Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings

Who was looking after me? Prioritising the safety of Tasmanian children

Volume 1: Summary, recommendations and findings

August 2023

Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings Report

Volume 1
Summary, recommendations and findings

The Honourable Marcia Neave AO
President and Commissioner

Professor Leah Bromfield
Commissioner

The Honourable Robert Benjamin AM SC
Commissioner

August 2023

Volume 1: Summary, recommendations and findings
978-0-6457694-1-8
Published August 2023

ISBN:

Volume 1 978-0-6457694-1-8

Volume 2 978-0-6457694-2-5

Volume 3 978-0-6457694-3-2

Volume 4 978-0-6457694-4-9

Volume 5 (Book 1) 978-0-6457694-5-6

Volume 5 (Book 2) 978-0-6457694-5-6

Volume 5 (Book 3) 978-0-6457694-5-6

Volume 6 (Book 1) 978-0-6457694-6-3

Volume 6 (Book 2) 978-0-6457694-6-3

Volume 7 978-0-6457694-7-0

Volume 8 978-0-6457694-8-7

Suggested citation:
Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, August 2023).

Acknowledgment of Aboriginal land

We acknowledge and pay our respects to the traditional and original owners of the lands on which we conducted our Commission of Inquiry, particularly the Aboriginal peoples of lutruwita. We celebrate the rich and diverse cultures of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples across Australia. We also acknowledge Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children, within whom culture lives and grows.

Content warning

Please be aware that the content in this report includes descriptions of child sexual abuse and may be distressing or raise issues of concern for some readers.

We encourage readers to exercise discretion in their engagement with this content and to seek support and care if required.

Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings

Her Excellency the Honourable Barbara Baker AC
Governor of Tasmania Government House
7 Lower Domain Road
Hobart TAS 7000

Your Excellency

In accordance with the Order of Her Excellency Professor the Honourable Kate Warner AC issued on 15 March 2021 and amendments to that Order dated 7 February 2022 and 26 April 2023, we have the honour of presenting to you the report, findings and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings.

Yours sincerely

The Hon. Marcia Neave AO
President and Commissioner

Professor Leah Bromfield
Commissioner

The Hon. Robert Benjamin AM SC
Commissioner

31/08/2023

1800 950 110
GPO Box 229, Hobart TAS 7001

commissionofinquiry.tas.gov.au contact@commissionofinquiry.tas.gov.au

Contents

VOLUME 1

Summary, recommendations and findings

VOLUME 2

Establishment and context

VOLUME 3

Children in schools

VOLUME 4

Children in out of home care

VOLUME 5

Children in youth detention (Book 1)

VOLUME 5

Children in youth detention (Book 2)

VOLUME 5

Children in youth detention (Book 3)

VOLUME 6

Children in health services (Book 1)

VOLUME 6

Children in health services (Book 2)

VOLUME 7

The justice system and victim-survivors

VOLUME 8

Oversight, coordination and therapeutic support

Preface

Who was looking after me?

This was a question we heard from more than one victim-survivor of child sexual abuse. Sometimes it was simply a statement, but in many instances it was a genuine question, reflecting a deep feeling of bewilderment that we came to share. How can child sexual abuse have been allowed to happen in some of Tasmania's most important institutions? How could children have continued to face known risks of sexual abuse and victim-survivors been ignored, blamed, denied justice and silenced?

On 15 March 2021, the Governor of Tasmania asked us to examine allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions. It may have appeared that our Commission of Inquiry was established in a sudden groundswell of community concern. It is true that 2020 reflected a tipping point. But it could not have been reached without persistent advocacy from victim-survivors, alongside their families and supporters, whistleblowers and journalists who have long called for greater justice, transparency and accountability in how child sexual abuse is addressed in Tasmania.

We had the privilege of hearing from extraordinary Tasmanians who placed their trust in us to drive much-needed change. This includes, most importantly, victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, who revisited their trauma and anguish to share their experiences. They told us of their pain and hopelessness when adults failed to believe or protect them as children. Victim-survivors and their families also told us of their sense of betrayal when they sought, but did not receive, support and justice for the abuse they suffered.

We respect and were deeply moved by the dedication and determination of victim-survivors, their families, whistleblowers and supporters to create change. We also learned that there are many good people who, although working every day in broken systems, put children's interests above all else.

Several State Service witnesses gave evidence to our Inquiry. Some did so with an expectation that their actions would come under considerable scrutiny. While the public glare of our hearings was understandably uncomfortable for some, it was needed to diagnose what lies at the heart of the problems we must solve to better protect children. We are grateful to those state servants who were cooperative, reflective and sought to assist our Inquiry. While most people engaged with us in good faith, we were disappointed that this cooperation was not universal.

We hope our public hearings helped the broader Tasmanian community learn more about this complex problem, particularly with the benefit of expert and lived-experience witnesses and of other stakeholders who informed our understanding of the problems and the possible solutions. We are grateful for their time and expertise.

The symphony of people, stories, documents, reports, written submissions, oral evidence and sessions with Commissioners we heard, digested and harmonised across all our teams has informed our report. So much happens behind the scenes of an inquiry like this, including important considerations for logistics, research, writing, managing technology, safety and wellbeing, among many other matters. To this end, we were supported by a highly capable, cohesive, professional and dedicated team of people, whom we thank and acknowledge in Appendix C, including our policy and research, community engagement, operations, legal and counsel assisting teams.

Undertaking an inquiry into child sexual abuse is not easy. It involves engaging with highly confronting evidence and testimony. One aspect of our Inquiry that made it particularly challenging was the recent and continuing nature of many of the risks and systemic issues adversely affecting the safety of children and the experience of victim-survivors. The need for our Inquiry to prompt the urgent changes required weighed heavily at times, but the opportunity to create that change was also a great source of hope and motivation. All three of us emerge from this experience changed people—depleted in some ways, but greatly enriched in others.

We were pleased to see positive changes beginning to occur throughout the life of our Inquiry and trust that the Tasmanian community will call its government to account if that progress does not continue. This cannot be 'just another inquiry'. It is our strong hope that our report will increase community understanding and awareness of how child sexual abuse occurs and how deeply it harms victim-survivors and their families, sometimes irreparably. Our community needs to understand that child sexual abuse is neither rare nor isolated. Sadly, it is common and usually preventable. It is our expectation that the Tasmanian Government will implement our recommendations so that current and future generations of Tasmanian children and young people will be much better protected.

We must not look away.

Executive summary

1 Introduction

This Commission of Inquiry was prompted by a groundswell of community concern in 2019–20 over child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions. It followed media reporting of incidents of abuse and inadequacies in the Government's response to these incidents. This included the well-publicised case of a paediatric nurse, James Griffin, whose abuses at Launceston General Hospital were described in The Nurse podcast in late 2020, roughly a year after he died by suicide while awaiting trial. Media reports also began to expose instances of child sexual abuse by other State Service employees, including teachers, youth detention staff and health practitioners. Although the Government's initial response to these concerns characterised these matters as 'historical', others in the community and media questioned the extent to which failures to keep Tasmanian children safe were indeed in the past.[1]

Around this time, the Tasmanian Government instigated two independent reviews into child sexual abuse in the education and health systems and an investigation into the conduct of three employees at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[2] However, as acknowledged by the then Premier, the Honourable Peter Gutwein MP, it was clear that despite establishing these reviews and other government activities, more needed to be done to protect children.[3]

On 23 November 2020, then Premier Gutwein announced that he intended to recommend to Her Excellency Professor the Honourable Kate Warner AC, then Governor of Tasmania, that she 'establish a Commission of Inquiry under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 to investigate the responses of Tasmanian Government Agencies in relation to the management of historical allegations of child sexual abuse'.[4] In making this announcement, Premier Gutwein acknowledged that despite the Government's efforts:

> … as the number of allegations coming to light continues to grow, we must take every step necessary to ensure we identify any systemic gaps and put in place measures to fill them.
>
> This situation is nothing short of terrible and we must take further action. I believe one of our greatest responsibilities is to learn from the past, and commit to not repeating its mistakes.[5]

In the announcement, the Premier stated that 'there will be more shocking examples come to light'.[6] The Premier referred to five State Service employees who had been suspended from work at the time due to claims of child sexual abuse, one of whom was stood down pending the outcome of criminal proceedings.[7] A media report in February 2021 suggested that another 14 State Service employees had been stood down since the Premier's announcement.[8] By February 2023, the number of state servants suspended due to allegations of child sexual abuse had risen to 92.[9] These state servants came from the then Department of Communities, the then Department of Education and the Department of Health. Some 38 of those state servants were suspended following our Commission of Inquiry's establishment.[10]

The Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings was established by Order of the Governor on 15 March 2021.[11]

This volume gives a high-level summary of our report, including the full list of our recommendations and findings. We start with the big picture—our overall conclusions and key reforms—before outlining how we got there, describing our approach and what we heard. We then provide short summaries of each of our volumes and chapters. We conclude with the full list of our recommendations and our findings.

2 Why this Commission of Inquiry was necessary

More than one in four Australians have experienced child sexual abuse, either within or outside institutions.[12] This represents an extraordinary number of people who are living with the devastating consequences of sexual violation. The simple reality of these numbers means that, in our lives, we will all inevitably know, love and care for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse—assuming we have not been abused ourselves. We all have a personal stake in preventing abuse from occurring and in ensuring victim-survivors receive the support, acknowledgment and justice they deserve.

The prevalence of child sexual abuse also means that many of us will, at some point, encounter abusers. While it can be hard to accept, the reality is that abusers are often our friends, family members, colleagues and neighbours. As we have learned in our Inquiry, too often they are the very people our society entrusts with the care of children—teachers, doctors, nurses, carers and youth workers, among others.

This report focuses on abuse that occurs in Tasmanian government or government funded institutions. While, overwhelmingly, people who work with children act in their best interests, some are predatory and tactical in their grooming and abuse. Not all child sex abusers are paedophiles. Some become institutional abusers because the cultural, operational or environmental context of their workplace enables or encourages such abuse to occur. Abusers need to be prevented from working in institutions, held accountable and removed from positions that give them access to children. This is generally accepted as uncontroversial but does not always translate into practice.

It is important to understand the systemic factors that can contribute to institutional child sexual abuse. This includes big-picture issues such as the effectiveness of the law, government policies (and how they are implemented) as well as community attitudes and awareness of child sexual abuse. It is also necessary to look closely at the cultural and other factors in institutions that increase the risk of child sexual abuse, allow it to go undetected, or even allow it to continue once it is suspected or known. Our consideration of these broader systemic issues has formed the basis of many of our recommendations.

But within these broader systems are individual people. Over our lifetime, many of us may find ourselves directly or indirectly contributing to the conditions that increase the risks or occurrence of child sexual abuse. Sometimes, we are directly called upon to act in the face of a disclosure, but more often it is our day-to-day actions that make us a cog in a broader machine that quietly tolerates abuse and the sexualisation of children. It is a confronting thought.

What became very clear to us is that our collective community understanding of child sexual abuse remains poor and unsophisticated. Myths and misconceptions about child sexual abuse continue to undermine the urgency and extent of the problem. These myths include that institutional child sexual abuse is rare and a problem of the past, that children are prone to misunderstand, lie or exaggerate abuse, or that abusers are obviously sinister individuals rather than ordinary and often well-respected people in the community.

The National Royal Commission into Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings ('National Royal Commission'), which ran from 2013 to 2017, was instrumental in exposing the inadequacy of established systems in preventing and responding to child sexual abuse. We heard harrowing accounts not only of child sexual abuse but of unfeeling and cruel responses from institutions that sought to preserve their reputations by dodging accountability for the harm that occurred under their watch.

The recommendations of the National Royal Commission reflect the best evidence of what works to prevent and respond more effectively to child sexual abuse, and greatly informed our Commission of Inquiry. We commend the Tasmanian Government's efforts to implement many of the National Royal Commission recommendations, but other recommendations are outstanding or remain in progress. While many Tasmanians took part in the National Royal Commission, its recommendations were developed with the broader nation in mind and did not have a dedicated focus on the Tasmanian context—including its unique challenges and strengths.

As we described earlier, our Commission of Inquiry was prompted by increasing community concern in 2019–20 about the safety of children in institutions and the ability of government agencies to respond to allegations of child sexual abuse effectively. Tasmania has not had a commission of inquiry since 2000, and ours is only the second since the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 ('Commissions of Inquiry Act') was passed. They are rare and reflect a unique opportunity to investigate past practices and make recommendations for future change.

We wanted our report to be a contribution to the public record—both in reflecting Tasmania's response to institutional sexual abuse at a point in time, and building broader knowledge that can help strengthen the evidence base to inform future policy development. Our report is an unprecedented account of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian institutions and, in some instances, a forensic examination of how and why abuse occurs or is enabled. For example, we have identified that, for decades, some children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre experienced systematic harm and abuse, a horrific blight on Tasmania. This uncomfortable truth must be documented and acknowledged.

We consider the systemic harm and abuse we identified at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to reflect the end point of a longstanding organisational culture that initiates or tolerates the humiliation, belittling and devaluing of detainees, with some long-term staff continuing to apply a punitive model of youth detention. Over many years, governments had been warned of the mistreatment of children in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and yet the response appeared to remain the same—training and development. Our analysis of Ashley Youth Detention Centre is a cautionary tale for all youth justice facilities of the risks of tolerating the deterioration of respect, care and professionalism towards children and young people.

Our report adds to the understanding of the risks of child sexual abuse in health institutions, which the National Royal Commission did not specifically examine. This was an area where we found a surprising lack of research. The accounts of abuse at or connected to Launceston General Hospital challenge myths about the assumed safety of children in health services, and demonstrate that abusers can groom children gradually and be brazen risk-takers, seizing opportunities to abuse in what are often assumed to be safe and busy settings. It is important for health services to be vigilant to the unique ways sexual abuse can occur under the guise of medical treatment and recognise the inherent power imbalance that contributes to a high degree of trust being placed in health practitioners by patients and their families.

We have also had the opportunity to understand the impact and operation of reforms from the National Royal Commission, such as the National Redress Scheme. This was recommended by the National Royal Commission to provide financial restitution and access to counselling services for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional settings, and to acknowledge the harm that has been done to them.[13] The National Redress Scheme began on 1 July 2018, with the Tasmanian Government adopting the Scheme shortly after, on 1 November 2018.[14] To date, the Tasmanian Government has received close to 700 claims.[15]

Victim-survivors told us about their mixed experiences of making claims under the National Redress Scheme and identified some areas of potential improvement. We also came to understand the challenges some government departments faced when they received information through National Redress Scheme applications that raised sexual abuse allegations about their employees. We consider this discovery requires government and non-government institutions across Australia to ensure they have systems in place for identifying whether allegations arising through the National Redress Scheme relate to current staff and to ensure any potential risks to children are addressed. It should also inform the design (or redesign) of redress schemes in the future to make it easier for institutions to use information to address potential risks to children, without compromising accessibility for applicants. As our Inquiry shows, child sexual abuse in institutions has not been relegated to the past but continues to occur. There is a clear need for redress schemes to be extended to the latest generation of victim-survivors who have been sexually abused in an institutional context.

We trust our work adds to the growing (but, in some cases, underdeveloped) research on the factors that contribute to child sexual abuse, particularly children's perspectives on safety in institutions. To assist our Inquiry, we commissioned research that asked Tasmanian children and young people how safe they felt in institutions and the steps they would take if they felt unsafe. This led to the report Take Notice, Believe Us and Act! Exploring the Safety of Children and Young People in Government Run Organisations by Associate Professor Tim Moore and Emeritus Professor Morag McArthur, who expertly gathered and analysed important information from young Tasmanians about what safety means to them. We are grateful to all the children and young people who participated in this research. They were candid and insightful in their opinions, which informed us greatly. We have shared their views throughout our report.

3 Overall conclusions

Through the course of our Inquiry, we have reached the following answers to four key questions about the Tasmanian Government's response to institutional child sexual abuse.

Question 1: Has the Tasmanian Government's response to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutions since 2000 to the 2020s been adequate?

Too often, no. While we saw pockets of good practice, this was often a result of the initiative and good judgment of individuals rather than something encouraged and enforced by a broader system. More commonly, institutions did not recognise child sexual abuse for what it was and failed to act decisively to manage risks and investigate complaints. Sometimes this was due to a lack of guidance and direction on how to manage incidents well but, also, due to ignorance, inertia and a desire to protect reputational interests. Too often, institutions did not effectively manage active risks to children and young people or extend adequate care when they disclosed abuse.

Question 2: Are Tasmanian Government institutions safe for children and young people?

Generally, yes. Overwhelmingly, people who work with children and young people do so with their best interests at the forefront. Most Tasmanian children are safe in government institutions, but some are not. More can and should be done to improve their safety. Despite some changes made during the life of our Inquiry, we continue to be worried about children in out of home care and youth detention, as well as Aboriginal children in institutions, and consider improving safety for them should be a priority.

Question 3: Does the Tasmanian Government have the right systems in place to effectively address risks and respond to incidents of child sexual abuse in institutions into the future?

Not often enough. We have seen improvements from changes implemented over the course of our Inquiry, but our recommendations reflect that much more needs to be done. A greater focus on child safety needs to be embedded in decision making and in the day-to-day practices of government departments. Staff need more education and training on child sexual abuse and clear guidance and support to help them identify and confidently respond to risks of child sexual abuse. We consider that requirements for organisations to comply with legislated Child and Youth Safe Standards and a Reportable Conduct Scheme (discussed in Section 6.2) will be a key way for institutions to prevent and better respond to the risks of child sexual abuse.

Question 4: Does the Tasmanian Government have a culture that encourages feedback, reporting, monitoring and reflection when responding to incidents of child sexual abuse?

Not often enough. We observed some leaders within the State Service resisted constructive criticism and lacked the curiosity and initiative required to ensure children's safety was prioritised. We also saw passivity and failures to act, particularly in response to past reviews, inquiries and internal reports highlighting problems that increased risks to children in institutions. We would like to see leaders be role models for prioritising children's rights and safety. To achieve this goal, leaders need the qualities of self-reflection, an ability to acknowledge mistakes and a drive for making improvements.

4 Key reforms for safer institutions for children and young people

We recommend several key reforms that will fundamentally change the way child sexual abuse in institutions is addressed in Tasmania. These reforms are central to protecting Tasmanian children and young people from abuse and harm in the organisations that care for them.

In developing our recommendations, we have attempted to take a strategic and practical approach by building on reforms that the Tasmanian Government has started or already implemented. We want our reform agenda to succeed and contribute to major change. We have kept at the forefront of our thinking the unique strengths and challenges to achieving good practice in Tasmania. But we have also tried to not let our emphasis on a practical approach get in the way of our aspiration for Tasmania to become a leader in child safety. We consider that Tasmania's smaller size and networked communities make it easier in some ways for it to be bold and ambitious in reform and to provide an advantage over larger jurisdictions in translating policy into changes in frontline practice. We want the Tasmanian Government and the broader community to feel pride in its child safety system rather than have a sense it is constantly catching up to an expected standard.

4.1 Creating a new, strengthened regulator and advocate for children and young people's rights and safety

It is important that children's rights and safety receives the focus and attention it deserves. For this reason, we recommend a new Commission for Children and Young People be established with appropriate independence, powers and resourcing to act as a strong and fearless advocate for children's rights and to monitor child safe practices in organisations.

We recommend that three key role-holders form the leadership of the new Commission and that all have relevant expertise in children's rights and safety:

- A Commissioner for Children and Young People with expanded powers and functions.
- A new Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People to advocate broadly for Aboriginal children, particularly for those in out of home care and youth detention.
- A new independent Child Advocate to advocate on behalf of children and young people in out of home care and youth detention, with the power to make a complaint to the Ombudsman on behalf of a child or young person in out of home care or youth detention, and to apply to the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal to review departmental decisions about children in out of home care.

We note the Tasmanian Government's creation of an Independent Regulator for Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Framework. We consider that the functions of the Independent Regulator should sit within the new Commission for Children and Young People and that the Independent Regulator should be the Commissioner for Children and Young People. We acknowledge there may be a transition period to combine these roles.

The new Commission for Children and Young People would build on the functions and powers of Tasmania's current Commissioner for Children and Young People, particularly in advocacy, research and policy influence and in amplifying children's voices and perspectives. However, we recommend it have additional functions, including:

- acting as the Independent Regulator for Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Framework (as noted)—this would involve monitoring and enforcing compliance with legislated requirements reflected in Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme
- establishing an independent community visitor scheme for children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities to increase the visibility of children and young people in these settings and make it easier for them to report any concerns to an independent person
- expanding powers to monitor and oversee the performance of the out of home care and youth justice systems and advocating for any necessary improvements and reforms
- advocating for individual children and young people in out of home care or youth detention, including by supporting them to complain to the Ombudsman about their treatment and, for children in out of home care, to apply for an independent review of a departmental decision that affects them.

The new Commission for Children and Young People should be a valued source of information, education and guidance for Tasmanian organisations and the broader community on children's rights and safety. Although we envisage it will work alongside organisations (including government departments) to promote the best interests of children and young people, we expect it to be fearlessly independent and to use its public platform and various powers to identify failings and hold government accountable when needed.

Tasmanian children and young people, particularly those who are in the day-to-day care of the Government, deserve a trusted and powerful organisation to champion their rights.

4.2 Introducing a more coordinated and statewide response to child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours

We want the benefits of best practice responses to child sexual abuse in institutional settings to reach far and wide. Particularly in a small state like Tasmania, we want to avoid different organisations, departments or sectors unnecessarily 'reinventing the wheel' and failing to recognise and learn from good practices in other institutions.

While some of our recommendations are quite specific to a particular institutional setting, and the expertise required for that setting, others are intended to have a broader benefit, including to non-government institutions and the wider community. We consider child sexual abuse prevention initiatives to be of particular benefit to the broader Tasmanian community.

We consider children and young people in Tasmania should receive age-appropriate child sexual abuse education. It is not the responsibility of children and young people to prevent abuse, but we consider evidence-based education can give children and young people greater confidence to identify and report safety issues, and reduces their vulnerability to grooming and exploitation.

Child sexual abuse education can challenge myths and misconceptions and provide the opportunity for children to understand consent, respectful relationships and the important role bystanders can play. This is critical knowledge that will assist efforts to keep children and young people safe into adulthood and contribute to generational change in the incidence of child sexual abuse. We also expect parents and carers will indirectly benefit from these programs, which can help inform their own conversations about safety with their children. Given how common child sexual abuse is, we consider this education will also help people respond more sensitively to disclosures they may receive from family, friends and others in their lives. We recommend child sexual abuse curriculum be mandated from early learning programs to Year 12, across all types of state schools, drawing on evidence of best practice.

Child sexual abuse in institutions is best addressed through prevention. In our report, we explore many of the factors that reduce the risks of child sexual abuse in institutions, which include: clear, child-centred policies and practices; child safety training and professional development; strong screening practices; and an organisational culture that promotes children's rights and acts decisively in response to risks to their safety. These features are reflected in the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations, which Tasmania has legislated through its Child and Youth Safe Standards and will require a broad range of government and non-government organisations to satisfy its requirements. We recommend all organisations, whether legally bound to or not, consider adopting the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations. We consider these reforms are key to reducing risks of child sexual abuse in institutions.

While child sexual abuse can be related to other forms of harm, including family violence or adult sexual assault, child sexual abuse must be given priority by the Tasmanian Government as a standalone issue. We recommend that the Tasmanian Government develops a whole of government child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan (which includes child sexual abuse in institutional settings) that sets out the outcomes it wants to achieve in addressing child sexual abuse and how they will be measured. This should include agreed definitions of child sexual abuse, institutional child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours that can be used across government and beyond. It should describe the stakeholder landscape and consultation processes to be adopted through reform. The child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan should be supported by strong governance arrangements and be overseen by the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, as Chair of the Secretaries Board. This should support coordination and collaboration across government. We also recommend that the governance structures for the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan incorporate the voices of children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, including institutional child sexual abuse.

We also see great benefit in a coordinated approach to preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. The Tasmanian Government should set out a whole of government approach, with a common understanding of what constitutes harmful sexual behaviours, high-level guidance on how to respond and, in the response, a clear outline of the roles and responsibilities of different government and government funded agencies. To provide practical support and guidance, the Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit. The Unit should help local areas enable a consistent, best practice, proportionate approach to responding to harmful sexual behaviours in schools, out of home care and residential youth detention that balances the needs of victim-survivors, children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours and other affected parties. We also call for specialised and targeted responses to harmful sexual behaviours for out of home care and youth justice tailored to the heightened needs of children and young people in these settings.

We recommend the Department of Premier and Cabinet provides leadership in building a therapeutic service system for adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, as well as therapeutic interventions for children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours. This includes funding sexual assault services to meet demand, addressing gaps in services (including how best to meet the needs of diverse populations), evaluating the performance of services, and creating child safe accreditation standards for service providers. We also recommend the Tasmanian Government establishes a peak body for the sexual assault service system. This will bring greater cohesion and coordination and amplify the advocacy of the sector.

4.3 Increasing participation of children and young people, victim-survivors and service providers in policy design and delivery

Across our report, we highlight the importance of involving children and young people in the decisions that affect them. This not only shows children and young people that they are important, but also leads to better policies and decisions.

We consider that children and young people's perspectives should be more formally built into Tasmanian Government policy development and decision making. We consider the existing Premier's Youth Advisory Council, which has members aged between 12 and 25, to be a suitable group to offer perspectives on a broad range of issues affecting children and young people, including the whole of government approach to child sexual abuse.

We also recommend establishing advisory groups for specific institutional contexts such as out of home care, youth detention and health services. We have considered whether, for efficiency, there could be one advisory group to meet these different purposes. However, in our view, these specific institutional contexts require specialist knowledge about these systems, gained through direct experience. For example, it would be difficult for a young person to contribute meaningful opinions on youth justice without having had experience of that system. In contrast, given the lower level of vulnerability of most children and young people in schools, we consider the Premier's Youth Advisory Council and other existing broad student representative groups should be engaged on policy and reform work in schools. In constituting institution-specific advisory groups, it is important to reflect the experiences of young people with diverse backgrounds and life experiences, particularly groups that are marginalised.

We also consider that adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse have important knowledge and expertise to offer the Tasmanian Government, particularly as it embarks on a major reform agenda. Many adult victim-survivors have recent experiences engaging with institutions and can bring important perspectives on issues such as civil litigation, access to government documents and redress. We also recommend establishing an adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group made up of members who have experienced institutional child sexual abuse, who are of different ages, backgrounds and geographical locations, and who can represent victim-survivors of different genders, Aboriginal victim-survivors, victim-survivors with disability and parents of victim-survivors.

4.4 Introducing stronger mechanisms for institutions to protect children in institutions from adults who pose a risk to them

Too often, our Inquiry revealed failures to take action to address risks adults posed to children and young people. While sometimes this could be blamed on the ignorance or poor judgment of individuals, it was clear to us that policies and practices for addressing risks adults posed to children in institutions tended to contribute to inaction.

We accept there is a delicate balance to be struck. We want people to feel comfortable to raise child safety concerns early and for these concerns to be well received. However, we also want to avoid organisations becoming overly paranoid and hypervigilant because this can undermine healthy and beneficial connections between staff, and the children and young people with whom they engage.

Waiting until a suspicion or concern becomes undeniable will sometimes allow abuse to continue and worsen. It may also place other children at risk. Sometimes, mistakes such as minor boundary breaches can happen due to the inexperience of individuals and can be quickly resolved through conversation and education. But, in other instances, these early warning signs point to a bigger problem that will require more serious and careful intervention. While education and guidance are important, sometimes there is no substitute for common sense and good judgment.

We make a range of recommendations for changes to State Service disciplinary processes to remove some of the real or perceived barriers to acting against staff in relation to child sexual abuse and related conduct. This includes making changes to the State Service Code of Conduct to prioritise the protection of children through clear and enforceable professional conduct policies, greater flexibility to suspend employees subject to allegations while an investigation is undertaken and increased rights in the disciplinary process for people making complaints and for affected children. We also make several recommendations to streamline processes and reduce delay. We consider that our recommendations strike the right balance in ensuring complaints are managed with fairness and transparency, but not at the expense of protecting children. Our proposed reforms require a significant shift in how the Tasmanian Government approaches disciplinary processes for state servants and may require changes to awards and agreements. We recommend the Government adopts initiatives to drive significant cultural change within the State Service. We invite unions to support our proposed reforms. We also recommend that the Government adopts appropriate measures to ensure volunteers, contractors and temporary staff (including relief teachers) in child-facing institutions are held to the same professional expectations as staff.

We consider child sexual abuse needs a specialist response. When they arise, these matters are complicated and overwhelming for leaders. Institutions need help and guidance in how to fairly and transparently manage allegations against staff while keeping children and young people safe. We recommend creating a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate with three distinct units and functions: case managing the response; investigating the allegation; and advising the Head of Agency as to the action they should take based on the investigation.

The Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should respond to allegations about staff in schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth justice. It should ensure institutions support victim-survivors, communicate appropriately with those affected, and conduct child-friendly and trauma-informed investigations that go beyond examining individual incidents to considering the broader context around an alleged abuser's interactions with children. To enable this, the unit responsible for case management should be staffed with people with knowledge and expertise of each of the organisational contexts they will support. The Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should be responsible for providing considered advice to a Head of Agency to support them to make informed disciplinary decisions.

In addition to child sexual abuse, the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should respond to other forms of staff-perpetrated abuse in schools, out of home care and youth justice, which contribute to creating an environment in which child sexual abuse is likely to occur. This can include allegations relating to excessive use of force, inappropriate isolation or unlawful search allegations, particularly in youth detention. The Directorate could also respond to child-related critical incidents in health or family violence and homelessness services. We recommend that the Department of Health either establishes its own Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate or refers matters to the broader Directorate, which should have access to appropriate specialist health expertise if this occurs.

The disciplinary reforms we recommend will only apply to state servants. However, we also hold concerns about adults who pose a risk to children in the out of home care system, including carers, or abusers in the community who target and exploit vulnerable children in care. The Department for Education, Children and Young People is responsible for children and young people in out of home care. It must respond effectively to concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care, including by promptly addressing any concerns or complaints about carers (including kinship, foster or residential carers). We recommend that the Office of the Chief Practitioner triages, records, monitors and coordinates all complaints about carers. We expect the Chief Practitioner to refer complaints of child sexual abuse by staff to the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate for investigation, supported by experts in child safety and the out of home care system. The obligation to report all serious concerns to the Chief Practitioner should be embedded in contracts with out of home care providers. For other care concerns that will not require a State Service disciplinary response—such as child sexual exploitation by adults who are not state servants, alleged abuse by carers or harmful sexual behaviours—the Chief Practitioner should monitor and support the response by a child's case manager and care provider.

We also recommend stronger and more preventative approaches to child sexual exploitation, which occurs when a child is manipulated or coerced into sexual activity by adults in exchange for incentives—a circumstance too common for children in out of home care. We heard examples of children and young people being exploited in this way, with abusers taking advantage of their desperation for love, care and affection. Children and young people were exploited in return for food, shelter, drugs and an illusion of safety, care and protection. We were saddened to see this exploitation too often mistaken by child safety officers and police as a consensual 'relationship'.

We recommend that the Department for Education, Children and Young People and Tasmania Police work with non-government providers and other relevant stakeholders to develop a framework for preventing and responding to sexual exploitation of children in care that is informed by best practice and evidence from other jurisdictions. We want all agencies, particularly those working with children in the care system, to improve their ability to identify child sexual exploitation and take all steps to prevent and disrupt this behaviour.

4.5 Showing greater care, compassion and investment in protecting and healing marginalised children

All children are vulnerable to child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours, but some groups of children are far more likely to be abused in institutions. This is because some children, through circumstance, spend more time in institutions—for example, children with chronic illnesses are more likely to have long stays in hospitals. Others are more likely to enter institutional care. For example, Aboriginal communities told us that the continuing impacts of colonisation, Stolen Generations and associated policy failures have caused the staggering over-representation of Aboriginal children and young people in out of home care and youth detention. These are some of the highest-risk institutions for abuse but, also, those typically associated with the poorest strategies to prevent and respond to such harms.

We were, at times, shocked at the lack of care and sometimes outright hostility extended to certain groups of children and young people, particularly those in the care system and in youth detention. Children in the out of home care system described being ignored, neglected and stigmatised by services and the broader community, despite being in particular need of love, care and support. Children in detention were sometimes described as 'the worst of the worst' and their reports of harm and abuse commonly dismissed out of hand as lies, without any meaningful investigation.

While we are under no illusions about the challenges of supporting children and young people who often come into the care of the State exhibiting trauma and difficult behaviours, we consider that pervasive attitudes that diminish and devalue these children are compromising their care and safety. Politicisation and sensationalist media reporting can also harden community attitudes towards vulnerable young people.

The former Department of Communities held substantial information about allegations of child sexual abuse about Ashley Youth Detention Centre, which it gained through state redress schemes, the National Redress Scheme and civil claims initiated by former detainees. Some of these sources also revealed allegations of sexual abuse against staff and carers in the out of home care system, particularly information from the Abuse in State Care Program. This program was a Tasmanian redress scheme that ran from 2003 to 2013 and has, since 2015, been replaced by the Abuse in State Care Service. This information was not acted on, allowing some staff and carers to continue to be responsible for children and young people in high-risk settings despite serious allegations having been made against them.

While some of this information (as it related to current Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff) was reviewed in late 2020, there has still not been a comprehensive review of all the information relating to allegations of child sexual abuse held by what is now the Department for Education, Children and Young People. There has been no reconciliation of information received about people who may be carers in the out of home care system or working in other government institutions. As a result, we are concerned that there may still be people working with children who are the subject of child sexual abuse allegations who have not been investigated.

This highlights the need for a comprehensive historical audit of all relevant records held by the Tasmanian Government to identify all allegations of child abuse, including child sexual abuse. The audit process should examine all available sources of information and be undertaken by a senior, independent person who is given direct access to all necessary systems and information.

We recommend wide-scale reforms to the out of home care system. We consider the Tasmanian Government has moral as well as legal obligations to be the best possible parent to children and young people who cannot stay safely with their birth families. This does not just require that their basic needs are met. The out of home care system should actively nurture and support children and help them reach their aspirations and full potential in life. This level of care should flow from their legal guardian (usually the Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People) through the entire system to their immediate carer, such as their kinship or foster carer. It should also flow into the broader community, which needs to recognise how deserving of love these young people are. Children cannot be safe from sexual abuse in care if they are not more broadly safe and cared for.

We recommend increasing funding in every area of out of home care, recognising it has been starved of investment for many years, and for the Tasmanian Government to become overseer and manager of a well-resourced and closely regulated non-government sector delivering out of home care services. Aboriginal organisations should be given more funding and greater power to better support Aboriginal children and reduce their over-representation in the care system.

We want the Tasmanian Government to set an ambitious agenda in our recommendation to develop an out of home care strategic plan and to invest in monitoring, quality assurance and continuous improvement processes. We want children and young people with experience of the care system to be influential in designing reforms. We want carers to be safe, suitable and loving. We want the Department for Education, Children and Young People's performance to be monitored and scrutinised by a Quality and Risk Committee.

Children and young people in youth detention are another group of children severely overlooked by society and governments. The best way to avoid young people being abused in youth detention is to prevent them from entering detention through raising the age of criminal responsibility to 14 and improved bail and diversionary measures. An effective youth detention system is also one that provides children and young people in detention with timely access to high-quality, developmentally appropriate therapeutic supports, education and health care. Laws and custodial practices must uphold children's rights and dignity in searches, isolation and in the use of force.

Our Inquiry demonstrates that system reform is urgently needed. We acknowledge that transforming a youth detention system that has resisted change over many years is not straightforward. It requires radical cultural change, strong leadership and a long-term commitment from the Government. It may take time, but we consider it is achievable. The Tasmanian Government has acknowledged the need to move to an evidence-based, therapeutic model of care for children and young people in the youth justice system.

Key recommendations we make to improve Tasmania's youth justice system include closing Ashley Youth Detention Centre as soon as possible and initiating a change management process that includes identifying youth workers' aptitude, attitudes and capabilities, and requires all current staff to reapply for their positions. We consider such a change management process will facilitate necessary cultural change and enable staff working in youth detention to separate themselves from the stigma of the old Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

4.6 Ensuring staff and volunteers working with children have the knowledge and skills they need

We want staff and volunteers working with children and young people to feel confident and capable in their abilities. This includes having the skills and knowledge to identify risks and signs of child sexual abuse and to take appropriate steps to respond.

Too often, we saw that when people within institutions were unsure or uncertain when confronted with child sexual abuse, they tended to avoid taking action or responded poorly. We consider child safety is a core capability needed by all people engaging directly with children and young people. For all staff, in all the institutions we considered—including teachers, social workers, health workers, youth workers, police, lawyers and judicial officers—we recommend tailored minimum and continuing professional development on child sexual abuse that aligns with their specific work context.

We identified the need for baseline knowledge and skills for all frontline staff and volunteers working with children and young people. This includes foundational knowledge on grooming and child sexual abuse (including the dynamics of abuse and its impacts on children and young people), harmful sexual behaviours, child exploitation and trauma. Staff and volunteers should also be clear on their professional obligations and how to respond to complaints and concerns, including any notification and reporting obligations to other agencies.

We make a number of recommendations to ensure institutions provide training and ongoing professional development to their staff so they are equipped to respond to child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours. For example, we recommend a mandatory training certification program for staff and volunteers working with children in schools, and that the Teachers Registration Board be empowered to set requirements for minimum training and professional development for teachers. We also recommend all Department of Health staff be subject to minimum professional development requirements on child sexual abuse, including grooming and professional boundary breaches. The knowledge and skills gained through such work-related skills development not only benefit children and young people in institutions but will have a broader impact as those staff and volunteers take their knowledge into their personal and recreational activities.

In some areas, we have identified the need for more advanced knowledge and skills for staff in specialist roles. This may be because they are directly involved in responding to child sexual abuse or they work with high-risk groups. For example, we consider child safety officers should have access to continuing professional development, so they clearly understand their ethical and professional obligations and meet mandatory minimum knowledge requirements to investigate and respond to sexual abuse and trauma. We also recommend that Tasmania Police establish specialist child sexual abuse units staffed by police officers who have undertaken specialised professional development on investigating and responding to child sexual abuse. We also recommend that the Tasmanian Government ensures youth workers in youth detention facilities hold a relevant Certificate IV qualification (or start or complete such a qualification within a year of enrolling) and have appropriate attributes, skills and professional experience in working with children and young people within a therapeutic framework.

4.7 Valuing and strengthening the skills and expertise of those working in the child safety and youth justice systems

Working in the child safety and youth justice systems is not easy. Staff are often forced to work under pressured and volatile conditions, carrying significant risk and responsibility. This work is distressing and emotionally taxing.

Despite this, these sectors have traditionally been comparatively undervalued and underpaid, with not enough investment in professional training and ongoing development. While this is most apparent in frontline workers, we often see senior roles in these areas viewed as 'operational' and not afforded the status and seniority required.

During our Inquiry, machinery of government changes brought together the areas of education, child protection and youth justice into a single, expanded department: the Department for Education, Children and Young People. In our report, we describe some of our reservations about this merger, mainly that it could crowd out the dedicated and specialised attention we consider child safety and youth justice need. However, we can see that, by bringing together these areas, there is also an opportunity to strengthen and align policies and practices that relate to children and to build significant expertise in the State Service.

To achieve this potential, we make several recommendations related to the executive leadership and governance of the Department for Education, Children and Young People. This includes elevating and recognising the level of risk carried by child protection and youth justice and the expertise needed to ensure Tasmania's child safety and youth justice system operates well. We were pleased to see the new Department has created the role of Deputy Secretary, Keeping Children Safe and consider it critical that this role-holder has expertise in child protection and out of home care. We recommend increased executive-level responsibility for youth justice, Child Safety Services and out of home care. In addition, we recommend a Chief Practitioner to support continuing practice improvement for out of home care, Child Safety Services and youth justice, and an Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People (supported by an Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice). Ultimately, expertise among members of the Department's executive should be evenly balanced across the areas of education, Child Safety Services, out of home care, and youth justice.

We heard from several frontline workers about the conditions under which they worked in the child protection and youth justice systems. We heard many workers experienced vicarious trauma and compassion fatigue associated with working under unsustainable and demoralising work conditions. Some staff working at Ashley Youth Detention Centre told us they had been assaulted by detainees and were frightened and hypervigilant at work. We heard that child safety staff were a traumatised workforce. If staff do not feel safe, we question how children and young people they care for can be safe.

We consider the Tasmanian Government needs to invest in these essential workforces and recognise the specialist skills needed to perform these roles well. We recommend the Department for Education, Children and Young People develops a workforce strategy for the Tasmanian child and family welfare sector to make these roles more attractive and to retain and build the skills of existing staff.

There should be enough staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future youth detention facility) to implement a therapeutic model of care and to ensure the safety and wellbeing of children, young people and staff. We also recommend greater psychological support be given to staff following critical incidents, such as assaults or attempted self-harm or suicide incidents.

4.8 Monitoring reform

Throughout our Inquiry we reviewed many previous Tasmanian reports and inquiries into out of home care, the health system and Ashley Youth Detention Centre, which identified problems that have not been addressed over many years. We are also conscious that some key recommendations of the National Royal Commission, such as the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme, are still in the early implementation stages five years after they were made.

We share the hopes we heard in evidence from victim-survivors, and their families, carers and supporters, that our Inquiry will lead to meaningful change that benefits Tasmania and its children and young people. The Tasmanian Government has said it will implement our recommendations, and we expect this. It would be a tragedy if our report were treated as the product of 'just another inquiry', to file and forget. The cost to taxpayers, the trust of the community and the toll on victim-survivors and whistleblowers that comes from sharing their experiences requires that the Tasmanian Government commits to a powerful and immediate response.

We recommend that the Tasmanian Government establishes an independent Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor to oversee and report on the Government's progress in implementing our recommendations and the recommendations of related inquiries, including outstanding recommendations of the National Royal Commission and the Independent Inquiry into the Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('Independent Education Review').

5 How we approached our task

In broad terms, we were required to inquire into the adequacy and appropriateness of the Tasmanian Government's responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in various institutional contexts and to make recommendations to better protect children into the future.

