects of the investigation and the sequence in which aspects of an investigation are to be carried out.[300]

Ms Lovell described Child Safety Services' procedure for investigating the allegations against Dr Tim in 2001 as 'unusual', noting she had not seen a procedure (since beginning work with child safety in 2004) that required Child Safety Services to complete an investigation and be satisfied that there is sufficient evidence before referring a matter to Tasmania Police.[301] Ms Lovell said that she was 'really struggling to imagine a scenario where a child safety officer is leading an investigation like this rather than police'.[302] She described the investigation, including the interviewing of witnesses (discussed below), as forming part of the role of police and as being 'far out of scope for the role of a child safety officer'.[303] She was also of the view that the Child Safety Services procedure did not enhance child safety and would instead delay a police investigation and require victim-survivors to unnecessarily repeat their story to police.[304]

Finding—The procedure used by Child Safety Services to investigate Zoe Duncan's allegations against Dr Tim was inappropriate and not consistent with best practice at the time

We agree with the comments made by former Commissioner Hine and Ms Lovell that it is not an appropriate role of a government department or agency to determine the facts or interview parties involved with allegations of a potential criminal nature before referring the matter to police. Tasmania Police was the agency responsible for investigating criminal allegations of child sexual abuse in 2001 as it is in 2023. The matter should have been referred to and investigated by Tasmania Police in the first instance. We consider that the policy was inappropriate and not consistent with best practice at the time.

The Child Safety Services investigation ran from June 2001 to September 2001. While the investigation was underway, Zoe made further incremental allegations over time, as is common with victims of child sexual abuse.[305] On 25 June 2001, Zoe told Mrs Duncan that Dr Tim had 'put his hands inside her pants around her thighs' and put his finger 'inside her front bottom'.[306] On 27 June 2001, Zoe disclosed that Dr Tim had raped her. Mr Duncan recalled that Zoe asked Mrs Duncan whether she would be pregnant, and when Mrs Duncan asked Zoe why she had asked this question she said 'he put his thing in there'.[307]

The Duncans said that because of this allegation, they took Zoe to her general practitioner for a medical examination on 28 June 2001.[308] They said the general practitioner spoke with Zoe on her own before undertaking the examination.[309] We do not know whether Zoe's general practitioner had any specific training in interviewing children or in completing forensic medical examinations. The Duncans recalled that the general practitioner reported that the 'examination was inconclusive, but there was no evidence of trauma'.[310] They also considered that it was significant that the examination was conducted five weeks after Zoe's initial allegations.[311]

On 11 July 2001, Zoe's psychologist wrote a report for Child Safety Services outlining the allegations and the psychologist's observations.[312] On 22 July 2001, Zoe's general practitioner also wrote a letter to Child Safety Services advising of the outcome of the medical examination.[313]

The investigator from Child Safety Services contacted Zoe's general practitioner, who confirmed that the examination was inconclusive.[314] Zoe's general practitioner indicated that Zoe had said Dr Tim had kissed her, cuddled her and touched her chest, but had not indicated anything else had occurred when asked.[315] The general practitioner also told the investigator that they had informed the Duncans that they considered Zoe's latest allegation, namely that Dr Tim had raped her, to be implausible, because her account had become more serious as time went on and because she claimed the rape had occurred in the emergency department.[316] The investigator relied on the general practitioner's statement in compiling their report.

As part of the investigation, Child Safety Services interviewed the Duncans, Zoe and Dr Tim.[317] The investigation report records that the Duncans were interviewed on 18 and 20 June 2001.[318] They relayed what had occurred and discussed Zoe's health issues and school history with the investigator.

Zoe was interviewed on 19 July 2001. The investigator described her as 'relaxed', 'friendly' and 'quite clear' about why she was being interviewed.[319] Zoe provided an account of her recollection and the investigator explained that they would also need to speak to Dr Tim about what happened.[320]

Dr Tim was interviewed on 24 August 2001. The investigator described Dr Tim as 'quite anxious' and 'extremely defensive and distressed'.[321] Dr Tim declined an interpreter and declined to hear the details of Zoe's additional allegations. Dr Tim suggested to the investigator that the complaint had been made because he was a foreign doctor.[322] Dr Tim denied to the investigator that he had acted inappropriately and indicated that he could not imagine someone acting inappropriately with a child in an emergency department with staff everywhere and only curtain partitions.[323] Dr Tim's support person ultimately terminated the interview, with the investigator observing that Dr Tim 'was reluctant to cooperate in the interview' and that it was 'extremely difficult to get answers to questions'.[324]

Child Safety Services finalised the report of its investigation on 12 September 2001, around four months after Zoe's initial allegations. The report states that 'Zoe's allegations become more serious with time' and that, because Zoe had spoken to several people about her allegations before being interviewed, it was 'likely' her story had been contaminated.[325] The report further states that such contamination 'may have been avoided if the hospital had contacted Child Safety Services to discuss the best way to approach the situation, prior to acting on the information'.[326] The report also states that 'there are numerous reasons why a child may take time to talk about specifics of abuse', including experiencing overwhelming emotions that inhibit their ability to talk about an incident.[327]

Similar to the view of Zoe's general practitioner, the report assessed that Zoe's description of the alleged sexual abuse was 'difficult to accept'.[328] Notwithstanding the investigator's observations about Dr Tim at his interview, the report appears to accept the explanation given by him, and expresses doubt that 'anybody would take this kind of risk in a busy emergency department while they had their back to the entrance of the examination cubicle room, which is only screened by a material curtain'.[329] The report states that Zoe's cubicle was adjacent to the central station, where staff would write their notes, confer and make telephone calls, and that this area was 'unlikely' to have been unoccupied at the time.[330] This finding is in contrast to evidence given by Mr Duncan, who recalled in his statement to us that:

> After Zoe made her disclosure to me, I went outside the cubicle to see if I could talk to someone. There was no one at the nurses' station and I couldn't see any doctors or nurses around in the ward. I called Anne [Mrs Duncan] and told her what had happened, and she told me that I needed to report it. I recall telling Anne I had tried to report it, but I couldn't find anyone to report to. Later [we] were to discover this was a tea break period.[331]

Mr Duncan further stated:

> … I distinctly recall it wasn't a busy [emergency department] on that Saturday night. The only patients on the ward were Zoe, a man two cubicles to the left who appeared to me to be severely drug affected, and an elderly lady on the opposite > side of the ward who was far from alert … I would describe the department as 'dead quiet'. When I went out to speak to someone following Zoe's disclosure, there was no one around. No nurses or doctors.[332]

The Child Safety Services investigation report concludes that it is not possible to determine what happened to Zoe but notes that '[s]omething certainly appears to have upset her'.[333]

The report recommended that the Department's protocol for investigating matters involving agency staff be reviewed because it 'does not provide instruction for referring matters of a possible criminal nature to police prior to the Department establishing the facts of a case and interviewing the involved parties'.[334] It also states that the matter highlights the importance of chaperone policies.[335]

The Child Safety Services investigator:

- received Dr Renshaw's account of events from the intake officer along with initial reports and file notes
- interviewed the Duncans, Zoe and Dr Tim
- spoke with and received a report from Zoe's general practitioner about the outcome of the medical examination
- received a medical report from Zoe's psychologist.[336]

It is apparent from the investigation report that the investigator did not speak with Dr Renshaw or any staff who were on duty the night of the incident, including the nurse on duty who received Zoe's allegations, the after-hours nurse coordinator and the registrar. Ms Lovell agreed that the fact neither Dr Renshaw nor any of the staff working on the night of the incident were interviewed suggested that the investigation process was not rigorous.[337]

The investigator appears to accept the views and accounts of adults, including Dr Renshaw, Zoe's general practitioner and Dr Tim, over Zoe's version of events.

Ms Lovell expressed concern that the Child Safety Services investigation report accepted Dr Tim's denial of Zoe's allegations over Zoe's clear and consistent allegations, especially in circumstances where Dr Tim declined to hear the allegations:

> It seems that she was making a consistent and clear disclosure that she had been sexually abused, and there doesn't seem to be reason to discredit that or disbelieve her, it's not that she's saying something that's untrue, so why would anyone preference the account of an adult, who's alleged to be responsible for abuse, who has every reason to not be honest about that abuse and in fact is unwilling to hear even the details of what's been alleged; it seems very unusual to me.[338]

The Child Safety Services investigation report accepts that the emergency department was busy at the time of the incident and that Zoe was not left alone with Dr Tim for any significant period. As noted, Mr Duncan strongly disputes this, describing the emergency department as 'dead quiet' on the night of the incident. He is recorded in the report as having observed Dr Tim alone with Zoe on two separate occasions.[339]

The Duncans believe that Child Safety Services was selective in its use of information in the report and made value judgments about what was likely to have occurred.[340]

When asked to comment on the conclusion reached by Child Safety Services that it was unlikely Zoe's allegations could have occurred on a busy ward, former Commissioner Hine responded that 'you can never assume anything because, if you make an assumption, you may bring a biased mind to the investigation, so assumptions shouldn't be made'.[341]

Additionally, in this report and those of subsequent investigations (discussed later in this case study), the investigator referred to Zoe's evidence as being contaminated because she had to retell her account multiple times. In his statement to our Commission of Inquiry, Michael Salter, Scientia Associate Professor of Criminology, School of Social Sciences, University of New South Wales, opined that this view about contamination demonstrates a bias against children's testimony that is often not warranted.[342] We agree with Mr Salter, but also note that Zoe was remarkably consistent in her account—while she progressively disclosed more detail, she never swayed from her account that something bad happened to her that night and nor did she contradict herself.

Ms Lovell said the following with respect to her assessment of Zoe's matter based on the available material:

> On the balance of probabilities I would say that [Zoe] was sexually abused; she's repeatedly made a clear disclosure, there's nothing to say that that hasn't happened. It doesn't mean there's enough proof for charges or convictions, but certainly for child safety and our substantiation there's certainly enough there by today's standard to substantiate …[343]

Ms Lovell told us that the Child Safety Services investigation resulted in a poor outcome for Zoe and her family because it was apparent that Zoe had been sexually abused. She apologised for this outcome.[344]

Finding—Child Safety Services carried out an inadequate investigation of Zoe Duncan's allegations, which affected subsequent investigations

It is clear to us that the Child Safety Services investigation lacked rigour and was inadequate. The investigator failed to seek the evidence of key staff including Dr Renshaw and other staff who were on duty the night of the incident, such as the nurse who received Zoe's allegations, the after-hours nurse coordinator and the registrar. We further consider that the investigator's report did not demonstrate an understanding of how children and young people disclose allegations of sexual abuse.

Regrettably, subsequent investigations, including by Tasmania Police in 2001 and the Medical Council of Tasmania in 2003, relied on the Child Safety Services investigation report. As discussed later in this case study, the limitations of the report have adversely affected subsequent investigations.

Secretary Pervan told us that if Zoe's allegations were made today, they would be referred to Tasmania Police and joint agency meetings to determine the response, including an approach that would minimise the need for Zoe to repeat her account multiple times.[345]

Secretary Pervan indicated that the approach to interviewing the alleged abuser would be planned in line with the memorandum of understanding that now exists between Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services.[346] Secretary Pervan also informed us that, today, Child Safety Services would not lead an investigation of a departmental staff member; rather, the matter would be referred to Tasmania Police and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.[347]

Ms Lovell also indicated that it would be her expectation that Dr Tim would be interviewed in a timely manner by Tasmania Police and not Child Safety Services.[348]

At our hearings, Dr Renshaw, unprompted by specific questioning, stated that he did not believe that Dr Tim had raped Zoe, saying: 'Because I know the layout, the set out of our emergency department, it is highly unlikely that [a rape] actually occurred'.[349]

It is unfortunate that Dr Renshaw made this observation. He ultimately accepted that he was not in a position to make an assessment of whether or not a rape had occurred.[350] In a subsequent appearance at our hearings, Dr Renshaw apologised for his comment: 'I know the suggestion caused additional grief to the Duncan family, and for that I … sincerely apologise to the family and to the Commission'.[351]

4.4 Tasmania Police investigation

Mr Duncan recalled to us that on 1 October 2001, after Child Safety Services had completed its investigation, Mrs Duncan reported Zoe's allegation of rape to Tasmania Police.[352] Mr Duncan said that the police asked Mrs Duncan why it took so long for her to make a report. Mrs Duncan told the police it was her belief that the matter would be reported by either Launceston General Hospital or Child Safety Services.[353]

Child Safety Services did eventually make an official notification to Tasmania Police on 8 October 2001. However, by this point, police were already investigating Zoe's allegations.[354] Former Commissioner Hine told us that the five-month delay in Child Safety Services reporting Zoe's allegations to Tasmania Police was 'not best practice' and 'unacceptable'.[355]

As part of its investigation, Tasmania Police accessed the material provided to Child Safety Services, along with the investigation report.[356] They also interviewed the investigator at Child Safety Services, as well as Zoe and Dr Tim.[357]

The Tasmania Police report records that, at an interview on 2 October 2001, the Child Safety Services investigator said:

> The matter had not been referred to police as protocols at [Child Safety Services] stipulate that where an allegation involves employees of the Department of Health and Human Services, then the Secretary of the Department must notify Police.[358]

Tasmania Police interviewed Zoe on 3 October 2001. In the report, the investigating officer described Zoe as 'extremely confident'.[359] The officer also observed that Zoe had been asked many of the questions before and that her answers did not require a lot of thought.[360] Dr Tim was interviewed on 11 October 2001 and 'emphatically' denied all allegations.[361]

Tasmania Police finalised the report of its investigation on 12 October 2001, around five months after Zoe's initial allegations. The report states that there were no witnesses, forensic evidence or medical evidence to support Zoe's allegations.[362] The report concludes that 'the allegation of rape is unfounded' and that 'there may have been an initial incident that Zoe may have been distressed by, however the fact that she has added to her story on many occasions does not hold her version as credible'.[363]

Counsel Assisting asked former Commissioner Hine at our hearings whether the Tasmania Police investigation report demonstrated a misunderstanding of how children make allegations of sexual abuse, insofar as police interpreted Zoe's incremental allegations as her changing her account of what happened. Commissioner Hine responded that it is now known that a victim's account can evolve over time and that this does not mean they did not experience trauma.[364]

As occurred in the Child Safety Services investigation, Tasmania Police did not contact or interview any of the staff on shift the night of Zoe's allegations, including the nurse who received Zoe's allegations, the after-hours nurse coordinator or the registrar. Tasmania Police did not speak with Dr Renshaw either.

Commissioner Hine retracted his view expressed in an earlier statement to our Commission of Inquiry that the Tasmania Police investigation was 'comprehensive', acknowledging that the police investigation had deficiencies.[365] Commissioner Hine accepted that any investigation should include following up with corroborating witnesses and reviewing evidence that might verify the circumstances being described by a victim, including early observations of how the victim presented in the aftermath of an alleged offence.[366] He agreed that the registrar at the hospital, in particular, should have been contacted by police as part of its investigation.[367]

Finding—Tasmania Police carried out an inadequate investigation of Zoe Duncan's allegations

In conducting their investigation, it appears that Tasmania Police relied on the Child Safety Services investigation report, which we have earlier described as inadequate.

Relevantly, Tasmania Police imported whole paragraphs from the Child Safety Services' report into its own report. These paragraphs reflected the Zoe Duncan file note, the view of Child Safety Services that Zoe's description of the way she was alleged to have been sexually abused was 'difficult to accept', and that the central nursing station was unlikely to have been unoccupied at the time that the alleged rape occurred.[368]

We consider that the Tasmania Police investigation was inadequate.

Former Commissioner Hine told us that Tasmania Police would today take a completely different approach to matters of this nature. He told us that an investigation would now involve an experienced detective assessing the matter, intermediary support being provided to a child while their account of events was collected, and the provision of support to the child and their family throughout the process.[369]

5 Subsequent actions, complaints and investigations

5.1 Attempts to obtain the Child Safety Services investigation report and hospital policies

Mr Duncan recalled that after police read out parts of the Tasmania Police investigation report, they attempted to get a copy of the Child Safety Services investigation report. It was clear to them that the former report had influenced the police investigation, and they wanted to ensure the Child Safety Services report was accurate.[370]

On 14 November 2001, the Duncans met with senior executives at Launceston General Hospital and representatives from the Department to raise concerns about the response to Zoe's allegations.[371] At the meeting, they requested a copy of the Child Safety Services' report but were told they would need to make a Freedom of Information Act application, which they did on 15 November 2001.[372] In their application, they also requested a copy of Launceston General Hospital's policy on the reporting of child abuse and neglect and the investigation protocol applicable to the Child Safety Services investigation.[373]

When the Duncans did not receive a response to their application, they wrote to the Commissioner for Children on 11 December 2001.[374] The Commissioner for Children replied that the Solicitor-General's Office had advised the report was either exempt from the Freedom of Information Act or was given in confidence and therefore could not be released.[375] Over the following months, the Commissioner for Children made several enquiries about the practices and policies in place at the hospital at the time of Zoe's allegation, including in relation to whether there was a chaperone policy, a protocol for reporting suspected abuse and neglect, and procedures applicable to investigating departmental staff.[376] The Duncans also recalled writing to the Ombudsman on 19 December 2001 to appeal the decision not to release the Child Safety Services investigation report.[377] On 21 December 2001, they received 27 of the 43 pages of the investigation report (with six of these pages containing redactions), as well as a copy of Launceston General Hospital's policy on reporting child abuse and neglect.[378] It was now the end of 2001 and Dr Tim had left Tasmania.[379]

On 2 May 2002, sexual assault service Laurel House, wrote to Ms Stackhouse on the Duncans' behalf. Laurel House told Ms Stackhouse that the Duncans were dissatisfied with the hospital's response and that they did not believe the hospital was acting in Zoe's best interests.[380] Laurel House requested that appropriate processes be put in place to keep children safe at the hospital, and that any future allegations of sexual abuse be properly investigated.[381] Ms Stackhouse responded to Laurel House's letter on 8 May 2002. She enclosed a draft chaperone policy with the letter, for comment, along with the protocol for reporting suspected abuse or neglect.[382] As noted, the Launceston General Hospital executive approved and implemented the chaperone policy in June 2002.[383]

5.2 Medical Council of Tasmania investigation

On 28 August 2002, the Duncans lodged a complaint with the Medical Council of Tasmania ('Council').[384] In carrying out its investigation, the Council sought information from Dr Renshaw and Tasmania Police.[385] Two case managers interviewed the Duncans and, unlike the earlier investigations by Child Safety Services and Tasmania Police, these case managers also interviewed the after-hours nurse coordinator (in person) and the registrar (by phone) who were on shift the night Zoe made her initial allegations.[386] Zoe was not interviewed because the case managers did not believe anything would be gained from this, considering it would 'likely … cause undue stress to Zoe'.[387] The Council also sought and received a written response to the complaint from Dr Tim.[388]

The Council finalised its investigation on 19 March 2003. Its investigation report states that the complaint 'has been extensively investigated'.[389] The report further notes that the Tasmania Police investigation report concluded that the allegation of rape was unfounded, that Zoe's general practitioner had been interviewed and examined Zoe and found the allegation to be 'implausible' with no remarkable examination findings, and that Child Safety Services were of the view that Zoe's description of events 'is difficult to accept'.[390]

The Council's investigation report concluded that it is 'highly unlikely' a rape could have occurred without anyone noticing but that 'something that occurred then or at some other time has distressed Zoe'.[391] There was no further comment in the report on Zoe's other allegations, which included that Dr Tim had touched her on the breast, digitally penetrated her mouth, commented on her physical appearance and expressed a desire to marry her.

The report noted that Dr Renshaw should have reported the matter on 21 May 2001 rather than 29 May, as 'an early investigation by appropriate investigators may have resulted in a clearer picture of events and less emotional trauma for Zoe'.[392] The Council wrote to the Duncans on 22 May 2003 advising them that the complaint was determined to be 'unsubstantial in that the complaint could not be proven'.[393]

It is apparent that the findings and observations in the earlier investigation reports by Child Safety Services and Tasmania Police, both of which we have found to be lacking in rigour, heavily influenced the Council's investigation.

These findings were available to and considered by Ahpra in 2021 when it undertook an investigation in response to notifications it received about Zoe's allegations against Dr Tim.

In a statement to us, Matthew Hardy, National Director of Notifications, Ahpra, said that 'Ahpra does not have access to enough information to form a view about the management of the notification by the former Medical Council of Tasmania'.[394] Mr Hardy also stated to us that it appeared that 'subsequent decision-making by the Council was influenced by the investigatory activity already undertaken by [Child Safety Services] and Tasmania Police'.[395]

Mr Hardy said if allegations like those made by Zoe Duncan arose today:

> I would expect that it would lead to a mandatory notification to the National Board. Such a notification would be administered under the National Law which confers investigative and protective powers on the current Medical Board of Australia and other national Boards. These powers allow immediate action to be taken to suspend or restrict a practitioner's registration while an investigation is being undertaken. Advances in approaches to investigating allegations of sexual misconduct and advances in technology facilitating greater collaboration between investigating authorities also play a significant role in today's administration of notifications alleging that a registered health practitioner has engaged in serious and potentially criminal conduct.[396]

We note that Dr Tim was investigated for similar conduct in another jurisdiction in relation to another patient, which resulted in Dr Tim's practice registration being cancelled (although he was permitted to re-apply in due course).

6 Zoe's death

The Duncans recalled that Zoe's final visit to Launceston General Hospital was in April 2015.[397] After this admission, Zoe decided not to return to the hospital.[398] The Duncans said they tried to get Zoe to go back because of her escalating health issues. However, the Duncans said that for several reasons, including the hospital's management of Zoe's allegations in 2001 and Zoe's ongoing distrust of the medical care provided by the hospital, she refused to attend the hospital again. The Duncans recalled that she said to them: 'No one believes me, no one, I can't trust what goes on here, I can't go back'.[399]

The Duncans told us that they knew when Zoe made the decision not to go back to the hospital that they would 'lose her' because her ongoing medical conditions required attention.[400] Because Launceston General Hospital was the only hospital nearby, there was nowhere else for Zoe to go if she became unwell.[401] Zoe died alone at her home in November 2017 from her health issues.[402] We make no finding in relation to the cause of Zoe's death.

Reflecting on their experience, the Duncans told us they 'cannot fathom why the key players involved throughout Zoe's ordeal were unable or unwilling to provide her with the support, understanding and ultimately the justice she deserved'.[403]

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed in its overall response and did not offer appropriate support to Zoe Duncan and her family

Despite many communications occurring across institutions about Zoe's allegations, at no time did Launceston General Hospital offer Zoe or her family any support. The Duncans recalled that when they did ask to access psychological support for Zoe they were told to make a request in writing to the chief executive officer of the hospital with the assistance of a lawyer.[404] The Duncans ended up arranging their own support for Zoe and, for a period of time, made regular trips to Hobart until Zoe decided to stop these visits.[405]

Ms Stackhouse conceded at our hearings that Launceston General Hospital's response to Zoe's allegations was 'inadequate'. She said the response 'did not prospectively protect other children from harm'.[406] She also said the matter was resolved 'in a manner that would not be considered appropriate today'.[407] Ms Stackhouse apologised to Zoe's family and acknowledged that the hospital had 'collectively let [Zoe's] family down'.[408]

The Department acknowledged the impact on the Duncan family. Kathrine Morgan-Wicks PSM, Secretary of the Department stated:

> To the memory of Zoe Duncan, to Mr and Mrs Duncan, and also to Amanda Duncan, you have waited a long time for Health to believe, and let me say that as the leader of Health, I believe. I am very sorry for what you have gone through for so many years to re-tell Zoe's story. I offer my deepest apology to you for our failure to hear what Zoe tried to tell us and which she ultimately revealed through incremental disclosure to her trusted parents and family.

7 Observations

Zoe's allegations have never been adequately investigated by Launceston General Hospital, Child Safety Services, Tasmania Police or relevant professional regulatory bodies. This failing may have exposed other children and young people to child sexual abuse.

This case study highlights key systemic issues relevant to responding to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse within a health institution. We consider the lessons of this case study include:

- the need to have appropriate policies and procedures in place to protect children from abuse and to immediately respond to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse
- the need to provide support to patients who make allegations of sexual abuse and their families
- the need for policies to ensure staff do not assume that their expertise enables them to make judgments about the veracity of abuse allegations by a patient, and that individual staff members at a hospital do not adopt the role of decision-maker and/or factfinder where a patient makes an allegation of sexual abuse
- the need for timely reporting and notification of allegations and incidents to appropriate external agencies
- the need for awareness-raising to break the myth that abusers do not perpetrate sexual abuse in locations where there is a 'high risk' of detection within health settings and elsewhere
- the need to apply independent and rigorous investigatory and disciplinary processes to complaints in health settings, and for these processes to use trauma-informed practices to minimise trauma for complainants.

The systemic deficiencies of Launceston General Hospital revealed by this case study, and ways to address them, are explored in more detail in Chapter 15.

By the time our report is published, 22 years will have passed since Zoe and her parents made a complaint to Launceston General Hospital, and some five and a half years will have passed since Zoe died.

Zoe, her parents, her sister and the broader community were entitled to a thorough and transparent investigation into the matters Zoe disclosed in May 2001. The deficiencies in the various investigations continued over many years. Our Commission of Inquiry has endeavoured to cast light on those events and on the subsequent inadequate investigations.

We acknowledge the pain and trauma these systemic failures visited upon Zoe, her parents and her sister. We acknowledge their love of Zoe, together with their dignity and determination in bringing these circumstances to the public's attention.

It is our hope that the systemic issues highlighted in this case study further increase awareness about the safety and wellbeing of children and young people across all health settings and inform action that is taken to safeguard children.

Case study 3: James Griffin

1 Introduction

James Geoffrey Griffin, also known as Jim, died at Launceston General Hospital on 18 October 2019 after an attempted suicide.[409] He was 69 years of age.[410] At the time of his death, Mr Griffin was facing serious criminal charges related to child sexual offending.[411] The coroner reviewing the circumstances of Mr Griffin's death found that: 'No doubt the charges he was facing at the time motivated his action'.[412]

Mr Griffin left devastation in his wake. Victim-survivors will not see him face accountability for his actions. During our Commission of Inquiry, we heard directly from many victim-survivors who experienced Mr Griffin's abuse and we became aware of more. We know there are many others who live with the uncertainty of never knowing whether they, or a loved one, experienced abuse by Mr Griffin, particularly if this may have occurred under the guise of medical care. Also, and notwithstanding the broad reach of our Inquiry, there are likely to be other victim-survivors of whom we are unaware.

Some victim-survivors of Mr Griffin's abuse were not in any way connected to Launceston General Hospital but came to know him through social or family connections. What they have in common with patients and former patients of Launceston General Hospital is the experience of traumatic abuse by a person they most likely trusted. All the evidence we received about Mr Griffin has been important in helping us understand the type of person he was and the tactics he used to groom and silence his victims. This information has explained, to some degree, how Mr Griffin was able to offend against children for as long as he did.

Mr Griffin's work and personal lives beyond Launceston General Hospital, including the abuse he perpetrated in other settings, were not considered by our Inquiry. This case study documents only the evidence about Mr Griffin's conduct during his employment at Launceston General Hospital and the responses of the Department, the Tasmanian Health Service, Launceston General Hospital and other agencies—including Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services—to his conduct. We also briefly mention his secondment to Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

We recognise that our insight into who Mr Griffin was as a person is somewhat limited because it is gained through the lens of his job at Launceston General Hospital and only a few people who were associated with him in a personal capacity.

1.1 Structure of this case study

This case study is divided into six sections. This section—Section 1—introduces the case study, outlines information sources and provides background information. Section 2 outlines our approach to findings and lists these. Section 3 is an overview of how those providing evidence to our Inquiry described Mr Griffin. Common themes emerged from these independent descriptions, including Mr Griffin's ability to charm those he sought to win over and to deflect and downplay concerns that arose about his behaviour. It is clear to us that Mr Griffin took advantage of his occupation as a nurse—including by positioning himself as going 'above and beyond' his duty to care for his patients—to disarm patients, parents and hospital staff.

We heard accounts of how Mr Griffin groomed young female patients by showing them affection, referring to them by pet names, spending social time with them and winning the trust and confidence of their parents. We also heard about Mr Griffin's opportunistic offending against patients who were admitted to the hospital for a short stay.

In Section 4, we document how leadership at Launceston General Hospital responded to the concerns raised, and complaints made, against Mr Griffin from when he began working on the paediatric ward until the suspension of his registration to work with vulnerable people on 31 July 2019.

The hospital received several complaints about Mr Griffin's behaviour over this period, most of which concerned his repeated breaches of professional boundaries with patients. Nurse unit managers often managed these complaints, sometimes with input from human resources staff. Mr Griffin was repeatedly cautioned and directed to undertake education to change his behaviour, but these low-level sanctions did not deter him. The hospital, Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services missed many opportunities throughout this period to piece together information held by each about Mr Griffin's inappropriate conduct towards children.

In Section 5 of this case study, we document how the hospital responded to the July 2019 notification that Mr Griffin's registration to work with vulnerable people had been suspended, and subsequent events relevant to Mr Griffin up until October 2021, at which time our Commission of Inquiry was underway.

In Section 6, we make some concluding remarks.

We heard about the variety of reactions that revelations of Mr Griffin's offending evoked in his colleagues, some of whom had known him for a long time and questioned whether they could or should have done more to protect the children and young people in their care. Some staff members also described their distress and frustration at the hospital's response, which some felt was not transparent or well communicated.

Presenting the large amount of information relevant to Mr Griffin was a challenge.

We have used a chronological format in Sections 4 and 5 of this case study to collate this information. We have documented the evidence against a timeline of the complaints about, and responses to, Mr Griffin's conduct at the hospital. However, within this chronological format we have sometimes included information from different periods, where that information either relates to the same issue and 'closes the loop' on a matter or where we think the information will clarify the circumstances of the event described.

In Section 4.2, where we summarise undocumented or undated complaints against Mr Griffin, we have grouped the information by source, rather than presenting the information by date. Sections 4 and 5 of this case study have been informed by witness statements, submissions and sessions with a Commissioner, some of which were provided anonymously. For procedural fairness reasons, we have been careful to use anonymous statements only to inform an understanding of the general themes in relation to Mr Griffin's conduct and not to inform our findings about the conduct of individuals.

1.2 Information sources

The information summarised in this case study came from the written statements and oral evidence of victim-survivors, their families and supporters, hospital staff and union representatives, members of the community and experts. Oral evidence was given at public hearings in June, July and September 2022. We also gathered information through public consultations and in private sessions with a Commissioner. Some information was clarified or further explained through our procedural fairness processes.

We also considered statements and oral evidence from senior managers and executives at Launceston General Hospital and the Department.

During Mr Griffin's employment at Launceston General Hospital, various bodies were responsible for the hospital's governance.[413] From 2016, overall governance of Launceston General Hospital sat with the Hospitals North Executive Committee.[414] This committee comprised the following operational roles (noting since this time some role titles may have changed):

- Chief Executive Hospitals North/North West (chair)
- Director Hospital Corporate and Support Services
- Director Launceston General Hospital Operations
- Director of Improvement
- Executive Director of Medical Services
- Executive Director of Nursing
- Nursing Director Primary Health.[415]

The Executive Director of Medical Services was the medico-legal lead for the hospital and police liaison in the response to Mr Griffin's case following the suspension of his registration to work with vulnerable people in July 2019.[416]

Human resources staff and management also played a significant role in managing complaints about Mr Griffin while he was an employee.

At our hearings, Kathrine Morgan-Wicks PSM, Secretary, Department of Health, told us that the executive structure at Launceston General Hospital has been in place for 'an incredibly long time'.[417]

The nursing management structure for the paediatric ward, Ward 4K, where Mr Griffin worked, comprised (in order from most senior to most junior):

- Executive Director of Nursing
- Nursing Director of Women's and Children's Services
- Nurse Unit Manager.[418]

In addition to receiving statements and oral evidence from individuals, we considered many volumes of documents produced by the State and others upon our request.

We received copies of some of Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreements on 20 December 2022, after an unmarked personnel file was discovered on Ward 4K. The staff members who found the file signed statutory declarations outlining the circumstances of the discovery. The file was securely provided to the Office of the Secretary of the Department, which provided it to us.[419]

The stated purpose of a Performance and Development Agreement ('Agreement') is to act as 'an essential tool intended to promote effective work practices across the Agency by clearly establishing the performance expected of our employees'.[420] We reviewed Mr Griffin's signed Agreements, which were in the unmarked personnel file described above, dated 31 December 2008, 31 March 2011, 6 March 2013, 21 March 2014, 27 March 2015, 23 March 2016, 25 May 2018 and 22 May 2019. We reference these Agreements throughout this case study.

We note more broadly that:

- We did not receive Agreements prepared before 2008, or those that would have been signed in 2009, 2010, 2012 and 2017. It is unclear whether Agreements were prepared in these years.
- The years when Agreements appear not to have been prepared coincide with years in which a number of complaints were made about Mr Griffin. In circumstances where (as we discuss in this chapter) education and support were the primary strategies to change Mr Griffin's behaviour, we expect that an Agreement would and should have documented this information. It is unfortunate we have not been able to review these or confirm if they were prepared.

- There is no mention of past complaints about Mr Griffin in any of his Agreements, nor is there reference to behaviours that management identified as problematic.

1.2.1 Tasmania Police reviews

In late 2020 following the release of The Nurse podcast (discussed in Section 1.2.3), Tasmania Police initiated several internal reviews to examine the police response to reports from the public and other agencies about Mr Griffin. We outline these reviews here, and we refer to their findings throughout this case study.

On 26 August 2019, a detective inspector prepared the report Investigation into Allegations of Sexual Assault by James Geoffrey Griffin (14 August 1950) for the Deputy Commissioner.[421]

On 26 October 2020, a report titled Griffin, James (Jim) Geoffrey (14/08/1950) - Investigative Review was prepared by the same detective inspector for the then Acting Commander of the Northern District of Tasmania Police.[422] The following day, the Acting Commander provided a summary and attached a copy of the report in correspondence to the Deputy Commissioner of Tasmania Police, Jonathan Higgins APM.[423] This report was prepared after the Department began an internal and external review. This report documented a review of intelligence holdings and investigative actions by Tasmania Police relating to Mr Griffin.[424]

In November 2020, another investigative review was conducted. This review involved a 'critical analysis of investigations conducted in relation to the various information received in relation to Mr Griffin from 2009 until his death in October 2019'.[425]

On 23 December 2020, a Revised Interim Report into the Review of Police Investigations Relating to James Griffin was prepared by another detective inspector for the Commander of Professional Standards of Tasmania Police.[426] In February 2021, a Review of Matters Surrounding James Geoffrey Griffin was prepared by a Commander for the then Acting Deputy Commissioner, who is now the Commissioner of Tasmania Police.[427]

On 26 February 2021, the Outcomes Report—Tasmania Police Internal Review of Police Actions Relating to James Geoffrey Griffin was released. This report provides an overview of key findings from the abovementioned reviews.[428] The media release accompanying this report included an apology to victim-survivors who were let down by the failures of Tasmania Police in responding to complaints about Mr Griffin. The media release also stated:

> It's important to note that Tasmania Police acted to review our own response—before the Commission of Inquiry was announced—as we wanted to identify issues and areas for change as soon as possible.[429]

The report omits that Tasmania Police were informed about concerns regarding Mr Griffin in 2000 and 2019. The report commits Tasmania Police to developing new guidelines for investigating child sexual offences and new practices of information sharing with other agencies. These changes are discussed in our chapter on criminal justice responses (Chapter 16).

We acknowledge the initiative taken by Tasmania Police to accept responsibility for its failings, which it did so after Mr Griffin's offending became public knowledge. We nonetheless make a number of findings against Tasmania Police throughout this case study, in the interests of transparency and noting the brevity of the outcomes report. We also supplement the key findings of that report with additional information and reflections on Tasmania Police's conduct.

1.2.2 Independent investigation into the management of historical reports of child sexual abuse

As discussed in more detail below, on 22 October 2020, the former Premier, the Honourable Peter Gutwein MP and the then Minister for Health, the Honourable Sarah Courtney MP, announced the Independent Investigation into the Systems of the Tasmanian Health Service and Relevant Government Agencies/Organisations Relating to the Management of Historical Reports of Allegations of Child Sexual Abuse ('Independent Investigation').[430] This occurred after the Department began its own internal review. The terms of reference for the Independent Investigation required examination of the circumstances surrounding Mr Griffin's conduct. The terms of reference also required consideration of what previous or current systems used by the Tasmanian Health Service, the Department and/or other government agencies did or did not operate to:

- require or encourage people to report known or suspected child sexual abuse and/or require appropriate authorities to investigate or respond to the risk of child sexual abuse occurring in the Tasmanian Health Service, or
- alleviate to the best extent possible the risk of the repetition of child sexual abuse by an employee who is alleged to have perpetrated, or is under investigation for, child sexual abuse.[431]

The terms of reference also requested advice about other actions and changes to current systems that could minimise the risk of child sexual abuse within the Tasmanian Health Service, given the Tasmanian Government's agreement to implement recommendations from the National Royal Commission.[432]

Our Commission of Inquiry was announced a month later. The Order establishing our Commission of Inquiry created a remit across a range of government-led and funded institutions, beyond the terms of reference of the Independent Investigation. However, the Order also specifically required us to consider:

> The adequacy and appropriateness of the responses of the Tasmanian Health Service and the Department of Health to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in the matter of James Geoffrey Griffin (deceased 18 October 2019).[433]

As a result, the Independent Investigation ended, and information obtained as part of that investigation was given to our Commission of Inquiry to inform our work.[434]

1.2.3 The Nurse podcast

Throughout this case study we refer to The Nurse podcast, which was produced by freelance journalist Camille Bianchi. The podcast covered abuses at Launceston General Hospital, particularly by Mr Griffin, but also alleged abuses by other health practitioners including Dr Tim (a pseudonym), which we explore in Case study 2.

We recognise the important role The Nurse podcast played in bringing Launceston General Hospital's failings to light and contributing to the momentum to establish our Commission of Inquiry. We had the benefit of Ms Bianchi's evidence in hearings and full transcripts of the podcast and are grateful for her assistance.

The Nurse podcast informed our lines of enquiry with various witnesses, particularly in the early stages of seeking information and identifying appropriate witnesses. However, we have not relied on the information in the podcast in our findings, noting we have had the benefit of powers to compel documents and evidence from witnesses, which we have used to inform our conclusions.

2 Findings

We make findings throughout this case study. We explain our general approach to making findings in Chapter 1. For the purposes of this case study, the findings reflect our determination of what did and did not occur at various points throughout Mr Griffin's employment at Launceston General Hospital. Some findings were straightforward to make because we could verify the information we received through documents and independent witnesses, or because those involved conceded or admitted to the subject of the finding. In instances where we did not have corroborative documentary evidence, we have sometimes made a finding where, having assessed all available evidence, we consider it is more likely than not that a particular event or outcome occurred.

We note that as a commission of inquiry we are not bound by the rules of evidence nor the standards of proof that apply to a criminal proceeding. We have adopted a 'balance of probabilities' standard of proof. A commission of inquiry must not express a conclusion of law in respect of the legal liability of a person. We have not recommended any criminal investigation in relation to any of the people against whom we have made adverse findings.[435]

We are conscious that Mr Griffin's death shortly after he was charged put an end to any criminal prosecution against him that might otherwise have followed. This has removed the opportunity for Mr Griffin's conduct to be established as child sexual abuse beyond reasonable doubt as part of a criminal process. As discussed in Chapter 1, we have accepted the truth of the accounts of abuse from victim-survivors but acknowledge that their accounts have not been assessed against this higher criminal standard of proof nor against the civil standard of balance of probabilities.

Some of the information we received from witnesses provided relevant context to understanding what occurred at Launceston General Hospital during Mr Griffin's tenure, but we could not find enough supporting evidence to meet a 'balance of probabilities' threshold. As such, we cannot and do not make a finding. In these circumstances, we have presented the information received (where we had the permission of those providing it to do so) and explained why we could not make a finding.

We also heard several rumours and received other speculative information relevant to Mr Griffin, his perpetration of abuse and the hospital's response. Where this has not fallen within the scope of our Inquiry, or where we have had no means to verify such information, we have not given it any weight when making our findings or included such information in our report.

The findings we have made, particularly against individuals, were not made lightly. We took great care to ensure we considered all relevant information and provided a fair reflection of the evidence we received, including any qualifications, corrections or alternative explanations that witnesses provided us. We have set out much of the evidence that we have received below. It is important to note that no finding is made where we have not specifically identified it as such.

In Section 4, we find there were significant failures on the part of Launceston General Hospital to respond to Mr Griffin's repeated and escalating boundary breaches and his inappropriate contact with child patients. We make several findings in relation to these failings:

- Launceston General Hospital failed to respond appropriately to Kylee Pearn's disclosure of abuse by James Griffin in 2011 or 2012, leaving children exposed to potential risk for eight years.
- Luigino Fratangelo and James Bellinger received a disclosure of child sexual abuse from Kylee Pearn relating to James Griffin in 2011 or 2012.
- Launceston General Hospital did not have adequate processes to ensure the meeting with Kylee Pearn was recorded and that record was retained.
- Launceston General Hospital's response to Will Gordon's 2017 Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint did not comply with the requirements of a State Service Code of Conduct investigation.

- Launceston General Hospital failed to manage the risks posed by James Griffin.
- Launceston General Hospital leadership collectively failed to address a toxic culture in Ward 4K that enabled James Griffin's offending to continue and prevented his conduct being reported.
- Launceston General Hospital failed to consider the cumulative effect of complaints about James Griffin.
- The response of Launceston General Hospital to complaints about James Griffin suggested it was ultimately not concerned about his conduct.
- Leadership at Launceston General Hospital collectively failed to provide appropriate supervision and proactive oversight, which is a systemic problem.
- Launceston General Hospital did not have a robust system for managing complaints involving child safety.
- Launceston General Hospital had no clear system, procedures or process in place to report complaints about James Griffin to external agencies.
- James Griffin had the ability to take and misuse medications from Launceston General Hospital.

We consider that many of these failings may have contributed to staff deciding against reporting Mr Griffin's behaviour and contributed to Mr Griffin being able to offend for as long as he did.

We learned that Mr Griffin had come to the attention of other government institutions, including Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services, in the lead-up to and during his employment at Launceston General Hospital. Each agency held vital pieces of the information puzzle about Mr Griffin's risk to children and yet we saw failures to share such information and work collaboratively, noting that information held by Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services was not shared with the Department before July 2019.

Tasmania Police failed to appropriately act when reports of Mr Griffin's conduct were received—most notably in 2015, when Australian Federal Police passed on significant intelligence about Mr Griffin's offending that was not accessed by Tasmania Police until 2019. Despite receiving notifications about Mr Griffin, Child Safety Services took only perfunctory steps to assess the risk that Mr Griffin posed to children. We make the following findings against these agencies:

- Child Safety Services should not have closed its November 2011 case into James Griffin without making further enquiries and ensuring Tasmania Police had all the information it required.
- Tasmania Police should have made further enquiries to receive the notifier's identity and reviewed previous intelligence holdings relating to James Griffin when receiving the November 2011 information from Child Safety Services.

- Child Safety Services should have taken further steps to assess the risk James Griffin posed in 2013 when concerns were again reported about him.
- Tasmania Police should have reviewed all intelligence holdings about James Griffin in 2013 when a report to Child Safety Services was made.
- The child safety system in the mid-2010s was not designed to address child sexual abuse in institutional settings.
- Tasmania Police failed to act on highly probative evidence regarding James Griffin provided by the Australian Federal Police in 2015.

In Section 5, we find that Launceston General Hospital failed in multiple ways to appropriately respond to an extensive history of complaints against Mr Griffin after his registration to work with vulnerable people was revoked, and we make the following findings:

- The response of Launceston General Hospital to revelations about James Griffin's offending was passive and ineffective.
- Leadership at Launceston General Hospital was dysfunctional and this compromised its collective response to revelations about James Griffin.
- Launceston General Hospital did not have clear accountabilities for child safety.
- The lack of a coordinated and transparent response by Launceston General Hospital increased feelings of mistrust among hospital staff.
- Launceston General Hospital should ensure open disclosure processes are trauma-informed.

We have further found that some individuals failed to fully and accurately convey the knowledge they held about Mr Griffin's conduct to the Office of the Secretary of the Department, which had the effect of creating a misleading picture of the scale of the crisis and impairing fully informed decision making by the Secretary and that office. Some of this information was critical and may have changed the course of events, had it been escalated and shared. Our findings in this regard include:

- Dr Peter Renshaw misled the Chief Executive of Launceston General Hospital and the then Secretary of the Department by failing to fully and accurately convey information relating to James Griffin received from Tasmania Police on 31 July 2019.
- The human resources team failed to escalate information they received on 11 October 2019 about Kylee Pearn's 2011 or 2012 disclosure.
- Dr Peter Renshaw should have escalated and acted on knowledge of Kylee Pearn's disclosure to the hospital once advised of it by Tasmania Police on 29 October 2019.

- Dr Peter Renshaw misled the Secretary of the Department about James Griffin.
- James Bellinger did not conduct a proper investigation into James Griffin's complaints history and misled the Secretary of the Department and the Integrity Commission.

We found some significant failures to identify and manage conflicts of interest relating to the hospital's response to Mr Griffin. Our findings in this regard are:

- Launceston General Hospital's human resources team should not have been involved in the request or preparation of a statement from Stewart Millar regarding Kylee Pearn's disclosure.
- James Bellinger should not have taken the statement from Stewart Millar.

The response to Mr Griffin's conduct was further let down by Tasmania's Integrity Commission, which received a complaint in November 2019 outlining major concerns with how the hospital had managed complaints about Mr Griffin over the years. Despite the Integrity Commission's initial assessment of the complaint, which it recognised as serious, it decided to refer the matter back to the Department for investigation. We find that:

- The Integrity Commission should have ensured Will Gordon's complaint to them was robustly and independently reviewed.
- The Integrity Commission's monitoring of the Department's response to Will Gordon's complaint was insufficient and it should have sought further review.

As noted, we have found that one individual, Dr Peter Renshaw, former Executive Director of Medical Services, Launceston General Hospital, deliberately misled his superiors. We also consider he misled our Commission of Inquiry. Dr Renshaw withheld information from us, fundamentally frustrating our ability to fully understand what happened at Launceston General Hospital. Recognising the gravity of such a finding, we applied a high threshold to the evidence that supported it. We disregarded evidence that could be attributed to a mistake or failure of memory and, in relation to questions of fact and findings, we sought clarification and explanation from Dr Renshaw to ensure we did not misunderstand his intention, and to provide a right of response or further explanation. We took a similar approach to those who are subject to our findings.

We found Dr Renshaw misled our Commission of Inquiry about his state of knowledge. We consider this conduct was unprofessional and unethical and brings the State Service into disrepute. We therefore find that Dr Renshaw's conduct constitutes misconduct under section 18 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995.

3 How people described Mr Griffin to us

Before we chronicle Mr Griffin's conduct and the hospital's response to it, it is important to summarise evidence we heard about Mr Griffin as a person. The evidence we received suggests that Mr Griffin's way of interacting with others was key to his ability to evade accountability for his actions.

Victim-survivor Tiffany Skeggs described to us how Mr Griffin groomed her:

> Griffin had an aura that oozed kindness and sincerity. He was sympathetic and compassionate. He provided me with all the attention a young girl could possibly want. I was fatherless. I was instinctively searching for a male role model in my life. Griffin provided love and safety. He was understanding and encouraging.[436]

Keelie McMahon, who was also abused by Mr Griffin, told us that Mr Griffin could adapt to whoever he was with to ingratiate himself:

> He made himself 'valuable' to other people. He was always able to find other people's interests so he could talk to them and please them. He would pump you up so you would feel good spending time with him. I can't recall many people ever speaking badly of Jim, and if they did, others around him would always jump to his defence.[437]

By most accounts, Mr Griffin was very effective at grooming young victims, some of whom were highly vulnerable because of their health conditions or family circumstances. A former colleague, who observed Mr Griffin's behaviour on Ward 4K, said:

> James Griffin didn't just groom kids, he groomed everyone. He groomed his colleagues and friends. Now that he's dead, people seem to think that he wasn't smart, but the reality is he was incredibly smart, both intuitively and from a nasty place.[438]

This same colleague described how Mr Griffin would use his age to justify some of his inappropriate jokes or behaviour in the workplace. We heard that when colleagues confronted Mr Griffin about using the term 'baby girl' with female staff, Mr Griffin:

> … replied with words to the effect of 'I'm old guard. I've always said these things. It gets me in trouble sometimes but that's the way I am'. That was James Griffin's tactic if he ever got pulled up on these things. He would say he doesn't do PC [political correctness] and that PC was a construct of generation X and generation Y.[439]

Mr Griffin often did favours for or showed kindness towards female colleagues. Many witnesses told us that they now understand this behaviour was part of his grooming process. A former colleague of Mr Griffin, Maria Unwin, described how he would take shifts for other staff to win their favour.[440] Another former colleague described Mr Griffin's behaviour as: 'He oozed "I'm here for you"'.[441]

Many witnesses shared stories about how Mr Griffin would paint himself as a 'hero'.[442] Mr Griffin told a regular patient of Ward 4K, Kirsty Neilley, that he had saved her life when she was having a seizure from an attempted drug overdose:

> From this day on, Jim would never let me forget that night. He would always tell me how he saved my life. I believed him and regarded him as my hero. My mum regarded him the same way. She still says now that Jim saving my life is worth more than any of the bad things he could have done.[443]

Another Ward 4K patient and victim-survivor abused by Mr Griffin told us: 'After not too long, he had developed a "friendship" with Mum and Dad and had gained their trust. They really trusted him'.[444] These dynamics made her less inclined to disclose the abuse because 'Jim was a big part of our family'.[445]

Kim (a pseudonym) described her experience of Mr Griffin caring for her daughter Paula (a pseudonym) in hospital: 'I observed him to be a "touchy-feely" person, but I thought he was friendly and caring'.[446] She stated that her trust in Mr Griffin developed as her daughter stayed in touch with him outside the hospital setting: 'I thought he could see how hard it was for me with four children, trying to work, trying to care for [Paula], and that his interest in [Paula] was part of him caring about other people'.[447]

One victim-survivor who was abused by Mr Griffin told us: 'In my opinion, James Griffin had a career that was structured around paedophilia'.[448] She described him as having a brazen persona, which seemed unaffected by the abuses he perpetrated. She told us:

> I never confronted James Griffin about what he did to me. He was so confident with everything he did that he just carried on around me like everything was normal and he had done nothing wrong. While he carried on as normal, he knew that I knew.[449]

Those who questioned or challenged Mr Griffin, or who were not the targets of his grooming tactics, often gave us a different view of his personality. One of the former colleagues we mention above stated that Mr Griffin 'appeared to not like the other male nurses on the ward. I think this was because we recognised things that he did openly, things that we as male nurses just would not do'.[450]

Ms Unwin expressed that she felt 'wary' of Mr Griffin from their first meeting. She said that when allocating patients to staff, she would divert vulnerable young female patients from Mr Griffin's care.[451] She described how Mr Griffin would 'glare' when she did this and how, one time, he confronted her in a small staff kitchen about this practice. She characterised his approach and body language on that occasion as 'intimidating'.[452]

Ms Unwin's experience was echoed by Ward 4K nurse Will Gordon, who told us:

> At times James was imposing. Although he wasn't overly tall he was broad, so when he got fired up, he cast a shadow. I felt that some of the nurses were intimidated by him when he did get fired up.[453]

Many victim-survivors believed they were the only one Mr Griffin abused. Ms Skeggs explained: 'The main reason I remained quiet and protected Griffin for such an extended period of time was because I thought I was special. He made me think I was the only one'.[454]

In offering his reflections on Mr Griffin, investigating police officer Detective Senior Constable Glenn Hindle told us that Mr Griffin would often enmesh victim-survivors with his own family so that victim-survivors believed speaking up about their abuse would cause harm to Mr Griffin's children:

> … he sought opportunity to touch children and then said to those children, 'You can never say anything because this is what I'll lose in life, these kids won't have a father' and those sorts of things …[455]

Understanding how Mr Griffin conducted himself goes some way to explaining why many colleagues, managers and others at Launceston General Hospital did not take appropriate action in response to his offending.

4 Complaints about Mr Griffin

On foldout →

In this section—Section 4—we document how Launceston General Hospital responded to the concerns raised about, and complaints made against, Mr Griffin from when he started working on the paediatric ward until the suspension of his registration to work with vulnerable people in July 2019.

We consider the hospital's response to documented and undocumented complaints in turn and make findings in relation to both. Other matters of concern about Mr Griffin, including allegations of Mr Griffin's unauthorised use of hospital medications to drug patients, are considered at the end of this section.

4.1 Documented or acknowledged complaints against Mr Griffin

In this section, we consider the concerns raised and complaints made against Mr Griffin by patients, their family members, staff at the hospital and others that were documented or otherwise acknowledged by the hospital's management, Child Safety Services or Tasmania Police between the year 2000 and July 2019.

4.1.1 19 September 2000—A report is made to Tasmania Police about images and browser history found on Mr Griffin's laptop

On 19 September 2000, Tasmania Police received information of concern about Mr Griffin.[456] The person who contacted police had purchased a laptop computer from Mr Griffin. Sometime later, having connected the computer to the internet, the person discovered concerning bookmarked links to websites with titles that suggested child exploitation material, as well as a cache of photographs of apparently pre-pubescent girls, naked or wearing only underwear.[457] In correspondence to Tasmania Police, this person wrote: 'I need to know if anything can be done … especially given that he is a [practising registered nurse], possibly working with children'.[458]

We heard that, following some back and forth and a review of the images, Tasmania Police ultimately declined to act, with the person recalling that Tasmania Police said that 'not enough was found on the computer to move forward'.[459] In some of those communications with Tasmania Police, the new laptop owner acknowledged that none of the images he witnessed were 'openly pornographic' but found them concerning nonetheless.[460] Upon learning of our hearings, this person contacted us and told us that 'it is very likely that I was the first person to alert any authorities about [Mr Griffin]' and that, although police decided not to take further action, 'at least my contact would put his name in a detective's mind and create a dot for any future join the dots inquiry'.[461]

Many years later, on 30 November 2019, Detective Senior Constable Glenn Hindle, who was then in charge of an investigation into Mr Griffin, answered a call from the same person who had contacted police in September 2000 about the disturbing laptop content. Detective Senior Constable Hindle told us that during this call the person explained that they had purchased a computer from Mr Griffin many years ago and later identified what they believed to be child exploitation material on the device, which they had reported to the police at the time. Detective Senior Constable Hindle described being 'a little bit perplexed' he hadn't previously come across this information.[462] Detective Senior Constable Hindle could not find evidence in any Tasmania Police records of this person's earlier report to police.[463]

Based on this person again describing the images discovered on Mr Griffin's old laptop, Detective Senior Constable Hindle formed the view that it was unlikely these images met the legal definition of child exploitation material, and hence, while being a moral concern, were not a legal concern to him.[464] He made a record of their 2019 conversation on 1 December 2020.[465] Detective Senior Constable Hindle acknowledged it was possible that he made the record a year after the conversation had taken place, although it is unclear to us how or why this occurred and he had difficulty recalling specific dates.[466]

Former Commissioner of Tasmania Police, Darren Hine AO APM, clarified that hard-copy records indicated the original complaint was escalated to a senior level and referred for investigation in 2001.[467] He confirmed that police in New South Wales carried out a forensic examination of the laptop and that no offences were detected.[468] Commissioner

Hine acknowledged that Tasmania Police had only limited information about this report because it was not entered into a police database until Detective Senior Constable Hindle did so in December 2020. However, Commissioner Hine concluded: 'I am satisfied from the scant information available on this matter that Tasmania Police acted appropriately on this occasion'.[469]

While we recognise information that suggests inappropriate conduct can appear less significant or probative in isolation, such information can become more significant over time when other complaints or concerns are reported to police. It is unfortunate, therefore, that the initial complaint was not recorded in a way that would allow easy access to the information for police in the future so they could 'join the dots', acknowledging that Tasmania Police did not implement an online intelligence system until 2002.[470]

4.1.2 September 2001—Mr Griffin is employed on Ward 4K at Launceston General Hospital

On 11 September 2001, Mr Griffin started working as a registered nurse on Ward 4K—the paediatric ward—at Launceston General Hospital.[471] The evidence we have indicates that he held this role until August 2019, except for two intervening temporary assignments:

- Between 14 June and 11 July 2009, Mr Griffin was assigned as a nurse to the Launceston General Hospital emergency department.[472]
- Between 19 November 2017 and 27 April 2018, Mr Griffin was seconded as a nurse to Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[473]

In all these roles, Mr Griffin had access to children and young people. His secondment to Ashley Youth Detention Centre is discussed in Section 4.1.29.

4.1.3 2002—A complaint is made about non-care related touching of a patient

We have received evidence that Mr Griffin was spoken to about professional boundaries in 2002. However, aside from records later made in 2009 by Sonja Leonard, when she was the Nurse Unit Manager of Ward 4K, and Clinical Nurse Educator Michael Sherring, we have little detail about this incident. As discussed further below, as part of her response to a complaint made on 14 January 2009 concerning Mr Griffin handing out his personal phone number to patients, Ms Leonard met with Mr Griffin on 11 February 2009. Ms Leonard's undated notes from this meeting state that she reminded Mr Griffin of the previous times that she or others counselled him about his behaviour. Her notes included the following reference:

> I mentioned there were other times [I had counselled Mr Griffin about professional boundaries] that he obviously didn't recall the time I spoke to him as a Level 2 [registered nurse] re prof. boundaries with [a person] and Michael Sherring and [a nurse unit manager] when he was doing Grad Cert course.[474]

We do not know the identity of the person and we did not request this information.