We gathered as much information and evidence as we could across Tasmania to assist our Inquiry. We have been informed by 143 submissions, 132 sessions with Commissioners, 21 consultations with more than 150 attendees, site visits, research, hearings and roundtables, engagement of two Aboriginal engagement officers to assist with 10 consultations with Aboriginal communities, as well as reviewing more than 95,000 documents provided by the State and others. We detail each of these processes and sources of information in Chapter 1.

We have focused on responses to child sexual abuse since 2000. This is because the National Royal Commission predominantly and thoroughly examined abuses in institutions before this period (as well as some more recent cases). We also focused on responses to child sexual abuse since 2000 because we wanted to understand the effectiveness of more recent responses to child sexual abuse, including whether some of the intended changes from the recommendations of the National Royal Commission were working as intended.

We focused our Inquiry on government and government funded services. We particularly examined children's experiences in four different institutional contexts: in schools, health services, youth detention and out of home care, including non-government out of home care. We did not conduct a thorough inquiry into allegations of abuse in some state institutions such as Tasmania Police, ambulance services or in connection with councils, nor into private or community organisations (such as private businesses, recreational clubs or religious organisations). While we did not investigate these other institutional contexts in detail, many of our recommendations will apply to some or all of them.

The approach we took to each of the four types of institutions—schools, out of home care, youth detention and health services—largely depended on the evidence and information we received and how we felt we could build on what is already known and understood.

- In relation to children in schools, we were conscious that an independent review had only recently been undertaken that closely examined child sexual abuse in schools. For that reason, we looked more closely at matters that fell outside the scope of the Independent Education Review. We considered several case studies exploring the then Department of Education's responses to both child sexual abuse perpetrated by adults and children with harmful sexual behaviours to identify systemic problems. While identifying multiple shortcomings in the prevention, identification and response to child sexual abuse, we particularly focused on the Department's disciplinary response to allegations against teachers.

- In relation to children in out of home care, we were confronted with an underdeveloped system that has not kept pace with expected policy and practice across Australia, which left us seriously concerned for the safety of some children in care. We considered that children cannot be safe from child sexual abuse in a broken care system. We heard the system was pressured to the point of crisis. This meant we had to consider how to fundamentally reform the out of home care system in a way that would suit the size and needs of Tasmania. For this reason, our recommendations relating to out of home care have a greater focus on rebuilding the system from the ground up.
- In relation to children in youth detention, we were specifically directed to inquire into the responses of the former Department of Communities to allegations of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. The problems were overwhelming and pervasive. We heard numerous accounts of child sexual abuse, harmful sexual behaviours, and other abuses such as inappropriate isolation and use of force—accounts were strikingly consistent (although sufficiently different) across many years and multiple sources. We did not want to be yet another of the many reports and reviews that have been conducted into Ashley Youth Detention Centre over the years. We took a more forensic approach to understanding how the culture and dynamics of the Centre contributed to child sexual abuse. This was a genuine inquiry, with problems and new evidence continuing to emerge up to July 2023. Our seven case studies explored a range of issues—harmful sexual behaviours, the use of force and isolation, abuse by staff and the way Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the then Department of Communities responded to complaints relating to child safety. These case studies informed our many recommendations to shift Tasmania's youth justice system from a system that compounds trauma and heightens the risk of child sexual abuse to one that offers hope and healing to children and young people.
- In relation to children in health services, we were again directed to inquire into specific institutions—the responses of the Tasmanian Health Service and the Department of Health—to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in relation to the now deceased paediatric nurse James Griffin. We examined three case studies into the response of health services to disclosures of child sexual abuse. Again, we took a forensic approach, particularly in relation to allegations against Mr Griffin over many years at Launceston General Hospital. We only came to understand the scale and the nature of the problems during our public hearings. We adopted a detailed approach partly to help us understand what went wrong but also to highlight the very real and often underestimated risks of child sexual abuse in health services.

In addition to our focus on these specific institutions, we also considered how effective the justice system is in holding individuals to account and responding to the needs of victim-survivors. We also looked at policy issues that cut across all government and government funded institutions, such as how the Tasmanian Government coordinates its efforts to prevent, identify and respond to child sexual abuse, disciplinary responses, and the therapeutic services available to victim-survivors. We also considered oversight mechanisms that are in place to monitor the Government and hold it to account.

Across the report, we generally focused on systemic problems to inform our recommendations for future reforms. This involved asking:

- How effectively did the relevant policies, processes and practices work to prevent and respond to child sexual abuse?
- How equipped are institutions to prevent and respond to child sexual abuse from the leadership through to the frontline workers?
- Are victim-survivors receiving the acknowledgment, empathy and support they deserve?

In considering these questions, we have also considered some important reforms to law and practice the Tasmanian Government has introduced during the period of our Inquiry. We discuss these briefly in Section 6.2.

The case studies and examples we chose illustrate issues we heard about through our early consultations, submissions and sessions with a Commissioner. Through these case studies and examples, we wanted to understand how the actions and decisions of individuals, as well as the systems in which they work, can contribute to child sexual abuse and poor responses to it. What tactics did abusers use to groom and manipulate the people around them to erode expected standards of behaviours and lower defences? What made people more likely to speak up and act rather than stay silent and passive when they suspected child sexual abuse? How do interpersonal dynamics and the culture of an institution influence people within them? Our case studies and examples shed light on the initial systemic issues we had identified and highlighted other systemic problems as we delved deeper into the evidence.

We saw examples of institutional enablers who—often driven by self-interest, misguided loyalties to abusers or reputational considerations—actively concealed or suppressed efforts to address child sexual abuse. We saw others who fell short in critical moments, through ignorance, incompetence, fear or poor judgment. People can also deliberately avoid the truth or wish their knowledge or suspicions away. Although this response can be driven by a reluctance to confront a hard truth, it was more often grounded in an inclination to give others the benefit of the doubt rather than assume the worst. Recognising that these actions contribute to the abuse of children is hard, particularly because otherwise well-meaning and caring people can find themselves in these positions.

Most often, we found that people made bad decisions or failed to respond to child sexual abuse effectively because of the flawed systems they worked in. This often made it hard to single out any one individual for an adverse finding, even when we felt their response was poor. However, we have made some findings that relate to the actions of individuals, particularly in the case study on James Griffin in Chapter 14, where we consider the conduct of those individuals could not be blamed on a systemic failure alone. We discuss some of the challenges we faced in making adverse findings in Section 5.1.

Across our entire report, we thought about how to make our recommendations work in Tasmania. While most of the problems we identify in preventing and responding to child sexual abuse are not unique to Tasmania, sometimes the needs, size and scale of Tasmania required consideration. We heard evidence about the many strengths of Tasmania—its strong personal networks and interconnectedness and how its smaller size makes it a good place to pilot new approaches to complex problems. But we also learned of some particular challenges—including in managing conflicts of interest, social dynamics that made speaking up about safety concerns more difficult, and the difficulties in consistently attracting and retaining highly skilled professionals, particularly in senior roles. We have tried to strike the right balance in challenging Tasmania to be bold and ambitious in confronting child sexual abuse while ensuring our recommendations can be properly funded and are fit for purpose for the size and scale of Tasmania.

5.1 Challenges we faced

Our Commission of Inquiry has the power to make findings or draw conclusions from evidence we gather under the Commissions of Inquiry Act. This includes:

- making adverse findings against a person under section 19, which requires us to notify the person in writing and give them at least 10 working days to respond[16]
- making a more serious finding of misconduct against a person under section 18, which requires us to follow more steps, including issuing a notice outlining the allegation and the evidence that supported it before that person gives evidence, allowing for oral or written submissions in response to the allegation and giving the opportunity for that person to call or cross-examine witnesses to defend themselves.[17]

The way these requirements were drafted enabled various parties, including the State and lawyers acting for some individuals, to adopt interpretations which had practical consequences for the way we approached our work. We heard arguments that any adverse comment about an individual's behaviour could constitute misconduct (for example, because it was a breach of the very broad State Service Code of Conduct). This interpretation made it difficult and, in some cases, impossible for us to make some of the findings we might otherwise have made. Our difficulties were caused because, sometimes:

- we received evidence or information that implicated people after our public hearings or very close to finalising our report, which meant we did not have the time or ability to follow the required statutory processes
- our proposed adverse findings may have resulted in victim-survivors and their families or whistleblowers (many of whom had already provided evidence) being recalled and cross-examined, potentially exacerbating their distress and trauma—something we considered it was appropriate to avoid given our primary focus was on making recommendations for systemic reform and not testing the veracity of individual accounts
- pursuing an adverse finding would have been time-consuming, expensive, lengthened the life of our Inquiry and diverted us away from other important activities such as designing recommendations for the future that could be implemented as quickly as possible.

As a result, we had to make some difficult decisions about how we wrote our report and framed our findings. This involved balancing the public interest in holding individuals and systems to account with the public interest in prioritising effort and funding to tangible changes to protect children. Given our grave concerns about Ashley Youth Detention Centre, we felt we could not afford to delay our findings and recommendations. As a result, we could not pursue some issues in detail. On a small number of key individual findings, we have remained firm. Most of our findings relate to systemic failures by the State. All our findings are listed later in this volume and expanded on in the relevant chapters.

We consider the Commissions of Inquiry Act should be changed to make it less onerous to make adverse findings or a finding of misconduct against an individual. We agree that procedural fairness in these processes is fundamental but consider that the requirements in the Act are out of step with other states and territories and make it too hard to do what commissions of inquiry are tasked to do—which, in some cases, involves holding individuals to account.

We also experienced challenges in the information we could publish. Section 194K of the Evidence Act 2001 prohibits the publication of some information after sexual offence charges have been laid. Changes to this provision were advocated for by victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, and welcome reforms were introduced in April 2020. While we support the premise of this provision—to give victim-survivors control over information about the abuse they experienced—it sometimes operated in unusual ways in our Inquiry. For example, we could publish the evidence, in Chapter 14, victim-survivors gave us about the abuses perpetrated by James Griffin, but not the evidence of potential witnesses in proceedings against Mr Griffin that had commenced before his death. This was the case even when the potential witness was giving evidence with the relevant victim-survivor's knowledge and endorsement. We discuss these issues in more detail in Chapter 1 and Chapter 23. We make suggestions for reform in Chapter 23.

6 What we heard

Preventing and responding effectively to child sexual abuse is a particularly complex problem. It often involves changing laws, policies and practices. It requires education to change people's attitudes and beliefs. Across our research we learned that other parts of Australia, and indeed the world, are facing similar challenges to the Tasmanian Government in addressing sexual abuse in institutions. We heard about strengths in Tasmania that will assist it in its task. We also heard about encouraging new reforms, as well as problems and shortcomings.

6.1 Tasmania's strengths and potential for reform

We have already acknowledged the potential of Tasmania's size and social connections for effecting meaningful change. We identified a strong commitment among many leaders, state servants, service providers, the community and victim-survivors and their supporters to effect this meaningful change.

Tasmania's children are insightful and wise, as demonstrated through the research we commissioned. They know what makes them feel safe in institutions and what needs to change. They will be an incredible source of information and guidance for the Tasmanian Government in implementing the changes needed to protect and benefit them.

Victim-survivors and their supporters bring expertise and practical insights to the reform task, particularly in designing policies and practices that recognise the trauma many victim-survivors carry, and ensure they are met with respect, acknowledgement and care. Their experience and passion for effecting change for children and young people is invaluable. The Tasmanian Government should recognise the potential toll placed on victim-survivors in seeking their expertise, and recognise that investing in tangible and meaningful change is important for maintaining their participation and good will over the long term.

We were also encouraged by the many Tasmanians we met striving to do their best through their work for children and young people. We met so many people working in institutions—including teachers, nurses, youth detention staff, police, counsellors and social workers—who are driven by the best interests of children in all they do. We were impressed by the professionalism and care demonstrated by many State Service employees who live and breathe the values of children's rights in their service to the community. Ultimately, institutions are made up of people, and the more we encourage, motivate and reward people who work every day to protect and care for children, the better.

6.2 Encouraging reforms

The National Royal Commission was an important process because it drew on best evidence from around the world to develop recommendations to prevent and address child sexual abuse. We are pleased that the Tasmanian Government has completed or is working on implementing recommendations, and urge the Tasmanian Government to continue to implement them—in substance and form.

Our work has added momentum to this reform agenda, and through the life of our Inquiry, the Tasmanian Government has announced and begun to implement several reforms to improve responses to child sexual abuse. We generally welcome these efforts, and outline below some recent encouraging reforms. We also understand that some whole of government reforms can only occur after the Tasmanian Government has had an opportunity to consider our Inquiry's findings and recommendations. However, it was not always clear how new developments fit together or would integrate with what was already in place. While we agree there is little time to waste, we also consider it is important that the Tasmanian Government be strategic and coordinated about its reform agenda to make sure it leads to the transformational change needed.

Quite apart from this, the stream of announcements from the Tasmanian Government (particularly in the final months of our Inquiry) sometimes made settling some of our report and recommendations a challenge. We note this as a challenge of our report finalisation and not a criticism of the Tasmanian Government. We have done our best to account for more recent changes and announcements, wherever we could.

In this section we outline some of the key reforms we support.

6.2.1 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act

We are particularly pleased that in 2023, the Tasmanian Parliament passed the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 ('Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act'), which implements important recommendations of the National Royal Commission to create child safe organisations.

Following the release of the National Royal Commission's report, the former National Children's Commissioner led the development of National Principles for Child Safe Organisations ('National Principles'), which were endorsed by members of the then Council of Australian Governments in February 2019, including the Tasmanian Government.[18] The National Principles promote child safety and wellbeing by setting out protective factors against harm to children and key actions for organisations to ensure these principles are embedded in their workplaces.[19]

The National Principles are mirrored in Tasmanian Child and Youth Safe Standards, which impose legal obligations on organisations to ensure their policies and practices promote child safety. The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act includes an additional enforceable Universal Principle that requires a regulated entity to 'ensure that the right to cultural safety of children who identify as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander is respected'.[20] Throughout our report, references to the Child and Youth Safe Standards are inclusive of the Universal Principle.

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act also introduces a Reportable Conduct Scheme, which requires the head of a relevant entity to notify the Independent Regulator on becoming aware of reportable conduct within their organisation. Reportable conduct includes a range of sexual offences as well as sexual misconduct, which is defined to include inappropriate behaviour, physical contact and voyeurism when performed in a sexual manner or with a sexual intention.[21] The Independent Regulator is then responsible for monitoring the organisation's handling of the conduct and can audit that organisation's policies and procedures to assist them in improving their systems and practices relevant to responding to the conduct.

A wide range of organisations must comply with the Child and Youth Safe Standards, including health, education and accommodation providers, as well as police, youth justice workers, local councils, government agencies and the Parliament of Tasmania.[22] The Reportable Conduct Scheme applies to a narrower cohort of organisations, but includes all government agencies, out of home care providers, police, youth justice, health services and schools.[23]

The Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act provides for the appointment of an Independent Regulator to monitor and enforce the requirements of the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.[24] It also creates broad and welcome powers to share information to promote children's safety. We recommend a new Commission for Children and Young People takes responsibility for these schemes, with the Commissioner for Children and Young People acting as the Independent Regulator.

6.2.2 Decision to close Ashley Youth Detention Centre

We support the Tasmanian Government's decision to close Ashley Youth Detention Centre. We consider it is not fit for purpose as a youth detention facility and should be shut down as soon as possible. We also welcome the willingness of the Tasmanian Government to fundamentally rethink the youth justice model in Tasmania to one that is more evidence based and therapeutic. The current model is not working—for staff, detainees or the broader community.

We were disappointed that there are some indications the Tasmanian Government is reconsidering its previous announcement to close the Centre by 2024. We hold grave concerns for the safety and wellbeing of all detainees at the Centre. While we acknowledge that the process of replacing Ashley Youth Detention Centre is complex, we consider the closure of the Centre should be treated with urgency.

6.2.3 Other welcome reforms

The Tasmanian Government issued an interim response to our Commission of Inquiry, describing 30 actions to improve the prevention of and response to child sexual abuse. We welcome these initiatives, particularly:

- defined accountabilities for child safety embedded in the performance instruments of Heads of Agencies to clarify expectations and improve accountability for upholding child safety in each department
- improving approaches to responding to civil litigation, including improving skills and awareness of the nature and impact of child sexual abuse among legal practitioners defending such claims
- appointing a Safeguarding Officer (now called Safeguarding Leads) in every Tasmanian government school, with these role-holders starting at the beginning of Term 1 in 2023.[25]

Other actions taken by the Tasmanian Government that we consider will make a significant difference to the safety of children and young people, and the recovery process for victim-survivors, includes the following:

- The release of Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework by the Department for Education, Children and Young People in April 2023, which is a living document that describes all the actions the Department has taken to ensure children and young people are protected from abuse and harm. It has a range of guidance and reference materials, including a guide to recognising signs of abuse. It is also designed to signal the importance of child safety to staff and to give them practice support when confronted with a concern.[26]
- The commitment to multidisciplinary centres (known as 'Arch' centres), which have the potential to provide coordinated support to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, including specialist police investigators, counsellors and other support services. Two Arch centres are planned in Launceston and Hobart, underpinned by a $15.1 million investment.[27] We discuss ways in which to protect their focus on child sexual abuse in Chapters 16 and 21.

We are also heartened by the Tasmanian Government's repeated commitment to implement and fully fund all our recommendations. It is our expectation that this occurs as part of a broader strategy to integrate the various reform initiatives that are already completed or underway, to ensure a coordinated approach that maximises the benefits of each reform. We want to be clear that implementing our recommendations—while important—should be viewed as another step Tasmania takes in its efforts to keep children and young people safe from abuse. We, at times, observed policies being allowed to date and deteriorate rather than evolve—taking systems to protect children backwards rather than forwards. Child safety is a policy area that is always changing and gaining new evidence of what works, and it is important that Tasmania continues to adapt and evolve with these improvements.

6.3 Problems we identified in our Inquiry

Inevitably, when undertaking an inquiry like this, you tend to mostly hear about what is not working. We have tried to keep this tendency in mind throughout our Inquiry and to keep failings and criticism in perspective. While we tried to see the good alongside the bad, it was important for us to have a deep understanding of the problems so we could design effective recommendations.

Below we describe some of the key themes and problems that emerged over the course of our Inquiry.

6.3.1 Poor understanding of child sexual abuse

There is a limited understanding of child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours in institutions.

Too often, we saw failures to recognise child sexual abuse for what it was. It was rare for us to receive evidence that the sexual abuse of a child was directly witnessed by staff in institutions, except for Ashley Youth Detention Centre. More often, complaints of inappropriate conduct were made later by children or their carers—sometimes many months or years later when the victim-survivor was an adult. However, we heard many examples where risks or signs of abuse were not detected when they should have been, particularly grooming behaviours or breaches of professional boundaries. These behaviours can be harder to identify, particularly where the conduct occurs under the guise of health care or when teachers could be seen to be paying particular attention to one student for good reasons. We saw too many examples of signs or reports of abuse being downplayed and denied. Sometimes, this happened because of a lack of skills and knowledge, sometimes, it was deliberate, and in other instances, it was driven by a desire to protect the reputation of a colleague, other adults or the institution. Even when reports and complaints of child sexual abuse were made directly, we saw examples of them not being recognised as such by the institution. Across the board, these actions led to inexcusable delays in managing risks to children and led to uncaring responses to victim-survivors.

Our commissioned research into the views and experiences of children and young people also saw some confused understandings around consent, particularly where there is an imbalance of power. We observed simplistic understandings of ‘consent’ in adults—including a tendency to conflate concepts of consent with compliance and an absence of physical resistance from a victim-survivor. We also saw a failure to consider age and power differences in cases of sexual exploitation of adolescents by adults, with these cases also wrongly considered consensual.

It is important that all Tasmanians (including children and young people) have a basic understanding of the nature and dynamics of child sexual abuse. Given how common child sexual abuse is, people need to assume they might receive a disclosure or witness its warning signs at some point, and it is important they know what to do if that happens. People working directly with children in organisations should have training and professional development that goes further than these basics to give them the necessary skills to identify the signs of abuse early, particularly if they work in a high-risk environment such as youth detention.

Recommendations to address this issue include:

- introducing a mandatory child sexual abuse prevention curriculum in Tasmanian schools (Recommendation 6.1)
- the Tasmanian Government continues to advocate to the Australian Government to ensure Tasmania receives the full benefit of community-wide prevention strategies under the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030 (Recommendation 18.1)
- changing legal terminology that reinforces problematic views around consent in child sexual abuse matters and ensuring legal professionals take greater care in describing child sexual abuse (Recommendation 16.18)
- introducing minimum mandatory education for staff and volunteers in recognising and responding to child sexual abuse (Recommendations 6.5, 9.11, 12.9 and 15.15).

6.3.2 Harmful sexual behaviours are often not properly recognised or responded to by institutions and needs greater investment Harmful sexual behaviours need to be better understood and addressed.

We have used the term harmful sexual behaviours to describe sexual behaviours displayed by children and young people that fall outside developmental expectations, which may cause harm to themselves or others. Sexualised behaviours occur along a continuum from healthy to harmful behaviours. Not all children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours will benefit from the same intervention, and responses to harmful sexual behaviours need to be 'both proportionate and appropriate'.[28] For example, inappropriate sexual behaviours that are motivated by misguided curiosity about sex could be addressed through clear boundary setting and education, while more serious, coercive and persistent behaviours might need an intensive specialised therapeutic response.

We heard instances of harmful sexual behaviours in schools, out of home care and in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

We tended to observe institutions either downplaying or overreacting to harmful sexual behaviours, which reflects the difficult balance that needs to be struck in these matters. Without guidance and experience, it can sometimes be difficult to tell the difference between age-appropriate exploration and harmful sexual behaviours. However, it is important to acknowledge that harmful sexual behaviours can be very damaging to victim-survivors and need to be taken seriously by institutions. Victim-survivors need an institution to take active steps to keep them safe after an incident and ensure they get support to recover.

However, care and sensitivity need to be extended to children and young people displaying harmful sexual behaviours. Sometimes these behaviours can be a sign that the young person is being sexually harmed. In some instances, we heard of adult abusers coercing children to engage in sexual acts. Therapeutic responses to young people engaging in harmful sexual behaviours need to be based on an individual assessment of the young person and the context of their behaviour and be carefully designed and delivered using specialised techniques for treating these behaviours.

Recommendations to address this issue include:

- a whole of government framework for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours to guide responses across all Tasmanian government institutions (Recommendation 21.8)
- the Department for Education, Children and Young People establishing a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to provide advice, support and guidance in schools, out of home care and youth detention to facilitate a consistent, best practice, proportionate approach to responding to harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 9.28)
- more funding for specialist therapeutic intervention and treatment services for young people displaying harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 21.8).

6.3.3 Children and young people are not listened to, their safety is not prioritised, and their fundamental rights are not upheld

Children and young people are too often undervalued, dismissed or disrespected.

People are generally passionate and committed to upholding the rights and safety of children. But, too often, we did not see this passion and commitment translate properly into the decisions and actions of institutions. We consider this reflects a legacy of children being undervalued in society—noting that in the recent past children were expected to be seen and not heard and were viewed as extensions of adults rather than individuals with rights.

Since Australia ratified the United Nation Convention on the Rights of the Child in 1990, there has been a shift towards recognising that children have inherent rights and deserve special protections for their safety and wellbeing. While this is slowly influencing decision making about children, we consider there is still some way to go for children's rights to be placed at the heart of organisations that provide services to them.

We saw many examples of disclosures of abuse made by children and young people being brushed off or not believed. While we give examples across our report of children's perspectives being treated as unreliable, it was particularly pronounced for children seen as 'bad' or untrustworthy, such as those in detention, who are experiencing mental health problems, live with disability or have difficult behaviours. Children in out of home care, who often lack access to trusted and supportive adults, were often overlooked and ignored. In the case of Ashley Youth Detention Centre, we saw the extreme end point of failing to respect the rights of children, with detainees experiencing human rights violations and being harmed and abused in a systematic way.

The National Principles for Child Safe Organisations require that children and young people are informed of their rights, can participate in decisions that affect them, and are taken seriously. Similarly, through our commissioned research, Tasmanian children and young people told us they are far more likely to feel safe in institutions where they are listened to and where their worries are taken seriously by the adults around them.

We consider organisations are stronger and better at what they do when they actively involve children and young people in the design and delivery of their services. They are also much more likely to be safe.

Recommendations to address this issue include:

- establishing youth advisory groups for specific institutional contexts including out of home care, youth detention and health services (Recommendations 9.6, 12.8 and 15.7) and using existing broad student representative groups on policy and reform work in schools
- including the Premier's Youth Advisory Council as part of the governance arrangements for our recommended child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan (Recommendation 19.5).

6.3.4 Aboriginal children and young people face unique risks of abuse and barriers to culturally appropriate support

Child sexual abuse wrongly and unequally affects Aboriginal children and young people.

Aboriginal children and young people are unacceptably over-represented in a range of high-risk settings, particularly out of home care and youth detention. This means that disproportionately more Aboriginal children are exposed to the risk of child sexual abuse in institutions and are also more likely to bear the brunt of the policy and process failures that can arise when organisations are not child safe.

We worked hard to understand and reflect in our report the views and experiences of Aboriginal communities. Through our consultations, Aboriginal people explained that the way child sexual abuse is experienced and addressed is closely linked to the trauma associated with colonisation. We heard that many Aboriginal people do not trust Child Safety Services and are worried that their parenting will be unfairly judged, and their children removed from their care. We heard many Aboriginal people were reluctant to report child sexual abuse to police because they (or their communities) had been treated poorly by police. We also heard that abuse of Aboriginal children in out of home care and youth detention was far too common and they did not receive culturally appropriate support or care.

The Tasmanian Government needs to recognise how historical mistreatment of Aboriginal people has contributed to the present-day increased risk of child sexual abuse of Aboriginal children. It needs to invest in Aboriginal-led programs that will keep children safe and work to divert them from out of home care and the youth justice system to support them to live safely in the care of their families and communities. Organisations need to work harder to build trust with Aboriginal communities by better supporting their own Aboriginal staff and by responding to what Aboriginal people say is needed to improve how they care for or provide services to children. Aboriginal victim-survivors need access to safe cultural spaces and culturally appropriate support to help them heal in a way that recognises the impact of intergenerational trauma.

Recommendations to address this issue include:

- appointing a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People to monitor the experiences of Aboriginal children in out of home care and youth detention (Recommendation 9.14)
- fully implementing all elements of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle to reduce over-representation in out of home care and invest in Aboriginal-led strategies to keep children and families safe (Recommendation 9.15)
- developing an Aboriginal Youth Justice Strategy, created in partnership with Aboriginal communities, that is underpinned by self-determination and focuses on prevention, early intervention and diversion strategies for Aboriginal children and young people (Recommendation 12.27)
- Tasmania Police developing a strategy to build trust with Aboriginal communities to encourage reporting of child sexual abuse (Recommendation 16.2)
- improving healing services for Aboriginal victim-survivors and their families by resourcing and supporting Aboriginal organisations to design, develop and deliver Aboriginal-led healing approaches (Recommendation 21.7)
- creating the role of an Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People in the Department for Education, Children and Young People (Recommendation 9.7).

6.3.5 Neglect and underperformance of some public institutions is tolerated and contributing to risks to children

There has been a neglect of some public institutions serving children and young people in Tasmania, leaving those institutions to flounder in key areas and putting children at increased risk.

We were confronted by how the out of home care system appeared to have been allowed to erode, impacted significantly by years of underfunding and neglect. Launceston General Hospital lacked some basic requirements for ensuring child safety and preventing child sexual abuse, and did not have strong governance arrangements and a culture of raising concerns concerning child safety. Ashley Youth Detention Centre has failed to meet the fundamental rehabilitation and developmental needs of children and young people. It has had a long history of systematic harm and abuse of children and young people, including through child sexual abuse, excessive use of force, the persistent and regular use of isolation as a form of behaviour management, punishment or cruelty, inappropriate strip searches (including searches that were sexually abusive) and not taking steps to protect children from harmful sexual behaviours. These problems, which have emerged through various reports over the years, have been tolerated by successive governments. Oversight bodies struggled to meet all their numerous obligations, with few complaints about child sexual abuse suggesting, at least at times, a lack of public confidence in their ability to effect change.

We consider these failings in the core functions of institutions to reflect the value respective governments have given to these institutions. Public-serving institutions need to be resourced and valued for their key role in society, and need to be healthy and functional to properly protect children from harm, including child sexual abuse.

Recommendations to address underperforming institutions include:

- resourcing non-government out of home care providers appropriately (Recommendation 9.3) and building a quality out of home care system, including: outsourcing care to non-government providers; strengthening leadership, governance, strategic planning, outcomes and performance monitoring; supporting Aboriginal self-determination and implementing the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle; supporting quality care and carers; and meeting all children's needs, including by having specific measures to address harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation (Chapter 9)
- closing Ashley Youth Detention Centre (Recommendation 12.1) and preventing children entering youth detention, creating a child-focused youth detention system (Recommendations 12.16–12.26), addressing harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention (Recommendation 12.30), and protecting against the inappropriate or unlawful use of searches, isolation and use of force (Recommendations 12.31–12.33)

- developing indicators to measure the culture and practices of health services through the Department of Health's cultural improvement program (Recommendation 15.3)
- giving the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet responsibility for overseeing, coordinating and reporting on statewide child sexual abuse reform (Recommendation 19.3)
- establishing a new statutory Commission for Children and Young People, with separate funding and reporting obligations to Parliament (Recommendations 18.6, 18.8 and 18.9).

6.3.6 Leadership efforts to mitigate the risk of child sexual abuse have not been strategic, persistent or coordinated, and there is little accountability for failings

Too often, we saw shortcomings in leadership—individually and collectively.

We were disheartened to see the way some leadership teams in government agencies responded to risks and allegations of child sexual abuse. We know that addressing an allegation of child sexual abuse is not easy, particularly once it has reached the scale of public crisis. In considering particular institutions' responses, we did not expect them to be perfect. What we did expect is that leaders would take child sexual abuse seriously, work together effectively to manage any risks, and ask for help and support from experts if they needed it. We expected them to prioritise the safety and wellbeing of children and young people.

Across all the types of institutions we examined, we rarely saw examples of child-centred leadership. Sometimes this was because of a lack of skill and good processes to guide leaders, which led to clumsy, slow and ineffective responses. But in other instances, we saw what can only be described as a callous lack of care for victim-survivors of abuse. This was more difficult for us to understand, with some leadership failings so extreme they caused enormous pain and suffering to those affected. The driving factors behind this poor leadership included an apparent disregard for children or victim-survivors, laziness or lack of interest, outdated understandings of child sexual abuse, lack of skill and capability, overwhelm and unreasonable workloads.

We consider leadership failures are more likely to occur, and be far more damaging, where there is a lack of accountability. We saw some senior leaders use terms like 'shared accountability', in some cases, to sidestep their individual accountability. Sometimes, this individual accountability comes from a person holding a legal duty, a professional duty or a moral duty. Yet we saw leaders lack curiosity or initiative, delegate their responsibilities or shift blame to others. We saw defensiveness rather than self-reflection. Some of these attitudes endured throughout our Inquiry, even when confronted with the devastating scale of what went wrong. This type of leadership can have much broader implications, by discouraging people from speaking up about child safety or signalling that promoting child safety is not a priority for staff more broadly.

While we agree that child safety is a responsibility that should be shared among all adults working in an institution, leaders should have specific responsibilities that reflect their power and influence in decision making. They need professional development and support to make sure they are equipped to identify and respond well to risks of abuse. If leaders make mistakes, they should acknowledge them and commit to learning more, so they can do better in future. Leaders should model a culture of improvement and self-reflection, so it positively influences everyone in the organisation.

Recommendations to address this issue include ensuring:

- leaders across the multiple institutions we examined have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation (Recommendations 9.4, 12.6, 15.3)
- expert and active leadership within the Department for Education, Children and Young People by ensuring senior executive roles reflect the risk and responsibility of respective positions and have appropriate expertise in youth justice and the child safety system (including out of home care) (Recommendations 9.4, 12.6)
- Heads of Agencies are clear about their responsibilities for implementing reforms under the child sexual abuse reform strategy (Recommendation 19.4).

6.3.7 Institutions' workforces have not been equipped to keep children safe and support victim-survivors

Earlier, we recognised the passion and commitment of many state servants working with children and young people. In some of the institutions we looked at, we saw some people show enormous strength and courage by calling out failures to respond to child sexual abuse, sometimes at great personal cost. Too often, we saw that good responses to risks to child safety relied on the good judgment and perseverance of individuals rather than being driven by a strong child safe system that staff fell in line with.

Some institutions did not invest enough in making sure staff were safe and suitable to work directly with children and young people, particularly in high-risk settings. Most institutions did not have clear policies that described what is (and isn't) appropriate behaviour, or that provided guidance on what to do if a staff member had concerns about the inappropriate behaviour of a colleague or the safety of a child. This led to confusion and uncertainty, which sometimes contributed to inaction. In some instances, staff told us there was a culture of fear within their institutions that stopped people from reporting concerns.

Staff in institutions often told us they did not have proper training to identify the signs of sexual abuse, particularly grooming. They also told us it was sometimes difficult to tell whether behaviour was an honest mistake or a sign of something more serious. We understand how hard it is to report concerns when a person is not clear or confident that they are right. It becomes even harder if an institution directly or indirectly discourages staff from speaking up or does not take seriously their questions or concerns.

Staff (and, where relevant, contractors, volunteers and carers) need clear policies and processes about how they should behave with children and young people. They need to know what to do if a child reports a concern or complaint to them and be confident the right action will be taken by their managers and leaders. They also need training and professional development to help them understand the signs of abuse or harmful sexual behaviours, which will give them confidence to act when they are confronted with it.

Recommendations to address this issue include:

- increasing and mandating professional development relating to child sexual abuse for staff and leaders in schools, health services, out of home care and youth justice and people working in the justice system, which includes developing foundational knowledge and skills and specialisation, depending on the nature of the role (Recommendations 6.5, 9.11, 12.9, 12.34, 15.15, 16.3, 16.16, 17.2, 17.6)
- developing a whole of government approach to professional development for responding to trauma to equip people working in government and government funded services that have contact with child sexual abuse survivors to respond appropriately (Recommendation 19.2).

While we have made recommendations for professional development across multiple institutions, the Tasmanian Government may look for efficiencies by sharing professional development materials across agencies, particularly for foundational knowledge. Each institution will also need tailored professional development for the specific institutional context.

6.3.8 Institutional responses to child sexual abuse have not been transparent, effective and rigorous

Too often we saw poor responses when concerns, complaints or allegations of child sexual abuse were made.

It takes enormous courage for a victim-survivor to report abuse to an institution. Survivors may be fearful, experience shame or be worried they will not be believed. It can also be hard to report a concern about a colleague, particularly if you are second-guessing yourself and are worried about the fallout if your concern is unfounded. We can understand how, sometimes, it can feel easier to stay silent. But the abuse of children thrives when people don't speak up.

Institutions should do everything they can to make people feel safe about reporting concerns of abuse because this is such important information. Even where an allegation is unfounded or the behaviour was an inadvertent boundary breach, speaking up can send a message to any potential abusers in the institution and create the impetus for professional conduct expectations to be reinforced. Institutions should want to know if their staff or volunteers are a risk to children so they can take steps to address that risk and support anyone who may have been affected.

Many institutions did not have a clear complaints process, which meant that people felt discouraged from reporting. Where they did, information received (from victim-survivors, staff or others) was not treated with the importance it deserved. Complaints were sometimes downplayed or minimised and not recorded or escalated. People who made a complaint were often left in the dark about what had happened with their report. The identity of complainants was sometimes inappropriately revealed to the subject of the complaint, causing stress and hardship for the person speaking up.

Where processes to investigate were started, they often took too long and were insensitive to the needs and experiences of victim-survivors, particularly if they were still children. We saw failures to manage risks while investigations occurred (for example, by not suspending relevant staff with pay or otherwise limiting their contact with children). Sometimes investigations lacked integrity, undertaken by local managers or investigators who lacked the skills and training, or by having people involved in investigations and decisions who had (or appeared to have) a conflict of interest. In some instances, we saw allegations of abuse or misconduct managed outside formal processes outlined in the State Service Act 2000 or legal processes weaponised to obstruct appropriate action. In other instances, legal advice that was not in the public interest or other perceived legal barriers that limited sensible action to respond to risks were passively left unchallenged, leading to poor outcomes. Often, we saw complaints and information about child safety not recorded appropriately, which meant information was not preserved and retrievable. Too often—across and within government agencies—the full picture of what the Tasmanian Government knew was not pulled together, contributing to poor assessments of risk. This often meant that abusers were not held to account or those subject to allegations were not removed from having contact with children and young people until risks could be properly determined.

Institutions need to treat information they receive about child safety as precious. Complaints processes need to be clear and accessible, including to children and young people. Investigations need to have rigour and integrity for all parties to have confidence in their outcomes.

Recommendations to address this include:

- improving complaints handling policies and practices to ensure information received through complaints is taken seriously, acted upon appropriately and recorded (Recommendations 9.31, 12.35, 12.37, 15.16)
- conducting a comprehensive audit into complaints and allegations received about Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the out of home care system (Recommendation 12.5)
- establishing a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate to provide specialised case management, investigation and advice on allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct (Recommendation 6.6, discussed in Section 4)
- establishing a new Commission for Children and Young People to take on the functions of monitoring and enforcing the Child and Youth Safe Standards and a Reportable Conduct Scheme (Recommendation 18.6, discussed in Section 4).

6.3.9 The State Service disciplinary framework is not suited to responding to child safety concerns

Too often we heard that the State Service disciplinary framework is not well suited to responding to allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct.

When an employee abuses or acts inappropriately with a child, their employer needs to take action to address that behaviour. Where the conduct is serious, this may mean terminating their employment. Responding quickly and fairly to allegations of child sexual abuse is an important way that government agencies can keep children and young people safe. It is important that investigations into staff are fair and transparent.

We found that policies and practices (particularly in addressing employee misconduct) were fundamentally flawed in addressing child sexual abuse and related conduct. They often relied on outdated approaches to responding to allegations that have since been changed in other contexts (such as the criminal justice process). These outdated approaches included imposing an unreasonably high standard of evidence to substantiate concerns, considering behaviour and complaints in isolation (rather than as a potential pattern of behaviour), and excluding behaviour that occurred outside the workplace. We also saw institutions (and investigators) interview children in ways that fell well short of the approach seen as best practice adopted by many police forces. These best practice approaches recognise the importance of understanding the whole history of connection between a child and an alleged abuser rather than simply focusing on individual incidents. There was also an excessive concern among some in the State Service about disciplinary decisions being challenged, which led to inertia. In some instances, we observed the interpretation and application of laws and policies to be so rigid and conservative as to entirely depart from common sense and the public interest.

At times, we considered the approach to disciplinary processes reflected outdated assumptions and requirements long since removed from the criminal justice system, which has a higher standard of proof.

We acknowledge that the disciplinary system, as it applies to child sexual abuse, is inadequate and particularly difficult to apply in certain situations (for example, if a complainant does not want to take part in an investigation or if a complaint is about conduct a long time ago and there are no good records or available witnesses). However, we saw too many examples of organisations not doing everything they could to investigate and, where appropriate, discipline or terminate employees who posed a risk to children. Although staff who are the subject of complaints need to be accorded fairness, we observed that sometimes an emphasis on their rights detracted from the safety of children and the wellbeing of victim-survivors. We consider that the rights and wellbeing of all staff are best supported by removing those staff who pose a threat to children.

Recommendations to address this include:

- clarifying the provisions of the State Service Code of Conduct in a way that prioritises protecting children (Recommendation 20.1)
- allowing for immediate suspension of staff when there is an allegation of child sexual abuse or related conduct (Recommendation 20.6)
- ensuring all child-facing departments develop a professional conduct policy that clearly describes expected standards of behaviour with children, reporting obligations and the consequences of a breach of the policy, including that it may be a breach of the Code of Conduct (Recommendations 6.4, 9.19, 12.10, 15.13, 20.2)
- increasing the rights of children and people making a complaint during disciplinary processes (Recommendation 20.8)
- funding awareness raising and culture change in the State Service approach to disciplinary processes (Recommendation 20.14).

6.3.10 Agencies with responsibilities for keeping children safe have not consistently coordinated and shared information

Too often, we saw poor coordination and information sharing across government that affected the response to victim-survivors.

A range of bodies have specific responsibilities to keep children safe from harm. This includes Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and professional regulators (such as the Teachers Registration Board or the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency). A range of duties may be imposed on people to report information relevant to the safety of children to these different bodies.

This means they often receive (or should receive) important information that may suggest a person is a risk to children. All these agencies have important powers that can be applied to reducing the risks from abusers.

Across our Inquiry we saw too many examples of these agencies failing to share with each other the information they received about potential abusers. We were told that privacy of alleged abusers—and, sometimes, the privacy of people providing agencies with information—was a key reason why people felt they could not share information about risks to children. We found the barriers to sharing information and coordinating a response to be primarily cultural, with legislative barriers mostly perceived rather than actual.

The practical consequence of this lack of coordination is that different agencies sometimes held pieces of information that were never put together to give a complete picture of the risk a person posed. Although individual incidents or pieces of information viewed in isolation may not be seen as serious, when put together they can sometimes reveal a far more dangerous pattern of behaviour. Putting information together also gives a better basis for agencies to use their powers to act—for example, to suspend registration, take disciplinary action, lay charges or otherwise restrict access to children and young people.

We have seen improvements through the development of information-sharing agreements and feel optimistic about broad powers given to the Independent Regulator (and other agencies) to share information relating to the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme. We consider that addressing immediate risks to the safety of children should always be an overriding priority when it comes to information sharing.

Recommendations to address this include:

- developing child safety information sharing, coordination and response guidelines to use across government and government funded agencies, supported by investment in cultural change work that promotes good information-sharing practices and reinforces the need to respond appropriately to any information received (Recommendation 19.8)
- reviewing confidentiality or secrecy provisions across Tasmanian legislation to identify and remove any legislative barriers to sharing information in the interests of protecting the safety and wellbeing of children and young people (Recommendation 19.7).

6.3.11 The legal system does not consistently offer justice to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse

The legal system is one way that victim-survivors seek justice for child sexual abuse, but we found that sometimes it not only failed to deliver justice but acted to compound trauma and distress.

The criminal justice system is an important way to hold child sexual abusers accountable for their actions and a way to disrupt their behaviour (through imprisonment, sex offender registration and/or programs to address their offending). The Tasmanian Government has made many legal reforms to improve the ability of the criminal justice system to respond to child sexual abuse, including new and strengthened child sexual abuse offences and changes to make the giving of evidence more sensitive to the needs of children and adult victim-survivors.

Some victim-survivors initiate civil litigation against institutions for their failures or seek other forms of acknowledgment, such as apologies or compensation through redress schemes. Despite efforts in recent years to make these processes fairer for victim-survivors (who usually have less money and power than the institutions they are trying to hold to account), we heard these processes are sometimes gruelling for victim-survivors. We also saw situations where the Tasmanian Government relied on legal advice (including that of the Office of the Solicitor-General) that contributed to outcomes that were not trauma-informed.

Institutions have an obligation to acknowledge any harm that happens under their care and to support victim-survivors and their families to heal and recover. Sometimes this also requires institutions to rebuild trust with the community—which demands transparency, accountability and evidence of change for the better.

Recommendations to address this include:

- establishing and funding specialist units within Tasmania Police to investigate child sexual abuse (Recommendation 16.1)
- improving court processes for child sexual abuse matters to reduce delays and trauma for victim-survivors and to increase knowledge and understanding of juries and legal and other professionals working on child sexual abuse matters (Recommendations 16.10, 16.15, 16.18, 16.19)
- improving the skills and knowledge of lawyers who act for the Tasmanian Government in civil claims and developing and enforcing guidelines to uphold best practice in responding to such claims (Recommendation 17.2)

- ensuring the Tasmanian Government and relevant institutions offer apologies to victim-survivors of abuse who wish to receive them, which includes meeting with a senior representative as part of that acknowlegment and an explanation of steps taken to prevent similar abuse into the future (Recommendation 17.4)
- ensuring victim-survivors of abuse in institutional settings have access to a redress scheme to provide compensation and support for child sexual abuse (Recommendation 17.1).

6.3.12 Victim-survivors of child sexual abuse do not consistently receive the support and care they deserve to address their abuse

Victim-survivors did not always receive the support they needed.

The impacts of child sexual abuse on a person can be devastating and lifelong. Some people do not survive it. Trauma associated with abuse can spiral into a range of other problems, including drug and alcohol abuse, mental illness, problems maintaining relationships and a person's ability to work consistently. Many victim-survivors mourn the life they could have led if they had not been abused.

We learned from experts that while the impact of child sexual abuse is sometimes severe, it can be managed and treated with the help of support services and trained professionals. Survivors often told us how beneficial they found counselling and other psychological support once they found the right professional or service, but many found accessing services too hard or impossible due to cost, location or waiting lists. We also heard about survivors accessing supports that did not meet their needs, including multiple examples of therapists who hindered rather than helped survivors' recovery.

Victim-survivors of abuse deserve support and psychological help to recover from their experiences. They deserve to live a life that is not defined by their abuse. Services should reflect the diversity of victim-survivors (including those who are still children and young people, are Aboriginal, identify as LGBTQIA+, live with disability or come from culturally and linguistically different backgrounds) and be tailored to their specific needs as much as possible. They should be able to feel confident that when they access services, those services will meet minimum quality standards.

Recommendations to address this include:

- improving and increasing access to sexual assault counselling and support services for all adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children who have experienced or displayed harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendations 21.4, 21.5, 21.6, 21.7)
- ensuring a sexual abuse service system that meets the needs of particular groups of victim-survivors, including adults and children, those with disability or a mental illness, those who identify as LGBTQIA+, are from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, and male victim-survivors (Recommendation 21.6).

6.3.13 External oversight of institutions' responses to child sexual abuse could be improved

We saw room for improvement in the oversight of child sexual abuse.

It is important, particularly in an area as sensitive and complicated as child sexual abuse, that there are strong safeguards to make sure the system is working well. Oversight bodies such as the Ombudsman, Integrity Commission, Commissioner for Children and Young People, Health Complaints Commissioner and Custodial Inspector are important in making sure government agencies act ethically and in line with their statutory obligations. They need strong powers and proper funding to do this well. Bodies that regulate professions, such as the Teachers Registration Board and the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency, play a critical role in ensuring people working in trusted professions are suitable to do so and meet their professional obligations.

We found that in some instances people reporting concerns about child sexual abuse (whether as a victim-survivor or a whistleblower) were let down by responses from oversight bodies. For example, we saw the Office of the Ombudsman erroneously refer some serious complaints from detainees at Ashley Youth Detention Centre back to the Centre for response without adequate oversight; inappropriate errors that have since been addressed. We also found the Integrity Commission's response to a complaint about Launceston General Hospital's management of complaints about James Griffin to be insufficient.

We also heard that understanding the role of different bodies was complicated, particularly for the broader community. Powers would begin and end at different points and intersect (or not) with other agencies. This created gaps and confusion.

External bodies need the right skills, powers and resourcing to perform their functions well. Roles and powers need to be clear to the general public and processes need to be robust and transparent to encourage trust and confidence in reporting concerns.

Recommendations to address this include:

- establishing a new Commission for Children and Young People with expertise in children's rights and safety to lead oversight of child safety practices in institutions—the Commissioner for Children and Young People should be appointed through a rigorous recruitment process, have independence over its funding and be accountable to the Tasmanian Parliament (Recommendations 18.6–18.9)
- increasing external oversight of out of home care and youth detention, including through establishing an independent community visitors program, creating an independent Child Advocate for out of home care (Recommendations 9.33, 9.34, 9.36, 9.37, 12.36 and 12.38)

- the Integrity Commission, Ombudsman, new Commission for Children and Young People and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme clarifying their roles and functions as they relate to child safety and formalising information-sharing arrangements (Recommendations 18.14, 18.15)
- strengthening the powers of the Teachers Registration Board to compel information, mandate training and professional development and to suspend a teacher's registration where it receives information suggesting an unacceptable risk of harm to children and to issue infringement notices for not complying with its requirements (Recommendations 6.10, 6.12, 6.13, 6.15)
- reviewing the Health Complaints Act 1995 so the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner can extend to administration, monitoring and oversight of the Code of Conduct for Unregistered Health Care Workers (Recommendation 15.21).

7 The structure of our report

Our report has eight volumes. In addition to this summary volume, Volume 2 provides details about the establishment and conduct of our Inquiry, the international, national and Tasmanian context within which this Inquiry has been conducted, and our understanding of the extent and causes of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts.

Volumes 3 through 6 of our report summarise the evidence we heard, and outline our findings and recommendations for specific institutions. In Volume 3, we discuss child sexual abuse in Tasmanian government schools. In Volume 4, we discuss child sexual abuse in out of home care. In Volume 5, we discuss child sexual abuse in youth detention. In Volume 6, we discuss child sexual abuse in health services, in particular at Launceston General Hospital. These volumes differ in their structure, style and approach, which reflects the nature and extent of the evidence we received. Where possible, we have included specific case studies, examples or summarised a particular experiences of an institution. Some of the victim-survivors who contributed their accounts were still in institutional settings at the time of writing this report.

Volume 7 outlines the gaps we have identified in the criminal and civil justice systems that may serve to undermine children's safety in institutions and create unnecessary barriers for victim-survivors seeking justice. It provides our findings and recommendations about how the justice system can be improved to better prevent and respond to child sexual abuse. Our final volume, Volume 8, outlines the need for system-wide reforms and makes recommendations for monitoring the Tasmanian Government's reforms in response to our recommendations.

Below we summarise the key contents of each volume, including an overview of our significant recommendations in each volume.

7.1 Volume 2—Establishment and context

In Volume 2, we provide the contextual information necessary to guide readers on the scope of our Commission of Inquiry and to help them navigate the challenging scenarios and discussions that we document over the other volumes of this report. This contextual information includes details about where our Inquiry fits in time, place and relative to broader approaches to understanding and acting on child sexual abuse, both globally and nationally. Volume 2 also includes an overview of what we know—largely from the research of the National Royal Commission—about the nature and risks of child sexual abuse in institutional settings.

In Chapter 1 Establishment, scope and conduct, we outline the events leading to the announcement of our Commission of Inquiry in November 2020. We go on to explain our powers as authorised by the Order of the Governor establishing our Inquiry, our terms of reference and the Commissions of Inquiry Act. This includes a discussion of relevant legislation and how it has affected our work, including our ability to make adverse findings and findings of misconduct.

Chapter 1 then provides broad details about how our Inquiry was conducted, including who informed our Inquiry and through what forums, how we managed the information they contributed, and the broad insights we gained from different individuals and groups.

In Chapter 2 The Tasmanian, national and international contexts, we locate our Commission of Inquiry in the broader legal and political landscape relevant to understanding, preventing and responding to child sexual abuse. We consider Australia's international obligations in relation to children and young people, outline how the National Royal Commission has informed our Commission of Inquiry, and summarise key national strategies and frameworks to address child sexual abuse in institutions.

Chapter 2 also looks at the history of Tasmania's examination of child sexual abuse and the key agencies, frameworks, programs and plans operating at the state level to respond to such abuse. These include statutory agencies, oversight bodies and justice and redress avenues for victim-survivors. We have included the most current data available to present a socio-demographic profile of Tasmania, which sheds light on the local culture within which child sexual abuse has occurred and is being called into question.

We note that the Tasmanian Government and its institutions have already begun to respond to problems revealed in the public hearings of our Commission of Inquiry. As noted, in May 2022, the Government announced the 'Keeping Children Safer' reforms, which include appointing senior staff to respond to incidents of child sexual abuse in schools, initiating a Child Safe Governance Review of Launceston General Hospital and planning for the closure of Ashley Youth Detention Centre to establish new youth justice facilities. In December 2022, the Commissioner for Children and Young People announced an investigation into the case management of children and young people in out of home care.

The Government has committed to publicly reporting on the progress of these actions through a dedicated website, which will also include information on the implementation of the recommendations we make in this report.

In Chapter 3 Child sexual abuse in institutions, we describe different forms of child sexual abuse and consider the risks of such abuse occurring in institutions. We also describe the profound effects of child sexual abuse on victim-survivors, their family members and communities.

We outline two different forms of child sexual abuse most relevant to our Inquiry—non-penetrative contact abuse and penetrative abuse—and discuss harmful sexual behaviours. We pay particular attention to grooming, which is a strategy abusers commonly use to enable and conceal their sexual abuse of a child or young person. Grooming can be so effective that the child or young person (and, in some cases, the adults around them) believe they 'consented' to sexual acts or that they are in a 'relationship' with the abuser. Abusers also groom adults who work with children in institutions, including their colleagues and managers.[29]

We discuss child sexual abusers in an institutional context. Some abusers actively seek out institutional settings to sexually abuse children.[30] Other abusers may only begin abusing children once they are in an institution where the culture and environment enables them to overcome their inhibitions.[31] Professional boundary breaches of employees in institutions are a key warning sign of the risk of child sexual abuse.[32] Abusers may 'test' how resistant an institution's culture is to the perpetration of child sexual abuse by breaching boundaries incrementally and then more egregiously with each breach they get away with.[33]

In Chapter 3, we also consider the features of an institution itself—the cultural, operational and environmental features of the institution—that can increase the risk of abuse occurring, or contribute to the failure of staff to identify or respond appropriately to child sexual abuse. The leadership, management and governance structures, norms as well as the physical and online environment of an institution are all important to preventing and responding to child sexual abuse. We particularly discuss 'total' or 'closed' institutions—those that exercise full control over a child's day-to-day life. In these institutions, children are subject to strict rules and procedures, are entirely dependent on the institution, and are isolated from the outside world.[34] Because closed institutions are not common environments, they can become 'alternative moral universes'—the cultural norms and rules are established and maintained wholly within the institution and are distinct from the norms and rules of general society.[35] Such environments can enliven a culture of humiliating and degrading children, including through child sexual abuse. Youth detention and some out of home care environments are closed institutions. We also discuss in Chapter 3 the unique risks that apply to the institutions we discuss in detail in Volumes 3, 4, 5 and 6 of this report—namely schools, out of home care, youth detention centres and health institutions. There is a greater risk of child sexual abuse in any institution that does not facilitate opportunities for children to communicate their views or that does not respect the views of the children under its care.[36] There is also a greater risk of child sexual abuse in institutions that do not have clear and appropriate child-centred policies to educate and guide staff in preventing, detecting and responding to misconduct against children.[37]

The harm caused by sexual abuse is profound and far-reaching. In Chapter 3 and throughout our report, we hear directly from victim-survivors, their families and other members of their community about the nature of this harm.

'Institutional betrayal' is a particular form of harm related to institutional child sexual abuse.[38] Institutional betrayal refers to the failure of an institution to provide a safe environment for a victim-survivor, as well as an institution's failure to act once a disclosure of abuse is made. When an institution chooses to prioritise protecting itself from public criticism or legal action by minimising, denying or concealing concerns about abuse, the risk that abuse will occur or continue to occur, and the number of children affected, is likely to increase.[39] In turn, many children and young people, their families and the broader community may lose trust in some of Tasmania's institutions.

We identified a strong—and understandable—sense of institutional betrayal from many of the victim-survivors and institutional staff who contributed to our Inquiry.

7.2 Volume 3—Children in schools

In Volume 3, we consider the Tasmanian Government's responses to child sexual abuse in state government schools. Although our terms of reference limit our Inquiry to government schools, much of the information and many of the recommendations in this volume will be relevant across the education system, not least because all teachers, including those working in non-government schools, must be registered with the Teachers Registration Board.

We acknowledge that, overwhelmingly, teachers and school staff are committed to ensuring the safety, wellbeing and educational achievement of students in their care and that many teachers will shape the lives of their students for the better. However, over the course of our Inquiry, we were made aware of too many instances where students were not kept safe.

In the first chapter of Volume 3, Chapter 4 Background and context: Children in schools, we provide an overview of the roles and functions of the Department for Education, Children and Young People (previously the Department of Education).

The Department oversees education services for more than 60,000 students in 195 government schools across Tasmania and employs about 11,000 people, including 5,700 teachers (of which more than 500 are principals and assistant principals).[40] The Department is responsible for responding to incidents of child sexual abuse in educational settings, which includes investigating complaints, supporting victim-survivors and disciplining employees who have engaged in misconduct.

We note that in August 2020, before establishing our Commission of Inquiry, the Tasmanian Government announced an Independent Education Inquiry. In late 2021, the Government publicly released findings and recommendations of the Independent Education Inquiry, although not the whole report. We discuss this report in Chapter 4. The Department accepted all 20 of the Independent Education Inquiry's recommendations.

In Chapter 5 Case studies: Children in schools, we consider eight cases where the Department had investigated allegations of abuse to better understand the Department's policies and disciplinary systems in response to a disclosure of child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours in an education setting. Three of these cases were about abuse that occurred before 2000 but involved the ongoing response of the Department or the justice system.

These cases highlight several systemic shortcomings in the Department's responses to child sexual abuse and the impact of this on victim-survivors. They demonstrate that the initial response by school authorities to a disclosure of abuse was frequently inappropriate, showing a lack of understanding of what constitutes child sexual abuse and grooming behaviour. At times, children were simply disbelieved, with school authorities being unwilling to accept their accounts of abuse. This led to authorities supporting and protecting the alleged abusers, rather than the children involved.

In some of the cases we reviewed, we noted that responses to disclosures of child sexual abuse often did not comply with departmental policies and procedures. Further, they show that the policies and procedures available were inadequate for responding to abuse, which was particularly apparent for harmful sexual behaviours. The case studies also highlight a general lack of support, care and communication for the children and young people who disclosed abuse, and for their families, sometimes with lifelong impacts. We also heard negative experiences of victim-survivors, now adults, trying to obtain information and acknowledgment from the Department.

We identified problems with the disciplinary framework for managing allegations of child sexual abuse in schools. There were also significant gaps in information sharing within and across schools, the Department and the Teachers Registration Board, as well as in the powers and functions of the Teachers Registration Board. In one case, these gaps allowed a teacher with multiple allegations to be employed by the Department as a relief teacher in multiple schools despite past concerns about his behaviour in interstate schools.

In the final chapter of Volume 3, Chapter 6 The way forward: Children in schools, we review the Department for Education, Children and Young People's child safeguarding measures, recognising that these measures are a work in progress as the Department continues to respond to recommendations of the National Royal Commission and implement the recommendations of the Independent Education Inquiry. Rather than duplicate the work of the Independent Education Inquiry, we endorse its recommendations and focus our attention on issues that fall outside that inquiry's terms of reference or complement their reforms. These issues include access to education about child sexual abuse for staff and students, the Department's disciplinary framework for managing complaints of sexual misconduct in schools, and the powers and functions of the Teachers Registration Board.

Child sexual abuse prevention education programs are important for safeguarding students because of the role they play in empowering children and young people in their bodily autonomy and navigating any threats to their safety. We recommend that prevention education should be mandated across all schools and within government-run early learning preschool programs, through to Year 12. The Department should introduce and fund this education as part of the Australian curriculum.

We affirm the Department establishing the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People in response to recommendations from the Independent Education Inquiry. A dedicated focus on child safeguarding policy and resourcing Safeguarding Leads in schools is necessary to ensure the right systems are in place to reduce the risks of child sexual abuse and respond appropriately. Although the Department has indicated that it would like to broaden the Office's remit to all child-facing service areas of the Department, our view is that it should stay focused on prevention, risk identification, policy development and related workforce development in schools.

The regular contact between teachers and students, sometimes over many years, means teachers are uniquely placed to notice concerning changes in the behaviours of their students, which may indicate they are being abused. Teachers are sometimes the most trusted adult in a child's life. For these reasons, all teachers, as well as others working and volunteering in schools, should be trained to identify abuse at the earliest opportunity and to respond with sensitivity and confidence if a student discloses abuse to them. Educators should also be confident of their professional and legal obligations, particularly in relation to maintaining boundaries with students and mandatory reporting of abuse. For these reasons, we recommend that the Department adopts mandatory child safeguarding training for all education staff and volunteers, with different levels depending on the skills and knowledge requirements of attendees.

The disciplinary process is central to the Government's response to allegations of child sexual abuse against staff. For this reason we recommend in Chapter 6 that the Tasmanian Government establishes the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, whose role it is to receive, assess, investigate, coordinate and oversee responses to allegations of child sexual abuse by staff, including for allegations of child sexual abuse by staff in schools.

We also make recommendations in Chapter 6 about improved departmental policies, including a professional conduct policy, responding to harmful sexual behaviours in schools, and ensuring these are regularly reviewed and publicly accessible.

The Teachers Registration Board is central to regulating the professional conduct of teachers, although it has been constrained by limited powers and a lack of information and coordination with the Department. We recommend that the Tasmanian Government enacts legislation to compel relevant entities to notify the Teachers Registration Board when the entity becomes aware of concerns about sexual misconduct by a teacher, and to involve the Board in any investigation. We also recommend that the Government amends the Teachers Registration Act 2000 to allow the Board to immediately suspend the registration of a teacher who poses an unacceptable risk of harm to students, to better monitor where teachers are working, to take enforcement measures more easily against schools employing unregistered teachers, and to set minimum professional development requirements for teachers.

7.3 Volume 4—Children in out of home care

In Volume 4, we consider the risks of and responses to child sexual abuse, harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation in out of home care settings, and make extensive recommendations to significantly reform the out of home care system. Out of home care services are part of Tasmania's statutory child protection system. The Department for Education, Children and Young People is responsible for children in out of home care, which used to sit with the Department of Communities.

Under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997, the Secretary of the Department can become the guardian of a child if a child is at risk of harm in their home environment. The Department is responsible for determining where a child should live, making arrangements for the child's education and medical treatment, and providing for any of the child's other needs. As part of its duty of care to children under its guardianship, the Tasmanian Government is obligated to protect children in out of home care from abuse, including sexual abuse. To help the Tasmanian Government to meet this duty, we call for an extensive rebuilding of the out of home care system.

Out of home care settings should provide for children and young people to heal from the harm that has led to the State assuming responsibility for their care. Instead, we found that such settings are, too often, causing more harm to children and young people and increasing their vulnerability to child sexual abuse. The out of home care system requires urgent attention and resourcing to turn this around.

In the first chapter of Volume 4, Chapter 7 Background and context: Children in out of home care, we look at how the statutory child protection system functions in Tasmania, including the Department's organisational structure for administering out of home care, how a child enters the system, and the known risks of child sexual abuse in care. We also summarise the findings of the National Royal Commission relevant to out of home care and the many Tasmanian reviews of the child protection system that have been conducted since the early 2000s. An assessment of the Department's progress in response to these previous reviews and recommendations gave us an indication of what more needs to be done to keep children in out of home care safe from sexual abuse.

While the number of children in out of home care in Tasmania has fluctuated in any given year since 2007, overall, numbers have increased. As of April 2022, there were 1,256 children in out of home care in Tasmania.[41] Approximately 90 per cent of children in care are cared for by foster or kinship carers in private homes. As of 30 June 2021, there were more than 563 Tasmanian households formally caring for at least one child in out of home care.[42] Approximately 6 per cent of children in out of home care in Tasmania are in 'residential care'; that is, they are placed with other children in a group residence supervised by rostered staff.

Children in out of home care are much more likely to experience maltreatment, including sexual abuse, than children who are not in out of home care.[43] This abuse may be perpetrated by employees and carers (within the Tasmanian Government, or in the non-government out of home care sector) or other members of a carer's family. The abuse may also be perpetrated by adults outside the out of home care system, through child sexual exploitation or by other children in care.

Some children and young people are at greater risk of sexual abuse in out of home care. Aboriginal children are more than five times more likely to be in out of home care than non-Aboriginal children.[44] More contact with out of home care institutions corresponds with a greater likelihood of being sexually abused.[45] The risk of sexual abuse is also heightened when an Aboriginal child's connection to community and culture is undermined by their out of home care placement.[46]

More than 20 per cent of children in out of home care in Tasmania have a known disability.[47] Children with disability in out of home care may need assistance with intimate care activities, may have less control over their daily lives and may have more difficulty communicating their needs to others. These factors increase their vulnerability to sexual abuse.[48]

The National Royal Commission made 22 recommendations aimed at improving the safety of children in out of home care. Since 2003, there have also been more than 20 reviews conducted into the child protection system in Tasmania, which amounted to several hundred recommendations—many of which remain unimplemented. These reviews have repeatedly highlighted that, despite attempts to reform the child protection system in Tasmania, the safety of children in out of home care continues to be undermined by inappropriate placements, not enough support for carers, inadequate monitoring of care arrangements, poor complaints processes and a lack of accreditation, registration and licensing systems for providers.

In Chapter 8 Case examples and our approach: Children in out of home care, we clarify the scope of our Inquiry into the safety of children in out of home care, identifying that we have focused on out of home care specifically, and only include those aspects of the wider statutory child protection system that relate to the risk of sexual abuse for children in care.

We discuss the sources of evidence that we drew on to understand the problems and potential solutions for the out of home care sector in Tasmania—including the accounts of victim-survivors, the concerns of numerous professionals who had worked in the out of home care system, and the case files of 22 children in the care of the Department—as a sample of those who were identified as having been at risk of, or had experienced, child sexual abuse while in care since 2013.

We have identified several systemic problems with Tasmania's out of home care system, including:

- challenges in adopting measures to prevent child sexual abuse, including ensuring appropriate placements of children
- difficulties with consistently putting in place risk mitigation strategies when risks are identified, such as providing early treatment for serious and concerning harmful sexual behaviours
- not consistently addressing the trauma children have experienced before or during their out of home care experience, which increases their risk of child sexual abuse or reduces their confidence in disclosing such abuse
- not consistently addressing the cultural needs of Aboriginal children, increasing their risk of child sexual abuse or reducing their confidence in disclosing such abuse
- not enough supports for staff and carers to manage risks of child sexual abuse, or to respond appropriately when it occurs
- inconsistent and uneven responses when children disclose child sexual abuse while in care.

We consider that these problems are, at least partially, a result of a system under pressure. We heard of a system that has been chronically underfunded, a culture that resists open scrutiny, and trauma within the system itself. These problems need to be addressed through changes to the systems and processes of out of home care broadly, rather than tweaks to the system.

In Chapter 9 The way forward: Children in out of home care, we contemplate significant reform of the out of home care system. We outline improvements to the out of home care system to strengthen the systems and structures that can reduce the risk of sexual abuse for children in care, as well as improving how the Department responds when abuse occurs. We also make recommendations to improve the independent oversight of the out of home care system.

We consider that, fundamentally, the chronic underfunding of out of home care services and the statutory child protection system more generally must be corrected as a matter of urgency. We recommend a significant increase in ongoing funding of the out of home care system, as well as once-off funding to ensure our reforms are implemented.

We recommend that the Tasmanian Government completes its outsourcing of all out of home care services to non-government providers while the Department retains responsibility for setting the strategic framework for out of home care, for case management and for monitoring and supporting quality care. New funding guidelines should be developed for these organisations, requiring them to prove compliance with the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the National Out of Home Care Standards and to deliver trauma-informed, therapeutic services to children and young people in out of home care.

'Foundational pillars' are required within Child Safety Services and out of home care to support staff to operate with confidence and to make complex decisions about the safety of children in out of home care. We consider these foundational pillars of an out of home care system to be expert and active leadership, strong governance structures with internal accountability, a clear strategic direction for the out of home care sector, public and transparent policies, outcomes and performance reporting, and a strong and capable workforce. A central feature of these reforms is that children must be involved in designing the system that cares for them, through empowerment and participation strategies, including establishing a permanent out of home care children's advisory group.

Increased accountability for the Government will motivate it to improve out of home care. To this end, we recommend that the Government restructures the leadership of the Department to further support the Department's role and responsibilities as statutory guardian. In addition to the current roles, this involves appointing executive leadership specifically for out of home care and appointing a Chief Practitioner to lead the practice improvement activities of the Department.

Quality improvement and safety will be achieved through developing an outcomes and reporting framework and a Quality and Risk Committee that monitors the system performance of out of home care, oversees children's safety and wellbeing in out of home care, including child sexual abuse, and monitors progress on implementing the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the national out of home care standards.

The Department's workforce strategy should include measures to increase staff numbers, retention and wellbeing. It should prioritise providing mandatory professional development for all out of home care staff, including ensuring child safety officers have enough knowledge to identify and respond to child sexual abuse and trauma to perform their important role. Further, a new professional conduct policy specific to the out of home care context should be developed to assist managers, staff and carers to understand and meet standards of conduct when interacting with children in care.

The Department must have a clear line of sight to each child in care, so risks of abuse can be identified and addressed at the earliest opportunity. We recommend that an individual case manager, supervised by a more experienced practitioner, be assigned to every child in out of home care. The Department must also have a clear line of sight to every carer. All carers should be registered on a Carer Register and satisfy annual reviews as a condition of maintaining their registration.

The Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle ('Placement Principle') is Australia's national policy framework for preventing Aboriginal children from entering the out of home care system. To date, the Tasmanian Government's implementation of the Placement Principle has been limited. An Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice, led by an Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People, should be established to oversee the implementation of the Placement Principle and to ensure the interests of Aboriginal children in out of home care are represented in all the Department's activities. This is essential to help reduce the over-representation of Aboriginal children in care and the increased vulnerability to institutional child sexual abuse this creates.

It was clear to us that children and young people with disability need tailored supports to improve their safety in out of home care. We recommend all children in care should have access to holistic assessments to meet their needs and that the Department appoints a specialised role to support children in out of home care to access the National Disability Insurance Scheme.

The Department has lacked a clear process for responding to concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care. We therefore recommend that the new Chief Practitioner receives and triages all complaints and concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care. Where concerns involve the behaviour of a staff member, the Child-Related Incident Management Unit—recommended and discussed at length in Volume 3—should respond to reports of misconduct, including conducting investigations. The Chief Practitioner should oversee the responses to all other types of concerns or complaints about the safety and wellbeing of children in care, including those relating to harmful sexual behaviours, child sexual exploitation and child sexual abuse by carers. The Chief Practitioner will then report on all concerns and complaints to the Quality and Risk Committee to inform quality improvement. We consider that the Department should develop policy responses to harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation that collaborate with other agencies such as police and schools. Such approaches have been developed with some success in other Australian states.

In particular, in Chapter 9, we recommend that the Department establishes a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit, overseen by the Chief Practitioner, to support all child-facing areas in the Department, including out of home care services, to manage harmful sexual behaviours by providing advice, guidance and support and context-specific policies.

Given the vulnerability of children in out of home care, there is a need to strengthen individual advocacy and systemic oversight. In Chapter 18, we recommend the new Commission for Children and Young People be empowered to undertake systemic inquiries into out of home care services and recommend ongoing improvements to the structure and operation of the Tasmanian statutory child protection system. In addition, a new independent Child Advocate should sit within the Commission as a Deputy Commissioner. The Child Advocate should employ community visitors to regularly check in with children in out of home care and report back on their needs and concerns.

7.4 Volume 5—Children in youth detention

In Volume 5, we explore the long history of allegations of child sexual abuse in Ashley Youth Detention Centre, Tasmania's primary dedicated youth detention facility. We consider child sexual abuse is not merely a historical problem for the Centre but remains a live and current risk. We observed a closed institution with a culture that enabled the humiliation and degradation of children, rationalised because the children were seen as 'the worst of the worst'. We remain particularly concerned about the safety and welfare of detainees. The Department for Education, Children and Young People is responsible for children and young people in detention, which was previously the role of the Department of Communities.

In Chapter 10 Background and context: Children in youth detention, we describe the heightened risk of children in detention being sexually abused. Many children who enter youth detention have experienced some form of childhood trauma, placing them at greater risk of further abuse, including sexual victimisation and assault.[49] Internationally, about 7 per cent of girls and 6 per cent of boys in detention are exposed to sexual victimisation, either from other detainees or staff.[50]

The nature of youth detention facilities, as highly controlled environments that are largely closed off from the world, also increases risks that staff will adopt attitudes of control and punishment, which can lead to children being dehumanised.[51]

We then describe the international, national and state-based laws and standards that apply to the detention of children and young people, including for strip searches (sometimes called 'unclothed searches'), the isolation of detainees and use of force against them, as well as rules around punishment, noting that the Youth Justice Act 1997 prohibits punishment intended to inflict physical pain or discomfort, that intimidates or humiliates detainees or involves any abusive or discriminatory practices.[52]

We describe how youth detention works in practice in Tasmania, including the management structure, how Ashley Youth Detention Centre is staffed and run, how key decisions are made (for example, about which units detainees are placed in or how detainee behaviour is managed) and in incident reporting and oversight.

Ashley Youth Detention Centre has been the subject of multiple reviews, with 17 internal and external briefings, reports and reviews completed since 2003. Although few looked at child sexual abuse directly, all identified risks to the safety of detainees. We summarise the findings of these reports, which consistently identified systemic problems in how detainees are treated, seemingly with little improvement over time. We found there was no lack of guidance and information on how the Centre could be improved, only an absence of political will to see through such necessary reforms. This has, in our view, contributed to a crisis in Ashley Youth Detention Centre that must be addressed by its closure and significant reform of youth detention.

In Chapter 11 Case studies: Children in youth detention, we share seven case studies looking at different aspects of Ashley Youth Detention Centre. In Case study 1, we describe the nature and extent of abuse at the Centre, including the evidence we received from a number of current and former detainees, as well as allegations made through redress schemes and civil claims. This evidence is harrowing, describing abuses that are callous, cruel and degrading. Children and young people's powerlessness in the face of such ingrained abuse and mistreatment is palpable and devastating. The consistency of themes across all these accounts, despite coming from multiple sources, are striking and include:

- sexual, physical and psychological abuse of detainees by staff
- harmful sexual behaviours between detainees, sometimes with the knowledge of Centre staff
- staff using strip searching as a tool of control, and as an opportunity to sexually abuse children and young people
- staff humiliating, belittling and threatening detainees
- inappropriate use of isolation and use of force, including to punish and control detainees.

While we did not test the truth of individual accounts, we gave particular weight to the consistency across the accounts of victim-survivors whom we heard from directly and the accounts we read in claims under the Abuse in State Care Program and the National Redress Scheme. Despite being the accounts of different people detained at the Centre over different periods, and the information coming from direct accounts, critical incident reports and state and Commonwealth redress schemes, we saw a striking consistency (and enough variability) in the accounts of where and how abuses occurred, the people they alleged were responsible and the patterns and consistency in specific sexually abusive behaviours.

Taken together, alongside previous reviews and the evidence we received about a longstanding corrosive culture that doubts and disbelieves reports by detainees, we find that for decades some children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre experienced systematic harm and abuse.

In Case study 2, we examine the extent of harmful sexual behaviours at the Centre and responses to such behaviour. We include some accounts of former detainees who describe sexual harm by other detainees at the Centre and how this was often ignored by staff. We also heard allegations that staff sometimes actively used the harmful behaviours, including sexual behaviours, of some detainees to control or frighten other detainees. We make findings in this case study about the failures in responding appropriately to the risks of harmful sexual behaviours, which are listed later in this volume and explained further in the case studies. In particular, we find that Ashley Youth Detention Centre has been aware of harmful sexual behaviours at the Centre and has not taken steps to protect children and young people from these harms.

Case studies 3 and 4 examine isolation and use of force at the Centre and make a range of findings that these practices have been misused, sometimes excessively and unlawfully, to punish and degrade detainees in breach of their human rights. In particular, we find that:

- using isolation as a form of behaviour management, punishment or cruelty has been a regular and persistent practice at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since at least the early 2000s, and in July 2023, we received information to suggest that some harmful practices, such as isolation, are still occurring
- the excessive use of force has been a long standing method of abusing children and young people by some staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, and the Department and Tasmanian Government have not always responded appropriately.

When the isolation of young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre is unauthorised, unregulated and unreported, or there is excessive use of force, the risk of and opportunities for the physical and sexual abuse of young people increase. Such belittling and dehumanising practices also reduce the likelihood of children and young people making disclosures of child sexual abuse because their sense of what is right and wrong, trust in adults at the Centre and self-worth have been undermined. Case studies 5 and 6 have examples of how complaints about the safety and treatment of detainees have been managed—including complaints by a staff member called Alysha (a pseudonym) and a detainee called Max (a pseudonym).[53] We make findings about the State's, the Department's and the Centre's response to these complaints, and identify systemic problems in these responses.

Case study 7 describes how the Department has responded to alleged sexual abuse of detainees by staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. This traces revelations from the Abuse in State Care Program (which began in 2003) and the perceived legal barriers that the Department told us limited its ability to act against staff, despite sometimes receiving multiple allegations of serious sexual assaults by staff still working at the Centre. Over time, corporate memory of the Abuse in State Care Program (and the information it revealed about current staff) was lost within the Department. Another wave of information alleging abuses by current and former staff came with the introduction of the National Redress Scheme in 2018, which was also met with confusion and inaction because of legal advice and practices that precluded use of that information, until a belated change of practice in the second half of 2020. We make a range of findings about failures to manage risks to detainees arising from this information.

Children and young people must be safe in youth detention. In Chapter 12 The way forward: Children in youth detention, we look beyond the disturbing picture of youth detention in Tasmania to the future, making a raft of recommendations, all of which we consider are necessary to deliver safety.

At the beginning of Chapter 12, we acknowledge that the Tasmanian Government has committed to a reform agenda for the youth justice system in its Draft Youth Justice Blueprint 2022–2032: Keeping Children and Young People out of the Youth Justice System, which contains strategies designed to achieve many of the changes we agree need to occur.[54] However, we consider the Government needs to do more to keep children in detention safe.

The Tasmanian Government should close Ashley Youth Detention Centre as soon as possible. Once closed, the Government should establish a memorial to victim-survivors of abuse at the site as a tangible, public acknowledgment of their experiences, trauma, pain and suffering. For victim-survivors seeking redress, it is critical that the Government develops a process to preserve historical records relating to children and young people and staff connected with the Centre.

Cultural change is fundamental to making Ashley Youth Detention Centre and future detention facilities safer for children and young people. We make several recommendations in the areas of leadership, governance, children's participation and staffing to help create a child safe culture in youth detention where the risk of child sexual abuse is minimised. These include recommendations designed to ensure staff in detention facilities have the right qualifications, attributes and skills to work constructively and therapeutically with children in detention. They also include: continuing professional development for staff on expected standards of behaviour in interacting with children in detention; approaches to setting fair, clear and firm boundaries for children's behaviour; and training in all custodial policies and procedures.

We have made the significant recommendation that the Department initiates a change management process that requires all staff to reapply for their positions. We consider that such a process is essential to change the culture in youth detention. It will also enable staff who are reappointed to clearly identify themselves as being a part of Tasmania's future youth detention system, rather than its past.

This recommendation, alongside others, may well add to pressure on staffing levels in the short term. The Tasmanian Government must urgently develop a staffing contingency plan for youth detention to ensure children and young people in detention are not subjected to unnecessary lockdowns and that their rights are not trumped by 'operational' considerations.

We also recommend that the Department maintains enough youth workers to implement a therapeutic model of care in youth detention, avoid lockdowns and ensure the safety and wellbeing of children, young people and staff in detention facilities.

The most effective way to protect children and young people against the risk of sexual abuse in youth detention is to prevent them entering or re-entering detention. It follows that strategies to divert children and young people from the youth justice system and from detention should be prioritised. Our recommendations include a strong focus on increasing opportunities for bail, reducing the number of children who are remanded to custody and ensuring detention is an option of last resort.

Strategies underpinned by Aboriginal self-determination are urgently needed to divert Aboriginal children and young people from the youth justice system and to reduce their over-representation in youth detention. Cultural safety for Aboriginal children and young people in detention must also be strengthened.

We consider that an effective youth detention system is one that is child-focused—that is, one that provides children and young people in detention with timely access to high-quality, developmentally appropriate therapeutic supports, education and health care, as well as support to address the underlying causes of their offending. These features are necessary to reduce reoffending and promote community safety.

Harmful sexual behaviours are a known risk in detention environments, and we heard numerous instances where children and young people were harmed by this form of sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. We recommend the Government develops a clear policy for preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention, which considers the full range of harmful sexual behaviours that may occur in that setting, so all children and young people involved can get help. It should explore therapeutic prevention programs and ensure timely access to specialist interventions. This must be done in conjunction with our other recommended measures to improve the Government's response to harmful sexual behaviours in institutional settings, including the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit in the Department for Education, Children and Young People to support consistent, high-quality practice in identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours.

It was apparent from evidence we heard that the inappropriate, and possibly unlawful, use of searches, isolation and force at Ashley Youth Detention Centre occurred as part of a broader culture that enabled abuse, including sexual abuse, of children and young people in detention. Although legislative and procedural improvements have recently been implemented for searches of children and young people in detention, we recommend that the Government introduces body scanner technology in youth detention to reduce the need for more intrusive searches and strengthen safeguards in custodial procedures for searching children in detention.

Children and young people have been, and continue to be, subjected to extensive isolation practices at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, whether because of staff shortages or as a response to difficult behaviours. Such practices interfere with children's access to education, exercise and health care, and have serious, detrimental effects on their health and wellbeing. We recommend changes to the Youth Justice Act to clarify the definition of 'isolation' and criminalise its use as a punishment.

Custodial procedures for searches, isolation and the use of force should be updated and published on the Department's website. We also recommend that Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) reports regularly on the use of searches, isolation and use of force to the Secretary, the new Quality and Risk Committee and the new Commission for Children and Young People. The Department should record, report and publish separate information on lockdowns to enable further oversight of this practice.

Effective complaints processes are critical to creating a safe detention environment. If a child in detention has a concern about their safety, including a concern about child sexual abuse, they should feel confident to speak up and know they will be listened to and that their concern will be taken seriously and acted upon, without reprisal. Children in detention also need clear, developmentally appropriate processes for raising concerns and making complaints.

We recommend that all serious allegations against staff in detention that involve concerns about the safety of children and young people—including child sexual abuse, boundary breaches and inappropriate searches, isolation or use of force—be referred immediately to the new Child-Related Incident Management Directorate. This Directorate should be responsible for investigating the allegation and ensuring children and their families are informed of the progress of the investigation and the Department's response. We also recommend that staff in detention facilities have clear processes for raising safety concerns about their colleagues.

Independent external oversight is a vital part of safeguarding children in detention facilities, where contact with people outside the facility is heavily controlled, regulated and limited. To help identify and minimise the risks of child sexual abuse, children in detention need access to regular visits from the staff of an independent oversight body who have the skills and experience to build rapport and trust with detainees and to advocate on their behalf. To this end, we recommend that the Government establishes an independent community visitor program for children in detention, to be administered by the new Commission for Children and Young People and led by the new Child Advocate.

We also recommend that the new Commission for Children and Young People, as an independent body with specialist expertise in children, be given broad functions to monitor the youth detention system and the safety and wellbeing of children in detention. In addition, we recommend that the Government appoints the new Commission for Children and Young People as a child-specific National Preventive Mechanism in accordance with the Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture. The Government must resource the new Commission to perform these various functions.

7.5 Volume 6—Children in health services

In Volume 6, we focus on the safety of children and young people in Tasmanian health services.

The Department of Health is the system-wide administrator of Tasmania's public health system. The Department employs around 15,500 people who work across approximately 330 sites statewide, including in four major hospitals that each have a paediatric unit and offer outpatient services to children and young people.[55] The overwhelming evidence we received about child sexual abuse was connected to Launceston General Hospital. For these reasons, we focus primarily on Launceston General Hospital in this volume, although our recommendations are intended to benefit all Tasmanian health services.

As in other states and territories, external agencies are also responsible for overseeing aspects of Tasmania's health system. These agencies are: the Office of the Health Complaints Commissioner, which responds to systemic complaints about Tasmanian health services; the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency and the National Health Practitioner Boards, which respond to complaints about individual registered health practitioners; and the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care, which accredits Tasmanian health service organisations against the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards.