On 21 January 2009, around the time Ms Leonard was managing this complaint, Mr Sherring was asked by Ms Leonard to document his 2002 meeting with Mr Griffin about his behaviour. In response, Mr Sherring prepared a file note:

> The 2002 discussion concerning professional boundaries has centred around overly friendly behaviour regarding children and young people exhibited by Jim. This includes hugging on greeting and other non care related touching. I identified the inappropriateness of this and the potential risk of people misinterpreting such behaviour. Jim did not appear to identify anything wrong with his behaviour despite advice from myself that it was inappropriate and however innocent would be considered unprofessional.[475]

During the hearings, Mr Sherring was asked to reflect on this 2002 complaint:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: So is it fair that in the conversation you had with him in 2002, he demonstrated to you a lack of insight into the impropriety of his behaviour?
>
> A [Mr Sherring]: Yep.
>
> Q: Why was he permitted to continue working with children?
>
> A: I can't answer that.
>
> Q: Do you think that a minimum prerequisite was that he understand that what he did was inappropriate?
>
> A: Yes.[476]

Mr Sherring agreed that the 2002 complaint should have been recorded, and that this type of complaint would generally be kept on ward personnel files held in the Nurse Unit Manager's office.[477] This summary is captured in the following exchange:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: What were the processes for escalating concerns about a person whose behaviour was inappropriate where they failed to appreciate it?
>
> A [Mr Sherring]: Those details would have gone to the Nurse Unit Manager at the time and they as the performance managers would have been the people to pursue that in that first instance.
>
> Q: I've been unable to locate any documents reflecting those 2002 issues. Is it your evidence that there should be some?
>
> A: Yes.
>
> Q: Where would they have been stored?
>
> A: To the best of my knowledge, there were personnel files kept on the ward at that time, in two D-ring folders in the Nurse Unit Manager's office, and my understanding would have been that any documentation related to nurses, whether it was employment records or other file notes, would have been kept in those.[478]

As noted above, we received Mr Griffin's personnel file in December 2022. It did not include any documentation about the 2002 complaint.

In his 2009 file note, Mr Sherring also appears to reference a complaint discussed in Section 4.1.5 regarding Mr Griffin kissing a patient on the head.[479]

4.1.4 July 2004—The hospital receives a complaint about Mr Griffin hugging a former patient

In July 2004, the then Nurse Unit Manager of Ward 4K received an incident form about the way Mr Griffin greeted an adolescent girl who had previously been an inpatient and was visiting the ward.[480] A copy of the form has not been located. The Nurse Unit Manager at the time recalls that it stated Mr Griffin hugged the girl. The Nurse Unit Manager told us that while they had some difficulties recollecting this incident, they agreed that the physical contact amounted to 'professional misconduct'.[481] They described their practice in response to such circumstances as having a conversation with the relevant staff member and then giving them a letter.[482] In this case, their final words in the letter to Mr Griffin cautioned: 'Whilst this behaviour may seem innocent to you, it may well have potential implications in the future and we ask that it is not repeated'.[483]

The Nurse Unit Manager said that a copy of this letter was sent to the human resources team, to be placed on Mr Griffin's file.[484] The Nurse Unit Manager also told us that they would have notified their manager, Sue McBeath, who was Director of Nursing, Women's and Children's Services, about this complaint.[485] However, Ms McBeath did not recall the incident in her statement to us and was not asked for her recollection of the matter during her oral evidence.[486]

4.1.5 Late 2005—A parent complains about Mr Griffin kissing their daughter on the forehead

In late 2005, the same Nurse Unit Manager recalled receiving a phone call from the concerned parent of a young girl. This parent informed the Nurse Unit Manager that Mr Griffin had kissed their daughter on the forehead, resulting in their daughter 'vigorously rubbing her face'.[487] The parent did not wish to make a formal complaint but did tell the Nurse Unit Manager that the incident had made them feel uneasy and that they wanted to express their concern.[488] The Nurse Unit Manager agreed that Mr Griffin's behaviour was 'most inappropriate' and gave Mr Griffin a letter indicating their concern and requesting that he provide them with a written explanation of his conduct.[489]

Mr Griffin responded in writing, acknowledging that the incident did occur. He explained it as a 'spontaneous action' in response to the patient not wanting to go to bed. He added:

> In retrospect I believe I did this as a way of establishing a level of friendship, rather than being seen by her as some kind of authoritarian figure. While this may have been seen by [the parent] in [their] context as a [professional role], > as an inappropriate act, giving a child a kiss as a show of something caring is something that is done often on the ward by many, nursing, and other, staff. I do, however, accept that this may not be seen as appropriate.[490]

The Nurse Unit Manager again wrote to Mr Griffin, formally requesting that he speak with the Clinical Nurse Educator, Mr Sherring, to 'further discuss issues around associations, care provision, and boundaries relating to gender issues and the workplace'.[491] They included a copy of the document Professional Boundaries Standards for Nurses in Tasmania with the letter.[492]

Mr Sherring told us he was concerned about Mr Griffin's behaviour because it was 'outside [the] acceptable professional boundaries guidelines' that applied at the time.[493] Mr Sherring had a discussion with Mr Griffin, which he reported back to the Nurse Unit Manager in a memo.[494] Mr Sherring made several points in the memo about his conversation with Mr Griffin, including that:

- Mr Griffin acknowledged that the incident involving the forehead kiss went beyond what he would normally consider 'an appropriate comfort measure' and that it occurred due to the 'specific circumstances of the events'.[495]
- Mr Griffin agreed to 'step back from direct care', despite a specific request from a patient or their family that he care for them, where doing so may not be appropriate in the circumstances. Mr Sherring and Mr Griffin discussed ways to do this 'without distressing either the child or family'.[496]

Mr Sherring also noted in his memo that:

> Jim recognises that there may be a disproportionate focus on the interactions of males in nursing roles with children in paediatric settings and that there is an increased need for awareness of how nursing behaviours with children may be viewed by others.[497]

The Nurse Unit Manager submitted all the relevant documents to the human resources team, to be placed on Mr Griffin's file 'in case any future issues arise'.[498]

The Nurse Unit Manager believes they 'would have verbally spoken to Sue McBeath, Director of Nursing Women's and Children's Services' about this complaint and the previous complaint of July 2004.[499] They also said there were regular meetings between ward managers and clinical nurse managers and the human resources team.[500] Ms McBeath recalls that the complaint was only informally reported to her after the Nurse Unit Manager had responded to the complaint.[501] She also recalls only discussing a complaint in relation to a male nurse kissing the forehead of a young female patient, and not that it specifically involved Mr Griffin.[502]

Reflecting on their own handling of Mr Griffin's behaviour, the Nurse Unit Manager told us they did not have any professional education about child sexual abuse throughout their nursing career and that they had not had to manage child abuse matters prior to complaints about Mr Griffin.[503] They added:

> At the time I felt I addressed the incidents appropriately, however my focus was on professional boundaries, not sexual abuse. In hindsight, I now understand my concerns were inadequately acted upon.[504]

A subsequent Nurse Unit Manager, Sonja Leonard, told us she was aware that Mr Griffin had kissed a patient on the forehead, but she was not aware of the circumstances surrounding the complaint.[505]

4.1.6 November 2008—Sonja Leonard becomes the Nurse Unit Manager on Ward 4K

A number of current and former staff of Ward 4K described a workplace culture, both post and prior to ward staff's knowledge of Mr Griffin's offending, that was tense, defensive and discouraging of feedback and reflection.

Ms Leonard, who was the Ward 4K Nurse Unit Manager from November 2008 until December 2020, conceded in evidence that she had a different management style to her predecessor and that her style was not well received by staff.[506] Shortly after starting in the role, we were told Ms Leonard was met with a no-confidence motion from staff on the ward. Former Ward 4K nurse, Annette Whitemore, described what happened after this:

> An external facilitator was then engaged to 'rebuild the nursing team' on the ward. I recall the facilitator talking to staff, asking us to blow up a balloon, put our worries in the balloon and pop it.[507]

Ward 4K staff took part in other team building initiatives over the years. In August 2012, for example, Mr Griffin signed a document titled 4K Leadership Team: Agreed Values, which was in his personnel file.[508] This read in part:

> Following much team building and time, we the members of the 4K … leadership team have agreed on the following values. We believe that following these values and ensuring we work according to these values that our team will build in strength. By doing so we will regain the trust of our leadership team colleagues, and also the respect of 4K staff. As leaders of the 4K team it is important we do this, not only for ourselves, but also our 4K team.[509]

The document included overarching values of 'respect', 'constructive communication' and 'trust'—including 'safety to be able to speak up'.[510] It is unclear why Mr Griffin signed this document given he was not formally on the ward's management team.

Will Gordon, a registered nurse mentioned earlier, recalled that before starting work on Ward 4K in 2016, several nurses told him to 'watch out for the Nurse Unit Manager'.[511] He described the culture when he started on the ward as one of 'tension' and 'high anxiety', adding that nurses were 'constantly watching their backs' and afraid to make any sort of error.[512] Ms Whitemore similarly described an ongoing 'culture of mistrust' and a ward that was 'divided and disjointed'. She added:

> I believe the culture on Ward 4K made it easier for [Mr Griffin] to do what he did. He saw the cracks and put himself in there. He would take Sonja's side. I've been told by other staff they believed he reported things back to her. He tried to win her favour.[513]

It was difficult for us to determine the degree to which the hospital's leadership was aware of the problems with Ward 4K's culture at this time. When questioned about the culture on Ward 4K, Janette Tonks, former Director of Nursing, Women's and Children's Services, replied that on starting her role in 2013: 'I was aware that there was a grievance; I wasn't aware that the culture was as toxic as what I am now led to believe'.[514] Ms Tonks later told us that her observation of Ward 4K was that staff were very happy and noted that none of the nurses had approached her with 'anxieties or lack of confidence in Ms Leonard'.[515] At our hearings, Ms Tonks conceded that she was responsible for making sure Ms Leonard had the tools to properly manage Ward 4K and she did not do so.[516]

Ms Leonard told us that she believed senior nursing management was well aware of the dysfunctional dynamics on the ward.[517] At hearings for our Inquiry, Helen Bryan, the then Executive Director of Nursing, gave evidence that she accepted cultural change was required at the hospital in relation to transparency, openness and honesty.[518] Ms Bryan also later gave evidence that she considered that progress has been made towards effecting those changes.[519]

4.1.7 31 December 2008—Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreement is signed off

On 31 December 2008, a Ward 4K staff member acting as the ward's Nurse Unit Manager signed off on Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreement.

There were two particularly notable entries in this Agreement. In response to the question 'What has worked well/been done well in the review period?', the Acting Nurse Unit Manager commented on Mr Griffin's 'management of adolescent mental health patients'.[520] Also of note, in response to the question, 'What hasn't worked so well/been done so well in the review period?', was the entry: a 'lack of encouragement and feedback (positive and negative from management)'.[521]

4.1.8 Early 2009—Mr Griffin gives his personal mobile number to a patient

In early 2009, a staff member told Ms Leonard about a professional boundary breach by Mr Griffin. The concern was that Mr Griffin had offered his phone number to a young patient, saying he would 'come back to work and sit with the distressed patient if needed' after his shift.[522] A 'handover memo' written by two staff members indicates that the rostered staff members assured Mr Griffin that the patient was fine and it was not necessary for him to return to work, despite Mr Griffin's insistence that he be called if the patient became distressed.[523] Later, when the patient was upset and staff members sought to comfort her, she became more distressed saying 'Jim had promised' her that the staff would call him if she wanted him to return.[524]

Ms Leonard told us that she was 'unsure' if this concern relates to the same patient referred to in a complaint made by a Senior Psychiatric Registrar (described in Section 4.1.9), noting that the Registrar also complained that Mr Griffin had given his mobile phone number to a patient and that the concern was 'considered at the same time and in the same manner' as this complaint.[525]

Ms Leonard met with Mr Griffin in February 2009 and directed him to not give out his mobile number to patients.[526] Ms Leonard's handwritten diary note of her discussion with Mr Griffin states: 'Verbal warnings not previously effecting change in [behaviour]' and that Mr Griffin's intention does not equal the 'effect and outcome'.[527] We discuss Ms Leonard's file note of this conversation in more detail in the next section.

Ms Leonard told us that she met with the patient's mother and that the mother advised Ms Leonard that she had deleted Mr Griffin's number from her child's phone.[528] Ms Leonard does not recall whether she reported this incident to her supervisor (who was Ms McBeath at the time).[529] Ms McBeath informed our Inquiry that she did not recall this matter being reported to her.[530]

4.1.9 Early 2009—Complaints are made about Mr Griffin interfering with a behaviour management plan and cuddling a patient

In early 2009, Ms Leonard received a written complaint from a Senior Psychiatric Registrar ('Registrar') about Mr Griffin. The Registrar described having developed a behaviour management plan with a treating paediatrician to overcome a young girl's extreme separation anxiety, which demanded 'a consistent approach from both her parents and ward staff in responding to her distress and demands for company'.[531] The Registrar wrote that in a previous session with this patient's parents they had expressed a view that all nurses should befriend their daughter 'like Jimbo has' to be therapeutically effective.[532]

The care of this young girl had been previously discussed at a weekly multidisciplinary team meeting, where the Registrar was 'surprised' to see Mr Griffin in attendance because Mr Griffin was on annual leave at that time.[533] As recounted by the Registrar in his letter to Ms Leonard, at this meeting Mr Griffin outlined his concerns with the treatment plan, stating that he believed it was 'unkind to leave the patient in a distressed state'. The Registrar explained in some detail the justification for the approach, which Mr Griffin then reluctantly accepted.[534]

In his letter, the Registrar also informed Ms Leonard that Mr Griffin's behaviour had come to his attention on a separate occasion, after Mr Griffin had given his personal mobile number to a highly vulnerable young woman who had been an inpatient on Ward 4K, encouraging her to contact him whenever in crisis.[535] The Registrar wrote to Ms Leonard that he was finding it 'particularly difficult to reach a mutual understanding' with Mr Griffin on the appropriateness of Mr Griffin's interactions with patients more broadly.[536] The letter said:

> I am deeply concerned about this and request that you address it immediately and thoroughly and that Mr Griffin be referred to a caring professional himself. I imagine referral to a psychologist or psychiatrist would be the most appropriate choice initially.[537]

The Registrar further informed Ms Leonard that he had notified the Clinical Director, Mental Health Services North, of his concerns about Mr Griffin and that the Clinical Director had indicated 'his intention of raising this with management as a performance issue, if the situation persists'.[538] Ms Leonard recalls notifying human resources staff and Ms McBeath about the Registrar's concerns.[539]

Ms Leonard told us that she responded to the Registrar, notifying him that she was going on leave and that the Acting Nurse Unit Manager would take responsibility for the matter.[540] Ms Leonard told us that, during handover, the Acting Nurse Unit Manager told Ms Leonard that they had seen Mr Griffin cuddling the same patient who was the subject of the Registrar's letter. This, the Acting Nurse Unit Manager said, took place in a recliner chair in the patient's room after her mother had left.[541] In a file note that the Acting Nurse Unit Manager prepared for Ms Leonard, they wrote that they 'accepted Jim's actions as being caring and consoling, even though it was an action I would not deem appropriate in my nursing care'.[542] The Acting Nurse Unit Manager acknowledged in their file note that they had since learned that Mr Griffin's actions were in contravention of the patient's treatment plan (as outlined by the Registrar).[543]

A meeting was held between the Acting Nurse Unit Manager, a member of the human resources team and Ms McBeath to discuss the complaint.[544] The file note from this meeting records the following items under the heading 'Issues discussed':

a. Physical touch of patients outside therapeutic boundaries.

b. Giving out mobile phone number to patients/families for contact outside work hours.

c. Development of simpler, more clear cut protocol outlining professional boundaries for staff on Children's Ward LGH.

d. Development of above protocol to be done within a group forum setting inclusive of J. Griffin.

e. Letter to be written by [the Acting Nurse Unit Manager] to James Griffin re confirming our expectations in respect to his professional relationships and boundaries. After inspection by [the human resources staff member] and [Ms McBeath] this will be given to James on his return after Annual leave.

f. This letter will specify the need to refer the matter to the Nursing Board of Tasmania if any further incidents arise.[545]

Our Commission of Inquiry was provided with a letter that is undated and marked 'draft'. Ms Leonard told us that this was the letter the Acting Nurse Unit Manager sent to Mr Griffin at the time.[546] The letter reflected the discussions described above and reiterated that Mr Griffin should not:

- have contact with patients and ex-patients outside a clinical setting
- attend care meetings for patients on days that he is not rostered to work
- continue to care for patients where colleagues or peers identify that this has become 'counterproductive to the team goal'
- have physical contact with patients beyond providing their medical care.[547]

The letter also explicitly warned Mr Griffin that if there was a similar complaint about him in the future, there would be no option but to raise the matter with the Director of Nursing, which may result in the complaint being referred to the Nursing Board of Tasmania.[548]

Later on in early 2009, a message from Ms Leonard's email address (but signed by the Acting Nursing Unit Manager) was sent to the Registrar informing him that Mr Griffin had asked for the letter of complaint that the Registrar had written so he could 'formulate a response to the matter at hand'. This email indicates that the Acting Nurse Unit Manager sought advice from then Human Resources Consultant, Luigino ('Gino') Fratangelo, about providing the letter of complaint to Mr Griffin.[549] Mr Fratangelo was apparently satisfied with it being provided if the Registrar was informed.[550] We have not enquired as to whether (or how) the Registrar responded to this request. Ms Leonard's notes suggest that the complaint was provided to Mr Griffin.[551]

Ms Leonard met with Mr Griffin about the complaint and took notes of their discussion. In these notes, Ms Leonard records that Mr Griffin was upset about the Registrar's letter of concern.[552] The notes record that she asked Mr Griffin how many times similar matters had been discussed with him, and he reportedly replied 'only twice', being this instance and the incident of kissing a patient's head (described in Section 4.1.5). Ms Leonard's notes include the following: 'I mentioned there were other times that he obviously didn't recall … so speaking about it hadn't changed the behaviour'.[553] Her notes go on to indicate that since the complaint had been made by another area of the health service, it was necessary to take appropriate action so the quality of services provided by Ward 4K were without question.[554] This appears to reflect a desire by Ms Leonard to manage the reputational risks (even within the hospital) associated with Mr Griffin's conduct.

In Ms McBeath's view, the wording of the Acting Nurse Unit Manager undated 'draft' letter to Mr Griffin suggested that it was 'more of a warning'.[555] Ms McBeath, noting the letter's reference to a potential report to the Nursing Board of Tasmania, told us 'the issue was obviously viewed as professional role confusion/professional boundary issue and the first time it emerged with Mr Griffin'.[556]

On the evidence, this was at least the fourth time professional boundary issues had been raised about Mr Griffin.

4.1.10 February 2009—Mr Griffin intends to 'give away' a former patient at her wedding

Ms Leonard told our Commission of Inquiry that, in February 2009, Mr Griffin advised her of his intention to 'give away' a former patient, Angelique Knight, at her wedding, which was to take place in several days' time. Ms Leonard said she was concerned when Mr Griffin told her this because it suggested an 'unusually close relationship for a nurse to have with an ex-patient'.[557]

Ms Leonard noted that her manager, Ms McBeath, was not available to advise her; consequently, Ms Leonard sought advice from the then Executive Director of Nursing, Helen Bryan, who was Ms McBeath's manager. Ms Leonard stated that Ms Bryan told her that Mr Griffin could attend the wedding but that he should not 'give away' the bride.[558]

Ms Leonard stated that, on 25 February 2009, she met with Mr Griffin to discuss the matter. At this meeting he confirmed he would not 'give away' Ms Knight.[559] Ms Leonard also stated that, on 2 March 2009, she reiterated their discussion in a letter to Mr Griffin, in which she referred to the importance of maintaining 'appropriate relationships with patients on the ward'.[560] She said that in this discussion she flagged an intention to develop a protocol on the topic of professional boundaries to 'assist all staff members'.[561] As referenced above, Mr Griffin was encouraged to contribute to this protocol.[562] It does not appear that Ms Leonard's letter to Mr Griffin was passed on to the human resources team at the time.

Ms Leonard did ultimately forward a copy of the letter to former Human Resources Consultant Mathew Harvey some time later on 6 March 2017, in response to another complaint about Mr Griffin (described in Section 4.1.26).[563]

As noted above, because of Mr Griffin's conduct, a protocol for Ward 4K staff on professional boundaries was developed.[564] Ms Leonard noted that this protocol was drafted in a group forum, which included Mr Griffin, in mid-2009.[565]

4.1.11 March 2009—Tasmania Police receive information about Mr Griffin 'upskirting' young girls

In March 2009, Victoria Police shared information with Tasmania Police that Mr Griffin had been captured on closed-circuit television 'upskirting' young women—that is, taking sexually intrusive photographs without their permission—while contracted to work as a medic on the Spirit of Tasmania.[566]

That same day, a Tasmanian police officer submitted an information report to the relevant Tasmania Police database describing the information received from Victoria Police. The information report included reference to Mr Griffin's role at Launceston General Hospital, stating: 'Unsubstantiated dialogue suggests he may also be employed at Launceston Children's Hospital'.[567] The information was not passed on to the Department or Launceston General Hospital.

Tasmania Police obtained still images from the Spirit of Tasmania showing Mr Griffin holding a camera 'in a suspicious manner'.[568] In April 2009, Tasmania Police conducted a search on Mr Griffin's property and asked him about the upskirting allegations.[569] Mr Griffin reportedly could not recall the events.[570] Mr Griffin's computer was examined and, while no unlawful images were found, officers did find hundreds of images of young girls in bathing attire at pools and beaches, as well as girls playing netball.[571] Police noted that Mr Griffin was clearing his internet search history daily.[572]

Mr Griffin refused to take part in a formal interview at this time. Tasmania Police decided there was not enough evidence to proceed with criminal charges, but noted the following in an information report:

> Although there was no evidence of any unlawful behaviour by Griffin this pattern of dealing with young girls … may cause rise to suspicion should other matters be reported in the future.[573]

In relation to the 2009 complaint, all information was ultimately filed in April 2009 with no caveats and was freely accessible to other investigators.[574] We note that this complaint predated the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.

A 2020 investigative review into Tasmania Police's handling of information received about Mr Griffin found that a 'thorough and timely' investigation was undertaken in this matter, noting that, while the investigators were suspicious of some of his behaviours, no unlawful images were located in the search. This review does not explain how relevant the still images of Mr Griffin (or the footage it was drawn from) was in substantiating the upskirting allegations. However, this review did conclude the information from the upskirting allegation should have been considered when later reports about Mr Griffin were made, stating that 'not enough weight was placed on these comments when Griffin was investigated in 2011, 2013 and 2015'.[575] Those subsequent investigations are described in later sections.

Former Commissioner Hine told us: 'This matter was investigated appropriately at the time by Launceston detectives, with no offences detected.'[576]

4.1.12 May 2009—An email chain that included a former patient is discovered

In May 2009, Ms Leonard received an email from Mr Griffin on her personal email account, which had also been sent to a broader group, including other Ward 4K staff.[577]

Mr Griffin had also included a former patient in the email chain.[578] Ms Leonard stated that she was aware Mr Griffin knew the former patient's family socially but felt it was inappropriate that Mr Griffin was emailing a former patient.[579] Ms Leonard stated that she met with Mr Griffin and asked that he not send her personal emails or communicate with current or former patients outside a professional capacity.[580]

Based on the evidence we have received, this was the fourth time in six months that Ms Leonard had personally responded to Mr Griffin's inappropriate behaviour, and the sixth such incident that was recorded about Mr Griffin in connection with his role at the hospital.

We note that in December 2020, Ms Leonard forwarded Mr Griffin's email to the human resources team with a note saying: 'I met with Jim to discuss this email as it contained the email address of a patient and detailed that it was inappropriate and directed him to cease'.[581] We do not know what prompted her to send this to the human resources team more than 10 years after Mr Griffin sent it. We note that, by that stage, the Department had initiated its Independent Inquiry and our Commission of Inquiry had been announced.

We did not receive a 2009 Performance and Development Agreement for Mr Griffin.[582] We do not know whether one was completed and not filed, or never completed. Such Agreements should have been an important tool to manage Mr Griffin's behaviour.

Given Mr Griffin's failure to comply with repeated instructions from his manager to stop his inappropriate behaviour towards patients, we consider that, at this point, there was enough evidence that Mr Griffin was engaging in improper contact with current and former patients and should have resulted in formal action.

4.1.13 31 March 2011—Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreement is signed off

On 31 March 2011, Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreement was signed off by a Ward 4K staff member, who had acted as the Nurse Unit Manager for a period, and Ms Leonard.[583]

Notable aspects of this Agreement include that Mr Griffin wanted to attend an eating disorder workshop but could not because of staffing issues.[584] His performance objectives included a focus on developing knowledge and clinical skills in eating disorders and adolescent mental health.[585]

It seems that Mr Griffin expressed significant confidence in his abilities and his qualification to advance to a Grade 4 position, as the Agreement states: 'He believes his role as a senior nurse on the ward plays an important role in facilitating staff learning and development and assisting management'.[586]

4.1.14 2011 or 2012—Kylee Pearn discloses childhood sexual abuse by Mr Griffin to Launceston General Hospital

In March 2011, Kylee Pearn started as a social worker at Launceston General Hospital.[587] She described finding it 'incredibly confronting' to come across Mr Griffin working on Ward 4K because she had been sexually abused by him as a child.[588] She came to know Mr Griffin as a family friend.[589] Soon after starting work at the hospital, Ms Pearn spoke to a friend who disclosed during a 'chance conversation' that she also had been abused by Mr Griffin when she was young.[590] Ms Pearn expressed feeling 'terrified' after her own child was admitted to the hospital that Mr Griffin would be in contact with her child.[591]

In relation to her decision around that time to report Mr Griffin's abuse, Ms Pearn said:

> I had this innate feeling that other children were at risk on the ward and I knew I couldn't pretend it didn't happen anymore. It was no longer just about me and I had a duty to do something about it, both as a mum and as a social worker.[592]

Ms Pearn 'summoned up the courage' to disclose Mr Griffin's abuse of her to Stewart Millar, who was the head of the social work department and her manager at Launceston General Hospital at the time.[593] Ms Pearn told us that:

> Stewart believed me, supported me and offered options on what I could do. Within a day or two, and with my permission, he organised a meeting with [the human resources team] so I could tell them what happened.[594]

Ms Pearn said that at this meeting she told human resources staff that Mr Griffin had sexually abused her and her friend when they were children. Ms Pearn recalled feeling at the time that the representatives had come to the meeting 'pre-prepared'.[595]

The following reflects Ms Pearn's recollection of the response she received from the human resources staff at the meeting:

> They told me they had looked into Jim, that he had been on the [kids'] ward for a long time and that he was [a union] member. They told me that Jim would ask too many questions and would cause 'too much of a fuss' if he was moved from the children's ward … They then said that there was nothing they could do without a conviction. The meeting was short and would not have gone longer than 20 or 30 minutes. I was stunned at their response and felt quite powerless. I got the sense that my information wasn't going to be acted on unless I got a conviction. At the time I felt I had done everything I could by alerting them and that it was now up to them. They didn't offer me any support after the meeting; however, I was offered support by Stewart.[596]

Mr Millar told us he thought the human resources staff would take the information Ms Pearn provided at the meeting 'and view it within the context of any other information that they had and come to a reasonable, rational decision about how to proceed'.[597] If this had occurred, then the six previous complaints of Mr Griffin's inappropriate behaviour towards child patients could have been considered together with Ms Pearn's very serious disclosure. Mr Millar said he considered there appeared to be a shared sense among the human resources representatives attending the meeting that the weight of the disclosure 'was not as much as if it had been a formal complaint'.[598] Mr Millar said he did not make a mandatory report to Child Safety Services because the concern related to historical events and there was no evidence of current abuse of a child, aside from the risk arising from an historical abuse.[599]

Ms Pearn said she had hoped that her disclosure to human resources staff would result in having Mr Griffin removed from the paediatric ward.[600]

There was no consensus as to the date of the meeting with the human resources team. Mr Millar recalled Ms Pearn's disclosure occurred in either 2011 or 2012.[601] Ms Pearn's best recollection was that the meeting occurred sometime after March 2011, when she started working at the hospital.[602] Ms Pearn explained that the meeting with human resources took place before she disclosed her abuse to Tasmania Police (on an informal basis) and the head of another organisation, although we have been unable to confirm when these reports (which we describe in Sections 4.1.15 and 4.1.16) were made.[603] Ultimately, we could not conclude when the meeting occurred but consider that it was likely to have taken place in 2011 or 2012.

There is some dispute about who from the human resources team attended the meeting with Ms Pearn and Mr Millar. At hearings, Ms Pearn gave us her best recollection:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Who else attended the meeting?
>
> A [Kylee Pearn]: I'm not 100 per cent sure but I believe it was Gino Fratangelo, who was an HR representative, I'm not 100 per cent sure about that. It was certainly a man.
>
> [...]
>
> Q: You say in your statement you think it was Mr Fratangelo, you can't be sure, it may have been two people but you can't be sure; is that right?
> A: Yeah, that's correct.[604]

Mr Millar told us that he 'made a phone call to [human resources]' and that 'both James Bellinger and Gino Fratangelo came straight down to my office'.[605] Mr Millar told us he recalled speaking to either Mr Fratangelo or to Mr Bellinger when he placed the call, saying 'I'm 99 per cent sure [Mr Bellinger] was there, and I'm 100 per cent sure the meeting occurred'.[606]

In their statements to us, neither Mr Bellinger nor Mr Fratangelo acknowledged attending the meeting with Ms Pearn and Mr Millar, but neither disputed that the meeting with the human resources team had occurred.

In his statement to us, Mr Fratangelo said: 'My inability to recall this meeting continues to frustrate me'.[607] When the very strong recollections of both Mr Millar and Ms Pearn that he had been at the meeting were put to Mr Fratangelo at our hearings, he maintained that he could not recall the meeting. Mr Fratangelo did, however, concede that he 'may have been there'.[608] Mr Fratangelo said:

> I've got no reason to doubt Mr Millar … and I've got no reason to doubt Ms [Pearn], and so where they say I may have been there, then I've got no reason to say that, no, I definitely wasn't there; maybe I was and I just can't remember it.[609]

Mr Bellinger's initial statement to us reflects an understanding that the meeting with Ms Pearn occurred in 2010 or 2011 (because he suggests this is what he was told by someone in the Department). In this regard, he said:

> I have no independent recollection or written record of attending any such meeting. If that meeting occurred, as is suggested, in 2010 or 2011, I was not working for the hospital at the time but working for the Human Services portfolio.[610]

At that stage, the Department was the Department of Health and Human Services. Mr Bellinger's evidence is that he was working in the Human Services area of the Department until April 2012 (which we describe as 'the Human Services portfolio'), when he began to provide support to the Health area (which we call 'the Health portfolio')—assuming responsibility for human resources work for Launceston General Hospital at that time.[611]

After reviewing his statement, it was not clear if Mr Bellinger's evidence was that he might have been at the meeting but could not recall attending or that he did not attend.[612] Counsel Assisting sought to clarify Mr Bellinger's evidence at our hearings:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Yes. Each of Mr Millar and Ms Pearn said they believed that you attended that meeting; what do you say to that?
>
> A [Mr Bellinger]: I do not believe I was working for the hospital at that time.
>
> Q: I understand that. Did you attend the meeting?
>
> A: No.
>
> Q: In your statement you say you do not recall. Is your evidence that you do not recall attending such a meeting or that you did not attend such a meeting?
>
> A: My apologies, I do not recall.
>
> Q: Is it possible that you attended that meeting, considered it of such little import that you did not remember it?
>
> A: No.
>
> […]
>
> Q: Is it possible you attended this meeting, Mr Bellinger?
>
> A: No.

> Q: So your statement's gone from, you don't recall, to you're certain you didn't attend; is that right?
> A: My apologies. I do not recall attending that meeting, I do not believe it's possible, which I have understood to be the question.[613]

We were struck by Mr Bellinger's careful wording. Nevertheless, we consider, based on his statement and his evidence at the hearing, that Mr Bellinger's position is that he was not present at the meeting. We consider Mr Bellinger's evidence around his attendance at this meeting in light of his actions from 2019 onwards, when Ms Pearn's report again came to light (which we discuss in Section 5).

Ms Pearn was less certain that Mr Bellinger attended the meeting than she was about Mr Fratangelo's attendance. She also accepted there was a possibility that only one human resources representative attended the meeting:

> Q: In your evidence earlier, Ms Pearn, and again now you've referred to 'they' in relation to HR.
>
> A: Yeah.
>
> Q: 'They did this, they couldn't do that, they said this.' I know you're not 100 per cent sure.
>
> A: Yep.
>
> Q: Do you think that there was or may have been a second HR representative in that meeting?
>
> A: It's a possibility in my mind.
>
> Q: Do you want to say anything about who that person might have been, if there was a second HR representative?
>
> A: I believe, if there was a second person there, it would have been James Bellinger.
>
> Q: But you're not 100 per cent sure?
>
> A: No, I'm not 100 per cent sure, no.
>
> ...
>
> Q: I expect that Mr Bellinger will say that he has no recollection of that meeting and that he was working in HR outside the hospital at the time. Do you have anything you want to say in response to that evidence?
> A: That's possible, yep.[614]

Mr Millar, while not certain, has consistently recalled that Mr Fratangelo or Mr Bellinger 'or both' attended the meeting. This position is reflected in Mr Millar's sworn statements to the Department in 2021 and to our Commission of Inquiry.[615] We also note that Mr Millar made a notable amendment to his draft statement (drafted by Mr Bellinger) to the Department, which was to add the last two words to the phrase

'I believe it was either Gino Fratangelo or James Bellinger or both' [emphasis ours].[616] We explain the circumstances surrounding this statement in Section 5.

Mr Millar told us he could not recall who held the relevant portfolio for the social work department at the time of the meeting (noting, as we explain above, Mr Bellinger's evidence that he only assumed the Health portfolio, which included Launceston General Hospital, from April 2012), but confirmed his recollection that Mr Bellinger and Mr Fratangelo attended the meeting:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: You said you were assigned an HR advisor. Who was your assigned HR advisor?
> A [Mr Millar]: Look, my recall isn't fantastic in this regard, but you know, Gino Fratangelo was at some stage and James Bellinger was at some stage. My recall is that they both attended that meeting.[617]

We received information that the human resources team adhered to its portfolio responsibilities. If so, this might make it unlikely that Mr Bellinger would have been involved in such a meeting, at least until assuming responsibility for supporting Launceston General Hospital in April 2012.

Even if the meeting occurred before April 2012, we cannot conclude on the evidence that Mr Millar, as part of the social work department in the hospital, would not have called a human resources representative from the Human Services portfolio and we do not consider it conclusively rules out that Mr Bellinger may have attended to support Mr Fratangelo. If the meeting occurred after April 2012, Mr Bellinger's evidence that it was not possible that he attended does not apply. Mr Bellinger denies he attended the meeting, regardless of when it occurred.[618]

When pushed on the proposition that Mr Bellinger was not at the meeting, Mr Millar recalled that Mr Bellinger attended this meeting:

> Q: Just out of fairness, Mr Millar, Mr Fratangelo has provided a statement to the Commission and he says he doesn't recall that meeting between you and Ms Pearn. Do you have anything to say to that?
>
> A: Well, simply that I'm 99 per cent sure he was there.
>
> Q: And again, out of fairness to Mr Bellinger, he's provided a statement to the Commission and he says that he doesn't recall a meeting and he wasn't working for the LGH at the time. Do you have anything to say to that?
>
> A: Again, I'm 99 per cent sure he was there, and I'm 100 per cent sure the meeting occurred.[619]

We made significant efforts to find an independent method to verify when Ms Pearn's meeting with human resources staff occurred and the attendees. Our enquiries included seeking sworn statements from all human resources staff employed at the hospital at that time to determine any knowledge of Ms Pearn's disclosure, as well as requesting records, calendar entries and emails from that period from the human resources team.

Some of the difficulty in obtaining information was attributed to IT limitations. The Secretary of the Department, Kathrine Morgan-Wicks PSM, explained in a statement to us that there were 'legitimate circumstances that could account for historical emails being "lost" and not retrievable'.[620] This included that:

- the email accounts of staff who left the Department prior to an email system migration in June–July 2019 were not retained
- since around 2012, shared mailboxes have been subject to 'technical challenges' that make them difficult to access
- emails archived by staff may not have been backed up or may have been deleted.[621]

Despite Secretary Morgan-Wicks' statement that the email accounts of former staff members were not retained after 2019, we are aware Mr Bellinger had some access to Mr Fratangelo's emails from 2012 onwards when he responded to a query from Detective Senior Constable Hindle in October 2019 (noting Mr Fratangelo had retired by that time).[622] This is discussed in Section 5.

No other staff member reported knowledge of this meeting with Ms Pearn and Mr Millar. We did not obtain any records of the meeting. The absence of any records of the meeting is a source of great concern to us.

At our hearings, Counsel Assisting asked Mr Fratangelo whether he would have expected there to have been a record of Ms Pearn's disclosure on Mr Griffin's personnel file. He said:

> I'm trying—ah—yeah, I guess it's fair to say I would have expected a note to be made of the meeting, and equally would have expected—well, I would have expected that I would have spoken to my manager about the meeting, if I was there, and equally I suppose I expect that Mr Millar would have spoken to his manager as well.[623]

When asked about how acceptable it would be to not have a record of this critical disclosure, Mr Bellinger responded: 'There should be a file note of that conversation'.[624]

Mr Millar stated he was 'pretty certain' that the human resources representatives took notes during the meeting.[625]

When questioned about what he would have done if he received Ms Pearn's disclosure, Mr Fratangelo said he would have told Ms Pearn to go to the police.[626] Mr Fratangelo also described what he perceived to be limitations on taking disciplinary action against a staff member under the State Service Code of Conduct, a part of which requires employees to abide by Australian law, which often relies on evidence that a person has been convicted of a crime in order to be satisfied.[627] We note that this statement largely mirrors what Ms Pearn recalls being told in the meeting with the human resources team in 2011 or 2012. We also understand that, at the time, the Department was reluctant to initiate State Service Code of Conduct investigations unless complainants were willing to be identified and departmental staff were sure that 'a termination of the employment' was likely.

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed to respond appropriately to Kylee Pearn's disclosure of abuse by James Griffin in 2011 or 2012, leaving children exposed to potential risk for eight years

Ms Pearn's disclosure of her sexual abuse by Mr Griffin to the hospital in 2011 or 2012 reflected a level of risk for the hospital of a significance that cannot be overstated. The failure to take any action in response to this disclosure failed to reduce the very significant risks Mr Griffin posed to paediatric patients on the ward for another eight years (and that those risks may have continued beyond this period had another victim-survivor, Tiffany Skeggs, not reported her abuse by Mr Griffin to police in 2019).

That a meeting occurred between Ms Pearn, Mr Millar and at least one representative of the human resources team is not contested. As described earlier, we consider the meeting most likely happened in 2011 or 2012. Launceston General Hospital was given credible information that Mr Griffin had a history of perpetrating child sexual abuse and was provided with an opportunity to prevent other potential risks to children, but did not act. The hospital did not even record the information to provide future weight or context to interpreting Mr Griffin's behaviour, which at that time included multiple allegations of 'boundary breaches' involving inappropriate non-medical contact with child patients.

We could not identify a specific hospital or departmental policy in place at the time for responding to allegations of child sexual abuse about a staff member. We consider it unlikely that any policies would have guided the human resources team to manage Ms Pearn's disclosure in the way it did. However, if the policies of the time did do so, we consider the hospital, at a minimum, should have taken the following action:

- Launceston General Hospital should have requested and examined all available complaints data or relevant information it held relating to Mr Griffin, which would have uncovered six prior complaints of inappropriate and unprofessional behaviour towards child patients. It should have taken steps, based on these complaints alone, to investigate the possibility of a disciplinary process that would mitigate risks to children on the ward.

- Launceston General Hospital should have discussed with Ms Pearn an intention to make a notification to the then Tasmanian Nursing Board, acknowledging that it would need to be sensitive to Ms Pearn's wishes in relation to whether and how this complaint could be made.

We note that no report was made to Child Safety Services by either Mr Millar or the human resources team. We consider this may have arisen because of confusion about obligations when there is a potential risk to a group of children (rather than a specific child) and when a report is made by an adult who requests confidentiality, which we have seen in other cases. We view this potential confusion as a systemic problem and make no findings regarding their failure to report. A best practice response could have considered whether Ms Pearn's disclosure activated mandatory reporting requirements to Child Safety Services and, if not, discussed whether Ms Pearn would be open to the hospital making such a notification (or making one herself). In future, there should be clarity about where to best report such a disclosure and the role of Child Safety Services in responding to institutional child sexual abuse, particularly when Tasmania's Reportable Conduct Scheme commences (discussed in Chapter 18).

We note that, because Ms Pearn was an adult, it was appropriate for hospital staff to defer to her wishes about making a formal police complaint, which we accept she was not willing to do at that time. We note Ms Pearn's initial disclosure predated the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme. We consider Ms Pearn's belief that no further steps were taken by the hospital to be true, but we cannot discern whether the hospital's failure was the result of a desire to downplay or minimise the disclosure, or because there was a genuine belief that nothing could be done.

Finding—Luigino Fratangelo and James Bellinger received a disclosure of child sexual abuse from Kylee Pearn relating to James Griffin in 2011 or 2012

We consider, on the balance of probabilities, that both Mr Bellinger and Mr Fratangelo were present at the meeting with Ms Pearn and Mr Millar in 2011 or 2012, in which she disclosed childhood sexual abuse by Mr Griffin. We are more confident in Mr Fratangelo's presence but consider there is enough evidence to find that Mr Bellinger was also present. We base this conclusion on the strength and consistency of Mr Millar's evidence (including a variety of documents we reviewed, not all of which have been described for legal reasons), Mr Bellinger's actions in 2019 when Ms Pearn's disclosure again became known (discussed further in Section 5), and because we found Mr Millar to be a more credible witness than Mr Bellinger.

Finding—Launceston General Hospital did not have adequate processes to ensure the meeting with Kylee Pearn was recorded and that record was retained

We could not determine whether a record of the meeting was not taken or was lost or destroyed. However, it is concerning to us that the human resources representatives who attended the meeting would not document a meeting of this nature, sensitivity and significance.

A disclosure of this kind, which describes child sexual abuse at the hands of a person employed on a paediatric ward, is a disclosure that should be treated with the utmost concern and urgency. The disclosure warranted a clear and accurate record being taken of the discussion and escalation to senior managers to determine appropriate action and ensure children on the ward were safe. Responding to the disclosure required care, concern and steps taken to ensure Ms Pearn had appropriate support, particularly given that she often had to encounter Mr Griffin at the hospital. Failure to take action was a missed opportunity to protect children and young people in the hospital from further abuse by Mr Griffin. It also meant that this information was not considered when subsequent complaints against Mr Griffin arose.

The absence of a record of such a serious disclosure is a significant and unacceptable failing. Eric Daniels, then Chief Executive North/North West ('Chief Executive') conceded the absence of a record constituted a 'substantial and catastrophic failure'.[628] We note Mr Daniels was not Chief Executive until 2016 and did not work at Launceston General Hospital at the time of Ms Pearn's disclosure. We agree with Mr Daniels' observations and consider that it suggests the hospital had inadequate processes to ensure the meeting with Ms Pearn was recorded, and that the record was retained.

4.1.15 2011 or 2012—Ms Pearn and her friend have an informal discussion with Tasmania Police

Sometime after Ms Pearn's meeting with the human resources team in 2011 or 2012, she and her friend (who had also been sexually abused by Mr Griffin) spoke informally with a person they knew at Tasmania Police. In Ms Pearn's words, that person gave them a 'very realistic' assessment of their prospects of securing a conviction against Mr Griffin, so they decided not to proceed with a formal police report at that time.[629] However, Ms Pearn recalls that they did discuss the option of putting information about her experiences on the police system 'so it could sit there in case anyone else came forward, I could back them up'.[630] In her statement to our Commission of Inquiry, Ms Pearn qualified this statement and said she believed this option was discussed and agreed but that she wasn't '100 per cent sure'.[631] No record was made on Tasmania Police systems of this discussion.[632] We consider this lack of record is unfortunate, but note

Ms Pearn did not recollect exactly what was agreed. Ms Pearn also reflected positively on the person from Tasmania Police with whom she had the discussion, including their deference to Ms Pearn and her friend about how they wished to proceed.[633]

Ms Pearn told us that she made a promise to herself at this point that she would come forward, if anyone else did, to have Mr Griffin charged—a commitment she honoured in September 2019 when Tiffany Skeggs reported her abuse by Mr Griffin.[634] Both events are discussed in Section 5.

4.1.16 2011 or 2012—Ms Pearn and her friend report their abuse to an organisation Mr Griffin volunteered with

After speaking to their contact at Tasmania Police, Ms Pearn and her friend decided to speak to the head of an organisation where they knew Mr Griffin volunteered.[635] Ms Pearn recalled that the person they spoke to at the organisation was not shocked by the disclosure, telling them that Mr Griffin gave them 'the creeps'.[636] The person gave Ms Pearn and her friend assurances that Mr Griffin would be restricted in some of his volunteering activities and be monitored at all times.[637] Ms Pearn said: 'I remember feeling relieved that we had at least prevented him from accessing children in this setting and how simple the process had been. If only [Launceston General Hospital] had taken similar steps'.[638]

Following the death of Mr Griffin on 18 October 2019, Ms Pearn's disclosure of her abuse to Launceston General Hospital was again raised with the hospital—this time by Tasmania Police and Ms Pearn herself. We discuss the hospital's knowledge and treatment of Ms Pearn's complaint following the death of Mr Griffin in Section 5.

4.1.17 November 2011—Child Safety Services receives a report about Mr Griffin and notifies Tasmania Police

On 17 November 2011, Child Safety Services received a report about Mr Griffin.[639] The notifier stated that they were very concerned after being visited by two people who disclosed that they had been abused by Mr Griffin when they were children.[640] The notifier provided information about Mr Griffin's contact with children in this particular organisation's context.

On 26 November 2011, Child Safety Services passed on the notification about Mr Griffin to Tasmania Police and, on 28 November 2011, to Child Safety Services for a regional response.[641] On 29 November 2011, Child Safety Services recommended that the matter be closed because Tasmania Police had been notified and because a particular organisation with which Mr Griffin was associated was aware of the risks.[642] There is no evidence that Child Safety Services examined the information it may have held (or had access to) to determine whether there was any more information that suggested Mr Griffin posed a risk to children, including in other settings.[643]

On 21 December 2011, an officer from the Launceston Police contacted Child Safety Services seeking information about the name of the notifier to enable them to follow up.[644] The Child Safety Officer who responded advised him that this information could not be shared. The relevant police officer pressed the Child Safety Officer for the information and, when it was not forthcoming, the police officer asked Child Safety Services to request that the notifier contact police directly because, without this information, police could not take the matter further.[645]

Claire Lovell, Executive Director, Children and Family Services within the former Department of Communities, explained to us that the laws and policies around information sharing were 'very confusing' at the time, and police were not included in relevant legislation as an information-sharing entity. She said the guidance that Child Safety Services staff would have received was to 'protect notifier identity at all costs'.[646] She conceded that the failure to contact the notifier to seek their consent for their identity to be revealed to police was 'a missed opportunity', highlighting that legislation is now more conducive to information sharing.[647]

Former Commissioner Hine told us of long-term problems with Child Safety Services sharing information with Tasmania Police:

> The review of the Griffin matter highlighted that there was still some resistance to providing information in instances up until 2021. Anecdotally, police officers have reported that on occasions, [Child Safety Services] Officers had baulked at providing information about reporting persons and required a warrant.[648]

Commissioner Hine stated that Tasmania Police had sought to improve information sharing between Child Safety Services and Tasmania Police by developing a memorandum of understanding in 2021.[649]

Finding—Child Safety Services should not have closed its November 2011 case into James Griffin without making further enquiries and ensuring Tasmania Police had all the information it required

As we note above, Child Safety Services closed this matter after referring it to Tasmania Police. Yet in doing this, it also failed to pass on all the information it held to enable the police to take any meaningful action. This essentially meant that no one acted on the information received through the notification. While it is impossible to know whether a police investigation would have led to earlier charges or actions to limit Mr Griffin's contact with children, it reflected another potential opportunity to disrupt his offending.

As Ms Lovell notes, it is unfortunate that this critical information was not passed on to Tasmania Police to support an investigation at that time. If staff did not feel empowered to provide this information, they could have contacted the notifier to seek their consent or to request the notifier speak to Tasmania Police.

We asked Tasmania Police what steps it took in relation to the formal notification it received from Child Safety Services in November 2011. In his statement to us, former Commissioner Hine reflected that the investigating officer could have escalated this matter to the relevant detective inspector when Child Safety Services told them they could not provide information about the notifier, but this did not occur.[650] There is also no record that the investigating officer examined the police intelligence system, which would have revealed the 2009 report against Mr Griffin relating to the upskirting that flagged Mr Griffin's employment at Launceston General Hospital (described in Section 4.1.11).[651] Instead, Tasmania Police simply filed this information for intelligence purposes on 21 December 2011.[652]

We note again that a police examination of the intelligence system would have also revealed the 2000 report about concerning material found on a laptop previously owned by Mr Griffin had the 2000 report been recorded in an accessible system, even if an electronic records system was not available at that time.

Finding—Tasmania Police should have made further enquiries to receive the notifier's identity and reviewed previous intelligence holdings relating to James Griffin when receiving the November 2011 information from Child Safety Services

While we accept that Tasmania Police made some efforts to obtain information about this 2011 notification and was not assisted by Child Safety Services, we nonetheless consider this should have been escalated to superiors within Tasmania Police, who may have been empowered to remedy the failure to share information. If the relevant officers had checked the intelligence holdings (which former Commissioner Hine noted there was no record of having occurred), the 2009 upskirting complaint made to police about Mr Griffin would have been on the system (which noted he was a paediatric nurse). This should have then added even greater impetus for police to obtain the necessary information from Child Safety Services so it could investigate.

4.1.18 November 2012—The mother of a patient reports concerns that Mr Griffin was a 'sleaze'

On 30 November 2012, a mother of a patient raised concerns about Mr Griffin with Ms Leonard. She told Ms Leonard that she had heard from staff that Mr Griffin was a 'womaniser' and a 'sleaze' (it was unclear if staff told the mother directly or she overheard something to that effect).[653] Ms Leonard's file note of this concern records the mother as saying: 'You've got men here looking after children—bad things happen we all know this'.[654]

Ms Leonard recalled that she subsequently spoke to her manager, Ms McBeath, who told her that 'the complaint would be noted but there was no need to progress the matter' because 'the patient was due to be discharged shortly after the concern was raised'.[655]

Ms McBeath told us that although she recalls Ms Leonard raising this incident in an informal conversation, Mr Griffin was not identified by name.[656]

4.1.19 6 March 2013—Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreement is signed off

Ms Leonard and another unnamed person signed off Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreement on 6 March 2013.

Notable features of this Agreement include that Mr Griffin was to have key responsibilities in relation to 'inservice sessions to raise the profile and education of resources' for the admission of patients with eating disorders.[657] It also included '[Nurse Unit Manager] role and responsibilities', beginning in March 2014, with Mr Griffin to 'consider topics for support/education'.[658] Rather than reflecting any concern about Mr Griffin's performance, this Agreement reflects a desire to allow Mr Griffin to have greater management responsibility and to pursue professional development activities that related to a highly vulnerable cohort of young female patients.

4.1.20 April 2013—A confidentiality breach follows a request that Mr Griffin not visit a patient and her mother

In April 2013, the mother of a patient made a request to a hospital staff member that Mr Griffin not visit her or her child on the ward. The mother told the staff member that her request was due to 'family issues' and she did not wish to elaborate further.[659]

This request was then raised with Ms Leonard. Ms Leonard told us that she understands that, in response to the request, the staff member asked Mr Griffin not to attend the room where the young patient was staying—a direction that Mr Griffin appeared to accept.[660] Ms Leonard further stated that a few hours after she was told of the request, the mother advised the staff member that she had received a call from a family member.

This family member had asked the mother about Mr Griffin being excluded from the treatment room because 'someone from the hospital' had called the family member and asked questions about the mother's request.[661] As only a few staff knew about the request, the implication was that Mr Griffin had made the call to the family member, in breach of confidentiality.[662] The staff member notified Ms Leonard and Clinical Nurse Educator, Michael Sherring, about this potential breach. The mother also spoke to Ms Leonard and Mr Sherring directly.[663]

Ms Leonard and Mr Sherring met with Mr Griffin to discuss the breach of confidentiality, which culminated in Ms Leonard sending another letter to Mr Griffin. Mr Fratangelo, from the human resources team, edited this letter before it was sent.[664] The letter, dated 17 April 2013, stated there is 'no situation that is acceptable to disclose any information to another person in relation to patients or families [admitted to the hospital]' and cited a range of professional codes and obligations for Mr Griffin's reference.[665] Ms Leonard concluded the letter as follows:

> I trust that as a result of discussions at our meeting you now fully understand the implications of breaches of [patient] confidentiality and that if there is any further breach, that this will require me to explore disciplinary action via formal processes.[666]

In his statement to our Inquiry, Mr Sherring confirmed that he and Ms Leonard met with Mr Griffin on 17 April 2013 to 'discuss the issue'.[667] Mr Sherring stated that his role in attending the meeting was as 'a third party witness of discussions'.[668] When giving evidence at our hearings, Mr Sherring recalled that Ms Leonard communicated to Mr Griffin the inappropriateness of the patient confidentiality breach, that such breaches were a significant issue, and that a number of attachments relating to Nursing Board guidelines were included with the letter.[669]

Ms Leonard stated that the final copy of the letter was also sent to Mr Bellinger in the human resources team.[670] We note that Mr Bellinger did not report to us that his team had knowledge of this complaint.[671]

At the time that Ms Leonard became aware of the request that Mr Griffin not have contact with a patient and their mother on Ward 4K, she was already aware of a series of boundary breaches by Mr Griffin—several concerns had been raised about Mr Griffin with Ms Leonard in 2009 and a further concern had been raised by a parent in 2012.

4.1.21 8 May 2013—A report is made to Tasmania Police about Mr Griffin, which is passed on to Child Safety Services

Tiffany Skeggs was a young girl when she came to know Mr Griffin outside the hospital environment. On or around 8 May 2013, when Ms Skeggs was 15 years old, her mother shared concerns with Tasmania Police at Launceston that Mr Griffin and her daughter were spending a lot of time together and had constant contact over phone, social media and email.[672] She also reported that she had witnessed Mr Griffin touching her daughter inappropriately and cuddling her excessively.[673] References in this section to Ms Skeggs are to Ms Tiffany Skeggs and not her mother.

On 13 May 2013, police spoke with Child Safety Services about the mother's concerns. We understand the notification included reference to Mr Griffin's employment on Ward 4K.[674]

In response to the notification, Child Safety Services indicated an intention, in the first instance, to contact a counsellor to talk (presumably) to Ms Skeggs about Mr Griffin's behaviour. Child Safety Services told Tasmania Police that they would advise Mr Griffin that a notification had been made to them about his behaviour.[675] At our hearings, Ms Skeggs recalled receiving contact from an officer from Child Safety Services (we are unclear whether this was a counsellor) and the fear this contact provoked in her. Ms Skeggs stated:

> It had been building up to a point that there was so many questions being asked that I knew by this point that it wasn't right and the behaviour wasn't normal, but I was already in so deep that I couldn't get myself out; I needed to get out but I was too scared to do that, and he had told me that it would destroy me and that he would destroy me if I ever said anything.[676]

Ms Skeggs described feeling blamed during a phone call with the officer from Child Safety Services, saying 'her words to me was that I should not continue engaging in that behaviour, that I should know that it's inappropriate to sit on his knee, I need to change what's happening'.[677] When we asked Ms Skeggs to reflect on the way Child Safety Services engaged with her, she responded:

> You heard from … Ms Pearn … that it was known to police by this point, it was known to [Child Safety Services], and no person with an ounce of experience in engaging with children or taking child sex abuse disclosures from children engaged with me in any way, and the only opportunity that I had at that point to disclose was on a phone call with a stranger in front of my mother.[678]

Tasmania Police sought updates from Child Safety Services on 24 and 25 June 2013, but could not reach the relevant person.[679] Eventually, police spoke with the relevant person, who reported that Ms Skeggs did not disclose any abuse or inappropriate conduct by Mr Griffin.[680]

Child Safety Services ultimately formed the view that Ms Skeggs' mother was having difficulties accepting the 'fatherly relationship' that Ms Skeggs had with Mr Griffin.[681] The officer from Child Safety Services informed police that Mr Griffin had stated he was angry that Ms Skeggs' mother had misread his behaviour.[682] The Child Protection Information System record contains a file note of the conversation with Mr Griffin on 14 May 2013:

> This worker stated that at this level he is better being aware of the concerns and making sure everyone is protective of each other. Jim was ok about this and was pleased that it was at this level rather than anything worse but was still dumbfounded that someone would interpret his behaviour as anything but what it was … This worker stated that there had been no more concern around cuddles and sitting on his lap, but in today's world it was up for [misinterpretation] and precautions needed to be taken. Jim said he could understand this but it was still not nice to destroy a person's reputation. This worker stated that it had not but he needed to be aware of the potential.[683]

Ms Lovell conceded that this framing of the matter by Child Safety Services could be construed as agreement with Mr Griffin that there had been an overreaction to his behaviour but added: 'I think this was their way of cautioning him and trying to disrupt the behaviour'.[684]

In his statement to us, former Commissioner Hine said there was no evidence that police searched the police intelligence system after Ms Skeggs' mother made the report. Rather, investigating police formed the view, based on information from Child Safety Services, that Ms Skeggs would be 'hostile' towards police and contact would cause her 'stress and anxiety'.[685] Tasmania Police closed the report, and the information from Ms Skeggs' mother was filed for intelligence purposes on 23 July 2013.[686] Commissioner Hine said this was 'not appropriate and would not be in keeping with the [Tasmania Police Manual] and guidelines as they now stand'.[687]

The Tasmania Police internal review into the handling of its investigation of Mr Griffin acknowledged that it found no evidence of any 'protective, legal or employment interventions' in response to reports about Mr Griffin in 2013 (and in 2011).[688] The review concluded that: 'In the absence of any meaningful follow up enquiries being apparent, Griffin's status was unaffected or impacted upon, and he remained potentially able to continue his behaviours'.[689]

Counsel Assisting asked Ms Lovell whether she would expect a child protection worker to make enquiries about prior concerns reported to police. Ms Lovell acknowledged that information about the upskirting complaint in 2009 would have been relevant to a risk assessment on this notification.[690] She also acknowledged that the information in the notification about Mr Griffin's involvement at the paediatric ward of the hospital meant that he clearly posed a risk to children and young people in professional settings.[691]

Child Safety Services undertook a risk assessment on this notification, which deemed the 'harm consequence' as 'concerning', the 'harm probability' as 'unlikely' and the 'future risk' as 'low'.[692] When asked to reflect on this classification, considered together with all the information about Mr Griffin that was available to, or easily attainable by Child Safety Services, Ms Lovell stated:

> I don't think that's a low risk of future harm. I think that [the child safety officer] overlooked the pattern and history; if [the child safety officer] had seen that, even followed up on that one matter [the 2009 upskirting] or located more information that we had on file [potentially the report made to Child Safety Services on 17 November 2011] I think [the child safety officer] would have seen that there was a pattern of this, it wasn't a one-off incident that was misunderstood.
>
> So I think that [the child safety officer] … either underestimated the likelihood of future harm or potentially it's a form of confirmation bias which isn't necessarily a cognitive action of the officer involved, it can actually be systemic as well; it can actually be a way of justifying the closure of a matter, where you know that you can't do any more or you feel that you can't do any more with it in order to accept the next matter that's waiting for assessment.
> I don't think that's right, I think that's very wrong. I think that it should have been—I think the information should have been gathered and that was an oversight. I think that in an ideal world there would have been more done, but I think for its time that seems to me that that's the type of practice that people were engaging with, quite possibly driven as much by necessity as anything else …[693]

Ms Lovell further stated that since 2013 there has been greater understanding about the manipulation that accompanies sexual abuse and how this manipulation may lead a young person to deny that they were being harmed.[694] She stated that: 'I think that today it would be assessed quite differently to what it was then in 2013'.[695] Ms Lovell added: 'We should have protected Ms Skeggs and we didn't protect her, and for that I barely—It's hard to find the words to say how sorry I am. I'm deeply sorry'.[696]

Finding—Child Safety Services should have taken further steps to assess the risk James Griffin posed in 2013 when concerns were again reported about him

Upon receiving the notification, Child Safety Services should have taken more steps to assess the risk Mr Griffin posed to Ms Skeggs and others—particularly given Child Safety Services' knowledge about his opportunities to offend in several settings, including in his professional role. Child Safety Services should have:

- taken the concerns of Ms Skeggs' mother seriously, particularly given her close relationship with Ms Skeggs and the fact that she directly witnessed some of the behaviour that concerned her
- undertaken a records check for any information to suggest Mr Griffin had previously been the subject of a notification—this would have raised the prior notification in 2011 from the head of an organisation who reported that two people had disclosed to them that Mr Griffin had abused them as children

- engaged with Ms Skeggs in person and in a location that was child-centred and created a sense of safety to disclose—if Ms Skeggs did not disclose, she should have been reassured and given the steps for who to contact if she wanted to talk in the future
- sought more information regarding the 2009 notification to Tasmania Police about Mr Griffin to inform its risk assessment process, noting that, in 2011, Child Safety Services had received information about child abuse allegations involving Mr Griffin.

If this matter was reported to Child Safety Services now, we would expect that it would seriously assess the risk a person posed to any children with whom it was aware an alleged perpetrator had contact—including through their family and through social, professional and volunteer roles. We would also expect that it would report all relevant information to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and relevant professional registration bodies (such as the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency, 'Ahpra').

Finding—Tasmania Police should have reviewed all intelligence holdings about James Griffin in 2013 when a report to Child Safety Services was made

Tasmania Police relied entirely on the information it received from Child Safety Services and, having received the information, did not conduct any searches of its own records.[697] If it had, it would likely have found the previous two reports about Mr Griffin:

- the 30 March 2009 'upskirting' complaint
- the November 2011 report from Child Safety Services.

We note also that information provided to the police about the material found on Mr Griffin's computer in 2000 was not entered into the police database until December 2020.

We note that Tasmania Police has since adopted measures to clarify minimum requirements for investigating child sexual abuse matters and established a memorandum of understanding to facilitate better information sharing with Child Safety Services.

Finding—The child safety system in the mid-2010s was not designed to address child sexual abuse in institutional settings

The above findings concerning Child Safety Services and Tasmania Police indicate failures within each of those agencies but also point to a broader system that failed to adequately address risks to children in institutional settings.

The findings against Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services reflect the following:

- Child Safety Services tended to focus primarily on the risk specifically articulated in a notification. In relation to the 2013 complaint, Child Safety Services confined its risk assessment to the risk that Mr Griffin posed to Ms Skeggs, while in 2009 it confined its risk assessment to the risk that Mr Griffin posed in a particular organisational setting. Child Safety Services did not consider the risk that Mr Griffin posed to others, including other children he may have had contact with in professional or other settings.
- Tasmania Police similarly focused on investigating a specific allegation (and considering whether it would meet the relatively high standard for a criminal prosecution), rather than working proactively with other agencies to address the broader risk posed by Mr Griffin.

This narrow focus from both agencies was further hampered by poor information sharing between them.

We note that some of these issues have been overcome through the introduction of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 ('Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act') on 1 July 2014 (and its related information-sharing provisions), which focuses on assessing risk in occupational and organisational contexts, and can act as a trigger for protecting children more broadly (as it indeed did, in the case of Mr Griffin, on 31 July 2019). Tasmania's introduction of Child and Youth Safe Standards and a Reportable Conduct Scheme (discussed in Chapter 18) will further strengthen safety for children in institutional settings.

Ms Skeggs told us she would often visit Mr Griffin on Ward 4K at Launceston General Hospital and that she could enter the secure unit without any problems because nurses would let her in.[698] She told us:

> Griffin sexually assaulted me on several occasions both on the ward and during our travels throughout the hospital … On one occasion, Griffin was almost caught assaulting me by another staff member whom he did not realise was in the office when we entered the room.[699]

A Ward 4K staff member recalled becoming aware at some point that a young girl had moved into the home that Mr Griffin shared with his wife and children.[700] The staff member said the situation confused them but that they understood it was more of a 'surrogate parenting arrangement'.[701] The staff member also recalled thinking it was strange when they learned Mr Griffin was taking this young person overseas alone, but given the trip was referred to in the local paper, they said they ultimately considered the trip must have been 'above board'.[702] While she was not named, we infer this recollection relates to Ms Skeggs (her overseas trip with Mr Griffin is described further in Section 4.1.23).

When Counsel Assisting asked Ms Leonard whether she recalled Ms Skeggs visiting Ward 4K, she indicated that she did and that 'it was around netball training and going to netball after school or something like that'.[703]

4.1.22 21 March 2014 and 27 March 2015—Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreements are signed off

On 21 March 2014, Ms Leonard signed off another of Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreements. A notable entry in this Agreement is Ms Leonard's comment that: 'Jim has participated in supporting staff and providing feedback over the past 12 months. He was [integral] in [providing] detailed specific feedback [designed] to support the improved performance and care provided by staff'.[704] The Agreement also states that Mr Griffin would like 'exposure and support to learn the [Nurse Unit Manager] role and responsibilities – double up days'.[705]

One year later, on 27 March 2015, Mr Griffin's next annual Performance and Development Agreement was signed off. In this Agreement, Mr Griffin's key responsibilities are listed as 'leadership, education, portfolio, advanced clinical skills, clinical knowledge, assist management roles, role model'. Ms Leonard writes that Mr Griffin would like assistance to develop his skills through '[o]ngoing [eating disorder] education'.[706]

4.1.23 10 April 2015—Tasmania Police receives information from the Australian Federal Police about Mr Griffin

On 10 April 2015, the Australian Federal Police shared information with Tasmania Police about Mr Griffin. The Australian Federal Police became aware of this information through its work disrupting the production and distribution of child exploitation material.

The information shared with Tasmania Police revealed that a person was communicating with an undercover law enforcement officer through an encrypted messaging application. This person described various acts of abuse against young girls and sent sexual exploitation material to the undercover officer. The person stated that he was a nurse and that he used antihistamines to sedate his victims.[707] The Australian Federal Police traced the internet protocol ('IP') address of this person to Mr Griffin's home.[708]

Not long after, on 16 April 2015, notes on an Australian Federal Police database indicated that federal police were aware that Mr Griffin was travelling with a then 17-year-old girl, Tiffany Skeggs, for two weeks.[709] Presumably this information was shared with Tasmania Police because the system entry noted: 'Comment from [a Tasmania Police detective inspector] happy to allow travel'.[710]

A later internal investigation by Tasmania Police into its handling of Mr Griffin commented: 'At the time Tiffany was 17 and her mother … was well aware of these travel plans. As such nothing further could be done to stop Griffin and Tiffany Skeggs travelling together'.[711] We note that in Tasmanian law, child sexual abuse refers to offences committed against a person under 17 years of age. However, we also note that Tasmania Police received the information about Mr Griffin travelling with Ms Skeggs in the context of known concerns about Mr Griffin's production and exchange of child exploitation material and prior concerns expressed by her mother about Mr Griffin's conduct towards her in 2013.

On 15 April 2015, the same Tasmania Police detective inspector wrote to the Australian Federal Police as follows:

> We have had extensive conversation regarding this one and have decided not to progress a warrant until we receive the … package [of materials]. We need to be confident the picture/s exchanged depict child exploitation material. We [have] considered his travel plans and the risk the child may or may not be in when making our decision. In the past he has declined to be interviewed and has also displayed … knowledge of hiding his PC history so we need to have as much information as possible in the first instance.[712]

On 26 April 2015, the investigating officer from the Northern Criminal Investigation Branch ('Northern CIB') in Launceston made a note that more information about Mr Griffin, being the evidence or 'package' requested from the Australian Federal Police, was available on the relevant secure system, ready for Tasmania Police to access. The note also stated that the police officer from Tasmania Police's Fraud and e-Crime unit in Hobart, who had access to the secure system, was out of the State but would 'return on Monday'.[713]

On 28 April 2015, the investigating officer from Northern CIB filed the Australian Federal Police report as 'pending further review', with the comment: 'See notes below re additional information now available on relevant system – awaiting package'.[714] On the same day, the Australian Federal Police transmitted the package to Tasmania Police on the secure system, which could be accessed by the Tasmania Police Fraud and e-Crime unit.[715] Although former Commissioner Hine confirmed that the package of materials 'was in the possession of Tasmania Police', it was not received by Northern CIB, not accessed by the Fraud and e-Crime unit, and no further action was taken at the time.[716] Northern CIB first obtained the package more than four years later, on 2 September 2019.[717]

Ms Skeggs described being met by Australian Border Force on her and Mr Griffin's return from overseas on 11 May 2015. Australia Border Force searched their luggage and electronic devices and asked Ms Skeggs and Mr Griffin about their travel, accommodation arrangements and the nature of their relationship. They were told it was a 'random inspection', which Ms Skeggs described as a 'poor effort to lie'.[718]

Ms Skeggs said she and Mr Griffin remained within a few metres of each other through the entire search.

Ms Skeggs said that at no point was she asked directly about whether Mr Griffin had offended against her, and she was not made to feel that she could disclose the abuse she was experiencing:

> Perhaps if authorities had been a little more honest with me, or at the very least a little more competent, I may have disclosed then. If I had been told that Griffin was suspected of committing wrongdoing and that there were other children involved, I may have spoken out. If they had told and demonstrated to me that they could protect me from Griffin, I might have been more honest.[719]

Ms Skeggs told us that despite both of their phones containing images of Mr Griffin's abuse of her, Australian Border Force took no further action: 'After the search of our devices was completed by the ABF they handed them back, told us we were free to go and apologised for causing us to miss our connecting flight to Launceston'.[720]

In response to media reporting of this encounter on 60 Minutes, Australian Border Force issued a statement: 'The ABF has thoroughly reviewed this matter and is satisfied that the officers conducting the intervention took the appropriate action in compliance with our legislative obligations'.[721] We have not investigated this encounter because the conduct of the Australian Border Force is not within the scope of our Inquiry.

An internal investigative review into Tasmania Police's handling of complaints about Mr Griffin conducted in 2020 noted that the package of materials the Australian Federal Police provided to Tasmania Police contained images and information 'of a high evidentiary value and would have most likely resulted in a conviction'.[722] The report also noted:

> Launceston CIB were directly involved in communications concerning the matter and it was their responsibility to lead, drive and manage the police investigation and external agency notification.[723]

This review further determined that due to Tasmania Police filing the Australian Federal Police information without investigation, there was no direct requirement to notify the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, although 'a general ability did exist due to a catch-all clause'.[724] The report noted that an investigation would likely have given the Registrar 'solid facts' to take into account in relation to a risk assessment on Mr Griffin's registration.[725]

In addition, the internal review found no record of Tasmania Police making a referral to Child Safety Services in line with mandatory reporting obligations. This is despite Tasmania Police receiving evidence of an identifiable child being a victim of child sexual abuse.[726] Former Commissioner Hine acknowledged that 'the police response to this report was clearly unacceptable'.[727]

Finding—Tasmania Police failed to act on highly probative evidence regarding James Griffin provided by the Australian Federal Police in 2015

From 28 April 2015, Tasmania Police had a package of information about Mr Griffin in its secure system. This secure system was accessible to Tasmania Police's Fraud and e-Crime unit, and to Northern CIB on request. Tasmania Police took no further action to access that data until 2019, when Detective Senior Constable Hindle sought it as part of his investigation into Mr Griffin.[728] While it is somewhat unclear exactly why this happened, it appears to have essentially involved two errors on Tasmania Police's part, as established from an internal investigative review conducted by Tasmania Police:

- Officers from Northern CIB in Launceston failed to seek the information from Tasmania Police's Fraud and e-Crime unit. The investigating officer from Northern CIB filed the report as 'pending further information' when it should have been filed 'pending review', which would have triggered various reminder system alerts to follow up the material.[729] However, given the officer in charge was aware the package was already available and just needed an officer in the Fraud and e-Crime unit to return the following Monday to access the material, we find it surprising they did not remember to do this irrespective of the way the report was filed. However, we note in Chapter 16 that we were told many times police often gave child sexual abuse matters lower priority when pulled into other matters.
- The Fraud and e-Crime unit failed to provide the material to Northern CIB. We find it difficult to understand why this error occurred but consider it had to do with a limited number of officers having access to the material, the relevant officer being away at the time, a miscommunication with the Australian Federal Police about where the material was going to be sent as a result of the officer being away, and it being unclear between themselves and Northern CIB who had ultimate responsibility for following up on the material.[730]

Two Northern CIB police officers were subsequently disciplined for failing to act with care and diligence in this matter.[731] We learned that a range of system changes now prevents a similar error occurring. A new database has an embedded 'supervisor approval' function, which means that a matter cannot be filed away without a superior reading the investigation notes and determining whether closure and filing is, in fact, appropriate.[732] We also understand that since 2015 the process of providing material through secure files has changed, such that material is physically collected from the Australian Federal Police.[733]

We note that on the public release of Tasmania Police's report on the internal review of its handling of complaints against Mr Griffin in February 2021, former Commissioner Hine issued an apology.[734] This was reiterated at our public hearings, where Commissioner Hine added:

> The impact of [Tasmania Police's] failures are deeply felt and we are committed to improving how we protect children within our community.[735]

We acknowledge Tasmania Police's self-initiated internal review and the apology given to victim-survivors of Mr Griffin's abuse before beginning our Commission of Inquiry. However, we cannot overstate the significance of the failure by Tasmania Police to act in a timely way on credible, probative evidence of child sexual abuse perpetrated by Mr Griffin that would likely have resulted in criminal charges and prevented other children and young people from being harmed.

4.1.24 November 2015—A nurse raises concerns about Mr Griffin's professional boundaries with teenage girls

On or around 2 November 2015, Ms Leonard received a handwritten note about Mr Griffin from a colleague. The note reported concerns raised by another nurse on the ward.[736] It described this nurse feeling uncomfortable about inappropriate behaviour on Mr Griffin's part and stated that Mr Griffin was 'overstepping many boundaries'.[737] The note further relayed that the nurse who had raised the concern felt that one-on-one care of patients should be 'ideally same gender, particularly important for adolescent female[s]'.[738] The note also indicated that the nurse holding the concerns was willing to be contacted for more information.[739]

Ms Leonard was not working at the time the concern was raised and cannot recall what the complaint related to precisely.[740] In relation to the conduct that her colleague had described in the note, Ms Leonard said:

> I observed Mr Griffin frequently greet familiar patients with a hug, including standing side by side with patients and hugging them. From my observations children and parents reacted positively to these gestures. The staff witnessing these hugs did not respond negatively to this. Notwithstanding this, I had directed Mr Griffin to desist from this behaviour as in my view it was not a professional manner in which to greet patients.[741]

A diary note from around the same time (4 November 2015) records Ms Leonard telling Mr Griffin not to sit on patients' beds or hug patients.[742]

Ms Leonard did not take further steps in relation to this complaint, such as contacting the person reporting the concerns, and it does not appear that anyone, including staff in the human resources team, was made aware of it.[743]

4.1.25 21 March 2016—Mr Griffin's Performance Development Agreement is signed off

On 21 March 2016, Ms Leonard signed off Mr Griffin's annual Performance Development Agreement. In this Agreement, Ms Leonard documents that Mr Griffin enjoyed his 'leadership role and supporting junior staff, [graduates] and students' and 'enjoy[s] and appreciate[s] the management role when opportunities arise'.[744] Mr Griffin's continued interest in developing professional skills in relation to patients with eating disorders, and supervising more junior staff, are again reflected in the Agreement.[745] Concerns about Mr Griffin's continued boundary breaches were not referenced.

4.1.26 March 2017—A young patient reports discomfort with Mr Griffin using pet names

Ms Leonard told us that on 3 March 2017, she became aware that a highly vulnerable patient was uncomfortable with Mr Griffin calling her 'babe' and 'sweetheart'.[746] A Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services worker reported this discomfort to Ms Leonard and Mr Sherring.[747]

In relation to Mr Griffin's use of pet names for patients, Ms Leonard told us:

> I recall Mr Griffin calling patients by such names, as well as members of staff. While I did not think it was professional, from my observations, children and their parents reacted positively to the names such that it did not concern me until the complaint was made.[748]

Ms Leonard said that due to the 'complex needs' of this patient, she discussed the complaint more broadly—including with Mathew Harvey, the then Human Resources Consultant within the human resources team, Mr Sherring, broader Ward 4K staff, social workers, staff from Child Safety Services and Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services, the patient's paediatrician and the then Director of Nursing Women's and Children's Services, Janette Tonks.[749] Ms Leonard said she then discussed the matter with the patient and 'following her feedback and request, determined that male staff would not care for the patient overnight, and Mr Griffin would not care for the patient at all'.[750]

Ms Tonks did not refer to this complaint in her statement to our Commission of Inquiry nor in her evidence.[751] Mr Bellinger reported that his team had made him aware of this complaint and described it as being 'appropriately dealt with within the employment framework that existed at this time'. Mr Bellinger added that Ms Leonard 'set clear expectations with respect to [Mr Griffin's] behaviour, appropriate relationships and supported these directions with education'.[752] Mr Bellinger did not have any specific documentation relating to his knowledge of, or extent of involvement in, this complaint.[753] He acknowledged, with the benefit of hindsight, that all parties should have documented 'more specific details about the child's concerns'.[754]

Mr Sherring told us he became aware of this incident on 3 March 2017, through a conversation with the Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services staff member.[755] He said that he and Ms Leonard met with Mr Griffin on 6 March 2017 'to discuss the concerns and provide direction'.[756] He told us that during this discussion Mr Griffin's behaviour was 'clearly identified as a breach of professional boundaries' and Mr Griffin was directed to familiarise himself with his professional responsibilities as a nurse and to amend his behaviour.[757]

Ms Leonard wrote a letter to Mr Griffin following the meeting, on 6 March 2017, copied to Mr Harvey. In this letter, she wrote:

> As this is not the first instance of a complaint of this nature brought forward regarding a patient under your care and that external agencies have been made aware of this concern expressed by the patient, I feel that this is a serious breach of your professional boundaries. As such the benefits from focused education on communication style and non-verbal communication with vulnerable children and families would be advantageous in developing a more flexible communication style that is more responsive to [patients'] needs and circumstances.[758]

The wording of this letter suggests Ms Leonard considered Mr Griffin's complaints history, yet the sanction remained the same—education. Accompanying the letter was the companion document to the Code of Professional Conduct for Nurses, entitled A Nurse's Guide to Professional Boundaries.[759] In the letter, Mr Griffin was encouraged to identify and attend an education session to support a change in his practice.[760]

At hearings, Counsel Assisting questioned Ms Leonard on the significance, to her mind, of external agencies being aware of Mr Griffin's conduct, noting that this was specifically referenced in her letter. She explained: 'I think it's in relation to other health professionals with experience in child and adolescent mental health that increases the gravity for me'.[761] The letter from Ms Leonard to Mr Griffin canvasses other matters about the importance of maintaining therapeutic relationships, and then warns:

> … if there is a reoccurrence of such a breach of professional behaviour, I may be required to refer this matter to the Director of Nursing or to an external forum for further investigation.[762]

This comment suggests that Ms Leonard had not escalated the matter to Helen Bryan, the then Executive Director of Nursing, either personally or through Ms Tonks. Ms Leonard noted the hospital had a culture of trying to resolve things 'at a low level in the first instance', which she agreed had the effect of keeping matters 'in-house'.[763] She added there was 'not an openness' to engage with regulatory bodies such as Ahpra or the Nursing Board.[764]

4.1.27 May 2017—A student undertaking a placement complains about Mr Griffin

On 19 May 2017, a clinical facilitator from the University of Tasmania notified Mr Sherring that a student had raised concerns about Mr Griffin, who was her clinical instructor during her placement at Launceston General Hospital.[765] The student objected to Mr Griffin calling her 'babe' and touching her on the arm on more than one occasion; she asked not to work with him again.[766] Mr Sherring told us he spoke to the student on 22 May 2017 and requested an email from the Clinical Facilitator to document the issue.[767] On 23 May 2017, the Clinical Facilitator emailed Mr Sherring and Ms Leonard, and this email was forwarded to Mr Bellinger in the human resources team.[768]

Mr Sherring took on this complaint and reported back to Ms Leonard that it was in fact 'some students' who had expressed discomfort with Mr Griffin's 'familiarisations'.[769] Mr Sherring reported that Mr Griffin could not recall using such terms with the students but acknowledged he had done so in the past and had been counselled by Ms Leonard and Mr Sherring about this.[770] Mr Sherring recommended that no students be allocated to Mr Griffin for the remainder of the placement and advised Mr Griffin he would 'let him know' if he heard him using such inappropriate language with students, staff or anyone else in future.[771] Mr Sherring did not recall having to correct Mr Griffin for using terms such as 'babe' and 'baby' following this incident because he did not observe, or have reported to him, any further incidents of Mr Griffin using such terms.[772]

This is the sixth professional boundary breach by Mr Griffin that we have evidence Mr Sherring was aware of and the eighth boundary breach that we have evidence of Ms Leonard being aware of. By this stage, it should have been apparent that a conversation with, or letter to, Mr Griffin, was not having the effect of altering his behaviour.

4.1.28 26 August 2017—A nurse complains about Mr Griffin having an inappropriate conversation with young female patients

Will Gordon, a nurse on Ward 4K, recalled supervising four teenage female patients as they ate dinner on 26 August 2017.[773] He overheard their discussions about 'messaging guys' on the social media app Snapchat. The patients then asked Mr Gordon what they should say to guys.[774] When Mr Gordon said that the topic was not appropriate for him to comment on, he recalls the patients responded: 'Jim talks to us about this stuff'.[775] Mr Gordon told the patients that Mr Griffin should not be discussing such matters with them.[776] One of the patients then said that Mr Griffin described a woman who worked at the hospital as 'titsy' and that 'he wanted to shag her because she had massive tits'.[777] They also said Mr Griffin gave them advice on 'what guys like'.[778] This summary is based on the evidence provided to us by Mr Gordon. We note that there are minor variations in the multiple documents relating to this matter, but we do not consider these variations consequential.

Mr Gordon recalled speaking with colleagues about what these patients had told him. These colleagues encouraged him to report the conversation to Ms Leonard.[779] The next day, Mr Gordon sent Ms Leonard an email summarising the conversation and asked for his complaint to be treated confidentially.[780]

During hearings, Mr Gordon described why he made the complaint:

> … the nature of the conversation and the way they were talking, the tone, some of the other— you know, the way they were talking about the subject matter, it felt highly sexual in nature … it felt like the comments that James had made to them were sexual themselves.[781]

According to Mr Gordon, Ms Leonard asked that he lodge a report in the Safety Reporting and Learning System, which is the hospital's database for reporting incidents. (Note that some statements and transcripts quoted in this chapter refer to this system as the 'SRLS'.) Ms Leonard told us that she does not recall asking him to do so. She instead referred to Mr Gordon's email, which stated 'I have not completed an SRLS tonight as I did not have the time … but the information that I have provided you is the same information that I would put in an SRLS' as being indicative that he already intended to make a report in the system.[782] Mr Gordon did this on 29 August 2017.[783] When lodging the complaint on the system, Mr Gordon designated it an 'SAC4' incident, which is considered a low-level matter.[784] During the hearings, Ms Leonard conceded that the allegation was one of sexualised commentary and not just a boundary violation, and it should have been escalated as such.[785]

Ms Leonard recalled forwarding Mr Gordon's complaint to Mr Harvey in the human resources team on 28 August 2017 and asking to meet with him to discuss it.[786] It is not clear whether Mr Harvey met with Ms Leonard to discuss the complaint before Mr Gordon lodged the Safety Reporting and Learning System report on 29 August 2017. However, Mr Harvey told us he did recall discussing the complaint with Ms Leonard during their 'regular catchups to discuss HR matters on the Ward'.[787]

Ms Leonard was allocated the Safety Reporting and Learning System file of the incident and was therefore responsible for reviewing it, assessing risk and seeking further information from others named in the report, namely the staff members with whom Mr Gordon discussed the incident before making the complaint.[788] The staff members Ms Leonard sought information from were not witnesses to the actual conversation.[789] Ms Leonard emailed five staff members requesting information.[790] Ms Leonard received two responses, although we note that some staff may have missed her email.[791] The two staff responses were pasted into the progress notes on the Safety Reporting and Learning System.[792]

Mr Harvey was granted access to the Safety Reporting and Learning System file on 4 September 2017, which he reviewed and discussed with Ms Leonard.[793] Mr Harvey told us he provided some advice to Ms Leonard about whether these allegations could be substantiated, although he did not give us the details of this advice. Mr Harvey then helped prepare a letter to Mr Griffin seeking his response to the concerns outlined in the complaint.[794] On 4 September 2017, Ms Leonard emailed the letter to Mr Griffin.[795] The letter clearly identifies Mr Gordon as the complainant and includes a copy of the allegation raised in the Safety Reporting and Learning System as an attachment.[796]

At hearings, Counsel Assisting asked Mr Harvey why Mr Gordon's identity was revealed to Mr Griffin, noting Mr Gordon's request for confidentiality. Mr Harvey explained that while Mr Gordon had requested confidentiality in his email to Ms Leonard, he later made the Safety Reporting and Learning System entry in his name when he had the option to enter it anonymously.[797] Under questioning by Counsel Assisting, Mr Harvey admitted that the complaint could have been progressed without disclosing Mr Gordon's identity.[798]

Ms Leonard seemed to anticipate the potential for conflict arising from revealing Mr Gordon's identity to Mr Griffin. She notes in her letter to Mr Griffin: 'As you may encounter Mr Gordon or such persons named in the complaint during this process, I expect you will conduct yourself in a professional manner towards them'.[799] Ms Leonard also noted in her letter to Mr Griffin:

> I must advise that while this matter is being addressed internally, there is a possibility that at some point during, or after, that this matter may be referred to an external forum through the actions of a party to this complaint.[800]

Mr Gordon told us that Mr Griffin made veiled comments to him that made it clear he was aware that Mr Gordon had made the complaint. Mr Gordon described an interaction with Mr Griffin prior to Mr Griffin's transfer to Ashley Youth Detention Centre, only a short time after Mr Gordon had made what he thought was a confidential complaint. Mr Gordon said:

> We heard that he was going to Ashley and I went up to him and I said, 'I heard you're going to Ashley, how come you're leaving the ward?' And he said, he looked at me in the eyes and he said, 'There's no one but fucking dibber-dobbers on this ward,' and his tone of voice, his body language, that sort of standing tall, broadening the shoulders and staring me straight in the eye; I knew from that moment that he knew I made the report against him, and he—it almost felt like he wanted me to know that he knew as well.[801]

On 6 September 2017, Ms Leonard received Mr Griffin's response to her letter.[802] Mr Griffin admitted that a patient had asked him what he thought guys liked in girls and that: 'I replied briefly something along the lines of being natural and being themselves, and that pictures of airbrushed girls in magazines wasn't seen as natural'.[803] He stated to Ms Leonard that this was the only time he had a conversation like this with patients. Mr Griffin further replied that his use of the term 'titsy' to describe a staff member was likely overheard by one of the patients when he was speaking to their mother outside the hospital setting.[804] He framed the use of this terminology as a benign 'pet nickname' and 'private joke', rather than a derogatory or sexual comment.

Ms Leonard sent Mr Griffin's response to Mr Harvey. Ms Leonard told us that she and Mr Harvey then discussed the matter and concluded that 'the inappropriate communication did not occur in the course of Mr Griffin's employment and the event should be closed'.[805]

Curiously, the determination that Mr Griffin's conduct did not occur in the course of his employment mirrors the language of what is often considered in a formal investigation pursuant to an Employment Direction under the State Service Code of Conduct (discussed in Chapter 20). We note that neither Ms Leonard nor Mr Harvey had authority to unilaterally initiate or determine a disciplinary matter under the State Service Code of Conduct and it is clearly open to question whether either was sufficiently independent to make a finding about the incident at all. Some of the steps taken in response to Mr Gordon's report gave us the impression of those taken in response to concerns that a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct occurred. Across our case studies, we identified a systemic problem of undertaking such quasi-investigations without the protections accorded through a formal process (including independent investigation and procedural fairness).

Mr Harvey and Ms Leonard made efforts to collate previous complaints about Mr Griffin, but Mr Harvey considered they could not base a decision on these.[806] Mr Harvey told us he believed they were unable to consider 'unsubstantiated' prior complaints when considering fresh complaints against an employee.[807] Mr Harvey stated his understanding of this limitation as follows:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: And [Mr Griffin's complaints history] nonetheless didn't cause you concern that Mr Griffin's conduct might be seen in a different light?
>
> A [Mr Harvey]: No, because we look at each investigation independently of itself, and then, if we can see that an allegation is proven, then you can look back at the history to say, yes, here is an escalation of what occurred previously. In this one we were able to substantiate that he made the comment about what guys like and we said, yes, that is a concern, that is a breach of your professional boundaries.
>
> Q: So, once a complaint is unsubstantiated it effectively gets put in a memory hole?
> A: That is right, because if you can— if you haven't substantiated a claim you can't use that as a basis for finding guilt in future allegations.[808]

Mr Harvey told us that this limitation has been upheld in a matter before the Tasmanian Industrial Commission as recently as 2021.[809] In contrast, Mr Bellinger, also a former member of the hospital's human resources team, told us that 'previous allegations are considered when dealing with new matters and consideration is given to whether the allegations suggest a pattern of behaviour'; however, he was not explicit about the extent to which unsubstantiated complaints could be relied upon.[810] Mr Bellinger also mentioned the 2021 case referenced by Mr Harvey, which suggests a lack of overall clarity about the hospital's position on taking previous complaints into account.

In any event, we note in relation to Mr Griffin that there had been previous substantiated boundary violations with written directions and education that Mr Harvey and Ms Leonard could have considered. In his statement to us, Mr Harvey made a point of noting that Ms Leonard was the delegate responsible for determining the matter and that she ultimately made the decision.[811]

In her statement, Ms Leonard told us that Mr Harvey drafted the letter to Mr Griffin, advising him of the outcome of the investigation, which she signed and sent on 11 September 2017.[812] Mr Harvey initially accepted this evidence during oral evidence but has since clarified that Ms Leonard drafted the final outcome letter and he provided amendments for consideration before the final outcome letter was issued.[813] In part, this letter stated:

> Based on my review of the allegations and with due consideration of the evidence presented, I find that the allegations against you cannot be substantiated.
>
> I am satisfied that the information that you have provided me that the comments made in relation to [another adult] were not made in the course of your employment with Ward 4K.
>
> In relation to patients requesting advice from you, I am satisfied that the response you made was reasonable, well intended and appropriate.
>
> As such, I will not be taking any further action regarding this matter at this point and now consider both matters resolved and closed.[814]

The letter also included a general reminder about maintaining appropriate relationships with patients and their families to ensure 'therapeutic relationships are not compromised'.[815]

In the context of Mr Griffin having received multiple warnings, education and counselling for his unprofessional conduct, Counsel Assisting asked Ms Leonard to explain what she considered to be the threshold for taking more decisive action in response to Mr Griffin's behaviour.

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: At what stage should someone simply be moved away from children? That was a question.
> A [Ms Leonard]: Okay, I'm not sure of the answer to that question.[816]

Ms Leonard told us in her statement that 'it was my understanding that meeting with staff, providing education and direction/directives were the first steps in resolving complaints and grievances'.[817] She further stated: 'I always thought that education and redirection would change [Mr Griffin's] behaviour'.[818] As far back as 15 January 2009, in response to a complaint about Mr Griffin, Ms Leonard's own notes stated: 'I mentioned [to Mr Griffin] there were other times that he obviously didn't recall … so speaking about it hadn't changed the behaviour'.[819]

Counsel Assisting questioned Mr Harvey about the characterisation that Mr Griffin's response was 'reasonable, well intended and appropriate'. Mr Harvey conceded that such a description was wrong.[820]

Mr Harvey defended his handling of this incident. In his statement to us, he wrote:

> If the evidence provided in the SRLS indicated that James Griffin made sexual comments to patients, then … I would have recommended further witness statements to assist in determining whether the allegations could be substantiated.[821]

Under questioning, and as later acknowledged by him, Mr Harvey eventually accepted that his view at the time was ill-informed and that the statements (as alleged) were sexual in nature, deeply inappropriate and constituted potential grooming behaviours.[822]

When Counsel Assisting asked Mr Harvey to explain why the patients were not interviewed, Mr Harvey said this was discussed with Ms Leonard but that they ultimately felt they should not interview the patients because 'it would cause a detrimental effect to them whilst they were still under our care'.[823] He added:

> And, yes, obviously now we can say we should have potentially gone to the children. At the time that's the information we received and we thought that was sufficient to make a finding.[824]

Ms Leonard told us that she had no recollection of this decision or turning her mind to whether the patients should be interviewed. She said it would have been important to have external, skilled interviewers undertake this, and that did not happen because the response from Mr Griffin seemed reasonable at the time. Ms Leonard said she felt 'deep regret' and accepted that she should have made further enquiries.[825]

Ms Tonks told us that the Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint was the first time she had heard 'there were concerns with Mr Griffin'.[826] Ms Tonks told us that she did not have regular meetings with Ms Leonard and felt Ms Leonard would come to her if she had any concerns 'as and when required'.[827] Ms Tonks told us at hearings that when she became aware of the Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint, Ms Leonard had alerted her that 'there had been previous … breaches of professional boundaries, but didn't really go into any details about that'.[828] Ms Tonks told us she did not enquire further and understood they occurred prior to 2013 and had been 'addressed appropriately'.[829]

Ms Tonks initially told us that she was satisfied with the response to the complaint at the time, but when asked to reflect on whether she remained satisfied, she replied: 'No, absolutely not.'[830] Ms Tonks reflected:

> I believe that I should have been more actively involved and acknowledge that I should have provided much more support to [Ms Leonard] given that they had absolutely no experience in dealing with grooming behaviours of perpetrators.[831]

Ms Tonks conceded none of the staff had this expertise:

> I don't think any of us had any skills in that area in training and education around potential sexual perpetrators. I don't believe that it was something that we engaged in at all. Should we have been? Absolutely, yes.[832]

Counsel Assisting also asked Mr Harvey about other actions taken to verify Mr Griffin's response, such as contacting the person (the mother of one of the patients) that Mr Griffin said he had the 'titsy' conversation with.[833] Mr Harvey cited a range of barriers to verifying Mr Griffin's account, including that he did not have the mother's contact details and could not access them via patient files. He eventually conceded that Ms Leonard could have obtained this information.[834] Mr Harvey also conceded that no one asked Mr Gordon for more information after he made his report on the system.[835]

Mr Harvey placed great emphasis on his and Ms Leonard's belief that Mr Griffin's comments were not made on the ward and that if they had been made on the ward, there would have been a 'greater escalation'.[836] We note that, in his initial email complaint to Ms Leonard, Mr Gordon contemplated that some of the conversations may have occurred off the ward; however, this did not diminish his concern about Mr Griffin's conduct.[837]

Mr Bellinger was also asked about the management of this complaint, given that he was more senior than Mr Harvey. In his initial statement to our Commission of Inquiry, Mr Bellinger indicated that he accepted Mr Griffin's explanation that the comments were made outside of work.[838] Mr Bellinger noted, as he did in relation to the March 2017 complaint against Mr Griffin, that Ms Leonard 'reminded and set requirements' for Mr Griffin in response to this complaint.[839] Mr Bellinger also stated that a 'more appropriate' response to this situation would have been for Mr Griffin to refuse to engage in any kind of conversation with female patients about 'what guys like' and that 'with the benefit of information that is now available', Mr Griffin's account of the incident should have been tested by speaking with the patients who had relayed the conversation to Mr Gordon.[840]

At hearings, Mr Bellinger told us that Mr Harvey and Ms Leonard should have considered whether Mr Griffin had breached the State Service Code of Conduct. Mr Bellinger also acknowledged that the complaint was of a sexual nature and that it should have been escalated and investigated.[841] He said: 'Given the pattern of behaviour displayed, these matters could and should have been considered differently and more significantly'.[842] He also agreed with the suggestion that a lack of training and awareness likely contributed to their failure to do so.[843] We note that Mr Bellinger was copied into a response that Ms Tonks sent to Mr Gordon on 2 December 2019, after Mr Gordon again raised concerns about how complaints regarding Mr Griffin were managed, following Mr Griffin's death (this is described in Section 5.2.26).

Mr Gordon told us that by reporting the incident to management, he believed he had acquitted his responsibility and therefore he did not notify Ahpra of the incident. He recalled that, at the time he made his report, he received no information about making a mandatory report. He stated: 'I had faith and trust in the Tasmanian Health Service back then and believe I had fulfilled my obligations by making the SRLS report'.[844]

After logging the report in the system, Mr Gordon said:

> I didn't receive any feedback from Sonja Leonard about the matter. She didn't speak a word to me about it. In my view there should have been some sort of feedback after I made the report. There should have been some follow up to let me know what the outcome of the complaint was. I also expected there would be some sort of investigation, including interviewing the girls. To my knowledge there was no further investigation.[845]

After no action or feedback was provided in response to his complaint, Mr Gordon said he did not report further concerns about Mr Griffin: 'I felt that if I did make a complaint, it wouldn't go anywhere'.[846] Mr Gordon believes that if his Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint was followed up, further abuse of children and young people on Ward 4K would have been prevented.[847] He told us:

> I now feel personally responsible for the children that James abused on the ward following my complaint in 2017. I regret that I didn't pursue the complaint and now refuse to let it go.[848]

We consider that the hospital had the onus to respond appropriately to Mr Gordon's complaint. We discuss Mr Gordon's actions in advocating for greater transparency in how the hospital responded to complaints about Mr Griffin, including his own, in Section 5.

Finding—Launceston General Hospital's response to Will Gordon's 2017 Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint did not comply with the requirements of a State Service Code of Conduct investigation

The response to Mr Gordon's complaint was effectively an informal investigation, which seemed to act as a proxy for escalating Mr Griffin's conduct to the Secretary of the Department for a formal Employment Direction No. 5 investigation for a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. We are concerned that this reflects a systematic practice we have identified across our case studies of informal investigations being undertaken in response to serious allegations relating to children (whether through one incident or a pattern of conduct), when it would be more appropriate to initiate a State Service Code of Conduct investigation. A formal process can support matters to be investigated by those with the necessary expertise, with appropriate senior management oversight.

There was an inappropriate focus on whether the alleged conduct occurred within or outside the course of employment, which reflects another problem we have identified across our case studies. In this context, such a focus detracts from important considerations, such as whether the person subject to a complaint may pose a risk to children, regardless of how (or where) a complaint about their conduct arises.

Having an independent investigator can increase transparency and confidence in the investigation process and avoid actual or perceived conflicts of interest. In this instance, we consider that the failure to have a suitably independent investigation may have affected the participation of staff witnesses in the investigation. Also, not all relevant people, including the children involved or the adult Mr Griffin referenced regarding the complaint, were spoken to.

Previous complaints were not considered, even when they had been substantiated and responded to with education or direction. In addition, the outcome of the complaint was not appropriately communicated to Mr Gordon.

We consider that Mr Gordon took reasonable steps and acquitted his responsibilities by reporting to the Nurse Unit Manager and lodging a complaint on the Safety Reporting and Learning System. We consider health practitioners should be made aware of mandatory reporting obligations and how to enact them, and of how to make complaints to Ahpra. However, in the context of his overall conduct (including escalation to management), we do not consider that Mr Gordon failed in his duties. We note, also, the general lack of clarity about reporting obligations of junior staff in the hospital (which we discuss in Section 4.2).

4.1.29 4 November 2017—Mr Griffin is transferred to work in a fixed-term role at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Between 4 November 2017 and 27 April 2018, Mr Griffin was assigned, as a registered nurse, to Correctional Primary Health Services in Ashley Youth Detention Centre (sometimes referred to by witnesses as 'AYDC' or 'Ashley').[849]

Mr Griffin remained a Department employee during this time.[850] Jacqueline Allen, Acting Executive Director, People and Culture at the then Department of Communities, told us that Department was not required 'to conduct any pre-employment checks in relation to employees from other agencies performing duties at AYDC'.[851] Barry Nicholson, Group Director, Forensic Mental Health and Correctional Primary Health Services, told us that health staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre are employees of the Department of Health and therefore would have already been subject to criminal conviction checks and required to hold registration to work with vulnerable people.[852] Mr Bellinger noted that beyond practicalities (such as determining whether the area that was releasing the potential secondee could effectively backfill them), the hospital would not take any other steps to determine the suitability of a staff member before they were transferred to Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[853]

It was difficult to find authoritative information about Mr Griffin's transfer to Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Secretary Morgan-Wicks noted that the secondment opportunity was not advertised and that '[t]here is no information in the records available as to how Mr Griffin was known to the Correctional Primary Health team and who requested the transfer'.[854] There is nothing on Mr Griffin's personnel file that made any reference at all to this secondment.[855]

Mr Sherring recalled being included in email exchanges about Mr Griffin's appointment to Ashley Youth Detention Centre, but he could not recall who authorised the transfer or whether it was connected to concerns or disciplinary proceedings.[856] Mr Bellinger was also not aware of the circumstances surrounding Mr Griffin's transfer.[857]

Ms Leonard could also not illuminate the circumstances that led to Mr Griffin's transfer and the process that facilitated it.[858] She was not asked to provide a reference, recommendation or information about Mr Griffin's work history.[859] When asked how she learned of the secondment, Ms Leonard said:

> That's difficult to recall, but I don't know if Mr Griffin told me directly or I was contacted by the manager at Ashley, but I understand as it was a secondment that the HR team were involved in arranging that secondment.[860]

Mr Nicholson speculated that Mr Griffin may have been recruited by an Acting Nurse Unit Manager of Correctional Primary Health Services.[861]

We heard of concerns about Mr Griffin's behaviour while he was at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, although we are not aware of any complaints being made. Former Ward 4K nurse Annette Whitemore told us:

> One of the things I was told by some staff was that J [Mr Griffin] would show them photos of kids' files he had on his phone from when he worked at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Other nurses would talk about it and say he shouldn't have those photos on his phone, but J never showed them to me.[862]

Mr Gordon also recalled that Mr Griffin, after returning from his secondment in 2018, showed him photographs that appeared to be head shots of children and young people in Ashley Youth Detention Centre. Mr Gordon remembers Mr Griffin describing the offences the young people had committed.[863]

4.1.30 25 May 2018 and 22 May 2019—Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreements are signed off

On 25 May 2018, not long after completing his secondment at Ashley Youth Detention Centre on 27 April 2018, Ms Leonard signed off on Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreement. His recent secondment to Ashley Youth Detention Centre was not referenced in this document.

In response to a question in the Agreement about how Mr Griffin emulated the values of the organisation, the following was recorded:

- Demonstrating the care and understanding of the challenges and issues surrounding a young patient and family who find themselves in a position of being a patient in a strange environment surrounded by people they don't know.
- Communicating effectively and appropriately to patient.
- Utilising Hospital and Ward policies and procedures to ensure the best health and personal outcomes for young patients and their families.[864]

Performance measures in the Agreement include: 'To provide best possible care to our young patients and their families, and make their hospital stay as enjoyable and stress free as possible' and 'To be a positive role model and provide in-service education and support to fellow staff, junior staff and students on the ward'.[865] We note that in May 2017 a student made a complaint about Mr Griffin's behaviour (refer to Section 4.1.27), yet there is no reference to this in the Agreement, nor any suggestion that Mr Griffin should step back from mentoring or supervising junior staff or students.

Again, there is no mention of any of the complaints about Mr Griffin in the previous year. This indicates to us that Mr Griffin's behaviour apparently bore no consequence to the assessment of his professional performance.

Approximately a year later, on 22 May 2019, Ms Leonard signed off on the next of Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreements. This Agreement would be Mr Griffin's last. It largely mirrors, in some parts word for word, the previous year's Agreement.[866]

4.1.31 July 2019—A nurse complains about Mr Griffin's inappropriate comments and actions when administering medication

In mid-July 2019, a nurse on Ward 4K was caring for a patient who required controlled medication, which has additional safeguards in its administration.[867] Mr Griffin prepared the relevant medication, which was checked and administered to the patient with his nursing colleague present.[868] Mr Griffin made a comment to the nurse about the taste of the medication, invited her to put out her hand and placed a drop of the medication on her finger for her to taste.[869] The nurse discreetly disposed of the medication and withdrew from the situation.[870] She then overheard Mr Griffin speaking to the parent of the patient saying 'that's why it is used as a date rape drug'.[871]

The nurse reported this incident to a colleague, who alerted Ms Leonard.[872] Ms Leonard met with the nurse on 22 July 2019 and requested that she put her concerns in the form of a statement.[873] Ms Leonard recalled relaying the complaint verbally to Mr Harvey and Ms Tonks on the same day.[874]

On 31 July 2019 (around the time this complaint was being addressed), hospital staff, including human resources staff, became aware that Mr Griffin's registration to work with vulnerable people had been revoked and that Tasmania Police were investigating him for child sexual abuse. Tasmania Police briefed Dr Peter Renshaw (the then Executive Director of Medical Services) and Mr Harvey about the allegations. Mr Griffin was suspended from duties that day. We discuss this in more detail in Section 5.

On 7 August 2019, Ms Leonard received the written account of the incident from the nurse. As Ms Leonard was aware that Mr Griffin had been stood down in light of a police investigation, and that human resources staff and senior management were managing the hospital's response, she forwarded the written complaint to Mr Harvey and Ms Tonks, describing the concerns reported by the nurse as 'very alarming to me'.[875]

On the same day, Mr Harvey advised Ms Leonard that the complaint would be sent to Tasmania Police through Dr Renshaw to 'determine whether it may be relevant to their ongoing investigation against Mr Griffin'.[876] Ms Leonard told our Commission of Inquiry that she had no further involvement in this complaint and was unsure how it was ultimately resolved.[877] We consider this reasonable given that, by this stage, all matters relating to Mr Griffin (who was by then not in the workplace) were being overseen by the human resources team and senior management.

On 7 August 2019, Mr Harvey forwarded the nurse's complaint to Mr Bellinger and to the Department's former Director of Employee Relations.

Mr Harvey also forwarded the complaint to Dr Renshaw on 7 August 2019, suggesting he send it to Detective Senior Constable Hindle of Tasmania Police. Detective Senior Constable Hindle had initiated an investigation into potential abuse by Mr Griffin following a report, which we describe in Section 5.[878] Dr Renshaw forwarded the complaint to Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 13 August 2019, with a message that it contained 'information from a hospital staff member that may be relevant to your investigation'.[879]

4.2 Undocumented or undated concerns or complaints from staff

In addition to the complaints outlined in Section 4.1, which the hospital acknowledges as having been reported or recorded, we received other information from staff and former staff of Launceston General Hospital about Mr Griffin's behaviour.

We heard that the hospital's practice was to minimise or dismiss concerns, which we consider provides context for why the complaints described below were not documented.[880] In reflecting on the evidence before our Commission of Inquiry, Secretary Morgan-Wicks said:

> From the evidence and from my conversations with several witnesses, including staff that have come forward to report, they all share a common story of feeling fobbed off … or their complaint ignored and they did not feel supported in relation to the serious harms or incidents they reported.[881]

At hearings, Emily Shepherd, Branch Secretary, Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (Tasmanian Branch), described some of the discussions she had with staff after Mr Griffin's death, during which many staff members told her of their concerns about Mr Griffin. Ms Shepherd acknowledged that some of the concerns shared by staff members may not have met the threshold for mandatory reporting, but added:

> … their concern was that there was … what appeared to be a pattern of incidents that, you know, was bordering on unprofessional behaviour, and I think that was really a concern about, well, how is it that it is captured over time and how is that escalated?[882]

We also heard of confusion among staff about how to raise a complaint or a concern about the conduct of a work colleague. Ms Shepherd reported staff telling her of multiple and inconsistent approaches taken by the hospital when a concern about a colleague was reported, which ranged from requests to send an email report, to verbal reporting to a manager to lodging a complaint in the Safety Reporting and Learning System.[883]

This evidence was consistent with the documented evidence we received regarding how Ms Leonard managed different complaints about Mr Griffin. For example, as outlined above, in August 2017, Mr Gordon's complaint was recorded and managed through the Safety Reporting and Learning System, whereas in July 2019, Ms Leonard asked a staff member to write a formal statement and forward it by email. At other times, Ms Leonard recorded concerns in her diary or as a file note. Some complaints were managed via email or letters to Mr Griffin.

We consider that it would have been difficult for staff to raise concerns formally if there was no clear process for doing so and if they did not know what process to expect. Ms Shepherd told us that hospital reporting systems should be improved by implementing a consistent approach for raising concerns across the Tasmanian Health Service.[884]

Several staff described their casual or contracted work status as a disincentive to speaking up about concerns they may have held about a colleague. For example, Maria Unwin, a nurse who worked on Ward 4K between 1993 and 2009, told us:

> I further believe that people who ask questions and make complaints at [Launceston General Hospital] are punished for doing so and treated as trouble makers. In my view there is a very strong practice of choosing and promoting people who say 'yes'. I have witnessed this with staff who are highly qualified for positions missing out, in place of staff who are known to agree with management.[885]

Mr Gordon said that fears about not securing a permanent position at the hospital deterred him from raising early concerns about Mr Griffin:

> … I was quite junior at the time and I did not have permanency on 4K and, in order to not upset the apple cart, I sort of didn't raise any concerns that I deemed were what I thought weren't minor but would cause tension between myself and other staff members. I did want to stay there and I thought, if I … started throwing accusations about James Griffin, the other staff members would not take too kindly to it.[886]

Another former employee echoed these sentiments:

> People are reluctant to challenge things because they don't want to jeopardise their career. Obtaining a permanent contract is also a big carrot for nurses at [Launceston General Hospital], and is something nurses don't want to jeopardise by making waves.[887]

Several other undocumented staff complaints that we outline below show that when staff did raise concerns they did not receive a satisfactory response. Sometimes they were told 'that's just Jim' or were encouraged to resolve the concern with Mr Griffin directly. Mr Gordon told us:

> When a complaint was made the managers would often say 'have you spoken to Jim about it', but most staff felt too nervous to confront him. I'm only aware of one nurse that did confront him and that was before I started.[888]
> I have been told by other 4K nursing staff that numerous grievances on 4K that should have been reported by staff were not reported because they felt 'why bother'.[889]

As discussed earlier in this section, Ms Leonard acknowledged a 'complicated culture' on the ward.[890] She accepted that this culture impeded the reporting of concerns.[891] She conceded that staff would likely be unwilling to escalate their complaints to more senior nursing managers if they doubted they would manage them fairly.[892] We note that Ms Leonard also defended her management of some of the complaints about Mr Griffin on the basis that the staff members who raised concerns 'did not seek feedback, information on outcomes, or advise that they were not satisfied with the outcome of the process'.[893]

Some of the complaints we outline below raise the question of why staff did not independently report their concerns to external bodies such as Child Safety Services or Ahpra. While this would have been ideal, we do not hold any of the staff mentioned below responsible for not reporting their concerns. We consider that any suggestion otherwise fails to adequately take account of the relevant context. In particular, we consider that there was a culture at Launceston General Hospital of not reporting without the permission of senior management.

Ms Unwin told us that although mandatory reporting under child safety legislation was something all staff were required to know about, 'in practice we were told that mandatory reporting would always be managed by the paediatric registrar or paediatrician'.[894] While we accept that we did not seek evidence from a paediatrician on this point, Ms Unwin's comments reflect what is now current policy in the Tasmanian Health Service Protocol – Complaint or Concern about Health Professional Conduct. The protocol, which applies to all Tasmanian Health Service staff since November 2020, states:

> In the case of reporting an offence complaint, this should be undertaken through the relevant Executive/Medico-Legal Advisor (South) through Human Resources. Mandatory reporting of a registered health professional, as represented by the organisation, must be sanctioned formally (in writing) and in accordance with line delegations.[895]

We discuss our concerns with this policy in Chapter 15 but note here that it appears to reflect what several staff told us about reporting practice. We could not find an earlier policy about this.

In addition to what Ms Unwin told us, Ms Whitemore said: 'We all knew we were mandatory reporters, and I don't think we were deliberately not told this, but until 2019 when all this happened … I never knew I could go straight to Ahpra'.[896] Mr Gordon told us that most nurses on Ward 4K did not realise they could report their colleagues to Ahpra.[897] He said: 'We just didn't know, we weren't told about it, there was no education about that sort of complaint process'.[898]

Another Ward 4K staff member said it was their practice as a registered nurse to 'escalate concerns first to management and then be directed as to which direction to take next'.[899]

Given an apparent practice of escalation for reporting, which we accept will often be operationally appropriate, we were concerned that the former Executive Director of Nursing, Helen Bryan, told us she was not aware of the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line—the first point of contact for child safety and wellbeing concerns and the place to which mandatory reports under child safety legislation should be made.[900] Ms Bryan told us, however, that she had no experience with managing child safety allegations and that she was aware of the legislation underpinning the mandatory reporting scheme and her duties as a mandatory reporter.[901]

4.2.1 Maria Unwin

As a former Ward 4K nurse, Ms Unwin told us about a conversation she had with the Nurse Unit Manager who preceded Ms Leonard, sometime in the early 2000s. Ms Unwin expressed that, at the time, she had a general feeling of unease around Mr Griffin and her concern grew when his preference for caring for, and becoming 'new best friends' with teenage female patients, became apparent.[902] She said that when she told the Nurse Unit Manager about her concerns:

> I clearly recall [the Nurse Unit Manager's] response, which was 'everyone has something to offer'. I don't recall if [they] said anything else but recall this being the end of the conversation … As a result of this, I initially felt guilty for judging Jim and not giving him the benefit of the doubt. I also felt there was nowhere else for me to go with my concerns and that the matter had been dealt with.[903]

Ms Unwin felt she couldn't raise concerns with the Nurse Unit Manager again, but she did talk to a more experienced staff remember (whose name she could not recall) and was met with a response along the lines of 'that's just Jim'.[904]

Ms Unwin noted that she generally had 'a great deal of respect for' the Nurse Unit Manager.[905]

4.2.2 A Ward 4K staff member

Another Launceston General Hospital staff member, who worked alongside Mr Griffin on Ward 4K from 2002 and at times acted as Nurse Unit Manager of Ward 4K, told us:

> I also have knowledge of many other occasions through conversation with other staff members of where Mr Griffin overstepped boundaries by physically touching or being physically overfamiliar with patients. These patients appeared to be mostly highly vulnerable teenage girls or chronic illness type diagnoses.[906]

The staff member said that ward staff often noted Mr Griffin's preference for caring for teenage girls.[907]

The staff member stated that Mr Griffin 'regularly referred to his patients as "chicki-babe, babe or princess", and also referred to female staff members in the same way'.[908] They told us that Mr Griffin was verbally affectionate with females and that multiple staff members had observed Mr Griffin being asked to stop using this language.[909] The staff member also told us of having multiple conversations over the many years they worked with Mr Griffin about Mr Griffin's 'overly affectionate behaviour towards teenage girls both internal and external to the ward'.[910]

The staff member further described witnessing an incident in which Mr Griffin carried a patient with a physical disability from a bathroom outside her room to her bed without first drying and dressing her. They recalled that other staff followed Mr Griffin into the patient's room 'to advocate for the patient'.[911] While the staff member found this behaviour concerning, they thought that because the patient's family was in the room, 'she would be safe once there'.[912]

4.2.3 Will Gordon

In addition to the documented complaint Mr Gordon made about Mr Griffin in 2017, he told us about witnessing other concerning incidents involving Mr Griffin:

- Mr Griffin referred to the drug midazolam as being 'like a date rape drug' in the presence of a young patient and her parents while Mr Gordon was a junior nurse, in either 2016 or 2017.[913] We note that this account is similar to the documented complaint made by another staff member about Mr Griffin in July 2019 (refer to Section 4.1.31).

- Mr Griffin commented on a female infant's lips in 2018, saying 'people would pay thousands of dollars for lips like that'. Mr Gordon noted that Mr Griffin frequently cared for this patient, often by himself.[914]
- Mr Griffin pulled up the nappy of the same female infant, after what Mr Gordon assumed must have been a nappy change, in the absence of a chaperone. This made Mr Gordon's 'hairs stand up on end'.[915]
- Mr Griffin came out of a communal bathroom, unaccompanied, with the same female infant. Mr Gordon added that he was aware of other occasions when Mr Griffin took patients, unaccompanied, to this bathroom.[916]

4.2.4 Other staff

A number of staff or former staff of Launceston General Hospital provided anonymous statements to our Commission of Inquiry about Mr Griffin. Others asked that their identity not be publicly revealed. We have only included information from these statements where the person directly observed or experienced the conduct.

We are conscious that many of these accounts have not been meaningfully tested with key witnesses. For this reason, we have not relied on them in making our formal findings, which we consider can be made on the strength of documented and acknowledged incidents alone. We have not made efforts to draw conclusions about the accuracy or veracity of any individual concern or complaint. However, we considered it important to include this information for completeness and to provide the public with as much information as possible about Mr Griffin's conduct.