We met many health workers across Tasmania over the course of our Commission of Inquiry, the overwhelming majority of whom do an outstanding job in providing safe and professional care to children and young people. However, revelations that paediatric nurse James Griffin perpetrated child sexual abuse, inside and outside Launceston

General Hospital, over many years—despite former patients and hospital staff repeatedly reporting his abuse and misconduct—was one of the reasons our Inquiry was established.

What we heard about child sexual abuse at Launceston General Hospital illustrates how abusers can take advantage of the trust placed in professionals in health services, including by using their health expertise to mask their abuse. We also learned the importance of strong collective leadership, with clear accountabilities for promoting children's safety, in preventing and best responding to any identified risks to children and young people.

In the first chapter of Volume 6, Chapter 13 Background and context: Children in health services, we describe what is known about the risks of child sexual abuse in health services, briefly describe the Tasmanian health system and outline several previous Tasmanian reviews that have examined aspects of this system, including failures to appropriately manage the misconduct of health service employees. We conclude the chapter by summarising what we heard about the organisational culture at Launceston General Hospital and how this culture contributed to abuses occurring without sanction over many years.

There is limited data globally on the nature and prevalence of child sexual abuse in health settings.[56] Child sexual abuse in health institutions was not a specific focus of the National Royal Commission.[57] In 2020, as part of an Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse in the United Kingdom, the Truth Project published a thematic report that included findings about the experiences of victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in healthcare contexts.[58] As part of our Inquiry, we commissioned research that included exploring children's and young people's perceptions of safety in Tasmanian hospitals.[59] We also heard from the Chief Protection Officer at the South Australian Department of Health about risk factors for child sexual abuse in hospitals.

Much of the qualitative data available from these different sources was similar. A key risk factor for child sexual abuse in healthcare settings is the intimate nature of medical care, which gives health practitioners unique access to children and young people in contexts that are less likely to be questioned.[60] Other risk factors include the absence of parental supervision when a child or young person is an inpatient at a hospital and children and young people recovering in hospital rooms that are not closely monitored.[61] The evidence before us also revealed that children and young people do not feel empowered to disclose concerns about how they are being treated in health services, particularly when safe complaints pathways are not actively communicated.[62]

Over the past two decades, the Tasmanian health system has been the subject of several reviews. While none of these reviews has specifically examined child sexual abuse in health services, they are relevant because they have repeatedly highlighted that health workplaces with dysfunctional cultures—particularly those that allow poor conduct to go unaddressed—may contribute to, or at least hinder, the identification of child sexual abuse.[63]

At consultations over the course of our Inquiry, several former and current staff members of Launceston General Hospital independently raised concerns about the hospital's culture. While we have not established that each of these concerns are true, considered as a whole, they suggest a culture that discourages complaints of misconduct and therefore allowed such conduct to go unaddressed.

In Chapter 14 Case studies: Children in health services, we focus on case studies relating to former employees of Launceston General Hospital. Our terms of reference specifically required us to have regard to allegations of child sexual abuse against James Griffin.[64] We received evidence about other incidents at Launceston General Hospital and decided to examine some of these more closely as well. We did this to acknowledge the efforts of the victim-survivors involved and their families to improve the safety of other children and young people, and to bring to light that Mr Griffin's abuse and the hospital's failures to respond to it appropriately were not an anomaly.

Case study 1 examines a complaint made about a health practitioner in the context of receiving a health service. This case study is subject to a restricted publication order, which means it will not be made available to the public or media. We are committed to being open and transparent. During our Inquiry, we heard evidence that, too often, people, including victim-survivors, have felt silenced or have felt unable to come forward and be heard. At the same time, we have sought to avoid prejudicing any current investigation or proceedings. Not only was this required by our terms of reference, but we are acutely aware of ensuring we did not prejudice the ability of victim-survivors to seek justice and ongoing attempts to keep children safe. It is in this context that we made a restricted publication order in relation to Case study 1. We made this order because we were satisfied that the public interest in the publishing of evidence contained in the case study is outweighed by relevant legal and privacy considerations, including avoiding prejudicing current investigations and proceedings.

Case study 2 examines a complaint by 11-year-old Zoe Duncan (now deceased) and her parents in 2001 alleging sexual abuse by Dr Tim (a pseudonym), a former doctor at Launceston General Hospital. It outlines a series of wrongful assumptions and inadequate investigations, each infecting the next. We make several findings in relation to this case study, which are listed later in this volume and explained further in Case study 2.

Case study 3 examines complaints regarding paediatric nurse James Griffin, who died shortly after his abuses against children began to be reported and exposed. We were overwhelmed by the extent of evidence about Mr Griffin's abuse over his tenure at Launceston General Hospital. The length of the case study about Mr Griffin in this chapter reflects the volume of material we received and evidence we heard, much of which was available to the hospital and other agencies and had been for some time. Over the course of Mr Griffin's offending, there were numerous and consequential missed opportunities—by Launceston General Hospital, Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services—to intervene earlier. The number and scale of findings we make in Chapter 14 reflects the magnitude of the failures to keep children and young people safe from Mr Griffin for almost 20 years, until he was finally suspended from his employment in mid-2019 after losing his registration to work with vulnerable people following a police report.

We describe a range of systemic failings that contributed to managers and human resources staff at Launceston General Hospital not acting appropriately in response to concerns raised about Mr Griffin over the years and to an inadequate response once the scale of Mr Griffin's abuses became more broadly known. The hospital did not have clear executive accountabilities for child safety, nor a transparent system for managing complaints relevant to child safety. At times, the response to reports of professional boundary breaches in the paediatric ward where Mr Griffin worked appear to have discouraged other concerns being raised or pursued by staff. Records of complaints and concerns, when they did exist, were incomplete, inaccessible and not escalated consistently. This reduced the ability of all concerned to view each complaint in the context of cumulative complaints about Mr Griffin, which revealed a disturbing and longstanding pattern of misconduct.

Further, there was no clear process in place at the hospital for reporting complaints about staff conduct to external agencies such as Child Safety Services, the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency (or its predecessor boards) or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme. Consequently, ward staff, nurse unit managers, senior management and members of the executive were not aware of their distinct roles and responsibilities for reporting. We also observed a highly conservative approach to initiating disciplinary proceedings against an employee, to the significant detriment of several children who were patients of the hospital.

It was apparent to us that the leadership at Launceston General Hospital was dysfunctional, which contributed to its overall failure to keep children and young people safe from Mr Griffin and respond appropriately once his offending became broadly known. We also found problems with the decisions and actions of human resources staff in responding to an important disclosure about Mr Griffin in 2011 or 2012 and in contributing to various processes within the hospital following his suspension (and ultimate resignation and death). We carefully considered the responsibilities of individuals at the hospital relative to their roles in addressing Mr Griffin's behaviour and in the context of the dysfunctional environment within which they were operating. In some cases, the conduct and omissions of individuals in response to known risks and incidents of abuse by Mr Griffin were not justified and we make findings accordingly. We make several findings, including that human resources staff at Launceston General Hospital failed to act on a serious disclosure of child sexual abuse in 2011 or 2012 and, later, failed to properly and accurately review Mr Griffin's complaints history, including in response to a complaint to the Integrity Commission. We also found a range of collective leadership failures in preventing and addressing the risks Mr Griffin posed but also the broader response once the extent of his offending became known. We also make a number of findings against Tasmania Police and Child Safety Services for their failures to share and act on important information each held that suggested Mr Griffin was a risk to children. We make a finding of misconduct against a former executive, who was closely involved in Launceston General Hospital's management of revelations about Mr Griffin from mid-2019 onwards, for misleading our Commission of Inquiry.

In Chapter 15 The way forward: Children in health services, we overview the suite of reforms that the Department of Health has begun in response to the evidence about Mr Griffin that was before our Commission of Inquiry. Some of these reforms complement the Child Safe Governance Review of the Launceston General Hospital and Human Resources, and the Launceston General Hospital Community Recovery Initiative, both of which were established, and reported their findings, during our Inquiry.[65] The Department has also implemented some reforms under its Child Safe Organisation Project, which aims to implement the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations and improve child safety in health services.[66]

We have concluded that while these recent reforms represent progress in improving child safety, it is still unclear exactly what reforms will be implemented, when and by whom. To this end, we recommend that the Department develops and publicly communicates a policy framework and an implementation plan for the reforms. This policy and plan should explain: the purpose and need for the reforms; the role, responsibilities and interactions of bodies established by the Department as part of the reforms; how the reforms will work together to provide a system-wide response to child sexual abuse in health services; how the reforms are being prioritised for implementation; who is responsible for their implementation; and the expected timeframes for implementation.

We also propose additional reforms in this report, with the objectives of ensuring child sexual abuse in the Tasmanian health system is identified and responded to appropriately when it occurs in the future, and that community trust in Launceston General Hospital and Tasmanian health services more broadly is restored.

Of national significance, recognising the risks we have identified of child sexual abuse in health settings, we recommend that the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations are a mandatory requirement for accrediting health services against the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards under the Australian Health Service Safety and Quality Accreditation Scheme. The Tasmanian Government should advocate for this reform at the national level.

We recommend that the Department of Health's cultural improvement strategy ensures clear organisational values, has strong governance and ensures accountability of senior managers and executives. We recommend that the Department of Health establishes processes and forums to facilitate the participation of children and young people in decisions affecting health service delivery, including a health services young people's advisory group. The advisory group should be composed of young people of different ages and from diverse backgrounds, with significant lived experience of health services. Through the advisory group, young people should have a say in departmental strategies, policies, procedures and protocols that affect them.

We recommend that the Department develops and implements a professional conduct policy for health services staff, which also applies to volunteers and contractors who have contact with children and young people. The policy should provide examples of behaviours that are relevant to the health services context. It should also reference existing professional and ethical obligations held by registered health practitioners.

The development and implementation of a clear complaints management, escalation and investigation process is critical. Noting the specialised context in which health workers operate, the Department may choose to establish a standalone Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate or work to ensure the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate we recommend in Chapter 6 has access to appropriate health-related expertise to accept referrals.

The Department, Launceston General Hospital and Tasmania Police must ensure ongoing assistance to all victim-survivors of child sexual abuse by Mr Griffin, including any victim-survivors who are yet to come forward. The Department should also develop and implement a critical incident response plan to ensure measures are in place to communicate clearly and consistently, and to support the affected members of the community, in the event of a future critical incident such as a serious breach to children's safety in the public health system. The plan should identify who is in charge of leading the response to the critical incident, facilitate debriefing for community members and provide for a comprehensive review of how the incident has been handled.

Further, the Tasmanian Government should undertake a review of the Health Complaints Act 1995 to ensure the role of the Health Complaints Commission extends to addressing systemic issues in health services related to children's safety.

7.6 Volume 7—The justice system and victim-survivors

Volume 7 looks specifically at the role that the criminal and civil justice systems, including redress schemes, play in responding to child sexual abuse, and how these systems might better serve victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in government institutions. In this volume, we discuss the criminal and civil systems, noting that while the former focuses on holding individual perpetrators to account and the latter has a broader focus on institutional accountability, they are not mutually exclusive options for victim-survivors seeking recourse for child sexual abuse.

In Chapter 16 Criminal justice responses, we consider recent reforms to criminal justice responses to child sexual abuse in institutional settings and what further reforms are needed. While the criminal justice system is an important mechanism for holding perpetrators of child sexual abuse to account, as an adversarial system, it is not always equipped to respond to the complex and sensitive issues that arise for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. However, there are many ways that the system's limitations can be alleviated. We heard about the importance to victim-survivors of having a voice and of not having damaging myths and language around sexual abuse—particularly misplaced notions of consent—wielded against them throughout the criminal justice process.

The criminal justice system only works if victim-survivors feel comfortable in coming forward and making a complaint to police. How police respond to an initial report of child sexual abuse will influence a victim-survivor's willingness to continue to engage with the criminal justice system.[67] Some victim-survivors with recent engagement with police told us that police officers responded professionally and sensitively to their accounts of child sexual abuse, but others told us that their complaint was not taken seriously or that the police failed to follow up an initial complaint.

We note that in late 2020, Tasmania Police initiated an internal management review to examine the response to allegations against James Griffin, which we discuss in detail in Chapter 16.[68] This review identified multiple investigative shortcomings.[69] In response to the review, Tasmania Police developed Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines, and committed to establishing a specialist investigative and policy team to focus on improving police procedures relating to child sexual abuse.[70] We further note that in March 2022, the Tasmanian Government announced that it would establish three multidisciplinary centres to bring together in one location family and sexual violence support services and specialist police investigators.[71]

Investigating allegations of child sexual abuse is a highly complex task that requires specialised knowledge and skills, particularly to elicit detailed, reliable and relevant accounts from children.

We have serious reservations about the Government's intention to incorporate family and sexual violence responses with child sexual abuse responses.[72] When child sexual abuse investigations are absorbed into other units, particularly those that are busy with a high number of family violence reports, there is a risk that responding to child sexual abuse allegations (particularly when they are historical) will be overwhelmed by the immediate pressures of managing family violence offenders.

We consider that the best approach for Tasmania is to establish specialist police child sexual abuse units, separate to family violence, in Hobart, Launceston and the North West. These specialist units should work closely with other agencies. They may but do not necessarily have to be co-located. Specialist child sexual abuse units constituted by appropriately trained officers should be resourced to ensure they can build trust with priority communities, that timely investigations of child abuse allegations are conducted and that the emotional wellbeing of officers in these units is supported. Officers in these units should only be drawn into other policing areas when there are exceptional circumstances such as natural disasters or public health emergencies.

Once an investigation of a child abuse allegation has been conducted, Tasmania Police may refer the case to the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, which is responsible for prosecuting an alleged perpetrator through the court system. As was the case with police, victim-survivors told us of mixed experiences with prosecuting authorities.

The Director of Public Prosecutions advised us that his office has implemented relevant recommendations of the National Royal Commission.[73] We further recommend that the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions provides ongoing professional development to its staff relevant to managing child sexual abuse cases, including for adopting more trauma-informed processes, addressing common myths about the nature of child sexual abuse and how to talk about consent, and keeping up to date on the laws of evidence and procedure that apply in child sexual abuse cases.

We note that the Tasmanian Parliament recently passed the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act 2023. This Act removes the limitation period for child sexual abuse offences, allowing historical offences to be pursued through the courts.[74] It also introduces model provisions to address barriers to the admissibility of evidence that may show a pattern of offending behaviour by a person accused of child sexual abuse offences.[75] It also introduced the offence of penetrative sexual abuse of a child or young person by a person in a position of authority in Tasmania. While we welcome these changes to the law, we recommend the new position of authority offence covers all forms of sexual contact (not just sexual penetration).

We would like to see further amendments to criminal legislation, rules of evidence and court procedures so the full range of offending behaviour in child sexual abuse cases can be prosecuted, adult victim-survivors of child sexual offences are extended the same protective measures that are in place for children to minimise the traumatic impacts of giving evidence in court, and juries understand the dynamics of child sexual abuse so they can effectively assess evidence in trials.

It was apparent to us that there is a lack of comprehensive data about how many child sexual abuse allegations result in prosecution and conviction in Tasmania. This data would provide a means of assessing the performance of the Tasmanian criminal justice system in responding to child sexual abuse. The Tasmanian Government should prioritise collecting and publishing data about institutional child sexual abuse such as the number of reports made to police, the prosecution outcomes relative to reports, and any trends in reports and prosecutions relevant to victim-survivor cohorts, including Aboriginal people.

In Chapter 17 Redress, civil litigation and support, we assess the effectiveness of the three main pathways available in Tasmania to victim-survivors seeking recompense from the State for the sexual abuse they suffered as children. These pathways are the National Redress Scheme, civil litigation and victims of crime compensation. Relevant to our assessment of these pathways is a consideration of the accessibility of information and records held by the Government and its institutions. In this chapter, we also consider the importance to victim-survivors of a personal apology for the sexual abuse perpetrated against them in government institutions.

Of national significance, we discuss the National Redress Scheme that is only available to victim-survivors who were abused before 1 July 2018 and expires on 30 June 2028.[76] Noting that it can take some victim-survivors more than 20 years to disclose child sexual abuse and recognising that child sexual abuse continues to occur in government institutions, we recommend that the Tasmanian Government ensures victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian government institutions continue to have access to a redress scheme that applies to child sexual abuse experienced after 1 July 2018 either by advocating for the Australian Government to extend the National Redress Scheme to abuse experienced on or after 1 July 2018 or by establishing a Tasmanian redress scheme with no specified closing date for applications.

The Tasmanian Government has made several amendments to legislation that regulates civil actions in response to recommendations of the National Royal Commission. These include removing the time limitation on commencing a civil action and providing that an institution can be held vicariously liable for an employee perpetrating child abuse, in some circumstances.[77] Recent guidelines for the Conduct of Civil Claims, drafted by the Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit in the Department of Justice, also provide that the Tasmanian Government and its agencies must act as model litigants in response to child sexual abuse civil claims, including avoiding unnecessarily adversarial conduct.[78] In March 2023, the Tasmanian Attorney-General, the Honourable Elise Archer MP, announced that she would 'establish a new separate State Litigation Office to take over the management of the Tasmanian Government's civil litigation'.[79] We welcome this reform and recommend that the new State Litigation Office trains staff in and ensures compliance with guidelines for managing settlement processes in child sexual abuse cases in trauma-informed ways.

Despite these improvements, there are still significant challenges for victim-survivors when bringing civil claims for child sexual abuse. One of these challenges is accessing information and records relevant to a claim. According to the Tasmanian Government, an Information and Records Management Standard introduced in 2020 aligns with the National Royal Commission's records and record keeping principles.[80] However, we heard evidence of child sexual abuse allegations, complaints and investigations not being recorded, and the loss of relevant records by government institutions and departments.

There was also evidence before us that a victim-survivor's right to access information has been undermined by inordinate delays in responding to requests for information and inadequate review processes when the release of information is refused. We recommend that the Tasmanian Government reviews legislation governing access to information to ensure victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts can access their records and consider reforms such as an explicit presumption in favour of disclosing information related to child sexual abuse. We further recommend that the Tasmanian Government considers centralising the management of access to information requests relevant to child sexual abuse within a specialist unit or department.

Applications for compensation by victim-survivors of child sexual abuse under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1976 should also be administered using trauma-informed principles. Victim-survivors should have a right of review before the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal for decisions about the amount of compensation payable or decisions to refuse compensation.

We note that the Tasmanian Parliament recently delivered an apology to all victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions.[81] Some victim-survivors who gave evidence to our Commission of Inquiry emphasised that a personal apology was also important to their healing. The Tasmanian Government should ensure individual victim-survivors of child sexual abuse who request an apology receive one. The apology should acknowledge what happened to the victim-survivors, answer any questions they might have about their time in the institution and the institution's response, and be prepared to answer questions about what steps have been taken to prevent child sexual abuse happening again.

7.7 Volume 8—Oversight, coordination and therapeutic support

In the final volume of our report, Volume 8, we consider how the Tasmanian Government can better coordinate and strengthen its approach to addressing child sexual abuse. The recommendations that we make in the chapters of this volume are relevant to all the institutions we consider in detail in other volumes of this report, as well as those that were outside our terms of reference.

In Chapter 18 Overseeing child safe organisations, we consider community-wide child sexual abuse prevention strategies recommended by the National Royal Commission and the Tasmanian Government's interest in ensuring staff and volunteers who work in child-facing organisations have a good baseline knowledge of child sexual abuse and how to respond to it.

Over the course of our Inquiry we heard evidence of, or otherwise observed, a limited understanding about child sexual abuse across the Tasmanian community and workforce. Considerable misconception about 'grooming' was apparent, as were simplistic understandings of 'consent', including a lack of appreciation of the many ways in which consent is usually irrelevant in the context of child sexual abuse.[82] We also heard that there is a limited understanding in organisations of the spectrum of conduct that constitutes harmful sexual behaviours and how to appropriately respond, and incorrect assumptions about who is likely (or unlikely) to perpetrate abuse.

We recommend a new Commission for Children and Young People. The new Commission should subsume the functions of the current Commissioner for Children and Young People, which include advocating for, and promoting the wellbeing of, all children in Tasmania. The new Commission should also be responsible for educating relevant organisations on the Child and Youth Safe Standards and overseeing and enforcing compliance with those standards, and administering, overseeing and monitoring the Reportable Conduct Scheme. The Commissioner for Children and Young People should assume the role of the Independent Regulator. We make a range of recommendations to support the independence of the Commissioner for Children and Young People.

We consider the Child and Youth Safe Standards and Reportable Conduct Scheme operating in tandem and overseen by a well-resourced and empowered Independent Regulator, will go a long way to reducing the need for recourse to other oversight bodies, such as the Integrity Commission and the Ombudsman. However, these bodies may still play a role, particularly in addressing specific complaints and targeting the broader systemic risk factors in organisations that can increase risks of child sexual abuse.

We recommend that the Ombudsman, the Integrity Commission, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the new Commission for Children and Young People clarify and formalise their respective functions and information-sharing arrangements and ensure these are clear to the community. We consider that the new Commission for Children and Young People will lead most oversight issues relating to child safety in institutions. However, we consider that the Ombudsman should manage formal individual complaints about the administrative actions of a public authority that do not constitute reportable conduct and that the Integrity Commission should lead the response to complaints about misconduct by public officers in agencies that are not legislatively required to comply with Child and Youth Safe Standards or the Reportable Conduct Scheme. We emphasise the importance of the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme in screening the suitability of individuals to engage with children and young people. We recommend legislative changes to ensure the Registrar considers potential risk to children and young people when undertaking an assessment of a person's suitability for holding registration.

In Chapter 19 A coordinated approach, we describe what is required to ensure there is a united approach to child safety issues across the Tasmanian Government. We recommend developing a child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan to bring together an extensive reform agenda, hold government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies to account for their responsibilities in implementing child sexual abuse reforms, and provide information to victim-survivors and their families, the community and government and non-government agencies about what is being done to address child sexual abuse in Tasmania.

The strategy and action plan should, among other things, describe the system for preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse that Tasmania is seeking to achieve and be informed by the voices of children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. It should identify agencies and role-holders involved in responses to child sexual abuse and describe their respective responsibilities in implementing reforms. People working in government and government funded agencies, statutory bodies and the broader Tasmanian community should be able to access the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan on a dedicated website.

It is our view that successfully implementing reforms also requires strong and sustainable leadership, accountability and governance mechanisms. We recommend that the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, as Chair of the Secretaries Board, is responsible for overseeing the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan. We also recommend that children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse form part of the Tasmanian Government's governance structure for the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan through the Premier's Youth Advisory Group and establishing an adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group.

To assist government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies to work effectively with one another and share information about child safety, the Tasmanian Government should review confidentiality and privacy provisions in legislation such as the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997, the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 and the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 to identify legislative barriers to sharing information across agencies for the purpose of protecting the safety and wellbeing of children and young people. Where barriers are identified, the Government should consider ways to remove them.

However, we consider the primary barrier to cross-government coordination and information sharing in the response to child sexual abuse is cultural—a deeply held view across many parts of the Government that prioritises privacy over child safety. We acknowledge that work is already underway across Tasmanian Government departments to better coordinate responses to child safety issues and information sharing. We consider that a key element missing from this work is publicly available guidance about the Government's framework for managing and exchanging information on child safety matters. To remedy this gap, we recommend that the Department of Premier and Cabinet leads development of child safety information-sharing, coordination and response guidelines to support government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies to respond to child safety issues, including institutional child sexual abuse. The Tasmanian Government should also invest in cultural change work to achieve good information-sharing practices and to foster a culture in which information sharing leads to action to protect children.

In Chapter 20 State Service disciplinary processes, we consider the disciplinary processes that apply when an employee of a government institution is the subject of an allegation of child sexual abuse or related conduct. The State Service Act 2000, the State Service Code of Conduct and Employment Directions form the central components of Tasmania's State Service disciplinary system.[83] This system has remained largely unchanged for more than 20 years.

An increasing number of employment suspensions in the State Service due to child sexual abuse contributed to establishing our Commission of Inquiry. Despite the recent increase in suspensions, a 2021 Independent Review of the Tasmanian State Service reported that terminations for Code of Conduct violations in the Tasmanian State Service were much lower than in the Australian Public Service.[84]

Over the course of our Inquiry, we heard from many sources that the disciplinary system is not fit for the purpose of keeping children and young people safe from abusers employed in government institutions. There is a delicate, difficult balance incumbent on the State between exercising a duty of care to ensure the safety of children and complying with obligations to an employee in matters of alleged child sexual abuse and related conduct. We consider that, in this balance, the duty of care to children has been compromised due to both barriers in the existing disciplinary framework and its practical application.

We heard of instances where there was a reluctance to initiate disciplinary processes against an employee despite multiple complaints of child sexual abuse or related conduct being made and employees only being suspended once a formal investigation had begun or the employee had been charged by police. We heard of lengthy periods to undertake preliminary assessments of an allegation, resulting in employees subject to allegations of child sexual abuse continuing to have contact with children and young people for an extended period before any action was taken.[85] We also heard that investigations of allegations of child sexual abuse were not triaged, leading to delays in investigating serious misconduct. Also, prior unsubstantiated complaints, potentially revealing patterns of concerns about behaviour, were not considered when assessing whether an employee had breached the Code of Conduct.

Affording procedural fairness to employees who are being investigated under State Service disciplinary processes is necessary. However, it should not act as a hindrance to pursuing investigations or considerations of child safety. Immediately removing an employee from the workplace when there has been an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse is critical. Suspension should not be contingent on the commencement of an investigation. Prior complaints, allegations and disciplinary action, even if they do not culminate in a sanction, should also be considered when making a determination about an employee's conduct when concerns about child sexual abuse and related conduct have been raised.

In Chapter 20, we recommend that child-facing departments develop professional conduct policies specific to child sexual abuse and related conduct. To ensure disciplinary action can be taken for misconduct of a sexual nature involving children, it is important to ensure a breach of a professional conduct policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct.

Heads of Agencies should ensure obligations under the State Service Code of Conduct and professional conduct policies apply to volunteers, contractors, sub-contractors, temporary staff and other relevant adults, including carers.

In conjunction with proposed legislative and policy reforms, we recommend funding initiatives aimed at education and cultural change in interpreting and applying disciplinary processes across the State Service to ensure the protection of children is truly embedded within the norms and practices of the State Service.

We note in Chapter 19 that unions have an important and influential role to play in effecting child safety in government workplaces, through advocacy on behalf of members who are subject to State Service disciplinary processes and by fostering a child safe culture in their union. We invite unions to support the significant reforms to the State Service disciplinary processes that we are recommending by issuing a statement of support.

In Chapter 21 Therapeutic services, we review the support services available to children, young people and adults who have experienced child sexual abuse in an institutional setting. We also consider the support needs of children and young people who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours and need an extra level of specialised intervention to address those behaviours.

Without appropriate support and intervention, victim-survivors can be left to cope with their trauma in ways that are harmful to themselves and others, such as self-harming, using drugs and alcohol, or engaging in violent or criminal behaviour. It can affect their life opportunities, including their ability to engage in education and employment. They can also become vulnerable to further victimisation. There are not enough therapeutic services available to ensure victim-survivors of child sexual abuse have timely access to the supports they need. There is an urgent need for more culturally appropriate Aboriginal healing services, as well as support services that accommodate diversity and disability. The long waiting lists to access therapeutic services for children and young people who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours is of particular concern.

We make several recommendations aimed at ensuring both victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children and young people engaging in harmful sexual behaviours can access timely and appropriate supports. These recommendations include that the Tasmanian Government provides leadership and funds development of a therapeutic service system with set maximum waiting periods. The Government should ensure funding agreements with non-government specialist services have appropriate governance requirements, sexual abuse service standards, service evaluation and child safe accreditation built into them. They should require that services meet the needs of children who are victim-survivors or who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours, victim-survivors with disability or mental illness, victim-survivors who identify with the LGBTQIA+ community, male victim-survivors, and victim-survivors who are from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.

We also make recommendations in Chapter 21 that the Tasmanian Government establishes and funds a peak body for the sexual assault service support system, distinct from and working collaboratively with the family violence peak body, and that the Government develops a statewide framework and plan for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. Among other things, this framework should ensure the Government provides ongoing and increased funding to specialist therapeutic interventions for abusive and violent harmful sexual behaviours.

In Chapter 22 Monitoring reforms, we note that the Tasmanian Government has committed to implementing our recommendations. We propose that the Government establishes an independent Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor to ensure the recommendations of our Commission of Inquiry result in sustained systemic improvements towards preventing child sexual abuse in institutions, improving institutional responses to such abuse and providing the necessary supports for those who have been abused. Ongoing monitoring is essential to maintaining momentum for reform, adapting reform efforts to changing circumstances as required and ensuring progress is transparent.

In that chapter, we also lay out a six-year reform agenda to guide implementation of our recommendations, noting that the Government may need to negotiate some timeframes with the implementation monitor. We consider that many of our recommendations can be implemented by mid-2024, while others should be implemented by mid-2026. Implementing some of our recommendations will take careful planning and require long-term investment. We propose that these recommendations are implemented by mid-2029.

In the final chapter of Volume 8 and of our report, Chapter 23 Afterword, we outline barriers we have faced due to legislative provisions that affect the way in which a commission of inquiry can be conducted. We suggest legislative reform to address these barriers for the benefit of future commissions of inquiry.

We understand that the reforms we propose across our report will require significant effort and investment. However, these changes are necessary and will ultimately make Tasmanian institutional settings safer for all children and young people. We share the hopes of the victim-survivors, their families, carers and supporters who shared their stories with us that this report will result in meaningful change.

Recommendations

Chapter 6 – The way forward: Children in the education system

Child sexual abuse prevention education in schools

Recommendation 6.1

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should introduce and fund a mandatory child sexual abuse prevention curriculum as part of the mandatory respectful behaviours curriculum from early learning programs to Year 12, across all types of government schools (including specialist schools).
2. This mandatory prevention curriculum should draw on expert evidence of best practice and successful approaches adopted in other states and territories, including South Australia's mandatory curriculum.
3. The Department should develop a plan for sustained implementation of the mandatory prevention curriculum. The plan should:
    a. set out the goals and objectives of implementing the mandatory prevention curriculum

b. define the roles and responsibilities of key participants

c. include criteria for evaluating the curriculum.

4. The Department should evaluate the effectiveness of the mandatory prevention curriculum five years after its implementation.

Office of Safeguarding

Recommendation 6.2

1. The Office of Safeguarding within the Department for Education, Children and Young People should focus primarily on safeguarding children in the education context, with a particular focus on prevention, risk identification, policy development and related workforce development.
2. The Office of Safeguarding should not be involved in critical incident management beyond learning from systemic reviews and trend data.

Policies, procedures and guidance in education

Recommendation 6.3

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should make its child safeguarding policies publicly available, including policies on mandatory reporting, professional conduct, and responses to allegations and concerns about child sexual abuse.
2. The Department should establish a regular review process for its child safeguarding policies.

Recommendation 6.4

The Department for Education, Children and Young People, in developing a professional conduct policy (Recommendation 20.2), should ensure:

a. there is a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in schools

b. the professional conduct policy for schools, in addition to the matters set out in Recommendation 20.2, specifies expectations outlined in other relevant school policies and procedures, including those covering online technology and a duty of care owed by staff members

c. the professional conduct policy for schools spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, relief teachers, contractors and sub-contractors

d. the Department uses appropriate mechanisms to ensure compliance by volunteers, relief teachers, contractors and sub-contractors with the professional conduct policy for schools.

Professional development

Recommendation 6.5

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should adopt and implement a training certification program that is mandatory for all education staff and volunteers. This training should be structured to provide basic and advanced levels of training for different role holders and targeted most directly at staff and volunteers operating in higher-risk settings.
2. Training should cover:
    a. key safeguarding policies of the Department, including appropriate standards of behaviour between adults and students and what to do if child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours are witnessed or disclosed
    b. relevant legal obligations, including requirements for reporting to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, and the Teachers Registration Board.
3. Training should be refreshed periodically and delivered at a time and in a format that will maximise engagement. It should be centrally recorded to monitor participation.
4. The Department should work with the Teachers Registration Board to establish the minimum training requirements for teachers (Recommendation 6.15).

Responding to and investigating complaints and concerns

Recommendation 6.6

1. The Tasmanian Government should establish a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate to respond to:
    a. allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct by staff, breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct and professional conduct policies, and reportable conduct (as defined by the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023) in schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth justice
    b. other forms of staff-perpetrated abuse in schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth justice, including other serious care concerns and allegations of excessive use of force, inappropriate isolation or inappropriate searches of children and young people in detention.
2. The directorate should comprise three units tasked as follows:
    a. Incident Report Management Unit. This unit should be responsible for case management—that is, assisting child-facing services within the Department for Education, Children and Young People with the management of incidents or allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct, including being the point of contact for these services.
    b. Investigations Unit. This unit should undertake preliminary assessments and investigations. It should comprise appropriately trained and skilled investigators or use external investigators with the requisite qualifications and training.
    c. Adjudication Unit. This unit should examine the investigation reports prepared by investigators and make recommendations to the Head of Agency about what disciplinary decisions are available and the appropriate response. The unit should be staffed by personnel with relevant experience, including a background in law.
3. The directorate should appoint staff with knowledge of schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care, and youth justice.
4. Within 12 months of appointment, all staff in the Investigations Unit should:
    a. undertake specialist training in interviewing vulnerable witnesses

b. undertake training in child development, child sexual abuse and trauma-related behaviours.

5. The directorate should maintain a case management platform and oversee a 'single file' for all child sexual abuse allegations and concerns about staff, including recording matters that do not result in disciplinary action.
6. The Tasmanian Government should decide where in the State Service this directorate should be established. Wherever it is established, it should be separated from traditional human resources functions.

Recommendation 6.7

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop guidelines that outline the ongoing supports that should be provided for victim-survivors, families, staff and the school community when there are allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse by staff or harmful sexual behaviours.
2. The guidelines should include policies, procedures, and templates for:
    a. Counselling and support—a counselling and support plan should be developed for victim-survivors and their parents and carers, other children or young people at the school, staff at the school, and the alleged perpetrator and their family.
    b. Risk assessment—a risk assessment should be conducted to determine whether there is any concern for the ongoing safety of other children and whether there may be other victim-survivors.
    c. Informing responsibly—the Department should develop specific policies that outline what communications should be made by the Department, and to whom they should be made, at particular stages of a child sexual abuse matter. These policies should take account of all legal obligations and the importance of informing victim-survivors, parents and the community. Communication may be needed with children and young people, staff, School Association Committees, parents, previous students and other schools.
3. Any policy outlining the communications that should be made by the Department should extend to matters where conduct does not amount to a criminal offence or where police do not proceed with charges but the matter is investigated as a possible breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, a professional conduct policy or reportable conduct under the Reportable Conduct Scheme.
4. Guidelines should also be developed for Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth justice contexts.

Recommendation 6.8

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should work with the Catholic and independent school sectors to adopt a statewide approach to responding to child sexual abuse in schools.

Harmful sexual behaviours

Recommendation 6.9

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop detailed education-specific policies, protocols and guidelines for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours in schools. The development of these policies, protocols and guidelines should be:

a. led and informed by the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28)

b. informed by the Tasmanian Government's statewide framework and plan to address harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 21.8).

Teacher registration

Recommendation 6.10

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to:

a. allow the Teachers Registration Board to compel relevant entities—including the Department for Education, Children and Young People, other employers of teachers, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, police, and Child Safety Services—to give the Board information or documentation that is relevant to child sexual abuse matters involving a registered teacher or a holder of a Limited Authority to Teach

b. compel these relevant entities to notify the Teachers Registration Board when they become aware of allegations or suspicions of child sexual abuse by a teacher. Such entities should also be required to notify the Board if they begin any formal investigation that involves allegations or suspicions of child sexual abuse by a teacher or a holder of a Limited Authority to Teach, and the outcome of any investigation

c. allow entities, when investigating matters involving child sexual abuse by a registered teacher or holder of a Limited Authority to Teach, to jointly appoint investigators to investigate the matter, taking into account the different criteria required for investigations by the Department and the Board.

Recommendation 6.11

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. introduce legislation to amend the Teachers Registration Act 2000 (or regulations) to require details of the prospective or current place of employment of a teacher (or a holder of Limited Authority to Teach) to be included on the Register of Teachers

b. develop an electronic means of updating the Register of Teachers with details of the place of employment of a teacher (or a holder of Limited Authority to Teach)

c. require employers to make updates to a teacher's place of employment—including when a teacher (or a holder of Limited Authority to Teach) begins working at the school or is no longer working at the school

d. fund the Teachers Registration Board to develop an upgraded, fit-for-purpose Customer Records Management System to enable the Board to maintain a Register of Teachers which can support information exchange in real time with other bodies working with children, and other jurisdictions.

Recommendation 6.12

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Teachers Registration Act 2000 to allow administrative infringement notices to be issued for noncompliance with the provisions of the Act that currently carry penalties in the form of fines.

Recommendation 6.13

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend section 24B of the Teachers Registration Act 2000 to:

a. allow for the immediate rather than emergency suspension of registration or a Limited Authority to Teach when the Teachers Registration Board considers there is an unacceptable risk of harm to children

b. allow the Board to suspend a person's registration or a Limited Authority to Teach where that person has been charged with a serious offence.

Recommendation 6.14

The Tasmanian Government, Department for Education, Children and Young People and the Teachers Registration Board should continue to advocate at the national level for an automatic mutual recognition scheme that takes into account risks to child safety and imposes measures to address these risks.

Recommendation 6.15

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Teachers Registration Act 2000 to allow the Teachers Registration Board to set requirements for minimum training and ongoing professional development.
2. The Teachers Registration Board should make child safeguarding training (Recommendation 6.5) a mandatory requirement for the granting of teacher registration and as part of ongoing registration requirements.

Recommendation 6.16

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Teachers Registration Board is funded to perform its core function of regulating the professional conduct of teachers.

Chapter 9 – The way forward: Children in out of home care

Funding

Recommendation 9.1

The Tasmanian Government should provide one-off funding to help implement the Commission of Inquiry's recommended out of home care reforms and significantly increase ongoing funding of out of home care, including out of home care services provided by Child Safety Services (such as out of home care governance and case management).

The role of the Department

Recommendation 9.2

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should outsource the provision of all forms of out of home care to the non-government sector.
2. The Department should maintain and improve its role in:
    a. the budgeting and purchasing of out of home care services from the non-government sector
    b. establishing and leading the strategic plan and policy framework for out of home care
    c. monitoring the quality of out of home care
    d. providing case management and leadership in out of home care
    e. ensuring carers and staff receive adequate education and skill development
    f. responding to complaints and safety and wellbeing concerns about children in out of home care
    g. cross-sector (government and non-government) data collection, ICT infrastructure and public reporting
    h. carer registration and monitoring.
3. The outsourcing of the provision of out of home care should be achieved through an orderly, staged and trauma-informed transition process and commissioning strategy.

4. The Department should establish a minimum out of home care dataset and a plan for two-way data sharing between the Department and non-government out of home care providers.

Contract management and auditing

Recommendation 9.3

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop new funding agreements with non-government out of home care providers that set quality and accountability requirements, including:
    a. compliance with the National Standards for Out-of-Home Care
    b. compliance with the Child and Youth Safe Standards
    c. provision of trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care (Recommendation 9.18)
    d. adoption of preventive measures for harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
    e. only using carers who are registered on the Carer Register (Recommendation 9.20)
    f. governance and organisational structures to support monitoring and responding to child sexual abuse including grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
    g. sharing relevant information about carers and children in their care
    h. quarterly reporting to the Department on these requirements
    i. periodic reporting of data against the outcomes framework (Recommendation 9.9).
2. All funding agreements between the Department and non-government out of home care providers should require the Department to give providers:
    a. relevant information about carers and children in their care
    b. information about the provider's performance against the data outcomes framework and compliance with standards.
3. The Department should monitor and audit non-government out of home care providers' compliance with contracts.
4. The Tasmanian Government should resource non-government out of home care providers appropriately.

Expert and active leadership

Recommendation 9.4

1. The Tasmanian Government should fund and restructure the Department for Education, Children and Young People to ensure (in addition to the current roles of Deputy Secretary for Keeping Children Safe, and the Executive Director for Youth Justice):

    a. there is separate executive-level responsibility for out of home care services

    b. there is separate executive-level responsibility for the combined areas of Child Safety Services, the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line and family support services

    c. the classification level of these executive roles reflects the level of risk and responsibility carried by the positions

    d. the holders of these executive roles have knowledge and understanding in the area of child protection or out of home care and experience in providing strategic direction and leadership

    e. executive responsibility for child safeguarding in the education context is not combined with responsibility for child safeguarding in the children and family services context

    f. the role of Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People is established and supported by an Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice (Recommendation 9.7)

    g. the role of the Chief Practitioner is established and supported by an Office of the Chief Practitioner (Recommendation 9.17)

    h. expertise among members of the Department's executive is evenly balanced across the areas of education, Child Safety Services, out of home care, and youth justice

    i. the relevant specialist for out of home care and youth justice in the executive leads policy and practice development for those areas

    j. relevant centralised functions within the Department, such as human resources, procurement, and staff learning and development, address the distinct needs of schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth detention.

2. The Tasmanian Government should ensure that:
    a. the Secretary of the Department demonstrates active efforts to inform themselves about child protection and out of home care through individual professional development
    b. the Deputy Secretary for Keeping Children Safe has knowledge and understanding of the area of child protection or out of home care and experience in providing strategic direction and leadership
    c. the Secretary and Deputy Secretary, and the holders of the new executive roles, have key performance measures that include culture change in Child Safety Services and out of home care
    d. the Secretary and Deputy Secretary, and the holder of the new executive role responsible for out of home care, have key performance measures that include preventing sexual abuse in out of home care
    e. the Department has appropriate processes in place to ensure leaders have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability requirements to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation.

Governance

Recommendation 9.5

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish a Quality and Risk Committee for Child Safety Services, out of home care, and youth justice.
2. The Secretary of the Department should chair the committee.
3. The functions of the committee should include monitoring:
    a. the system performance of the out of home care sector
    b. the performance against the outcomes and reporting framework (Recommendation 9.9)
    c. children's safety and wellbeing in out of home care, including from child sexual abuse
    d. progress on implementing the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the National Standards for Out-of-Home care

e. practices in youth detention, including in relation to searches, isolation and the use of force (Recommendations 12.31, 12.32 and 12.33).

4. The committee should report routinely to the Commission for Children and Young People.

Recommendation 9.6

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should, in consultation with the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6), develop an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care. This strategy should have regard to best practice principles for children's participation in organisations at the individual and systemic levels.
2. The empowerment and participation strategy should include:
    a. establishing a permanent out of home care advisory group to be involved in developing the out of home care strategic plan (Recommendation 9.8) and have ongoing input into the out of home care system
    b. building engagement with children into the Department's quality assurance and continuous improvement activities under the strategic plan (Recommendation 9.8)
    c. implementing the Viewpoint online questionnaire without delay
    d. regular monitoring and evaluation of the effectiveness of the empowerment and participation strategy.
3. The out of home care permanent advisory group should:
    a. include children, young people and young adults up to the age of 25 years with current or previous experience of out of home care in Tasmania, including Aboriginal people and people with disability
    b. have clear terms of reference developed in consultation with children, young people and young adults with experience of out of home care
    c. enable its members to participate in a safe and meaningful way and express their views on measures to empower children and young people in out of home care
    d. meet regularly, be chaired by a person independent of the Department and be attended by a senior departmental leader
    e. be adequately funded and resourced.

Recommendation 9.7

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should appoint an Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People for the whole of the Department. The office holder should:

a. report directly to the Secretary

b. be supported by a sufficiently resourced Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice

c. oversee and report on the implementation of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle (Recommendation 9.15)

d. facilitate departmental engagement and build partnerships with Aboriginal communities

e. promote and help establish recognised Aboriginal organisations (Recommendation 9.15)

f. ensure Aboriginal culture, views and interests are represented in all departmental activities

g. promote cultural safety for Aboriginal staff and Aboriginal children and families who come into contact with the Department

h. increase recruitment of Aboriginal staff in the Department

i. participate in the Quality and Risk Committee at least every six months in discussions about the number of Aboriginal children in out of home care, the proportion of Aboriginal children placed with Aboriginal carers, the proportion of Aboriginal children in out of home care with a cultural support plan, reunification rates for Aboriginal children and other key performance indicators to be agreed with the Quality and Risk Committee.

Strategic planning for out of home care

Recommendation 9.8

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop a strategic plan for the out of home care system. The plan should include:
    a. a vision for future models of out of home care in Tasmania
    b. the transition plan and commissioning strategy for outsourcing the provision of out of home care to the non-government sector (Recommendation 9.2)
    c. the empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care (Recommendation 9.6)
    d. implementation of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle (Recommendation 9.15)
    e. a commitment to trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care (Recommendation 9.18)
    f. a commitment to the National Standards for Out-of-Home Care and the Child and Youth Safe Standards
    g. a workforce capacity building strategy (Recommendation 9.10)
    h. developing a carer recruitment, support and retention strategy, in consultation with the non-government sector
    i. a process for ongoing carer accreditation, registration and monitoring (Recommendation 9.20)
    j. establishing the outcomes and performance reporting framework (Recommendation 9.9)
    k. building quality assurance and improvement into all activities
    l. an updated framework of policies for the safety and wellbeing of children in care, including updating key policies relating to
        i. complaints handling
        ii. harmful sexual behaviours
        iii. mandatory education for staff in child sexual abuse
        iv. care concern and critical incident reporting and management
        v. child sexual exploitation

vi. how decisions can be appealed and reviewed

vii. professional conduct

viii. implementing the Child and Youth Safe Standards.

2. All policy documents should be published on the Department's website.
3. Each element of the strategic plan for the out of home care system should have a timeframe attached, with staggered implementation, and the plan should be fully implemented within five years.
4. The Secretary's key performance indicators should require the implementation of the strategic plan for the out of home care system within allocated timeframes.

Outcomes and performance reporting

Recommendation 9.9

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. establish an outcomes and performance reporting framework against which it can measure the performance of the out of home care sector, including in relation to child safety

b. develop the data capability to enable reporting against the framework

c. routinely report against the framework.

Workforce strategy

Recommendation 9.10

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop a workforce strategy for the child and family welfare sector to pursue the following objectives:

a. an increase in staff numbers and retention

b. workplace conditions that make the sector a more attractive employer, particularly in the Department

c. a reduction in unplanned staff vacancies, particularly in the Department

d. promoting staff wellbeing, at the individual and system levels, including by addressing the causes and effects of trauma and vicarious trauma

e. a workforce equipped with the knowledge and skills to respond effectively to the needs of children and families.

Recommendation 9.11

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish mandatory core knowledge requirements for Child Safety Officers, which include an understanding of:
    a. child sexual abuse, including grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
    b. the effects of trauma, trauma-informed care and therapeutic responses to trauma
    c. ethical and professional conduct.
2. The Department should ensure Child Safety Officers attain this knowledge during their induction period.
3. The Department should provide regular refresher training and continuous professional development opportunities to enable Child Safety Officers to continue to advance their knowledge and skills (advanced professional development).
4. In its role of overseeing the out of home care system, the Department should:
    a. determine the core knowledge and skills required for staff in non-government organisations providing carer assessment and support, and for residential, foster and kinship carers
    b. ensure non-government out of home care staff and carers have access to professional development in core knowledge and skills, recognising existing high-quality training available in Tasmania and developing or funding new training where required.

Recommendation 9.12

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should ensure the Foster and Kinship Carers Handbook is updated to include:
    a. information applicable to all carer types
    b. more information on child sexual abuse, including harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
    c. mandatory reporting requirements for carers
    d. the professional conduct policy for foster and kinship carers.
2. The Department should:
    a. make the Handbook available publicly on its website
    b. ensure the Handbook is regularly updated in line with any relevant changes to policy.

Recommendation 9.13

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should ensure staff have access to the latest out of home care practice knowledge by becoming a learning organisation, including by:

a. implementing purposeful means for critical reflection and internal review
b. establishing strategic partnerships with specialist out of home care, child maltreatment and child protection researchers
c. engaging in cross-jurisdictional partnerships where there are opportunities for shared learning
d. developing opportunities for formal recognition of ongoing learning for staff through these partnerships, such as via micro-credentialling pathways.

Keeping Aboriginal children safe

Recommendation 9.14

The Tasmanian Government should appoint a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People with statutory powers and functions to monitor the experiences of Aboriginal children in out of home care and youth detention.

Recommendation 9.15

The Tasmanian Government should fully implement all elements of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle by:

a. increasing investment in Aboriginal-led targeted early intervention and prevention services for Aboriginal families, including family support and reunification services, to a rate equivalent to the representation of Aboriginal children in the Tasmanian child safety system

b. adopting and reporting on measures to reduce institutional racism and supporting decolonising practices in the Department for Education, Children and Young People to reduce the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care

c. ensuring that the Aboriginal status of all Aboriginal children in contact with Child Safety Services is accurately identified and recorded at the earliest opportunity, and appropriately shared with non-government out of home care providers and carers

d. introducing legislation to amend the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 to

    i. require decision makers to consult with a relevant recognised Aboriginal organisation in relation to any decision likely to have a significant impact on an Aboriginal child—in particular, decisions about whether to remove a child from their family and where a child should live

    ii. require the involvement of a relevant recognised Aboriginal organisation nominated by an Aboriginal child, or their advocate, in family group conferences, case planning and cultural support planning in respect of the child

    iii. create a statutory framework and plan co-designed with Aboriginal communities for transferring child safety decision-making authority for Aboriginal children to recognised Aboriginal organisations

e. partnering with Aboriginal communities to

    i. promote and support establishing recognised Aboriginal organisations with local knowledge of Aboriginal children, families and communities, to facilitate the participation of Aboriginal children and families in child safety and out of home care decision-making processes

    ii. develop a model or models for the transfer of child safety decision-making authority to recognised Aboriginal organisations

iii. invest in recognised Aboriginal organisations' capacity to ensure they are fully resourced, and their workforces fully equipped and supported, to participate in child safety and out of home care decision-making processes for Aboriginal children, including involvement in cultural support planning, and to manage any transfer of decision-making authority for Aboriginal children

f. designing and establishing, in partnership with Aboriginal communities, fully resourced, Aboriginal-led, therapeutic residential programs for Aboriginal children who have been removed from their families and for whom an appropriate placement with an Aboriginal carer cannot be found

g. implementing systems to ensure every Aboriginal child in out of home care has a meaningful cultural support plan prepared by or with the involvement of a recognised Aboriginal organisation or an Aboriginal person with relevant cultural knowledge, and regularly reviewing cultural support plans to ensure cultural connections for Aboriginal children are being maintained

h. ensuring non-government out of home care providers comply with the 'placement' and 'connection' elements of the Placement Principle

i. ensuring the Aboriginal status of carers is identified and accurately recorded

j. providing mandatory professional development to Child Safety Services staff to ensure all interactions with and responses to Aboriginal children, families and organisations are culturally safe.

Supporting quality care

Recommendation 9.16

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:
   a. ensure all children in care, including those on guardianship orders until age 18, have a case manager
   b. set a maximum case load for Child Safety Officers.
2. The Department should report quarterly to the Quality and Risk Committee on the:
   a. number of children without an individual case manager
   b. average case load for Child Safety Officers

c. average frequency of case manager visits children received, and the longest and shortest time periods between visits

d. the number of children with a care team and Aboriginal representatives on the care team (where appropriate)

e. average frequency of care team meetings

f. percentage of children with a current care plan.

3. The Department should ensure these figures are published quarterly on its website.

Recommendation 9.17

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should appoint a Chief Practitioner to lead clinical practice and quality assurance across Child Safety Services, the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, and out of home care.
2. The Chief Practitioner should lead an Office of the Chief Practitioner, manage a team of clinical practice experts across Child Safety Services and report to the Secretary.
3. The Chief Practitioner should be responsible for:

    a. developing the clinical capacity of practitioners through professional development and supervision

    b. informing clinical policies, procedures and practice directions to ensure they reflect best practice in child protection and trauma-informed care

    c. receiving, triaging, recording, monitoring and coordinating responses to complaints about Child Safety Services and out of home care (Recommendation 9.31) and concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care (Recommendation 9.32)

    d. supporting best practice responses to children in out of home care experiencing or at risk of child sexual exploitation

    e. conducting file reviews and audits to inform an understanding of current clinical practice and identify areas for reform.

4. The Chief Practitioner should:
    a. work closely with the Quality and Risk Committee to monitor data to identify systemic strengths and weaknesses within practice across Child Safety Services and out of home care
    b. have a close working relationship with the Department's Learning and Development team, ensuring that workforce development of Child Safety Services and out of home care is designed and delivered to support best practice service provision
    c. support the Department's strategic partnerships and collaboration where appropriate, including with research and teaching institutions and non-government service delivery partners to enhance knowledge and practice across the sector (Recommendation 9.13).
5. The Department should ensure clinical practice experts are located in all regional offices of Child Safety Services across the state.
6. The Chief Practitioner should lead the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28).

Recommendation 9.18

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should require out of home care to be trauma-informed and therapeutic and identify the key components of trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care.
2. The Department should require non-government out of home care providers to deliver services that align with these key components of trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care, noting some providers have already adopted such models of care.
3. The Department should ensure children are assessed for trauma symptoms when entering care through the holistic assessment (Recommendation 9.23) and, where needed, receive appropriate therapy and intervention for their trauma.

Recommendation 9.19

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People, in developing a professional conduct policy (Recommendation 20.2), should ensure:
    a. there is a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in Child Safety Services and out of home care
    b. the professional conduct policy for Child Safety Services and out of home care, in addition to the matters set out in Recommendation 20.2, specifies expectations outlined in other relevant policies and procedures, including the policy on concerns about child safety and wellbeing and the duty of care owed by staff members
    c. the professional conduct policy for Child Safety Services and out of home care articulates expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors, and carers
    d. the Department uses appropriate mechanisms to ensure compliance by volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors, and carers with the professional conduct policy for Child Safety Services and out of home care.
2. The Department should develop guidance material and information sessions for children in care about the expected behaviour of carers, staff, volunteers and adults in their lives.

Ensuring quality carers

Recommendation 9.20

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish and maintain a Carer Register of all types of carers in the out of home care setting to ensure all third-party guardians, and foster, respite, kinship, and salaried residential carers can provide quality care to children and act protectively.
2. The Department should:
    a. set minimum requirements for registration as a carer
    b. record allegations of concern about a carer or members of their household
    c. set out a process for de-registering carers
    d. enable easy information sharing between the Carer Register, the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

3. The minimum requirements for carer registration should include:
    a. current Registration to Work with Vulnerable People and satisfactory National Police Checks
    b. best practice and tailored approaches to foster, kinship and residential carer screening and assessment
    c. mandatory knowledge and skill requirements for carers, including
        i. understanding child sexual abuse, including grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
        ii. understanding the effects of trauma, trauma-informed care and therapeutic responses to trauma
        iii. understanding the professional conduct policy and ethical behaviour
    d. requiring other relevant adults who routinely spend time in the carer household to hold Registration to Work with Vulnerable People and to have been subject to carer assessment
    e. satisfactory annual carer reviews conducted by non-government providers and reported to the Carer Register.
4. The Department should provide for kinship carers to be provisionally registered for 12 months after assuming care of a child. During this time kinship carers should be required to complete their mandatory training requirements or apply for an exemption in exceptional circumstances.
5. Non-government out of home care providers should support kinship carers to access and complete the mandatory training required for full registration as a carer. The mandatory training should contain measures to overcome literacy difficulties, cultural difference or geographical remoteness.
6. The Department should only place children with a carer who is registered or provisionally registered on the Carer Register.
7. The Department should establish a mechanism for reviewing decisions about the registration or deregistration of carers.
8. The Tasmanian Government should adequately resource the Department to establish and maintain the Carer Register.

Recommendation 9.21

To improve placement stability and the oversight of the care of children by third-party guardians, the Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. make publicly available the criteria and process for a carer to become a third-party guardian

b. sufficiently resource the team responsible for third-party guardianship applications to ensure appropriate assessments and timely processing

c. require third-party guardians to be registered on the Carer Register to maintain their guardianship

d. ensure third-party guardians receive the same level of support in their caring role as received by foster or kinship carers

e. ensure children in third-party guardianship arrangements continue to have their safety and wellbeing supported and monitored (for example, through independent community visitors (Recommendation 9.34)).

Meeting children's needs

Recommendation 9.22

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People's out of home care processes, including assessments, placements and care planning, should be tailored to address the specific needs of individual children.
2. These processes should address the specific needs of all children, including Aboriginal children, children from other culturally diverse backgrounds, children with disability, children with mental illness and children who identify as LGBTQIA+.
3. The Department's empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care (Recommendation 9.6) should include processes that enable children's views to inform all elements of their individual care, including their assessments, placements and care planning.

Recommendation 9.23

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure all children in care have access to:
    a. a timely holistic assessment when entering care across all domains of physical health, trauma and mental health, disability and educational need
    b. health and wellbeing assessments conducted annually, or more often where there is an identified need.
2. Multidisciplinary health teams should provide expert consultation to the care team around a child about the child's needs, and input into the child's care plan.
3. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should create a specialised role to support children in out of home care to access the National Disability Insurance Scheme.

Recommendation 9.24

1. The Tasmanian Government should increase funding for specialist trauma therapy services for children in care to ensure their needs are met.
2. The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service's new specialist mental health service for children in out of home care is resourced to meet demand.

Recommendation 9.25

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should improve placement stability and reduce the risk of sexual abuse of children in care by:

a. considering the views of the child or children about their out of home care placement
b. using placement matching guidelines to aid placement decisions and support planning
c. placing siblings together or maintaining sibling connection where safe to do so
d. ensuring carers are aware of any history of abuse in relation to the child and the child's specific needs relevant to this
e. introducing an intensive salaried or professional foster care model to allow children with challenging behaviours to remain in family-based care

f. funding all placements (including kinship, foster, respite and residential care) to fully meet all the child's assessed needs to the extent these are not covered by other schemes (such as the National Disability Insurance Scheme and public health or education services).

Recommendation 9.26

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should ensure:

a. each child is involved in developing their care plan

b. each child's care plan is informed by the holistic assessment (Recommendation 9.23) and the interests and aspirations of the child

c. care plans include strategies to address identified risks of child sexual abuse, including the risk of harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation

d. the care team reviews any risk assessments and management plans for child sexual abuse at least every six months, or more frequently if incidents occur or circumstances change such as when a new child joins the household.

Children on out of home care orders involved in youth justice

Recommendation 9.27

In its role as statutory guardian of a child in care, the Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. ensure a representative of the Department with knowledge of the child appears for a child in out of home care in the Magistrates Court (Youth Justice Division) and in the new specialist children's division of the Magistrates Court (Recommendation 12.15), in order to

   i. support the child in court

   ii. inform the court of all relevant considerations to the court, including the child's child protection history

   iii. make submissions to the court on behalf of the child with arrangements in place for this to occur in out-of-hours bail hearings as well as those that occur during normal business hours

b. take actions that may address any causes contributing to child offending, including changes to care plans

c. ensure, when a child in care is admitted to youth detention or another residential youth justice facility, that the child's Child Safety Officer

   i. arranges an immediate review of the child's care plan with their care team, which includes developing a transition plan for when the child leaves detention

   ii. visits the child as soon as practicable and regularly thereafter, with a minimum of one visit during their admission in line with the child's revised care plan

   iii. notifies the Commission for Children and Young People of the child's admission to youth detention

d. report to the Quality and Risk Committee on the number of children in care in detention and on the activities listed above.

Harmful sexual behaviour

Recommendation 9.28

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to support best practice responses to harmful sexual behaviours across the Department, including in schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth detention. The unit should:

   a. provide advice, guidance, and support across the Department

   b. develop context-specific policies for all settings informed by the Tasmanian Government's statewide framework and plan to address harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 21.8)

   c. work closely with the Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to ensure systemic risks, practice issues and opportunities for improvement are identified.

2. The Tasmanian Government should allocate additional funding to support responses to harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care and youth justice.

3. The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit should develop detailed out of home care-specific policies, protocols and practice guidance to support best practice responses to harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care.

4. The Department should ensure the advanced professional development for departmental staff in understanding and responding to harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 9.11) includes tailored professional development for both Child Safety Officers and carers, and is available to staff in relevant roles in schools and youth justice.
5. The Department should ensure staff working in the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit are suitably experienced or undertake additional professional development to advance their knowledge in responding to harmful sexual behaviours.
6. The Department should ensure Power to Kids or another program or approach with comparable components is implemented in government funded residential care homes as a supplementary strategy to address the heightened risk of harmful sexual behaviours (including child sexual exploitation and dating violence) in out of home care.

Child sexual exploitation

Recommendation 9.29

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People and Tasmania Police should work with non-government providers and other relevant stakeholders to develop a framework for preventing and responding to sexual exploitation of children in care that is informed by best practice and evidence from other jurisdictions. The framework should:
    a. acknowledge the responsibility of the Department to lead the protection of children in care from child sexual exploitation
    b. outline the prevention strategies to be used and each agency's role in delivering those strategies
    c. outline the detection, disruption and intervention strategies to be used and each agency's role in delivering those strategies
    d. outline how children in care who have been exploited will be supported to heal and recover
    e. describe how agencies will work together
    f. implement a reporting framework about the incidence of sexual exploitation of children in care, which is reported to the Quality and Risk Committee.

2. The Chief Practitioner should lead the development of the framework.
3. The Keeping Children Safe Handbook and Tasmania Police operating guidelines should be updated to reflect the role of police in responding to child sexual exploitation in the new framework.

Recommendation 9.30

Tasmania Police should more fully utilise the offences in sections 95 and 96 of the Children, Young People and Their Families Act 1997 (the offences of harbouring or concealing a child and of inducing a child to be absent without lawful authority) to deter behaviour by adults that puts children in out of home care at risk of sexual abuse.

Responding to complaints and concerns about child sexual abuse

Recommendation 9.31

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop and maintain a complaints policy and procedures for Child Safety Services and out of home care. The policy and procedures should:
    a. explain how to make a complaint and who to complain to using a 'no wrong door' approach
    b. direct who should be informed when a person receives a complaint
    c. direct who is responsible for responding and within what timeframes
    d. ensure a child-friendly complaints procedure is made available to all children in care
    e. apply to all types of complaints or incidents
    f. cross-refer to the new concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care policy (Recommendation 9.32)
    g. explain how to seek an internal review of a decision made by the Department
    h. outline how to provide feedback and support for a complainant.

2. The Department should implement a centralised complaints and incident recording system.
3. The Chief Practitioner should receive all complaints about Child Safety Services and out of home care and be adequately resourced to receive, triage, record, monitor and coordinate responses.
4. The Chief Practitioner should report regularly on complaints handling to the Quality and Risk Committee and the Commission for Children and Young People.
5. The complaints policy and procedure should be published on the Department's website.

Recommendation 9.32

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop a new policy to guide responses to concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care. The policy should:
    a. identify all forms of sexual abuse—including grooming, child sexual exploitation, harmful sexual behaviours, abuse by adults within and outside the out of home care system—as serious and requiring a higher-level response
    b. describe response pathways for concerns about the sexual abuse of children in care depending on the context. Specifically
        i. concerns or complaints about the sexual abuse of a child in care, or related conduct, by departmental staff should be referred to the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate (Recommendation 6.6)
        ii. responses to concerns about the sexual abuse of children in care, or related conduct, by adults who are not departmental staff should be led or overseen by the Chief Practitioner
        iii. responses to concerns about sexual exploitation of children in care should be led or overseen by the Chief Practitioner (Recommendation 9.17)
        iv. responses to concerns about harmful sexual behaviours involving children in care should be led or overseen by the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28).

2. The Chief Practitioner should receive all concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care and be adequately resourced to receive, triage, record, monitor and coordinate responses. Where the Chief Practitioner has referred a matter to another entity, the Office of the Chief Practitioner should support the localised response to the child's safety and ongoing welfare.
3. The Office of the Chief Practitioner should include staff with skills in investigation and child interviewing to conduct investigations.
4. The outcomes of all concerns about the sexual abuse of children in care should be reported to the Quality and Risk Committee.

Independent advocacy and oversight

Recommendation 9.33

1. The Tasmanian Government should establish an independent Child Advocate, to be included in the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6).
2. The Child Advocate should have responsibility for:
    a. the independent community visitor scheme (Recommendation 9.34)
    b. individual advocacy for children, including making complaints to the Ombudsman on behalf of a child in care (Recommendation 9.35)
    c. the permanent out of home care advisory group (Recommendation 9.6).

Recommendation 9.34

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to establish an independent community visitor scheme for children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities.
2. The scheme should be administered by the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) and led by the Child Advocate (Recommendation 9.33).
3. The scheme should be funded to enable every child in care, youth detention or another residential youth justice facility to receive regular and frequent visits, and children in family-based care to be visited regularly or when they request a visit. Resourcing should also enable community visitors to undertake advocacy on behalf of the children they visit.

4. Community visitors should be appointed by the Child Advocate based on their skills, knowledge and expertise, and remuneration should be comparable to similar paid roles in other jurisdictions.
5. Aboriginal children should have access to Aboriginal community visitors under the scheme.
6. Community visitors should be responsible, among other matters, for:
    a. developing trusting and supportive relationships with children in out of home care, youth detention or other residential youth justice facilities
    b. advocating on behalf of children by listening to, giving voice to and helping to resolve their concerns and grievances
    c. facilitating children's access to support services
    d. inquiring about and reporting on children's physical and emotional wellbeing
    e. inquiring about whether children's needs are being met.
7. The program should include funding for a small number of legally trained child advocacy officers, also appointed by the Child Advocate (Recommendation 9.33), to assist children with more complex concerns and to support them in seeking independent review of departmental decision making.

Recommendation 9.35

Legislation establishing an independent Child Advocate in the Commission for Children and Young People should provide the Child Advocate with power to make a complaint to the Ombudsman on behalf of a child who is in out of home care, youth detention or another residential youth justice facility, seeking the child's permission to do so first.

Recommendation 9.36

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to:
    a. expand the jurisdiction of the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal to include review of decisions of the Department for Education, Children and Young People in exercising its custody or guardianship powers—including decisions about where a child should live and arrangements for the child's care

b. ensure children whose cases are subject to review have the right to express their views and participate in Tribunal proceedings

c. give the Child Advocate the power to apply for a Tribunal review of a decision about the care arrangements for a child on behalf of the child, or on the Child Advocate's own initiative

d. grant parties, such as parents or carers, the right to apply for a Tribunal review depending on the nature of the decision.

2. To support their understanding of the experiences of children in out of home care, Tribunal members should be specifically trained in the nature and effects of trauma and child sexual abuse.

Recommendation 9.37

1. The Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People should notify the Commission for Children and Young People of sexual abuse allegations involving children in out of home care that fall outside the Reportable Conduct Scheme, including incidents of child abuse by non-carers, and of the outcomes of investigations into those allegations.

2. The Commission for Children and Young People should have the power to require the Department to provide it with information about its responses to such allegations.

Recommendation 9.38

1. The Commission for Children and Young People should have the following functions in relation to out of home care:

   a. monitoring the operation of the out of home care system and the provision of out of home care services to children, by regularly monitoring data and conducting own motion systemic inquiries into aspects of the system

   b. conducting own motion inquiries into the services received by an individual child or group of children in out of home care

   c. making recommendations to the Government for out of home care system improvements

   d. advocating for individual children in out of home care, including supporting children to make complaints to the Ombudsman and to apply for independent reviews of departmental decision making

e. administering the independent community visitor scheme

f. upholding and promoting the rights of children in out of home care.

2. The Commission should be fully resourced on an ongoing basis to perform these functions.

Chapter 12 – The way forward: Children in youth detention

Addressing the legacy of abuse

Recommendation 12.1

The Tasmanian Government should close Ashley Youth Detention Centre as soon as possible.

Recommendation 12.2

Once Ashley Youth Detention Centre is closed, the Tasmanian Government should establish a memorial to victim-survivors who experienced abuse at the Centre. The form and location of the memorial should be decided in consultation with victim-survivors of abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

Recommendation 12.3

The Tasmanian Government should ensure no person who has been detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre is detained or imprisoned in any redeveloped facility at the same site unless the person expresses a preference for this to occur.

Recommendation 12.4

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should work with the Office of the State Archivist to:

a. establish a process to identify, recover, restore, collate, digitise, index and catalogue all historical records relating to children and young people and staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, and all other children in, or staff or carers connected with, state care

b. ensure digitised records are searchable, retrievable, secure and protected against corruption or loss

c. determine which physical records should be retained following digitisation, and maintain these physical records in line with the National Royal Commission's record-keeping principles

d. determine protocols and guidance on how people who have been detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre can access their records.

Recommendation 12.5

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. conduct an audit of allegations arising from

   i. claims made under the Abuse in State Care Program, the Abuse in State Care Support Service and the National Redress Scheme

   ii. civil claims in relation to Ashley Youth Detention Centre or the out of home care system

   iii. complaints regarding Ashley Youth Detention Centre or the out of home care system to identify any current or former staff in government institutions or carers in the out of home care system who are the subject of child abuse allegations, including child sexual abuse

b. ensure the names and details of any staff or carers identified by the audit are added to the cross-government register of misconduct (including unsubstantiated allegations) concerning child sexual abuse (Recommendation 20.9)

c. ensure all relevant information derived from the audit is provided to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, disciplinary action is considered, and the current safety of children in institutions prioritised

d. require the Department of Justice to

    i. pass on to the Department for Education, Children and Young People and other relevant departments as a matter of urgency the full details (rather than a summary) of any relevant National Redress Scheme application or claim under any future state redress scheme that the Department of Justice administers

    ii. make appropriate notifications to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 in relation to allegations in National Redress Scheme applications or claims under a future state redress scheme

e. advocate at a national level to review the information-sharing framework in the National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth) and the National Redress Scheme's Operational Manual for Participating Institutions to

    i. ensure information about current risks to children is reported to police, child protection authorities, authorities responsible for registration to work with children and administrators of reportable conduct schemes in the timeliest manner and by the most appropriate entity

    ii. identify the most appropriate point in the process for the National Redress Scheme Operator to seek consent from applicants to share information with relevant authorities

f. implement systems to enable future monitoring of National Redress Scheme applications, claims under any future state redress scheme and civil claims to identify current staff in government institutions or carers in the out of home care system who are the subject of child abuse allegations, including by adding relevant information to the recommended register of misconduct concerning child sexual abuse (Recommendation 20.9)

g. make appropriate supports available to victim-survivors who disclose abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, including warm referrals, with permission, to sexual assault counsellors who have training and experience in working with victim-survivors of child sexual abuse

h. remove any barriers to information sharing that would prevent the implementation of this recommendation.

Cultural change

Recommendation 12.6

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. have appropriate processes in place to ensure leaders in youth detention have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability requirements to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation

b. ensure the person who holds the position of Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice, has knowledge and understanding of youth justice and therapeutic models of care in youth justice, and experience in providing strategic direction and leadership

c. ensure cultural change in youth detention is included in the key performance indicators of the Secretary, Associate Secretary and Executive Director, Services for Youth Justice

d. reclassify the position of Manager, Custodial Youth Justice from Band 8 in the Tasmanian State Service Award to at least a Senior Executive Service Level 1

e. ensure the position description and performance measures for the role of Manager, Custodial Youth Justice include implementing cultural change in youth detention.

Recommendation 12.7

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. develop measures to monitor and evaluate progress towards cultural change in youth detention and include these in the Outcomes Framework under the Youth Justice Blueprint and associated action plans

b. include monitoring and evaluation of progress towards cultural change in youth detention in the Youth Justice Reform Governance Framework

c. urgently begin data collection and monitoring of progress towards cultural change

d. ensure there is an ongoing governance structure to oversee and monitor the functioning of the youth justice system, including the performance and culture of youth detention, beyond the implementation of the youth justice reforms

e. fund the Department for Education, Children and Young People to immediately appoint a culture change manager at Ashley Youth Detention Centre reporting to the Centre Manager and whose role is to work with and support the Centre Manager to

   i. drive cultural change in youth detention

   ii. create a child safe organisation

   iii. establish a positive, collaborative and supportive working environment

f. maintain the culture change manager position or function beyond the closure of Ashley Youth Detention Centre for as long as monitoring indicates there is a need for it.

Recommendation 12.8

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should, in consultation with the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6), develop an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in detention, having regard to best practice principles for children's participation in organisations. The strategy should include:

a. the establishment of a permanent advisory group that i. includes children, young people and young adults up to the age of 25 years with previous experience of youth detention in Tasmania, including Aboriginal people and people with disability

   ii. has clear terms of reference developed in consultation with young people with experience of detention

   iii. enables its members to participate in a safe and meaningful way and express their views on measures to empower children and young people in detention (including the role and purpose of the Resident Advisory Group) and achieve cultural change in detention

   iv. meets regularly and is chaired by a person independent of the Department and attended by a senior departmental leader

   v. is adequately funded and resourced

b. a review of the Ashley Youth Detention Centre Resident Advisory Group to ensure it conforms with best practice principles for children's participation and provides a safe forum for children and young people in detention to express their views, including on measures to achieve cultural change in detention, without fear of reprisal

c. a consultation forum for children and young people in any youth detention facility that replaces Ashley Youth Detention Centre

d. mechanisms to ensure children and young people in detention are aware of their rights

e. regular monitoring and evaluation of the effectiveness of the empowerment and participation strategy.

Recommendation 12.9

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. initiate a change management process that includes identifying the aptitudes, attitudes and capabilities expected of youth workers, and requires all current youth workers to reapply for their positions

b. ensure individuals recruited to the youth worker role hold a relevant Certificate IV qualification before starting or complete such a qualification within a year of starting, and have appropriate attributes, attitudes and skills to build positive relationships and work therapeutically with children and young people in youth detention

c. create incentives for ongoing professional development by supporting youth workers to complete higher qualifications and providing for operational career progression to a senior youth worker role

d. maintain a sufficient level of youth workers to implement a therapeutic model of care in youth detention and to ensure the safety and wellbeing of children, young people and staff

e. establish an ongoing biannual recruitment process for youth workers

f. ensure the induction program and continuing professional development for youth workers are based on best practice principles and include

    i. expected standards of behaviour in interacting with children and young people

    ii. a focus on children and young people's human rights, particularly in relation to isolation, force, restraints and personal searches

    iii. approaches to setting fair, clear and firm boundaries for children and young people's behaviour within a therapeutic, trauma-informed framework

    iv. training in all custodial policies and procedures

g. ensure newly recruited youth workers are not eligible to start work until they have satisfactorily completed the induction program, followed by two weeks of 'buddy shifts'

h. develop a clear policy on the appropriateness of providing training, counselling or direction to detention centre staff members who have repeatedly demonstrated resistance to change

i. urgently develop a staffing contingency plan to ensure children and young people in detention are not subjected to lockdowns caused by staff shortages

j. consider introducing mechanisms to attract more youth workers, such as an allowance or loading that reflects the regional location of Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the current high-risk environment of youth detention

k. implement other supports for Ashley Youth Detention Centre staff in relation to allegations of child sexual abuse against their colleagues and strengthen support for youth workers and other detention centre staff following critical incidents in detention, such as riots, assaults, attempted suicide and self-harm, by providing psychological first aid, additional support from skilled psychologists on an 'as needs' basis and, where appropriate, critical incident debriefing facilitated by a neutral and trained expert.

Recommendation 12.10

The Department for Education, Children and Young People, in developing a professional conduct policy (Recommendation 20.2), should ensure:

a. there is a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in detention facilities and other residential youth justice facilities

b. the professional conduct policy for detention facilities and other residential youth justice facilities, in addition to the matters set out in Recommendation 20.2, specifies expectations outlined in other relevant custodial policies and procedures, including those on the use of force, isolation and personal searches of children and young people in detention

c. the professional conduct policy for youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors

d. the Department uses appropriate mechanisms to ensure compliance by volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors with the professional conduct policy.

Reducing the number of children in youth detention

Recommendation 12.11

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. introduce legislation to increase the minimum age of criminal responsibility to 14 years, without exception

b. develop and provide a range of community-based health, welfare and disability programs and services that are tailored to meet the needs of children and young people under the age of 14 years who are engaging in antisocial behaviour, and to address the factors contributing to that behaviour

c. work towards increasing the minimum age of detention (including remand) to 16 years by developing alternatives to detention for children aged 14 and 15 years who are found guilty of serious violent offences and who may be a danger to themselves or the community.

Recommendation 12.12

The Tasmanian Government should ensure legislation to replace or amend the Youth Justice Act 1997 contains updated general principles of youth justice that reflect contemporary understandings of child development, children's antisocial behaviour and children's needs.

Recommendation 12.13

1. The Tasmanian Government, in reviewing current diversion processes and developing a Diversionary Services Framework, should:

   a. examine the exercise of police discretion to determine whether opportunities for cautioning and community conferencing are being maximised, particularly for Aboriginal children and young people, and children and young people without a strong family support network

   b. commission research to examine the effectiveness of formal cautions imposed with undertakings and the sanctions imposed by community conferences, to ensure they are proportionate to the alleged offending and not unnecessarily onerous

c. introduce legislation to widen the range of alleged offences in respect of which diversion may be pursued and create a presumption in favour of pre-court diversion for children and young people.

2. The Tasmanian Government should begin statewide delivery of new diversion programs under the Diversionary Services Framework by 2025.

Recommendation 12.14

The Tasmanian Government, to maximise opportunities for children and young people to be admitted to bail and minimise the number of children and young people on remand, should:

a. introduce legislation to

   i. require bail decision makers to consider the matters specified in section 3B of the Bail Act 1977 (Vic) when determining bail for a child, as well as the child's age (including their developmental age at the time of the alleged offence), Aboriginal status and any previous experience of trauma or out of home care

   ii. prohibit the refusal of bail to a child on the sole ground that the child does not have any, or any adequate, accommodation

b. examine the effectiveness of the existing bail support program with a view to expanding its capacity and funding additional bail support programs

c. establish and fully resource a statewide 24-hour bail system for children and young people with

   i. specialised and trained decision makers who have knowledge of children and young people, Aboriginal children and young people, and the impact of trauma

   ii. access to corresponding bail support services

   iii. access to legal representation for children and young people

d. ensure its proposed assisted bail facilities

   i. are small, homelike and, subject to bail conditions, do not place restrictions on the movements of children and young people

   ii. have the capacity to deal with children and young people with complex needs

iii. are designed to include wraparound services, such as health, education and employment

iv. are culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people

v. include specialist, therapeutically trained bail support workers to help children and young people attend programs and services, and to comply with their conditions of bail.

Recommendation 12.15

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. ensure any legislation designed to amend or replace the Youth Justice Act 1997 provides that i. rehabilitation is the primary purpose of sentencing a child

ii. the list of sentencing options is a hierarchy and a sentencer can only impose a sentence at a particular level of the hierarchy if satisfied that it is not appropriate to impose a sentence that is 'lower' in the hierarchy

iii. a sentence imposed on a child should be the minimum intervention required in the circumstances

iv. a custodial sentence must only be imposed as a last resort and for the minimum period necessary

v. in sentencing a child the court must consider the child's experience of trauma, any child protection involvement or experience of out of home care, disruptions to the child's living situation or education, any mental illness, neurological difficulties or developmental issues experienced by the child, and the child's chronological age and developmental age at the time of sentencing

vi. in sentencing an Aboriginal child, the court must consider additional factors including the consequences of intergenerational trauma, historical discriminatory policies, general and systemic racism, and any previous culturally inappropriate responses that may have worsened the effects of trauma on the child

vii. there is a presumption against imposing restrictive conditions (such as curfews and non-association conditions) with community-based sentencing orders, which may increase a child's likelihood of breaching a sentencing order and being sentenced to detention

b. ensure children who are sentenced to a supervised community-based order receive adequate support to comply with the conditions of the order from therapeutically trained, culturally competent staff

c. assist and support the Magistrates Court to establish a new division of the Court to hear and determine both child protection matters and criminal charges against children and young people, which should be constituted by at least three dedicated full-time magistrates with specialist knowledge and skills relating to children and young people

d. support the Magistrates Court to arrange for the implementation and operation of the Court's new specialist division to be independently evaluated after three years

e. fund the Magistrates and Supreme Courts to provide professional development for judicial officers hearing matters involving children and young people in the adult jurisdiction, in areas including child and adolescent development, trauma, child and adolescent mental health, cognitive and communication deficits, and Aboriginal cultural safety.

Creating a child-focused youth detention system

Recommendation 12.16

The Tasmanian Government should ensure its proposed new detention facility (and any future detention facilities) are small and homelike and incorporate design features that reflect best practice international youth detention facilities. This includes features that:

a. promote the development of trusting and therapeutic relationships between staff and children and young people

b. facilitate and enhance trauma-informed, therapeutic interventions for children and young people

c. minimise stigma to children and young people

d. facilitate and promote connections between children and young people, and their families and communities

e. protect children and young people against the risks of child sexual abuse (including harmful sexual behaviours)—for example, by enabling line-of-sight supervision as far as possible, without infringing on children and young people's privacy.

Recommendation 12.17

1. The Tasmanian Government, to enhance the safety of children and young people in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any new detention facility, should:
    a. ensure all public areas of the facility are subject to electronic surveillance
    b. introduce viewing panel swipe readers
    c. introduce body-worn cameras, supported by comprehensive policies and procedures for their use by staff
    d. develop and implement a policy for managing and retaining surveillance footage that i. takes account of the record-keeping principles identified by the National Royal Commission and the disposal freeze on records relating to children issued by the Office of the State Archivist
        ii. promotes transparency of staff conduct and enables regular audits of staff performance to be undertaken
        iii. requires footage to be made available on a timely basis on the lawful request of a government department or oversight body.
2. The Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) should annually review the use of electronic surveillance in detention to determine whether it increases children and young people's feelings of safety in detention and should continue to be used. The initial review should seek the views of children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre on whether electronic surveillance should be deployed in the proposed new detention facility.

Recommendation 12.18

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure:
    a. use of the Behaviour Development Program is discontinued in Ashley Youth Detention Centre and not adopted in any new detention facility
    b. the Youth Justice Model of Care planned to be developed by 2025 includes a specific operating philosophy, service objectives and service standards for detention facilities that are based on non-punitive, child-centred, trauma-informed, culturally safe practice and reflect international best practice in youth justice

c. staff in youth detention facilities have the skills needed to undertake evidence-based, trauma-informed, child-centred interventions with children and young people, including the skills to anticipate, de-escalate and respond effectively to challenging behaviours without resorting to force or restrictive practices

d. implementation of the Youth Justice Model of Care and updated Practice Framework for youth detention is monitored by the governance structure outlined in Recommendation 12.7.

2. The Custodial Inspector, or the body responsible for inspection standards for youth detention centres in Tasmania, should review standards and guidelines on the appropriate use in youth detention of behaviour management programs that incorporate incentives and rewards, having regard to international best practice and research on effective responses to children and young people with trauma backgrounds and emotional regulation challenges.

Recommendation 12.19

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. establish clear processes and guidelines for assessment, case planning and case management for children and young people in detention, to enable the delivery of tailored, multidisciplinary, therapeutic responses to each child and young person as part of their daily routine, which meet their health and wellbeing needs and address the factors contributing to their offending behaviour

b. implement a collaborative, multidisciplinary approach to responding to each child and young person in detention that includes all relevant service providers and, to the greatest extent possible, the child or young person's family

c. develop a memorandum of understanding between agencies involved in delivering services to children and young people in detention, including child protection, health, disability support and education that i. describes the roles and responsibilities of each agency in case planning and case management

   ii. commits to agencies adopting a collaborative, child-centred approach

   iii. contains clear protocols for record keeping, information sharing, incident reporting and dispute resolution

d. ensure each child or young person in detention (and/or their representative) is given the opportunity to participate in case planning and case management processes, express their views and have those views given due weight

e. ensure each child and young person on remand has access to therapeutic services and supports, with statutory protections that prohibit using disclosures made during interventions and programs on remand as evidence of guilt.