A nurse who worked alongside Mr Griffin described to us the following incidents:

- A senior nurse said to them: 'You know Jim likes the young girls, don't you?'. When the nurse questioned what this meant, the senior nurse replied: 'You watch at handover, he will go for the young girls'.[917] The nurse then observed Mr Griffin nominating to care for young patients with eating disorders or chronic illnesses, which confirmed what the senior nurse had said.[918]
- Mr Griffin cared for several girls on Ward 4K and fulfilled the role of a male figure in their lives, including attending a former patient's wedding.[919]
- When caring for a patient who had electrocardiogram dots on her body after an operation, Mr Griffin removed the dots himself. The nurse believed that nurses would usually tell patients that they should remove the dots themselves.[920]

Another nurse who worked alongside Mr Griffin on the ward relayed the following:

- The nurse reported feeling 'immediately uncomfortable' in Mr Griffin's presence, particularly noticing the way he behaved around women and young women.[921]
- Mr Griffin told a sexual joke about a young girl to a group of nursing staff at handover in the presence of a manager, who laughed.[922] When the witnessing nurse raised the inappropriateness of the joke, the response provided was that Mr Griffin had worked on the ward for a long time.[923]
- The nurse verbally raised two concerns about Mr Griffin's behaviour with management—one involving Mr Griffin inappropriately touching a patient's thigh, and the other concerning Mr Griffin specifically choosing to care for physically or emotionally vulnerable female patients, even when he was not their allocated nurse.[924] The nurse recalled raising concerns about Mr Griffin's behaviour with management another 'half a dozen times' while working on Ward 4K.[925] The nurse described these concerns as being based on their 'own observations and gut instinct' and included Mr Griffin's use of pet names for patients and staff, such as 'baby girl', 'gorgeous', 'sweetheart', 'beautiful girl' and 'sexy'.[926]
- The nurse felt they needed to watch Mr Griffin 'because of the way he would invest in patients lives, not just their care', regularly checking in with female patients who were allocated to Mr Griffin and having to watch Mr Griffin's care of these patients.[927]
- The nurse spoke with a senior nurse about feeling uncomfortable with Mr Griffin's 'presence and bedside manner'.[928]
- The nurse observed Mr Griffin spending a lot of time building trust with patients, saying:

  > He did this subtly, often gaining the trust of single mums before he would try with the patients themselves. He had a clear method of gaining trust quickly and cleanly, and it worked. He would pick vulnerable children and then act in a way that he would say was designed to make them feel safe and secure. He'd place himself as the father figure in the lives of young girls who didn't have a father. He would have deep conversations with them, asking them questions beyond what a nurse needed to know.[929]

- The nurse observed a young female visiting the ward 'on several occasions' during 2016 or 2017 to have her knees and ankles strapped due to injury by Mr Griffin in the treatment room, where the blinds and door would be closed.[930]

Another hospital employee described attending to a young female patient in the emergency department in 2019. They observed Mr Griffin 'hovering in the examination bay standing quite close to the patient'.[931] When the staff member questioned why Mr Griffin was there, he told the staff member that he was a friend of the patient's family.

The employee told Mr Griffin he should leave, which he did.[932] This staff member also recalled that, in or around 2019, Mr Griffin was given responsibility to provide one-to-one care to a highly traumatised teenage girl overnight in a single room.[933]

A nurse at the hospital also told us about having a 'creepy' feeling around Mr Griffin.[934] This nurse observed Mr Griffin's behaviour towards a particular young female patient who was highly vulnerable. The nurse recalled observing Mr Griffin calling this patient pet names, such as 'sweetie', and rubbing her back. The nurse says other people witnessed the behaviour. The nurse could not recall saying anything to management but said 'it stuck in my mind', adding 'I remember thinking, you're a creep. It didn't look good'.[935]

4.2.5 Managers

The Nurse Unit Manager who worked on Ward 4K before Ms Leonard between 2001 and 2008 gave evidence to our Commission of Inquiry about several recollections relating to concerns raised about Mr Griffin.

They had a scant memory that a staff member reported seeing Mr Griffin at a sporting match with a former patient and that they felt they needed to address this with Mr Griffin as a potential breach of the State Service Code of Conduct.[936] Mr Griffin admitted taking the former patient to the game along with his own family.[937] When Mr Griffin was reminded that he should not have contact with former patients, he reported to this Nurse Unit Manager that he had stopped contacting the patient.[938] The Nurse Unit Manager accepted his explanation and did not document the incident.[939]

In addition to the complaints that Ms Leonard directly received or documented about Mr Griffin, which we have outlined above, Ms Leonard also made some general observations to us about Mr Griffin's conduct.

For example, she told us that she tried to ensure procedures involving intimate engagement with paediatric patients, such as bathing, were conducted by a nurse of the same gender as the patient, and that she sometimes reallocated patients to different nurses accordingly.[940] Ms Leonard said:

> In my view, Mr Griffin, as well as other staff, did not always demonstrate an awareness of procedures involving intimate engagement with paediatric patients. By this, I mean that if there had been an inappropriate allocation made [and Mr Griffin was assigned to bathing a female patient], he would not raise the issue and request that it be changed.[941]

Ms Leonard gave evidence that she was aware of Mr Griffin having contact with a patient outside the hospital but was not concerned because this patient knew Mr Griffin socially.[942]

4.3 Undocumented or undated concerns or complaints from patients and their family members

We received numerous accounts of Mr Griffin's conduct that were not the subject of a documented complaint from former Ward 4K patients and their families. These accounts of Mr Griffin's behaviour and abuse had many similarities and reflected staff observations of Mr Griffin's grooming practices. This is not an exhaustive account of all the abuses described to us because some people chose to provide information to us confidentially and did not consent to us publishing this information in our report. We are also conscious that some former patients and victim-survivors have chosen not to share their experiences with us.

We note that, like employees of the hospital, patients and their families commonly experienced barriers to making a formal complaint about Mr Griffin, including a lack of response from hospital staff when raising concerns.

4.3.1 Angelique Knight

Angelique Knight was a patient on Ward 4K on and off from the ages of five to 21. She first complained to nursing staff about Mr Griffin when she met him in around 2001, when she was 14 years old. At this time, she found him to be 'touchy feely' with her and recalled screaming at one point 'get that man away from me'.[943] Ms Knight believes that her mother also requested that Mr Griffin not care for her, but her mother's complaints were not acknowledged or responded to, and, after a short period, Mr Griffin was caring for her again.[944]

Ms Knight stated that nursing staff would observe Mr Griffin 'hug and kiss me in the hallways of ward 4K'.[945] However, staff told her Mr Griffin 'was just a touchy feely kind of guy'.[946] She also stated that nursing staff were aware of how close Mr Griffin had become to her while she was a patient and afterwards, including that he intended to give her away at her wedding (refer to Section 4.1.10).[947] When hospital management told Mr Griffin that it would be inappropriate to give Ms Knight away, he acted as master of ceremonies at her wedding instead.[948]

In a statement that Ms Knight made to Tasmania Police and shared with us, she described Mr Griffin:

- adding her on Facebook and giving her his personal mobile number so they could communicate via Facebook and text message[949]
- physically touching her, including hugging her, giving her bear hugs and putting his arm around her waist while engaging in conversation with other nurses[950]
- helping her prepare for showers and baths, including sometimes helping her to undress and washing her back[951]

- helping her to remove electrocardiogram dots from her body, which had been placed over her breasts, chest and abdomen[952]
- placing his hand on the inside of her thigh and resting his hand on her vagina while he sat with her and talked[953]
- kissing her 'for longer than a usual peck'[954]
- referring to her as 'baby girl', 'my princess', 'you're my girl' or 'my favourite girl' and telling staff 'she is my girl'[955]
- questioning her about the details of her relationship and whether she had been intimate.[956]

Ms Knight said in her statement to police:

> People tell me I am lucky it never went down 'that line'. I think that if I had [have] taken him up on his invitations to go away with him what he would have done to me. It crosses my mind constantly and I honestly do not feel lucky at all. I feel disgusting and violated all the time, it just always seems to be on my mind.[957]

4.3.2 Kirsty Neilley

Kirsty Neilley first met Mr Griffin when she was admitted to Launceston General Hospital in October 2015, at the age of 16.[958] Soon after her admission, Mr Griffin began to overstep professional boundaries.[959] Ms Neilley recalled Mr Griffin looking at her Facebook account with her, including photos on her phone, sending her a message to allow her to see his Facebook account and photos, and exchanging messages with Mr Griffin via Facebook, including on his days off.[960] She said that 'Jim was the only nurse that would look at Facebook with me and send me messages'.[961]

Soon after they began exchanging messages via Facebook, Mr Griffin told Ms Neilley he 'wasn't allowed to talk to me on Facebook anymore, and that he would get into trouble if anyone saw our messages'.[962] Mr Griffin gave Ms Neilley his phone number so they could text instead, telling her that if anyone saw those messages they would not know who they were from.[963] Consequently, they started exchanging messages by phone.[964]

Ms Neilley also described Mr Griffin giving her a 'hug and a kiss in my room' before leaving after a night shift, adding that he would never do this during the day.[965] She described Mr Griffin's hugs as 'long'.[966]

Ms Neilley further recalled Mr Griffin taking her out of Ward 4K to get coffee and, on one occasion, to a shop in the hospital to get lollies. She said Mr Griffin once took her to the top of the hospital to look out over Launceston. On this occasion, he held her close while in the elevator and then stood behind her giving her a hug while they were at the top of the hospital.[967]

One night, Ms Neilley awoke to Mr Griffin 'standing beside my bed, holding his phone up with what appeared to be the torch on'.[968] When she asked what he was doing, Mr Griffin responded he was waking her because he was finishing his shift.[969] Ms Neilley said this 'didn't feel right or normal' and that it occurred 'a couple more times'.[970]

Ms Neilley said that at one point she received a phone call from Mr Griffin, who told her that someone had put in a complaint that he was becoming too close to her and that he had been told not to care for her anymore or have any contact with her.[971] Ms Neilley said Mr Griffin laughed before saying he would always care for her but that it would 'depend who was on shift'.[972] Mr Griffin continued to visit Ms Neilley in her room at least once each shift, shutting the door behind him before sitting with her, talking, looking at Facebook and doing puzzles.[973]

Ms Neilley had later admissions to Launceston General Hospital, during which Mr Griffin provided her with nursing care. On one admission she couldn't walk and needed a shower. Mr Griffin helped her to the shower using a wheelchair, but when she finished showering, she noticed she had left her clothes in her room. Mr Griffin told her no wheelchairs were available before picking her up and carrying her back to her room wrapped in a towel.[974] Ms Neilley did not recall whether anyone saw this, but she said she was carried past other rooms on the ward.[975] When Ms Neilley was discharged from the hospital following this admission, she continued to exchange messages with Mr Griffin by phone 'about once a month'.[976]

Ms Neilley got married in 2018. Mr Griffin attended the wedding and posed for photos, telling everybody he was proud of his 'baby girl'.[977] He said it so much that the photographer asked Ms Neilley whether she wanted a photo with her father before calling Mr Griffin over.[978] Ms Neilley recalled that this was the first time Mr Griffin had called her 'baby girl' in front of others and that he had sometimes called her this when she was in hospital.[979]

Ms Neilley had her first child in 2019. During a visit around this time, Mr Griffin said words to the effect of 'I'm so proud of how much you've grown up baby girl. I've still got all your photos of our time together as a memory'.[980] This statement confused Ms Neilley, who assumed he was talking about her wedding photos. It also prompted Ms Neilley's husband to question Ms Neilley about what photos Mr Griffin was referring to, but Ms Neilley did not think anything of it at the time.[981]

4.3.3 Angela

In 2018, Angela (a pseudonym) raised concerns about the care her daughter Lilian (a pseudonym), who has cerebral palsy, was receiving at Launceston General Hospital from nursing staff, including Mr Griffin.[982] Angela said she first became concerned when she saw Mr Griffin rubbing Lilian despite noticing that Lilian was obviously uncomfortable. Angela asked Mr Griffin to stop.[983] When Mr Griffin left the room, she asked Lilian whether she wanted him to be her nurse, to which Lilian responded 'no' using her hand signals.[984]

Angela became increasingly concerned when she noticed on more than one occasion that somebody had been putting cream on Lilian's vagina. When she queried staff about who was applying the cream, she did not get an answer.[985] Angela requested that the cream not be applied and confronted Mr Griffin, who said to Angela 'show me where the issue is'.[986] At Mr Griffin's insistence, Angela pulled her daughter's nappy down slightly. Mr Griffin tapped his hand on Lilian's vagina and said, 'she'll be fine'.[987] Angela instructed that no more males were to change her daughter's nappy and asked that this instruction be put in writing on Lilian's file.[988] Angela recalled the nurse in charge said she would refer the incident to people higher up in the hospital.[989] It is not clear whether this occurred.

Angela also raised her concerns about Mr Griffin and other staff with Child Safety Services, but these concerns were dismissed and no action taken.[990] We have not been provided with a copy of Angela's complaint about the incident.

4.3.4 Other patients

The material below is drawn from anonymous submissions. We have not been able to independently verify this material, nor the identity of all those who made anonymous submissions. We consider, however, that these disclosures reveal common themes about Mr Griffin's conduct, and it is in the public interest to present this material.

One female patient who was admitted to Ward 4K in 2004 told us that Mr Griffin asked other nurses if they would swap patients so he could treat her.[991] She described Mr Griffin as initially being 'just friendly and cuddly' and said he was like this with a lot of the patients.[992] But he soon started insisting that he be present when she showered.[993] He then began 'pulling my tops up and my pants down to check me and touch my private parts' under the guise of medical care.[994] Mr Griffin then started to enter her room at night and sexually assault her while she pretended to be asleep.[995] The patient frequently discharged herself from the hospital to avoid being around Mr Griffin.[996]

The parents of another female patient who was admitted to Ward 4K for lengthy periods from 2008 described Mr Griffin as befriending them 'very quickly' and becoming their daughter's regular nurse. They recalled Mr Griffin:

- saying to their daughter words to the effect of 'don't worry I'll be your nurse', 'you'[re] my special girl', 'you'[re] my only special one' and 'don't worry I'll look after you'
- being 'handsy, rubbing [their daughter's] back, brushing her hair, touching her in some way, carrying her and putting her on his knee'
- regularly calling the patient's mother 'sweetheart' and saying 'I'll look after our special girl, you go have some tea' or 'I'll shower her today, you go have a cup of tea'

- giving his mobile number to their daughter without their knowledge or consent (the parents were not aware of this until a senior nurse told them not to accept phone numbers from staff)
- adding their daughter on Facebook
- telling them he gave a previous patient away at her wedding and that they were still close
- undertaking 'routine nightly checks' where he would come into their daughter's room and use his torch to check the bed and look around her legs and lower half (Mr Griffin explained this to the parents as 'protocol' for the child's medical condition even though other nurses did not do the same)
- randomly turning up at their holiday home when their daughter was on day release from the hospital.[997]

When they asked another nurse whether it was normal for males to shower female patients and use their phone and torch to check under the bed covers at night, the reply they received was 'it's just Jim and how he does his job'.[998]

The mother of another patient who entered the hospital in the early 2010s contacted our Commission of Inquiry to advise of a negative experience her daughter had with Mr Griffin. The mother told us Mr Griffin was forceful with her daughter in attempting to provide medical care and was rubbing and touching her leg, leaving her daughter to describe Mr Griffin as a 'creep' and threatening to walk out if Mr Griffin continued to treat her.[999] The mother told us she complained to one of the nurses. The nurse reportedly said there was nothing that could be done because Mr Griffin had been allocated to her daughter's care. Yet, the mother said this nurse then quietly approached her and assured her that Mr Griffin would not care for her daughter, telling our Inquiry: '[The nurse] gave me a basic acknowledgment she understood what I was saying and what I was referring to'.[1000] The mother is not sure whether this incident was ever documented.

A female patient who was admitted to Ward 4K in around 2012 told us that Mr Griffin was commonly assigned as her nurse.[1001] She described Mr Griffin:

- touching and rubbing her buttocks, neck and inner thighs[1002]
- frequently hugging her for long periods[1003]
- giving her medication when she was distressed, after which she would wake up hours later[1004]
- watching her when she went to the toilet and shower[1005]
- threatening to show the nurses photos of her naked if she did not comply with her treatment plan.[1006]

This patient told us that Mr Griffin was friendly with her family. She also described abuse by Mr Griffin outside of the hospital.[1007]

Another female patient who was admitted to Ward 4K in 2012 and placed under the care of Mr Griffin described her first interaction with him as 'a bit hostile'.[1008] However, after this, he 'suddenly became very charming and charismatic'.[1009] This patient told us that Mr Griffin called her pet names, which she found 'patronising, gross and inappropriate'.[1010] She said that Mr Griffin 'would mostly sit on my bed when he came to my bedside' and that she felt Mr Griffin 'imposed himself on my personal space and acted too familiar'.[1011] Mr Griffin also asked her about her 'personal life and boys', which she found 'strange' as she 'had never liked conversations about "boys", especially with much older men'.[1012] The patient described other incidents including:

- Mr Griffin insisted she expose more of her body than was necessary and against her will, and stared 'intensely at my groin region' when administering an injection.[1013]
- Mr Griffin insisted that he remove sticky dots from her chest, noting that he went to leave when she objected but then checked if anyone was looking and 'walked back to my bed, pulled down the front of my hospital gown, ran his hands over my chest, and also took these sticky dots off'.[1014] The patient was frozen in shock at this interaction, yet Mr Griffin continued to 'act like everything was normal' afterwards.[1015]
- The patient reported Mr Griffin 'shuffling around the room on multiple occasions' during the night when she was in hospital and 'waking to a light on at least one occasion'. She told us that Mr Griffin gave her a 'threatening "look"' while holding something behind his back with his right hand, when he realised she was awake.[1016]

She also recalled Mr Griffin attending to another unaccompanied young female patient in her room at night and hearing the young patient was 'very distressed'.[1017] At the time, she thought Mr Griffin was performing a medical procedure on the other patient, but on reflection she considered 'it would be highly unlikely that such a distressing medical procedure would have been carried out on this child at the middle of the night and by a solo male nurse'.[1018]

Another female patient who was admitted to Ward 4K in 2014 and 2015 recalled Mr Griffin:

- saying to her parents 'I think of her as a daughter'
- touching her thigh while engaging in conversation (she stated that Mr Griffin 'was very touchy-feely and cuddly, always cuddling me, putting hands on me, touching my thigh and rubbing my leg')
- making her shower in her room with the door open and, on one occasion, coming in to talk to her while she was showering

- taking a photo of her on his phone
- holding her down in the presence of a female nurse to collect blood for a blood test.[1019]

Yet another female patient who was admitted to Ward 4K in or around 2014 or 2015 told us that one night Mr Griffin said he needed to check her heart lead stickers and he touched her breast. She said there was no need for Mr Griffin to touch her breast because there were no lead stickers on them.[1020] She also noted that other nurses had previously asked her to check these stickers herself.[1021] The patient recalled:

> That night I called my mum crying and told her I was scared. When mum came up, I was surprised to see her in the morning. I couldn't remember ringing her. I believe that I must have been under the influence of drugs. Mum says I told her what Jim had done and begged her not to leave me there.
> Mum stayed that night in the bed next to me. Later she said during the night Jim entered my room and immediately left when he saw my mum.[1022]

In a separate submission to us, this patient's father outlined these same events and described Mr Griffin as giving him 'the creeps'.[1023]

Another female patient who was admitted to Ward 4K at a young age in the mid-2010s recalled that Mr Griffin, who was her night nurse, showed 'inappropriate favouritism to her' by not requiring her to comply with a medical plan.[1024] She further recalled that Mr Griffin:

- touched her breast and buttocks while undertaking observations[1025]
- frequently visited her even when he was not her assigned nurse[1026]
- sat on her bed and rubbed her leg and inner thigh 'towards my vagina' when her parents were not present[1027]
- gave her back rubs and called her 'baby girl', 'darling' and his 'special girl'[1028]
- insisted she change into a hospital gown in his presence, when other nurses would give her privacy[1029]
- tied her hospital gown at the back and touched her buttocks and the side of her breast while doing this, saying 'don't tell anyone', 'that's what friends do', 'this is our thing' and 'this is our little secret'.[1030]

This patient recalled expressing multiple times that she did not want a male nurse. The patient understood that this request was passed on to the Nurse Unit Manager by her mother, but Mr Griffin continued as her nurse.[1031] The patient said that she complained directly to the Nurse Unit Manager about Mr Griffin touching her but that the Nurse Unit Manager 'was dismissive' and 'brushed off my concerns', saying words to the effect of 'he's just a nurse. You know he has to touch you in those places'.[1032]

The patient also told us that she complained to the Nurse Unit Manager about Mr Griffin watching and talking to her when she showered and insisting on drying her off, which other nurses did not do.[1033]

She recalled also telling a senior nurse that she was uncomfortable with Mr Griffin calling her 'darling' and 'baby'.[1034] She said the senior nurse responded with words to the effect of 'oh, that's fine, Jim just says things like that', which she said made her feel she was acting strangely for bringing it up.[1035]

The patient further described Mr Griffin befriending her family members and 'welcoming himself into our family and making himself a part of our lives by stepping in and acting as a father or grandfather figure'.[1036] She told us that Mr Griffin abused her outside the hospital.[1037]

Another female patient who was admitted to Ward 4K in 2018 told us that 'Jim did lots of touching and showed lots of interest in me'.[1038] She described Mr Griffin:

- being 'overfriendly' and calling her 'baby girl' and his 'special girl'[1039]
- sitting on her bed on top of the covers and touching her upper thigh while a parent was present[1040]
- frequently checking in on her when he was on shift[1041]
- helping her shower[1042]
- coming into her room, touching her leg and moving his hand slowly towards her vagina.[1043]

This patient also described instances of grooming and abuse by Mr Griffin outside of the hospital.[1044]

Another patient who made a submission to us said Mr Griffin sexually abused her on Ward 4K during the 2010s while she was an inpatient. She said she had numerous admissions, sometimes for lengthy stays.[1045] She did not provide further details.

In 2005, a young woman disclosed childhood sexual abuse (which occurred outside the hospital) by Mr Griffin to her general practitioner. She told us:

> My reason for seeking his help, other than for personal reasons, was because I was aware James Griffin was employed at Launceston General Hospital in the paediatrics ward. I was concerned he would come into contact with children through his work.[1046]

This woman described her doctor being somewhat surprised by her disclosure because he knew Mr Griffin through local sport. The doctor arranged a referral for her to sexual assault support service, Laurel House, and told the woman he would 'take care of' the issue of Mr Griffin working in the hospital.[1047]

When she came back to the doctor for an appointment sometime later, she recalled the doctor telling her words to the effect of 'you don't need to be worried about LGH'.[1048] She told us:

> When he said this I felt relieved. In my mind I reconciled that I must be the only victim. My GP didn't tell me who he had spoken to or elaborate on why I didn't need to worry. I trusted my GP and felt reassured by what he told me so didn't take it any further with him. I now wish I had asked more about the steps he had taken, but in a way, it was the answer I was expecting because I always thought it was only me.[1049]

She didn't discuss the matter with the general practitioner again and, shortly after, moved away and changed doctors.[1050]

When we contacted this general practitioner, he stated that he had no recollection of this woman's disclosure and had no clinical records to refer to because his records had been handwritten and were lawfully destroyed following the relevant retention period.[1051] We could not confirm whether the doctor contacted Launceston General Hospital about the disclosure.

4.4 Findings

Below, we make a series of findings about the appropriateness of Launceston General Hospital's response to concerns and complaints about Mr Griffin, as well as the systems and processes the hospital used in response to complaints. As noted above, all these findings are based on recorded and acknowledged complaints alone.

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed to manage the risks posed by James Griffin

There were at least 14 complaints that related to breaches of professional boundaries and confidentiality and of sexualised, unprofessional behaviour by Mr Griffin during his time at Launceston General Hospital. These were never escalated beyond an education and direction response. Launceston General Hospital was on notice to the potential that Mr Griffin posed a serious risk to children and young people—at least from 2011 or 2012, when Ms Pearn made her disclosure, if not before—and should have known this posed a risk to patient safety. In the following findings we identify different aspects of this failing.

Finding—Launceston General Hospital leadership collectively failed to address a toxic culture in Ward 4K that enabled James Griffin's offending to continue and prevented his conduct being reported

From late 2008, we understand there was a hostile working environment in Ward 4K. Throughout our report we have highlighted how the culture of an organisation can enable abuse to occur, as well as prevent it being reported or appropriately dealt with when it does occur. In Chapter 13, we have also described a range of cultural problems that have been highlighted in previous reviews that show significant cultural problems existed within Tasmanian health services, including Launceston General Hospital. We continued to observe many of these problems in our examination of this case study.

The specific culture of Ward 4K, as described to us by many witnesses, combined with the 'hands off' nature of the senior nursing management, created an environment that enabled Mr Griffin to offend unabated. Ms Leonard acknowledged this, stating that the culture and conflict on the ward was 'a perfect storm for Mr Griffin to take advantage of'.[1052] Ms Leonard also described feeling groomed by Mr Griffin and him taking advantage of the poor culture of the ward:

> I have a lot to learn, as we all do, and part of the challenge in responding is that I feel deep, deep, deeply that we were deceived, we were manipulated, and we were sold a version of Mr Griffin that he wanted us to believe; and, unfortunately with all of the distractions and the difficult personalities and the difficult situations on the ward, it's—I feel that it might have opened up opportunities for Mr Griffin to take advantage of and manipulate us.[1053]

There were at least 14 complaints about Mr Griffin's unprofessional behaviour that were never properly escalated. We suspect there were many more concerns that were raised and not addressed or not raised at all. The culture of an organisation is the responsibility of leadership. We find there was a collective failure of leadership in not addressing this toxic culture at Launceston General Hospital.

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed to consider the cumulative effect of complaints about James Griffin

Each complaint about Mr Griffin was responded to as if it was the only complaint, rather than one in a series of regular boundary breaches against vulnerable children. This meant that the cumulative effect of concerns about Mr Griffin's conduct were not considered and escalated. Professional boundary breach complaints should not be considered as separate individual incidents—such an approach misses the cumulative weight of past complaints or patterns of behaviour when assessing individual complaints. This is a significant deficit because grooming-related boundary violations often involve multiple individual incidents that on their own may be interpreted as innocuous or one-off instances of poor judgment.

When Ms Pearn's serious complaint was made against Mr Griffin in 2011 or 2012, if not earlier, Launceston General Hospital leadership should have been briefed to support a formal disciplinary response to Mr Griffin under Employment Direction No. 5 for a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. Around the time we estimate Ms Pearn's disclosure occurred, there were at least seven complaints about Mr Griffin's conduct of breaching professional boundaries. There should have been an escalation to the leadership about the cumulative effect of the concerns to enable an increase in the sanctions imposed on Mr Griffin for repeated unprofessional behaviour.

We accept that in early 2009 some effort was made to consider previous complaints, but only a formal letter was sent to Mr Griffin—there was no evidence of a formal briefing to anyone in the executive. This was the sixth letter sent to Mr Griffin about similar concerns.

In 2017, there were also efforts to collate previous complaints about Mr Griffin, but again, there was no evidence that the leadership was informed about this consolidation of complaints, nor was Mr Griffin reported to Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme (after 2014) or the Nursing Board/Ahpra.

There were several options for reporting Mr Griffin's behaviour. While we accept that many of the individual complaints against Mr Griffin may not have been enough in and of themselves to warrant a report to Child Safety Services, the Nursing Board/Ahpra or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, if the cumulative effect of Mr Griffin's conduct had been considered, a report to external agencies would have been warranted. Alternatively, if Mr Griffin's cumulative conduct had been reported to leadership, it is more likely that the hospital would have treated Mr Griffin's conduct more seriously, triggering a report to these external agencies.

Finding—The response of Launceston General Hospital to complaints about James Griffin suggested it was ultimately not concerned about his conduct

None of the numerous concerns raised with Mr Griffin resulted in a disciplinary response harsher than a letter, education and direction. A disciplinary process was only recommended when there was no other option but to do so, namely, when Mr Griffin was unable to perform his duties when his registration to work with vulnerable people was suspended on 31 July 2019. Ms Leonard described the focus on further education and maintaining professional boundaries as being 'most generous to Mr Griffin' and that in hindsight 'it is difficult to consider the actions in relation to [the] complaints made about Mr Griffin [to be] adequate'.[1054]

Mr Griffin's continual noncompliance with management directions was not even treated as a performance management issue. At least seven of Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreements, all of which were positive about his performance, made no mention of his conduct or the reprimands he had received, which suggested efforts to address his behaviour were not embedded, formalised and documented. Despite Mr Griffin being disciplined through counselling and letters in response to numerous concerns about his behaviour, endorsements of Mr Griffin's Performance and Development Agreements would have given Mr Griffin the impression that management was satisfied with his performance.

We consider that allowing Mr Griffin to act as a supervisor of nursing students and to continue to receive development opportunities and assume greater seniority and responsibility sent the wrong message to Mr Griffin. It had the practical effect of undermining the credibility of management's warnings and would have reinforced Mr Griffin's view that there would be no meaningful consequences for his actions.

In addition, Mr Griffin continued to breach professional boundaries with patients even after being asked to stop (in some instances, in writing). Section 9(6) of the State Service Code of Conduct requires employees to comply with any lawful and reasonable direction given by a person having authority to give that direction.[1055] We consider Mr Griffin's continued non-compliance with instructions from his nurse unit managers was likely to have constituted a breach of such a direction, and we consider this would have been sufficient cause for disciplinary processes to be initiated for a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct.

Finding—Leadership at Launceston General Hospital collectively failed to provide appropriate supervision and proactive oversight, which is a systemic problem

We were struck by the relative invisibility of management in the responses to Mr Griffin. We received evidence that senior managers, despite for many years having had responsibilities over Ward 4K or for medico-legal matters, had little to no idea about Mr Griffin's complaints history.

Helen Bryan, who held the role of Executive Director of Nursing said that 'no informal concerns were raised with me in the early stages but in hindsight they should have been'.[1056] In relation to her reported lack of knowledge about Mr Griffin's conduct, Ms Bryan stated:

> Without being able to comment on the specifics of the complaints, I have a general concern that some of the ward staff who received complaints and/or concerns … from staff, patients and/or families did not appropriately escalate those matters and therefore the response to those matters would have been inadequate. I appreciate that this could have had a significant impact on whoever made the complaint.[1057]

Ms Bryan and Eric Daniels, the then Chief Executive responsible for Launceston General Hospital (noting he began this role in 2016), also told us they were not aware of any concerns about Mr Griffin until 2019.[1058]

As we heard from Professor Erwin Loh, Group Chief Medical Officer and Group General Manager, St Vincent's Health Australia, who is an expert in clinical governance and management of complaints and conduct concerns:

> If senior management isn't aware of problems at the ward or unit level, this is generally because middle managers are only sharing the good news … or they're incompetent or ineffective. Either way, it's a problem for senior management. Senior management has to do its bit to ensure that middle managers have what they need to be effective (e.g. funding and workforce resources).[1059]

Janette Tonks, Nursing Director of Women's and Children's Services from 2013 until 2022, conceded that a culture of active and visible leadership 'certainly could have been done a whole lot better' at the hospital.[1060] During oral evidence, Mr Daniels also conceded that there was a catastrophic failure in management, structures and processes at Launceston General Hospital.[1061] Mr Daniels later said that he was unable to explain his answer fully during his oral evidence and has reiterated that he 'had not been made aware of the nature of, nor extent of many of the allegations'.[1062]

Finding—Launceston General Hospital did not have a robust system for managing complaints involving child safety

As noted above, there were at least 14 complaints about Mr Griffin during his employment at Launceston General Hospital that we could find some record of.

We note that the failings in the responses of some individuals to complaints about Mr Griffin were partly a consequence of inadequate policies, processes and systems at the hospital. It is obvious to us that there was no clear and consistent approach to managing complaints about Mr Griffin. Ms Bryan told us:

> … in my opinion we do not have good systems and we do not have good processes, we do not have record keeping and documentation, and we don't have the resources within the organisation with the expertise and experience to handle such situations.[1063]

Standards of behaviour for staff working in child-facing roles should have been in place so that Mr Griffin's conduct could be transparently assessed, and disciplinary action triggered, in response to his repeated failures to comply with the standards.

The State Service Code of Conduct is not sufficient to assess child safety complaints, given its very general nature. In particular, a professional conduct policy would have assisted in identifying boundary breaches that might amount to grooming behaviour.

We note that Ms Leonard recognised the absence of such standards in 2009 when she initiated a professional boundaries protocol for Ward 4K. We do not consider it should have fallen to a role-holder at Ms Leonard's level to have to address this gap—this should have been a hospital-wide policy (or indeed, a statewide departmental policy).

Management's inconsistent approaches to recording and documenting complaints had the effect of fragmenting and isolating important information about Mr Griffin, which made it difficult to identify a pattern of conduct and to respond decisively to his offending.

Complaints against Mr Griffin were not recognised as a patient safety concern that should be consistently recorded in the Safety Reporting and Learning System. Logging the complaints in this system would likely have increased visibility and oversight of Mr Griffin's behaviour and generally improved the integrity of the hospital's response.

Further, the hospital did not have a defined pathway for escalating complaints. Nursing staff were not guided on what kind of incidents should be reported, to which bodies and by whom, and local managers were not guided as to when they should tell human resources and/or nursing management about a complaint. The absence of a defined pathway for escalating complaints contributed to failures by local managers or ward staff to involve other parties consistently in responding to complaints.

The informal and ad hoc practice of escalating some complaints and not others allowed local managers too much discretion about what they escalated, to whom and when. This lack of formality was a particular risk given that managers may have, at times, had self-interested reasons for not alerting their superiors to problems on their ward and because managers appeared to have had little training for determining the potential seriousness of complaints.

While we accept that policies and systems play an important role in any organisation, we also consider that it was incumbent on managers to apply their common sense and professional judgment in response to complaints. If the hospital's systems were not working, managers should have raised their concerns with those empowered to rectify them.

We discuss recent reforms to complaint management processes in Chapter 15.

Finding—Launceston General Hospital had no clear system, procedures or process in place to report complaints about James Griffin to external agencies

During the time that Mr Griffin was employed at Launceston General Hospital, not one of the internal complaints against him resulted in any referrals or notifications to external agencies such as Child Safety Services, the Tasmanian Nursing Board, Ahpra or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme. This hampered the ability of external agencies to scrutinise Mr Griffin's behaviour and to identify continuing risks to child and patient safety.

Matthew Hardy, National Director, Notifications, Ahpra, advised us that the agency received its first (and to that point) only notification about Mr Griffin from Dr Peter Renshaw on 1 August 2019.[1064] Mr Hardy said:

> I am sympathetic to the view that the subsequent alleged extent of Mr Griffin's offending against children, if known to others, could have been acted on sooner had appropriate disclosures have been made to law enforcement, or our agency. I regret that we were not informed of the concerns well before the ultimate notification in August 2019.[1065]

Ms Leonard attributed the failure to notify external agencies about Mr Griffin's conduct to there not being 'an openness that there is today around engaging with those regulatory bodies'. She told us that the tendency was to keep problems in house.[1066] Ms Bryan observed that the hospital did not manage the issue of child safety well and needed to improve, adding:

> Could I guarantee that every nurse, and I'll talk nurse, in our organisation is fully aware of their responsibilities? And I'll be honest and I'll say I couldn't sit here with hand on heart and say yes: I'm going to say no.[1067]

Across the period from 2000 to 2019, there were multiple avenues for reporting Mr Griffin's behaviour, including some mandatory reporting obligations. These reporting options included:

- reporting to a police officer the abuse of a child, noting the offence of failing to report the abuse of a child without a reasonable excuse was only introduced on 2 October 2019[1068]
- informing Child Safety Services (or its predecessor), the Secretary with responsibility for Child Safety Services or a community-based intake service, pursuant to section 13 of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ('Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act'), noting that there is only an obligation to 'inform' (including making a report) if the person 'knows or gains knowledge, or believes or suspects on reasonable grounds, that a child is suffering, has suffered or is likely to suffer abuse or neglect'[1069]

- informing and/or making a mandatory report to Child Safety Services, the then Communities Tasmania Secretary or a community-based intake service as an employee of a government agency that provides health services under section 14 of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, noting that there is only an obligation to report when, in carrying out official duties or in the course of their work, the employee 'believes, or suspects, on reasonable grounds, or knows … that a child has been or is being abused or neglected'[1070]
- making a complaint to the Nursing Board of Tasmania from 24 November 1995 to 1 July 2010, noting that this would have been a voluntary complaint in circumstances where a person 'is aggrieved by the conduct of a nurse'[1071]
- mandatory reporting to Ahpra from 1 July 2010 to present, noting that during this time registered health practitioners have been subject to mandatory reporting obligations, including the obligation to notify Ahpra if another health practitioner 'forms a reasonable belief' that a 'second health practitioner has engaged, is engaging, or is at risk of engaging, in sexual misconduct in connection with the practice of the practitioner's profession'.[1072] There is also an option for any person to make a voluntary report to Ahpra in circumstances including, among other things, where a registered health practitioner's professional conduct is or may be of a lesser standard than what might be reasonably expected by the public or the practitioner's professional peers; or the practitioner is not, or may not be, a suitable person to hold registration in the health profession because, for example, the practitioner is not a fit and proper person to be registered in the profession[1073]
- making a report of a registered person that has 'engaged, or may have engaged, in reportable behaviour', even if that behaviour was raised to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme before or after 27 November 2015.[1074] Reportable behaviour is 'behaviour that poses a risk of harm to vulnerable persons, whether by reasons of neglect, abuse or other conduct'.[1075]

We note that even if, on the facts, there was not a mandatory reporting obligation to some of these bodies, best practice would be to make a voluntary report in a broader range of circumstances.

It was difficult to determine if there were formal policies relevant to the hospital's reporting obligations. In any event, the evidence we heard from several Launceston General Hospital nursing staff suggests there was no clear system, procedure or process in place for reporting concerns about a colleague's conduct during Mr Griffin's employment. This reflects that there was either no relevant policy or that it was not embedded and followed. As a result, ward staff, nurse unit managers, senior management and members of the executive were not aware of their distinct roles and responsibilities in relation to reporting and could not appropriately guide and support staff on the issue.

The hospital did not have reporting protocols in place to ensure complaints of misconduct, such as those made against Mr Griffin, were reported to Child Safety Services, the Tasmanian Nursing and Midwifery Board, Ahpra or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.

Hospitals should have systems, procedures and processes in place to ensure staff comply with mandatory reporting and to educate and support individual staff members on such reporting. There needs to be a clear process of responsibility for reporting and documented escalation of matters within an organisation. In addition, an organisational reporting protocol should not mean staff cannot make a mandatory report themselves when they have concerns. They can and should.

We discuss recent reforms to support mandatory reporting obligations in Chapter 15.

4.5 Other matters relating to Mr Griffin between 2000 and 2019

4.5.1 Allegations of Mr Griffin's misuse of medication

In light of information from the Australian Federal Police, victim-survivor Tiffany Skeggs and a hospital colleague that Mr Griffin used medication that he sourced from the hospital in his abuses, we enquired further about medication protocols and practices on Ward 4K.

As earlier outlined, in 2015 Australian Federal Police traced chat logs to Mr Griffin in which he identified that he was a nurse who used antihistamines to stupefy his victims before sexually abusing them.[1076] Ms Skeggs told us that Mr Griffin would steal medications from the hospital or ask inexperienced nursing staff to sign out medication for him.[1077] She said that Mr Griffin was very open about the fact that he never paid for medications and simply took them from the hospital.[1078] Ms Skeggs added that:

> The medication that he had included antihistamines, anti-psychotics, numerous types of sleep medication, pain relief including high strength anti-inflammatories, Panadol, tramadol and panadeine forte. He would hand the medication out to myself and other children.[1079]

Ms Skeggs stated that numerous nursing staff told her that Mr Griffin would steal medications, but that they were afraid to come forward because of the potential consequences for not earlier reporting such breaches.[1080] She also relayed that a Ward

4K nurse had told her that they had witnessed Mr Griffin give a patient medication against doctor's advice and take medications (including the sedating controlled drug Rohypnol) out of the hospital.[1081]

We also heard, as previously outlined, that Mr Griffin's administration of medication was unsafe and unprofessional in at least one instance when he encouraged a colleague to taste a restricted medication and then referred to it as a 'date rape drug' to the father of a patient. Another patient described feeling like she was under the influence of heavy drugs while being cared for by Mr Griffin (refer to Section 4.3.4).

We asked Ms Leonard, Ms Bryan and Ms Tonks about how medication was secured and dispensed on Ward 4K to ascertain how Mr Griffin's procurement of medication could have occurred. Ms Bryan and Ms Tonks had limited information to contribute, noting that they were not performing clinical roles on the ward.

Ms Leonard told us that, in her experience, policies and procedures about storing and dispensing controlled drugs, which are subject to strict access and dispensing controls under legislation, 'were generally adhered to'.[1082] Ms Leonard told us that when she started on the ward in 1999, controlled drugs were stored in a double-locked cupboard in a secured room.[1083] If someone wanted to get medications from the cupboard, they would need to ask the nurse in charge, who carried what were referred to as the 'red keys'.[1084] However, Ms Leonard said that if the nurse in charge was busy or unavailable, they would give the 'red keys' to a registered nurse who would (or should) return them as soon as possible.[1085] She said it was 'possible' to remove drugs undetected under this old system.[1086]

From around 2014, a more secure system was introduced, which required swipe access that was traceable to the individual staff member. Any discrepancies in medication access or stores could then be checked against those who accessed the drug cupboard during the relevant times.[1087] Ms Leonard said that when this system was introduced it was 'common practice' for a second nurse to witness the removal of drugs.[1088]

However, in her statement, Ms Leonard gave an example of when the integrity of the system was compromised:

> I understand there was a SRLS event where discharge medication that had been delivered in the late afternoon by the pharmacist was found to be missing from the Ward 4K drug room when nursing staff were preparing the patient for discharge. I am unable to verify the date this incident took place, however having spoken to [a colleague] I understand it is likely to have occurred prior to 2017. Upon investigation, it was determined that the nursing staff working the late and night shifts had been wedging the swipe card access door open with a towel to prevent it from slamming and waking up nearby patients and families. The event was logged, investigated (including by Tasmania Police) and ultimately processes were changed to ensure that appropriate control measures were in place regarding the safety of controlled medications.[1089]

When Ms Skeggs' assertion that Mr Griffin was stealing drugs from the hospital was put to Ms Leonard, she responded that if this were occurring it would have been detected in the controlled drugs count, which occurred daily. She further replied that any discrepancies in the count were required to be logged on the Safety Reporting and Learning System.[1090] At hearings, Counsel Assisting asked how other drugs, such as antibiotics or antihistamines, which were not subject to particular regulation, were stored and accessed. Ms Leonard said that such drugs were also stored within the secured room, which required swipe access, but that there was no formal reconciliation of stock levels like there was with controlled drugs.[1091]

Ms Tonks told us in her statement that since Ward 4K's redevelopment in 2021, there are two drug rooms that each have swipe card access and are video monitored, providing greater security and traceability of improper access.[1092] Ms Tonks also confirmed that this level of security extends to non-controlled drugs.[1093]

Finding—James Griffin had the ability to take and misuse medications from Launceston General Hospital

We did not find conclusive evidence that Mr Griffin took and misused medications from the hospital, and we have no way to verify that he did. No staff came forward to disclose that they witnessed thefts or otherwise facilitated Mr Griffin's access by not following appropriate procedures for signing out and administering drugs. However, based on the evidence heard, we consider that Mr Griffin did have the ability to take and misuse medications from the hospital. We consider that access (and use) of medications is a unique risk that arises in the context of health practitioners.

4.5.2 1 May 2019—Tiffany Skeggs reports Mr Griffin's abuse to Tasmania Police

On 1 May 2019, a now-adult Ms Skeggs contacted Tasmania Police in Hobart and reported Mr Griffin's sexual abuse of her when she was a child.[1094] On 7 May 2019, Ms Skeggs gave a formal statement to Hobart police.[1095] The Department was not aware of Ms Skeggs' complaint until 31 July 2019 (discussed in Section 5).

Ms Skeggs told police that she met Mr Griffin when she was about eight years old at her netball club, where he volunteered.[1096] Ms Skeggs formed a close friendship with Mr Griffin, which extended to going to his house and joining him on camping trips.[1097] Mr Griffin started abusing Ms Skeggs when she was 13 years old. At this time, he advised her on how to covertly communicate with him via an app on her phone.[1098] The sexual abuse of Ms Skeggs by Mr Griffin continued up until, or soon after, Ms Skeggs turned 17.[1099]

Ms Skeggs told us that Mr Griffin was able to groom her because she lacked the 'family stability' required to protect her and that he 'secluded me and generated maximum distance between me and my family and friends'.[1100] Ms Skeggs also stated that Mr Griffin used her interests, such as in Australian military history, to lure her in.[1101] Ms Skeggs said 'he provided me with all the attention a young girl could possibly want'.[1102] Ms Skeggs described Mr Griffin as having 'perfected the art of grooming children'.[1103]

Ms Skeggs' statement against Mr Griffin was not transferred to the Northern CIB until early July 2019 because the officer taking the statement was 'waiting for Ms Skeggs to provide some more information'.[1104] Launceston Police received the statement on 18 July 2019, and on 19 July 2019 it was allocated to Detective Senior Constable Glenn Hindle to investigate.[1105]

In commenting on the impact of her disclosure to police, Ms Skeggs said that 'from a personal perspective I regret opening my mouth', but she went on to say, 'I would do it all over again in a heartbeat to help others and create the change that is happening now'.[1106]

5 Launceston General Hospital's response to revelations about Mr Griffin's offending

Section 4 provides useful context for what various people already knew, including Launceston General Hospital staff, about Mr Griffin's offending behaviour towards children. In this section—Section 5—we focus on the response of Launceston General Hospital to the police investigation into child sexual abuse by Mr Griffin and continuing concerns among staff and victim-survivors about how the hospital managed prior complaints about Mr Griffin. The report Tiffany Skeggs made to police, described in Section 4.5.2, triggered the police investigation.

On 31 July 2019, Mr Griffin's registration to work with vulnerable people was suspended due to the police investigation. This suspension was ultimately the catalyst for action by Launceston General Hospital because it legally prevented Mr Griffin from performing his employment duties.

News of a police investigation into Mr Griffin for child sexual abuse should have been a matter of significant concern to the executive at Launceston General Hospital and treated as a critical incident. The hospital was aware that Mr Griffin was a longstanding employee, having worked as a paediatric nurse at the hospital since 2001, and that he had the opportunity to form close relationships with young patients over the years. As we describe in Chapter 13 about the particular risks that can arise within health services, Mr Griffin's role as a nurse gave him unique opportunities to abuse children.

The hospital would also have been aware that once Mr Griffin was charged, which occurred in September 2019, there would be significant public concern about his role as a paediatric nurse, with attendant reputational and potential legal risks for the hospital.

We acknowledge that responding to an event such as this is never easy and is rarely perfect. There are complex issues to manage, among them the need to respect confidentiality where justified to ensure sensitivity to victim-survivors (and potential victim-survivors), and to take care not to compromise a police investigation. There is also an understandable desire not to alarm or distress people unnecessarily or to inadvertently create harmful misinformation, particularly where information is emerging in a developing situation. Managing information effectively can also be challenging in a small community, where information can be shared quickly and informally and can sometimes become distorted as it passes through multiple people. We recognise that most organisations are not well equipped to respond to events of this scale and complexity, given their relative infrequency. We kept all this in mind when reflecting on the hospital executive's unenviable task.

When a police investigation arises in relation to child sexual abuse and the suspect is (or was) in a child-facing role, we consider it irrelevant whether the alleged conduct occurred within, or in connection to, the workplace. We also consider it irrelevant whether any complaints of child sexual abuse were 'historical' in nature. The starting point for any organisation's response is assessing and responding to any risks to children in the organisation's care. In this case, this extended not only to managing the immediate risks Mr Griffin posed (before his death) but also in assessing—to the extent possible—whether his conduct may have affected current or former patients.

A police investigation can act as a trigger for an organisation to review its child safeguarding systems. If approached with care and a genuine desire to protect children, a 'root and branch' review can uncover previously unknown abuses and harms. Failures can be acknowledged and affected victim-survivors appropriately supported. Improved child safeguarding strategies and practices can then be adopted and implemented to protect children from future risk.

The hospital's response to Mr Griffin's suspension and the circumstances surrounding it was primarily led by its then Executive Director of Medical Services, Dr Peter Renshaw, with assistance from the human resources team. We heard that Dr Renshaw assumed leadership of the hospital's response because of his medico-legal responsibilities. He was the liaison for Tasmania Police and the person responsible for key briefings to the Secretary of the Department on 31 July 2019 and 5 November 2019.

At our hearings, Counsel Assisting asked an expert in health service governance, Professor Erwin Loh, whether, in his experience, responsibility for medico-legal matters tends to sit with a single hospital executive member or across several individuals.

Professor Loh said good governance requires that a single executive member is clearly accountable for such issues but that they should work in a team and draw on the expertise of others.[1107]

Rather than working to understand the scale of Launceston General Hospital's failure to act on potential risks that were known about Mr Griffin and examine the systems, processes and practices that contributed to that failure or even to identify victim-survivors and offer them support, the evidence suggests that the hospital worked to downplay its knowledge and distance itself from Mr Griffin. This was evident in the failures to conduct a prompt and thorough review of all the information the hospital held about Mr Griffin's complaints history and to ensure briefings up the line about the hospital's knowledge of the potential risks Mr Griffin posed to former patients were accurate and comprehensive. Indeed, the hospital only conducted such a 'review' reluctantly, after staff activated the union into advocating for greater transparency.

Much of the leadership of the hospital was noticeably absent from the response to Mr Griffin's offending. We did not receive evidence (or meeting minutes) to suggest this issue was regularly discussed by hospital leadership. The then Chief Executive Eric Daniels and then Executive Director of Nursing, Helen Bryan, in particular, were not referenced by witnesses to our Inquiry, and their names did not often appear in the documents we reviewed relevant to the hospital's response to Mr Griffin's offending. In their evidence to us, they appeared to have little knowledge of the situation; it seemed that they learned the extent of Mr Griffin's offending from The Nurse podcast and from our hearings.

The practical effect of their absence from the response is that the evidence we received focused more on the conduct of those who were directly involved, including many who were significantly more junior than those tasked with the hospital's governance.

In some of these findings we include evidence to provide context or to show an enduring problem that predates leadership role-holders at Launceston General Hospital at the time Mr Griffin's offending became known.

We make specific findings that Dr Renshaw misled superiors, including Secretary Morgan-Wicks, in failing to escalate critical information he received about Mr Griffin's behaviour. We also find Dr Renshaw misled our Commission of Inquiry.

In Chapter 15, we discuss the expert evidence we received about responding to critical incidents and recommend that the Department develops a critical incident response plan to respond to traumatic events such as this (refer to Recommendation 15.19). The absence of a plan like this leaves an organisation at risk of compounding trauma and distress when such an event does occur. This is what happened at Launceston General Hospital.

5.1 Overview of Launceston General Hospital's leadership response

Several members of the hospital's leadership indicated to us that they were largely unaware of the extent of Mr Griffin's complaints history until our hearings, which occurred more than three years after Mr Griffin's registration to work with vulnerable people was suspended.

We saw no evidence that Launceston General Hospital took steps to promptly and thoroughly review Mr Griffin's complaints history to satisfy itself of what was known to the hospital about him and to determine whether there was any indication that children may have been harmed under his care.

We requested minutes from any executive meetings at which Mr Griffin was discussed and were told that none existed.[1108]

Ms Bryan told us that she was not aware of any investigations into Mr Griffin's conduct after 31 July 2019: 'I didn't see a report; I had no further input or feedback. I got a lot of my information from the two podcasts I listened to'.[1109] Ms Bryan agreed that although she should have been given more information about the matter, it was an omission on her part not to have sought further information.[1110] Ms Bryan told us that the hospital did not have good systems and processes in place—including in relation to record keeping, resourcing and expertise within the organisation—to respond to situations of this nature.[1111] She agreed that there was a complete failure of senior leadership to respond appropriately to Mr Griffin's conduct.[1112] Ms Bryan later told us that she considers that, since 2022, the hospital has taken steps to improve its systems and processes in relation to child safety.[1113]

When Counsel Assisting asked Dr Renshaw, in September 2022, what changes were made to the hospital's systems and processes in the aftermath of Mr Griffin's suspension, he replied: 'I'm not certain that there have been any marked changes'.[1114] When he was asked how he could be sure the hospital was safe considering this observation, he responded: 'As I'm not aware of any formal action items and what they would be intended to achieve, I really can't answer that.'[1115]

Mr Daniels acknowledged that as the hospital's Chief Executive he had an obligation to ensure Launceston General Hospital was safe.[1116] However, when Counsel Assisting asked why he did not initiate a robust investigation once allegations about Mr Griffin emerged on 31 July 2019, he responded: 'I can't answer that, I'm sorry'.[1117] He added that he believed the police investigation would have acted as an external review.[1118] Mr Daniels later told us that he did not have the opportunity to fully explain his answer in oral evidence and reiterated that he was not aware of the nature or extent of many of the allegations until our hearings.[1119]

Finding—The response of Launceston General Hospital to revelations about James Griffin's offending was passive and ineffective

Senior leaders appeared to have a complete lack of curiosity or sense of duty to examine the systems, practices, policies and work cultures that may have contributed to Mr Griffin continuing to work on the ward for 18 years, despite a series of concerns (many documented by the hospital) about his behaviour. The police investigation into Mr Griffin should have been a catalyst for the hospital's leadership to review child safeguarding systems and processes more broadly at the hospital—and to learn and improve, based on weaknesses uncovered. Yet at no stage did any member of the hospital's leadership seek to comprehensively and independently investigate whether the risks Mr Griffin posed to children could have been foreseen and whether the hospital had the best possible policies, practices and systems in place to safeguard its child patients. Most of this information would have been readily discoverable had the hospital's leadership taken an active interest.

We find that the following should have occurred when the hospital was alerted to the police investigation:

- The risk posed by Mr Griffin, particularly following the laying of charges against him on 17 September 2019, should have been explicitly discussed at executive meetings. Such discussions would have prompted better information sharing between the broader team and provided grounds for a considered and collective response.
- The hospital should have overseen a thorough and rigorous review of all complaints relating to Mr Griffin, rather than relying on the manifestly deficient reviews undertaken by the human resources team (described later in this section), which arguably held a conflict of interest given its role in responding to complaints to Mr Griffin in the past. Such a review would have revealed several systems, process and cultural barriers to effectively managing complaints. These issues should have been escalated to Mr Daniels and the Secretary.
- The hospital should have developed a response strategy to the police investigation of Mr Griffin, including a plan for communicating with staff (particularly Ward 4K staff), patients, their families and the public. This strategy should have anticipated different scenarios—for example, if Mr Griffin was convicted or acquitted—and recognised the ways in which the hospital's interests overlapped or differed from the police investigation (in having a broader systemic focus on safeguarding, for example). The plan should have supported information sharing with Tasmania Police and other agencies, such as Ahpra, and developed strong information-sharing practices with all relevant agencies.

- The hospital should have taken proactive steps to determine the possibility that patients were harmed by Mr Griffin. This should have included reviewing Mr Griffin's complaints history (described in Section 4) and learning as much as possible from Ward 4K staff about any suspicions and concerns they may have held that could help the hospital determine if particular patients and their families should be contacted or provided with support. The hospital should have liaised with Tasmania Police throughout this process.

Finding—Leadership at Launceston General Hospital was dysfunctional and this compromised its collective response to revelations about James Griffin

We received evidence that the culture among the leadership at Launceston General Hospital was dysfunctional. This evidence provided further context to us for why the hospital's response to Mr Griffin's conduct was manifestly inadequate.

Former Executive Director of Nursing, Ms Bryan, described having 'very little involvement with the allegations relating to Mr Griffin' after 31 July 2019, despite Ward 4K being within her area of responsibility.[1120] She indicated that Dr Renshaw and the human resources team managed the response.[1121] She conceded that she should have been involved, given Mr Griffin was a nurse, but she described feeling 'disconnected' and 'not included in the process'.[1122] She said:

> I don't know [whether Dr Renshaw] deliberately excluded me, but … there were multiple meetings that I had become aware of either after the event that I was never invited to attend or included to attend; that doesn't dissolve my accountability and I accept that and I would do things very differently if this happened tomorrow.[1123]

Ms Bryan apologised for allowing others to exclude her from the process, stating that she 'probably' omitted to properly fulfil her responsibilities.[1124] We also accept Ms Bryan's evidence that Dr Renshaw excluded her, despite her being his peer on the executive.

Dr Renshaw initially did not agree that it was open to us to find that leadership at Launceston General Hospital was dysfunctional and had no clear focus on protecting children from sexual abuse.

Dr Renshaw told us:

> In my view, this was an absolutely unprecedented situation that … nobody had had any experience in, and yes, we muddled through, but it was not ideal. Probably what we could be criticised for was not being dysfunctional but not being resilient or flexible enough to try and work out better ways of ensuring the safety of children in the hospital as a result of this experience.[1125]

When questioned on this point by Commissioner Benjamin, noting (among other things) the evidence of leadership failures in Case study 2 (which occurred while Dr Renshaw was employed at the hospital), Dr Renshaw was invited to closely reflect whether he truly stood by the position he articulated above. He conceded it would be open for us to find that the leadership of the hospital was dysfunctional. We do so.

Finding—Launceston General Hospital did not have clear accountabilities for child safety

Elizabeth Stackhouse, a former Chief Executive Officer of Launceston General Hospital, told our Commission of Inquiry that, during her time in the role between 1998 and 2003, the hospital did not have any strategic plans, performance measures or key indicators that directly or indirectly related to child safety, including allegations of physical or sexual abuse of children.[1126] Dr Stephen Ayre, who was in the role from 2004 until 2008, could not recall whether or what plans were in place.[1127] John Kirwan, who acted in the role from mid-2008 until 2015, also told us that there were no indicators relating to child safety. He explained that, at the time, 'the focus was to move away from detailed input-based metrics to outputs and have the key strategic focus captured on one page'.[1128]

We saw no indication that one individual, committee or role-holder was responsible for ensuring child safety at the hospital.[1129] Ms Stackhouse could not recall whether there was a separate role-holder responsible for child safety during her tenure. She told us that patient safety generally, for adults and children, was monitored by the quality committee.[1130] Dr Ayre said that during his tenure 'the overall safety of the patients and staff at the hospital rested with the executive team and every staff member'.[1131] Mr Kirwan also did not recall the hospital having a specific role-holder responsible for child safety. He stated: 'If it was a requirement of the then National Safety and Quality Health Service accreditation standards, I am sure [there] would have been'.[1132] Despite this, he could not identify which roles held ultimate accountability for child safety.

A shared responsibility for child safety should not be interpreted as a diffused responsibility in which no one is ultimately accountable.

Speaking to the more recent governance arrangements at Launceston General Hospital, Mr Daniels wrote in his statement to us:

> There is no one specific committee for [child safety]. All governance committees with Hospitals North, inclusive of the LGH have oversight of child safety. All committees have representation from Women's and Children's Services, representing our paediatric patients. Paediatric needs and child safety issues are addressed under the umbrella of all consumers of our services through the application of the National Safety and Quality Health Service (NSQHS) Standards across all areas of service provision.[1133]

When giving evidence at our hearings, Mr Daniels said he had only recently become aware of some reports about Mr Griffin, and with that knowledge he would reconsider his views about whether the management accountability structures were appropriate. He said:

> [The hospital's governance is] not robust. … it doesn't provide the appropriate amount of accountability, and it doesn't provide for the sorts of things we've been discussing today in terms of ensuring that the safety of children in our care is appropriate.[1134]

We note that Mr Daniels, himself a registered nurse, admitted that he did not know what constituted grooming behaviours.[1135] He was also not familiar with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations, which emerged from the National Royal Commission (described further in Chapter 18).[1136] He agreed that it was fair for us to conclude that child safety was not embedded in the leadership, governance and culture of the hospital and hadn't been for a number of years.[1137]

5.2.1 1 July 2019—A search warrant is executed on Mr Griffin's property

On the morning of 31 July 2019, Tasmania Police executed a search warrant on Mr Griffin's property. During this search, police became aware that Mr Griffin sometimes looked after a former patient of the hospital, Penny (a pseudonym), including at his home.[1138] Tasmania Police was already aware of Penny because Ms Skeggs had expressed some concern for Penny's welfare after seeing Mr Griffin with Penny in a chance encounter before making her police report.[1139] She also told police that her concern for Penny was a motivation for making the report.[1140]

Detective Senior Constable Hindle told us that, on 31 July 2019, he shared information about Ms Skeggs' allegations, and the resulting search warrant on Mr Griffin's home, with two risk assessment officers from the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Unit at the Department of Justice.[1141] The purpose of sharing this information was to expedite the immediate suspension of Mr Griffin's registration to work with vulnerable people.[1142]

On 2 August 2019, Detective Senior Constable Hindle submitted a Child Safety Notification to Child Safety Services, which noted Mr Griffin's care arrangement involving Penny.[1143] The purpose of the notification was to advise Child Safety Services of 'any perceived ongoing risk if exposed to [Mr Griffin] and allow them to act appropriately'.[1144] The notification was allocated to a Child Safety and Wellbeing worker for action.[1145] Detective Senior Constable Hindle was not aware whether Child Safety Services took any further action in response to his notification, and we have not examined this matter.[1146]

In his first statement to us, dated 21 June 2022, Detective Senior Constable Hindle did not mention Penny. At our prompting, after we became aware of Penny's connection to the hospital from other documentation, Detective Senior Constable Hindle told us about her in a subsequent statement, dated 9 November 2022. We understand that the initial omission was due to Detective Senior Constable Hindle's understanding of our request for statement, which asked for information about any formal complaints police had received about Mr Griffin in relation to child sexual abuse. While police held concerns in relation to her, Penny was not the subject of a formal complaint. However, we are of the view that it should have been clear to Detective Senior Constable Hindle when responding to our request for a statement that Tasmania Police's awareness of concerns about Mr Griffin's care of Penny (particularly given her status as a former patient of Mr Griffin's) would have been of particular interest to us.

At a briefing later this day on 31 July 2019, Detective Senior Constable Hindle told Dr Renshaw that police were concerned about Penny.[1147] Dr Renshaw made a commitment to police to confirm whether Penny was a former patient or if she may have had contact with Mr Griffin at the hospital.[1148]

Tasmania Police's knowledge of the care arrangement of Penny (and evidence it advised Dr Renshaw of this) is important because it ultimately formed part of the hospital's notification to Ahpra relating to Mr Griffin, referencing her status as a former patient.

It indicated that Dr Renshaw was aware from this point that Mr Griffin's offending was potentially connected to former patients of the hospital.

5.2.2 31 July 2019—Mr Griffin's registration to work with vulnerable people is suspended

On 31 July 2019, Dr Renshaw received an email notification from the Acting Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme that Mr Griffin's registration had been suspended under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act.[1149] While the notification did not mention a police investigation into sexual abuse nor provide any reasons for the suspension, Dr Renshaw told us he understood that the suspension had been precipitated by such a police investigation.[1150]

On receiving the email, Dr Renshaw immediately sought out Ms Bryan and Mathew Harvey (former Human Resources Consultant within the human resources team), who were in a meeting with union officials. Dr Renshaw asked to speak with Ms Bryan urgently.[1151] Ms Bryan excused herself from the meeting while Mr Harvey remained. After Mr Harvey concluded the meeting, he also joined the discussion with Dr Renshaw and Ms Bryan, as did Janette Tonks, the former Director of Nursing Women's and Children's Services.[1152]

Ms Tonks recalled being told at this meeting that the police were investigating an allegation of sexual assault involving Mr Griffin.[1153] She also recalled being advised that Mr Griffin's devices, including his computer, had been seized, which suggested to her that the police suspected there was child exploitation material on these devices.[1154] Ms Bryan's recollection of the meeting broadly accords with Ms Tonks' account.[1155] Both Ms Tonks and Ms Bryan described being 'shocked'.[1156] Ms Bryan added: 'I had no suspicion at all of any of this behaviour. Nothing had ever been raised at my office in relation to these allegations'.[1157]

At this meeting, Dr Renshaw asked Ms Tonks when Mr Griffin was working next, to ensure that Mr Griffin did not provide further care to children.[1158] Ms Tonks discovered Mr Griffin was, in fact, rostered to work that afternoon, so she went to the ward to wait for him.[1159] Seeing him there early, Ms Tonks asked Mr Griffin to go to Dr Renshaw's office, where Dr Renshaw advised him that because of the suspension of his registration to work with vulnerable people, he was not able to work. Dr Renshaw then requested that Mr Griffin leave the hospital.[1160] Dr Renshaw told us that this was the first and only contact he had with Mr Griffin.[1161] Ms Tonks recalled that Mr Griffin 'seemed very calm about it'.[1162]

Ms Tonks said she escorted Mr Griffin to collect his bag and walked him out of the ward.[1163] Detective Senior Constable Hindle later told to us that allowing Mr Griffin to collect personal items 'undermined' the police investigation because police had intended to search Mr Griffin's work locker.[1164] We are not clear whether Detective Senior Constable Hindle had communicated this intention to anyone at the hospital.

As she was escorting Mr Griffin out, Ms Tonks asked Mr Griffin if he was okay and asked what she should tell the other staff. He told her she should tell staff he was off sick due to a chronic issue with his back.[1165]

Ms Leonard recalled learning about these events from Ms Tonks the following day, on 1 August 2019. Ms Leonard also recalled that the human resources team directed nursing staff to not discuss the allegations about Mr Griffin due to the police investigation. Ms Leonard recalled that this direction was due to a recommendation of Tasmania Police. She told us that Mr Harvey, James Bellinger, Human Resources Manager, Ms Tonks, Ms Bryan and Dr Renshaw all reiterated this 'recommendation' at various points.[1166] There does not appear to have been any formal policy or plan guiding management's response. We note that such a policy could have identified what information could reasonably be provided to staff.

Dr Renshaw described other steps he took following the notification from the Acting Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme that Mr Griffin's registration had been suspended. Dr Renshaw told us that he contacted Tasmania Police to request a briefing. We are not clear who Dr Renshaw spoke to when making this request but consider it most likely to have been Detective Senior Constable Hindle. This briefing occurred later on 31 July 2019. Mr Harvey was with Dr Renshaw during the police briefing.[1167] In a statement to us, Dr Renshaw described himself as 'the defacto executive liaison between Tasmania Police and the LGH'.[1168]

Dr Renshaw told us that he then made a mandatory notification to Ahpra by phoning its state manager on 31 July 2019, followed by a written notification that was emailed on 1 August 2019.[1169] Dr Renshaw said that Ahpra notifications are generally made by the 'professional lead', which in this case should have been Ms Bryan because Mr Griffin was a nurse. However, in this instance, Dr Renshaw assumed responsibility for liaising with Ahpra.[1170] Dr Renshaw did not explain why he assumed this responsibility.[1171] Dr Renshaw also prepared a briefing or 'Minute' for the then Secretary of the Department, Michael Pervan, which was reviewed by Mr Daniels and sent on 31 July 2019.[1172]

These events all assume significance because they establish what Dr Renshaw, in particular, knew and when, as well as the extent to which he shared important information with his superiors about the connection between the investigation of Mr Griffin and possible offending by Mr Griffin against patients. For this reason, we explore these events in some detail.

5.2.3 31 July 2019—Tasmania Police briefs Dr Renshaw and Mr Harvey

As mentioned earlier, Dr Renshaw and Mr Harvey met with Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 31 July 2019 to receive a briefing on Mr Griffin.[1173] What exactly was discussed at this meeting was difficult to ascertain. Detective Senior Constable Hindle's recollections were confused, and the descriptions of the meeting in both Dr Renshaw and Mr Harvey's statements were brief. However, there seems to be a general consensus, supported by an email from Mr Harvey sent to human resources colleagues on the afternoon of 31 July 2019 capturing the substance of the meeting, that Detective Senior Constable Hindle told Dr Renshaw and Mr Harvey:

- Charges had not yet been laid against Mr Griffin, but police considered they had 'enough evidence' to charge Mr Griffin in relation to child exploitation material and 'maintaining a sexual relationship with a minor'.[1174]
- There were photographs on Mr Griffin's phone in a folder entitled 'Ward 4K', which appear to have been taken of patients in Ward 4K and the intensive care unit between 2015 and 2019.[1175] Other evidence from Tasmania Police indicates photographs were taken from the late 2000s to mid-2010s; however, it is not clear to us the basis upon which Tasmania Police formed that view.[1176] It is also not clear to us if these photographs are additional to the ones discussed at this meeting.

It is unclear whether Detective Senior Constable Hindle stated or implied to Dr Renshaw and Mr Harvey at the meeting that the photos taken at the hospital were potentially child exploitation material. In the email that Mr Harvey sent his human resources colleagues (noted above) on the afternoon of 31 July 2019, he wrote that the photos were 'nothing of a sexual nature'.[1177] However, in evidence to us, Dr Renshaw said that he was advised at this meeting that some child exploitation material may have been taken in the hospital, thus creating a potential connection between Mr Griffin's sexual offending and hospital patients.[1178]

Detective Senior Constable Hindle's oral evidence was that it was on 29 October 2019 that he first became concerned that the photographs in Mr Griffin's phone were evidence of offending by Mr Griffin in his role as a nurse or in connection with patients.[1179] He was unable to explain how Dr Renshaw had become aware of that possibility on 31 July 2019. Detective Senior Constable Hindle said he was not the person who initially showed the photographs to Mr Harvey and Dr Renshaw on 31 July 2019, and he was unaware what information had been exchanged when those photographs were revealed.[1180] Detective Senior Constable Hindle's evidence was that his first contact with Dr Renshaw about the connection between the photographs and patients occurred at the same time he asked Dr Renshaw to convene a panel to help identify those patients, which ultimately occurred on 5 December 2019.[1181]

The fact that Dr Renshaw was aware of the imagery potentially constituting child exploitation material around this time is confirmed by the recollection of Paul Turner SC, Assistant Solicitor-General (Litigation), who reportedly had a conversation with Dr Renshaw 'shortly after 31 July 2019'.[1182] The Solicitor-General, Sarah Kay SC, reported this recollection in a statement to us:

> His recollection, as conveyed to me, is that Dr Renshaw called him, advising that Tasmania Police had identified a number of photographs on Mr Griffin's telephone that appeared to be of paediatric patients at the Launceston General Hospital. The discussion is said by Mr Turner to have centred upon identifying the patients where possible and notifying the patients or their families.[1183]

Ms Kay shared her understanding that Mr Turner 'did not make any notes of the discussion and that he cannot be certain of the exact dates or whether there was more than one discussion'.[1184] We were surprised to learn no notes were taken, given the significance of the query. The absence of these records is a source of frustration for us. Ms Kay asked Mr Turner for his recollections and records about this matter, but we did not.

On balance, we consider it possible that Detective Senior Constable Hindle did not describe the images as sexual and in connection with the hospital at his meeting with Dr Renshaw and Mr Harvey on 31 July 2019, and that Mr Harvey's recollection was correct. However, we consider that Mr Griffin's possession of images of patients, in the context of a police investigation, should have been a significant source of concern to Mr Harvey and Dr Renshaw regardless. It should have also been clear that, given the images had only just been seized, closer analysis might confirm that they constituted child exploitation material.

Dr Renshaw did not mention Penny in his initial statements to us, despite a question that should have elicited this information. Mr Harvey also did not mention Penny in his statement, but said he was not told about her in the meeting and was not present for part of the discussion between Detective Senior Constable Hindle and Dr Renshaw, which we accept.[1185]

It was upon a review of documents received from Ahpra that we noticed a reference to Penny (including her status as a former patient) as part of its communication with Dr Renshaw regarding the mandatory notification he made to them about Mr Griffin on 1 August 2019 (discussed at Section 5.2.5). As previously indicated, Penny is significant in this context because her status as a former patient established a clear and early link between the hospital and the police investigation.

We already noted above that Detective Senior Constable Hindle also did not mention Penny in his initial statement to us. Detective Senior Constable Hindle's subsequent statement to us on 9 November 2022 confirmed that Penny and her potential connection to the hospital was discussed at this meeting:

> As previously stated, Dr Renshaw and a member of his HR team attended the police station following the execution of the search. It was at this time that Dr Renshaw was made aware of the presence of concerning material on Mr Griffin's electronic devices, as well as the continued care/relationship of Penny as a 'private arrangement'.[1186]

Detective Senior Constable Hindle also recalled Dr Renshaw advising him at this meeting that he would check hospital patient records to confirm whether Penny had been a former Ward 4K patient.[1187] Detective Senior Constable Hindle added: 'Dr Renshaw contacted me back in a timely manner (potentially the same day) to confirm that [Penny] was a former patient of Ward 4K and was most likely exposed to Griffin'.[1188] We understand this reference to indicate that Penny most likely had contact with Mr Griffin on the ward.

We asked Dr Renshaw about his knowledge of Penny when he gave evidence at a hearing on 8 September 2022. Dr Renshaw acknowledged that he was aware of Mr Griffin's care of Penny outside the hospital on 31 July 2019 because she was mentioned in his notification to Ahpra.[1189] Dr Renshaw also acknowledged that the question of whether Penny was a former patient of the hospital was significant because it established a clear link between the police investigation of Mr Griffin and Mr Griffin's employment at the hospital.[1190]

The failure to inform us at the earliest opportunity about Penny and her status as a former patient was an omission by Dr Renshaw and Detective Senior Constable Hindle. We note that there were more opportunities for Dr Renshaw, who was leading the hospital's response, to register that Penny was significant to both the police investigation and the hospital's response.

We do not know why this information was not provided to us in a more forthcoming way by Dr Renshaw. We are particularly concerned by Dr Renshaw's misleading responses to our original request for a statement. We discuss this further in our finding of misconduct against Dr Renshaw in Section 5.2.44.

5.2.4 31 July 2019—The Secretary of the Department is briefed about Mr Griffin's suspension

Following Mr Griffin's suspension, Dr Renshaw prepared a briefing for then Secretary Pervan. This briefing was forwarded to Mr Daniels late on the afternoon of 31 July 2019.[1191] The briefing appeared to go directly to Mr Daniels for approval before going to Secretary Pervan that same day because it is not listed as having been endorsed by any other role-holders.

The briefing informed Mr Daniels and the Secretary of the suspension of Mr Griffin's registration to work with vulnerable people and summarised, at a high level, what had occurred that day in terms of the procedural steps to direct Mr Griffin away from the workplace and to block his swipe access to the hospital.[1192] It also stated:

> The [Executive Director Medical Services] is currently conducting a look-back in the SRLS complaints reporting system for any previous issues involving this staff member.[1193]

Ms Bryan recalls being asked (it is unclear by whom and exactly when) to look at the Safety Reporting and Learning System for any incidents concerning Mr Griffin, and that upon doing so she found Ward 4K staff member Will Gordon's complaint from August 2017.[1194] The audit trail of this entry (which we discuss further in Section 5.2.26) shows that Ms Bryan was granted access to Mr Gordon's complaint on the system on 7 November 2019.[1195] Mr Harvey was granted access on 4 September 2019.[1196] This suggests that this 'look-back' was not undertaken immediately but occurred some months later.

We are unclear when Dr Renshaw may have considered Mr Gordon's complaint but believe that he did before briefing staff about the police investigation, which began on 29 October 2019. Staff briefings are described in Section 5.2.22. Mr Gordon's complaint was not mentioned in the subsequent briefing to Mr Daniels or the Secretary, nor were the numerous other complaints against Mr Griffin that were reported to Mr Griffin's managers (including the previous Nurse Unit Manager and Ms Leonard) and the human resources team.

In relation to information received from Tasmania Police, Dr Renshaw's briefing to the Secretary merely notes:

> The [Executive Director Medical Services] and Human [Resources] Consultant have met with Tasmania Police
>
> ...
>
> The Tasmania Police investigation is ongoing.[1197]

Further, Dr Renshaw does not mention in the briefing that Detective Senior Constable Hindle notified him about Penny's status as a former patient, nor that images of patients were found in Mr Griffin's possession.

When asked about his failure to accurately reflect this important information in the Minute to the Secretary, Dr Renshaw stated it was an 'oversight'.[1198] Despite assuming such a central role in responding to the concerns about Mr Griffin—Dr Renshaw was the contact for the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and Tasmania Police, he managed Mr Griffin's suspension from work, and he drafted the Minute to the Secretary—Dr Renshaw sought to distance himself from the management of the situation in evidence to us at hearings.

Dr Renshaw told us that 'at that point the management of the issue had passed ... into HR and into the Secretary's office'.[1199] Reflecting on his actions on 31 July 2019, Dr Renshaw concluded that he had 'fulfilled' his medico-legal responsibilities, stating: 'I'm not certain what actions I could have taken beyond what I did'.[1200] For reasons that become clearer as we further explain Dr Renshaw's central role in this matter, we do not agree with this assertion.

The only caution that Dr Renshaw provided Secretary Pervan in the 31 July 2019 Minute was about adverse media attention: 'It is anticipated that if this matter does result in prosecution, there will be significant public concern and media attention'.[1201] Dr Renshaw provided no further context to the Secretary.

We make a finding below that Dr Renshaw misled Mr Daniels and the Secretary by omitting critical information from the brief. Before making this finding, we explain Dr Renshaw's interactions with Ahpra in the days following this briefing, which reveal the extent of the information he withheld.

5.2.5 1 August 2019—Dr Renshaw notifies the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency about Mr Griffin

On 1 August 2019, Dr Renshaw made a formal notification to Ahpra about Mr Griffin. Having received the notification, a staff member called Dr Renshaw for more information. A file note of this discussion, captured by the Ahpra staff member on the day, includes the following:

> PR [Peter Renshaw] advised that he believes a complaint was made to Tas Police in relation to an alleged 'inappropriate sexual relationship with a child under the age of 12'. This child is advised to be a … former patient.[1202]

The file note of Dr Renshaw's advice did not accurately reflect the actions of Tasmania Police, which was investigating Ms Skeggs' complaint. To be clear, there was no police investigation into Mr Griffin's behaviour with Penny, or any other former patient, at this point.

In oral evidence to us, Dr Renshaw agreed that the file note captures the substance of what he told Ahpra, although he could not recall the words he used.[1203] We conclude, based on this file note, that Dr Renshaw told Ahpra about the information he received from Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 31 July 2019.

The Ahpra file note goes on:

> Tas Police have asked the Hospital for info regarding specific patients. They have also advised the hospital that having seized JG's [James Griffin's] mobile phone and home computer, they have found a folder on his phone containing a large number of images of female patients under the age of 16 (non-sexual in nature).

> PR advised that he did not have access to JG's HR record but believes that there have been prior vague concerns surrounding JG similar in nature but unconfirmed and not to the same extent with patients.[1204]

The extent of the information Dr Renshaw provided Ahpra is in stark contrast to the briefing he provided the Secretary the day before, yet he had the same state of knowledge on both occasions.

On 5 August 2019, an Ahpra staff member contacted Detective Senior Constable Hindle to confirm what information they could rely on to determine any action they might take against Mr Griffin without interfering with the police investigation.[1205]

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw misled the Chief Executive of Launceston General Hospital and the then Secretary of the Department by failing to fully and accurately convey information relating to James Griffin received from Tasmania Police on 31 July 2019

Dr Renshaw received two critical pieces of information that linked the police investigation into Mr Griffin to the hospital. These two pieces of information were the possibility that images found on Mr Griffin's devices were taken of patients in the hospital (whether they were deemed child exploitation material or not) and the possibility of Mr Griffin's inappropriate contact with Penny, a patient of the hospital.

This information is relevant to the hospital's response to revelations about Mr Griffin's offending for the following reasons:

- The information suggested a risk that photos Mr Griffin took of patients in the hospital constituted child sexual exploitation material.
- Even if the photos of patients did not constitute child exploitation material, Mr Griffin's possession of them suggested a significant breach of professional conduct and a major breach of patients' privacy. Tasmania Police has since told our Inquiry that, to their knowledge, the images of some children would not constitute 'child exploitation material as described in statutory definitions'.[1206]
- Depending on the police's assessment on a closer inspection of the images, it was possible that the hospital would need to undertake an open disclosure process with affected parties. An open disclosure process involves:

  > … a discussion with a patient and carer about an incident that resulted in harm to the patient while receiving health care. The criteria of open disclosure are an expression of regret, and a factual explanation of what happened, the potential consequences, and the steps being taken to manage the event and prevent recurrence.[1207]

- Open disclosure is a process health providers use to transparently acknowledge and explain any errors or adverse events to patients receiving health care. Accepting that Dr Renshaw did not have conclusive information that this would be required, he nonetheless should have cited it as a possibility in his briefing to the Secretary.

- Mr Griffin's 'private care arrangement' of his former patient Penny likely constituted a breach of his professional obligations.
- Given Mr Griffin's connection to Penny was through the hospital, it should have been apparent that other former patients had similar contact with Mr Griffin and had therefore also been at risk from Mr Griffin.
- An examination of Mr Griffin's complaints history would have revealed a pattern of boundary breaches, including Mr Griffin contacting patients outside the hospital setting, which in turn would have alerted the hospital that other patients had been placed at risk. As we noted earlier, there did not appear to have been any effort to review Mr Griffin's prior complaints history within the Safety Reporting and Learning System (and otherwise) at this time.

We find that Dr Renshaw misled Mr Daniels and then Secretary Pervan by failing to convey information fully and accurately to them about the police briefing on 31 July 2019. Dr Renshaw's initial briefing, which positioned Mr Griffin's offending as occurring entirely outside the hospital setting, set the tone for subsequent briefings to the Secretary.

5.2.6 August–October 2019—Rumours circulate in the community about Mr Griffin

After Mr Griffin was removed from the workplace, staff were told that he had taken leave due to an issue with his back.[1208] Mr Griffin had asked Ms Tonks to tell staff that he was 'off with a bad back' and she did so in order to be 'respectful' of Mr Griffin's wishes because no charge had yet been laid.[1209] However, rumours soon began to circulate about the real reasons for Mr Griffin's departure. Former Ward 4K staff member Annette Whitemore told us:

> After J [Mr Griffin] left there was talk among nurses that he was being investigated for something of a sexual nature. I was told that a young girl had made a statement to Police about historical sexual assaults by J. I recall myself and other staff checking to see if he was still registered as a nurse.[1210]

Around August 2019, Ms Leonard took leave and an Acting Nurse Unit Manager stepped into her role.

Mr Gordon told us that when the rumours about Mr Griffin's absence began to circulate, some Ward 4K staff attended a meeting with human resources staff to discuss how to handle questions from the public about Mr Griffin. Mr Gordon did not attend this meeting and we do not have any other information about it.[1211] However, Mr Gordon told us that not long after this meeting, associate nurse unit managers verbally directed Ward 4K staff to not talk about any allegations connected to Mr Griffin.[1212] Ms Tonks confirmed this, particularly given that a police investigation was underway.[1213] Ms Tonks later recalled that this instruction came from Dr Renshaw.[1214]

Ms Leonard told us that Mr Harvey also directed nursing staff to not discuss the allegations made against Mr Griffin because of the ongoing police investigation.[1215] Ms Leonard believed that this direction was given to preserve the integrity of the police investigation and had been recommended by Tasmania Police.[1216] She said:

> The direction for staff not to discuss the allegations against Mr Griffin was very difficult to support, and I was deeply challenged and conflicted by this, frequently requesting the ability for staff to talk about the topic and be offered support. The staff clearly needed the opportunity to talk and were struggling, however I was unable to meet their needs, and support open conversations.[1217]

Dr Kate Brady, a researcher with expertise in supporting communities to recover from traumatic events, explained to us that the close control of information management because of concerns about interfering with investigations can impede appropriate responses to critical incidents:

> … it is important to empower managers to treat people as affected community members first, and as legal witnesses second. In my experience, I have observed that some managers and organisations can be so concerned about what they are 'allowed' to say or what the legal ramifications of any communications are that it impairs their ability to think about responding as humanistically as possible.[1218]

5.2.7 2–8 August 2019—Employment Direction processes relating to Mr Griffin

Dr Renshaw told us that a formal investigation of Mr Griffin, under Employment Direction No. 6, began on or about 2 August 2019.[1219] Employment Direction No. 6 outlines the State Service disciplinary processes for determining whether an employee can perform their duties. This becomes relevant for child-facing roles in circumstances when a person no longer holds registration to work with vulnerable people. We discuss the operation of the Employment Directions, and how they are applied in child sexual abuse matters, in Chapter 20.

On 5 August 2019, then Secretary Pervan approved the suspension of Mr Griffin under the Employment Direction No. 4 process (which outlines the process for suspending employees with or without pay) and a letter was sent to Mr Griffin advising him of this decision on the same day.[1220] We consider it appropriate that Mr Griffin was advised immediately to not attend work on 31 July 2019 and that his formal suspension occurred shortly after.

5.2.8 7 August 2019—Mr Griffin's nursing registration is suspended and Tasmania Police advises the hospital of concerns for Mr Griffin's welfare

On 7 August 2019, Ahpra advised Mr Griffin that the Nursing and Midwifery Board of Australia had proposed to suspend his registration.[1221]

Early that morning, Detective Senior Constable Hindle emailed Dr Renshaw outlining concerns Mr Griffin's family had expressed about Mr Griffin's welfare.[1222] Detective Senior Constable Hindle noted: 'It is not uncommon for people in his current situation to make the ultimate decision'.[1223] Detective Senior Constable Hindle informed Dr Renshaw that Mr Griffin had been provided the details for Lifeline and offered transportation for a mental health assessment, which he declined. Detective Senior Constable Hindle asked Dr Renshaw whether the hospital had taken all steps to offer Mr Griffin follow-up support in relation to his suspension from work.[1224] Mr Harvey attempted to contact Mr Griffin to check on him the following day.

5.2.9 8 August 2019—Mr Griffin resigns his role at Launceston General Hospital and surrenders his nursing registration

On 8 August 2019, Mr Griffin wrote to Ahpra to surrender his registration as a nurse.[1225] Notwithstanding this, the Nursing and Midwifery Board determined to investigate Mr Griffin. The Board ultimately took no further action after Mr Griffin's death.[1226]

Mr Griffin also resigned from the Tasmanian Health Service on 8 August 2019. His employee exit form listed his reason for departure as 'Retirement–Voluntary' and was signed off by Ms Leonard on 9 August 2019.[1227]

Mr Harvey attempted to call Mr Griffin to do a welfare check, but he did not answer.[1228] Mr Harvey then emailed Mr Griffin with information about the hospital's Employee Assistance Program and other support services.[1229]

5.2.10 8–14 August 2019—The then Secretary is briefed on Mr Griffin's resignation and provided advice on his disciplinary investigation

On 9 August 2019, Mr Harvey prepared a Minute to then Secretary Pervan to advise of Mr Griffin's resignation and that Mr Griffin would likely be charged by Tasmania Police, 'which may attract media attention'.[1230] The Minute largely focused on the Employment Direction No. 6 process (triggered by the loss of Mr Griffin's registration to work with vulnerable people) and recommended that disciplinary processes be aborted because Mr Griffin was no longer an employee of the State Service and therefore any determination or sanctions would not have effect.[1231]

The Minute also notes that Ahpra was notified of the police investigation into Mr Griffin and had cancelled his nursing registration. In relation to the Tasmania Police investigation, the briefing states:

> Tasmania Police [is] conducting enquiries and has advised of pending charges being laid which relate to child exploitation and maintaining inappropriate relations with a minor. Further charges may be considered following Tasmania Police interviews with other parties.[1232]

This Minute was endorsed by the then Acting Chief People and Culture Officer. It does not appear that Dr Renshaw had any involvement in this Minute. The then Secretary Pervan approved the advice to abort the Employment Direction No. 6 investigation on 14 August 2019.[1233]

Mr Daniels recalls speaking with then Secretary Pervan around this time, but this conversation did not appear to cover more than Mr Daniels acquitting his responsibilities to advise Secretary Pervan on the actions taken to respond to Mr Griffin, which were reflected in the briefing.[1234]

Dr Renshaw gave the following explanation as to why the disciplinary process in relation to Mr Griffin was aborted:

> My understanding is that the [Employment Direction] processes only apply to current State Service employees and therefore, if a [State Service] employee resigns, the Department of Health no longer has jurisdiction.[1235]

We accept that it was common practice in 2019 to end a disciplinary process if an employee resigned. We also note that this practice means that the institution does not have the opportunity to learn from any systemic issues that may have arisen by examining the alleged conduct, and that once such a process stops, there is no record preventing the ex-employee from being re-employed by the State Service at a later date. This means that even in circumstances where a former employee causes serious harm, they may be able to continue their predatory behaviour in another workplace. We note that the introduction of a Reportable Conduct Scheme in Tasmania will require heads of regulated entities to continue investigations into reportable allegations regardless of whether the relevant worker resigns or is otherwise no longer an employee.[1236]

Given that early indications from the police suggested a link to hospital patients connected to Mr Griffin, we consider an investigation of some form should have continued, notwithstanding Mr Griffin's resignation.

5.2.11 September 2019—Kylee Pearn makes a complaint to police about Mr Griffin

In September 2019, Ms Pearn reported her abuse by Mr Griffin to Tasmania Police. As we discussed in Section 4, Ms Pearn made a promise to herself that she would come forward to support another victim-survivor's police report, if one were ever made. In her statement to Detective Senior Constable Hindle, Ms Pearn referenced her earlier disclosure to human resources staff at Launceston General Hospital in the presence of her then manager, Stewart Millar.

5.2.12 August–September 2019—Tasmania Police investigates and charges Mr Griffin with child sex offences

On 27 August 2019, before Ms Pearn made her report to police, Detective Senior Constable Hindle wrote to the Australian Federal Police about the child exploitation images that Tasmania Police had overlooked in 2015 (refer to Section 4.1.23).[1237] This material was ultimately forwarded to Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 2 September 2019.[1238]

On 3 September 2019, Tasmania Police interviewed Mr Griffin, during which he made several admissions.[1239] After this interview, he was charged with one count of sexual intercourse with a young person under 17 years of age and was bailed to reappear in the Launceston Magistrates Court on 23 October 2019.[1240] Detective Senior Constable Hindle told us that Tasmania Police did not oppose bail at this time because they believed the bail conditions, which included that Mr Griffin not be in the company of a minor without another adult present, were sufficiently stringent.[1241]

On 13 September 2019, Tasmania Police sought approval from the Director of Public Prosecutions to authorise the more serious charge of what is now referred to as persistent sexual abuse of a young person. The Director of Public Prosecutions gave approval shortly after, on 17 September 2019.[1242]

Also on 13 September 2019, Mr Harvey spoke to Tasmania Police. He recalled police telling him that it was unlikely hospital staff would have to make statements because 'the incidents occurred outside the workplace'.[1243] At the time of Mr Griffin's arrest, Dr Renshaw was on long service leave overseas and did not return until after Mr Griffin's death, which would be sometime after 18 October 2019.[1244]

On 3 October 2019, based on a review of the materials Tasmania Police received in 2015 from the Australian Federal Police, Tasmania Police conducted a second search on Mr Griffin's home. This search resulted in Mr Griffin being charged with offences relating to possessing, producing and distributing child exploitation material.[1245] Mr Griffin was also charged with another eight counts of indecent assault relating to four victim-survivors, who had since made a report of their abuse to police, including Ms Pearn and Keelie McMahon.[1246]

Mr Griffin was detained and Tasmania Police opposed bail on the basis that Mr Griffin had 'sought loopholes' on his previous bail conditions and reportedly had plans to attend a recreational event with young people.[1247] However, the Court granted him bail and he was released that day.[1248]

5.2.13 19 September 2019—Secretary Morgan-Wicks visits Ward 4K

On 19 September 2019, the then new Secretary of the Department, Kathrine Morgan-Wicks PSM, who began in the role on 2 September 2019, visited Ward 4K for a site tour of the new Women's and Children's ward redevelopment. She told us that Mr Daniels and 'key LGH staff' accompanied her on this tour.[1249] Secretary Morgan-Wicks stated that: 'To the best of my recollection, the circumstances of Mr Griffin were not raised during the tour or in meetings that day'.[1250]

5.2.14 9 October 2019—The Examiner publishes a brief article about Mr Griffin's criminal charges without identifying him

On 9 October 2019, The Examiner newspaper published a brief article about a paediatric nurse in Launceston, which read:

> A former nurse has been accused of possessing, producing and distributing child exploitation material as well as maintaining a sexual relationship with a young person.
>
> The 69-year old Legana man has been charged with eight counts of indecent assault, distribution of child exploitation material, involving person under 18 years in production of child exploitation material, produce child exploitation material, possess child exploitation material and maintain a sexual relationship with a young person.
>
> It is alleged the man maintained a sexual relationship with a young person between August 2009 and August 2013.
>
> He is also accused of involving a person under 18 years in the production of child exploitation material in South Launceston on March 6, 2015. The charges for producing and distributing child exploitation also relate to March 6. The indecent assault charges span across 25 years, with the first alleged offence occurring between 1987 and 1990, and the most recent sometime between 2011 and 2012.
>
> On July 19 this year, the man was also allegedly found in possession of child pornography photos. He will appear in Launceston Magistrates Court on November.[1251]

5.2.15 11 October 2019—Tasmania Police ask human resources staff about Ms Pearn's disclosure

Mr Bellinger told us that on 11 October 2019, Detective Senior Constable Hindle called to 'ask if we had any records about a disclosure by Kylee Pearn or Stewart Millar'.[1252] When Counsel Assisting asked Mr Bellinger for more detail about what Detective Senior Constable Hindle said, Mr Bellinger replied that the request was specific enough to confirm to him that the disclosure related to Mr Griffin's inappropriate conduct in relation Ms Pearn as a child.[1253] Mr Bellinger recalled that Detective Senior Constable Hindle told him that Ms Pearn's disclosure to the hospital was estimated to have occurred in 2010 or 2011.[1254]

Mr Bellinger said that after hanging up from the call with Detective Senior Constable Hindle he searched the human resources team's records and spoke to another, more senior, member of the human resources team to seek their recollection.[1255]

Later that day, Mr Bellinger emailed Detective Senior Constable Hindle, copying in this same member of the human resources team. As referenced in Section 4.1.14, this email included the following:

> I was not working with the LGH at that time, Gino Fratangelo and [the member of the human resources team] were at the LGH at that time. Gino has since retired, [the member of the human resources team] is still in HR with the THS and I have copied [them] in. I have access to Gino's emails from 2012 onwards and a record of some matters dating back to 2004.
> I have been unable to find a record of [Ms Pearn's] complaint.[1256]

We note that Mr Bellinger did not try to contact Mr Fratangelo at this point to find out whether Mr Fratangelo could recall the meeting or whether he may have held records or notes relating to it that could have assisted police. Nor did Detective Senior Constable Hindle contact Mr Fratangelo. Mr Bellinger did not make a file note of his conversation with Detective Senior Constable Hindle.[1257]

The reference in Mr Bellinger's email to 'a record of matters dating back to 2004' suggests that Mr Bellinger did at least review some of Mr Griffin's complaints history, given the first recorded complaint with which the human resources team was involved was made in 2004 (described in Section 4.1.4). We understand that information about Mr Griffin's complaints history was never provided to Tasmania Police, noting also that it may not have been requested.

We asked Ms Leonard whether she was asked to provide the human resources team with information to do with the complaints about Mr Griffin, noting that complaints were not always escalated to the human resources team.

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: After Griffin was arrested you [were] asked for all the records concerning Griffin; is that right?
>
> A [Ms Leonard]: I don't recall that.
>
> Q: Did you gather all of the records concerning Griffin after his arrest?
>
> A: I don't recall that.
>
> Q: Did HR ask for access to all of his records after Mr Griffin's arrest?
>
> A: At some stage they asked for all the records.
>
> Q: And you gathered them for them?
>
> A: Yes.
>
> Q: And you made everything available to HR for review at that stage?
>
> A: Yes.[1258]

We are unclear when human resources staff requested Ms Leonard's records in relation to complaints about Mr Griffin. We consider it likely that this request was made in November 2019 when the human resources team conducted a review into complaints about Mr Griffin (discussed in Section 5.2.25).

We expect that the phone call from Detective Senior Constable Hindle would have been a source of significant concern to Mr Bellinger, given our finding that he was at the meeting when Ms Pearn's disclosure was made. The call would also have put Mr Bellinger on notice that his and Mr Fratangelo's inaction in the face of that disclosure was likely to be scrutinised.

Despite having reasonably good recall of a wide variety of matters, including some from many years ago, Mr Bellinger could not recall whether he had escalated his correspondence with Detective Senior Constable Hindle to others, other than copying the member of the human resources team into his email response to Detective Senior Constable Hindle.[1259]

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Did you speak to anyone else about the conversation you'd had with [Detective] Hindle?
>
> A [Mr Bellinger]: Not that I can recall.
>
> Q: Did you speak to Dr Renshaw?
>
> A: I don't recall.[1260]

Counsel Assisting then asked Mr Bellinger whether he was aware of Dr Renshaw's medico-legal expertise and his role as police liaison. This information is relevant because the failure to take action in response to Ms Pearn's disclosure in 2011 or 2012 exposed the hospital to litigation on the basis that it had prior knowledge of the risk Mr Griffin posed as a paediatric nurse.

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: So, that being [Dr Renshaw's] position, is that the sort of thing that you would have taken to his attention?
>
> A [Mr Bellinger]: Yes.
>
> Q: And, did you take it to his attention?
>
> A: I don't recall.
>
> Q: Would it have been your practice to do so?
>
> A: Yes.
>
> Q: Do you have any file notes that tell us whether or not you did?
>
> A: No, I don't.

Mr Bellinger also could not recall advising the Chief People Officer at the Department about his correspondence with Detective Senior Constable Hindle, despite it being his practice to share information of this nature with the Department.[1261]

Counsel Assisting asked Mr Bellinger whether he appreciated the significance of the information he had received from Detective Senior Constable Hindle.

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: Did you understand [Kylee Pearn's previous disclosure to the hospital] to be a serious matter?
>
> A [Mr Bellinger]: Yes.
>
> Q: Did you not escalate it?
>
> A: I don't know.
>
> Q: You didn't make any records about it beyond that email, did you?
>
> A: Correct.
>
> Q: You didn't formally brief anyone about it, did you?
>
> A: Correct.[1262]

While Dr Renshaw was on leave at the time of Detective Senior Constable Hindle's call, we would have thought the call was something Mr Bellinger or other members of the human resources team would report to Dr Renshaw on his return, as a matter of urgency. Indeed, Mr Daniels and the Secretary should have been alerted immediately. Mr Bellinger's failure to so alert them is notable.

Below, we discuss the possibility that Mr Bellinger or other members of the human resources team told Dr Renshaw about Ms Pearn's disclosure. Another member of the human resources team could not take part in our Commission of Inquiry and we make no findings in relation to them.

5.2.16 8–14 October 2019—The Acting Secretary is briefed on the status of Mr Griffin's criminal charges

While Secretary Morgan-Wicks was on planned annual leave between 9 and 20 October 2019, the Acting Secretary approved a Minute to the Secretary about the status of criminal charges relating to Mr Griffin, dated 14 October 2019.[1263] This Minute was prepared by the former Director of Employee Relations at the Department on 8 October 2019 and was approved by Mr Bellinger on the same date. The Acting Chief People and Culture Officer at the time formally endorsed the Minute on 9 October 2019.

The Minute recapped some of the information provided in earlier briefings to then Secretary Pervan, including that:

- Mr Griffin had been suspended on 5 August 2019 by former Secretary Pervan, following notification that his registration to work with vulnerable people had been suspended pending criminal charges relating to offences involving children.[1264]

- An Employment Direction No. 6—Inability was considered the most appropriate course given that Mr Griffin was not able to fulfil an essential requirement of his nursing role; however, as Mr Griffin resigned on 8 August 2019, no further action was taken.[1265]
- Ahpra had been notified and had cancelled Mr Griffin's nursing registration.[1266]

The Minute noted that the Tasmanian Health Service had cooperated with Tasmania Police and that:

> To date, there has been no notification that offences are linked to Mr Griffin's employment as a Paediatric Nurse with the THS.[1267]

The Minute also flagged that the matter had attracted media attention but that no action was required.[1268]

This Minute had serious omissions and was misleading on numerous fronts. There is no information to suggest that its author, the former Director of Employee Relations at the Department was aware that this document was misleading.

The Minute was technically correct in stating that Mr Griffin's charges were not directly connected to the hospital because Mr Griffin was charged in relation to child sexual abuse of Ms Skeggs, and others who were not patients.[1269] Also, the charges related to child exploitation material and were based on information discovered in the review of the materials that Australian Federal Police had obtained in 2015, not the images of patients at the hospital found on Mr Griffin's devices and described by police at the 31 July 2019 briefing.[1270] However, we consider the following omissions from the Minute to be material:

- As with the earlier Minutes of 31 July 2019 and 9–14 August 2019, the substance of the 31 July 2019 briefing from Tasmania Police was not reflected in this Minute. We received no evidence to suggest that Tasmania Police had categorically ruled out the images of patients as constituting child exploitation material, noting its investigation of Mr Griffin was ongoing. Even if it had, this information should have been included in the Minute.
- By the time the Acting Secretary signed off on the Minute on 14 October 2019, Mr Bellinger and another member of the human resources team were formally on notice about Ms Pearn's disclosure, as Mr Bellinger had received the call from Detective Senior Constable Hindle asking for records relevant to this disclosure on 11 October 2009. Although Mr Bellinger is listed as having endorsed this briefing on 8 October 2019, before receiving the call from Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 11 October 2019, he should have immediately sought to update the Minute or prepared another Minute to reflect this information before it went to the Acting Secretary. When Counsel Assisting asked Mr Bellinger why he did not seek to update the Minute before it was sent to the Office of the Secretary, or to prepare a subsequent urgent Minute, he agreed that another Minute should have been prepared.[1271] When asked why this did not occur, Mr Bellinger said: 'I can't answer that.'[1272] This is an inexplicable response in the circumstances.

- Mr Bellinger appears to have undertaken at least a cursory examination of Mr Griffin's complaints history in response to Detective Senior Constable Hindle's request, noting the reference in his email to Detective Senior Constable Hindle about 'records dating back to some matters in 2004'.[1273] The Secretary should have been informed of this complaints history at the earliest opportunity—ideally by Dr Renshaw on 31 July 2019—however, there is no justification for the omission in a subsequent briefing to the Secretary.

Dr Renshaw returned from leave sometime after 18 October 2019, after this Minute was approved.

It took until our public hearing on 28 June 2022 for Mr Daniels and Secretary Morgan-Wicks to learn of Mr Bellinger's correspondence with Detective Senior Constable Hindle in October 2019.[1274] In relation to Ms Pearn's disclosure to the hospital in 2011 or 2012, Mr Daniels stated that he only learned of this fact through our hearings.[1275] When Counsel Assisting asked Mr Daniels for his response to learning that people in his organisation did not tell him about the disclosure before the hearings, he replied:

> I am very disturbed about that because, as I think I've indicated in my statement, that I rely very heavily on the advice from those people who manage those processes to advise me, because I can say in all honesty that, had I been aware at the time—not that I was in the role then [at the estimated time of the disclosure]—if that occurred today and that report was made available to me and I was told, I'd take immediate action and that action would be to report it to Tasmania Police and expect some outcome from it, as well as the notifications that are required because of the practitioner.[1276]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks recalls learning of Ms Pearn's disclosure to the hospital on 20 October 2020, which we describe in Section 5.2.45. We established that Dr Renshaw told her and Mr Daniels in an email in general terms about Ms Pearn's disclosure on 16 October 2020 following the release of the podcast The Nurse.[1277] Ms Pearn also attempted to alert others to her disclosure once The Nurse podcast was released. However, Secretary Morgan-Wicks did not know that Tasmania Police had spoken to the human resources team about this disclosure in 2019.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks gave evidence that, had she been advised of the circumstances of Ms Pearn's missing complaint in her review of the draft response to the Integrity Commission on 10 September 2020, or if it had been escalated earlier to her, she believes she would have immediately instituted an independent investigation into the management of complaints relating to Mr Griffin, given the seriousness of the missing complaint and the behaviour reported in 2011 or 2012.[1278]

Finding—The human resources team failed to escalate information they received on 11 October 2019 about Kylee Pearn's 2011 or 2012 disclosure

As we have described above, the call to Mr Bellinger from Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 11 October 2019 should have been a catalyst for immediate and urgent action from Mr Bellinger and other members of the human resources team. We consider that the human resources team, including Mr Bellinger, should have taken steps to ensure Mr Daniels and Secretary Morgan-Wicks were advised of the request and its implications for the hospital.

The information that human resources staff held about Ms Pearn's disclosure should have been escalated given it indicated that the hospital had known about Mr Griffin's potential offending from that time. This includes fully informing the Secretary of the query human resources staff received from Detective Senior Constable Hindle about Ms Pearn's disclosure—and describing what was known about that disclosure. We understand that for Mr Bellinger in particular, given his attendance at the meeting at which the disclosure was made, acknowledging such a fundamental error of judgment is confronting. However, the implications of mishandling Ms Pearn's disclosure should have been acknowledged at the earliest opportunity.

The tone of the briefing to the Secretary worked to distance the hospital from Mr Griffin's offences and to suggest there was no potential connection or risk to the hospital, beyond a possible and generic reputational risk associated with media attention of Mr Griffin's charges. This framing contributed to the hospital doing nothing and significantly undermined the opportunity for Mr Daniels and Secretary Morgan-Wicks to get on the front foot of the crisis by taking the following actions:

- They could have initiated an investigation into the specific circumstances of Ms Pearn's disclosure to understand exactly what happened and to enable any relevant information to be provided to assist Tasmania Police in its investigation of Mr Griffin.
- They could have closely examined Mr Griffin's personnel file and complaints history to determine whether there was any information that gave rise to concerns he may have harmed or abused patients in any way. This would have uncovered a significant complaints history at the hospital, as described in Section 4. Such a review would have also revealed that Mr Griffin was transferred to Ashley Youth Detention Centre in November 2017, providing an opportunity for the Department to investigate whether there were any complaints or concerns about Mr Griffin during his assignment there, and to determine the full extent of the Department's legal and reputational exposure.

- They could have prepared a plan on how to respond effectively to the hospital's failure to act on Ms Pearn's disclosure and the ongoing police investigation. This plan could have designated appropriate roles and responsibilities for managing the hospital's response and ensured any conflicts of interest were avoided, that legal advice and assistance was sought, and that relevant records and documents were secured and quarantined. This plan could also have guided the Department in responding to any patients and families that may have been affected by Mr Griffin's conduct and in providing accurate information to staff and the community as it was appropriate to do so. Further, contemplation of such a plan may have triggered a realisation that external expertise and assistance may be required, given the scale of this event.

5.2.17 18 October 2019—Mr Griffin dies by suicide

On 13 October 2019, Mr Griffin was found unresponsive at home, because of a suicide attempt.[1279] He was taken to Launceston General Hospital where he received treatment in the Intensive Care Unit, but died on 18 October 2019.[1280] The Coroner later stated in relation to Mr Griffin's death:

> The evidence viewed as a whole satisfies me to the requisite legal standard that the cause of Mr Griffin's death was a mixed prescription intoxication which caused hypoxia. I am satisfied that there are no suspicious circumstances surrounding Mr Griffin's death and that when he took the drugs which caused his death he did so with the express intention of ending his own life, voluntarily and alone. No doubt the charges he was facing at the time of his death motivated his action.[1281]

Shortly after Mr Griffin's death, Ms Leonard told us she learned from a staff member that community members were contacting Ward 4K staff with questions about Mr Griffin. These community members had learned of his death informally, presumably via friends and family of Mr Griffin.[1282]

Ms Leonard told us that she was not aware of Mr Griffin's family having formally announced his death and felt that his family should be entitled to confidentiality and privacy surrounding his hospitalisation. She said she did not think it was appropriate to formally share the news with staff.[1283] Acknowledging rumours were circulating, when conducting morning handover on 21 October 2019, Ms Leonard verbally briefed staff to not discuss the matter. She provided information about how they could access counselling and invited staff to meet with her to discuss any questions or concerns they may have. Ms Leonard acknowledged that not being informed of the circumstances of Mr Griffin's death at this time would have been challenging for some staff.[1284] She added:

> I found this a very difficult path to navigate, so I sought guidance and direction from Ms Tonks, Mr Harvey and Mr Bellinger once they were at work later this morning. I was hoping to receive guidance on how to proceed and I recall that they supported this approach [of not discussing the circumstances of Mr Griffin's death].[1285]

Ms Leonard said she did not receive any support or guidance from the then Executive Director of Nursing, Helen Bryan. Ms Bryan told us: 'I am unaware of any other directions made by LGH to staff on Ward 4K'.[1286] Ms Bryan also told us that, as a patient at the hospital prior to his death, Mr Griffin was entitled to 'the same privacy any other patient would receive' and this right to privacy continued after his death. Ms Bryan said that the hospital has:

> … an obligation to keep confidential from the general nursing staff on Ward 4K the fact that Mr Griffin had been a patient at the Hospital, the reason for his admission to the Hospital, and the fact of Mr Griffin's death, just as Hospital staff would keep confidential the admission and prognosis or health outcome of any other patient from the general staff at the Hospital who were not caring for the patient. This obligation meant that there was a tension between the Hospital's leadership taking steps to provide information to the nursing staff on Ward 4K in an effort to reduce the staff's distress and respecting the obligation to keep Mr Griffin's health information private and confidential.[1287]

Dr Renshaw also said that he was 'unaware' of any directions to staff on Ward 4K and that he consistently encouraged nursing staff to report any useful information to police or to his office.[1288]

Ms Leonard sent an email to staff on Ward 4K later in the day on 21 October 2019. The email read:

> Dear 4K staff,
>
> Due to recent events within the hospital, it has come to my attention that a former employee has recently passed away. I understand that this situation may cause you some distress, can I please again offer you the support of [an employee assistance program, with phone number]. However, due to patient confidentiality issues this should not be discussed by 4K nor any other Hospital employee. I would like to remind you about the ethical requirement as nurses to work within our code of ethics and code of conduct as state service employees. With appreciation for the difficult situation that we find ourselves in and kindest regards, Sonja.[1289]

According to some recipients who gave evidence to our Commission of Inquiry, this email was not well received by staff. Mr Gordon said there was no recognition from Ms Leonard of the fact that some staff had been friends with Mr Griffin for nearly 20 years. He stated: 'One 4K nurse I spoke to told me that she had never felt as insulted or degraded as she did receiving that email'.[1290] Mr Gordon described the rest of his shift that day as the 'worst shift' he had ever worked, as 'we essentially got told by her to shut up and do our jobs'.[1291] He explained: 'Many staff were trying to deal with the conflict of having James as a close friend but then knowing what he was alleged to have done. They were struggling'.[1292]

Mr Gordon also felt that Ms Leonard and the associate nurse unit managers were watching staff to make sure they did not talk about Mr Griffin.[1293] A Ward 4K staff member at the time, Annette Whitemore, agreed with Mr Gordon's recollections of how the email was received and the instructions not to talk. She told us: 'There was no reason to send it out like this … It was really blunt. I told Sonja that I thought it was blunt'.[1294] Ms Whitemore added that Ms Leonard was very upset at the time too:

> She told me that she didn't know [about Mr Griffin's offending]. Nobody knew. … I've been told by a colleague that they observed Sonja write and rewrite that email a number of times. It was very difficult for her to send.[1295]

Ms Leonard said in her statement to us that after Mr Griffin died 'I remember there was more transparent communication'.[1296] When Counsel Assisting asked whether she felt she received enough direction or leadership around managing the issues in the aftermath of Mr Griffin's death she responded: 'No, I don't think so'.[1297]

Meanwhile, Dr Renshaw continued to be the contact point for people concerned about Mr Griffin's actions in the months after his arrest and death. He described being contacted by staff and patients' families reporting concerns or looking for information about whether it was possible their child was harmed under the care of Mr Griffin.[1298] As described above, there seemed to be no clear plan to manage this contact, with responses largely ad hoc and driven primarily by Dr Renshaw.

We heard that over the following weeks staff began to agitate for a group debriefing process. We understand that the desire of staff to talk with each other was to help them process complex emotions, which for some extended to examining their own complicity in tolerating or overlooking Mr Griffin's inappropriate behaviour. In our view, many staff were experiencing what researcher and expert in community trauma recovery Dr Kate Brady calls 'moral injury'. The term moral injury refers to a person's psychological reaction to a serious event that involves a betrayal of their deeply held moral beliefs.[1299] Moral injury can involve feelings of guilt, remorse and anger and may cause a person to blame themselves for failing to prevent an event.[1300]

Mr Gordon described feeling 'extremely guilty' for not speaking up after observing the way Mr Griffin failed to demonstrate best practice in line with the chaperone protocol with a particular patient:[1301]

> … as a result of all the allegations being made against [Griffin] later on down the track, I look at that—I replay that, you know, those two seconds, that two-second memory, and I feel like that patient, without a shadow of a doubt, was a victim, purely because of the way that he would talk about her as well. The way he would talk to the family, the relationship he had with the parents. He would always try and look after this patient; even if he wasn't allocated, he was there. Yeah, without a doubt, I believe she was a victim.[1302]

Ms Whitemore shared with us her experience of working alongside Mr Griffin as a graduate nurse in around 2002 and witnessing him washing a patient:

> … but he moisturised over her chest, and that just keeps coming back, that I— I think I told somebody but I didn't put a complaint in, but it made me feel, 'Is that what we do?' But I knew I wouldn't do that, I wouldn't— if I was a male … So I sort of regret that I never took that further.[1303]

After he completed his shift on the day of Ms Leonard's email to staff, Mr Gordon, who was one of the nursing union delegates on the ward, contacted the union to request assistance. He told us: 'I was already furious about the way staff were being treated by management, the cone of silence that had been imposed and the lack of support offered'.[1304] This led to a meeting between the union and ward staff on 24 October 2019, which we describe in Section 5.2.20.

Some victim-survivors of Mr Griffin's abuse also described insensitive responses from Tasmania Police when they sought information or attempted to make a statement after Mr Griffin's death.[1305]

5.2.18 Sometime after 18 October 2019—Dr Renshaw returns from leave and hears 'corridor rumours' about Ms Pearn's disclosure

Dr Renshaw told us that after he returned from leave at an unspecified date after Mr Griffin's death, he gained 'vague knowledge' that a staff member had raised a concern with Stewart Millar about what Dr Renshaw described as a 'relationship' that the staff member had with Mr Griffin when she was a child.[1306] As we describe in Section 4.1.14, Mr Millar was Ms Pearn's manager at the time she reported Mr Griffin to human resources staff in 2011 or 2012 and attended the meeting held with human resources representatives at that time.

Dr Renshaw described the context in which he heard this information as 'one of these sort of corridor rumour-type situations'.[1307] Dr Renshaw could not recall who passed on this rumour, stating to us: 'How does anybody know when they pick up a rumour?'[1308] He described the hospital being 'rife with rumour' at the time, saying 'you basically had to be there at the time to actually understand the way decision making was being made and so on'.[1309] We do not have evidence of who told Dr Renshaw this 'rumour'.

When asked what enquiries he made to test the accuracy of the 'rumour' he had heard, Dr Renshaw explained that, by then, matters relating to Mr Griffin were largely with the Secretary of the Department and he did not think he should take it upon himself to make enquiries.[1310] We note that the Department disputes that the Secretary was tasked with any actions in relation to Griffin's offending.[1311] After further questioning, Dr Renshaw conceded that he believed the rumour at the time he heard it.[1312] He also told us that he did not believe it was appropriate to escalate this information 'on the basis of a rumour heard in a corridor' despite his belief in its veracity, and that there was not enough information for him to do so.[1313] During our hearings, Dr Renshaw conceded that not advising the Secretary of the rumour was a failing.[1314]

We recognise there were likely rumours swirling around the hospital. However, as reported to us, Dr Renshaw did receive specific information as part of this 'rumour' (namely the fact the disclosure involved Mr Millar) that he could have escalated for closer examination. We consider Dr Renshaw's failure to pass on information arose once Tasmania Police confirmed this 'corridor rumour' to him on 29 October 2019 and find as such in Section 5.2.21.

5.2.19 21 October 2019—The Secretary is verbally briefed on Mr Griffin's death

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that when she returned from leave:

> I recall that [the Acting Secretary] briefed me on critical issues of note that occurred during my period of leave, including the prolonged death following attempted suicide of a former employee, Mr Griffin, on 18 October and the earlier information that had been received on 14 October in relation to criminal charges against Mr Griffin.[1315]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks said that when she spoke to the Acting Secretary, she queried whether supports had been put in place for staff in light of Mr Griffin's death, and whether anything further needed to be done.[1316] She recalled that:

> … no further action was recommended at that time, that the Tasmania Police investigation was ongoing and that there was no notification that Mr Griffin's alleged offending was linked to his employment as a Paediatric Nurse with the THS.[1317]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks' impression was that the criminal allegations against Mr Griffin were related to his personal life, as she understood that the Department would be told if the victim-survivor was a patient, or the offending had occurred at the hospital.[1318] Secretary Morgan-Wicks also stated that the specific details of the police charges laid against Mr Griffin do not appear to have been shared with the Department until 2 November 2020, after the Department requested more information.[1319]

5.2.20 24 October 2019—The Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation convenes a meeting for Ward 4K staff

Following Mr Gordon's contact, the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation convened a meeting for Ward 4K staff on 24 October 2019. Mr Gordon told us that the response of almost all attendees at this meeting was 'essentially a vote of no confidence' in Ms Leonard's leadership.[1320] Mr Gordon added: 'Everyone had had enough of the lack of support, information, and the direction to remain silent'.[1321]

Emily Shepherd, Branch Secretary, Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (Tasmanian Branch), gave her recollections of this meeting, which she attended, as follows:

> There was one report that was quite recent from 2016 which was made by one of our workplace delegates. [Note we consider this to be Mr Gordon's 2017 complaint.]