Recommendation 12.20

The Tasmanian Government should ensure:

a. there are appropriate mechanisms and pathways for children in contact with the criminal justice system to be diverted to the mental health system for assessment and treatment

b. the proposed Youth Forensic Mental Health Service provides timely referral and access to mental health treatment, care and support for children and young people when appropriate, whether they are under community-based supervision, in detention or not yet sentenced (including on remand)

c. children and young people in detention have daily access to an onsite child and adolescent psychologist and fortnightly access to an onsite child and adolescent psychiatrist

d. the proposed mental health inpatient unit for children and adolescents in Hobart provides for children and young people in detention.

Recommendation 12.21

The Tasmanian Government should ensure children and young people in detention (including on remand):

a. receive a mental and physical health assessment on admission to the detention facility, and when needed while in detention

b. have access to 24/7 medical care

c. have a say in their mental and physical health care.

Recommendation 12.22

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. ensure the Youth Justice Model of Care emphasises the central importance for children and young people in detention of access to high-quality education and vocational training that is tailored to their individual learning needs and that includes learning life skills

b. make education programs and other structured activities accessible to all children and young people in detention (including on remand)

c. ensure a child or young person's access to educational programs or physical exercise in detention is not linked to, or limited by, their ranking in behaviour management programs

d. develop and establish partnerships with community organisations to create employment and training opportunities for children and young people leaving detention.

Recommendation 12.23

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. develop and implement a policy that recognises the importance to children and young people in detention of maintaining or building connections with their family and community and

    i. specifies ways to promote such connections, including through visits, temporary leave and phone or video calls

    ii. clearly states that entitlements to visits, temporary leave and phone or video calls cannot be denied on the basis of a child or young person's behaviour

b. provide reasonable assistance (including financial help) to members of a child or young person's family or Aboriginal community to enable them to visit the child or young person frequently, where families or Aboriginal community members have barriers to accessing the youth detention facility.

Recommendation 12.24

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. establish an integrated throughcare service for children and young people in detention that

   i. begins exit planning as soon as possible after a child or young person enters detention for the provision of safe and stable accommodation, access to physical and mental health support, and assistance with education or employment after release to facilitate their reintegration into the community

   ii. provides increased access to the detention facility for staff of community-based providers of post-release services

   iii. adopts a collaborative, child-centred, cross-organisation approach involving child protection, housing, health, disability support and education services, supported by a memorandum of understanding and clear policies and procedures

   iv. involves the child or young person and, to the greatest extent possible, their parent, guardian or other significant adult in exit planning

   v. includes post-release wraparound support services for children and young people

   vi. is culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people

b. deliver community-based schooling options for children and young people with complex behavioural challenges, including those who are or have been involved in the youth justice system, to provide appropriate learning environments for children to transition to when they leave detention.

Recommendation 12.25

The Tasmanian Government should introduce a new process for approving transfers of young people from youth detention to an adult prison facility that:

a. limits transfers to young people aged 16 years or older

b. requires the Department for Education, Children and Young People to notify the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) of any proposed transfer

c. requires the Department to apply to the Magistrates Court (Youth Justice Division) or the new specialist children's division of the Magistrates Court (Recommendation 12.15) for approval to transfer

d. requires the Magistrates Court, in determining whether to approve the transfer, to consider, among other matters, the steps the Department has taken to avoid the need for the transfer, whether the transfer is in the young person's best interests and the views of the Commission for Children and Young People on the appropriateness of the transfer.

Recommendation 12.26

The Auditor-General should undertake an audit of the length of custodial stays at Ashley Youth Detention Centre to determine whether they align with sentencing orders.

Aboriginal children in youth detention

Recommendation 12.27

1. The Tasmanian Government, to protect Aboriginal children and young people against the risk of sexual abuse in youth detention, should urgently develop, in partnership with Aboriginal communities, an Aboriginal youth justice strategy that is underpinned by self-determination and that focuses on prevention, early intervention and diversion strategies for Aboriginal children and young people. Aboriginal communities should be funded to participate in developing the strategy.
2. The strategy should consider and address, among other matters:
    a. legislative reform to enable recognised Aboriginal organisations to design, administer and supervise elements of the youth justice system for Aboriginal children and young people
    b. capacity building and funding for recognised Aboriginal organisations to participate in youth justice decision making in relation to Aboriginal children and young people, and to deliver youth justice services to Aboriginal children and young people
    c. the use of police discretion in the investigation and processing of Aboriginal children and young people, including cautioning, arrest, custody, charging and bail

d. alternative pre-court diversionary options for Aboriginal children and young people

e. mechanisms to increase the likelihood of Aboriginal children and young people receiving bail and minimise the number of Aboriginal children and young people on remand, including culturally responsive supported bail accommodation and other bail assistance programs, and legislative reform to require bail decision makers to consider a child's Aboriginal status

f. mechanisms to support Aboriginal children and young people to comply with the conditions of community-based youth justice orders, to minimise their likelihood of breaching conditions and entering detention.

Recommendation 12.28

The Tasmanian Government should ensure:

a. any new facilities intended to replace Ashley Youth Detention Centre are co-designed with Aboriginal communities and include culturally enriching environments for Aboriginal children and young people that promote connection to family, community and Country

b. the Aboriginal youth justice strategy (Recommendation 12.27) considers whether a small, homelike facility that has Aboriginal staff, provides trauma-informed care and enables Aboriginal children and young people to connect with culture through the involvement of local Aboriginal communities, should be established specifically for Aboriginal children and young people who are remanded or serving a custodial sentence. Careful consideration should be given to the most appropriate management model for such a facility.

Recommendation 12.29

The Tasmanian Government should take steps to ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre and any replacement facilities are culturally safe for Aboriginal children and young people. These steps should include:

a. updating admission procedures and case management guidelines to require staff to

    i. ask children and young people who identify as Aboriginal whether they would like the support of an Aboriginal organisation or an Aboriginal community member while they are detained

ii. notify the nominated organisation or individual within 12 hours of the child or young person's admission

iii. facilitate the involvement of the child or young person's nominated representative in case planning, case management and exit planning in respect of the child or young person

b. updating relevant guidelines and procedures to require staff to consult with an Aboriginal child or young person's community to determine how best to provide individual cultural support to the child or young person while they are in detention

c. working with Aboriginal communities to establish ongoing cultural programs for Aboriginal children and young people in detention, such as visiting Elders programs, on-Country programs and cultural mentoring programs

d. ensuring the new policy on supporting children and young people in detention to maintain connections to their families and communities (Recommendation 12.23) emphasises the central importance of connection to family, community and culture for the wellbeing of Aboriginal children and young people in detention

e. establishing the role of Aboriginal liaison officer in youth detention to support Aboriginal children and young people, including by facilitating cultural support and becoming involved in case planning, case management and exit planning

f. ensuring the updated Ashley Youth Detention Centre Learning and Development Framework is designed to equip staff with the knowledge and skills to provide a culturally safe environment for Aboriginal children and young people, including providing trauma-informed and culturally safe responses to children and young people engaging in self-harm or other challenging behaviours.

Harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention

Recommendation 12.30

1. The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28) should develop detailed youth justice-specific policies, protocols and practice guidelines to support best practice responses to harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities.

2. All incidents of harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention or other residential youth justice facilities should be reported to:
    a. the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to enable data on harmful sexual behaviours in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities to be included in the Department for Education, Children and Young People's monitoring and oversight of harmful sexual behaviours through the new Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5)
    b. the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6).
3. The Department should explore the potential to implement Power to Kids (or another program or approach with comparable components) in youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities as a supplementary strategy to address the heightened risk of harmful sexual behaviours in those settings and take a proactive approach to prevention.
4. The Tasmanian Government should ensure measures are in place to facilitate timely access to specialist therapeutic interventions for children in youth detention displaying or harmed by harmful sexual behaviours. Where treatment is likely to extend beyond their custodial sentence this should be provided by a clinician external to the detention centre who can continue the treatment after the child is released from detention.

Searches, isolation and use of force

Recommendation 12.31

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Youth Justice Act 1997 to ensure the Act expressly prohibits fully unclothed searches of children and young people in detention.
2. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:
    a. introduce body scanner technology at Ashley Youth Detention Centre and include such technology in any facility designed to replace the Centre
    b. update the Department's Personal Searches of Young People Detained at AYDC procedure to
        i. define a fully unclothed search as a form of child sexual abuse
        ii. explicitly outline the hierarchy of search options, from the least to the most intrusive

iii. align gender requirements for staff who conduct or observe searches with requirements in the Youth Justice Act 1997

iv. specify internal and external reporting requirements in relation to searches

c. publish the personal searches procedure on the Department's website

d. consider what search policies and procedures, if any, should apply in the proposed new assisted bail and supported residential facilities

e. ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) provides

i. monthly reports on searches of children and young people in detention to the Secretary

ii. quarterly reports on searches of children and young people in detention to the Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to enable it to monitor trends and identify any areas of concern

iii. the search register and all relevant supporting documentation to the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) on a monthly basis or more frequently, as agreed with the Commission for Children and Young People.

Recommendation 12.32

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Youth Justice Act 1997 to ensure the Act:

a. makes clear that confining a detainee in their room or unit and preventing them from having contact with other detainees (other than overnight) constitutes isolation, regardless of the label used to refer to the practice

b. clarifies that the use of isolation as a punishment is a prohibited action and makes it a criminal offence for a person to punish a detainee by isolating them or causing them to be isolated

c. refers expressly to the principle that isolation should only be used as a measure of last resort and for the minimum time necessary.

2. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:
    a. update the Department's Use of Isolation procedure to
        i. make clear that confining a detainee in their room or unit and preventing them from having contact with other detainees (other than overnight) constitutes isolation, regardless of the label used to refer to the practice
        ii. specify clearly who is a delegate of the Secretary or the detention centre manager for the purpose of authorising isolation and extensions of isolation
        iii. require isolation beyond three hours to be authorised by a senior departmental official such as a Director
        iv. specify internal and external reporting requirements in relation to isolation
    b. publish the updated Use of Isolation procedure on the Department's website
    c. ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) records information on lockdowns, including the reason for the lockdown, details of authorisation processes, the duration of the lockdown, the number of children and young people isolated during the lockdown, measures adopted during the lockdown to meet the needs of children and young people and support their health and wellbeing, and steps taken after the lockdown to address its effects on children and young people
    d. ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) provides
        i. monthly reports on isolation and lockdowns in detention to the Secretary
        ii. quarterly reports on the isolation of children and young people in detention and lockdowns to the Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to enable it to monitor trends and identify any areas of concern
        iii. the isolation register (with all relevant supporting documentation) and separate data on lockdowns to the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) on a monthly basis or more frequently, as agreed with the Commission for Children and Young People
    e. publish quarterly data on isolation and lockdowns in youth detention.

Recommendation 12.33

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Youth Justice Act 1997 to provide that:
    a. subject to sections 25E and 133, force may only be used when reasonable and necessary to prevent an imminent and serious threat of harm to a person or to prevent an imminent escape, and when all other means of control have been exhausted
    b. force must be used for the minimum time necessary
    c. force must never be used to punish a child or young person, or solely to secure their compliance with an instruction or direction
    d. using force in contravention of the Act is a criminal offence.
2. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:
    a. update the Department's Use of Force procedure to
        i. require all uses of force to be immediately reported to a senior departmental official, such as a Director, in addition to identifying the use of force as part of an incident report
        ii. require every child or young person who has been subjected to the use of force to be provided with health care and offered the opportunity to discuss the incident with a staff member who was not involved
        iii. require parents and carers of a child or young person who has been subjected to the use of force to be notified
        iv. specify internal and external reporting requirements in relation to the use of force
    b. publish the updated Use of Force procedure on the Department's website
    c. ensure Ashley Youth Detention Centre (and any future detention facility) provides
        i. monthly reports on the use of force in detention to the Secretary
        ii. quarterly reports on the use of force in detention to the Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to enable it to monitor trends and identify any areas of concern
        iii. the use of force register and all relevant supporting documentation to the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) on a monthly basis or more frequently, as agreed with the Commission for Children and Young People.

Recommendation 12.34

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should provide regular joint training and professional development for staff who have contact with children and young people in youth detention facilities and relevant staff of the Youth Justice Services directorate on laws, standards, policies and procedures regarding the use of isolation, the use of force and searches of children and young people in detention to ensure consistency in understanding and application. This training should be mandatory.
2. Tasmania Police should ensure its members receive regular training and guidance on laws and procedures on the use of isolation, the use of force and searches of children and young people in detention to enable police to readily identify conduct that falls outside the parameters of acceptable professional conduct among staff and may constitute a criminal offence.

Responding to concerns, complaints and critical incidents in detention

Recommendation 12.35

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. update its complaints procedure and practice advice for youth detention to
    i. address structural barriers to making complaints in detention and include developmentally appropriate communication methods at all stages
    ii. require concerns, regardless of the form in which they are raised, to be recognised, recorded and actioned as a complaint where the person raising the concern wants to make a complaint
    iii. define child sexual abuse (including sexual misconduct, grooming and harmful sexual behaviours) and boundary breaches
    iv. require all complaints and concerns involving allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct or other harms to children (including the inappropriate use of force, isolation or searches) by staff, breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct or the professional conduct policy for youth detention (Recommendation 12.10) and reportable conduct as defined by the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 to be referred immediately to the new Child-Related Incident Management Directorate for response (Recommendation 6.6)

v. require all incidents involving harmful sexual behaviours to be reported to the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28)

vi. clearly specify mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations for staff in relation to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023

vii. set timeframes for responding to complaints

viii. specify requirements for communicating with and providing support to complainants and other affected parties, including parents or carers of affected children and young people

ix. clarify the requirements for recording complaints and outcomes of complaint investigations to enable the monitoring of trends for quality, safety and governance purposes

x. include procedures for making and responding to complaints in relation to other residential youth justice facilities, including the proposed assisted bail and supported residential facilities

b. ensure staff in detention and other residential youth justice facilities understand and comply with their role in responding to complaints, including complaints about child sexual abuse, and have a clear process for raising safety concerns about other staff

c. use a range of child-friendly tools to ensure children and young people in detention and other residential youth justice facilities are aware of complaints processes and understand the steps facility staff and the Department will take in response to a complaint, including a complaint about child sexual abuse

d. ensure a child-friendly guide to making a complaint and explaining complaints procedures, including the circumstances under which complaints made to oversight bodies may be referred to the Department, is readily accessible on the Department's website, as well as a guide for adults wishing to make a complaint on behalf of a child in detention or another residential youth justice facility

e. ensure there are staff in the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate with expertise in youth justice, including an understanding of the risks of child sexual abuse in detention and the characteristics of mistreatment and abuse in detention environments.

Independent oversight of youth detention

Recommendation 12.36

The Tasmanian Government, in establishing and resourcing the new independent community visitor scheme (Recommendation 9.34), should ensure:

a. independent community visitors visit children and young people in detention facilities weekly, at a minimum

b. Aboriginal children and young people in detention or other residential youth justice facilities have access, wherever possible, to visits from an Aboriginal independent community visitor or from the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, depending on the child's preference

c. independent community visitors have the necessary statutory powers to perform their functions, including the power to enter the facility, have access to children and young people in the facility and inspect the facility

d. each facility where children and young people are detained or reside has a safe, dedicated space where independent community visitors can meet with children and young people and discuss concerns without being observed or overheard by staff or other children and young people.

Recommendation 12.37

The Ombudsman should develop written guidelines for its staff on managing complaints it receives containing allegations of child sexual abuse involving children in youth detention, other residential youth justice facilities or out of home care. Among other matters, these guidelines should include:

a. the definition of child sexual abuse and related conduct, including sexual misconduct, grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and boundary breaches

b. the process for reporting relevant allegations to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023

c. guidance on referring an allegation or complaint to an agency named in the complaint

d. guidance on communicating with child complainants on the referral of their complaints to other entities and the progress of investigations into their complaints

e. processes for sharing information with other oversight bodies regarding the management of complaints (Recommendation 18.15).

Recommendation 12.38

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6):

a. has functions and powers to monitor the operation of youth detention centres and other residential youth justice facilities, and the safety and wellbeing of, and the provision of services to, children and young people in detention, and in the youth justice system more broadly, by

   i. regularly monitoring and reviewing custodial population data and information on serious or adverse incidents (such as child sexual abuse, assaults, attempted suicide, self-harm, riots, escapes and property damage) and the use of isolation, force, restraints and searches

   ii. conducting regular onsite inspections of youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities

   iii. conducting own-motion systemic inquiries into issues that are identified through monitoring

   iv. conducting own-motion inquiries into the youth justice services received by an individual child or group of children

b. has the power to enter adult prison facilities to visit children and young people in those facilities to monitor their safety and wellbeing

c. is adequately resourced on an ongoing basis to fulfil its systemic monitoring functions.

Recommendation 12.39

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. appoint the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6) as an additional National Preventive Mechanism under the United Nations Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (OPCAT), with expertise in child rights, child trauma, the prevention and identification of child abuse, the needs of Aboriginal children and young people and the needs of children and young people with disability, and with power to inspect places where children and young people are detained

b. resource Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanisms sufficiently to allow them to effectively fulfil their functions under OPCAT.

Chapter 15 – The way forward: Children in health services

A policy framework and implementation plan

Recommendation 15.1

The Department of Health should develop and communicate a policy framework and implementation plan for reforms to improve responses to child sexual abuse in health services. The policy and implementation plan should:

a. set out the purpose and need for the reforms

b. set out the role, responsibilities and interactions of bodies the Department has set up as part of the reforms

c. explain how reforms, including departmental reforms and those recommended by the Child Safe Governance Review, Community Recovery Initiative and this Commission of Inquiry, will work together to respond to child sexual abuse in health services

d. outline how the reforms are being prioritised for implementation and who is responsible for their implementation

e. set out the expected timeframes for implementation

f. be published on the Department's website.

Implementing the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations

Recommendation 15.2

1. The Tasmanian Government and Department of Health should continue to implement the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations across all health services.
2. The Tasmanian Government should advocate at a national level for compliance with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations to be a mandatory requirement for accrediting health services against the National Safety and Quality Health Service Standards under the Australian Health Service Safety and Quality Accreditation Scheme.

Protecting children through a safety culture

Recommendation 15.3

The Department of Health should ensure its cultural improvement program embeds a safety culture in health services by:

a. requiring clear organisational values be observed across all levels of health services, including in relation to staff conduct

b. establishing strong governance arrangements to address staff practices that place children at risk of abuse, and complementing established patient safety governance structures

c. ensuring all levels of management demonstrate a commitment to a safety culture, including by addressing poor staff conduct

d. clarifying roles and responsibilities among staff when there is a suspicion that child sexual abuse has occurred or that safety policies are not observed

e. ensuring there are processes that hold senior managers and executives accountable to respond appropriately to the conduct of their staff, including through performance agreements and role descriptions

f. establishing measures of a strong organisational culture that indicate an organisation

i. welcomes concerns about staff and sees them as an opportunity to improve safety for staff and patients

ii. empowers staff to feel safe and supported to raise concerns about colleagues with their leaders and gives them confidence in the ability of leaders to respond to concerns and take disciplinary actions (including termination) where appropriate

iii. ensures staff are clear about the process for raising concerns, how these concerns will be addressed and what feedback they can expect to receive

g. providing progress reports to the Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor to demonstrate how these principles have been translated into policy and practice (Recommendation 22.1).

Recommendation 15.4

1. The Department of Health should consider integrating features of the St Vincent's Health Australia's Ethos Program into its cultural improvement program.
2. The Department of Health should ensure, in adopting its cultural improvement program, professional boundary breaches by staff towards a child are always formally reported, responded to and recorded in centralised records for future reference.

Embedding child safety as a priority for leadership

Recommendation 15.5

The Department of Health should make health leadership accountable for embedding child safety as a priority, including by:

a. ensuring that all relevant health leaders have an obligation to act consistently with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (reflected in Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Standards) in their role descriptions and performance agreements, with compliance with this obligation to be reviewed annually

b. ensuring that the role descriptions and performance agreements of all staff providing services to children require them to protect child safety, with compliance with this obligation to be considered as part of annual performance reviews.

Recommendation 15.6

The Department of Health, to support health services become child safe organisations, should ensure:

a. child safety, including safety from abuse in health services, is overseen by the governance and leadership structures established through the cultural improvement program

b. child safety is built into the safety and quality systems of health services

c. staff responsible for providing care to children have the knowledge and skills to respond to child safety concerns in line with the expectations of a child safe organisation and relevant health service policies, including being equipped to identify and respond to indicators of child sexual abuse

d. staff act consistently with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (reflected in Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Standards) when performing their work, including in discussions between health practitioners, health workers and children about care planning and treatment.

Empowering children, families and carers

Recommendation 15.7

1. The Department of Health should establish a health services young people's advisory group. The advisory group should:

   a. have a clear purpose and objectives

   b. be guided by clear terms of reference developed in consultation with children and young people

   c. comprise young people with significant lived experience of health services, including young people of different ages, from diverse backgrounds and with different care needs

   d. enable young people to contribute to decision making in a safe and meaningful way about issues that affect them

   e. allow young people to have a say in departmental strategies, policies, procedures and protocols that affect them

   f. be adequately funded and resourced.

2. Summaries of the health services young people's advisory group meetings should be prepared and distributed to all senior executive teams in the Department.
3. The Department should report on the activities of the health services young people's advisory group and on other engagement with children and young people through its annual report.
4. The Department should undertake other age-appropriate engagement with children to ensure as many children and young people as possible can take part in shaping health services.

Recommendation 15.8

1. The Department of Health should ensure consistent information is provided to patients, including suitable age-appropriate resources for children and young people and their families and carers, across its health services. These resources should include information on:
    a. requirements and expectations of a child safe organisation
    b. patient rights when receiving health care, including the rights of children and young people
    c. expected standards of behaviour for health service staff
    d. processes for raising concerns and making complaints internally and externally
    e. roles of health regulatory bodies in receiving complaints.
2. This information should be provided in formats that meet community needs, especially for those with less capacity to comprehend complex written text.

Recommendation 15.9

The Department of Health should require its health services to undertake regular and ongoing monitoring of children and young people's sense of safety in health services to inform continuous improvements to child safety, including in the safety of the physical environment.

Recommendation 15.10

The Department of Health should work with relevant stakeholders to consider the needs and backgrounds of children and young people using health services, including Aboriginal children, children from culturally diverse backgrounds, children with disability, children with mental illness and children who identify as LGBTQIA+. The Department should consult with Aboriginal communities on how it can provide culturally safe spaces for Aboriginal children across its health services.

Policies, procedures and protocols on child safety

Recommendation 15.11

1. The Department of Health should review and consolidate its policies, procedures and protocols. This review should prioritise identifying gaps in relation to safeguarding children and should inform the development and implementation of consistent statewide policies, procedures and protocols on child safety.
2. The Department's safeguarding policies should include implementing the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations and other recommended policy changes (namely, policies on reporting obligations, professional conduct and providing a chaperone (Recommendations 15.12, 15.13 and 15.14)).
3. The Department should undertake regular scheduled reviews of its policies, procedures and protocols for child safety to ensure they continue to reflect best practice and organisational changes.
4. The Department should publish its policies, procedures and protocols for child safety on its website to promote transparency and ensure accessibility to staff, patients and their families.

Recommendation 15.12

1. The Department of Health should ensure there are up-to-date policies on mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations, including for concerns about staff conduct, and that these are effectively communicated to staff. These policies must not require that reporting be formally authorised.
2. The Department's review of the Tasmanian Health Service Protocol – Complaint or Concern about Health Professional Conduct and associated documents should include:

a. a description of external reporting requirements in relation to child safety, including voluntary reporting pathways, and reporting to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 and the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency

b. guidance on when it is appropriate to acquit mandatory reporting obligations by reporting concerns to a superior (for example, to avoid multiple notifications). This should make clear that a person is always entitled to make a notification to an external agency if they wish to do so

c. a list of internal contacts for staff who have questions about child safety concerns and their reporting obligations.

Recommendation 15.13

1. The Department of Health, in developing a professional conduct policy (Recommendation 20.2), should ensure:

    a. there is a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in health services

    b. the professional conduct policy for health services, in addition to the matters set out in Recommendation 20.2

        i. specifies expectations outlined in other relevant Department of Health policies and procedures

        ii. refers to other professional obligations of registered health practitioners, including those developed by the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency and the National Boards

        iii. reflects the specific risks that arise in health services, particularly the sometimes intimate and invasive nature of health services, and the significant trust and power afforded by patients and the broader community to those providing health services

    c. the professional conduct policy for health services spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors

    d. the Department uses appropriate mechanisms to ensure compliance by volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors with the professional conduct policy for health services.

2. The professional conduct policy for health services should be reinforced through professional development requirements (Recommendation 15.15).

Recommendation 15.14

The Department of Health's chaperone (or Accompanying Person/Observer) policy should be updated to require the presence of an extra staff member during examinations or episodes of care where no family member or carer can be present.

Professional development for health service staff

Recommendation 15.15

1. The Department of Health should identify minimum requirements for professional development on child safety for different levels of staff, including staff, volunteers and contractors, as well as leadership. Professional development should cover, at a minimum:
    a. understanding child sexual abuse (including grooming and boundary breaches)
    b. the requirements and expectations of a child safe organisation
    c. mandatory and voluntary reporting obligations, including the role and function of Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 and the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency
    d. relevant child safeguarding policies and procedures.
2. The Department should have appropriate processes in place to ensure leaders have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability requirements to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation.
3. The Department should develop outcomes-based measures of the effectiveness of child safety professional development initiatives for all categories of staff, volunteers, and contractors, including management, leadership, human resources, and professional and non-professional staff.
4. These outcomes-based measures should be reviewed annually and the results used to inform further professional development initiatives and leadership selection.

Recommendation 15.16

1. The Department of Health should have a specific policy on responding to complaints and concerns about staff conduct. The policy should establish a complaints escalation, management and investigation process that is informed by the following principles:

    a. Complaints processes should be well-understood, trusted and accessible to staff, patients and others.

    b. Complaints processes should have clear escalation processes, internal and external reporting requirements within specific timeframes, and address immediate risks to children's safety.

    c. There should be appropriate scrutiny and oversight of how complaints about child safety are escalated to senior staff, managed and recorded.

    d. Complaints about child safety should be recorded comprehensively and stored securely in incident management (such as the Safety Reporting and Learning System) and human resources systems.

    e. Complaints about unprofessional conduct and boundary breaches with child patients should be recognised as indicating a patient safety issue and treated as serious.

    f. Complaints data should support decision making and inform system improvements.

    g. There should be appropriate communication and supports provided to those making complaints or affected by the alleged conduct, including through open disclosure processes (Recommendation 15.18).

2. The policy should include a diagram showing the complaints escalation, management and investigation pathways for child safety concerns and associated governance and review arrangements. It should also outline the roles and responsibilities of the various bodies involved in responding to child safety concerns.

3. This policy and diagram should be available to health service users and the public.

Recommendation 15.17

1. The Department of Health should establish a separate Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate or partner with the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate (Recommendation 6.6) to respond to allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct by staff, breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct and professional conduct policies, and reportable conduct (as defined by the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023) in health services.
2. If the Department partners with the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, it should ensure the directorate has access to specialised advice to inform investigations against health services staff, particularly where allegations have arisen in the context of provision of health care.
3. If the Department establishes a new Health Services Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, it should mirror the functions and manner of operation reflected in the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, including having three distinct roles and skill sets covering incident response management, investigations, and misconduct and disciplinary advice.

Recommendation 15.18

The Department of Health should ensure open disclosure processes for patients who experience child sexual abuse in health services and their families and carers that:

a. create a safe, trauma-informed pathway for victim-survivors, or others affected by an event, to receive clear and personalised information in response to their questions or concerns

b. facilitate appropriate notifications including to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 and the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency

c. make appropriate supports available to affected people, including victim-survivors, their immediate family and carers, where abuse is connected to the Department's health services, including warm referrals, with the person's consent, to trained and experienced child sexual abuse counsellors.

Recommendation 15.19

The Department of Health should develop and implement a critical incident response plan for human-caused traumatic events where numerous staff and patients are affected, including serious child-related incidents. The response plan should:

a. identify who is responsible for leading the response to a critical incident and set out the applicable reporting arrangements

b. identify the steps to responding to a human-caused traumatic event (including incidents relating to child safety)

c. provide for external assistance from experts with training and expertise in crisis management

d. be based on best practice responses to traumatic events

e. provide for early communication of information about the event

f. provide psychological first aid to affected people

g. provide extra support from skilled psychologists on an 'as needed' basis to affected people

h. provide for information about other support services that can assist affected people

i. facilitate communication and support among affected people as a means of social support

j. provide for critical incident debriefing run by a neutral and trained expert where appropriate

k. provide for a review of the Department's response to the critical incident

l. provide for an evaluation of any actions to be implemented as part of the Department's response to the critical incident

m. provide for any lessons from a review or an evaluation of the Department's response to the critical incident, to be shared with the Secretaries Board to further inform responses to critical incidents across the whole of government.

Restoring trust

Recommendation 15.20

1. The Department of Health, Launceston General Hospital and Tasmania Police should make clear that they will continue to assist, on an ongoing basis, known and as yet unknown victim-survivors of child sexual abuse by James Griffin related to the hospital and should nominate a contact person for people who have enquiries.
2. Assistance should include:
    a. outlining what is known about Mr Griffin's offending at the hospital
    b. taking steps to ascertain whether a person is or may be a victim-survivor of Mr Griffin's offending or clearly explaining why this cannot be done.
3. The Department and Launceston General Hospital's communications with known and as yet unknown victim-survivors of Mr Griffin and their families and carers and the broader community should be informed by the principles of open disclosure.
4. Launceston General Hospital should ensure victim-survivors and their families and carers who do not receive individual open disclosure (Recommendation 15.18) still receive a warm referral to trained child sexual abuse counsellors if desired.

Oversight

Recommendation 15.21

The Tasmanian Government should ensure a review of the Health Complaints Act 1995 is completed and considers the role of the Health Complaints Commissioner in relation to:

a. addressing systemic issues within health services related to child safety
b. incorporating the administration, monitoring and oversight of the Code of Conduct for Unregistered Health Care Workers
c. coordinating with the role of the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6), and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023.

Chapter 16 – Criminal justice responses

Police responses

Recommendation 16.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should fund and establish specialist units in Tasmania Police, based on the Victorian Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation Teams model, to investigate child sexual abuse and to be based in three locations (Hobart, Launceston and the North West).
2. The specialist police units should:
    a. specialise in the investigation of child sexual abuse, including historical child sexual abuse (and potentially adult sexual assault) but not undertake domestic and family violence work unless it is directly connected to child sexual abuse (or adult sexual assault)
    b. be staffed by police officers who have undertaken specialised professional development (Recommendation 16.3) and members who have trauma-informed training (Recommendation 19.2)
    c. partner with other agencies and support services involved in responding to child sexual abuse to create multidisciplinary teams. These teams do not have to be co-located, although this may be appropriate in some areas
    d. have access to a 'soft' interview room, ideally offsite from police stations and potentially in multidisciplinary centres
    e. be directed to perform other policing duties only in exceptional circumstances and not as part of a unit's usual roster
    f. support the wellbeing of police officers and members working in the specialist unit
    g. develop and implement strategies to engage and build trust with marginalised communities, particularly Aboriginal people and people with criminal histories (Recommendation 16.2).
3. Tasmania Police should measure and report on victim-survivor satisfaction with the operation of the specialist units within two years of establishment and regularly thereafter.

Recommendation 16.2

1. Tasmania Police should establish ways for people to report child sexual abuse online.
2. The Department of Justice and the Department for Education, Children and Young People should review their internal processes to make it easier for people in prison and youth detention to report abuse to the police or other bodies, including online or by phone hotline, and ensure appropriate confidentiality of reports.
3. Specialist police units (Recommendation 16.1) should develop a strategy to engage with 'priority communities', by implementing measures to develop relationships, build trust and encourage reporting of child sexual abuse, and to assist prevention and 'disruptive' policing (Recommendations 9.29 and 9.30).
4. Priority communities include:
    a. Aboriginal communities
    b. people who are or were in prison or youth detention
    c. people who are or were in out of home care (or youth support services).

Recommendation 16.3

Tasmania Police should review its professional development on child sexual abuse to ensure:

a. all police are trained in
    i. the dynamics of sexual abuse and the concept of grooming, and perpetrators' use of these to facilitate a crime
    ii. myths and misconceptions about child sexual abuse and disclosure
    iii. responding to child and adult victim-survivors sensitively and with an understanding of trauma
b. child sexual abuse specialist detectives are trained in
    i. approaches to interviewing child and adult victim-survivors and vulnerable witnesses, including the Whole Story framework (or similar specialist interviewer training)

ii. understanding the vulnerability of specific groups of children (such as those in out of home care and youth detention) and common myths about these children

c. all police receive scheduled and regular refresher training and ongoing professional development.

Recommendation 16.4

1. Tasmania Police should develop and implement quality audit and assurance processes for investigating child sexual abuse offences, including random file sampling.
2. File sampling should:
   a. capture data on how well police are complying with procedures for investigating child sexual abuse offences, including the requirements set out in the Initial Investigation and Notification of Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines
   b. assess whether
      i. contact was made with the person reporting child sexual abuse
      ii. every effort was made to establish the victim's identity and to assess and investigate the report, where appropriate
      iii. a thorough examination of intelligence on Tasmania Police databases was conducted
      iv. cross-agency and interstate requests for information checks were made to determine whether any intelligence held outside Tasmania might assist the investigation
      v. contact details of the investigating officer were provided to the victim, parent, guardian or other support person
      vi. a supervisor confirmed whether the above actions were taken
   c. capture data on the timeliness of investigations
   d. go beyond technical adherence to requirements and assess the overall quality of police investigative responses and outcomes for victim-survivors, including identifying any opportunities for improvement.

Recommendation 16.5

Tasmania Police should:

a. review the adequacy and availability of equipment used to record evidence by video or audio, and ensure this equipment is available in all police facilities where victim statements relating to child sexual abuse are taken

b. ensure specialist child sexual abuse police officers receive training on the use of recording equipment and refresher training if they have not used the equipment for six months or more.

Recommendation 16.6

1. The Department of Health should increase the availability of forensic medical examination services for child victim-survivors of sexual abuse to ensure all child victim-survivors can access an examination with minimal delay. To achieve this, the Department should:

   a. train existing adult sexual assault forensic medical examination services to examine child victim-survivors

   b. ensure, in areas of Tasmania where no sexual assault forensic medical examination services exist, suitably qualified local health professionals are trained and supported to conduct forensic medical examinations for child sexual abuse.

2. At a minimum, the training should include:

   a. an external, recognised qualification in forensic medical examinations

   b. external recognised training in sexual abuse care for children.

Recommendation 16.7

Tasmania Police should:

a. establish a clear, publicly accessible process for reporting and responding to allegations of child sexual abuse against a member of Tasmania Police, including the ability to report to an entity independent of police such as the Integrity Commission

b. expand the domestic violence review panel to cover child sexual abuse and ensure independence in investigations when a member is alleged to have been involved in child sexual abuse.

Prosecutions

Recommendation 16.8

1. The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions should provide ongoing professional development to staff on child sexual abuse, including:
    a. specialist training on trauma-informed practice
    b. training on issues that children and adult victim-survivors may face in giving evidence and approaches that can be taken to make the process trauma-informed, including the role of witness intermediaries
    c. training on the laws of evidence and procedure that apply in child sexual abuse cases
    d. training on the nature, causes and methods of child sexual abuse and grooming, including addressing common myths about child sexual abuse.
2. The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions should also explore opportunities with Tasmania Legal Aid and the Law Society of Tasmania for joint training on the dynamics of child sexual abuse and trauma-informed practice.

Offences, evidence and procedure

Recommendation 16.9

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the following provisions in the Criminal Code Act 1924:

a. section 125A to remove all language referring to 'maintaining a sexual relationship with a young person' and replace it with words referring to the 'persistent sexual abuse of a child or young person'
b. section 124A (the position of authority offence) to cover indecent acts with or directed at a child or young person under the age of 18 by a person in a position of authority in relation to that child or young person. The offence should
    i. not apply where the person accused of the offending is under the age of 18 at the time of the offence
    ii. qualify as an unlawful sexual act for the purposes of the offence of 'persistent sexual abuse of a child or young person' under section 125A of the Criminal Code Act 1924

c. section 125E (the offence of failure by a person in authority to protect a child from a sexual offence) to ensure the offence does not apply to a person who was under the age of 18 at the time of the offence.

Recommendation 16.10

1. The Tasmanian Government should extend the Witness Intermediary Scheme to include children who are under investigation for, or who have been charged with, sexual offences, and fund it to do so.
2. The Tasmanian Government should consider whether legislation should be enacted requiring police to use witness intermediaries in police interviews of children and young people and adults with communication needs (including defendants), relating to sexual offences.

Recommendation 16.11

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act 2001 to simplify the legislation to clarify when special measures are available to adults who are complainants in trials relating to child sexual abuse and allow them to:
   a. have a support person present when they give evidence in court
   b. give their evidence at a special hearing before the trial unless the judge considers that this would be contrary to the interests of justice, regardless of whether the accused consents
   c. be shielded from the view of the accused person by a screen or partition if they choose to give evidence in court.
2. The Tasmanian Government should ensure courts, public defence counsel (such as Tasmania Legal Aid) and the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions are appropriately funded to carry out this recommendation.

Recommendation 16.12

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. update the audiovisual equipment available to the Supreme and Magistrates Courts

b. discuss with the Supreme and Magistrates Courts ongoing training for relevant staff on using audiovisual equipment.

Recommendation 16.13

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to extend the principles of section 13B of the Family Violence Act 2004 to sexual assault matters, including child sexual abuse. This will ensure that where a person is acquitted in the Magistrates Court because the prosecution has informed the Court it will not be offering any evidence in support of the charge, the acquittal does not prevent admitting evidence of relationship, tendency or coincidence evidence in a later related matter.

Recommendation 16.14

The Tasmanian Government should, in similar terms to sections 199, 204 and 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic), amend the Criminal Code Act 1924 (including section 361A) to:

a. allow pre-trial rulings or orders to be made before the accused person has entered a plea

b. provide that such pre-trial rulings or orders are binding on a trial judge, even where a different judge made the order, unless the trial judge considers that would not be in the interests of justice

c. provide that such pre-trial rulings or orders apply at a new trial unless this would be inconsistent with any order or decision made on an appeal or would not be in the interests of justice.

Recommendation 16.15

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to:

a. require trial judges to explain to juries the difficulties child witnesses often face in giving evidence in court, and the distinctive ways in which they give evidence, in cases where the reliability or credibility of a child witness is likely to be in issue, in similar terms to section 44N of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (Vic)

b. provide that in jury trials of a person accused of a child sexual abuse offence, if a party so requests, the judge must, unless the judge considers there are good reasons for not doing so, direct the jury that i. children who have been subjected to child sexual abuse respond in a variety of ways and some children who have been abused do not avoid the alleged perpetrator

    ii. disclosure of abuse may occur over time and not all on one occasion

c. prohibit, in similar terms to section 294AA of the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW), a judge in a trial of a person indicted for sexual offences against a child from

    i. warning a jury against convicting the accused person solely because the only evidence is the evidence of the complainant

    ii. directing the jury about the danger of conviction in the absence of corroboration

d. amend the Evidence Act 2001, in similar terms to section 52 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (Vic), to require a trial judge who considers that delay in complaining is likely to be raised in a trial for a child sexual abuse offence to inform the jury that i. people react differently to sexual abuse and there is no typical, proper or normal response to a sexual offence

    ii. some people may complain immediately to the first person they see, while others may not complain for some time, and others may never make a complaint

    iii. it is common for a person to delay making a complaint of sexual abuse, particularly if it occurred when they were a child

    iv. there may be good reasons why a person may not complain, or may delay complaining about sexual abuse

e. amend the Evidence Act 2001 to provide that the warnings and directions can be

   i. given by a judge to the jury at the earliest opportunity, such as before the evidence is called or as soon as practicable after it is presented in the trial

   ii. repeated by the judge at any time during the trial

   iii. given by the judge's own motion, or if requested by either party before the trial or at any time during the trial.

Recommendation 16.16

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. fund the Supreme Court to support the professional development of judicial officers on the dynamics of child sexual abuse and trauma-informed practice

b. consider introducing legislation dealing with the responsibility of the Chief Justice to direct the professional development and continuing education and training of judicial officers, in similar terms to section 28A of the Supreme Court Act 1986 (Vic).

After a conviction

Recommendation 16.17

The Tasmanian Government should ensure preventive programs for adults who are at risk of abusing, or have abused, children are available beyond the custodial setting. These programs should be:

a. properly funded

b. align with the practice guidelines issued by the Association for the Treatment and Prevention of Sexual Abusers

c. include a monitoring and evaluation process.

The language of consent

Recommendation 16.18

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend section 11A of the Sentencing Act 1997 to provide that, in determining the appropriate sentence for an offender convicted of a child sexual abuse offence, the acquiescence or apparent consent of the victim is not a mitigating circumstance.
2. The Director of Public Prosecutions should amend its Prosecution Policy and Guidelines to make it clear that in child sexual abuse matters where consent is not an element of the offence, then the language of consent should not be used by prosecutors.
3. Professional education for judicial officers (Recommendation 16.16) and prosecutors (Recommendation 16.8) should include challenging the myths and misconceptions about consent in relation to child sexual abuse.

Responses to children and young people displaying harmful sexual behaviours

Recommendation 16.19

We encourage the courts to consider using their powers to direct young people engaging in harmful sexual behaviours who are charged with a criminal offence to specialist therapeutic services.

Monitoring and evaluation

Recommendation 16.20

1. The Department of Justice should:
    a. prioritise collecting and publishing key data about institutional child sexual abuse, including
        i. the number of reports of child sexual abuse made to police
        ii. police, prosecution and court outcomes of reports, and reasons for outcomes, including the reasons why cases did not proceed

iii. the time between reporting, charging or a decision not to progress, and prosecution

iv. whether the abuse took place in an institutional setting

v. basic demographics of victim-survivors and alleged perpetrators (for example, age, gender and Aboriginal status)

vi. trends in relation to particular groups, including Aboriginal people

b. support the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions to improve its data collection for child sexual abuse cases so it can effectively monitor

i. the cases on which police seek advice, that proceed to court and that are discontinued, including the reasons for discontinuance

ii. the number, type and success rate of appeals in child sexual abuse matters

c. cause periodic surveys to be conducted and published with victim-survivors of child sexual abuse on their experience and satisfaction with the criminal justice system, including on whether the victim-survivor

i. felt listened to

ii. felt believed

iii. understood the process

iv. was kept informed of the progress of the case.