> That information was shared, but then there were also other members indicating that they were aware that other reports had been made, both verbally, via email, on paper-based incident reporting some time ago, and there was a collective recognition that there had been a pattern of reporting over a number of years.[1322]

Sometime after the meeting on 24 October 2019, Ms Shepherd contacted Ms Leonard and Ms Tonks to relay staff concerns and foreshadow the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation's intention to put those concerns in writing.[1323] On 28 October 2019, Ms Shepherd wrote to Ms Leonard, requesting a staff group debriefing facilitated by an independent counsellor 'without any management or HR representatives present'.[1324]

Mr Gordon recalled that, as a result of the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation's advocacy, the hospital engaged a private counsellor for individual sessions with staff.[1325] When Mr Gordon encountered this counsellor in the staffroom, he learned that their professional expertise was in counselling parents and staff following stillborn births.[1326] He felt that this was not the right skill set for what the nurses required and so did not arrange a session with the counsellor.[1327] Mr Gordon said that other staff were also wary of speaking to this person because there was a perception that the counsellor was reporting back to management.[1328]

The letter Ms Shepherd sent to Ms Leonard on 28 October 2019 also stated that:

> Members articulated an aggrievement with the way their previously lodged complaints regarding Jim have been handled. Members note that they did not receive any acknowledgement, or they were not advised that their complaint/ concern was handled. Considering recent events, the lack of transparency around their concerns is causing them significant distress, it is also driving a lack of confidence in their management. The [Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation] requests that all previously lodged complaints in relation to Jim Griffin are reviewed and that the complainant is contacted and advised of the action take[n] at the time.[1329]

The request triggered a meeting between the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation and hospital management, which is described in Section 5.2.24.

As noted earlier, we did not see evidence of any meaningful examination of complaints about Mr Griffin in the three months from when he became the subject of a police investigation. There is considerable confusion about which complaints concerning Mr Griffin that Dr Renshaw was aware of at this stage. We note that Dr Renshaw had committed, on 31 July 2019, to examining the Safety Reporting and Learning System. At the time of our hearings, Dr Renshaw said that he was only aware of one complaint by a staff member in relation to Mr Griffin.[1330] Dr Renshaw, however, later told us that the search of the Safety Reporting and Learning System 'did not yield any results'.[1331]

5.2.21 29 October 2019—Tasmania Police briefs Dr Renshaw further about child exploitation images taken on Ward 4K and about Ms Pearn's disclosure

Dr Renshaw told us that on 29 October 2019, he received another briefing from Tasmania Police. On this day, he was advised that police had formed the belief that some of the photos that Mr Griffin had taken of Ward 4K patients constituted child exploitation material and that the police investigation was now focused on identifying the children in those photographs.[1332] This advice is confirmed in Detective Senior Constable Hindle's written summary of the meeting:

> Dr RENSHAW informed of the existence of in excess of (50) photographs regarded as Child Exploitation Material which were located on a device (phone) seized from GRIFFIN.[1333]

Detective Senior Constable Hindle told us that he informed Dr Renshaw about Ms Pearn's disclosure at this meeting, although this is not expressly captured in the meeting summary he prepared.[1334] Dr Renshaw said he did not recall Ms Pearn's disclosure being discussed at the meeting but that he had no reason to doubt Detective Senior Constable Hindle's recollection.[1335]

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw should have escalated and acted on knowledge of Kylee Pearn's disclosure to the hospital once advised about it by Tasmania Police on 29 October 2019

We consider that Detective Senior Constable Hindle told Dr Renshaw about Ms Pearn's disclosure on 29 October 2019. Dr Renshaw had a responsibility to tell the Department and the hospital executive, particularly the Chief Executive Mr Daniels, that there had been a significant failure of systems and processes at the hospital resulting in a paedophile continuing to work in a paediatric ward for several more years. Dr Renshaw, as part of the executive, should have been looking for ways to ensure similar failures did not reoccur. He should also have been ensuring that others were informed of the failures in systems and processes so they could support those affected and take their own actions to ensure similar failures were not repeated.

5.2.22 30 October, 1 November and 13 November 2019—Dr Renshaw facilitates Ward 4K staff information sessions

On top of the distress staff were experiencing about the circumstances of Mr Griffin's death, we heard that staff were also becoming increasingly frustrated about the lack of information from management about how the hospital was responding to allegations against Mr Griffin.

Dr Renshaw facilitated three information sessions with Ward 4K staff to share information about Mr Griffin. These sessions took place on 30 October 2019, 1 November 2019 and 13 November 2019.[1336] Dr Renshaw told us that the 'overall strategy' for these sessions was 'driven by human resource advice'.[1337] Dr Renshaw said that the purpose of the sessions was to provide 'factual information regarding the current situation of the investigations into Griffin', noting that all the information he provided was cleared by Tasmania Police.[1338] Dr Renshaw stated that he advised staff that 'gossiping and innuendo were potentially destructive and unhelpful when the focus should be on supporting the legal processes and healing the broken team'.[1339] We consider it likely that Dr Renshaw was referring to the Tasmania Police investigation when referring to legal processes.

Ms Tonks, who was present during these sessions, told us that the information provided at the sessions was consistent on each occasion and included the timing of the police complaint (and when the hospital became aware of it), the suspension of Mr Griffin and the fact that the investigation (to the extent that it was occurring after Mr Griffin's death) was being managed by Tasmania Police.[1340]

At the hearings for our Commission of Inquiry, Ms Whitemore described a change in Dr Renshaw's approach towards staff during these sessions, saying 'it changed from "We'll support you, we'll support the nursing staff with whatever they need", to "You all should have been mandatory reporting": no respect, no respect'.[1341]

We understand Ms Tonks advised the meeting that there were no outstanding complaints against Mr Griffin. Ms Tonks later explained that she told staff this because she 'could only trust that [she] had been given accurate information by HR'.[1342] Ms Bryan did not take part in these sessions. She told us: 'I was not included in those meetings and so I am unaware of what response/reaction there was to [them]'.[1343]

Dr Renshaw felt the sessions he facilitated were generally well received. He recalled that some staff members sent him emails thanking him for the information provided at the sessions.[1344] However, Dr Renshaw also noted that 'two or three' staff were disappointed that the sessions were information-based and not group debrief sessions and 'expressed themselves quite clearly' on that front.[1345]

On 12 November 2019, before the final session, Mr Gordon, in his capacity as a union representative for Ward 4K, wrote to Dr Renshaw thanking him for hosting two meetings with Ward 4K staff.[1346] In this email, Mr Gordon said he had heard nothing but 'praise and gratitude' for answering staff questions.[1347] However, he reiterated the desire of staff to hold a group debriefing session because many were personal friends of Mr Griffin and felt both saddened by his death and shocked and conflicted by the information that had emerged about his offending.[1348]

Dr Renshaw sought advice from Mr Bellinger, Mr Daniels and Ms Bryan on how to respond to Mr Gordon's request.[1349] We note that this was one of the rare occasions that we are aware of when members of the executive discussed decisions in relation to Mr Griffin.

Mr Bellinger gave Dr Renshaw several options for responding to the request, including encouraging staff to use the services of the counsellor and directing staff to the usual Employment Assistance Program. Mr Bellinger also advised Dr Renshaw to explain that staff debriefs were 'not clinically or therapeutically recommended in these circumstances' because they may contribute to further staff upset or trauma.[1350] Mr Bellinger suggested that Dr Renshaw guide Mr Gordon and other staff 'back towards [Women's and Children's Services] management' to rebuild trust.[1351] Mr Bellinger's advice to Dr Renshaw concluded:

> I am deeply concerned by the breakdown this is now causing and think we need to be very careful to provide appropriate support, and resolve their perceived issues (which in my view are not reasonably held in these circumstances).[1352]

In the final of the three information sessions facilitated by Dr Renshaw, Mr Gordon asked Dr Renshaw whether he was aware of his 2017 complaint.[1353] Mr Gordon told us that Dr Renshaw replied that he had not seen Mr Gordon's complaint, but he was corrected by Ms Tonks, who said that Dr Renshaw had in fact seen the complaint.[1354] Mr Gordon described what happened next:

> I then asked [Dr Renshaw], 'Is this a minor incident?' And he said, 'No, it's not.' So I was like, 'Well, did you actually see it, did you read it?' It felt heavily implied by the contradicting statements of, you know, [Janette] Tonks and Peter Renshaw at the time that one of them wasn't being truthful and it felt heavily like it was Peter Renshaw who was not being truthful at the time.[1355]

Mr Gordon went on to ask why Ms Leonard did not report his complaint to Ahpra. Mr Gordon described Dr Renshaw's response:

> He said, 'Well, if you're going to blame [Ms Leonard]' and he pointed his finger and looked in my general direction, he said, 'Why didn't you report him?' And that's when it truly hit me that this was dead in the water, the THS [Tasmanian Health Service] were not going to do anything about it.[1356]

Mr Gordon reflected on this, telling us:

> It also felt quite personal as if, you know, it was my fault, and the big problem was, is that, he was actually right. Why didn't I? Because I didn't know I could report my own [colleagues] to Working with Childrens. The majority of nurses on that ward, after hearing about this, didn't realise they could report their colleagues to Ahpra, otherwise we might have done.[1357]

Ms Tonks also gave evidence about this exchange between Mr Gordon and Dr Renshaw at the third information session. She said she did not believe Dr Renshaw intended his response to sound accusatory but conceded: 'I believe it was certainly delivered in a way that people would have felt that it was their fault, and that's regretful that's occurred'.[1358]

On 13 November 2019, after the final information session, Dr Renshaw received an email from a nurse on Ward 4K who expressed 'extreme disappointment' about how the session was facilitated.[1359] The nurse complained that Dr Renshaw had not answered staff questions satisfactorily and had 'conducted' the meeting rather than allowing for debrief and discussion.[1360]

In his response to this staff member, Dr Renshaw clarified that his sessions with staff were not intended to be therapeutic debriefings but focused on delivering factual information to 'minimise the impact of gossip and hearsay'. He wrote to the staff member:

> I have been provided with expert advice, both from within the THS and external advice from my colleagues in other jurisdictions that strongly indicates that the 'open de-brief' such as you are requesting can be very damaging to individual members of the ward team … For this reason, and as an LGH/THS member who is personally accountable for the safety and well-being of our staff attending any session for which I am the lead, at the present time, I will not be supporting the open debrief 'quiet chat' approach.[1361] [Emphasis is Dr Renshaw's.]

Dr Renshaw also provided information to the staff member about how the hospital was responding to the allegations against Mr Griffin:

> Relevant members of the LGH Executive (specifically myself, James [Bellinger] – HR Director, Helen [Bryan] – EDON [Executive Director of Nursing] and Janette [Tonks]) have reviewed any matter relevant to Mr Griffin's behaviour of which we have a record. In each instance we can find the matter was reasonably addressed with Mr Griffin. This is not to say there are other matters of which we are unaware of which need to be considered and I welcome the opportunity to review these in order to bring you some closure.[1362]

Mr Gordon told us that it was after this final staff briefing on 13 November 2019 that he made an anonymous complaint to the Integrity Commission about the way senior staff at the hospital responded to concerns about Mr Griffin:

> I made the report to inform the Secretary of Health of the situation on the ward. I was desperate for some sort of investigation into the THS over the handling of the situation.[1363]

Other evidence suggests the Integrity Commission received this complaint on 4 November 2019, after the second briefing session, but that Mr Gordon was engaged with the Integrity Commission about the complaint on 13 and 15 November.[1364] Mr Daniels told us he was not aware of the complaint to the Integrity Commission until our hearings.[1365]

Mr Daniels told us that Dr Renshaw briefed him about these sessions with staff. Mr Daniels recalls Dr Renshaw describing the purpose of the sessions as part of the 'counselling and debriefing for them' and expressed the view that staff would benefit from further training (presumably about mandatory reporting).[1366] Mr Daniels further stated at hearings for our Inquiry: 'The feedback we've received [from staff] to date [has] been really positive from my perspective'.[1367]

Finding—The lack of a coordinated and transparent response by Launceston General Hospital increased feelings of mistrust among hospital staff

We have received evidence that Launceston General Hospital leadership did not have access to records relating to many potential complaints about Mr Griffin, and that the human resources team did not raise complaints about Mr Griffin with leadership, other than Mr Gordon's complaint.[1368] A review of complaints about Mr Griffin was not conducted until November 2019. We discuss the quality of this review in Section 5.2.25.

We saw no evidence to suggest that Launceston General Hospital leadership actively sought information from human resources staff or anyone else about previous complaints against Mr Griffin, nor was a process conducted to test the rigour or quality of the hospital's records of complaints by human resources or anyone else. Therefore, the assurances provided to staff that complaints about Mr Griffin had been thoroughly examined were misleading.

Instead, staff were given assurances that there were no relevant concerns about Mr Griffin's employment at the hospital, notwithstanding knowledge that:

- Mr Griffin had taken photos of patients on the ward, some of which Tasmania Police considered to be child exploitation material.
- Tasmania Police had advised that Mr Griffin had a care arrangement with a former patient of his, which may have been a breach of his professional boundaries.
- A former staff member, Ms Pearn, had made a disclosure of child sexual abuse by Mr Griffin to the hospital in 2011 or 2012.

While we accept that it would not have been appropriate to share all this information with staff, false assurances should not have been provided.

We were particularly concerned about suggestions that staff felt blamed for not making mandatory reports to Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and Ahpra. We hold this concern in light of our earlier findings about the hospital's lack of a clear process for staff reporting concerns to external agencies.

The hospital's response would have been assisted if there had been a critical incident response plan informed by open disclosure principles (refer to Chapter 15, Recommendation 15.19). This may have assisted the hospital to:

- seek external guidance on how to respond to staff
- provide accurate, transparent and clear communication to staff, including being honest about what was and what was not known
- trigger an early review of what could be learned about Mr Griffin's conduct within the hospital.

The absence of these elements in the response led to staff mistrusting the leadership team.

5.2.23 29 October–5 November 2019—The Secretary is briefed on a 'potential legal issue' relating to Mr Griffin

On 29 October 2019, the same day that Dr Renshaw received the second briefing from Tasmania Police, he prepared a Minute to the Secretary. Mr Daniels endorsed this Minute the same day, as did the human resources team on 31 October 2019. The Secretary signed the Minute on 5 November 2019. The Minute is significant, and, for this reason, we replicate significant parts of it. As stated in the Minute, the purpose of the briefing to the Secretary contained within the Minute was to:

1. Update you re the status of a Tasmania Police investigation into James Geoffrey Griffin, a previously registered Paediatric Nurse who was suspended from duty at the Launceston General Hospital (LGH) on 31 July 2019 on advice that his Working with Vulnerable People Registration was withdrawn.
2. Update you as to the actions taken by the Tasmanian Health Service (THS) in relation to this investigation.[1369]

We note that at hearings, there was significant back and forth between Counsel Assisting and Dr Renshaw as to how the first three dot points of the Minute under the heading 'Summary of key issues' (refer below) should be interpreted. In essence, Dr Renshaw sought to argue that the chronological nature of the briefing was intended to recap key events for the Secretary and to reflect the hospital's state of knowledge at particular times in the chronology. We do not intend to recount this back and forth, but note our frustration at Dr Renshaw's responses under questioning, when it was clear that what was at the heart of questioning by Counsel Assisting was to seek Dr Renshaw's response to a suggestion that the Minute he drafted was not comprehensive nor accurate.

We have considered the dot points in the Minute in line with how Dr Renshaw felt they should be interpreted—that is, as reflecting his state of knowledge as at 31 July 2019. We consider they are misleading even on this reading.

Under the heading 'Summary of key issues', the Minute starts with the following two dot points:

- Mr Griffin was suspended from duty from the LGH Paediatric Ward (Ward 4K) on 31 July 2019 following the cancellation of his registration for Working with Vulnerable People on the advice of Tasmania Police received by the Executive Director of Medical Services (EDMS).
- At that time, Tasmania Police were investigating a complaint external to the hospital pertaining to his alleged relationship with a young person and possession of child exploitation material. At that time, Tasmania Police advised that there was no evidence to suggest that any criminal activity had taken place within, or connected to, the LGH.[1370]

As described above, at the 31 July 2019 briefing from Tasmania Police, Detective Senior Constable Hindle told Dr Renshaw about police awareness of Mr Griffin's contact with Penny, a former Ward 4K patient. Detective Senior Constable Hindle also advised that photos of patients had been found in Mr Griffin's possession. Dr Renshaw specifically referenced Penny, and her status as a former patient, as part of his Ahpra notification made the following day. Dr Renshaw also told us that during this briefing, he identified that some of the photos, which did not include child exploitation material, were taken in Ward 4K.[1371] This state of knowledge is not reflected in the second dot point above. Dr Renshaw later told us that the absence of any references in the briefings prepared prior to October 2019 to the possibility that photographs may have been taken in the hospital was not an attempt to mislead his superiors, as the possibility was 'obvious to anyone'.[1372] Dr Renshaw also told us that he considered it unnecessary to make specific reference to Penny in the Minute.[1373]

As Dr Renshaw explained to us, the third dot point also relates to his state of knowledge on 31 July 2019:

- The LGH had not received any complaints from patients or their families regarding inappropriate behaviour by Mr Griffin that would warrant a Code of Conduct investigation, [Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency] notification or Tasmania Police notification.[1374] [Emphasis is Dr Renshaw's.]

In Section 4, we outline a succession of complaints about Mr Griffin's breaches of professional boundaries and inappropriate behaviour with young patients. We consider that several of the complaints against Mr Griffin, particularly those related to non-care touching of patients, independently met the threshold for disciplinary action. Considered cumulatively, there was no justification for not taking further action in response to Mr Griffin's conduct.

At hearings, Dr Renshaw stated that he had based the content of the third dot point on his interrogation of the Safety Reporting and Learning System, which only included one complaint by a staff member (Mr Gordon).[1375] Dr Renshaw later told us that the search of the Safety Reporting and Learning System 'did not yield any results'.[1376] Dr Renshaw, however, conceded that the content in this third dot point was inaccurate.[1377]

As noted above, Mr Bellinger acknowledged that consideration should have been given to conducting a State Service Code of Conduct investigation in response to Mr Gordon's Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint.[1378] We are not convinced that Dr Renshaw had properly reviewed this complaint, such that he could have formed a view at the time on the appropriateness of a State Service Code of Conduct investigation.

When asked why he did not reflect any potential connections between Mr Griffin's criminal investigation and the hospital in the Minute, Dr Renshaw provided a confused explanation, but ultimately said he 'overlooked it' and that the omission was 'unintentionally misleading'.[1379] Dr Renshaw conceded that the second dot point under the heading 'Summary of key issues' 'should have been worded better than that', and he agreed the term 'connected to' was 'wrong' and 'misleading', given he himself had referred to Penny as a former patient in his Ahpra notification on 1 August 2019, and that he knew images of patients had been found in Mr Griffin's possession.[1380]

The dot points in the Minute following the three discussed above are unremarkable in summarising subsequent events. They include content on the cancellation of Mr Griffin's nursing registration by Ahpra on 4 August 2019 (although we note that the cancellation in fact happened on 7 August 2019); Mr Griffin's resignation from the Tasmanian Health Service on 8 August 2019; the article of 9 October 2019 in The Examiner; and Mr Griffin's death, which Dr Renshaw noted was subject to a coronial investigation.[1381]

After this content, the next dot point summarised the information Dr Renshaw received from Tasmania Police on 29 October 2019:

> Tasmania Police met with the Executive Director of Medical Services on his return from leave on 29 October 2019 to provide additional information from their ongoing investigation. They advised that they had found a significant number of photographs classifiable as 'child exploitation material' possibly taken within the hospital over a period of some years. Tasmania Police are working to identify the children involved in this material.
>
> The information provided on 29 October 2019 by Tasmania Police was the first information that illegal / criminal behaviour may have occurred within the LGH.[1382]

We note that Detective Senior Constable Hindle told Dr Renshaw about Ms Pearn's disclosure to the hospital at the 29 October 2019 meeting. This critical information was not reflected in the summary of what Dr Renshaw learned that day. We also note that the human resources team signed off on this Minute and was aware of Ms Pearn's disclosure, noting Mr Bellinger's discussion with Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 11 October 2019. Dr Renshaw acknowledged that the Minute failed to include all relevant information, including Ms Pearn's disclosure: 'I would concede that there should have been a mention towards the bottom of the chronology regarding the most recent information from Tas Police'.[1383] The omission was more significant than this. The statement that this 'was the first information that illegal / criminal behaviour may have occurred within the LGH' was clearly misleading.

The Minute goes on to detail what was occurring on Ward 4K:

> There is considerable gossip and innuendo in respect of this case across the Launceston community which is generating significant pressure on LGH management to provide statements in relation to this matter.
> Some staff on the Paediatric Ward (Ward 4K) have also shown levels of stress which has resulted in a letter from the ANMF (Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation) claiming, without foundation, that LGH management had ignored potential warning signs in Mr Griffin's behaviour. The LGH offered one-on-one individual counselling to all nursing staff on the ward in addition to the standard Employee Assistance Program. Group debriefs, which the ANMF has requested, is not clinically recommended in circumstances such as this.[1384]

This part of the briefing was of particular concern to us. We consider it appalling to suggest, in the context of Mr Griffin's complaints history, that the concerns staff expressed via the union were 'without foundation'. The inaction on Ms Pearn's disclosure alone, which was known to Dr Renshaw and some members of the human resources team by this point, was a clear demonstration of the hospital ignoring potential warning signs.

The Minute continues:

> Peter Renshaw met with 4K staff on Wednesday 30 October 2019 and the Executive Director of Operations, Executive Director of Nursing and HR are currently arranging to meet with Dr Renshaw with respect to the purpose and content of the meeting.[1385]

We note that Dr Renshaw prepared the Minute on 29 October 2019, before the 30 October 2019 meeting, and suspect that the tense used—that is, that Dr Renshaw had 'met' with staff—was likely changed by those endorsing the Minute up the line, who recognised that the session with staff had happened by the time the Minute reached the human resources team.

The next heading of the Minute is 'Analysis of Issues' and reads:

> This is a serious and sensitive matter, even prior to the new information about potential criminal activity within the hospital. If and when Tasmania Police provide details of LGH patients that may have been the victims of the former staff member's alleged crimes whilst in LGH care, it will be imperative that the THS undertake Open Disclosure with the affected individuals and families.
>
> There is a need for ongoing management in relation to issues of open disclosure, staff assistance (EAP) for stressed or concerned staff members, liaison with Tasmania Police and media liaison as appropriate.

> There may also be publicity surrounding the Coroner's findings into Mr Griffin's death although this is fully dependent on the amount of information that the Coroner chooses to release with his or her findings.
>
> Advice has been sought from Crown Law (through the Assistant Solicitor-General, Mr Turner) regarding the THS response to this matter.[1386]

Dr Renshaw told us at hearings that the request for legal advice was confined to advice on the open disclosure process.[1387] We discussed in Section 5.2.3 the evidence we received from the Office of the Solicitor-General about Dr Renshaw's queries, including the frustrating absence of any records relating to this request for legal advice.

The recommendation in the Minute was simply that Secretary Morgan-Wicks 'note the above advice'.[1388] The previous 31 July 2019 Minute to the Secretary was listed in the 5 November 2019 Minute as an attachment.

On 5 November 2019, Secretary Morgan-Wicks marked the Minute as 'noted' with the following handwritten comment: 'Please advise if/when TasPol share information re past patients identified in any material so that approach to disclosure can be approved'.[1389]

Counsel Assisting invited Mr Daniels, who also received the Minute, to reflect on the many opportunities he had to receive frank advice from Dr Renshaw, given how little he seemed to know about Mr Griffin until our public hearings. Mr Daniels said he felt 'a loss of trust' in Dr Renshaw.[1390] Dr Renshaw said he could understand why Mr Daniels felt this way, given that he did not pass on information that may have assisted Mr Daniels to respond appropriately.[1391]

Counsel Assisting also invited Secretary Morgan-Wicks to reflect on the Minute:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: From reading this note [the 5 November 2019 Minute], did you learn anything about the Pearn disclosure?
>
> A [Secretary Morgan-Wicks]: No, I did not.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks also agreed that the Minute did not make her aware of Mr Griffin's care of a former patient of the hospital, Penny. Counsel Assisting continued:

> Q: Are those matters that you would expect to be briefed to you if they were known to any person providing you with this briefing?
> A: Absolutely.[1392]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks described being 'absolutely horrified' about not having received critical information in the Minute and agreed that it was 'misleading'.[1393] Secretary Morgan-Wicks also told us that she would have liked to have understood the extent of staff anxiety and concerns in late 2019 rather than 2020 so she could have 'better [supported] Ward 4K staff to recover from this traumatic incident'.[1394] She stated that she only became aware of the extent of staff distress once she met with staff after the release of The Nurse podcast.[1395]

Reflecting on the importance of briefings to the Secretary being accurate, Secretary Morgan-Wicks said:

> As the Secretary of a department that has some close to 16,000 employees, I rely on the accuracy of information that comes up to me. It's certainly impossible for me to dive into every single issue that actually crosses a Secretary's desk on any day of the week, so certainly I absolutely do rely on the information that comes to me.[1396]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks also said that the information about Ms Pearn, in particular, would have influenced her decisions at this time:

> … if it had been escalated earlier to me at the time of contact from TasPol in October 2019, I believe that I would have immediately instituted an independent investigation in relation to the management of complaints relating to Mr Griffin (as I did on 21 October 2020 upon receipt of this information).[1397]

We discuss the independent investigation in Section 5.2.46.

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw misled the Secretary of the Department about James Griffin

Of all the Minutes to the Secretary, we consider the Minute of 5 November 2019 to be the most significant and the most misleading. The following reflects the specific information we consider should have been included in the Minute. We then make observations about its overall tone.

Other information that should have been included in the Minute was:

- Mr Griffin was a paediatric nurse on Ward 4K for 18 years. His length of service is relevant given the number of paediatric patients who would have had exposure to him. It is also relevant to understanding the impacts on staff of his conduct and death because many would have known him for a long time.
- Mr Griffin was temporarily assigned to Ashley Youth Detention Centre in November 2017. Mr Griffin would have had contact with a group of highly vulnerable young people in a high-risk setting during this assignment. Steps should have been taken to confirm whether there were any concerns or complaints about Mr Griffin during his time in this role.
- Mr Griffin had an extensive complaints history within the hospital. All the complaints and concerns listed under 'Documented or acknowledged complaints' in Section 4 were known or knowable to the hospital. There were 14 documented complaints about Mr Griffin's inappropriate behaviour and professional boundary breaches in the hospital during his employment.

- In addition to these complaints, a staff member, Ms Pearn, disclosed to the hospital in 2011 or 2012 that she had been sexually abused by Mr Griffin as a child. Inaction by the hospital following this disclosure, including allowing Mr Griffin to remain on the ward, was a major litigation and reputational risk for the hospital and the Department.
- Tasmania Police had raised a private care arrangement regarding a former patient of Mr Griffin's, Penny, which may have constituted a breach of Mr Griffin's professional obligations.

While the Minute gave the Secretary some sense of the seriousness of the situation and the distress of ward staff, it also conveyed that the hospital had no knowledge of the risk Mr Griffin posed to children until 31 July 2019. We consider the wording of what was included, combined with what was excluded, to have been calculated to give the impression to the Secretary that the hospital was not implicated in Mr Griffin's conduct. Secretary Morgan-Wicks agreed, telling us she felt that the wording of the Minute was designed to 'reassure me that there was nothing to see here in terms of the LGH'.[1398]

Dr Renshaw conceded that 'in retrospect' the briefing was significantly deficient, although he qualified that the briefing was written in 'good faith based on the information' he had at the time and 'there was no deliberate intent to mislead'.[1399] He said 'it was just one of those situations where the amount of information we had was pretty well overwhelming'.[1400] Dr Renshaw later told us that he did not include some information in the briefing, because it was 'unnecessary' (in relation to Penny), did not 'warrant advising the Secretary' (in relation to the 'corridor rumour') or was 'well known' (in relation to Mr Griffin's length of employment).[1401] This does not explain why Dr Renshaw did not include information about Ms Pearn's disclosure when it was confirmed by Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 29 October 2019. Dr Renshaw also stated that he regretted his failure to pass on critical information, which contributed to the Secretary not taking appropriate steps in response to the allegations against Mr Griffin and in support of staff.[1402]

The concessions Dr Renshaw made were reluctant and highly qualified and we found his evidence on this Minute to be unconvincing. Overall, we consider that he attempted to minimise his responsibility by suggesting that the Department was taking the lead on coordinating investigations and that any enquiries he may have made to provide more comprehensive advice could have cut across the Department's work.[1403] This position overlooks the obvious fact that the Office of the Secretary was relying on Dr Renshaw's advice—as a senior executive who was receiving or had access to all material information—to inform her decisions on the need for and nature of further enquiries.

5.2.24 6 November 2019—The Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation meets with hospital management

As noted above, the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation wrote to Ms Leonard on 28 October 2019. This letter reiterated staff requests for a group debriefing and raised concerns that hospital management had not properly addressed complaints about Mr Griffin.

After not receiving a response, Ms Shepherd contacted Ms Tonks and was told that her letter had been escalated to Mr Daniels.[1404] On 31 October 2019, Mr Daniels wrote to Ms Shepherd noting that her letter had caused 'significant distress to Ms Leonard as well as the then Nursing Director of Women's and Children's Services [Ms Tonks]'.[1405] Mr Daniels requested a meeting with Ms Shepherd and proposed that it would be 'appropriate to have both the LGH Executive Director of Nursing … Helen Bryan, and James Bellinger, Manager of Human Resources for the North and North West of the THS also attend'.[1406] Mr Daniels ended the letter: 'I am particularly concerned to ensure that relevant executive management staff at LGH are involved' and requested union correspondence to be directed to Ms Bryan in the first instance.[1407]

Ms Shepherd said Mr Daniels' request that she direct correspondence to Ms Bryan was outside usual processes and that the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation had previously been directed to always raise concerns with the relevant nurse unit manager in the first instance.[1408]

Our review of the correspondence between the hospital and the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation suggests that the relationship between hospital management and the Federation at this point was strained at best.

A meeting involving Ms Shepherd, Mr Daniels, Ms Bryan and Mr Bellinger took place on 6 November 2019.[1409] Ms Shepherd told us that a range of issues were discussed at this meeting. Of note, Ms Shepherd recollected that:

- Mr Daniels asked for evidence to support members' claims that complaints about Mr Griffin had been made and not acted on, to which Ms Shepherd referenced Mr Gordon's 2017 Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint.[1410]
- Ms Shepherd had to advocate strongly for a commitment from the hospital representatives attending the meeting that feedback be provided to staff who had previously raised complaints about Mr Griffin, without staff members having to request this feedback themselves.[1411]
- Mr Daniels produced a copy of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act to suggest that any members who held concerns about Mr Griffin should have made a mandatory report.[1412]
- Mr Daniels strongly advised against staff speaking to the media, stating that this would be a breach of the State Service Act 2000 ('State Service Act') and place their employment at risk.[1413]

We did not receive evidence from Mr Daniels or Ms Bryan about this meeting. We note Mr Daniels' evidence that human resources staff and Dr Renshaw informed him that all complaints against Mr Griffin had been 'critically investigated and not substantiated'.[1414]

5.2.25 November 2019—Human resources staff review complaints about Mr Griffin

As we have foreshadowed at various points, despite the assurances given to Ward 4K staff and the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation, it was unclear to us what, if any, reviews the hospital undertook into Mr Griffin's complaints history and its state of knowledge of the risks he posed to children.

Mr Bellinger told us that sometime in November 2019 he conducted a review of records in response to staff concerns about how management had dealt with complaints about Mr Griffin.[1415] We note that on 11 October 2019, Mr Bellinger had conducted at least a cursory search of human resources records when Detective Senior Constable Hindle called him asking about Ms Pearn's 2011 or 2012 disclosure to the hospital. As outlined earlier, Ms Leonard recalled the human resources team asking for her records of complaints about Mr Griffin 'at some stage' and we consider it likely this occurred around this time.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that she understood a review of the complaints history against Mr Griffin was conducted after the 6 November 2019 meeting with Ms Shepherd.[1416] It is our view that this review was only conducted because of pressure from the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation.

At our hearings, Mr Bellinger stated that after undertaking this review he formed the belief that all complaints relating to Mr Griffin had been 'handled appropriately'.[1417] He subsequently qualified this statement, asserting that it was more accurate to say that the complaints were managed in line with the practice at the time.[1418] Under questioning from Counsel Assisting, Mr Bellinger conceded that Mr Griffin's complaints history suggested a pattern of behaviour that should have been identified and addressed:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: We've heard the evidence that Griffin was cautioned three times at least that he would be subject to escalation if his conduct did not change. So, as far as you were aware did any escalation ever take place in accordance with those threats?
>
> A [Mr Bellinger]: No.
>
> Q: And is that a matter of concern for you?
>
> A: Yes.
>
> Q: Can you tell the Commissioners why it is a matter of concern for you?
> A: Given the pattern of behaviour displayed, these matters could and should have been considered differently and more significantly.[1419]

Of significant concern was that Mr Bellinger's review failed to consider and reflect all available material relevant to complaints about Mr Griffin. Mr Bellinger admitted that Ms Pearn's complaint to the hospital—which, on his evidence, he became aware of from Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 11 October 2019—was not included in his review.[1420] This is a striking omission. Mr Bellinger sought to justify the omission by explaining that his review was limited to complaints that were addressed with Mr Griffin.[1421] He accepted, in retrospect, that the limited scope of the review was not appropriate and that Ms Pearn's disclosure should have been included.[1422] However, he denied that his failure to include Ms Pearn's disclosure in his review was an attempt to cover up that the disclosure was first made to the hospital in 2011 or 2012:

> My involvement may not have been adequate, it may not have been sufficient, but 'cover-up' implies that there was an intent to cover up … That was not the intent; [the review] may not have been exhaustive enough, but it was not the intent to bury it.[1423]

We are not convinced of this and return to this point later.

Reflecting on the review of Mr Griffin's complaints history, Secretary Morgan-Wicks noted that, at the time, she was not provided with the review's findings:

> Although this was not a formal investigation, I am informed that this review took place and feedback was provided to staff involved. No further escalation regarding the review of complaints was made to the Secretary.[1424]

We did not receive evidence to suggest that any such feedback was given to staff about the complaints made or about the outcome of the November 2019 review (noting Ward 4K staff had received assurances before this review that all complaints had been managed appropriately in the staff briefings described in Section 5.2.22).

Mr Bellinger then conducted two 'reviews' into Mr Griffin's complaints history, but there was no evidence before us that those reviews went beyond the initial review. As a result, we consider that the deficiencies and omissions from the first review infected the subsequent reviews. This is significant because one of the later reviews was undertaken on behalf of the Secretary, in response to a complaint to the Integrity Commission. We return to Mr Bellinger's failings in relation to the various 'reviews' in our finding in Section 5.2.38.

Dr Renshaw confirmed his involvement in Mr Bellinger's November 2019 review; however, he was at pains to emphasise that human resources staff were leading this review and that he did not consider all the information that informed it.[1425] This suggests that Dr Renshaw was not aware of Mr Griffin's full complaints history.

5.2.26 November 2019—Mr Gordon becomes concerned his Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint could be modified

After the staff briefings with Dr Renshaw, described above, Mr Gordon became increasingly suspicious of the hospital's response to Mr Griffin's complaints history. So much so that, sometime in November 2019, he took photographs of his complaint in the Safety Reporting and Learning System to ensure he had a record in case the entry was altered or deleted.[1426]

On 14 November 2019, Ms Tonks emailed Mr Gordon stating: 'Peter [Renshaw] and I both share concerns with your comments [at the staff information session] relating to "unanswered complaints"'.[1427] Ms Tonks requested more information from Mr Gordon so she could 'personally review these complaints'.[1428] Ms Tonks followed up this request on 28 November 2019, writing to Mr Gordon that she 'remained concerned' with his assertions. Given Mr Gordon had not provided further information, she requested a meeting, that Mr Bellinger would also attend, on 2 December 2019.[1429]

Mr Gordon ultimately responded to Ms Tonks on 1 December 2019, noting that he had forgotten to send a previous draft response. He wrote: 'Regarding the unanswered complaints I, and the nurses who raised concerns with me on the ward as their ANMF Rep have decided not to pursue these concerns with the THS'.[1430] Mr Gordon indicated that staff had shared their concerns with the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation and that they had met with Mr Daniels and were ultimately satisfied. Mr Gordon, did, however, express concern about what happened to his complaint of August 2017, which Dr Renshaw had committed to following up.[1431] Mr Gordon indicated he did not think a meeting was necessary.

Ms Tonks responded to Mr Gordon's email on 2 December, copying in Mr Bellinger. Her email stated:

> I assure you that we have reviewed the matter you raised via SRLS in regards to Jim's behaviour, that particular event was addressed by Sonja with Jim at the time and I am satisfied with the outcome. I can confirm for you that (as [union] delegate) that all of the matters that we have on record were addressed with Jim in a reasonable manner. As I am sure you will appreciate, it can be difficult for managers to share the outcomes of these processes however I hope the assurance that they were addressed provides some comfort.[1432]

Mr Gordon formed a view at around this time that his Safety Reporting and Learning System entry had been changed to remove a specific reference to the comments Mr Griffin made to patients being sexual in nature. He began making enquiries with the hospital's IT team and the administrator in charge of the system about whether this could have happened.[1433] Mr Gordon stated to us that this administrator told him that pursuing his own investigation 'may result in an ED5 [Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct] and could potentially result in termination of my contract'.[1434] Mr Gordon discontinued his enquiries.

A staff member in the Quality Patient Safety Service North at Launceston General Hospital told us that most staff at health services are 'default reporters', which means they can only report a Safety Reporting and Learning System event, not view, access or manage it.[1435] We were told that staff can see the file status of the event (for example, 'submitted', 'awaiting review', 'being reviewed/under investigation', 'referred for closing' or 'closed').[1436] Changes to safety events logged in the Safety Reporting and Learning System can also be seen via an audit trail, which shows the name of the person who made the changes as well as the date and time of the change and the actual change made.[1437]

We requested information to examine whether Mr Gordon's complaint entry had been altered in any way. As previously outlined, the audit trail shows that a staff member in the Quality Patient Safety Service granted file access to former Human Resources Consultant Mathew Harvey on 4 September 2017 and to Helen Bryan, former Executive Director of Nursing, on 7 November 2019, for review purposes only.[1438] This staff member told us that they did not alter or update the report other than to grant this file access to Mr Harvey and Ms Bryan.[1439] The audit trail also revealed that none of the staff who originally had access to Mr Gordon's complaint, including Ms Leonard and Ms Tonks, made any changes to the event.[1440] We were satisfied with our review of this entry and the audit trail that the entry had not been improperly changed. Mr Gordon was also ultimately satisfied with this conclusion once it was put to him at our hearings.[1441]

5.2.27 21 November 2019—The Integrity Commission notifies the Secretary of a complaint about Launceston General Hospital's management of complaints about Mr Griffin

As we noted above, in his frustration with the staff briefing process, Mr Gordon made an anonymous complaint to the Integrity Commission about the response of certain Launceston General Hospital managers to information about Mr Griffin.[1442] On 21 November 2019, the then Chief Executive Officer of the Integrity Commission wrote to Secretary Morgan-Wicks advising that he had received a complaint on 4 November 2019 about an employee at Launceston General Hospital.[1443] The Chief Executive Officer told Secretary Morgan-Wicks that the 'complaint raises allegations which, if established, might constitute misconduct'.[1444] The Chief Executive Officer referred the allegations raised in the complaint to Secretary Morgan-Wicks as the principal officer of the relevant public authority for investigation and action under section 38(1)(b) of the Integrity Commission Act 2009.[1445] His letter outlined the Integrity Commission's expectation that Secretary Morgan-Wicks would 'make sufficient inquiries to satisfy yourself as to whether any act of misconduct has occurred, and if so, to ensure that misconduct is dealt with in an appropriate way'.[1446] His letter also noted that the complaint may 'be an opportunity for you to review any relevant policies and procedures'.[1447]

While we have referred to Mr Gordon as the complainant in this section for clarity, the Chief Executive Officer's letter did not identify the complainant. However, the Chief Executive Officer indicated in his letter to the Department that he would advise the complainant that the matter had been referred to Secretary Morgan-Wicks. [1448] The Chief Executive Officer also noted in his letter that the complaint was 'a protected disclosure for the purposes of the Public Interest Disclosures Act 2002 and that the protections provided under the Act applied to the disclosure'.[1449]

The Chief Executive Officer's letter did not provide details about the specific conduct of employees who were the subject of the complaint but enclosed a copy of the Integrity Commission's report, Assessment Greystone, with the letter. Assessment Greystone reflected a summary of the initial assessment of the complaint.[1450] It included the following:

> Multiple complaints were made to the Tasmanian Health Service over the past 18 years about Mr Griffin relating to his inappropriate conduct against minors and others on Ward 4K however that, due to personal relationships between key staff and Mr Griffin, these complaints were not properly investigated and any documentation destroyed.[1451]

The complaint alleged that the employees 'failed to properly deal with reports and complaints about James Griffin relating to his inappropriate conduct on Ward 4K of Launceston General Hospital'.[1452] Their conduct was described as a possible breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, which provides that 'An employee must behave honestly and with integrity in the course of State Service employment' and that 'An employee … must comply with all applicable Australian law'.[1453] Assessment Greystone noted that medical practitioners and nurses have mandatory reporting obligations under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act.[1454]

Assessment Greystone considered a range of issues raised in the complaint, including Mr Griffin's behaviour, management's response to reports and complaints, the police investigation, workplace culture and mandatory reporting of child abuse.[1455] It made explicit that the Integrity Commission's assessment had not considered any reports or management responses to Mr Griffin's behaviour, apart from a report made in August 2017 (Mr Gordon's Safety Reporting and Learning System report).[1456] This reflects the preliminary nature of the assessment.

The report also referenced Mr Gordon's belief that 'staff stopped making reports about Mr Griffin given management failure to respond to the reports and a fear of losing their jobs if they spoke out'.[1457] In this regard, Mr Gordon referenced an earlier matter where a former nurse on the ward was believed to have been 'bullied out of [their] position' after raising concerns about a procedural change they believed was detrimental to patients.[1458] The complainant surmised that the way this complaint was managed may have influenced staff against reporting future issues.[1459]

Assessment Greystone notes that the Integrity Commission contacted Mr Gordon on 13 and 15 November 2019. It recorded that Mr Gordon indicated he believed that he had been 'targeted' for speaking out at a meeting about Mr Griffin on 13 November 2019 because he was the only one who had received email contact after doing so, despite several other nurses also raising issues at the meeting.[1460] We note this description would likely have made Mr Gordon identifiable as the complainant to certain individuals at the hospital, most notably Mr Bellinger, who Ms Tonks copied in when responding to Mr Gordon raising concerns at a staff information session (described in Section 5.2.22).

Assessment Greystone concluded that:

> On the available evidence, it is likely that there has been knowledge and reports of inappropriate and more serious behaviour by Mr Griffin over an extended period of time, and that these may not have been properly dealt with by the [Tasmanian Health Service]. It is possible that proper reporting and management responses may have prevented Mr Griffin from offending and subsequently being charged with criminal offences, and thus protected vulnerable children and young people.[1461]

Mr Gordon received an email from the Integrity Commission's Chief Executive Officer on 21 November 2019, which read:

> … I consider the best way forward is to refer the matter to Ms Morgan-Wicks, with a request that she take further action. This decision is largely based on my belief that Ms Morgan-Wicks is in a better position to deal with the cultural and workplace issues that envelop your complaint – while we try to work with sensitivity, I do not believe that the commission is the best agency to deal with this matter in the existing circumstances.
>
> In referring the matter, I would expect Ms Morgan-Wicks to make sufficient inquiries to satisfy herself as to whether any act of misconduct has occurred and if so, to ensure that misconduct is dealt with in an appropriate way. It is also an opportunity for her to review any relevant policies and procedures. Ms Morgan-Wicks will advise us of any action she takes and I would be happy to pass that on to you.[1462]

When Counsel Assisting asked Mr Gordon whether he was disappointed by the Integrity Commission's determination not to investigate his complaint, Mr Gordon gave this response:

> I was hoping it would, but I did not expect it to because that submission to the Integrity Commission was highly emotive at the time and it was a lot of hearsay without facts, so I did not expect it to be investigated thoroughly but, like I said, the result I wanted I achieved: Kathrine Morgan-Wicks was aware of it.[1463]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that she did not specifically recall receiving this correspondence from the Integrity Commission.[1464] We consider that it is possible that staff within the Office of the Secretary who received the complaint from the Integrity Commission may not have specifically notified the Secretary, given the volume of correspondence that is transacted through her office.[1465]

On 2 December 2019, the Integrity Commission's letter and report was referred to the then Chief People Officer at the Department with a request that she 'review the appropriate systems and provide advice to the Secretary'.[1466] In line with standard practice, the former Chief People Officer allocated the complaint to Mr Bellinger, as then Human Resources Manager, for investigation.[1467] According to the former Chief People Officer, they did this in consultation with another member of the human resources team. We note that the former Chief People Officer had only been in their role for a few weeks at this time but had previously worked in the Department's human resources area.[1468]

We consider it should have been obvious to the human resources team that allocating the complaint to Mr Bellinger—or indeed to anyone within that team—was inappropriate given their direct involvement in the management of some of the complaints about Mr Griffin (which the complainant took specific issue with). Mr Bellinger had been directly involved in responding to various complaints about Mr Griffin's behaviour over the years and played a central role in the hospital's management of more recent staff concerns about how Mr Griffin's conduct had been managed.

The former Chief People Officer told us they had no reason to believe there was any conflict of interest in Mr Bellinger investigating the complaint forwarded by the Integrity Commission and would have expected either the human resources team or Mr Bellinger to have notified them if there was.[1469] The Secretary echoed the former Chief People Officer's view:

> It's my expectation that when employees receive matters that they are working on, so whether it's an investigation or whether it's a transaction or other matter that they need to work with, that they need to evaluate their own conflicts of interest in relation to handling of matters.[1470]

When Counsel Assisting asked the Secretary whether allocating the complaint to Mr Bellinger in these circumstances was a conflict of interest, she replied: 'I believe so, yes'.[1471] Michael Easton, current Chief Executive Officer, Integrity Commission, similarly acknowledged that there was a potential concern that Mr Bellinger had a conflict of interest and should not have undertaken the investigation.[1472] The Health Complaints Commissioner, Richard Connock, also stated to us that 'it should probably have gone to somewhere other than human resources in this circumstance, yes'.[1473] The Department has since clarified that at the time of the referral the Department was not aware of the scale of the concerns in relation to the hospital's human resources team. However, the Department has acknowledged that, in hindsight, the matter should not have gone to the human resources team at the hospital.[1474]

Mr Easton's evidence also discussed the Integrity Commission's own processes for monitoring complaints. He accepted that in November 2019 the monitoring of complaints that were referred to public authorities was less rigorous than he would have liked it to have been.[1475] However, speaking generally, he held the view that it would be appropriate at times for a public agency to investigate itself where there is an allegation of potential document destruction and cover up within the organisation.[1476]

Counsel Assisting asked Mr Easton about the reasons for referring the matter back to the Department, querying whether community outrage at the circumstances surrounding Mr Griffin's long-time employment in the paediatric ward should have warranted a more independent investigation. Mr Easton explained that enhancing public confidence was a relevant consideration, but community outrage was not. Mr Easton's evidence on this is set out below:

> Q [Counsel Assisting]: What about the need to restore public confidence in the aftermath of a discovery that a paedophile had worked on a paediatric ward at Launceston General Hospital for 18 years? Did that context and the understandable community outrage that followed weigh at all in your decision about whether or not this matter should be referred back to the Department of Health?
>
> A [Mr Easton]: No.
>
> Q: It didn't?
>
> A: No.
>
> Q: But you'd accept that public confidence in independent— I'm not going to phrase it, it's not going to be spot on— but independent scrutiny of allegations of misconduct is one of your objectives under your Act?
>
> A: It is: … 'enhance public confidence, and misconduct by public officers will be appropriately investigated and dealt with'.
>
> Q: And you didn't take that into account? The fact that this in particular might be a matter where the public, in order to have confidence in the system, would have welcomed an independent investigation of Mr Gordon's complaints, you didn't take that consideration into account?
>
> A: No, we do take—where we can enhance public confidence into account all the time. What you were talking about was community outrage; we don't take that into account, but broadly we need to always be conscious of, whatever we are doing, we are enhancing public confidence that is appropriately investigated and dealt with, and 'appropriately' can mean by us or by another agency. That's the key element, and then by doing that we enhance public confidence. We're not responding to community emotion or outrage—not disrespecting that, it's just, that's not a factor, it's how we enhance public confidence that things are appropriately dealt with, is the key thing.[1477]

Mr Easton indicated that a triage team within the Integrity Commission met every three weeks to discuss the monitoring of active referrals.[1478]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that Mr Daniels was not made aware of the Integrity Commission report on the basis that two of the people named in the complaint reported to him.[1479] The fact that most of the executive were implicated in the complaint meant that there was no scrutiny by senior executives (or anyone else, it seems) of the investigation into the complaint, which was ultimately led by human resources staff.

Finding—The Integrity Commission should have ensured Will Gordon's complaint to them was robustly and independently reviewed

Although we accept that there may be instances where it is appropriate to refer a complaint back to a principal officer of a public authority for investigation, this should only occur in circumstances where the referring agency, in this case the Integrity Commission, is satisfied that:

- the public authority tasked with the review has adequate processes in place to ensure complaints are robustly and independently investigated
- the referring agency has adequate processes in place to maintain a close level of oversight and scrutiny over an authority's investigation, to ensure it is robust and independent.

We note that Mr Gordon's complaint to the Integrity Commission did not name human resources staff as subjects of the complaint. However, we consider the Integrity Commission should have been attuned to the risks that could arise in referring the complaint back to the Department, including that it may be investigated by those who had previously been involved with complaints about Mr Griffin's conduct. The Integrity Commission should have set guiding parameters for the Department to avert this, such as specifying that the complaint should not be investigated by those previously connected to the management of complaints involving Mr Griffin.

5.2.28 5 December 2019—Dr Renshaw receives another complaint about Mr Griffin from a staff member

On 5 December 2019, following Dr Renshaw's invitation to staff at the information sessions to share any further concerns related to Mr Griffin with him, a staff member emailed Dr Renshaw about a comment that a patient had made about Mr Griffin.[1480]

The staff member provided the name of the patient but did not nominate a date or timeframe for the comment.

The reporting staff member told Dr Renshaw that the patient said Mr Griffin would often offer to take her home, which she found confusing in the context of him being a nurse. The staff member added:

> Again, this is very much a Jim sort of thing to say about patients and he would often say the same comment to us about disadvantaged children as a kind of hero like gesture … I thought I better mention it to you as it clearly seemed to be confusing to [the patient].[1481]

This information was suggestive of the 'private care arrangement' that Mr Griffin described to Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 31 July 2019 as explanation for a former patient, Penny, staying with him. Dr Renshaw forwarded the staff member's email to Tasmania Police.[1482]

5.2.29 5 December 2019—A panel of hospital staff examine sanitised photos found in Mr Griffin's possession

As outlined above, Dr Renshaw noted in a Minute signed by the Secretary on 5 November 2019 that the Tasmanian Health Service was 'committed to providing open disclosure to the families of any child identified as a victim of Griffin at the LGH'.[1483] In Chapter 6, we discuss a protocol used in South Australian schools where the parents of all children who have had contact with a person charged with a child sex offence are made aware of their child's exposure to that person regardless of whether complaints were raised.

From 5 December 2019, the hospital assisted Tasmania Police to identify the patients who were in the photographs Mr Griffin took at the hospital. Tasmania Police sanitised the images for the purposes of this identification. Tasmania Police believed that the images were taken between 2009 and 2014, although the date that some were taken could not be verified.[1484]

According to Dr Renshaw:

> Approximately 10 photos were received on 5 December 2019 by a small panel … in the presence of Detective Senior Constable [Glenn] Hindle and [another detective sergeant]. The panel was able to identify one victim with certainty and two victims with significant doubt because of the quality of the photograph and the lack of any date references on the pictures.[1485]

This information, provided to us in Dr Renshaw's statement, was at odds with an email he sent to Secretary Morgan-Wicks on 7 August 2020, which makes recommendations to her about four identified patients the hospital should engage in open disclosure.[1486] We note that we have received evidence from Tasmania Police that three children were positively identified and that the panel disputed the identification of one other.[1487] We return to this email in Section 5.2.37. This email also refers to Mr Griffin's care arrangement with Penny.[1488]

5.2.30 12–20 December 2019—The Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation engages with hospital management

On 12 December 2019, Ms Shepherd wrote to Mr Daniels expressing concern about the accuracy of draft minutes prepared by the hospital relating to the 6 November 2019 meeting that she had attended with Mr Daniels, Ms Bryan and Mr Bellinger. In addition to making corrections to the minutes, the letter from Ms Shepherd reflected the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation's ongoing concerns that hospital management was not offering appropriate information and support to staff. The Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation expressed concern about the staff sessions Dr Renshaw facilitated, during which Dr Renshaw blamed staff for not making mandatory reports about Mr Griffin. Ms Shepherd stated in her letter:

> … when staff tried to discuss the ward culture, they felt they were promptly shut down by Dr Renshaw. This has resulted in anger and further dissatisfaction with management, making staff feel that the [Tasmanian Health Service] is not serious about implementing any change as a result of these current events. This has further reduced staff's confidence in senior management for developing a culture of support and to make mandatory reports and a shared attempt for positive reflection.[1489]

Ms Shepherd also raised concerns about failures of the hospital to consistently give feedback to members who had submitted a Safety Reporting and Learning System report, making them feel that submitting a report was 'fruitless'.[1490]

Mr Daniels replied to the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation on 20 December 2019 defending the management response. Mr Bellinger prepared the draft of this letter, which was intended to reflect the outcome of his review of Mr Griffin's complaints that began in November (described in Section 5.2.25).[1491] Mr Daniels told us that his response to the Federation reflected the knowledge he had at the time and that his knowledge was limited because key information about Mr Griffin's complaint history and conduct had not been made available to him.[1492]

On the question of complaints, the response letter noted:

> There has been one (1) SRLS that we could find relevant to Mr Griffin's behaviour. Whilst the person submitting it did not receive feedback the matter was appropriately addressed with Mr Griffin and any feedback that would have been provided to the person submitting it would have been in generic and confidential terms.
> There were a small number of HR files, each of which were appropriately addressed.[1493]

No further information about the 'small number of HR files' was provided in the response letter. Nor was there any mention of the complaints about Mr Griffin recorded in Ms Leonard's file notes and diary entries. Mr Daniels later told us that he was informed that the records reviewed in relation to Mr Griffin 'had not revealed any substantiation for taking any remedial actions, other than a reminder to Mr Griffin from the [Nurse Unit Manager] about ensuring that he continued to be cognisant of maintaining appropriate professional boundaries associated with his role'.[1494] Mr Daniels told us he understood this to be a result of Mr Griffin's social and external sporting activities.[1495]

Mr Daniels' letter referred to the fact that the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation had not provided any additional information from employees about complaints previously lodged that were unaddressed. He also defended Dr Renshaw's behaviour at the staff sessions and the type of support offered by the hospital. The letter read in part: 'I would ask that we now turn our mind to collectively moving forward in a way that rebuilds team values and respect within the Ward'.[1496]

As we have outlined above, we saw no evidence that Mr Daniels took any steps to test or verify the advice he was receiving from human resources staff about Mr Griffin's complaints history.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks said of this period:

> I recall having a general awareness of direct discussions and correspondence that was occurring between the ANMF and the Chief Executive Eric Daniels in relation to Ward 4K staff concerns regarding past complaints handling and their desire for a group debrief/counselling sessions in late 2019, but was assured that these matters were being investigated and managed appropriately at the local level. I was not aware of the true depth of anxiety being expressed by several Ward 4K staff at this time, because if I had I would have directly engaged with the staff to hear their concerns and further test that local management action was appropriate.[1497]

5.2.31 14 December 2019—Mr Gordon has a chance encounter with a journalist

Mr Gordon told us that on 14 December 2019, he had a chance meeting with a journalist at a social function.[1498] He did not name this journalist in his evidence to us. Mr Gordon shared his concerns and frustrations relating to Mr Griffin and Ward 4K with the journalist. The journalist then asked him to draft three questions that the journalist could take to Secretary Morgan-Wicks, which Mr Gordon did. We were not provided with these questions. Mr Gordon told us: 'I was desperate for the public to realise this was happening and for people to take responsibility'.[1499]

Sometime in early 2020, Mr Gordon received a call from an acquaintance who had also spoken to this same journalist. Mr Gordon said of this call:

> She told me that the journalist would not present the questions to the Secretary in order to protect me … As a result of this, I understood that the journalist would not investigate the matter. I felt like the situation was being covered up again.[1500]

5.2.32 3 January 2020—Mr Gordon learns of the outcome of the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation's advocacy

On 3 January 2020, Mr Gordon received an email from a union organiser indicating that Mr Daniels and the Tasmanian Health Service were of the view that all complaints against Mr Griffin had been appropriately addressed.[1501] Mr Gordon stated to us:

> This email made me feel as though the ANMF had been brick-walled. … [It] heavily implied that our requests wouldn't be actioned and that there would not be an investigation unless staff had more evidence. As a result of this, I decided to seek external avenues to pursue this matter.[1502]

5.2.33 30 January 2020–COVID-19 is declared a Public Health Emergency of International Concern

On 30 January 2020, the World Health Organization declared the coronavirus (COVID-19) a Public Health Emergency of International Concern.[1503] On 17 March 2020, the Premier of Tasmania announced that the State would take several public health emergency response measures.[1504] The Director of Public Health in Tasmania made a formal declaration of a public health emergency in relation to COVID-19 on 24 March 2020.[1505]

We acknowledge that the COVID-19 pandemic placed significant strain on the health system worldwide, and the Tasmanian health system. This included the rapid establishment of a number of COVID-19 response teams, including the Incident Management Team, Regional Health Emergency Management Teams, the establishment of the Emergency Coordination and Operations Centres, and responses to COVID-19 outbreaks, particularly in North West Regional Hospital and North West Private Hospital.[1506] We acknowledge that the intensity and pressure on health staff directly involved in responding to the pandemic, maintaining core services and engaging in reviews at this time, was significant.