2. The Sentencing Advisory Council should periodically review trends in sentencing for child sexual abuse offences in Tasmania and compare them with sentencing outcomes for equivalent offences in other Australian jurisdictions.

Chapter 17 – Redress, civil litigation and support

The National Redress Scheme

Recommendation 17.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions have access to a redress scheme irrespective of when the abuse occurred, when they were born or whether they have committed a serious offence.
2. To achieve this outcome, the Tasmanian Government should advocate at a national level for:
    a. the National Redress Scheme to apply to child sexual abuse in institutions experienced on or after 1 July 2018, with no specified closing date for applications
    b. changes to the National Redress Scheme that will allow access to redress for people sentenced to imprisonment for five years or longer for a state, territory, federal or foreign country offence.
3. If the National Redress Scheme is not extended, the Tasmanian Government should itself establish a redress scheme for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions, with no specified closing date for applications to be made.
4. The design and operation of any Tasmanian redress scheme should:
    a. ensure delays are minimised and that applications for redress are handled in a sensitive and trauma-informed manner
    b. incorporate relevant recommendations made in the Second Year Review of the National Redress Scheme
    c. make it available to people sentenced to imprisonment for five years or longer for a state, territory, federal or foreign country offence
    d. allow information to be shared to reduce current risk to children wherever possible, and to facilitate disciplinary action and reporting to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 (Recommendation 12.5).

Civil litigation

Recommendation 17.2

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure all lawyers who act for the Tasmanian Government in civil claims relating to child sexual abuse receive regular professional development on:
    a. the nature and effects of child sexual abuse, including institutional child sexual abuse, perpetrator tactics and impacts on victim-survivors
    b. how to consider these effects when victim-survivors are involved in civil litigation processes.
2. The Solicitor-General or the new State Litigation Office should issue and ensure compliance with guidelines relating to:
    a. trauma-informed management of settlement processes and conferences in child sexual abuse cases
    b. whether and when legal professional privilege should be claimed by the Tasmanian Government in relation to medical reports or expert evidence, adopting the principle that generally legal professional privilege should be waived
    c. making apologies before reaching a final settlement.

Recommendation 17.3

1. The Attorney-General should issue guidelines to clarify the respective roles of the Solicitor-General and the new State Litigation Office, departmental secretaries and other agency heads where Tasmanian government agencies are engaged in the conduct and settlement of civil litigation arising from allegations of child sexual abuse.
2. The Treasurer's Instruction relating to obtaining external legal advice should be amended to:
    a. make it consistent with the Attorney-General's guidelines on civil litigation arising from allegations of child sexual abuse
    b. specify the circumstances in which departmental secretaries and other agency heads should be able to seek external legal advice on matters related to child sexual abuse.

Apologies

Recommendation 17.4

The Tasmanian Government should ensure individual victim-survivors of child sexual abuse who request an apology receive one. Proactive steps should also be taken to offer an apology to victim-survivors who make contact in relation to their abuse. The apology should include:

a. the opportunity to meet with a senior institutional representative (preferably the Secretary) and receive an acknowledgment of the abuse and its impact

b. information about the victim-survivor's time in the institution

c. information about what steps the institution has taken or will take to protect against further sexual abuse of children, if asked.

Recommendation 17.5

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Civil Liability Act 2002 to ensure that an apology in relation to child sexual abuse can be made without amounting to an admission of liability.

Support for victims of crime

Recommendation 17.6

The Department of Justice should ensure that:

a. in relation to claims for financial assistance under the Victims of Crime Assistance Scheme, delays are minimised and applications for compensation are handled in a sensitive and trauma-informed manner

b. staff in Victims Support Services receive regular professional development on the effects of child sexual abuse and how to respond to victim-survivors in a trauma-informed manner

c. people being considered for appointment as Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners are required to take part in professional development on the effects of child sexual abuse and how to respond to victim-survivors in a trauma-informed manner before their appointment and regularly thereafter.

Recommendation 17.7

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1976 to create a right of review on the merits by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal in relation to a decision of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Commissioners:

a. to refuse financial assistance to a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse

b. about the amount of financial assistance to which a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse is entitled.

Access to information and records

Recommendation 17.8

1. The Tasmanian Government should review and reform the operation of the Right to Information Act 2009 and the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 to ensure victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts can obtain information relating to that abuse. This review should focus on what needs to change to ensure:

   a. people's rights to obtain information are observed in practice

   b. this access is as simple, efficient, transparent and trauma-informed as possible.

2. The review should consider reforms to the Right to Information Act 2009 and the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 to:

   a. include an explicit presumption in favour of disclosure in the Right to Information Act 2009 and Personal Information Protection Act 2004

   b. embed the public interest test in specific exemptions in the Right to Information Act 2009, tailored to those exemptions

   c. streamline the interface between the Right to Information Act 2009 and Personal Information Protection Act 2004 to overcome what has, by default, become a two-step process to obtain personal information

   d. require that a personal information custodian under the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 'must provide' rather than 'may provide' personal information upon request from an individual who is the subject of that information, subject to any appropriate exemptions to that requirement

e. include a 'reasonableness' test in the Right to Information Act 2009 as part of the assessment of whether to withhold personal information relating to a person or third party other than the person making the request for information

f. strengthen and streamline internal and external review processes in the Right to Information Act 2009 and Personal Information Protection Act 2004, with a focus on options to enforce decisions of the Ombudsman and to apply for review by the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal

g. provide an automatic fee waiver for right to information applications relating to child sexual abuse made under the Right to Information Act 2009 by victim-survivors or a person acting on their behalf.

3. The Tasmanian Government should consider centralising management of access to information processes in a specialist unit or department, supported by access to information liaison officers located in government departments and agencies.

4. The Tasmanian Government should provide funding to government departments, agencies and the Ombudsman, as the case may be, to:

   a. ensure access to information requests are processed within statutory timeframes

   b. speed up external review of right to information decisions

   c. provide trauma-informed training to the Tasmanian State Service in relation to victim-survivor access to information (Recommendation 19.2).

Chapter 18 – Overseeing child safe organisations

Community-wide prevention strategies

Recommendation 18.1

The Tasmanian Government should continue to advocate for Tasmania to receive the full benefit of Australian Government prevention strategies, including under the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030.

Creating child safe organisations

Recommendation 18.2

All organisations engaging in child-related activities should voluntarily comply with the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (as reflected in Tasmania's Child and Youth Safe Standards) to the greatest extent possible, regardless of whether they are legislatively bound to do so or when their legislative obligations commence.

Recommendation 18.3

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Ombudsman is prescribed as an entity for the purposes of disclosure of information under section 40 of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023.

Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023

Recommendation 18.4

The Tasmanian Government, in implementing the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, should ensure:

a. the functions of the Independent Regulator and Deputy Independent Regulator under the Act are embedded within the new Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6)

b. the Commission is sufficiently resourced to enable it to effectively perform these regulatory functions

c. the Commission has access to government data systems such as those held by Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme to enable systematic and proactive monitoring and that those agencies have access to the Commission's data, where appropriate.

Recommendation 18.5

The Tasmanian Government should ensure its independent three-year review of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 has a particular focus on:

a. whether the Independent Regulator is sufficiently resourced and empowered to perform its functions effectively, and new or additional resourcing, functions and powers are necessary to support compliance

b. how effectively the Independent Regulator is working with other agencies, including the Ombudsman or other oversight bodies, Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, Tasmania Police, professional regulatory bodies and other peak bodies, to support compliance, share information and manage active risks to children and young people

c. how organisations captured by the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme have experienced the new regulatory requirements, and in particular whether they have felt sufficiently supported to comply

d. analysing data emerging from the operation of the schemes, particularly as they relate to complaints and notifications and trends within and across sectors

e. whether the Universal Principle requiring organisations to uphold cultural safety is achieving its intended objective, and whether it should become an additional Child and Youth Safe Standard, mirroring the approach in Victoria

f. whether any further legislative changes are required to ensure appropriate information sharing between the Independent Regulator and other agencies.

Oversight and safeguards supporting a child safe system

Recommendation 18.6

1. The Tasmanian Government should establish a statutory Commission for Children and Young People, which includes the following roles, each appointed for a term of five years:

   a. a Commissioner for Children and Young People

   b. a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People

   c. a Child Advocate (Deputy Commissioner).

2. The Commission for Children and Young People should, in addition to the functions of the current Commissioner for Children and Young People under the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016, have the following functions:

    a. educating relevant entities on the Child and Youth Safe Standards and overseeing and enforcing compliance with those standards as Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023

    b. administering the Reportable Conduct Scheme as Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023

    c. administering the independent community visitor scheme for children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities (Recommendations 9.34 and 12.36)

    d. advocating for individual children in out of home care, youth detention and other residential youth justice facilities

    e. monitoring the operation of the out of home care and youth justice systems and the provision of out of home care and youth justice services to children (Recommendations 9.38 and 12.38)

    f. conducting inquiries into the out of home care and youth justice systems and the services provided to individual children in those systems, including own-motion inquiries (Recommendations 9.38 and 12.38)

    g. making recommendations to government for out of home care and youth justice system improvements

    h. promoting the participation of children in out of home care and youth justice in decision making that affects their lives

    i. upholding and promoting the rights of children in the out of home care and youth justice systems.

3. The Commission for Children and Young People should have all necessary powers to perform its functions.

Recommendation 18.7

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the process for appointing future Commissioners and Deputy Commissioners for Children and Young People adopts the following:

a. future Commissioners and Deputy Commissioners be appointed following an externally advertised merit-based selection process to ensure they have relevant professional qualifications and substantive experience in matters affecting vulnerable children

b. the recruitment process for these roles include a non-partisan adult selection panel with at least one member external to the Tasmanian State Service, and a separate children's selection panel

c. the adult and children's selection panels for the role of Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People have a majority of Aboriginal members

d. before making a recommendation to the Governor for an appointment to the Commission for Children and Young People, the Minister be required to consult with the leader of any political party with at least two members in Parliament.

Recommendation 18.8

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Commission for Children and Young People is separately and directly funded, rather than through the Department for Education, Children and Young People. Any funding arrangements or conditions should be structured to ensure the Commission has power to control its budget and staffing.

Recommendation 18.9

A joint standing committee of the Tasmanian Parliament should oversee the performance and proper execution of functions of the Commission for Children and Young People.

Other oversight and regulatory bodies

Recommendation 18.10

1. The Integrity Commission and Ombudsman should develop a publicly available policy for complaints related to child sexual abuse which explains the circumstances in which complaints may be referred back to the agency that is the subject of the complaint for investigation.
2. The Integrity Commission and Ombudsman should consult the complainant on the intended approach to handling the complaint, including referring the complaint back to the relevant agency.

Recommendation 18.11

The Tasmanian Government should implement Recommendation 11 of the Independent Reviewer's 2016 Report Independent Review of the Integrity Commission Act 2009, which would oblige public authorities to notify the Integrity Commission of any allegations of serious misconduct.

Recommendation 18.12

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation or regulations to provide statutory guidance to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme on the factors to be considered when conducting risk assessments in respect of applications for registration, suspension or cancellation pursuant to the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013.
2. The statutory guidance should provide that (among other things):
    a. the assessment of unacceptable risk is a predictive exercise that is not necessarily capable of empirical proof nor subject to a particular standard of proof such as 'the balance of probabilities'
    b. the assessment of unacceptable risk of harm to a child or children requires determination of two separate questions, without conflation, namely
        i. whether or not an allegation or allegations of previous harm to vulnerable people are proven on the balance of probabilities, and

ii. whether or not an unacceptable risk of harm is demonstrated regardless of whether there is a finding, on the balance of probabilities, that previous harm occurred

c. the Registrar is not limited in the factors they can consider in assessing unacceptable risk, including information that suggests a person's tendency to cause harm, as the ultimate determination of unacceptable risk is a predictive exercise

d. when the Registrar is considering suspending a person's registration, the focus on the prospective risk that a person may pose to children should have a lower evidentiary threshold, noting further assessment will likely occur prior to a decision to cancel registration or otherwise

e. once the Registrar makes a determination that a person poses an unacceptable risk to a child or young person, irrespective of other factors (such as employment or mental health), that person's registration must be refused, suspended or cancelled (as the case may be).

Recommendation 18.13

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 and related statutory instruments to replace the Administrative Appeals Division of the Magistrates Court with the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal as the forum for administrative reviews of decisions under the Act.

2. The Tasmanian Government should:

   a. introduce legislation or regulations to require the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal to support Tribunal members who hear administrative reviews of decisions under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 to have the knowledge, skills, experience and aptitude to deal with each matter, including in relation to child sexual abuse, neglect and family violence

   b. provide sufficient funding to the Tribunal to support members to gain this knowledge, skills, experience and aptitude.

Recommendation 18.14

1. The Commission for Children and Young People, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Integrity Commission and the Ombudsman should work jointly to develop a user-friendly guide for the general public, which describes:
    a. how each of these agencies can assist with complaints and concerns about how organisations respond to child sexual abuse
    b. the process these agencies will adopt in responding to reports, complaints and concerns, including what outcomes these agencies are empowered to achieve
    c. how information provided by a person lodging a report, complaint or concern will be shared and managed
    d. that agencies are committed to a 'no wrong door' approach to complaints, so people are reassured that all reports, complaints and concerns will receive a response from an agency
    e. pathways for raising concerns about the way any of these agencies respond to reports, complaints or concerns.
2. A child and youth-friendly version of the guide should also be developed and should be publicised and distributed widely in schools, out of home care, youth justice and health settings.
3. Both guides should be available on each of the agencies' websites and form part of their child safety community education and engagement activities.
4. While the Commission for Children and Young People should be promoted as the key agency for receiving reports, complaints or concerns relating to conduct towards children, people should be able to raise reports, complaints or concerns with any of these agencies and these agencies should ensure the matter is appropriately referred (the 'no wrong door' approach).

Recommendation 18.15

The Commission for Children and Young People, the Integrity Commission, the Ombudsman and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme should develop a formal memorandum of understanding relating to the management and oversight of reports, complaints and concerns relating to child sexual abuse and information sharing. The memorandum of understanding should:

a. define the roles, responsibilities, functions and limitations of each agency and describe where these overlap or intersect

b. require consultation prior to the initiation of systemic reviews or inquiries where the subject of that inquiry relates to areas of common interest or intersecting functions

c. provide for permissive and enabling information-sharing practices that prioritise the safety and welfare of children for individual matters and ensure each party receives from others de-identified trend data necessary to perform its functions.

Chapter 19 – A coordinated approach

Developing a child sexual abuse reform strategy

Recommendation 19.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should develop a whole of government child sexual abuse reform strategy for preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse, including child sexual abuse in institutions and harmful sexual behaviours. The strategy should:

   a. describe the system that Tasmania seeks to achieve, including the component parts of that system, how Tasmanians will know it is working, and the role of key initiatives, reforms and recommendations in achieving the intended outcomes

   b. be separate from, but complement, the Government's Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan

   c. be informed by the voices of children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse (Recommendation 19.5)

d. include agreed definitions of child sexual abuse, institutional child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours

e. set out guiding principles and objectives to inform preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse

f. identify the agencies, including statutory bodies and non-government organisations, involved in preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse

g. set out processes through which government agencies, statutory bodies and non-government organisations can consult on child sexual abuse reform

h. set out considerations relevant to particular cohorts of children and young people, including Aboriginal children, children with disability, children with mental illness, children who identify as LGBTQIA+ and children from culturally and linguistically diverse communities

i. outline the sources of funding for key initiatives and reforms set out in the strategy

j. outline the governance, monitoring, review and evaluation arrangements for child sexual abuse reform, including that the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, as Chair of the Secretaries Board, is responsible for endorsing, overseeing, coordinating and reporting on the strategy and action plan (Recommendation 19.3).

2. The Tasmanian Government should develop an action plan for the implementation of the child sexual abuse reform strategy. The action plan should:

   a. prioritise all recommendations and reforms for implementation over the short, medium and long term and include expected timeframes for implementing each recommendation

   b. identify the role holders and agencies that have responsibility for implementation of each recommendation and reform

   c. describe the actions to be taken to implement the recommendations and reforms, including any milestones, sequencing and dependencies

   d. identify the status of each recommendation and reform (that is, complete, under way or not commenced) and whether it is progressing on time

   e. be endorsed and overseen by the governance structure identified in the strategy.

3. The child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan should be:
    a. tabled in each House of Parliament
    b. published on a dedicated website
    c. supported by a communication plan that seeks to inform and provide visibility of reform work to stakeholders and the community
    d. periodically reviewed and updated by the Secretaries Board through the Department of Premier and Cabinet.

Trauma-informed government services

Recommendation 19.2

The Tasmanian Government should develop a whole of government approach to professional development on responding to trauma within government and government funded services, as well as statutory bodies, that provide services to children and young people or adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.

Establishing a strong governance structure for child safety

Recommendation 19.3

The Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, as Chair of the Secretaries Board, should be responsible for endorsing, overseeing, coordinating and reporting on the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan.

Recommendation 19.4

1. The Premier should, through their performance agreements, ensure Heads of Agencies are responsible for reforms under the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan within their portfolio responsibilities.
2. Heads of Agencies should ensure relevant State Service executives are also responsible for implementing the strategy and action plan.
3. The statements of duties for relevant departmental staff should refer to their responsibilities in relation to the strategy and action plan.

Recommendation 19.5

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure, in setting out the governance structure for the child sexual abuse reform strategy and action plan, that children and young people and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse are part of this governance structure through:
    a. the Premier's Youth Advisory Council
    b. the establishment of an advisory group comprising adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse, including child sexual abuse in institutions, of different ages, backgrounds, cultures, gender identities and geographical locations and parents of child victim-survivors.
2. The Department of Premier and Cabinet should report on the activities of these advisory groups in its annual report.
3. These advisory groups should:
    a. be guided by clear terms of reference that have been developed in consultation with the advisory groups
    b. have a clear purpose and objectives in terms of how they can contribute across the whole of government
    c. receive secretarial support and be adequately funded and resourced
    d. ensure trauma-informed processes apply in their interactions
    e. support and enable members' attendance by covering the costs of travel and expenses, and providing honorariums where appropriate.

Improving information sharing and cross-agency coordination for child safety

Recommendation 19.6

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 to clarify that, in addition to the duty to report in certain circumstances, any person can notify reportable behaviour to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.

Recommendation 19.7

The Tasmanian Government should review confidentiality and secrecy provisions in Tasmanian legislation, including the Personal Information Protection Act 2004, to identify any specific legislative barriers that hinder the sharing of information necessary to protect the safety and wellbeing of children and young people and remove these barriers.

Recommendation 19.8

1. The Department of Premier and Cabinet should lead the development of child safety information sharing, coordination and response guidelines to support government and government funded agencies and statutory bodies to respond to child safety issues. The guidelines should:
    a. set out the principles which guide information sharing, cross-agency coordination and the roles of different services and entities in responding to child safety issues, and require that staff are trained on these issues
    b. identify a process for nominating a lead agency for cross-agency responses to individual child safety issues and set out the lead agency's role and responsibilities
    c. identify a process for setting out the roles and responsibilities of collaborating agencies in responding to child safety issues
    d. explain child safety information-sharing obligations and responsibilities and how staff can fulfil them
    e. set out an escalation and dispute resolution process to resolve disagreements that may arise across agencies
    f. identify resources and professional development opportunities for staff in relation to responding to child safety issues
    g. be subject to periodic review to ensure they remain up to date and accurately reflect best practice cross-agency information sharing and coordination arrangements.
2. The Tasmanian Government should fund the culture change work required to achieve good information-sharing practices.

Chapter 20 – State Service disciplinary processes

The State Service Code of Conduct

Recommendation 20.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should, by introducing legislation or through other means, ensure that the State Service Code of Conduct includes the following binding obligations:

    a. if a state servant's conduct creates an unacceptable risk to the safety and wellbeing of children or young people accessing government and government funded services, the State Service disciplinary framework should apply, and termination, suspension or sanction should be available (including being able to terminate employment based on a loss of confidence)

    b. in relation to child sexual abuse and related conduct, the requirement that state servants must comply with all applicable Australian law is determined on the basis of a balance of probabilities test and does not require a breach of the law to be determined by a court

    c. where a state servant has contact with a child or young person through their work, and an allegation is made of child sexual abuse or related conduct in relation to that child, this contact is sufficient to establish the conduct occurred 'in the course of employment' or, in the case of section 9(14), has a nexus to employment regardless of whether the conduct complained of occurred outside the workplace or outside working hours.

2. The Tasmanian Government should develop policy documents or guidance on the interpretation of the State Service Code of Conduct explaining (among other things):

    a. how the required connection between a state servant's employment and a child and young person should be interpreted in matters that involve child sexual abuse or related conduct

    b. explain that all provisions of the Code of Conduct should be interpreted to prioritise the protection of children.

Recommendation 20.2

1. All Heads of Agencies whose agencies provide services to children should develop a professional conduct policy for the agency's employees that:
    a. explains what behaviours are unacceptable, including concerning conduct, misconduct or criminal conduct
    b. defines and prohibits child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations, in language consistent with the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023.
2. The professional conduct policy should:
    a. acknowledge the challenge of maintaining professional boundaries in small communities and provide clear identification of, instructions about and examples of how to manage conflicts of interest and professional boundaries in small communities
    b. provide guidance on identifying behaviours indicative of child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations relevant to the particular organisation
    c. outline behaviours that must be reported to authorities, including what behaviours should be reported to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, or other relevant agencies
    d. provide that not following reasonable directions is a breach of professional standards
    e. provide that a failure to report a breach or suspected breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the policy
    f. outline the protections available to individuals who make complaints or reports in good faith
    g. provide and clearly outline response mechanisms for alleged breaches of the policy
    h. specify the penalties for a breach, including that a breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct without needing to assess whether a separate provision of the Code has been breached, and may result in disciplinary action
    i. cross-reference any other policies, procedures and guidelines that support, inform or otherwise relate to the professional conduct policy, for example, complaints handling or child protection policies or other codes of conduct relevant to particular professions.

3. The professional conduct policies should be:
    a. easily accessible to everyone in the agency and communicated by a range of mechanisms
    b. explained to and acknowledged and signed by all employees
    c. accompanied by a mandatory initial training session and regular refresher training, including as part of professional development training
    d. communicated to children and young people and their families through a range of mechanisms, including publication on the agency's public-facing website.
4. The professional conduct policies should include a specific prohibition on romantic or sexual relationships between an employee and a young person where that employee has been in a position of authority, care or protection with the young person for two years after the young person turns 18 or the employee's position of authority, care or protection has ended, whichever is later. This requirement should operate in addition to any other professional and ethical obligations.
5. Heads of Agencies should ensure the professional conduct policy spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors, and other adults where relevant to the specific organisation and use appropriate mechanisms to ensure their compliance with the policy.
6. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation, or other binding mechanisms, to ensure:
    a. a breach of a departmental professional conduct policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, without needing to assess whether a separate provision of the Code has been breached
    b. such a breach does not have to be accompanied by a lawful and reasonable direction for there to be a breach of the Code of Conduct.

Recommendation 20.3

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to ensure that where a finding is made that a State Service employee has committed reportable conduct under the Reportable Conduct Scheme, this also constitutes a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct under section 9 of the State Service Act 2000.

Recommendation 20.4

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to ensure the provisions in the professional conduct policies apply to contractors, sub-contractors, volunteers and other adults who have contact with children.

Employment Directions

Recommendation 20.5

1. The State Service should develop guidance material for conducting preliminary assessments to ensure:
    a. they are conducted quickly (within three to five business days after an allegation is received)
    b. the reasons for any delay are documented, a new timeframe set, and the reasons for the delay and the new timeframe are communicated to the parties if applicable in the circumstances
    c. they are confined to a basic gathering of information and do not require evidence of wrongdoing
    d. they do not assess whether the alleged conduct occurred in the course of the employee's State Service employment.
2. Victim-survivors and child witnesses should not normally be interviewed at the preliminary assessment stage to avoid them being interviewed more than once or being interviewed by a person without special skills. If it is necessary to interview a child or young person at this stage, then this should be done in line with clause 7.3 of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct. Any such interview should be conducted by individuals who have been trained in child development, child sexual abuse (including taking a Whole Story approach), and trauma-related behaviours.
3. Any engagement with a child or young person during the preliminary assessment stage should be child-centred and trauma-informed.
4. The Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should conduct preliminary assessments in child sexual abuse or related conduct matters.

Recommendation 20.6

The Tasmanian Government should amend Employment Direction No. 4—Suspension to:

a. specify that in matters involving complaints or concerns about child sexual abuse or related conduct of an employee, they may be suspended immediately

b. clarify, to avoid any doubt, that suspension can occur before the start of any disciplinary processes, including preliminary assessments

c. exclude, in matters involving complaints or concerns of child sexual abuse or related conduct, the requirement that the Head of Agency must have a reasonable belief that it is in the public interest to suspend the employee

d. include the safety of children and young people among the matters a Head of Agency must take into account when deciding whether to suspend an employee.

Recommendation 20.7

The Tasmanian Government should ensure investigations into misconduct in relation to child sexual abuse or related conduct by State Service employees of the Department for Education, Children and Young People and the Department of Health under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct are conducted by the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate.

Recommendation 20.8

The Tasmanian Government should amend Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, as it relates to child sexual abuse or related conduct, to:

a. ensure people making a complaint and children or young people who have been abused have the right to

    i. reply to any factual matters put forward by the alleged abuser

    ii. know the outcome of an investigation

    iii. seek a review of decisions in an appropriate forum

b. clarify timeframes for carrying out investigations, set out the process for seeking an extension of time for an investigation and the considerations involved, and require the granting of, and reasons for, an extension of time be communicated to the parties affected

c. provide that all matters of concern relevant to an employee's conduct with a child or young person pertaining to child sexual abuse or related conduct be treated as potential serious misconduct

d. note the importance, in circumstances where it is appropriate to summarily dismiss an employee for misconduct, of conducting an investigation to identify children who have been harmed and any systemic problems that need to be addressed

e. ensure investigations are conducted by people who have been trained in child development, child sexual abuse (including taking a Whole Story approach) and trauma-related behaviours.

Recommendation 20.9

The Tasmanian Government should maintain a central cross-government register of misconduct concerning complaints and concerns about child sexual abuse and related conduct. This register should contain records of substantiated and unsubstantiated matters, including those that did not proceed to investigation.

Recommendation 20.10

1. The Tasmanian Government should take measures to ensure that misconduct investigations under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct in relation to complaints and concerns of child sexual abuse are able to take into account prior substantiated, untested and unsubstantiated complaints, allegations and disciplinary action, in addition to the immediately alleged misconduct.

2. The Tasmanian Government should take measures to ensure that prior allegations (including unsubstantiated allegations) should be considered at various stages of the disciplinary process, including in determining:

a. the process to be used to deal with new allegations

b. whether the conduct occurred on the balance of probabilities, with previous substantiated allegations being given more weight than unsubstantiated allegations

c. if misconduct has occurred

d. the sanction to be applied.

Recommendation 20.11

1. The Head of the State Service should monitor and publicly report annually on the management of misconduct matters related to child sexual abuse or related conduct.

2. Heads of Agencies should report quarterly to the Head of the State Service on all misconduct matters related to child sexual abuse or related conduct, substantiated and unsubstantiated.

Recommendation 20.12

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend Employment Direction No. 6—Inability to provide for:

a. a simplified process that applies to matters where the employee no longer has an essential employment requirement (for example, no registration under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013)

b. powers to immediately terminate a person's employment if the employee no longer meets an employment requirement for working with children or young people

c. any interview with a child or young person in line with Employment Direction No. 6—Inability to be subject to the same considerations as should apply under clause 7.3 of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct (Recommendation 20.8).

Recommendation 20.13

1. The Head of the State Service should issue guidance on State Service disciplinary processes that contains key principles and procedures to be followed. This guidance should include information on:
    a. the steps involved in the process of dealing with disciplinary matters
    b. maintaining confidentiality
    c. setting timeframes for investigations and communicating timeframes to the parties
    d. preliminary assessments
    e. employee suspensions, in particular where matters are alleged to involve child sexual abuse
    f. considerations when interviewing children
    g. an employee's inability to perform a role due to the loss of employment requirements
    h. the rights of an employee and any complainant.
2. This guidance should be developed in line with relevant child safety considerations, relevant recommendations of this Commission of Inquiry and the Integrity Commission's Guide to Managing Misconduct in the Tasmanian Public Sector.

Cultural change

Recommendation 20.14

The Tasmanian Government should allocate funding for initiatives aimed at cultural change and awareness raising to promote a shared understanding and application of disciplinary processes across the State Service in a manner that ensures the safety and wellbeing of children at risk of child sexual abuse or related conduct.

Role of the Tasmanian Industrial Commission

Recommendation 20.15

The Government should fund the Tasmanian Industrial Commission to enable its members to attend training on child sexual abuse either locally or through any relevant interstate program or training, such as the programs offered by the Judicial College of Victoria.

Chapter 21 – Therapeutic services

Improving the therapeutic service system

Recommendation 21.1

1. The Department of Premier and Cabinet should lead, coordinate and fund a therapeutic service system for child and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children who have experienced or displayed harmful sexual behaviours.
2. The Department should ensure the therapeutic service system:
    a. addresses service gaps and provides coordination of services, appropriate coverage and equitable access to quality services
    b. is easily understood and accessible to the public, state servants and other mainstream service providers.
3. The Department, in leading this work, should consult with:
    a. any relevant government departments, including the Department for Education, Children and Young People, the Department of Health and Tasmania Police
    b. sexual assault and abuse counselling services
    c. the Premier's Youth Advisory Council and the adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group (Recommendation 19.5)
    d. the peak body for the sexual assault service system (Recommendation 21.3).
4. The Tasmanian Government should ensure funding agreements with non-government specialist services include appropriate governance requirements, sexual abuse service standards, service evaluation and child safe accreditation.

Recommendation 21.2

1. The Tasmanian Government should conduct an independent process and outcomes evaluation for the pilot multidisciplinary Arch centres and any future centres after three years of operation to inform the Government of any systems improvements that could be made to the centres and whether they have resulted in improvements in client outcomes. The evaluation should incorporate:
    a. an evaluation and data outcomes framework established during the first year that includes required baseline and outcomes data for clients receiving services through the Arch centres, and considers how Arch centre outcomes can be compared with the outcomes of cases that have not received an Arch centre response
    b. the collection of data in line with the data outcomes framework in the first year
    c. the storing and retention of data in a format that can be provided to the independent evaluators.
2. The evaluation and data outcomes framework should include outcome measures for adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children who have experienced or displayed harmful sexual behaviours.
3. The Tasmanian Government should ensure multidisciplinary centres are not the sole response to the therapeutic needs of adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse.

Recommendation 21.3

1. The Tasmanian Government should establish a peak body for the sexual assault service system, including therapeutic interventions for children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours, to:
    a. ensure the needs of adult and child victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and children who have experienced or displayed harmful sexual behaviours are met by the sexual assault service system
    b. represent sexual assault service providers in a coordinated way
    c. share evidence and experience
    d. develop or identify practice standards for sexual assault services and interventions for child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours

e. coordinate service delivery for victim-survivors

f. advocate for improvements in the sexual assault service system.

2. This peak body for the sexual assault service system should be distinct from, but work in cooperation with, a family violence peak body.

Recommendation 21.4

1. The Tasmanian Government should increase the funding for free or low-cost sexual assault counselling services to:

   a. reduce waiting times to no longer than four weeks for victim-survivors, regardless of where they live in Tasmania

   b. enable fortnightly access to sexual assault counselling in Ashley Youth Detention Centre

   c. assist peer support groups.

2. The Department of Premier and Cabinet should adopt strategies to increase the number of professionals with skills to provide therapeutic responses to abuse-related trauma to address the challenge in attracting and retaining sufficient suitably qualified staff to fill vacancies and meet the need for therapeutic responses to child sexual abuse.

Recommendation 21.5

The Tasmanian Government should increase the capacity of the Victims of Crime Service by:

   a. increasing the number of counsellors available in each of the Victims of Crime Service offices to at least three in southern Tasmania, two in northern Tasmania and two in the North West

   b. promoting the availability of the Victims of Crime Service counselling service to victim-survivors of sexual assault.

Recommendation 21.6

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure that the needs of particular groups of victim-survivors are met by the therapeutic service system and related contracting of services, including the needs of:
    a. children who are victim-survivors or have displayed harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 21.8)
    b. victim-survivors with disability or mental illness
    c. victim-survivors who identify as LGBTQIA+
    d. male victim-survivors
    e. victim-survivors who are from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.
2. The Tasmanian Government should consult on the therapeutic service system with relevant stakeholder groups, including the Interim Disability Commissioner, community groups and representative bodies.

Recommendation 21.7

The Tasmanian Government should improve healing services for Aboriginal victim-survivors and their families and communities by:

a. fully resourcing and supporting recognised Aboriginal organisations across the state to design, develop and deliver Aboriginal-led healing approaches targeted to victim-survivors of child sexual abuse
b. ensuring Aboriginal representation on the boards of management or in the executive structures of sexual assault services.

Strengthening services for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours

Recommendation 21.8

1. The Tasmanian Government, in collaboration with key stakeholders, should develop a statewide framework and plan for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. The framework should:

a. agree on a common definition and understanding of harmful sexual behaviours, including adopting a recognised, contemporary continuum of sexual behaviours from 'developmentally expected' to 'harmful'

b. use an evidence-informed framework for understanding, preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours

c. clarify the roles and responsibilities of the various agencies and departments involved in preventing and responding to the full continuum of harmful sexual behaviours, including programs delivered by non-government providers

d. meet the needs of particular groups of children (Recommendation 21.6)

e. include structures to support ongoing engagement with emerging evidence regarding harmful sexual behaviours

f. include an evaluation framework.

2. The Tasmanian Government should ensure the therapeutic service system for children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours:

   a. provides sufficient therapeutic services that can be accessed in a timely manner

   b. ensures timely access to therapeutic services for all children who need them, regardless of their age, identity or location in the state (including in youth detention)

   c. ensures specialist interventions for children with disability

   d. ensures all providers of therapeutic interventions for harmful sexual behaviours have Aboriginal representation in their governance structure.

3. The Tasmanian Government should provide ongoing and increased funding for specialist therapeutic interventions for harmful sexual behaviours that:

   a. ensures children who have displayed abusive or violent harmful sexual behaviours and their families need not wait more than two weeks for support when therapeutic treatment is required

   b. provides an advisory service for child-facing organisations, such as independent schools, childcare, disability and at-risk youth services and Tasmania Police (this service is not intended for the Department for Education, Children and Young People, which will have access to an internal Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28))

   c. contributes to the statewide plan for preventing harmful sexual behaviours and its agencies' responses to children who have displayed such behaviours.

Recommendation 21.9

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 and the Youth Justice Act 1997 to:

a. give the Magistrates Court explicit power to order that a child who has displayed harmful sexual behaviours (and their family) engage in a therapeutic intervention for harmful sexual behaviours

b. ensure the Magistrates Court has the power to divert from the criminal justice system a child who has been charged with a criminal offence and who has engaged in harmful sexual behaviours, by adjourning the criminal proceeding to enable the child to engage in a therapeutic intervention, and discharging the child where the intervention has been completed successfully.

Recommendation 21.10

Tasmania Police and the Department for Education, Children and Young People should update the Keeping Children Safe Handbook to reflect the Tasmanian Government's statewide framework and plan for addressing harmful sexual behaviours, including by:

a. modifying the language used when discussing children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours to align with the definitions developed through the National Office of Child Safety

b. clarifying the roles and responsibilities of the two agencies in responding to incidents involving harmful sexual behaviours, including the conditions under which each agency will lead the response

c. clarifying the involvement of specialist therapeutic services in responses to incidents.

Chapter 22 – Monitoring reforms

Recommendation 22.1

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to establish and fund an independent Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor to:
    a. monitor and report to Parliament annually on the implementation of
        i. the recommendations of this Commission of Inquiry
        ii. any recommendations of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse that were accepted by the Tasmanian Government and have not been implemented
        iii. the recommendations of the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse
    b. undertake independent evaluations of the effectiveness of the measures and actions taken in response to the recommendations identified above, especially the impact on the safety and wellbeing of children in government and government funded institutions and victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts.
2. Independent evaluations should enable assessment of change over time and involve:
    a. identifying an evaluation framework and baseline data requirements within the first year of the appointment of the Implementation Monitor
    b. commencing collection of data identified in the evaluation framework as soon as possible after the evaluation framework has been developed
    c. assessing the change against the evaluation framework at five- and ten-year intervals following the tabling of this report
    d. making independent evaluations publicly available.
3. The Tasmanian Government should protect the independence of the Implementation Monitor by:
    a. appointing the Implementation Monitor for a fixed term that cannot be prematurely terminated except in extraordinary circumstances
    b. maintaining the role of the Implementation Monitor until implementation of the recommendations identified above is substantively complete
    c. separately and directly funding the Implementation Monitor, rather than through a line agency.

4. The Tasmanian Government, through the Secretaries Board, should be required to report to:
    a. the Implementation Monitor as requested and in the form required by the Implementation Monitor
    b. the public on its implementation and reform activity through the Department of Premier and Cabinet's annual report.
5. The Implementation Monitor should consult as required with:
    a. the Premier's Youth Advisory Council
    b. the adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse advisory group (Recommendation 19.5)
    c. the peak body for the sexual assault service system (Recommendation 21.3)
    d. the institution-specific advisory groups established within Tasmanian government agencies (Recommendations 9.6, 12.8 and 15.7).

Findings

Chapter 11 – Case studies: Children in youth detention

Case study 1: The nature and extent of abuse in Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Finding—For decades, some children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre experienced systematic harm and abuse

Case study 2: Harmful sexual behaviours

Finding—In August 2019, Henry (a pseudonym) was exposed to an unacceptable risk of harm and experienced preventable harm at Ashley Youth Detention Centre[86]

Finding—In August 2019, Max (a pseudonym) was exposed to an unacceptable risk of harm at Ashley Youth Detention Centre[87]

Finding—The issues briefing to the Secretary about the 7 August 2019 incident regarding Henry minimised the incident and was incomplete, which contributed to a delay in reviewing the incident

Finding—In the weeks following the 7 August 2019 incident, Henry continued to be exposed to risk of harm at Ashley Youth Detention Centre despite widespread knowledge about these risks

Finding—Ray's (a pseudonym) placement in the Franklin Unit at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in December 2019 was inappropriate and exposed him to preventable harm[88]

Finding—The 20 January 2020 issues briefing on concerns regarding Ray at Ashley Youth Detention Centre was inadequate and incomplete

Finding—The response to the Serious Events Review Team review of the 7 August 2019 incident did not follow a clear process for implementation and oversight

Finding—Ashley Youth Detention Centre was not equipped to meet the complex needs of children and young people, resulting in at least one young person being transferred to adult prison

Finding—The Department should have fully investigated allegations that staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre used older detainees to threaten or control younger detainees

Finding—There is a lack of consistent policy and practice at Ashley Youth Detention Centre on unit placements

Finding—Ashley Youth Detention Centre has been aware of harmful sexual behaviours at the Centre and has not taken steps to protect children and young people from these

Case study 3: Isolation in Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Finding—The use of isolation as a form of behaviour management, punishment or cruelty and contrary to the Youth Justice Act has been a regular and persistent practice at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since at least the early 2000s, and the conditions that enabled this practice still exist today

Finding—The Department, and sometimes the Tasmanian Government, have been on notice about potentially unlawful isolation practices at Ashley Youth Detention Centre since at least 2013, and have not taken sufficient action

Finding—There was a consistent failure to include the voices of children and young people detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre in any reviews, investigations or policy changes relating to isolation

Finding—Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the Department failed to support children and young people in detention who were subjected to isolation practices

Case study 4: Use of force in Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Finding—The excessive use of force has been a longstanding method of abusing children and young people by some staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, and the Department and Tasmanian Government have not always responded appropriately

Finding—The Department's responses to excessive use of force do not represent a child-centred approach in line with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child

Case study 5: A response to staff concerns about Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Finding—The Department should not have conducted the Preliminary Assessment and this reflects systemic problems

Finding—The State does not have a clear process for initiating a preliminary assessment when the Secretary has a conflict of interest, including identifying a suitable decision maker

Finding—The delay in the Preliminary Assessment was not acceptable and risked exposing children to ongoing harm

Finding—The Preliminary Assessment was, at least in part, a quasi-investigation into the substantive reports made by Alysha (a pseudonym) about child sexual abuse by staff, due to a lack of clarity about preliminary assessments[89]

Finding—The Preliminary Assessment gave a false impression of the adequacy of the Department's response to reports made by Alysha about child sexual abuse by staff

Case study 6: A complaint by Max (a pseudonym)[90]

Finding—Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the Department did not respond to Max's allegation appropriately

Case study 7: Allegations of child sexual abuse against staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Finding—From at least 2007 the Department should have taken more active steps to use information gained through state redress programs to protect children from the risk of harm

Finding—The State Service disciplinary framework, including its application and interpretation by the Department, did not facilitate an appropriate response to allegations and complaints about Walter (a pseudonym) from the late 1990s to the mid-2010s[91]

Finding—The Department did not take appropriate steps to manage risk, make appropriate notifications and progress investigations against Ira, Lester and Stan (all pseudonyms), which left children and young people at Ashley Youth Detention Centre at potential risk of harm[92]

Finding—The Department failed to adequately consider the safety of detainees and place appropriate weight on public interest considerations in relation to Ira, Lester and Stan until 8 November 2020

Finding—Tasmania Police should improve its responses to allegations of child sexual abuse made by current and former detainees at Ashley Youth Detention Centre

Finding—On occasion, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme appeared to adopt too high an evidentiary threshold in assessing whether staff with allegations against them posed an unacceptable risk to children

Finding—The Department of Justice does not have an appropriate process to ensure information in National Redress Scheme applications is shared in a timely manner to protect children

Chapter 14 – Case studies: Children in health services

In accordance with the Restricted Publication Order of the Commission of Inquiry dated 30 August 2023 and section 10(3) of the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 (Tas), the Governor has omitted Volume 6, Chapter 14, Case Study 1 because the public interest in the disclosure of that part of the report is significantly outweighed by other relevant considerations, namely the right of any person to a fair trial.