On 25 March 2020, Secretary Morgan-Wicks appointed experienced Secretary delegate Ross Smith to lead and manage all non-COVID aspects of the Department to enable her to focus on the pandemic as the State Health Commander.[1507] Mr Smith provided non-COVID related support until 10 September 2021, at which time he was transferred to the Department of Justice.[1508]

We acknowledge that this public health emergency required significant attention from everyone working within the health system, including Secretary Morgan-Wicks and staff at Launceston General Hospital. We also acknowledge that the pandemic would have placed significant strain on the Department's resources. We consider the hospital's actions from this period on with this context in mind.

5.2.34 15–19 February 2020—Mr Gordon contacts freelance journalist Camille Bianchi

On 15 February 2020, after Mr Gordon's attempt to have his concerns investigated by a journalist in December 2019 had failed, he contacted Camille Bianchi, who he knew to be a freelance journalist, as a 'last resort'.[1509] Ms Bianchi was Mr Gordon's former housemate.[1510]

Mr Gordon and Ms Bianchi spoke on 19 February 2020, when Ms Bianchi asked Mr Gordon if she could report the story. Mr Gordon agreed she could.[1511] Mr Gordon told Ms Bianchi that he would not give an interview because he wanted to protect himself and his family from any repercussions.[1512] Ms Bianchi went on to produce The Nurse podcast.

Ms Bianchi reflected to us on Mr Gordon's tip-off as follows:

> I got a tip and then what quickly became apparent was that, or at least it seemed so at the time, that the only avenue in which victim-survivors, including Keelie McMahon who was wonderfully courageous … would have the chance to [tell their story], was through media. They wanted to tell their stories because the Griffin matter wouldn't proceed to court because he had died and that stymied all sorts of different processes and so, began, yeah, a good seven, eight, nine months of trying to work out how to tell that story and even if I could.[1513]

Keelie McMahon, who was abused by Mr Griffin, told us why she decided to take part in The Nurse podcast:

> I made the decision to speak to Camille because I wanted to change the way the hospital was dealing with the situation and hold it to account. I was also sick of hearing what a great guy Jim was and thought that telling my story would help other people speak up.[1514]

Mr Gordon's identity as the initial source for the podcast only became known when he gave evidence at our hearings on 27 June 2022. Indeed, Ms Bianchi confirmed that day that The Nurse podcast was, in fact, named after Mr Gordon in honour of him as a whistleblower.[1515]

5.2.35 3 March 2020—Mr Gordon engages a lawyer to write to the then Minister for Health, Sarah Courtney

On 3 March 2020, Mr Gordon engaged a private lawyer to prepare a letter to the then Minister for Health, the Honourable Sarah Courtney MP, on his behalf.[1516] At hearings, Mr Gordon described his thinking at the time:

> You know, this isn't a minor thing to be swept under the rug, this is the sexual abuse of children. At what point do we as healthcare workers, and this includes all levels of management, brush aside our ethics and morals to cover this sort of thing up? That's just frigging, like, despicable, it's deplorable. For the sake of our own reputations, our egos, our money, you know, finances or whatever, it's just—I just couldn't let that happen, so I pushed as far as I could to Sarah Courtney so that she knew this was happening and so that she could not say she did not know about it.[1517]

The letter prepared by Mr Gordon's lawyer, dated 3 March 2020, raised two key points, the first of which is outlined below:

> The first and primary concern which is occasioning significant workplace stress and indeed grief is whether the alleged victims of the perpetrator have been contacted with respect to the matter and whether those persons have been offered counselling and assistance with respect to the alleged historical child sexual abuse. My client tells me that this is of significant concern to professional and other staff within the Launceston General Hospital and a matter which is occasioning significant workplace stress itself.[1518]

The letter also documented ongoing staff requests for proper psychological support and suggested that the ability for staff to speak publicly and openly about the matter may assist.[1519]

Mr Gordon received, via his lawyer, an acknowledgment letter from former Minister Courtney sometime in March 2020 (the letter is not dated).[1520] The letter stated in part:

> I have referred your letter to the Secretary of the Department for urgent attention and advice on appropriate action, and I will write to you again following that further advice.[1521]

This suggests that the letter was forwarded to the Office of the Secretary. We note that Secretary Morgan-Wicks has advised us that between 25 March 2020 and 10 September 2021, all matters requiring the approval of the Secretary that did not relate to COVID-19 were delegated to the Secretary delegate, Ross Smith.[1522]

Minister Courtney sent a final letter to Mr Gordon's lawyer sometime after this (that letter was also not dated).[1523] It explained that the information that could be provided to staff was sometimes limited, where answers were unknown or otherwise restricted by the Tasmania Police investigation.[1524] In relation to the treatment of staff complaints about Mr Griffin, Minister Courtney stated:

> The THS has and is addressing concerns arising from this process. I am aware that staff have raised concerns that their previous issues with respect to the individual employee were not addressed. The Department has reviewed the management records available about the individual and repeatedly requested specific information from the concerned employees; all the issues on record that were raised by staff were appropriately addressed at the time.[1525]

The letter goes on to explain that open disclosure processes would be available to any affected patients, when permitted by Tasmania Police.[1526] The letter listed the supports that had been offered by the hospital, including the Employment Assistance Program, the engagement of the counsellor, training sessions on trauma and grief, training sessions relating to sex offences and related behaviour and several in-service sessions with Dr Renshaw and human resources staff.[1527] The letter from Minister Courtney ended:

> I note you suggest that the staff may be encouraged to raise the matter publicly to address some of the psychological impacts of the alleged abuse. I am advised that the THS does not support raising this publicly as it would be unlikely to positively address the psychological impact, and, to the contrary, may very well cause unnecessary distress to the employees and clients.[1528]

Mr Gordon reflected in his statement to us: 'At this point I knew that the THS were not going to release this information publicly and therefore the media was the only avenue to inform the public of what occurred'.[1529]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us in a statement that she did not recall 'discussing or communicating with the then Minister for Health, regarding Mr Griffin prior to 14 October 2020'.[1530] We consider Minister Courtney did refer this correspondence to the Office of the Secretary for advice but as all non-COVID-19 matters were delegated to Mr Smith, we accept that Secretary Morgan-Wicks was not personally aware of it.

5.2.36 April–August 2020—The Integrity Commission complaint is followed up

On or about 15 April 2020, the Office of the Secretary followed up with the Department's human resources team about a response to the Integrity Commission complaint.[1531] It seems no response was provided.

On 29 July 2020, the Office of the Secretary received further correspondence from the Integrity Commission requesting an update on enquiries into the matter.[1532] The Office again followed up with the Department's human resources team on 11 August 2020 and on 18 August 2020.[1533] On 20 August 2020, the Office of the Secretary received a draft response to the Integrity Commission, which the Director of the Office of the Secretary reviewed in consultation with the Chief People Officer.[1534]

Mr Bellinger prepared the draft response. He gave evidence that on receiving the complaint from the Chief People Officer he understood his tasks to be preparing a reply, reviewing the allegations and briefing the Chief People Officer on the issue.[1535] Mr Bellinger's draft response stated that complaints that were known to the Tasmanian Health Service about Mr Griffin had 'been investigated and addressed with Mr Griffin' and that the Tasmanian Health Service had 'reviewed all available records and determined that all matters that were raised with the Agency were addressed in a manner that was reasonable in the circumstances that existed at that time'.[1536]

When Counsel Assisting questioned Mr Bellinger about what steps he took to examine the issues raised in the complaint forwarded by the Integrity Commission, Mr Bellinger confirmed that he did not undertake a fresh investigation into the allegations because he understood a review had already occurred through his previous enquiries.[1537] This appeared to be a reference to his own November 2019 review in which he found that previous complaints had been handled appropriately.[1538] At the hearings, Mr Bellinger agreed that his review of the Integrity Commission complaint was a 'desktop review' and did not involve fresh consideration of any complaints or concerns.[1539]

When Counsel Assisting asked Secretary Morgan-Wicks about the level of investigation required to respond to a complaint of misconduct, she replied that it was her expectation that a 'thorough review' would be undertaken, so she could respond 'accurately and truthfully to the Integrity Commission'.[1540]

Mr Easton from the Integrity Commission described Mr Bellinger's desktop review approach as being insufficient, noting:

> It comes back to our expectation, I guess, which is that the matter be investigated and action taken but, as I said earlier, it doesn't necessarily mean everything is investigated but a desktop review is surely not sufficient.[1541]

5.2.37 17 August 2020—Dr Renshaw provides the Secretary with recommendations relating to open disclosure

In the Minute she received on 5 November 2019, Secretary Morgan-Wicks requested further information, when it was appropriate, about the identities of any patients in the images held by Mr Griffin, so she could approve an open disclosure process.[1542]

As noted above, on 5 December 2019, a small panel of Launceston General Hospital staff viewed sanitised photographs in an effort to assist Tasmania Police to identify some of the people in the photographs taken at the hospital.[1543] In one part of his statement to us, Dr Renshaw indicated that three individuals 'could clearly be identified from the photos'.[1544] However, in another part of the same statement he says one individual was identified 'with certainty' and two individuals 'with significant doubt' due to the quality of the photographs and a lack of date references.[1545]

On 17 August 2020, Dr Renshaw sent an email to Secretary Morgan-Wicks and the Director of the Office of the Secretary with the identities of four patients and associated recommendations for how an open disclosure should proceed.[1546] He noted that there was another patient who appeared to have been a 'one-time' admission, but staff could not recall their name and their identity could not be established.[1547]

Open disclosure was recommended for two patients with their parents.[1548] In relation to one patient, who was an adult by that time, Dr Renshaw's email noted:

> Pictures were hard to identify and were clearly made without this patient's awareness; my own impulse is not to offer open disclosure to [the patient] as it may cause anxiety/distress from matters completely outside [their] knowledge. However, if the decision is to provide open disclosure, this would only require open disclosure to the patient.[1549]

This email also referred to Penny and Mr Griffin's care arrangement with her.[1550] It was clear from that correspondence that Dr Renshaw was still at pains to distance the hospital from Mr Griffin's care of Penny, despite her status as a former patient.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks replied to the email asking whether Dr Renshaw had spoken to any of the patients or parents, noting that Mr Daniels had suggested Dr Renshaw may have spoken to one.[1551] We do not have Dr Renshaw's response to this email, or Secretary Morgan-Wicks' decision in relation to Dr Renshaw's recommendations.

Dr Renshaw told us in his statement that open disclosure occurred with one family, on 28 October 2020, which is described in Section 5.2.47. At one point of his statement, he wrote: 'Two other individuals, who at the time of contact were adults or had already provided evidence to Police regarding Griffin, declined open disclosure'.[1552] At another point of his statement, he told us:

> The family of the identified victim was contacted through the Department of Paediatrics and accepted the offer of open disclosure … The remaining two 'possibles' (who were both aged over 18) declined open disclosure.[1553]

5.2.38 10 September 2020—The Secretary responds to the Integrity Commission about its investigation of the complaint

Secretary Morgan-Wicks reviewed Mr Bellinger's draft response to the Integrity Commission and approved it on 10 September 2020, without amendment.[1554] We note that numerous senior officials reviewed and cleared the draft response prior to the Secretary receiving it.[1555] We reference the most pertinent sections below.

The written response provided the following assurances to the Integrity Commission:

> I assure you that we have considered the matters in a timely manner, as they have been raised in a number of forums since the death of Mr Griffin, including a police investigation and … also a coronial investigation which has only recently concluded.
>
>
> The complainant's concern that past complaints relating to Mr Griffin had been raised but not addressed by the Agency has previously been discussed with, and reviewed by, the Tasmanian Health Service (THS) on a number of occasions.[1556]

The reference to reviewing past complaints 'on a number of occasions' appeared to be a reference to Mr Bellinger's sole review in November 2019. The response goes on to say:

> As reflected in [Mr Daniels'] correspondence to the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (ANMF) (Attachment I) 20 December 2019, several matters have previously been raised with the THS and those have been addressed.[1557]

We note that no details of complaints were provided to the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation in the letter dated 20 December 2019, which referred to a 'small number of HR files'.

The response to the Integrity Commission identified eight different concerns raised about Mr Griffin over 14 years, which were described as follows:

- 2005: The former Clinical Nurse Consultant of Ward 4K addressed with Mr Griffin his act of kissing a patient on the forehead whilst redirecting them back to their inpatient bed. A copy of the Agency's available records is provided.

- 2008–2009: A series of undated/unsigned notes that are believed to be Ms Leonard's. The relevant contents relate to Mr Griffin providing his phone number to patients and professional boundary issues.
- January 2009: Concerns were raised by a Psychiatric Registrar with respect to Mr Griffin not complying with the pre-determined care plan and providing his personal contact details to the patient. Further file notes of [a Ward 4K staff member] and Mr Sherring are provided and a draft of the proposed correspondence to Mr Griffin. The final correspondence has not been located in the records.
- March 2009: Record of Ms Leonard's meeting with Mr Griffin with respect to a further boundary issue, that being his intent to 'give away' a former patient at her wedding. Mr Griffin ultimately determined with his manager's counsel not to do so.
- April 2013: Mr Griffin was asked not to tend to a patient as a result of 'family issues'.
- March 2017: Provides a record of a meeting between Mr Griffin and his Nurse Unit Manager on 6 March 2017 with respect to a patient who expressed feeling uncomfortable in Mr Griffin's presence.
- An event was lodged in the Safety Reporting & Learning System on 29 August 2017 as referenced in the complaint provided to the Integrity Commission. The matter was provided to Mr Griffin for his reply, his written response was considered, and a decision reached. Mr Griffin was reminded to maintain appropriate relationships with patients and families. It is acknowledged that the complainant should have received a more informed outcome.
- August 2019: [A nurse] raised a concern with respect to Mr Griffin's conduct in July 2018. At this time Mr Griffin was already the subject to other investigations, and the matter was referred to Tasmania Police. Given Mr Griffin's passing, the matter was not put to him by the [Tasmanian Health Service].[1558]

Launceston General Hospital also supplied its records related to these complaints to the Integrity Commission but not an actual review or explanation of its assessments.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks stated in the letter:

> In summary, the Agency has over the course of 14 years had several complaints pertaining to Mr Griffin that can be broadly characterised as professional boundary issues. Each matter that the THS was made aware of has been investigated and addressed with Mr Griffin.[1559]

She also noted in the letter that there were some incomplete records but that there had been 'no information indicating that evidence has been destroyed and the records reflect that there are several issues on file that have been addressed'.[1560] We are unclear how a desktop review could lead to this conclusion.

The letter concluded:

> The THS has reviewed all available records and determined that all of the matters that were raised at the agency were addressed in a manner that was reasonable in the circumstances that existed at the time. The decisions made over the past 15 years were without the benefit of the information that now exists as a result of the Police investigation and the management actions cannot be judged with that in mind.
>
> Further, the THS has repeatedly sought to particularise and identify any complaints that the employees contend were previously raised and not addressed. No such complaints have been identified.[1561]

The letter named Mr Bellinger as having carriage of the investigation in response to the complaint received by the Integrity Commission.[1562]

The list of complaints in the response, although extensive, does not cover all the complaints about Mr Griffin that were known to or discoverable by the hospital. Omitted complaints included:

- a 2002 concern about Mr Griffin hugging patients and engaging in non-care related touching (this was referenced in a file note by Mr Sherring, retrospectively, in 2009)
- a complaint on 5 July 2004 relating, again, to Mr Griffin hugging a patient (we consider this omission curious, given that Mr Bellinger's response to Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 11 October 2019 noted 'a small number of HR files dating back to 2004', which suggests Mr Bellinger's awareness of this complaint)[1563]
- Mr Griffin being counselled for including a former patient in an inappropriate 'email forward' on 8 May 2009, although we note that this may be captured in the reference to Ms Leonard's unsigned and undated notes from 2008–09
- a concern reported to Ms Leonard about Mr Griffin being a 'sleaze' and suggesting he was a risk to children, in November 2012
- concerns reported by a nurse about Mr Griffin's behaviour with teenage girls in November 2015
- a complaint from a student on placement about Mr Griffin's use of pet names and unprofessional behaviour in May 2017
- the complaint reported on 18 July 2019 about Mr Griffin's inappropriate conversations with a patient and their father about medications and his encouragement that a colleague nurse 'taste' a controlled medication before giving it to a patient.

More information about each of these complaints is in Section 4.

Most significantly, the letter to the Integrity Commission does not include Ms Pearn's disclosure to human resources staff in 2011 or 2012, which Mr Bellinger was reminded of on 11 October 2019.

Finding—James Bellinger did not conduct a proper investigation into James Griffin's complaints history and misled the Secretary of the Department and the Integrity Commission

As we have outlined above, Mr Bellinger appeared to undertake a cursory 'review' of complaints relating to Mr Griffin in November 2019. Mr Bellinger's reference to his various 'reviews' was confusing, but what is clear to us is that there was no meaningful review at any stage. Mr Bellinger told us that his November 2019 review was limited to complaints that were addressed with Mr Griffin, which resulted in Ms Pearn's disclosure in 2011 or 2012 being excluded. Further, this review does not appear to have been recorded and was not communicated to anyone else other than through verbal assurances that responses were appropriate. His subsequent reviews in response to the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation's concerns and the Integrity Commission relied on this inadequate review.

Deficiencies in Mr Bellinger's 'review' conducted in response to the Integrity Commission referral included the following:

It was inappropriate for Mr Bellinger and other hospital human resources staff to undertake the review. Mr Bellinger had a direct conflict of interest in the matter, given that he and other human resources staff were involved in managing complaints about Mr Griffin. An investigation should have ideally been undertaken by a person entirely independent of the hospital, but most certainly not by its own human resources team.

- The response omitted important information and complaints about Mr Griffin. Why some complaints were omitted and not others is unclear to us and we can find no logic in their selection.
- One omission was particularly concerning, namely the disclosure by Ms Pearn in 2011 or 2012. We consider it likely that this was omitted either because it would jeopardise the reputation of the hospital or because it would reflect badly on Mr Bellinger and/or the human resources team or possibly both.
- Of the listed complaints, there was inadequate context to convey their seriousness. For example, the description of the January 2009 complaint from the Senior Psychiatric Registrar was limited to not following a care plan and providing contact details to a patient, when in fact the Senior Psychiatric Registrar was so concerned by Mr Griffin's behaviour (noting it was not his first such observation) that he recommended Mr Griffin seek psychological help. This incident also involved Mr Griffin cuddling the same patient.

- This review does not appear to have been documented, aside from listing complaints and records relating to complaints in the letter to the Integrity Commission. A review or investigation of this nature and significance should have been the subject of a comprehensive written report or briefing that outlined all the relevant facts and appended all associated documentation to explain the reasoning behind the conclusion that matters were handled appropriately (at the time or otherwise). It should have been checked by independent parties on its journey up the line to the Secretary. This way, each person reading it could assess its methodology, including its accuracy, quality and thoroughness, as well as ask questions and escalate any concerns arising from it.
- Noting the complaint referenced possible document destruction and failures to respond to complaints, simply reviewing records of complaints put to Mr Griffin was clearly inadequate. The review should have included interviews with Ward 4K staff to investigate whether there were complaints of which they were aware that had not been responded to, or for which records were now missing or altered.

We are unclear what, if any, scrutiny Mr Bellinger's superiors in the human resources team applied to this review, noting they recalled only seeing the final letter to the Integrity Commission. We are of the view that Mr Bellinger was not closely supported or supervised by senior managers in the task of responding to the Integrity Commission, which demonstrated an absence of concern by senior leaders about the seriousness of the complaint. This lack of scrutiny enabled the response prepared by Mr Bellinger to the Integrity Commission to contain inaccurate and misleading information.

There was no evidence of an investigation beyond a 'desktop review'. Given reported limitations in finding certain records and information, evidence should have been sought directly from key staff. We note that human resources staff requested Ms Leonard's records (although their contents do not appear to have been reflected in their entirety), but further steps should have been taken, such as interviewing or seeking statutory declarations from staff, to supplement the records that were available. We accept that Mr Daniels (via the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation) and Dr Renshaw (at staff sessions) did ask staff to share any information about unaddressed complaints. We also accept that by this stage staff may not have trusted management or perceived that they could not prove their prior complaints.

In a statement to us, Secretary Morgan-Wicks said that before hearing Mr Bellinger's evidence at our Commission of Inquiry she was not aware that he had been informed, in October 2019, of the complaint that Ms Pearn made about Mr Griffin.[1564] Secretary Morgan-Wicks said that had she been made aware of Ms Pearn's disclosure, she would have immediately started an internal investigation, rather than waiting until October 2020.[1565] She agreed that Mr Bellinger's draft response was misleading to both her and to the Integrity Commission.[1566]

5.2.39 16 September 2020—The Integrity Commission acknowledges the Secretary's letter

On 16 September 2020, the then recently appointed Chief Executive Officer of the Integrity Commission, Mr Easton, replied to Secretary Morgan-Wicks' letter, noting the 'comprehensive information provided' and the outcome of the Department's investigation. Mr Easton's letter stated:

> The information you have provided confirms the ongoing reports of James Griffin's conduct as described in the original complaint, and describes the management actions taken at the time. While it is now difficult to gauge the appropriateness of individual responses, it is clear that a pattern of behaviour was emerging, the end product of which was allegedly serious misconduct and criminal behaviour by Mr Griffin.[1567]
> Our original assessment identified the possibility that some staff stopped making reports about Mr Griffin given a perceived failure of management to respond to earlier reports and a fear of losing their jobs if they spoke out. Mr Griffin's apparent presence and personality also contributed to this reluctance to report.[1568]

The letter also identified the 'need to ensure new or rotating managers have accessibility to prior management actions and responses' to ensure 'continuity in the response and identifying patterns of behaviour across time'.[1569]

When Counsel Assisting asked Mr Easton about specific follow-up the Integrity Commission had pursued to ensure the Department was taking appropriate steps to address these issues, he referenced the Integrity Commission providing general education and training to State Service officials about misconduct. He added that Department employees had attended in greater numbers than any other agency.[1570]

Mr Easton conceded that, apart from providing training, 'we haven't undertaken active follow-up on that particular issue with that particular department'.[1571] He described the monitoring process for complaints in November 2019 (at a time when he was not the Chief Executive Officer) as 'less rigorous than they are now'.[1572] He said:

> My predecessor was not as active or desirous of us to be as active in following things up with agencies; it doesn't mean that he didn't think we should, it's just that I've come into the chair and I really think we should, it's a big part of our reason for > being, is to build our capacity of agencies to deal with misconduct, it's there in the objectives of the Act, and how else are we to do that without understanding what their weak points are and how they are dealing with misconduct?[1573]

Mr Easton explained that the Integrity Commission now has additional resources for monitoring compliance and was 'trying to build some proactive measures' into these processes.[1574] He told us that once a matter is referred to an agency for response, it moves from the Integrity Commission's complaints stream into its compliance stream.[1575] We heard that the Integrity Commission makes contact with a person at the relevant agency 'within three to four weeks after' a matter is referred to them for a response to ensure they have received the referral and are actioning it, in addition to checking whether the Integrity Commission can assist.[1576]

We further heard that the Integrity Commission generally gives an agency 'about six months' to respond, and then a compliance team, led by the Director of Operations and a senior investigator, follow up the matter.[1577] When a response is received from an agency it goes into a 'compliance triage' run by the senior investigator, who determines, according to criteria, whether the Integrity Commission needs to provide more time or assistance to the agency to respond, or whether the Integrity Commission should manage the response themselves.[1578]

Finding—The Integrity Commission's monitoring of the Department's response to Will Gordon's complaint was insufficient and it should have sought further review

Mr Gordon's complaint, which raised serious concerns about potential misconduct, should have been investigated by the Integrity Commission itself or been subjected to more rigorous and active monitoring by the Integrity Commission. Once the Integrity Commission referred Mr Gordon's complaint to the Department on 21 November 2019, there was no further follow-up until 29 July 2020.

We are pleased to note that the Integrity Commission is now more focused on monitoring compliance, but this does not satisfy the concerns we hold about the Integrity Commission's acceptance of the response letter provided by Secretary Morgan-Wicks on 10 September 2020. The response letter revealed systemic problems with the Department's complaints processes, not least because of the sheer number of complaints it outlined in relation to Mr Griffin, but also the letter's assurance (despite the hindsight knowledge of the serious misconduct and criminal behaviour of Mr Griffin) that they had each been dealt with appropriately. The Department's response demonstrated no reflection on systemic errors or the potential improvements that could be made in its responses. The Integrity Commission identified these systemic problems in its response, but they were not referred to the Health Complaints Commissioner, nor did the Integrity Commission seek any formal reassurances from the Department that they had been actively addressed. Without adequate redress, children remained vulnerable to the same errors occurring again.

Mr Easton described his reaction to the response letter as follows:

> I actually thought it was comprehensive, but I also just had a visceral reaction to, 'I can't believe nobody has picked up that there's been an issue with this person'. That's my fundamental concern with the response, was that, how can there be this many reports—and I believe there's more since what's in this letter—how can somebody not have picked this up? That's what worries me.[1579]

Given the nature of the complaint, we consider that the Integrity Commission should not have concluded that the matter had been resolved, particularly given Mr Easton's own reaction to its contents.

5.2.40 13 October 2020—The first episode of The Nurse podcast is released

The first episode of Camille Bianchi's podcast, The Nurse, was released on 13 October 2020. The first episode was titled 'Just Jim'. As of May 2022, this episode had been downloaded more than 1.3 million times.[1580]

The podcast initially provided an avenue for victim-survivors of Mr Griffin's abuse to share their experiences. However, it expanded over time as Ms Bianchi received information from more victim-survivors and about incidents involving other abusers, government departments and institutions. The podcast led to more media reports about Mr Griffin and other abuses at Launceston General Hospital, including those we describe in Case study 2, relating to Dr Tim (a pseudonym).[1581]

Recognising the significant attention that The Nurse podcast drew to child sexual abuse in institutions (and how this may have impacted on those affected by such abuses), Mr Gordon wrote in a statement to us:

> I want to make it known I am sorry for any hurt or trauma or collateral damage I may have unknowingly inflicted to victims of abuse by fighting for this event to be released to the public, and in my quest to obtain a Commission of Inquiry. I honestly meant no harm.[1582]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us at a hearing that she was alarmed to learn, through the podcast, about the extent of Mr Griffin's behaviour and that the hospital had, at various times, questioned him about these behaviours. We note she was aware of at least the eight complaints listed in her response to the Integrity Commission.[1583] Senior executives at the hospital, Ms Bryan and Dr Renshaw, also told us that the podcast exposed them to new information about Mr Griffin's conduct.[1584]

The podcast made reference to what we presume was Ms Pearn's disclosure, as follows:

> Shockingly, in 2010 a survivor of Jim's abuse told the hospital's HR department something was badly wrong. She told them in a formal meeting he had molested her as a child. She told them to protect the children then in his care. She told them 9 years before he was charged and finally taken off the ward.[1585]

We are not clear how Ms Bianchi learned of this disclosure because Ms Pearn was not the source. However, Ms Pearn, recognising that the podcast was gaining widespread media attention, contacted Dr Renshaw to inform him of the disclosure she had made to the hospital.[1586] Dr Renshaw was already aware of Ms Pearn's disclosure at this point, having been advised by Tasmania Police about it a year earlier, on 29 October 2019. Ms Pearn described a brief phone conversation with Dr Renshaw. She told us that Dr Renshaw was 'very dismissive' in his response to her informing him of her disclosure and that she felt 'fobbed off'.[1587] Dr Renshaw told us in hearings that he did not remember this phone call but did not dispute it occurred.[1588]

5.2.41 14 October 2020—The Secretary recommends an immediate review to the Minister for Health

The day after the first episode of The Nurse podcast aired, Secretary Morgan-Wicks contacted Minister Courtney, recommending that she initiate an immediate review into 'internal and external conduct reporting mechanisms and the THS [Tasmanian Health Service] complaints handling process relating to unprofessional conduct and sexual misconduct'.[1589]

Minister Courtney responded in writing on 14 October 2020. She asked Secretary Morgan-Wicks to examine and provide advice on a range of issues, past and current, which we quote directly:

a. the current internal reporting mechanisms of the Tasmanian Health Service and the compliance of these mechanisms with Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency standards and mandatory reporting obligations under relevant Tasmanian legislation

b. the appropriateness and effectiveness of Tasmanian Health Service complaints handling processes relating to unprofessional conduct and sexual misconduct

c. the effectiveness of interaction between Working with Vulnerable People systems and the Tasmanian Health Service

d. the degree of compliance with the Tasmanian Health Service complaints handling processes

e. the appropriateness of mechanisms to ascertain and act upon systemic behaviour of an employee

f. any further action required by the Tasmanian Health Service to improve the culture, policies and processes relating to these issues.[1590]

Minister Courtney also requested that Secretary Morgan-Wicks consider the management of any complaints and concerns relating to Mr Griffin, including whether any further action or review needed to be undertaken.[1591] Minister Courtney further requested that a 'centralised mechanism be established for current and former staff and patients to come forward and provide information to assist in the examination of the matter'.[1592]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks confirmed that the Department would lead an examination to respond to the issues raised by Minister Courtney. Secretary Morgan-Wicks then set up a review team to start this work.[1593] Secretary Morgan-Wicks wrote to all staff at the Department to inform them of the internal examination.[1594]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks also set up a public disclosure email address for staff and another for public enquiries, along with a dedicated phone line to triage complaints or submissions and advise on available support services.[1595]

5.2.42 15 October 2020—The Secretary attends a meeting with Ward 4K staff

On 15 October 2020, Secretary Morgan-Wicks sat in on the end of a meeting with Ward 4K staff at the hospital, which was facilitated by the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation. We received no evidence that any members of the hospital executive attended this meeting. Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us:

> I recall feeling confronted by the depth of feeling and anxiety in the room and the sense of distrust that anything different was going to happen if information was reported. I explained the nature of a protected disclosure and that the review of the information would be entirely separate from the Ward and from LGH and conducted by an experienced and senior team in the South.[1596]

We can understand why staff would have been wary and sceptical, given the way their concerns had been managed in the past.

Mr Gordon recalled Secretary Morgan-Wicks' attendance:

> I challenged Kathrine Morgan-Wicks that she must have known about the issues on the ward and that it should not have come to nurses becoming whistleblowers in order to get the story out to the public. I also said that the hospital should have and still should take responsibility for their abysmal handling of the situation and asked what changes will be made. Kathrine did not answer questions, instead saying words to the effect of 'if I knew about the situation, something would have been followed up on'. This is despite the response I received from the Integrity Commission and the Minister's letter to my lawyer which stated that she had referred my letter to Kathrine Morgan-Wicks.[1597]

As we noted above, Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that between 25 March 2020 and 10 September 2021, all matters that were not related to COVID-19 were delegated to Secretary delegate Ross Smith.[1598]

Pressure began to mount for a Commission of Inquiry. As Ms Shepherd of the Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation stated to us:

> Unfortunately, due to the fact that a report to the Integrity Commission was already known about by the Secretary of the Department of Health and the Minister for Health was also aware of members' concerns, members did not have trust in any internal, departmental or Government led investigation, which is why they, along with the ANMF, called for a Commission of Inquiry.[1599]

As we discuss in other chapters of this report, these calls coincided with concerns about civil and redress claims related to child sexual abuse in schools and youth detention.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks attended several more meetings with ward staff in the coming days and weeks. Dr Renshaw and nursing management also attended some of these meetings. Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that over the course of these meetings it became apparent to her that:

> Ward 4K staff remained traumatised by the death and alleged criminal conduct of Mr Griffin of which they had no awareness, and felt that they had been 'silenced by Management' unable to grieve or openly discuss the matter and that the issue therefore had continued to fester for over a year, causing significant workplace disharmony.[1600]

5.2.43 15–21 October 2020—The hospital hears concerns from patients' families

On 15 October 2020, likely as a result of The Nurse podcast, the Director of Improvement, Quality and Patient Safety Service, North and North West at Launceston Hospital informed Dr Renshaw that the hospital feedback line had received four phone calls and an email from concerned families.[1601]

The Director of Improvement sought guidance from Dr Renshaw about how to handle the matter. Mr Daniels was copied into this email. The Director asked Dr Renshaw: 'Can we please have some direction regarding our responses from a complaints perspective and what direction we should be giving potential new victims in regards to contacting police'.[1602] She also sought guidance on whether a public statement would be required.[1603] It is notable to us that even at this stage, Dr Renshaw was seen as the key contact in relation to matters concerning Mr Griffin.

Dr Renshaw responded to this request for advice on 22 October 2020, the same day that an independent review was announced, which we discuss in more detail below. In his response, Dr Renshaw provided the following instructions:

- All patients or community members were to contact the dedicated public enquiries email, which was established on 22 October 2020.
- Staff were to contact the dedicated staff email address.

- The contact details of support services listed on Minister Courtney's media release—1800 RESPECT, Laurel House, Lifeline, the Sexual Assault Support Service and Relationships Australia—should be provided to concerned families.[1604]

Dr Renshaw added that 'there will be the occasional person who may insist on dealing with us directly' and that this should be assessed on a case-by-case basis.[1605] He also asked that a particular family, who were due to be contacted as part of an open disclosure process, be put through to him immediately, should they call.[1606]

We also received evidence that on 21 October 2020, the hospital's response to an in-person contact from a distressed person concerning comments made by her daughter about Mr Griffin was to provide an email address and a consumer feedback form for them to lodge a complaint, notwithstanding the person had clearly requested to speak with someone.[1607] This person was advised to send an email outlining their concern and that they were seeking to speak to someone or receive counselling about the matter.[1608] They were further advised to include this information in the feedback form, which would be received by Dr Renshaw, who was 'managing all enquiries regarding the matter to see what the hospital could assist with'.[1609]

5.2.44 16 October 2020—The Department is advised that the police investigation into Mr Griffin had been closed and Dr Renshaw seeks advice from the Secretary on responding to queries and disclosures

On 16 October 2020, a detective with Tasmania Police emailed Dr Renshaw advising him that the police investigation into Mr Griffin had been formally closed.[1610]

The detective noted that due to media coverage associated with The Nurse podcast, police had received 'a number of enquiries regarding complaints against Griffin at the hospital'. The detective queried whether there was a central point of contact at the hospital to which these queries could be directed.[1611] Dr Renshaw immediately forwarded this email to Secretary Morgan-Wicks, the Director of the Office of the Secretary, Mr Daniels and the Director of Improvement, Quality and Patient Safety Service, North and North West.[1612]

The same day, Dr Renshaw emailed Secretary Morgan-Wicks, copying in Mr Daniels, advising her of Tasmania Police's decision to close the investigation into Mr Griffin.[1613] Dr Renshaw also wrote in this email that following the release of the podcast, the hospital had received calls from concerned patients and their families, as well as former staff, with information about Mr Griffin's conduct.[1614] Dr Renshaw's email read in part:

> While most of the feedback constitutes a desire to simply communicate individual experiences with Mr Griffin, there have been at least two where specific allegations are made about incidents on Ward 4K that are either recollected after a period of time or were allegedly reported to hospital staff at the time but for which we can find no record of complaint. I have also had a call from a former staff member …

> who had had significant concerns from her knowledge of Mr Griffin outside the hospital and who reported the matter to her Manager at the time. The Manager took the matter seriously and pursued the matter through HR. There was no documented outcome of this concern.[1615]

As outlined above, the call Dr Renshaw received from a former staff member was the call from Ms Pearn. To our knowledge, this email was the first time that Mr Daniels and Secretary Morgan-Wicks were notified of Ms Pearn's disclosure, albeit in general terms. Mr Daniels told us that he was not aware of the disclosure by Ms Pearn until he gave evidence during our hearings.[1616] Dr Renshaw does not reveal in the email that he was aware of Ms Pearn's disclosure a year earlier, on 29 October 2019, when advised by Tasmania Police.

In the email, Dr Renshaw asked Secretary Morgan-Wicks for an urgent discussion about 'our strategy to address the concerns that will continue to arrive as the podcast continues over the next few weeks'.[1617] The Director of the Office of the Secretary responded by email on behalf of the Secretary, noting that they had attempted to call Dr Renshaw. The Director of the Office of the Secretary provided Dr Renshaw with the relevant email addresses for queries, told him that a central contact point was being established and that advice would be provided in due course.[1618] The Director of the Office of the Secretary stated in their email to Dr Renshaw that allegations of criminal conduct should be directed to Tasmania Police.[1619] They also flagged a desire to speak with Dr Renshaw about the forthcoming open disclosure process. We do not know whether that call took place and, if it did, what was discussed.[1620]

Shortly after, Mr Daniels forwarded an email chain, which included Dr Renshaw's original recommendations relating to open disclosure, to Ms Bryan, Mr Bellinger and the Director of Improvement.

Misconduct finding—Dr Peter Renshaw misled our Commission of Inquiry about his state of knowledge

Throughout Section 5, we have shown that Dr Renshaw withheld important information, particularly in briefings to the Chief Executive and the Secretary, that significantly and adversely affected their ability to make the best possible decisions to address Mr Griffin's conduct and its implications for staff, patients, the hospital and the broader community. That Dr Renshaw's briefings were factually inaccurate also hampered our Inquiry. We relied on accurate documentation and truthful statements to inform and shape our Inquiry, particularly in the lead up to our hearings. Dr Renshaw did not provide this when it was within his power to do so.

There were many instances during our Inquiry where witnesses forgot certain events or were confused by questions. We accept that giving oral evidence, in particular, is daunting and it can be easy to misspeak. We note this here to make explicit our inclination to give witnesses the benefit of the doubt.

We consider that Dr Renshaw falls into a different category. We consider that in view of the totality of his evidence, the evidence of others and relevant documents provided by other agencies, that Dr Renshaw actively sought to mislead our Commission of Inquiry. We describe how he misled us below.

Dr Renshaw misled us about the extent of his knowledge regarding Penny

Through our hearings, we established that Dr Renshaw had knowledge that Penny was a former patient who had been under the care of Mr Griffin. Tasmania Police was concerned about Penny because Mr Griffin was spending time with her outside the hospital setting. Dr Renshaw learned this from Detective Senior Constable Hindle on 31 July 2019, which is evidenced by Ahpra file notes discussing Dr Renshaw's notification of Mr Griffin to Ahpra the following day.

Dr Renshaw did not convey any information to the hospital executive or the Secretary that suggested his awareness, or the full extent of his awareness, of the above information. His advice to the Secretary on 17 August 2020 acknowledged that Tasmania Police was aware of Penny but does not clarify that this concern was known to him (and hence the hospital) as far back as 31 July 2019.

Dr Renshaw did not alert us to Penny in his statement at all, whether directly or indirectly. When we asked whether he knew of Mr Griffin 'having contact with paediatric patients after hours or when off-duty', Dr Renshaw responded: 'I became aware of this allegation from "The Nurse" podcast'.[1621] When we asked whether he knew of Mr Griffin having 'ongoing contact with paediatric patients after they were discharged from hospital', Dr Renshaw again responded: 'I became aware of this allegation from "The Nurse" podcast'.[1622]

These responses were clearly untrue.

Dr Renshaw misled us about the extent of his knowledge regarding Ms Pearn's disclosure

We have made earlier findings regarding Dr Renshaw's failure to escalate his knowledge of Ms Pearn's disclosure to the hospital.

Through our hearings, we established that Dr Renshaw held the following knowledge about Ms Pearn's disclosure:

- On his return from leave, sometime after 18 October 2019, Dr Renshaw heard a 'corridor rumour' about a former staff member reporting their own child sexual abuse by Mr Griffin to their manager and human resources sometime before.
- Tasmania Police confirmed Ms Pearn's disclosure to Dr Renshaw on 29 October 2019.
- Ms Pearn called Dr Renshaw sometime after the release of The Nurse podcast about her disclosure, which was reflected in Dr Renshaw's email to the Secretary on 16 October 2020.[1623]

There is no reference to Ms Pearn, or any information that resembles Ms Pearn's circumstances, in Dr Renshaw's statement to us. In our request for statement, we asked Dr Renshaw: 'Did anyone raise a concern about Mr Griffin with you (either formally and informally). If yes, please detail in respect of each concern'. Dr Renshaw listed some matters, which we have reflected earlier in this case study, but made no mention of Ms Pearn's phone call to him.

While we accept that Dr Renshaw may have been receiving many contacts at the time that Ms Pearn called him, we consider that Ms Pearn's call would have stood out to him, given its significance and his prior knowledge from Tasmania Police about her complaint. We consider that Dr Renshaw recognised the significance of Ms Pearn's disclosure to such an extent that he advised the Secretary about it, although without naming her. We do not accept that information he received about Ms Pearn was information that he would have forgotten. His failure to include this information in his statement to us was deliberately misleading.

As we have flagged elsewhere, we found Dr Renshaw to be an unhelpful witness. He was defensive and pedantic. Each of the concessions he made, once confronted by the evidence, had to be extracted from him during hearings. We consider that Dr Renshaw failed to accept responsibility for his failures. He did not demonstrate even a modicum of self-reflection during our hearings. Dr Renshaw's approach to our Inquiry frustrated many affected parties, particularly victim-survivors and their families, who were understandably seeking some acknowledgment, reflection and, indeed, apologies.

Dr Renshaw's omissions and fabrications amount to misleading our Commission of Inquiry. We do not make this finding lightly. Misleading a commission of inquiry undermines public trust and confidence in the process. Such an act by a senior state servant is unethical and unprofessional and brings the State Service into disrepute.

Under section 18 of the Commissions of Inquiries Act 1995 ('Commissions of Inquiries Act'), we have the power to make a finding of misconduct. Section 3 of the Commissions of Inquiries Act defines misconduct as 'conduct by a person that could reasonably be considered likely to result in a criminal charge, civil liability, disciplinary proceedings, or other legal proceedings, being brought against that person in respect of the conduct'. Section 10 of the State Service Act outlines circumstances under which a State Service employee may be subject to disciplinary processes. This includes when an employee breaches the State Service Code of Conduct.

Dr Renshaw's conduct in misleading our Commission of Inquiry meets most, if not all, of these provisions and may be considered likely to result in disciplinary proceedings, which meets the definition of misconduct in the Commission of Inquiries Act. We make a finding of misconduct against Dr Renshaw.

5.2.45 20 October 2020—The Secretary is advised of Ms Pearn's identity and media reports on Mr Griffin's offending

On 19 October 2020, after her conversation with Dr Renshaw, Ms Pearn spoke with the former Director of Employee Relations, who had since taken up a role in the Department's Commission of Inquiry Response and Reform team, to continue her efforts to bring the circumstances of her disclosure to the hospital's attention.[1624] Around this time, Ms Pearn also spoke with Minister Courtney about the handling of her disclosure.[1625]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that she first became aware of Ms Pearn's first complaint to the hospital (in 2011 or 2012) on 20 October 2020, when she was informed about Ms Pearn's conversation with the former Director of Employee Relations.[1626] We note that Dr Renshaw did advise her, in general terms, a few days earlier on 16 October 2019.[1627] Secretary Morgan-Wicks therefore became aware of Ms Pearn's disclosure roughly a year after Mr Bellinger and Dr Renshaw had knowledge of it (if we accept Mr Bellinger's evidence that he was not present at the original disclosure, which we do not).

On the same day, 20 October 2020, The Examiner newspaper identified the unnamed paediatric nurse in its report of 9 October 2019 as Mr Griffin (refer to Section 5.2.14 for a discussion of the 9 October 2019 report).[1628]

On 21 October 2020, Secretary Morgan-Wicks received a file note of a conversation that Minister Courtney had with Ms Pearn.[1629]

On the same day, Secretary Morgan-Wicks wrote to Minister Courtney recommending an independent investigation into the hospital's response to complaints about Mr Griffin, in addition to the planned internal examination.[1630] Secretary Morgan-Wicks wrote:

> Whilst my examination of this issue continues, I write to confirm that I have received information which raises serious allegations about the proper conduct, strength and adequacy of historical reporting processes relating to the subject of this matter, involving both the [Tasmanian Health Service] and other Government Agencies.

> Given my remit as the Department of Health Head of Agency, I do not hold the powers necessary to conduct an in depth cross-agency systems review. Noting the serious nature of the concerns raised, I am writing to you to request that you consider instituting an independent investigation in relation to this matter so that this information can be independently assessed and examined.
>
> In the interim, I will continue to undertake my examination of the relevant [Tasmanian Health Service] and Department policies and procedures, as confirmed above.[1631]

5.2.46 22 October 2020—The Department announces an independent investigation into the management of complaints about Mr Griffin

The next day, 22 October 2020, the then Premier, the Honourable Peter Gutwein MP, and Minister Courtney announced the Independent Investigation into the Systems of the Tasmanian Health Service and Relevant Government Agencies/Organisations Relating to the Management of Historical Reports of Allegations of Child Sexual Abuse.[1632] As indicated above, the terms of reference of the investigation required examining the circumstances surrounding Mr Griffin's conduct and other related matters.

On 12 and 17 November 2020, Secretary Morgan-Wicks and the Department's Chief People Officer met with staff on Ward 4K to give an update on the Department's internal examination and to provide them with information about the independent investigation.[1633] During these meetings, staff expressed concern that the issues were not being considered by a Commission of Inquiry.[1634]

5.2.47 28 October 2020—Open disclosure with a family occurs

As foreshadowed earlier on 28 October 2020, open disclosure with a family occurred following the discovery of an image of their child among the photos on Mr Griffin's devices. Open disclosure was provided to the family on 28 October 2020 at a meeting involving Dr Renshaw, a 'social worker/counsellor', a Tasmania Police liaison officer and possibly Ms Tonks.[1635] While Dr Renshaw suggested she was present, Ms Tonks did not recall whether she attended the open disclosure meeting.[1636] Dr Renshaw told us: 'I believe that it went well, the family concerned appeared to be very thankful for it'.[1637]

This family contacted us to share their experience of the process. They told us that Dr Renshaw contacted them after their child had been identified in images found in Mr Griffin's possession.[1638]

Although they found the meeting with Dr Renshaw and Tasmania Police to be 'informative and useful', they also felt that the overall process of disclosure, and the lack of follow-up since, was not ideal.[1639] Their dissatisfaction stemmed from the following:

- They found out about the identification of their child via a voicemail message from the hospital, which was received by the patient's mother while at work. This message left her 'feeling sick and … very upset'.[1640]

- They received assurances from Dr Renshaw that, while the hospital had responded to some concerns relating to Mr Griffin over the years (which Dr Renshaw described to them in general terms), these concerns 'were not of a direct sexual nature or of photos being taken'. The family has since queried the accuracy of this characterisation.[1641] They recall that Dr Renshaw described one complaint as being about Mr Griffin 'giving away… a former patient' (likely a reference to the February 2009 complaint) and another complaint as Mr Griffin giving teenage female patients advice about boyfriends (this was likely Mr Gordon's August 2017 complaint).[1642] We consider it unlikely that Dr Renshaw shared the full extent of Mr Griffin's complaints history with this family.
- The family was not offered any counselling and received no follow-up from the hospital or Tasmania Police. They felt 'it should have been offered, we shouldn't have just been left to sort ourselves out'.[1643]

In describing the effect that the revelation of Mr Griffin's conduct towards their child had on their family, family members told us:

> The long-term impact this has had on our family is significant. Our trust in others to care for [our child] is now very limited … I don't want this to happen to other families … they should be able to leave their children on the ward in the care of nursing staff.[1644]

The Risk Management Open Disclosure Policy that forms part of the suite of policies and procedures relevant to open disclosure includes an objective to:

> … ensure that persons who have experienced an adverse clinical event will be provided with timely communication and discussion about what has occurred, why the adverse event occurred, and what is being done to prevent it happening again.[1645]

This objective was a live concern for this family:

> We discussed how as parents we really just wanted to know that the hospital had put processes in place for this to never happen again and for future complaints to be addressed. Dr Renshaw talked about personal phone use no longer being allowed when on shift.[1646] [Emphasis is the parents'.]

One of the desired outcomes of an open disclosure process is 'Improved patient satisfaction with the process of managing an adverse clinical event'.[1647] The family told us:

> Our family has always been very respectfully treated by the LGH nursing and medical staff and we have nothing but praise for them. We have no doubt that they have saved [our daughter's] life on several occasions.
> We do have concerns about how the photo incident was reported to us and the lack of follow up we have since had.[1648]

We note that a 'social worker/counsellor' was present for this discussion, which the family did not recall (they remembered a person taking notes).[1649] The family told us that no support was offered after the open disclosure process for the patient or her parents.[1650]

Finding—Launceston General Hospital should ensure open disclosure processes are trauma-informed

We note the quite different recollections of how this open disclosure process occurred. We consider that an open disclosure process in relation to child sexual abuse should:

- not discuss the substance of the open disclosure in a voicemail message
- define the actions taken to prevent child sexual abuse occurring again and keep affected parties up to date with subsequent reforms
- ensure the patient and family are personally connected with expert sexual abuse counsellors.

5.2.48 November 2020—Angelique Knight contacts Dr Renshaw

Former Ward 4K patient Angelique Knight contacted Dr Renshaw sometime after The Nurse podcast was released. She shared a concern with Dr Renshaw about a reference in the podcast relating to her, namely that Mr Griffin wanted to 'give away' a patient at her wedding (described in Section 4.1.10). Ms Knight told us that Dr Renshaw responded to this concern by saying, 'oh that's interesting', without elaborating further.[1651]

Ms Knight told Dr Renshaw that she was worried that some of the images found on Mr Griffin's phone may have been taken of her because Mr Griffin would have had many opportunities to do this while caring for her.[1652] She wanted to see the images but recalled Dr Renshaw telling her that it 'can't happen' and that only one person had been identified from the photographs.[1653] Ms Knight said 'he didn't explain the process that led to this identification'.[1654] She further stated:

> I don't know if James Griffin did take photos of me and that bothers me … I was really annoyed … and it felt like Peter Renshaw was just brushing me off again. I felt like I was nothing and just a number to him.[1655]

On 10 November 2020, Ms Knight wrote to Dr Renshaw to share her shock and disgust about Mr Griffin's conduct. She told him it made her 'utterly sick and angry knowing how inappropriate he was with me … for half my life on 4K and outside of 4K'.[1656] She wrote: 'I feel so disgusting and I have no idea where to go with this I just know this is extremely hard trying to process! Hopefully someone can help!'[1657] Dr Renshaw wrote back expressing some sympathy and providing assurance that the hospital was cooperating fully with the independent investigation.[1658] He also encouraged Ms Knight to look after herself and reach out to support services, and he provided the contact details of some of these services.

At our hearings, Ms Knight described finding this response lacking:

> … it just seemed very generic to me, like, you know, a very basic email that he's probably sent everybody that sent him an email—that's how it felt anyway … I just felt like a number to him, you know, like it's … not really important, not a big deal, kind of.[1659]

She acknowledged that Dr Renshaw provided information about support services but felt it was not personalised and required her to seek out help herself, rather than the hospital offering support.[1660]

Ms Knight's experience reinforced our view that Launceston General Hospital did not have an adequate process for responding to victim-survivors and related parties about Mr Griffin. The hospital did not provide clear information about what processes the hospital and police had undertaken to identify potential victims and, aside from a list of support service numbers, did not offer counselling. Providing a list of contact details for support services, while useful, is not an adequate response in these circumstances.

5.2.49 November 2020—A Launceston General Hospital staff member is approached by management following their participation in The Nurse podcast

A Launceston General Hospital staff member, who had a family member who was abused by Mr Griffin, spoke to Camille Bianchi for The Nurse podcast.[1661] The staff member also had a part-time role at the Sexual Assault Forensic Examiner (known as 'SAFE') in relation to sexual assault victims. SAFE sits within the Launceston General Hospital's area of responsibility.

The staff member told us that during a meeting with a Launceston General Hospital manager and the SAFE medical lead, they were told that due to their participation in the podcast and because of their family member's experience, the staff member's objectivity could be questioned, and this might compromise any prosecutions in which they were involved through SAFE. The staff member said they were confused by this information, given that SAFE is a forensic service and their family member's experience would not change the nature of any forensic evidence.

The Launceston General Hospital manager said that when the podcast was released, the SAFE medical lead approached her to discuss whether there was a potential conflict of interest or perceived bias if the staff member was to give evidence in a future sexual assault case.[1662] The manager told us that the medical lead had sought advice from the Director of Public Prosecutions who said that the staff member potentially could have a conflict of interest. The manager told us that the meeting with the staff member was intended to see how the staff member might feel about this risk if their objectivity was questioned in a prosecution, given they had shared information about their family's experience publicly through the podcast, and to consider the staff member's wellbeing. The manager also told us that, given the concerns expressed by the medical lead, she considered it was appropriate for her to raise the issue with the staff member, and in doing so she did not express any personal views.

The staff member told us that at the time they interpreted the conversation as reprisal for speaking out, but with the benefit of hindsight they acknowledged it also expressed some concern for their mental health.

The manager denied that her comments were a reprisal for the staff member speaking out about their family's experience publicly. While SAFE does not conduct any general screening to determine if employees have experienced sexual assault, the manager explained that the difference in this situation was that the staff member had made their family's experiences public.

We also heard of other occasions when Launceston General Hospital management spoke to staff who had spoken publicly. We recognise that such conversations might have been based on genuine concerns about conflicts of interest or staff wellbeing. We are concerned, however, that such approaches, at least in the absence of a clear explanation of their purpose, risked contributing to a culture where staff felt reluctant to speak up about sexual abuse or feared adverse consequences if they did so publicly.

5.2.50 23 November 2020—The intention to establish a Commission of Inquiry is announced

On 23 November 2020, the then Premier Gutwein announced that a Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's responses to child sexual abuse in institutional settings would be established in early 2021.[1663]

5.2.51 15 March 2021—Our Commission of Inquiry is formally established

On 15 March 2021, our Commission of Inquiry was formally established by Order of the Governor of Tasmania.[1664]

5.2.52 September 2021—Legal Services and the Department convene a group of staff to provide information in response to civil claims lodged in relation to Mr Griffin

In September 2021, the former Director of Employee Relations at the Department (who had since moved to the Department's Commission of Inquiry Response and Reform team) and Mr Bellinger joined a group established by Legal Services either within or designed to assist the Department to provide information to the Office of the Solicitor-General in response to civil claims relating to Mr Griffin.[1665] At least one of these civil claims referenced a disclosure made to the hospital in 2010.[1666] This may have been drawn from the reference to a disclosure reported in The Nurse podcast, which we have presumed to be a reference to Ms Pearn's disclosure, although we consider it occurred in 2011 or 2012.

The former Director of Employee Relations recalled discussing Ms Pearn's disclosure with Mr Bellinger in the context of it coming up in one of the civil claims. We understand that they were already aware of Ms Pearn's disclosure through their conversation with Ms Pearn on 19 October 2020.[1667] On their evidence, they were not made directly aware of the possibility of Mr Bellinger's presence at Ms Pearn's initial disclosure; however, we have not been able to confirm this.

The former Director of Employee Relations and Mr Bellinger's exchange revealed that the Department accepted that the meeting Ms Pearn reported having with hospital's human resources staff did in fact occur, despite the hospital having no record of it.[1668] The former Director of Employee Relations told us that in discussions with Mr Bellinger, he mentioned that he often had contact with Stewart Millar in Mr Millar's capacity as a consultant, and that Mr Millar would likely be willing to provide a statement about Ms Pearn's disclosure, relevant to the claim.[1669]

5.2.53 1 October 2021—Mr Bellinger is asked to obtain statements from Mr Millar and Mr Fratangelo regarding Ms Pearn's disclosure

On 1 October 2021, the former Director of Employee Relations emailed Mr Bellinger asking him to obtain statements from Mr Millar and Mr Fratangelo about Ms Pearn's disclosure, noting they could do this themself if he was unable to.[1670] The former Director of Employee Relations wrote: 'No super urgency – it's not required at this stage but may be later' [Emphasis is the former Director's].[1671]

We note it was around this time that, as part of our evidence gathering, we were also making enquiries about Mr Millar's recollections of Ms Pearn's disclosure. We were not aware at that point that Mr Millar had recently given a similar statement to the Department.

We learned from the Solicitor-General, Sarah Kay SC, that the request for a statement from Mr Millar did not come from her office and it only learned that it had been taken on 28 January 2022 when a solicitor from her office had a discussion with a Department employee. This solicitor's file note of the conversation said:

> James Bellinger had contacted [Mr Millar] (the retiree) in late 2021, as they were unsure of details of alleged discussion of former staff member re abuse by Griffin when she was a child. … [The employee] confirmed OSG didn't ask for it [a statutory declaration] to be done, Health did on own volition and [Mr Millar] (had?) offered to make a stat dec as a record.[1672]

Because Ms Pearn's disclosure was made to the hospital's human resources team, it was not appropriate for anyone from that team to be involved in obtaining statements from Mr Fratangelo or Mr Millar.

On 30 October 2021, Mr Bellinger reported to the former Director of Employee Relations that Mr Millar was reviewing his statement and that Mr Fratangelo 'cannot recall [the disclosure] for the life of him'.[1673] Mr Fratangelo was not asked to complete a statutory declaration to this effect.[1674]

We have compared a draft version of Mr Millar's statement, prepared by Mr Bellinger, with the version that was ultimately signed by Mr Millar. The draft unsigned statement included the following content about who attended the meeting when Ms Pearn disclosed Mr Griffin's abuse: 'I believe it was either Gino Fratangelo or James Bellinger'.[1675]

On 3 November 2021, Mr Millar advised Mr Bellinger that he had made 'a couple of small changes' to the statement and forwarded a revised version.[1676] We identified two changes, one of which we do not consider consequential. On 8 November 2021, Mr Millar attended the hospital to sign the statement. In Mr Millar's final statement, signed on 8 November 2021, the content relevant to who attended the meeting when Ms Pearn disclosed Mr Griffin's abuse read: 'I believe it was either Gino Fratangelo or James Bellinger or both' [Emphasis ours].[1677]

We consider Mr Millar's edit notable. We also note that this is the evidence that Mr Millar has consistently given, including to us.

Mr Bellinger said he did not share this information from Mr Millar's statement with anyone at the hospital, beyond providing the former Director of Employee Relations a copy of Mr Millar's statement.[1678] We are not clear whether and how this statement was used.

Mr Bellinger gave evidence at our hearings that he only became aware that Mr Millar placed him at the meeting where Ms Pearn's disclosure took place when he was taking Mr Millar's statement.[1679] He admitted that this knowledge did not prompt him to recuse himself from taking the statement due to a conflict of interest.[1680] Mr Bellinger conceded that 'with hindsight somebody else should have taken over that interview process or that witness statement process'.[1681]

When Counsel Assisting asked Mr Bellinger whether the reason he did not take any steps in response to his conflict of interest was because he didn't want any further scrutiny of Ms Pearn's disclosure, Mr Bellinger responded: 'No, it was not that reason'.[1682]

The former Director of Employee Relations told us that it was not their expectation that Mr Bellinger would discuss Mr Millar's recollection with him and draft Mr Millar's statement himself, only that he would request that Mr Millar provide a statement. They said that they only became aware that Mr Bellinger had prepared the statement himself when they received a copy and saw that Mr Millar's name was misspelt.[1683] They acknowledged that they should not have asked Mr Bellinger to obtain a statement from Mr Millar.[1684]

Finding—Launceston General Hospital's human resources team should not have been involved in the request or preparation of a statement from Stewart Millar regarding Kylee Pearn's disclosure

The Department's Commission of Inquiry Response and Reform team (where the former Director of Employee Relations worked at this time) was responsible for providing our Commission of Inquiry with all relevant documentation from the Department, including in relation to Ms Pearn's disclosure.

Because Ms Pearn's disclosure was made to the hospital's human resources team, it should have been clear to the Department's Commission of Inquiry Response and Reform team that the hospital's human resources team should not have been involved in documenting anything connected to Ms Pearn's disclosure, nor gaining statements from other human resources team members.

Furthermore, it was reasonably foreseeable to the Department's Commission of Inquiry Response and Reform team that Mr Bellinger and Mr Millar would be witnesses at our Commission of Inquiry and that there may have been a point of contention in their differing recollections of who was present at Ms Pearn's disclosure, and that greater care to not compromise the evidence before our Inquiry should have been taken.[1685]

Finding—James Bellinger should not have taken the statement from Stewart Millar

We are concerned that Mr Bellinger took the statement from Mr Millar about Ms Pearn's disclosure in 2011 or 2012 given our finding that Mr Bellinger was at the meeting with Ms Pearn when she made the disclosure.

Even on Mr Bellinger's evidence that he was not at the meeting, when asked by the former Director of Employee Relations to obtain a statement from Mr Millar, Mr Bellinger should have flagged his likely conflict of interest and declined to be involved. Mr Bellinger was a member of the human resources team. It was not appropriate for him to have any involvement in Mr Millar's statement. Even on the most favourable interpretation of Mr Bellinger's evidence, at the point Mr Millar named Mr Bellinger as being at the meeting, he should have reported this to his manager and ceased involvement. Mr Bellinger conceded that somebody else should have taken the statement.

We are concerned about Mr Bellinger's decisions regarding Ms Pearn's 2011 or 2012 disclosure, including:

- not alerting anyone within the hospital or Department to Ms Pearn's disclosure when Detective Senior Constable Hindle enquired about it on 11 October 2019, despite his evidence that it would be his usual practice to do so
- not including Ms Pearn's disclosure in any of his various reviews of Mr Griffin's prior complaints history, including the response to the Integrity Commission.

These decisions contributed to our finding that he was present at the 2011 or 2012 meeting.

6 Observations

Despite considering the documents and other evidence relevant to Mr Griffin for some months, we struggle to come to terms with the enormity of the collective failure by a range of institutions—including Launceston General Hospital, Child Safety Services and Tasmania Police—that characterises their responses to the risks Mr Griffin posed. These collective failures enabled a motivated sexual predator to repeatedly groom, harm and abuse vulnerable young patients and other children with whom he had contact. The extent of Mr Griffin's sexual abuse of children and young people is astounding and devastating. We acknowledge that the incidents we are aware of likely reflect only some of Mr Griffin's sexual offending across a range of contexts. We only examined one facet of Mr Griffin's abuse, namely his abuse within an institution. We know of many more victim-survivors and witnesses who decided not to share their experiences with us.

What is clear from the evidence we have laid out in Sections 3 and 4 is that:

- Mr Griffin had a clear modus operandi in often (but not always) targeting particularly vulnerable young girls who, because of their family circumstances, poor mental health or physical illness, were more susceptible to his grooming. While we heard evidence that Mr Griffin could be opportunistic in offending against short-stay patients, it was young people with ongoing chronic conditions whom Mr Griffin most often targeted because their extended stays in hospital created more opportunities for him to groom them and their families, build relationships that could extend beyond the hospital and offend against them.
- Mr Griffin was tactical in his interactions with people who may have detected his abuses or raised the alarm. He groomed colleagues, managers and the families of patients to build their trust and to make them less likely to recognise, report or act on his behaviour. This grooming lowered the guard of some people and made them more inclined to view Mr Griffin's inappropriate behaviours as benign or indicative of a higher level of care and concern for patients.

- When Mr Griffin's charm did not work, particularly with male nursing colleagues who were conscious of the professional conduct expected of male nurses, he revealed glimpses of a more intimidating and hostile side that made people wary to confront him. Mr Griffin's aggressive side was apparent on the few occasions that he was confronted with complaints or resistance from patients and very evident in his abuse of Ms Skeggs. While the revelations about Mr Griffin were a shock to some, they were a confirmation of the suspicions held by others who had encountered or detected his menacing side.
- Much of Mr Griffin's inappropriate behaviour occurred in plain sight, which at times made it less likely to be detected. He groomed, breached professional boundaries with and inappropriately touched children with brazenness. His behaviour was facilitated by his confidence that he could act with impunity—when concerns were raised, the hospital, Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services largely failed to intervene. His unabashed behaviour was also a strategy to reassure people that his conduct was appropriate. In being so open with some of his conduct, those around him often did not recognise his behaviour as abusive (or second guessed their sense that it was) and even participated in assuring others, including patients and their family members, that his behaviour was 'just Jim'.
- Mr Griffin often encouraged relationships between his victims and his family. This had the effect of making the time he spent with his victims less suspect. It also made his victims feel that they had a duty to protect his children from the distress of disclosures about his conduct. This kept them silent. Many victim-survivors that we heard from were careful to ensure the information they provided us would not hurt Mr Griffin's family, who have no doubt suffered considerably. We expect that many others did not provide us with information for this reason.
- The health setting that Mr Griffin operated in gave him unique opportunities to offend. It gave him access to young girls who were often in a frightened and highly vulnerable state. Many of these young girls spent long periods on the ward and initially welcomed his warmth and attentiveness, which informed how their families interpreted Mr Griffin's keen interest in their care. Patients' need for physical care (including for bathing, dressing or other intimate procedures) provided a veneer of legitimacy for his abuses, particularly because chaperone protocols were not strongly embedded and enforced on the ward, and children and young people (and their families) had little information to help them identify what was normal and what was unprofessional practice (although some did come to recognise how Mr Griffin's behaviour differed from that of other nurses).
- The dysfunctional nature of Ward 4K enabled Mr Griffin to offend. He took full advantage of this toxic work culture. Staff were mired in interpersonal conflict for many years, which had the effect of demotivating them, making them less likely to speak up about their concerns, and allowing management and human resources staff to be sceptical or dismissive of their complaints.

- The systems, policies and processes of the hospital were not adequate to protect children from sexual abuse. The hospital provided inadequate guidance on expected standards of behaviour in child-facing roles, showed lax enforcement and embedding of the chaperone protocol, demonstrated poor complaints-handling processes, showed reluctance to take disciplinary action in the face of escalating noncompliance, and failed to adequately notify and involve senior management and external agencies about the multiple complaints against Mr Griffin. The combination of all these factors contributed to a disclosure as significant as Ms Pearn's in 2011 or 2012 being met with complete inaction.
- Similarly, the failures of Child Safety Services to properly share information and create meaningful opportunities for disclosure meant chances were missed to piece together information that could have revealed Mr Griffin's abuses at a much earlier stage. The response of Child Safety Services to concerns about Ms Skeggs in 2013 did not feel safe or helpful to her; instead, it cast doubt on reported concerns in a rush to close its file. This response may well have been a product of a pressured and overstretched system, but it contributed to allowing Mr Griffin to continue his abuses.
- Following the email it received in 2000 onwards, Tasmania Police similarly failed to act on critical information at various times and to review prior intelligence holdings that would have allowed a more complete assessment of Mr Griffin's modus operandi. Mr Griffin was not given priority as a suspected offender despite significant risks to children. The failure of Tasmania Police to act diligently on intelligence gathered by the Australian Federal Police in 2015 cannot be overstated. While Tasmania Police has rightly reviewed its actions and apologised accordingly, this failing was so egregious as to warrant revisiting by our Inquiry.
- Each organisation—Launceston General Hospital, Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services—should have done more to assess and act on the risks posed by Mr Griffin, acknowledging that the extent of the risk was only fully apparent when the information held by each of these agencies was put together. Mr Griffin had a pattern of abusive behaviour towards children that was stark and undeniable. The failures to share information, particularly between Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services, meant that opportunities to identify this pattern earlier were lost.

The following is clear to us from the evidence presented in Section 5:

- Launceston General Hospital only acted in response to Mr Griffin when forced to do so and as a result of the police investigation prompted by Ms Skeggs' report in 2019. The lack of any pre-existing plans or strategies to manage a crisis of this nature—that is, employing a paedophile in a paediatric ward for 18 years—combined with the completely dysfunctional dynamics within the hospital, created significant vulnerabilities that were ultimately catastrophic in terms of the hospital's response.

- Leadership of this response was largely absent. However, to the extent that the hospital's leadership was involved in the response, it did not properly acquit its responsibilities.
- Secretary Morgan-Wicks came to our hearings to listen and accept responsibility. She stood out as one of the few senior witnesses to genuinely appreciate the scale of the catastrophe that was the hospital's response to revelations of Mr Griffin's offending and that the task ahead of rebuilding community trust will be enormous. Her willingness to be accountable was as appropriate as it was heartening. It was clear to us that Secretary Morgan-Wicks was not only poorly advised, but also misled.

Several staff from Ward 4K who provided evidence to us showed great vulnerability and courage in honestly admitting what they felt were their own failings to report, record actions or to take greater steps in response to Mr Griffin's conduct. There can be a fine line between self-condemnation, genuine regret and appropriate reflection on what one would do differently if they had their time again. We hope bystanders of Mr Griffin's abuse learn from their experience and work towards safer practices in future. Some of these individuals have done the most—alongside victim-survivors—to draw attention to the systemic failures within the hospital. They have spoken up and spoken out, notwithstanding their own fears of reprisal. We, and the broader Tasmanian community, owe a great debt to them for their fearlessness and tenacity.

What was apparent to us is that the people who most berated themselves for their decisions and actions were those least responsible for Mr Griffin's abuse—victim-survivors. We witnessed the anguish of many victim-survivors who believed that they alone were being abused by Mr Griffin and felt wracked with guilt when the extent of his abuse became known. They expressed to us that they should have raised the alarm. These feelings come from a deep concern for others and for the protection of children, which we greatly admire, but it is not a burden victim-survivors of abuse should have to carry. It is not their responsibility to protect others from their abuser. It is the responsibility of institutions tasked with their care and protection.

Our Commission of Inquiry would not have been possible without the willingness of victim-survivors and their supporters to share their most painful and distressing experiences with us. We know there are many other people who have chosen not to do so, which we respect. We had hoped our hearings would offer a degree of healing and catharsis for many who held unanswered questions or were rightly hoping and expecting some proper acknowledgment of their suffering and their efforts to bring attention to concerns about Mr Griffin with the hospital. Instead, they—like us—were met with a response from senior executives at the hospital that lacked empathy, insight, reflection and care for them.

We hope this report—alongside our Commission of Inquiry's care and deep admiration for all victim-survivors—nonetheless offers some measure of comfort and closure that can be further reinforced by the recommendations that we discuss in Chapter 15.

15 The way forward: Children in health services

1 Introduction

Health services have a duty of care to patients, which extends to keeping them safe from sexual abuse while they are under care. The National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards require that health services protect the public from harm and provide quality health care to all patients. The National Principles for Child Safe Organisations, which have now been substantially adopted in the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 ('Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act'), set out the expectations of organisations to create cultures that foster child safety and wellbeing. The Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ('Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act') and the Health Practitioner Regulation National Law Act 2009 (Qld) ('National Law') require that sexual misconduct by health practitioners be reported, including to the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency ('Ahpra').[1]

There is limited research into the prevalence of sexual abuse in health services. However, we know from the available evidence that abusers who are also health workers will exploit their often unquestioned, intimate access to young patients, and that children and young people's vulnerability to abuse is heightened when they are sick, injured or otherwise unwell.

This volume makes a much-needed contribution to the research on child sexual abuse in health services. We learned that abusers use tactical strategies to avoid detection when offending in health services. They leverage the trust and deference that many of us afford health workers, take advantage of the assumption that sexual abuse cannot happen undetected in a health service, and are effective at grooming vulnerable young patients, as well as their families and their colleagues. They can enhance their perceived trustworthiness by appearing to go 'above and beyond' in providing health care to young patients and supporting their family and carers.

A health service can provide an ideal environment for health workers to abuse young patients if it does not have systems, policies and protocols in place relevant to preventing, detecting and responding to child sexual abuse.

In Chapter 14, we examined Launceston General Hospital's response to allegations of child sexual abuse. We identified systemic problems with leadership, culture, policies and processes at the hospital.

In this chapter, we discuss some of the work already underway to address these problems. In Section 2, we outline recent reviews and numerous new initiatives designed to improve children's safety in health services and better support staff to identify signs of abuse. In Section 3, we discuss the foundations that can assist health services to protect children, reflected in the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations, including building a strong culture, strengthening leadership and accountability, empowering children and young people, and investment in clear policies and professional development. In Section 4, we discuss responses to complaints, concerns, and allegations of child sexual abuse. In Section 5, we discuss the importance of recognising the impact of Mr Griffin's offending on Launceston General Hospital and restoring trust in that institution. In Section 6, we discuss the role of oversight bodies.

Throughout this chapter, we make recommendations to further enhance work already underway. Our recommendations are aimed at ensuring the Tasmanian health system is better placed to identify child sexual abuse and respond appropriately when it occurs in future.

In summary, we recommend:

- developing and communicating a policy framework and implementation plan to improve responses to child sexual abuse in health services
- that the Tasmanian Government advocates for the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations to become a mandatory requirement for accrediting health services nationally
- increasing the participation of children and young people in decisions affecting health care delivery, including through:
    - establishing a health services young people's advisory group
    - increasing young people's and their families' and carers' knowledge of patient rights

    - regularly monitoring children and young people's sense of safety within health services
    - identifying actions that can be taken to make health services safe and inclusive for diverse groups of children and young people
- increasing the accountability of leaders and staff in protecting child safety and embedding safety through cultural improvement initiatives
- reviewing and consolidating departmental policies, procedures and protocols to address gaps in the safeguarding of children, including publishing child safety policies to promote accessibility and transparency within the community; in particular, improvements to, or developing, policies on key child safety matters, including mandatory reporting and voluntary reporting, professional conduct for staff and chaperones
- establishing minimum requirements for staff professional development on child safety
- improving responses to child safety concerns, including establishing a clear complaints management, escalation and investigation pathway and developing a critical incident response plan to respond to human-caused traumatic events
- restoring trust through Launceston General Hospital, the Department and Tasmania Police offering ongoing assistance to known and as yet unknown victim-survivors of child sexual abuse by Mr Griffin that related to the hospital
- reviewing the Health Complaints Act 1995 ('Health Complaints Act') to ensure the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner extends to addressing systemic issues within health services related to child safety.

2 Implementing recent reviews

In 2022, following the revelations about Mr Griffin's offending, and throughout our Commission of Inquiry, the Department began addressing risks to child safety within health services. In particular, the Department initiated two reviews—the Independent Child Safe Governance Review of the Launceston General Hospital and Human Resources ('Child Safe Governance Review') and the Launceston General Hospital Community Recovery Initiative ('Community Recovery Initiative'). Kathrine Morgan-Wicks PSM, Secretary, Department of Health, has accepted all the recommendations of these two reviews.[2] The Department has also introduced reforms under its Child Safe Organisation Project, which primarily sought to implement the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations and the associated Child Safe Standards recommended by the National Royal Commission.[3]

In this section, we provide an overview of these reviews and reforms. The Department has also set up a Statewide Complaints Oversight Unit in the Office of the Secretary, and a statewide policy framework and incident reporting system. We discuss this in a later section on improving responses to child sexual abuse in health services.

We conclude that while the Department's recently initiated reforms represent progress on improving child safety, it remains unclear exactly which reforms will be implemented and by whom. The community is entitled to know more about the Department's reforms, how the reforms will work to provide a system-wide response to child sexual abuse in health services, how the reforms are being prioritised, and the expected timeframes for implementation. To this end, we recommend that the Department develops and communicates a policy framework and implementation plan.

2.1 Recent reviews and reforms

Following evidence presented to our Commission of Inquiry at hearings relevant to Launceston General Hospital, the Department announced the Child Safe Governance Review and the Community Recovery Initiative to respond to community concerns about the hospital.

2.1.1 Child Safe Governance Review

On 3 July 2022, the Honourable Jeremy Rockliff MP, Premier of Tasmania, together with Secretary Morgan-Wicks, announced the immediate establishment of the Child Safe Governance Review.[4] The Premier said:

> We knew the evidence before the Commission of Inquiry would be confronting and there would be serious lessons to learn. There is nothing more important than keeping children safe which is why we are listening and acting now to ensure past wrongs are not repeated.[5]

Two external and independent co-chairs were appointed to lead the Child Safe Governance Review—Adjunct Professors Karen Crawshaw PSM and Debora Picone AO.

The terms of reference for the Child Safe Governance Review were to consider a range of operational matters related to Launceston General Hospital, including assessing its organisational structure, the roles and responsibilities of leaders and managers, training and staff development, policies and procedures and the management of complaints.[6] Some of the terms of reference went to issues beyond the focus of our Inquiry, particularly around clinical governance and patient safety more broadly.

A Lived Experience Expert Reference Group was established as part of the Child Safe Governance Review. Although the membership of this group was not made public, we know that it comprised victim-survivors.[7] The report of the Child Safe Governance Review states that the Lived Experience Expert Reference Group was given the opportunity to inform the review and shape recommendations to the Secretary.[8]

The report of the Child Safe Governance Review contained 92 recommendations, including in relation to the role and skills of leadership, staff and human resources; governance structures; strengthening child safeguarding; and improved record keeping. We discuss specific recommendations, where relevant, in subsequent sections.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks confirmed to us that the Tasmanian Government had accepted all recommendations set out in the Child Safe Governance Review report.[9] She also wrote to us following the public release of the report to provide an update on the progress of implementing the recommendations. She told us that:

- a Statewide Child Safety and Wellbeing Service had been established, with child safeguarding officers to be recruited and located onsite at all major hospitals in Tasmania, including at Launceston General Hospital
- a fact sheet for staff had been drafted and promoted to guide the reporting of child safety concerns
- the Chief Executive Hospitals North would assume responsibility for safeguarding children at Launceston General Hospital[10]
- the co-chairs would be appointed to monitor implementation of the review's recommendations.[11]

Adjunct Professors Picone and Crawshaw advised us in July 2023 that many of their recommendations involved 'major systemic changes in technology, business operations and culture', some of which take months or years to fully implement and embed.[12] However, they said that in overseeing the implementation of all the recommendations, they maintained a particular focus on those relating to child safety and that 'significant progress' had been made.[13] Areas identified as most relevant for priority oversight included:

- strengthening complaints and incident management policies
- ensuring delivery of child safety training
- embedding accountabilities for child safety in all statements of duty
- appointing child safeguarding officers within each region
- supporting implementation of the Child Safe Organisation Framework
- ensuring leadership is proactively working to improve the culture of Launceston General Hospital.[14]

We provide some more detail on progress related to these matters in relevant sections.

Seven working groups were established, each chaired by a health executive role holder and focusing on different aspects of implementation—with progress to be reported back to the broader Health Executive, acting as the Steering Committee.[15]

Adjunct Professors Picone and Crawshaw described their process of independent monitoring as involving a wide range of sources—including documentary evidence (progress reports, draft policies, relevant data), as well as targeted meetings with departmental executives that often involved 'probing questioning' and requests for additional information and follow-up.[16] The co-chairs advised us that they also met with a range of other stakeholders and role-holders, including victim-survivors involved in the development of recommendations, Launceston General Hospital's Community and Consumer Engagement Council, employee and professional organisations, as well as focus groups with frontline staff.[17] Where the co-chairs felt implementation was 'sub-optimal' or required additional support, they raised these concerns with Secretary Morgan-Wicks, who they described as having been 'responsive and timely in addressing our concerns'.[18]

We were pleased to be advised that Adjunct Professors Picone and Crawshaw's independent oversight role had been extended by Secretary Morgan-Wicks until the end of December 2023, and greatly encouraged by the overall positive assessment made by them of the Department's (and Launceston General Hospital's) progress in promoting the safety of children receiving health services.[19]

2.1.2 Community Recovery Initiative

Elizabeth Daly OAM and Malcolm White, two 'experienced and known members of the northern region community', were appointed to act as co-chairs of the Community Recovery Initiative, designed to improve community trust in Launceston General Hospital.[20]

The key objectives of the Community Recovery Initiative are to:

1. Learn from the community – for the Department to gain a deeper understanding of the northern community's concerns, and have those concerns inform its efforts to improve the [Launceston General Hospital's] systems, processes and culture to prevent child sexual abuse from happening again.
2. Restore community confidence – to rebuild the northern region community's confidence in the [Launceston General Hospital] as a trusted public institution.
3. Build community capacity – through this process, aim where possible or appropriate to build ongoing capacity, strength and resilience within the northern region community.[21]

The co-chairs of the Community Recovery Initiative made eight recommendations directed at improving management, leadership and culture; improving communication with staff and the media; and increasing staff training.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that she accepted the recommendations of the Community Recovery Initiative, which she believes are consistent with, and able to be implemented through, the recommendations of the Child Safe Governance Review.[22] The co-chairs of the Community Recovery Initiative stated an intention to liaise with the Department to monitor progress of actions towards the implementation of their recommendations.[23]

2.1.3 Child Safe Organisation Project

Other Department-initiated reforms are relevant to our Commission of Inquiry. In particular, the Child Safe Organisation Project was set up primarily to implement the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations and associated Child Safe Standards, as recommended by the National Royal Commission and endorsed by the former Council of Australian Governments in February 2019.[24]

The objective of the Child Safe Organisation Project was to ensure the Department has a strong, common understanding of child safety and wellbeing, that children's voices are heard, and that children and their families are involved in decisions affecting them.[25]

Key elements of the Child Safe Organisation Project were to develop a framework for child safety and wellbeing, set up an independent panel for child safety and wellbeing, and establish a new Child Safety and Wellbeing Service within the Department.

The Child Safe Organisation Project finished in December 2022. The Child Safety and Wellbeing Service now leads implementation of the Department's work to improve child safety and wellbeing.[26] We understand that child safeguarding officers located at Tasmania's four public major hospitals are also supporting implementation of the Department's Child Safety and Wellbeing Framework, including providing education on mandatory reporting and identifying grooming and professional boundary breaches.[27] We have been advised that these roles have been successfully filled in each region.[28]

We note that Tasmanian health services will be subject to legislative requirements to embed the Child and Youth Safe Standards (which are based on the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations) and will also be subject to a Reportable Conduct Scheme to enable oversight of how investigations of reportable allegations (which includes child sexual abuse and sexual misconduct) are conducted.[29] For further discussion on these schemes, refer to Chapter 18.

2.2 A policy framework and implementation plan

Although substantial reform work is underway across the Department, we consider this would be strengthened by clarifying:

- how the reforms will work together to provide a system-wide response to child sexual abuse in health services
- how the reforms are being prioritised
- expected timeframes for implementation.

To this end, we recommend that the Department develops and communicates a policy framework and implementation plan for reforms to improve responses to child sexual abuse in health services, against which it will be accountable to the community. This plan should explain how reforms—including departmental reforms, those recommended by the Child Safe Governance Review, Community Recovery Initiative and our Commission of Inquiry—fit together to ensure the safety of children in health settings. Publishing the policy framework and implementation plan will provide a greater degree of transparency and accountability around the Department's implementation of reforms.

In February 2023, Secretary Morgan-Wicks provided a written update on the Department's reform work. She told us that an implementation plan had been prepared and included the recommendations of the Child Safe Governance Review and Community Recovery Initiative.[30] She said the plan covers implementing the recommendations not only within Launceston General Hospital but also across the Department.[31] She also told us that several of the recommendations have already been 'completed'.[32]

We are pleased that the Department has started implementation planning in relation to the recommendations of the Child Safe Governance Review and Community Recovery Initiative. However, given the number and complexity of recommendations to be implemented (and, as we note above, the fact that some may take time to become fully embedded), we consider the Department and the community would benefit from a policy framework and implementation plan that outlines:

- the purpose and need for the reforms
- the role, responsibilities and interactions of bodies the Department has set up as part of the reforms
- how the reforms work together to provide a system-wide response to child sexual abuse in health services
- how the reforms are being prioritised for implementation and who is responsible for their implementation
- the expected timeframes for implementation.

We asked the co-chairs of the Child Safe Governance Review about the features they considered important in a monitoring and oversight function relating to health services. Adjunct Professors Picone and Crawshaw advised us that, in their view, the following skills and capabilities are needed:

- independence (actual and perceived)
- strong understanding of public sector management, health service administration and subject-specific knowledge relevant to recommendations
- good access to engage with individuals responsible for implementation and scope to offer objective guidance and advice
- sound reporting methodology, which includes monitoring of front-line staff experiences of the implementation of recommendations
- a long enough period of oversight to cover the reform agenda.[33]

We acknowledge that the policy framework and implementation plan may need to evolve over time because of changes in implementation dependencies and unexpected challenges, but we consider that, at the outset, the policy framework and implementation plan should contain the elements set out in the following recommendation.

Recommendation 15.1

The Department of Health should develop and communicate a policy framework and implementation plan for reforms to improve responses to child sexual abuse in health services. The policy and implementation plan should:

a. set out the purpose and need for the reforms

b. set out the role, responsibilities and interactions of bodies the Department has set up as part of the reforms

c. explain how reforms, including departmental reforms and those recommended by the Child Safe Governance Review, Community Recovery Initiative and this Commission of Inquiry, will work together to respond to child sexual abuse in health services

d. outline how the reforms are being prioritised for implementation and who is responsible for their implementation

e. set out the expected timeframes for implementation

f. be published on the Department's website.

3 Creating strong foundations to protect children

In this section, we make recommendations aimed at creating child safe cultures across Tasmanian health services including:

- establishing the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations as a mandatory requirement for accrediting health services against the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards
- creating a child safe culture in Tasmanian health services
- empowering children to influence how health care is delivered
- creating safe physical environments for children
- ensuring the development and implementation of key child safe policies that are publicly accessible and create a shared understanding of the rights of children and expectations of staff conduct
- improving professional development for staff about child sexual abuse and related matters such as grooming and professional boundaries.

3.1 Implementing the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations

Health services that prioritise child safety share key organisational characteristics. These characteristics are reflected in the expectations of the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations ('National Principles') and include good culture, competent leadership, the empowerment of children and young people, safe physical environments, appropriate policies and targeted professional development. Although these principles are reflected in Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Standards, we refer to the National Principles in this chapter because health services must be accredited nationally.

The Tasmanian Government and the Department should continue to work to implement the expectations of the National Principles in Tasmanian health services. The National Principles should also be a mandatory requirement for accrediting health services against the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards.

3.1.1 National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards

The National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards ('National Standards') are the starting point for determining what is required for a hospital (or any health service) to be safe for patients. The National Standards are a consistent statement on the level of care consumers can expect from health services across Australia.[34]

The primary aims of the National Standards are to 'protect the public from harm and to improve the quality of health service delivery'.[35] All public and private hospitals, as well as other health services, are assessed for compliance with the National Standards as part of their accreditation under the Australian Health Service Safety and Quality Accreditation Scheme.[36]

While the National Standards make no express reference to child safety, the Standards most relevant to child safety are the Clinical Governance Standard and the Partnering with Consumers Standard.[37] Aspects of these Standards are discussed throughout this section.

3.1.2 Launceston General Hospital's accreditation against the National Standards

The last organisation-wide assessment of Launceston General Hospital against some of the National Standards occurred in 2022.[38] As of July 2023, the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care's website indicates that the Launceston General Hospital is accredited, with an assessment against the National Standards 'to be completed by 12/12/2022'.[39]

One of the co-chairs of the Child Safe Governance Review, Adjunct Professor Debora Picone, also gave evidence to us in her capacity as Chief Executive Officer, Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care. She told us that in June 2022, the Tasmanian Health Service North Region, which includes Launceston General Hospital, underwent assessment during the week of 4 April 2022.[40] The assessment covered three of the eight Standards—the Partnering with Consumers Standard, the Preventing and Controlling Infection Standard and the Comprehensive Care Standard.[41] Independent assessors were also specifically asked to review the hospital's systems for incident reporting, complaints handling, risk management and open disclosure.[42] The assessors found the systems in place at the hospital 'were effective, were being used appropriately, and were being monitored'.[43]

3.1.3 Integrating the National Principles into the National Standards

While the National Standards apply to services provided to all patients, including children and young people, they do not specifically address issues of child safety.[44] Adjunct Professor Picone told us that aspects of the National Principles are reflected in the National Standards, particularly in the Clinical Governance Standard and Partnering with Consumers Standard.[45] Although it is not currently mandatory, there is an expectation that health services will implement systems to keep children safe and manage risks to children as part of complying with the National Standards.[46]

Adjunct Professor Picone told us that it would be possible, and indeed preferable, to embed the National Principles into the National Standards, making the National

Principles mandatory for all accredited health services.[47] She noted that the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care has not previously had enough information about the failures of child safety systems in health services to warrant this.[48]

The Tasmanian Government has recently made efforts to implement the expectations of the National Principles, including within the Department (as evidenced in the new Child Safety and Wellbeing Framework referred to above and discussed below).[49] The enactment of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act will also legislate that health services providing care to children and young people must adopt the National Principles in the form of the Child and Youth Safe Standards, and implement a Reportable Conduct Scheme.[50]

However, in our view, the expectations of the National Principles should be reflected explicitly within mandatory requirements for accreditation against the National Standards under the Australian Health Service Safety and Quality Accreditation Scheme. This will highlight the core importance of child safety to broader concepts of patient safety, provide another safeguard for children and young people, and allow implementation of the National Principles to be assessed at least once every three years by a body that is familiar with the operating environments of health services.

We anticipate the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care will engage and share information with the Independent Regulator of the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme in Tasmania, as well as with the Tasmanian Health Complaints Commissioner, Ahpra and the National Health Practitioner Boards ('National Boards'), about the compliance of health services and health practitioners with the National Principles.

The need to ensure compliance with principles and standards of child safety extends beyond health services to health departments as system administrators for state-based public health systems and regulators of the private health sector.[51] Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that the Department had not previously identified child sexual abuse in public health services as a specific strategic risk; instead, risk assessments tended to form part of patient safety and clinical decision-making processes in individual health services.[52] Secretary Morgan-Wicks identified areas in the Department that provide direct service delivery to children and young people, or that have access to the personal information of children and young people, as posing the greatest risk of child sexual abuse.[53] These areas included Women's and Children's Services, and Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services.[54]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks acknowledged that it was a 'critical oversight' that there was not a broader focus on managing the risks of child sexual abuse in public health services and indicated that the occurrence of child sexual abuse had now been added to the Department's Strategic Risk Register and approved by the Health Executive.[55] Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that the Department's Child Safe Organisation Project was managing work to address this risk.[56]

The case studies discussed in Chapter 14 highlight the risk of child sexual abuse in health services and demonstrate that these services need to have systems in place to prevent such abuse occurring, and to respond appropriately when it does occur. The Tasmanian Government should advocate for the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care to formally integrate the expectations of the National Principles into the National Standards.

Recommendation 15.2

1. The Tasmanian Government and Department of Health should continue to implement the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations across all health services.
2. The Tasmanian Government should advocate at a national level for compliance with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations to be a mandatory requirement for accrediting health services against the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards under the Australian Health Service Safety and Quality Accreditation Scheme.

3.2 Protecting children through a child safe culture

In this section, we recommend that the Department takes steps to embed a child safe culture in health services.

As noted in other chapters of our report, an organisation's 'culture' refers to the assumptions, values, beliefs and norms that distinguish appropriate from inappropriate behaviours in an organisation, and how those assumptions, values, beliefs and norms translate into practice, including staff conduct.[57]

Professor Ben Mathews, Research Professor, School of Law, Queensland University of Technology, told us that in Australia and other countries such as the United States it has been found that institutions with strong leadership and a positive culture have higher prospects of early recognition, reporting and appropriate responses to child sexual abuse.[58]

In Chapter 13, we outlined previous reviews that had identified common themes related to a poor organisational culture across Tasmanian health services including:

- ineffective governance arrangements and a lack of clarity about roles and responsibilities among health service staff
- an absence of scrutiny over staff conduct and decision making, and a lack of accountability for senior managers and executives

- organisational cultures characterised by poor leadership and poor behaviour, including misconduct by State Service employees in relation to conflicts of interest, underperformance and mistreatment of other staff
- failures to report misconduct due to fear of retribution
- instability because of changes in organisational and governance structures.

In the health context, the National Standards explicitly require that the governing body of a health service 'provides leadership to develop a culture of safety and quality improvement, and satisfies itself that this culture exists within the organisation'.[59] The Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care defines a safety culture as:

> A commitment to safety that permeates all levels of an organisation, from the clinical workforce to executive management. Features commonly include acknowledgement of the high-risk, error-prone nature of an organisation's activities; a blame-free environment in which individuals are able to report errors or near misses without fear of reprimand or punishment; an expectation of collaboration across all areas and levels of an organisation to seek solutions to vulnerabilities; and a willingness of the organisation to direct resources to deal with safety concerns.[60]

We consider that this requirement of leadership to support a safety culture should extend to ensuring safety and quality processes protect children and young people who are under a health service's care. Given our findings, achieving this outcome will require cultural change, at least within Launceston General Hospital and possibly across the Department.

Professor Erwin Loh, Group Chief Medical Officer and Group General Manager, Clinical Governance, St Vincent's Health Australia, told us: 'Culture change management is probably the hardest thing to do in any organisation, no matter what the profession or industry'.[61] As an expert in facilitating such change within health services, he offered the following reflections:

- Organisations need to have broad strategies for encouraging staff to speak up and not be afraid to 'challenge the status quo'. Organisations cannot rely on single initiatives alone.[62]
- Senior leadership must model the desired behaviours. The leadership should welcome criticism and feedback from staff and patients, ensuring those who have spoken up feel appreciated, listened to and that their concerns have been acted on.[63]
- Middle management (such as nurse unit managers and heads of medical units) must also be engaged in creating a safety culture.[64]

3.2.1 Cultural improvement initiatives

Secretary Morgan-Wicks recognised that organisational change is 'one of the most significant challenges' facing the Department.[65] She told us of several measures being implemented across the Department and at hospitals that are directed at improving organisational culture. These include:

- the Speaking up for Safety program being implemented at Royal Hobart Hospital, which is designed to build 'a culture of safety and reliability' in the hospital by encouraging all staff to speak up if they experience or observe concerning actions or behaviour[66]
- the One Health Cultural Improvement Program, which the Department began working on in January 2022.[67]

Professor Loh explained that the Speaking up for Safety program is based on the Vanderbilt Promoting Professional Accountability model ('Vanderbilt model') that is used widely in the United States and in some Australian hospitals.[68]

Professor Loh gave evidence of a similar program he is responsible for administering in St Vincent's Health Australia, known as the Ethos Program. Like Speaking up for Safety, this is a peer-based early intervention program designed to recognise staff who demonstrate positive behaviours, remove barriers from speaking up about concerns that affect patient or staff safety, and allow for a quick, fair and transparent response 'to all staff', including those making a complaint and those with concerning behaviours.[69]

Under the Ethos Program, staff are trained on how to 'speak up' effectively and can use an online messaging system to submit feedback for recognition (to acknowledge positive behaviour) or reflection (to offer feedback for improvement).[70] This feedback is delivered by a trained Ethos Messenger, who is generally a peer of the staff member, via an informal conversation.[71] The program allows for anonymous reports; however, Professor Loh told us that, in his experience, most people using the program are happy to be identified.[72] The Ethos Program supplements other practices at the hospital, including raising a concern directly with a colleague.[73]

Trained staff triage reports received through the Ethos messaging system across four levels, depending on the seriousness of the incident.[74] Less serious behaviour would not necessarily be formally reported. While Speaking up for Safety and the Ethos Program have a similar intent, a key difference is that the Ethos Program includes an option for positive recognition, whereas Speaking up for Safety facilitates only feedback in response to negative interactions.[75]

We consider a staff reporting system that applies to all staff, volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors in a hospital is a valuable initiative for creating a culture that enables giving and receiving of feedback.

We note, however, that professional boundary breaches towards a child by a staff member, whether they are an employee, volunteer, contractor or sub-contractor, should always be formally reported, responded to and recorded in centralised records for future reference.

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that the Department's One Health Cultural Improvement Program is based on a 'cultural baseline' of information drawn from staff interviews; an academic literature review relating to health care and organisational culture; departmental surveys and reviews; and data relating to workers compensation, State Service Code of Conduct investigations and workplace safety reports.[76] In May 2022, Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that work had begun under the program to:

- develop and embed departmental values that signal acceptable behaviours, and what to do if these are not upheld
- build leadership and management skills, including around communication and how to respond to complaints or grievances
- improve induction procedures for new employees to help them better understand values and desired behaviours
- improve complaints and disciplinary policies and processes.[77]

When Secretary Morgan-Wicks gave evidence at our hearings in September 2022 she advised that the Department was putting the finishing touches on the program.[78]

The Child Safe Governance Review made several recommendations to improve the culture at Launceston General Hospital.[79] These included recommendations to:

- set up a specific advisory group at the hospital with diverse membership[80]
- improve communication with staff about progress against cultural improvement plans[81]
- clarify the expectations of executive and management through performance agreements[82]
- develop a culture improvement strategy[83]
- monitor staff feedback through annual surveys on patient safety culture.[84]

As noted above, the Tasmanian Government has accepted all the recommendations set out in the Child Safe Governance Review.[85]

In a written update provided to our Commission of Inquiry in February 2023, Secretary Morgan-Wicks stated that senior leadership at Hospitals North, which includes Launceston General Hospital, is implementing an accountability and culture framework called Excellence Together.[86]

3.2.2 Our observations

We welcome the focus of the Tasmanian Government and the Department on addressing organisational culture to address child safety concerns. We consider that these reforms should be guided by a set of principles, which we set out in the following recommendation. We also consider that progress reports to the Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor (Recommendation 22.1) should demonstrate how these principles have been translated into policy and practice.

Initiatives designed to support cultural change should be informed by a range of sources and be the subject of regular review and evaluation against pre-established criteria to ascertain whether they are achieving desired outcomes.

Recommendation 15.3

The Department of Health should ensure its cultural improvement program embeds a safety culture in health services by:

a. requiring clear organisational values be observed across all levels of health services, including in relation to staff conduct

b. establishing strong governance arrangements to address staff practices that place children at risk of abuse, and complementing established patient safety governance structures

c. ensuring all levels of management demonstrate a commitment to a safety culture, including by addressing poor staff conduct

d. clarifying roles and responsibilities among staff when there is a suspicion that child sexual abuse has occurred or that safety policies are not observed

e. ensuring there are processes that hold senior managers and executives accountable to respond appropriately to the conduct of their staff, including through performance agreements and role descriptions

f. establishing measures of a strong organisational culture that indicate an organisation

    i. welcomes concerns about staff and sees them as an opportunity to improve safety for staff and patients

    ii. empowers staff to feel safe and supported to raise concerns about colleagues with their leaders and gives them confidence in the ability of leaders to respond to concerns and take disciplinary actions (including termination) where appropriate

iii. ensures staff are clear about the process for raising concerns, how these concerns will be addressed and what feedback they can expect to receive

g. providing progress reports to the Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor to demonstrate how these principles have been translated into policy and practice (Recommendation 22.1).

Recommendation 15.4

1. The Department of Health should consider integrating features of the St Vincent's Health Australia's Ethos Program into its cultural improvement program.
2. The Department of Health should ensure, in adopting its cultural improvement program, professional boundary breaches by staff towards a child are always formally reported, responded to and recorded in centralised records for future reference.

3.3 Embedding child safety as a priority for leadership

The National Principles state an expectation that 'child safety and wellbeing is embedded in organisational leadership, governance and culture'.[87] As Professor Mathews says:

> To succeed in preventing child sexual abuse requires a genuine commitment by the institution or organisation to children's rights to safety. If the leadership in an organisation does not possess this quality, it is near impossible to prevent instances of child sexual abuse.[88]

3.3.1 Problems of leadership and accountability

In Chapter 14, Case study 3, relating to James Griffin we make several findings about the failures of leadership in Launceston General Hospital. These included findings that:

- Launceston General Hospital leadership collectively failed to address a toxic culture in Ward 4K that enabled James Griffin's offending to continue and prevented his conduct being reported.
- Leadership at Launceston General Hospital collectively failed to provide appropriate supervision and proactive oversight, which is a systemic problem.
- Leadership at Launceston General Hospital was dysfunctional, and this compromised its collective response to revelations about James Griffin.
- Launceston General Hospital did not have clear accountabilities for child safety.

Several senior executive staff at Launceston General Hospital told us that responsibility for child safety was not part of senior executive roles and that they were not subject to any performance measures, indicators or financial outcomes in relation to safeguarding children.[89]

3.3.2 The need for accountability

Dr Samantha Crompvoets, Director, Australian Human Rights Commission and sociologist with expertise in organisational culture, was frank in her evidence to our Commission of Inquiry about the limits of incremental organisational change in response to a crisis. She noted that there may be times, due to the nature and significance of particular events, when a 'complete reset' of the organisation will be required from the ground up.[90] Dr Crompvoets said that leadership accountability is essential to achieving change within an organisation.[91] She spoke about the importance of 'tangible' accountability, which requires a specific person to be responsible for a particular recommendation or action.[92] Dr Crompvoets noted that accountability should not be a 'tick and flick' exercise, but built into a leader's key performance indicators.[93]

Will Gordon, the Launceston General Hospital nurse who blew the whistle on the management of complaints about Mr Griffin, told us that nothing would change at the hospital 'unless management at every hierarchical level … changes'.[94] Another staff member said that the hospital needed 'to be flushed from the top down' and that '[n]ew staff should be put in all senior positions'.[95] The co-chairs of the Community Recovery Initiative described 'strong feelings' among those they consulted that senior leaders who gave evidence at our Commission of Inquiry 'be seen to be made accountable and be seen to be removed and not allowed just "to retire"'.[96] The co-chairs went on to say:

> To not meet this criterion will, in our view, lead to the risk of an overall failure assessment of restorative trust actions from those we heard from and, more generally, for those whom [the Department] seeks to restore a trusting relationship.[97]

At our hearings, Secretary Morgan-Wicks also acknowledged that it was time Launceston General Hospital had a 'complete reset'.[98]

3.3.3 Recent reforms

The Department has developed the Child Safety and Wellbeing Framework as part of its Child Safe Organisation Project. This framework, publicly released in September 2022, has the objective of establishing 'a systemic approach to enhance the way the Department of Health works with vulnerable people, specifically children and young people'.[99] It:

- ensures structures, systems and processes are in place to mandate and foster a child safe organisation and child safe culture[100]
- establishes the National Principles as key priorities to be embedded into the Department's child safe approach[101]

- applies to the entire Department, as well as organisations funded by the Department[102]
- details the responsibility and requirements to be met by all people engaged by the Department in protecting the health, safety, welfare and wellbeing of children and young people.[103]

Secretary Morgan-Wicks told us that the framework is an important step in ensuring a Department-wide commitment to child safe practices and reporting of suspected child sexual abuse.[104]

The Tasmanian Government has also committed to clarifying expectations and improving accountability for child safety through Head of Agency performance agreements.[105] Jenny Gale, Secretary, Department of Premier and Cabinet and Head of the State Service, told us on the final day of our hearings:

> Every Head of Agency's performance agreement with the Premier will commit them to identify and take action within their own department and across the service that will keep children safer. This commitment applies regardless of whether that agency engages directly in child-related work.[106]

We would expect such performance measures to also filter down into the responsibilities of other management teams in health services.

Adjunct Professors Picone and Crawshaw advised us in July 2023 that Secretary Morgan-Wicks had issued a directive to all staff under section 34 of the State Service Act 2000 ('State Service Act') in respect of their child safeguarding responsibilities as employees of the Department of Health, and is updating all statements of duties to include the following:

> Champion a child-safe culture that upholds the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations. The Department is committed to the safety, well-being, and empowerment of all children and young people, and expects all employees to actively participate in and contribute to our rights-based approach to care, including meeting all mandatory reporting obligations.[107]

The Child Safe Governance Review also made several recommendations for ensuring accountability of leadership through improved governance, organisational structure, clearer roles and accountabilities, and professional development. Although many of these recommendations relate to Launceston General Hospital, they are relevant to other health services across Tasmania. Key recommendations of the Child Safe Governance Review include:

- ensuring collective and individual commitment to child safety through the Secretary, executive and clinical leadership of Launceston General Hospital implementing the Child Safety and Wellbeing Framework, signing a statement of commitment and undertaking an annual review of child safety and wellbeing status, confirmed by a publicly reported attestation statement[108]

- changes to the organisational structure and executive titles at Launceston General Hospital, including splitting the role of Chief Executive Hospitals North/North West and advertising for a new Chief Executive Hospitals North[109]
- more frequent meetings between various management and governance groups in Hospitals North, including at least a quarterly discussion on culture improvement initiatives and the implementation of the Child Safe Organisation Framework, which, under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, comprises the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme at Launceston General Hospital[110]
- various changes to role responsibilities and added performance measures relating to child safety, culture, workplace and patient safety for executives and senior managers, supported by annual performance reviews.[111]

On accepting the interim recommendations of the Child Safe Governance Review in September 2022, the Premier announced more changes to support leadership renewal at Launceston General Hospital and the Department, including changes to existing positions and the creation of new positions.[112] The announcement stated that some key members of Launceston General Hospital's executive team had either moved to another leadership role, were acting in their current role or were 'on a period of extended leave' before their impending retirement.[113]

3.3.4 Our observations

Health leaders need to be equipped and empowered to embed the expectations of the National Principles and related reforms in the day-to-day work and practice of staff working in health services. Various activities will aid their endeavours, including culture-improvement initiatives, refreshed policies and practices, and relevant professional development, for which we make recommendations elsewhere in this chapter.

Health leaders (and State Service staff) are subject to annual performance reviews. We consider that health leaders should have accountability measures for child safety in their performance agreements and that they should receive regular feedback on their performance against these measures.

The Australian Commission on Safety and Quality and Health Care's User Guide for Acute and Community Health Service Organisations that Provide Care for Children ('User Guide') suggests mechanisms through which health services should adopt the Charter on the Rights of Children and Young People in Healthcare Services in Australia (discussed below), including:

- allocating responsibility for the implementation of the Charter to a senior individual or committee
- building the requirements of the Charter into the organisation's safety and quality systems, and processes of care for children

- displaying the Charter in areas within the organisation frequented by children, such as paediatric units or play areas
- providing accessible copies of the Charter in formats that meet community needs, especially for those with limited capacity to read and comprehend complex written text
- providing education about the Charter to new members of the workforce responsible for providing care for children
- using the Charter as the basis for discussions between clinicians and children about care planning and treatment
- using play-based techniques when appropriate
- adding specific questions relating to the Charter to consumer experience surveys.[114]

We consider some of these mechanisms could be used to support a commitment to child safety across health services. We also recommend that the Department have appropriate processes in place to ensure leaders have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability requirements to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation.

Recommendation 15.5

The Department of Health should make health leadership accountable for embedding child safety as a priority, including by:

a. ensuring that all relevant health leaders have an obligation to act consistently with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (reflected in Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Standards) in their role descriptions and performance agreements, with compliance with this obligation to be reviewed annually

b. ensuring that the role descriptions and performance agreements of all staff providing services to children require them to protect child safety, with compliance with this obligation to be considered as part of annual performance reviews.

Recommendation 15.6

The Department of Health, to support health services become child safe organisations, should ensure:

a. child safety, including safety from abuse in health services, is overseen by the governance and leadership structures established through the cultural improvement program

b. child safety is built into the safety and quality systems of health services

c. staff responsible for providing care to children have the knowledge and skills to respond to child safety concerns in line with the expectations of a child safe organisation and relevant health service policies, including being equipped to identify and respond to indicators of child sexual abuse

d. staff act consistently with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (reflected in Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Standards) when performing their work, including in discussions between health practitioners, health workers and children about care planning and treatment.

3.4 Empowering children, families and carers

Children's views about their health care are important and should inform health services' policies and practices. In this section, we consider the barriers that children and their families and carers may face in identifying inappropriate behaviour by health workers and in raising concerns with health services, particularly in a hospital setting. We also consider how children can and should influence health services' policies and practices more generally. We make recommendations that will help to:

- facilitate engagement with children about safe health care
- address concerns about children's perceptions of safety in hospitals, including by creating a safe physical environment
- ensure consistent information is provided to children and their families and carers about patient rights, what they can expect of staff, and ways to provide feedback.

3.4.1 Empowering children and young people through meaningful engagement and participation

Principle 2 of the National Principles states, in part, an expectation that organisations ensure children and young people participate in decisions affecting them.[115] In health services, this means that children and young people should have the opportunity to inform decisions about their individual health care, and be consulted about the development, implementation and evaluation of health services' policies and strategies that are relevant to their care and safety.[116]

The Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care's User Guide states that health services can involve children and young people (as well as their families) in the development, implementation and evaluation of relevant policies and strategies through a governance structure that, among other things:

- effectively engages children and their families and carers
- has representation from children and their families and carers
- includes mechanisms to maximise engagement with children
- includes the views of children and their families when planning new facilities or redesigning existing ones.[117]

The National Standards also require health services to 'seek regular feedback from patients, carers and families about their experiences and outcomes of care' and to 'use this information to improve safety and quality systems'.[118]

At our hearings in September 2022, we asked Secretary Morgan-Wicks about how the voices and views of children were informing the Department's work. She indicated that the Department had engaged the Commissioner for Children and Young People and Child Wise, a child safeguarding consulting organisation, to provide expert advice on the best ways to ensure children's perspectives were reflected in the Child Safety and Wellbeing Framework and new policies and procedures.[119] In November 2022, Secretary Morgan-Wicks wrote to our Commission of Inquiry to tell us that the Department had worked with the Commissioner for Children and Young People to consult with children on a new name for the paediatric ward (previously known as Ward 4K) at Launceston General Hospital.[120] In a progress update provided to our Inquiry in February 2023, Secretary Morgan-Wicks wrote:

> The consultation process with children to engage them initially on child safeguarding themes is progressing and will also include consultation on renaming the children's wards across the State. The Department of Health will implement an ongoing engagement mechanism from the initial consultation process. Engagement with children will also feed into the development of child safe behaviours and further consideration of child-friendly complaint mechanisms.[121]

In June 2023, it was announced that paediatric wards across Tasmania's major hospitals will soon be known as the 'Wombat Ward', based on consultative processes with young Tasmanians aged 8 to 18 years through workshops at the Royal Hobart Hospital, Launceston General Hospital and the North West Regional Hospital in April 2023.[122] We were advised that these workshops also canvassed broader discussion of children's experiences of health services, including what was working well and what could be improved.[123]

We welcome this engagement, but consulting children and young people on the renaming of a hospital ward is a small step. While we are encouraged by some broader discussions about children and young people's experiences of health services, we would like to see the Department's engagement with children and young people continue to expand as reforms are further planned and implemented.

In December 2022, the Child Safe Governance Review reported that children and young people who are treated at Launceston General Hospital do not have a pathway for reporting concerns about their safety, other than raising these concerns 'in person' with a staff member.[124] The review made two recommendations relevant to this issue:

- the Department of Health [develops] an online form for children and young people to report concerns about their safety (in real time)[125]
- children and young people who are provided with health care within the Tasmanian Health Service be provided with the opportunity to complete a survey of their patient experience.[126]

Again, these steps are commendable. But we consider that the Department should go further to proactively empower children and young people to meaningfully participate in decision making on matters that affect them, including their safety. The Department could do this by setting up ways to engage with children and young people regularly and meaningfully.

The relationship between children and young people feeling heard and feeling safe was something identified through our commissioned research into safety in government run organisations.[127] Associate Professor Tim Moore, Deputy Director, Institute of Child Protection Studies, Australian Catholic University, who was one of the researchers we commissioned, told us:

> Children and young people want to play a part in their own protection and, in building alliances with adults to develop strategies to meet their safety needs, they can build confidence, awareness and an ability to turn to adults if they are being harmed … 'participatory' strategies need to empower individual children and young people through child-friendly and proactive means as well as through collective activities such as youth advisory groups.[128]

Liana Buchanan, Principal Commissioner, Commission for Children and Young People (Victoria), similarly stated that:

> Efforts to empower children in organisations are critical. An organisation can have perfect policies, processes and systems but if children do not feel that they will be listened to if they speak up, and that they will be believed and action taken, the policies and systems will be of little value.[129]

Victoria's Commission for Children and Young People has developed a guide for organisations working with children and young people.[130] The guide recognises that everyone benefits when children and young people's participation is done well, outlining principles to support the meaningful participation of children and young people in decision making.[131] The Commission for Children and Young People's guide also includes specific advice for involving children and young people of different ages.[132]

The Office of the Advocate for Children and Young People in New South Wales has developed a comprehensive guide for setting up a children and young people's advisory group.[133] The purpose of such an advisory group is to facilitate the voices of children and young people on a range of issues relevant to service delivery.[134] An advisory group is a way to gather feedback, test ideas and ensure policies and practices best reflect the unique needs of children and young people.[135] Participation in an advisory group can build children and young people's trust and confidence in an organisation, improve the experience of children and young people within that organisation, and enhance the knowledge of an organisation's leaders about child safety.[136]

Establishing a dedicated health services young people's advisory group in Tasmania will help facilitate the contribution of young people in creating safer health services and will complement measures the Department is already implementing.

The types of issues that the health services young people's advisory group could contribute to, using developmentally appropriate methods, include:

- policies and practices that relate to providing health care to children and young people (for example, expected standards of staff behaviour, use of chaperones (or accompanying persons/observers) and processes for getting informed consent, or how to make a complaint)
- induction materials for staff in child-facing roles
- the design, interpretation and response to surveying children and young people cared for in Tasmanian health services recommended by the Child Safe Governance Review[137]
- initiatives to improve the experience of health care for groups with particular needs (for example, Aboriginal and other culturally diverse children, gender diverse young people and those with disability or mental illness, or those who identify as LGBTQIA+)
- analysing complaints data and advising on how to avoid future complaints
- implementing initiatives under the Child Safe Organisation Project
- built environment projects or upgrades to facilities that will affect younger patients
- contributing to recruitment processes for senior roles focused on child safety.

It is important that the health services young people's advisory group is adequately funded and that the role and functions of the group, including the scope of its authority, are clear from the outset. Without this support and role clarity, participants may feel the group is tokenistic or hollow, creating understandable cynicism and distrust that only serve to damage an organisation.

It would be beneficial for senior leaders within the Department and its agencies, as well as statutory role holders—such as the Health Complaints Commissioner, Ahpra, the National Boards and the Commissioner for Children and Young People—to regularly engage with the health services young people's advisory group. This engagement could include making themselves available for questions and discussion.

We acknowledge that setting up a health services young people's advisory group may mean that only a small number of children and young people are consulted. It is therefore important that the Department also pursues other strategies to engage children and young people of all ages. These strategies may include consultations, surveys, youth forums and events, staff communications and social media.[138] One strategy, for example, could involve extending the role of hospital-based child safeguarding officers to include engaging and empowering children and young people through regular visits to hospital wards and providing information to them in appropriate formats. It is imperative that the Department identifies age-appropriate ways to engage with all children and young people on questions of patient safety.[139] The health services young people's advisory group would be well placed to advise on these strategies.

Recommendation 15.7

1. The Department of Health should establish a health services young people's advisory group. The advisory group should:
    a. have a clear purpose and objectives
    b. be guided by clear terms of reference developed in consultation with children and young people
    c. comprise young people with significant lived experience of health services, including young people of different ages, from diverse backgrounds and with different care needs
    d. enable young people to contribute to decision making in a safe and meaningful way about issues that affect them
    e. allow young people to have a say in departmental strategies, policies, procedures and protocols that affect them
    f. be adequately funded and resourced.
2. Summaries of the health services young people's advisory group meetings should be prepared and distributed to all senior executive teams in the Department.

3. The Department should report on the activities of the health services young people's advisory group and on other engagement with children and young people through its annual report.
4. The Department should undertake other age-appropriate engagement with children to ensure as many children and young people as possible can take part in shaping health services.

3.4.2 Children and young people's perception of safety in hospitals

Our commissioned research showed that children often feel unsafe and disempowered during hospital stays. Some reported feeling unsafe because they were given little information about their treatment or because medical staff dismissed their opinions.[140] Associate Professor Moore said:

> Children continue to report that they feel disrespected, their needs and wishes disregarded and their ability to influence change as limited. While we see children as having less value to adults and their views and needs as secondary to those of adults, children are vulnerable.[141]

Speaking of their experience receiving care at a hospital, one young person explained how not being believed affects how safe and well young people feel:

> Socially, often, children aren't believed when they say something. Their opinions aren't valued as much because they're children, because they're young.
> A lack of life experience. I also think because I was unwell mentally, physically.
> But regardless, if I'm unwell, I should still be treated with compassionate decency.
> To treat somebody in that state in such [a] dehumanising and most humiliating way, it just makes you feel worse. It makes you not want to commit to getting better.
> I makes you feel like you're hopeless.[142]

This young person went on to describe how raising concerns did not resolve their negative situation at the hospital and left them feeling their issues were not taken seriously. They said that for children to feel safe in institutions like hospitals it is essential that they are believed and listened to.[143]

Some people, including children and young people, are not aware of their rights when receiving health care.[144] Angelique Knight, a former Ward 4K patient, told us: 'You are so vulnerable while you are in hospital because you are completely reliant on someone else doing everything for you'.[145] She said: 'Patients should be told about how they can make complaints. There could be signs up on the wall or a pamphlet could be placed in your hospital pack'.[146] This sense of disempowerment can also extend to parents and carers of child patients. For example, Angela (a pseudonym) described the challenge she faced when she raised concerns about vaginal cream being used for her young daughter, who has cerebral palsy and needs support to communicate.[147] Angela said she raised her concerns but felt staff dismissed them and that she was unaware of any action being taken.[148]