Case study 2: Response to complaint about Dr Tim (a pseudonym)[94]

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw failed to comply with Launceston General Hospital's protocol for reporting and management of cases of suspected child abuse

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw failed to comply with his mandatory reporting obligations in a timely manner, which impacted on the ability to gather evidence and future investigations

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed to consider and take active steps to stand down Dr Tim while Zoe Duncan's allegations were investigated

Finding—Launceston General Hospital should have formalised, implemented and enforced a chaperone policy as soon as practicable after Zoe Duncan's May 2001 disclosure and not waited until June 2002

Finding—The procedure used by Child Safety Services to investigate Zoe Duncan's allegations against Dr Tim was inappropriate and not consistent with best practice at the time

Finding—Child Safety Services carried out an inadequate investigation of Zoe Duncan's allegations, which affected subsequent investigations

Finding—Tasmania Police carried out an inadequate investigation of Zoe Duncan's allegations

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed in its overall response and did not offer appropriate support to Zoe Duncan and her family

Case study 3: James Griffin

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed to respond appropriately to Kylee Pearn's disclosure of abuse by James Griffin in 2011 or 2012, leaving children exposed to potential risk for eight years

Finding—Luigino Fratangelo and James Bellinger received a disclosure of child sexual abuse from Kylee Pearn relating to James Griffin in 2011 or 2012

Finding—Launceston General Hospital did not have adequate processes to ensure the meeting with Kylee Pearn was recorded and that record was retained

Finding—Child Safety Services should not have closed its November 2011 case into James Griffin without making further enquiries and ensuring Tasmania Police had all the information it required

Finding—Tasmania Police should have made further enquiries to receive the notifier's identity and reviewed previous intelligence holdings relating to James Griffin when receiving the November 2011 information from Child Safety Services

Finding—Child Safety Services should have taken further steps to assess the risk James Griffin posed in 2013 when concerns were again reported about him

Finding—Tasmania Police should have reviewed all intelligence holdings about James Griffin in 2013 when a report to Child Safety Services was made

Finding—The child safety system in the mid-2010s was not designed to address child sexual abuse in institutional settings

Finding—Tasmania Police failed to act on highly probative evidence regarding James Griffin provided by the Australian Federal Police in 2015

Finding—Launceston General Hospital's response to Will Gordon's 2017 Safety Reporting and Learning System complaint did not comply with the requirements of a State Service Code of Conduct investigation

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed to manage the risks posed by James Griffin

Finding—Launceston General Hospital leadership collectively failed to address a toxic culture in Ward 4K that enabled James Griffin's offending to continue and prevented his conduct being reported

Finding—Launceston General Hospital failed to consider the cumulative effect of complaints about James Griffin

Finding—The response of Launceston General Hospital to complaints about James Griffin suggested it was ultimately not concerned about his conduct

Finding—Leadership at Launceston General Hospital collectively failed to provide appropriate supervision and proactive oversight, which is a systemic problem

Finding—Launceston General Hospital did not have a robust system for managing complaints involving child safety

Finding—Launceston General Hospital had no clear system, procedures or process in place to report complaints about James Griffin to external agencies

Finding—James Griffin had the ability to take and misuse medications from Launceston General Hospital

Finding—The response of Launceston General Hospital to revelations about James Griffin's offending was passive and ineffective

Finding—Leadership at Launceston General Hospital was dysfunctional and this compromised its collective response to revelations about James Griffin

Finding—Launceston General Hospital did not have clear accountabilities for child safety

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw misled the Chief Executive of Launceston General Hospital and the then Secretary of the Department by failing to fully and accurately convey information relating to James Griffin received from Tasmania Police on 31 July 2019

Finding—The human resources team failed to escalate information they received on 11 October 2019 about Kylee Pearn's 2011 or 2012 disclosure

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw should have escalated and acted on knowledge of Kylee Pearn's disclosure to the hospital once advised about it by Tasmania Police on 29 October 2019

Finding—The lack of a coordinated and transparent response by Launceston General Hospital increased feelings of mistrust among hospital staff

Finding—Dr Peter Renshaw misled the Secretary of the Department about James Griffin

Finding—The Integrity Commission should have ensured Will Gordon's complaint to them was robustly and independently reviewed

Finding—James Bellinger did not conduct a proper investigation into James Griffin's complaints history and misled the Secretary of the Department and the Integrity Commission

Finding—The Integrity Commission's monitoring of the Department's response to Will Gordon's complaint was insufficient and it should have sought further review

Misconduct finding—Dr Peter Renshaw misled our Commission of Inquiry about his state of knowledge

Finding—Launceston General Hospital should ensure open disclosure processes are trauma-informed

Finding—Launceston General Hospital's human resources team should not have been involved in the request or preparation of a statement from Stewart Millar regarding Kylee Pearn's disclosure

Finding—James Bellinger should not have taken the statement from Stewart Millar

Glossary

Term	Definition
boundary breaches / boundary violations	Behaviours that cross the line between a professional and personal relationship. For example, a teacher providing a student with personal contact details.
child / young person	A person below the age of 18 years, as defined by the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.[95] We use the terms 'child' and 'young person' depending on the context. We recognise that many older children prefer being referred to as young people but, at times, using this term may minimise young people's vulnerability and legal status as children, particularly in the context of youth detention.
'child-facing' institutions or services	Institutions that provide services directly to children (such as schools), as distinct from more operational services (such as human resources) where any contact with children is incidental.

Term	Definition
child safe institution / child safe organisation	An institution that puts children first and ensures their safety. It 'consciously and systematically: • Creates an environment where children's safety and wellbeing is at the centre of thought, values and actions. • Places emphasis on genuine engagement with and valuing of children and young people. • Creates conditions that reduce the likelihood of harm to children and young people. • Creates conditions that increase the likelihood of identifying any harm. • Responds to any concerns, disclosures, allegations or suspicions of harm'.[96] We use 'child safe institution' and 'child safe organisation' interchangeably.
Child and Youth Safe Standards	Tasmania adopted Child and Youth Safe Standards in the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023.[97] Under this Act, organisations must also comply with an embedded Universal Principle requiring regulated entities to 'provide an environment that ensures that the right to cultural safety of children who identify as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander is respected'.[98] Our references to the new Child and Youth Safe Standards should be read as inclusive of the Universal Principle.
Child Safety Service / Child Safety Services	Formerly known as Child Protection Services, this is the division of Children, Youth and Families (part of the Department for Education, Children and Young People) that acts to 'protect children and young people who are at risk of abuse or neglect'.[99] It investigates child welfare concerns, including child sexual abuse, and is responsible for children in out of home care. We use 'Child Safety Service' and 'Child Safety Services' interchangeably.
child sexual abuse	Any act which exposes a child to, or involves a child in, sexual processes beyond his or her understanding or contrary to accepted community standards. Sexually abusive behaviours can include the touching of genitals, masturbation, oral sex, vaginal or anal penetration by a penis, finger or any other object, touching of breasts, voyeurism, exhibitionism and exposing the child to or involving the child in pornography. It includes child grooming, which refers to actions deliberately undertaken with the aim of befriending and establishing an emotional connection with a child, to lower the child's inhibitions in preparation for sexual activity with the child, and any related matters.[100]

Term	Definition
child sexual exploitation	A form of child sexual abuse where: 'a child is manipulated or coerced to participate in a sexual activity in exchange for, or the promise of, an incentive. This can include incentives such as food, accommodation, clothing, drugs, alcohol, cigarettes or money. It can also include incentives such as love, affection, or safety. Child sexual exploitation is a distinct form of child sexual abuse because of this notion of exchange or reward'.[101]
Counsel Assisting	Lawyers appointed to assist a commission of inquiry. They can perform several roles, including speaking and asking questions at hearings.
detainee / child or young person in detention	A child or young person detained in a youth detention facility (sometimes referred to as residents). We use the terms 'child and young person in detention', 'child in detention', or 'young person in detention' but sometimes use 'detainee' for ease of reading.
Employment Directions	Issued by the Minister administering the State Service Act 2000, Employment Directions provide instruction on how the State Service must manage State Service employment matters, including suspensions, investigations of alleged breaches of the Code of Conduct and considerations relevant to whether an employee no longer has the ability to perform their role. Employment Directions replaced Commissioner's Directions and a number of Ministerial Directions from 4 February 2013 (some Ministerial Directions are still being replaced).
ex gratia	Something that is done voluntarily rather than as a result of a legal obligation. For example, an ex gratia payment may be made by an institution to someone who has been harmed in some way, as a gesture of goodwill rather than an acceptance of legal liability.
grooming	A form of child sexual abuse, defined in this glossary under 'child sexual abuse'.
harmful sexual behaviours	A form of child sexual abuse that involves: 'sexual behaviours displayed by children and young people that fall outside what may be considered developmentally, socially and culturally expected, may cause harm to themselves or others, and occur either face to face and/or via technology. When these behaviours involve another child or young person, they may include a lack of consent, reciprocity, mutuality, and involve the use of coercion, force or a misuse of power'.[102]

Term	Definition
Head of Agency / Heads of Agencies	Leaders of Tasmanian Government agencies, including secretaries of departments and chief executive officers of agencies. A Head of Agency 'leads, and is responsible for, the overall management of communications and its integration with other key functions, particularly policy and program management'.[103] In the context of our Commission of Inquiry, Heads of Agencies are most commonly secretaries of departments.
LGBTQIA+	An inclusive term that recognises people's complexity and diversity, encompassing the entire spectrum of gender fluidity and sexual identities. The letters refer to lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, queer or questioning, intersex, asexual and other sexually or gender diverse people.[104]
National Redress Scheme	The scheme that allows victim-survivors to seek financial compensation, counselling and a direct personal response from the institution in which their abuse occurred, without needing to interact with their abuser or pursue criminal or civil claims.[105] The National Redress Scheme was set up by the Australian Government in July 2018 and was given effect in Tasmanian legislation in the same year. Non-government institutions may also join the scheme.[106]
National Royal Commission	Refer to 'Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse'.
related conduct	In relation to child sexual abuse, any unlawful or improper treatment of children that is, either generally or in any particular instance, connected or associated with child sexual abuse.
reportable conduct scheme	A scheme that monitors how organisations investigate and report on allegations of misconduct towards children, with the requirement to report these allegations to an independent body. In Tasmania, a Reportable Conduct Scheme is being established under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 that enables people to report neglect or abuse by a worker towards a child to an Independent Regulator.[107]
Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse / National Royal Commission	The Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('National Royal Commission') was established on 11 January 2013.[108] The National Royal Commission investigated child sexual abuse in government and non-government institutions across Australia. It released its final report, including 409 recommendations, in 2017.

Term	Definition
Secretary or Secretaries	Refer to 'Head of Agency'.
State Service	Tasmanian government departments and institutions that develop and deliver government policies, programs and services. Employment in the State Service is established under the State Service Act 2000.[109] People who work in the State Service are sometimes called state servants or public servants, as well as government employees, staff or workers.
State Service Code of Conduct	The State Service Code of Conduct outlines how employees of the State Service are expected to behave.[110]
trauma-informed	A way of understanding people and their interactions that is based on an awareness of trauma and its effects, as well as behaving in ways that demonstrate this understanding. This applies to how individuals, organisations and wider society can recognise and respond to people who may have experienced trauma. The core trauma-informed principles are safety, trust, choice, collaboration, empowerment and respect for diversity.[111]
victim-survivor	Someone who has been sexually abused as a child. When we use the term 'victim-survivor', it is to recognise a person's experience and is not a legal determination. For ease of reading, we use the term 'victim-survivor'. We recognise that some people prefer 'survivor' because of the resilience and empowerment associated with the term, and because they do not identify as victims. We also recognise that some people who have experienced abuse do not consider that they 'survived' the abuse and that 'victim' is more appropriate. We also recognise that some people may have died by suicide as a consequence of the abuse they experienced. We acknowledge that 'victim' is more appropriate in these circumstances. We also recognise that some people do not identify with either of these terms, and may prefer terminology such as 'person with lived experience of child sexual abuse'.[112]
2000s, 2010s & 2020s	In this report, we refer to the following time periods: • the '2000s' means the years 2000 to 2009 • the '2010s' means the years 2010 to 2019 • the '2020s' means the decade beginning 2020. To avoid identifying people, we sometimes use 'early', 'mid-' and 'late' with these decades without specifying the relevant years.

Notes

Executive summary

1 Peter Gutwein, Premier, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>; Loretta Lohberger, 'Class Action Prepared Against Tasmanian Government Alleging Abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre', ABC News (online, 28 July 2020) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2020-07-28/class-action-amid-alleged-abuse-at-ashley-youth-detention-centre/12496558>; 'Episode One: Just Jim', The Nurse (Transcript, undated) 73–74.

2 The Attorney-General and Minister for Health implemented an independent investigation into the systems of the Tasmanian Health Service, Department of Health and other relevant Government agencies concerning the management of allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in the matter of James Griffin: Department of Justice, Independent Investigation into the THS and the Management of Child Sexual Abuse (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.justice.tas.gov.au/news_and_events/investigation-into-ths-child-sexual-abuse-allegations>. The Department of Communities initiated an investigation of three current employees of Ashley Youth Detention Centre who were the subject of allegations of abuse. The staff were stood down pending investigation: Roger Jaensch, Allegations against Staff at AYDC (Web Page, 2022) <http://www.rogerjaensch.com.au/allegations-against-staff-at-aydc/>. The Minister for Education initiated an independent inquiry to examine systems in the Department of Education relevant to minimising the risk of child sexual abuse within Tasmanian government schools. The report of the Inquiry was submitted in June 2021. For the final report, refer to Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 7 June 2021) 1.

3 Peter Gutwein, Premier of Tasmania, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

4 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

5 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

6 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

7 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

8 Erin Cooper and Emily Baker, 'Tasmania Police Took Years to Charge Alleged Paedophile Nurse Who Worked with Children, Review Finds', ABC News (online, 26 February 2021) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2021-02-26/police-took-years-to-investigate-alleged-paedophile-nurse/13196044>.

9 These numbers relate to allegations of child sexual abuse since 1 January 2000.

10 Department of Communities, 'ED Tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), January 2023, produced by the Department of Communities in response to a Commission notice to produce; Department of Education, 'ED Tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), 22 February 2023, produced by the Department of Education in response to a Commission notice to produce; Department of Health, 'ED Tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), February 2023, produced by the Department of Health in response to a Commission notice to produce. Refer to Appendix H for the methodology used to calculate these numbers.

11 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021 (refer to Appendix A).

12 Divla Haslam and Ben Mathews et al, The Prevalence and Impact of Child Maltreatment in Australia: Findings from the Australian Child Maltreatment Study: Brief Report (Report, Australian Child Maltreatment Study, Queensland University of Technology, 2023) 12 <http://www.acms.au/wp-content/uploads/2023/04/3846.1_ACMS_A4Report_C1_Digital-Near-final.pdf>.

13 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 2017) Recommendations, 73 [1], 79 [26-32], 88 [85]–89 [89] <https://www.childabuseroyalcommission.gov.au/sites/default/files/final_report_-_recommendations.pdf>.

14 National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth) s 43; National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse (Commonwealth Powers) Act 2018 s 2; Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Ministerial Statement – National Redress Scheme' (Media Release, 22 May 2018) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/releases/tasmania_opts_in_to_the_national_redress_scheme>.

15 Statement of Ginna Webster, 10 June 2022, 52 [335].

16 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 19(2A).

17 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 18.

18 Statement of Anne Hollonds, 13 April 2022, 8 [32].

19 Statement of Anne Hollonds, 13 April 2022, 9 [34].

20 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 15, sch 1.

21 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 7.

22 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 16, sch 2.

23 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 sch 3.

24 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 22.

25 Department of Premier and Cabinet, Keeping Children Safer Implementation Status Report (Report, 30 June 2023) <https://www.dpac.tas.gov.au/__data/assets/pdf_file/0027/306873/WEBSITE-UPDATE-Keeping-Children-Safer-Implementation-Status-Report-as-at-30-June-2023.pdf>.

26 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023).

27 Felix Ellis and Jo Palmer, 'New Arch Centres to Provide Victim-Survivors with Immediate, Integrated Support' (Media Release, 2 December 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/new-arch-centres-to-provide-victim-survivors-with-immediate,-integrated-support>.

28 Statement of Gemma McKibbin, 6 May 2022, 14–15 [47].

29 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 44.

30 Donald Palmer and Valerie Feldman, 'Toward a More Comprehensive Analysis of the Role of Organizational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts' (2017) 74 Child Abuse and Neglect 23, 25.

31 Donald Palmer and Valerie Feldman, 'Toward a More Comprehensive Analysis of the Role of Organizational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts' (2017) 74 Child Abuse and Neglect 23, 25.

32 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 59.

33 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 7, 26.

34 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 158.

35 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 38.

36 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 49.

37 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 172.

38 Carly Smith and Jennifer Freyd, 'Institutional Betrayal' (2013) 69(6) American Psychologist 575.

39 Refer to Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 63, 85; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 162–163.

40 Department of Education, Key Data (Report, 2022) 16; Department of Education, Annual Report 2021–2022 (Report, 2022) 4, 33–34.

41 Department for Education, Children and Young People, 'Children in Out of Home Care', Human Services Dashboard (Web Page, undated) <https://www.decyp.tas.gov.au/about-us/department-data/human-services-dashboard/>.

42 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Report, 15 June 2022) Table S7.1 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

43 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 87.

44 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Report, 15 June 2022) Table S5.10 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

45 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 2017) vol 2, 84, 89.

46 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 2017) vol 12, 89–90, 196.

47 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Report, 15 June 2022) Table S5.8 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

48 KL Kaufman and M Erooga, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 27.

49 Statement of Elena Campbell, 4 July 2022, 5 [30]–7 [39]; Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 14.

50 Eileen Ahlin, 'Forced Sexual Victimization among Youth in Custody: Do Risk Factors Vary by Gender and Perpetrator?' (2020) 100(2) Prison Journal 151, 158.

51 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 2017) vol 15, 39.

52 Youth Justice Act 1997 s 132(c)–(f).

53 The names 'Alysha' and 'Max' are pseudonyms; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

54 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Draft Youth Justice Blueprint 2022–2032: Keeping Children and Young People out of the Youth Justice System (Draft Report, 3 February 2023).

55 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 15; Statement of Kathrine Morgan-Wicks, 24 May 2022, 3 [17].

56 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 16.

57 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 2017) Preface and Executive Summary, 6, 10, 11 <https://www.childabuseroyalcommission.gov.au/preface-and-executive-summary>.

58 Julienne Zammit et al, Truth Project Thematic Report: Child Sexual Abuse in Healthcare Contexts (Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse, December 2020).

59 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023).

60 Julienne Zammit et al, Truth Project Thematic Report: Child Sexual Abuse in Healthcare Contexts (Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse, December 2020) 2.

61 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 43; Statement of Catherine Turnbull, 23 June 2022, 5 [20].

62 Julienne Zammit et al, Truth Project Thematic Report: Child Sexual Abuse in Healthcare Contexts (Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse, December 2020) 3; Statement of Catherine Turnbull, 23 June 2022, 7 [33–36].

63 Julienne Zammit et al, Truth Project Thematic Report: Child Sexual Abuse in Healthcare Contexts (Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse, December 2020) 19.

64 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021.

65 Letter from Secretary Morgan-Wicks to Commission of Inquiry, 17 December 2022 1–2; Letter from Secretary Morgan-Wicks to Commission of Inquiry, 10 February 2023, 2.

66 Department of Health, Child Safe Organisation Project (Web Page) <https://www.health.tas.gov.au/health-topics/child-and-youth-health/child-safety-and-wellbeing/child-safe-organisation-project>.

67 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, Criminal Justice Report (Report, 2017) Executive Summary and Parts I and II, 20.

68 Submission 126 Tasmania Police, 7.

69 Submission 126 Tasmania Police, 7.

70 Submission 126 Tasmania Police, 7.

71 Jacquie Petrusma, 'Multidisciplinary Centres to Provide Victim-Survivors with Immediate, Integrated Support' (Media Release, 1 March 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/multidisciplinary_centres_to_provide_victim-survivors_with_immediate,_integrated_support>.

72 Tasmania Police, ARCH (Web Page) <https://www.police.tas.gov.au/what-we-do/family-violence/multidisciplinary-centres/>.

73 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, 17 [83].

74 Police Offences Act 1935 s 35(5B) as amended by Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act 2023 s 39.

75 Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act 2023.

76 Australian Government, 'Applying', National Redress Scheme (Web Page) <https://www.nationalredress.gov.au/applying>.

77 Limitation Act 1974 s 5B, which provides that no limitation period applies to an action for damages for personal injury or death of a person arising from or related to the sexual abuse, or serious physical abuse, of the person when the person was a minor. Under section 5C of the Limitation Act 1974, the Court can set aside a previous settlement of such an action. This is likely to be relevant to claims settled by churches and other institutions: Civil Liability Act 2002 s 49I.

78 Office of the Solicitor-General, Guidelines for the Conduct of Civil Claims (2019).

79 Elise Archer, Attorney-General and Minister for Justice, 'New State Litigation Office to Support Victim Survivors', (Media Release, 1 March 2023) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/new-state-litigation-office-to-support-victim-survivors>.

80 Department of Justice, Fifth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2023: Appendix A (Report, December 2022) 23.

81 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 8 November 2022, 29–39 (Jeremy Rockliff, Premier; Rebecca White, Leader of the Opposition; Cassy O'Connor, Leader of the Greens; Kristie Johnston; David O'Byrne).

82 Statement of Kathryn Fordyce, 3 May 2022, 25 [78]. Consent is irrelevant to child sexual offences except where it occurs between children of similar age. Lack of consent must be proven in a criminal prosecution for rape. Refer to Chapter 16 for further discussion of this issue.

83 The Code of Conduct is in section 9 of the State Service Act 2000. Relevant employment directions are: Tasmanian Government, Employment Direction No. 4 – Procedure for the Suspension of State Service Employees With or Without Pay (4 February 2013); Tasmanian Government, Employment Direction No. 5 – Procedures for the Investigation and Determination of whether an Employee Has Breached the Code of Conduct (4 February 2013); and Tasmanian Government, Employment Direction No. 6 – Procedures for the Investigation and Determination of whether an Employee Is Able to Efficiently and Effectively Perform Their Duties (4 February 2013). Also relevant are the State Service Principles, which are in section 7 of the State Service Act 2000. The Principles are a statement about the way employment in the State Service is to be managed and the standards expected of State Service employees.

84 Ian Watt, Independent Review of the Tasmanian State Service (Final Report, 2021) 201. The Review found that in Tasmania, most terminations were for inability (65 per cent in 2019) while terminations for underperformance or Code of Conduct breaches were only 24 per cent in 2019. In the Australian Government, terminations for underperformance or misconduct represented 40 per cent of terminations.

85 Submission 084 Integrity Commission Tasmania, 2.

Findings

86 The name 'Henry' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

87 The name 'Max' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

88 The name 'Ray' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

89 The name 'Alysha' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

90 The name 'Max' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

91 The name 'Walter' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

92 The names 'Ira', 'Lester' and 'Stan' are pseudonyms; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

93 In accordance with the Restricted Publication Order of the Commission of Inquiry dated 30 August 2023 and section 10(3) of the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 (Tas), the Governor has omitted Volume 6, Chapter 14, Case Study 1 because the public interest in the disclosure of that part of the report is significantly outweighed by other relevant considerations, namely the right of any person to a fair trial.

94 The name 'Dr Tim' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 27 June 2022.

Glossary

95 United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, opened for signature 20 November 1989, 1577 UNTS 3 (entered into force 2 September 1990) art 1.

96 Australian Human Rights Commission, 'What is a child safe organisation?', Child Safe Organisations (Web Page, 24 July 2023) <https://childsafe.humanrights.gov.au/about/what-child-safe-organisation>.

97 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 sch 1.

98 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 15.

99 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Child Safety Service (Web Page, 24 July 2023) <https://www.decyp.tas.gov.au/children/child-safety-service/>.

100 Refer to Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 5 (refer to Appendix A); Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 1, 19. For the purposes of this Commission of Inquiry, we have replaced the word 'fondling' with the trauma-informed term 'touching'.

101 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 1, 320.

102 National Office for Child Safety, 'Discussion paper from the National Clinical Reference Group – Language and Terminology' (Discussion Paper, December 2022).

103 Department of Premier and Cabinet, '9.2 Heads of Tasmanian Government agencies', Tasmanian Government Communications (Web Page) <https://www.communications.tas.gov.au/policy/roles_and_responsibilities/heads_of_tasmanian_government_agencies#:~:text=The%20head%20of%20agency%20leads,champions%20the%20agency's%20internal%20communications>.

104 Australian Government, Australian Institute of Family Studies, LGBTIQA+ Glossary of Common Terms (Child Family Community Australia Resource Sheet, February 2022).

105 National Redress Scheme, National Redress Scheme (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.nationalredress.gov.au>.

106 National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth).

107 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 pt 4.

108 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 1, 2–13. State Service Act 2000 pt 2.

109 State Service Act 2000 s 9.

110 State Service Act 2000 s 9.

111 Cathy Kezelman and Pam Stavropoulos*, Organisational Guidelines for Trauma Informed Service Delivery* (Blue Knot Foundation, 2020).

112 Definition adapted from Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 1, 328.

Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings

Who was looking after me? Prioritising the safety of Tasmanian children

Volume 2: Establishment and context

August 2023

Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings Report

Volume 2
Establishment and context

The Honourable Marcia Neave AO
President and Commissioner

Professor Leah Bromfield
Commissioner

The Honourable Robert Benjamin AM SC
Commissioner

August 2023

Volume 2: Establishment and context
978-0-6457694-2-5
Published August 2023

Suggested citation:
Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, August 2023).

Contents

CHAPTER 3

Child sexual abuse in institutions

1 Establishment, scope and conduct

1 Introduction

This Commission of Inquiry was prompted by a groundswell of community concern in 2019–20 over child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions. It followed media reporting of incidents of abuse and inadequacies in the Government's response to these incidents. While the Government's initial response to these concerns characterised these matters as 'historical', others in the community and media questioned the extent to which failures to keep Tasmanian children safe were indeed in the past.[1]

On 31 July 2019, Tasmania Police searched the home of paediatric nurse James Griffin. The search revealed large quantities of child exploitation material. Later that day, Mr Griffin was stood down as an employee of the Launceston General Hospital. In October 2019, Tasmania Police arrested Mr Griffin and charged him with numerous sexual offences relating to children, before releasing him on bail. Soon afterwards, Mr Griffin took his own life.[2] These events, and the rumours that circulated about them, caused great concern among the staff of the hospital and the Tasmanian community.

In 2020, the media began reporting allegations of child sexual abuse perpetrated by Tasmanian State Service employees, including teachers and health staff.[3] The media also reported an impending class action against the State of Tasmania, led by people who had 'suffered serious injuries', including sexual abuse, as children while detained in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[4] These reports prompted others to come forward with information about current and past child sexual abuse in a range of Tasmanian Government institutions. Some accounts expressed that formal avenues to report and seek redress for child sexual abuse were unavailable or ineffective.[5] One victim-survivor referred to attempts to report abuse that had 'fallen on deaf ears or [been] swept under the carpet'.[6]

These reports and civil claims raised concerns that child sexual abuse had not been properly addressed in Tasmania after previous inquiries and reviews, and that it was not isolated to a single institution or a small number of people. The Honourable Peter Gutwein, the then Premier of Tasmania, noted 'significant community concern and public angst quite rightly—over recent matters that have come to light where historically children have not been safe in our Government institutions'.[7] In particular, government institutions' responses to reports of child sexual abuse perpetrated by Mr Griffin, and others, were subject to significant media scrutiny, which included a podcast, The Nurse. As of May 2022, episodes of The Nurse had been downloaded about 1.3 million times.[8]

The Tasmanian Government instigated two independent reviews into child sexual abuse in the education and health systems, and an investigation into the conduct of three employees at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[9] However, as acknowledged by the then Premier, it was clear that despite establishing these reviews and other government actions more needed to be done to protect children.[10]

On 23 November 2020, Premier Gutwein announced that he intended to recommend to Her Excellency Professor the Honourable Kate Warner AC, the then Governor of Tasmania, that she 'establish a Commission of Inquiry under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 ('Commissions of Inquiry Act') to investigate the responses of Tasmanian Government Agencies in relation to the management of historical allegations of child sexual abuse'.[11] In making this announcement, Premier Gutwein acknowledged that despite the Government's efforts:

> … as the number of allegations coming to light continues to grow, we must take every step necessary to ensure we identify any systemic gaps and put in place measures to fill them.
>
> This situation is nothing short of terrible and we must take further action. I believe one of our greatest responsibilities is to learn from the past, and commit to not repeating its mistakes.[12]

In the announcement, the Premier stated that 'as more claims for redress are progressed there will be more shocking examples come to light'.[13] The Premier referred to five current State Service employees who had been suspended from work due to claims of child sexual abuse, one of whom was stood down pending the outcome of criminal proceedings.[14] A media report in February 2021 suggested that another 14 current State Service employees had been stood down since the Premier's announcement.[15]

By February 2023, the number of state servants in child-facing departments suspended by the Government since January 2000 had risen to 92.[16] Some 38 of those state servants were suspended following the announcement of our Commission of Inquiry in November 2020.[17]

The Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings was established by Order of the Governor on 15 March 2021.[18]

A year after beginning our Inquiry, a personal element in the Premier's announcement of our Commission of Inquiry became apparent. At a media conference in March 2022, Premier Gutwein stated that he is a victim-survivor of child sexual abuse perpetrated by a teacher.[19] He said: 'I'm the first Premier of this state that has taken the steps to have a Commission of Inquiry. The reason that I've done that is that I have great empathy, because I have walked in their shoes'.[20] He further stated: 'I know what the loss of trust feels like; I know what the shame feels like'.[21]

In 2003, Mr Gutwein, a Liberal Member of Parliament, had crossed the floor of Parliament to vote with the Tasmanian Greens in support of establishing a commission of inquiry into child abuse. The then Labor Government and the Liberal opposition opposed the motion. Because he crossed the floor, Mr Gutwein lost the shadow treasury, education and employment portfolios. At the time, he stated: 'If we don't have the courage of our own convictions, how can we expect those people out there that have been abused, that are aware of abuse, to come forward?'[22]

On 8 April 2022, Premier Gutwein resigned as Premier and a Member of Parliament. We commend Mr Gutwein for his bravery in supporting victim-survivors of child sexual abuse and their families, and for sharing his own story of abuse.

2 Establishment and scope

When our Commission of Inquiry was established on 15 March 2021, the Governor appointed the Honourable Marcia Neave AO, Professor Leah Bromfield and the Honourable Robert Benjamin AM SC as members of our Commission of Inquiry, with Commissioner Neave appointed as President. Commissioners Bromfield and Benjamin were born in Tasmania.

The Order of the Governor required and authorised the Commissioners 'to inquire into the Tasmanian Government's responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts'.[23] The Order specified areas for inquiry that form our Inquiry's terms of reference, which are outlined below.

The Order directed our Commission of Inquiry to make any recommendations arising from our Inquiry that we considered appropriate, including about any policy, legislative, administrative or structural reforms.[24]

We held an opening hearing in Hobart on 26 October 2021. We were required to report by 31 August 2022, and hearings were planned to restart in early 2022. However, after considering advice from the Tasmanian Government on the potential impact of community transmission of COVID-19 in early 2022, we decided to restart hearings in May 2022. Due to the postponement of hearings, and other factors outside our control, we sought an extension to the original reporting deadline. In February 2022, the Tasmanian Government granted an extension to 1 May 2023.[25]

In early 2023, our Commission of Inquiry asked for another extension because of the complexity of information provided to us, our commitment to appropriately and thoroughly address all the issues raised with us, and the need to discharge our procedural fairness obligations under the Commissions of Inquiry Act. In April 2023, the Tasmanian Government granted an extension to 31 August 2023.

We delivered our final report, comprising 8 volumes and 191 recommendations, to the Governor of Tasmania on 31 August 2023.

2.1 Terms of reference

The Order of the Governor asked us to inquire into what the Tasmanian Government should do to:

- better protect children against child sexual abuse in institutional contexts in the future
- achieve best practice in the reporting of, and responding to, reports or information about allegations, incidents or risks of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts
- eliminate or reduce problems that currently prevent appropriate responses to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including addressing failures in, and barriers to, reporting, investigation and responding to allegations and incidents of abuse
- address or alleviate the impact of past and future child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, including, in particular, in ensuring justice for victim-survivors through processes for referrals for investigation and prosecution and support services.[26]

As part of our Inquiry, we were also required to consider:

- the experiences of people affected by child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, and provide opportunities for them to share their experiences

- the adequacy and appropriateness of the Tasmanian Government's responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts generally, and in particular, by:
    - the Department of Education to allegations of child sexual abuse in government schools
    - the Tasmanian Health Service and the Department of Health to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in the matter of James Griffin
    - the Department of Communities to allegations of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre
- systemic issues, recognising that individual cases may need to be referred to appropriate authorities
- changes to laws, policies, practices and systems that have improved the ability of government institutions to better protect against and respond to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts.[27]

We did not have to inquire into matters that had been appropriately dealt with by the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('National Royal Commission') or by another inquiry, investigation or court proceeding.[28]

2.2 Refinement of scope

With our terms of reference in mind, we clarified and refined the scope of inquiry to:

- accommodate key areas of concern in Tasmania
- ensure we prioritised areas that had not been addressed previously.

2.2.1 Child sexual abuse

The Order of the Governor adopted the victim-centred and legally based definition of child sexual abuse that the National Royal Commission used:

> i. Any act which exposes a child to, or involves a child in, sexual processes beyond his or her understanding or contrary to accepted community standards. Sexually abusive behaviours can include the [touching] of genitals, masturbation, oral sex, vaginal or anal penetration by a penis, finger or any other object, [touching] of breasts, voyeurism, exhibitionism, and exposing the child to or involving the child in pornography. It includes child grooming, which refers to actions deliberately undertaken with the aim of befriending and establishing an emotional connection with a child, to lower the child's inhibitions in preparation for sexual activity with the child; and
>
> ii. Any related matters.[29]

The National Royal Commission also considered the 'production, consumption, dissemination and exchange of child sexual exploitation material' to be child sexual abuse.[30] While the Order of the Governor did not refer to child exploitation material in its definition, the definition captures such material.

The definition of child sexual abuse also includes sexual abuse by other children or 'harmful sexual behaviours'. We use this term to refer to the:

> ... sexual behaviours displayed by children and young people that fall outside what may be considered developmentally, socially, and culturally expected, may cause harm to themselves or others, and occur either face to face and/or via technology. When these behaviours involve another child or young person, they may include a lack of consent, reciprocity, mutuality, and involve the use of coercion, force, or a misuse of power.[31]

While our examinations focused on child sexual abuse, we recognise that other forms of abuse can contribute to an institutionalised culture that treats violence, bullying and harassment as normal, and that sexual abuse can co-occur with other types of abuse and neglect. Such behaviour can create a risk of child sexual abuse and discourage it from being reported by the child or other people in the institution.[32] Therefore, we examined other forms of abuse if there was a link between that abuse and child sexual abuse occurring in institutional contexts.

We consider the definition, nature and impact of child sexual abuse in an institutional context in detail in Chapter 3.

2.2.2 Institutional contexts

The terms of reference directed us to examine child sexual abuse in 'institutional contexts'. According to the Order of the Governor, child sexual abuse happens in an institutional context if, for example:

i. it happens on premises of a government or non-government institution, where activities of the institution take place, or in connection with the activities of the institution; or

ii. it is engaged in by an official of a government or non-government institution in circumstances (including circumstances involving settings not directly controlled by the institution) where ... the institution has, or its activities have, created, facilitated, increased, concealed or in any way contributed to, (whether by act or omission) the risk of child sexual abuse or the circumstances or conditions giving rise to that risk; or

iii. it happens in any other circumstances where ... a government or non-government institution is, or should be treated as being, responsible for adults having contact with children.[33]

For government institutions, we focused on what was then the Department of Education, the Tasmanian Health Service and Department of Health, and the Department of Communities, particularly in relation to Ashley Youth Detention Centre and out of home care. The Order identified public schools, health services and youth detention for particular attention because those institutions provide significant direct services to children. As noted above, there had also been significant media coverage of child sexual abuse in those institutions, and separate inquiries had been announced for each of those institutions. We decided to include a focus on out of home care because the National Royal Commission identified that children in this institutional context are at an increased risk of child sexual abuse.[34] Our case studies in Volumes 3–6 examine child sexual abuse occurring in these institutions.

The Order of the Governor defined a non-government institution as one 'that undertakes, or has undertaken, activities on behalf of the Tasmanian Government to provide services for children'.[35] Based on this definition, we focused on non-government institutions that:

- undertake activities on behalf of the Tasmanian Government and provide services for children, or
- are funded by the Tasmanian Government to provide services for children.

We concluded that non-government institutions must meet the following three criteria to be in the scope of our Inquiry:

- The activities undertaken represent an outsourcing of traditional public functions and so there is a contract for services rather than a grant funding arrangement.
- The Tasmanian Government is the principal funder of the organisation or the amount of funding is substantial.
- The public could reasonably assume that the Tasmanian Government is responsible, directly or indirectly, for the services provided.

Applying these criteria, we focused mostly on non-government institutions that are contracted and funded by the Tasmanian Government to provide out of home care services.

We did not examine child sexual abuse in private or community institutions (churches, non-government schools, sporting organisations, local clubs) unless such institutions were solely funded by the Tasmanian Government to provide services for children.[36] We did not follow up or inquire into areas such as the involvement that abusers might have had with such institutions. We considered that these associations were outside our terms of reference. We have not conducted a thorough inquiry into allegations of abuse by police officers, ambulance officers or in connection with councils. Given the volume of material raised about the institutions identified in our terms of reference or, in the case of out of home care prioritised by us, we did not have the capacity to fully inquire into these other government institutions. We took this decision to use the time and resources available to our Inquiry most effectively. The State did not make this suggestion, nor did we request extra time or resources from the State to expand our terms of reference for this purpose.

We heard a small number of significant concerns about child sexual abuse in these other institutional contexts, though not to the same extent as allegations of abuse in the education, health, youth justice and out of home care systems. While we did not investigate these other institutional contexts in detail, many of our recommendations apply to them. We ask the Government to consider these government institutions—and all others that provide services for children—when responding to our recommendations.

2.2.3 Current responses to allegations and incidents

We focused on responses to reports of child sexual abuse since 2000 (even if the act or acts of abuse occurred before 2000). This period reflects current responses to child sexual abuse, including community awareness and policy responses. This focus therefore informs our findings on current and ongoing issues and our recommendations for what needs to change.

As noted in the terms of reference, we did not have to inquire into matters that the National Royal Commission or another inquiry, investigation or court proceeding had dealt with.[37] Our Commission of Inquiry complements rather than duplicates the work of the National Royal Commission, which had already closely examined child sexual abuse in institutions prior to 2000, as well as some more recent cases. Consequently, we decided to focus on more contemporary responses to child sexual abuse, in order to consider how effective they are and what has changed since the National Royal Commission concluded. We only examined incidents of child sexual abuse that predated 2000 where they threw light on current issues of concern about preventing, reporting and investigating abuse or official responses to such abuse.[38]

In focusing on the period since 2000, we directed our resources towards identifying current and continuing systemic issues. Within this scope, we have prioritised those issues and circumstances that continued to be present at the time of our Inquiry. We did so with the view that a purposeful focus on current issues was the best way to protect current and future generations of Tasmanians from the profound and lifelong pain caused by child sexual abuse.

2.2.4 Systemic reform

As directed by the Order of the Governor, we focused on systemic problems in institutional contexts and options for reform. This systemic focus has been significantly informed by the experiences of individuals. The accounts of victim-survivors, their families and advocates enabled us to understand current practices and to develop appropriate recommendations for reform. We have accepted the truth of the accounts of victim-survivors but acknowledge that, except where we have made findings, these accounts have not been examined by reference to the legal test for criminal responsibility, which requires proof beyond reasonable doubt, or civil liability, which requires proof of the allegation on the balance of probabilities.

Equally, examining specific institutions' responses to child sexual abuse has enabled us to identify patterns of behaviour that have gone unaddressed. In particular, we are concerned that a systemic problem in the Government's response to institutional child sexual abuse is a failure to deal with poor conduct or behaviour, including in relation to the conduct of individuals in responding to reports about the behaviour of others. We have identified poor conduct and failures by institutions and by individuals where the evidence before us supported such a conclusion, with the goal of ensuring that persistent and systemic issues are not perpetuated. Under the Commissions of Inquiry Act, we also have the power to make findings of misconduct.[39] We discuss this power further in Section 2.3.4.

We have focused our Inquiry on the institutional response to allegations of child sexual abuse in an institution, rather than investigating whether the abuse occurred. The Order of the Governor recognised that we may need to refer individual cases to appropriate authorities for investigation, including the police. We discuss our referrals in Section 2.3.3.

2.2.5 Organised abuse

Michael Salter, Scientia Associate Professor of Criminology, School of Social Sciences, University of New South Wales, defines organised abuse as 'any case of child sexual abuse in which two or more adult offenders conspire to sexually abuse one or more child'.[40] We have adopted that definition.

Over the course of our Inquiry, we have heard accounts of, or concerns about, organised abuse. We did not have the capacity to undertake proper forensic investigations into these. We consider that these matters are better investigated by other bodies with dedicated funding and mandates for investigating alleged criminal activities. Accordingly, we did not request extra resources to expand our Inquiry to cover these accounts or concerns.

As set out in Section 2.3.3, we have referred all appropriate information to Tasmania Police and other relevant authorities for their consideration. With the consent of the relevant victim-survivors and families, we confidentially identified where such information might suggest organised abuse.

We have not outlined the details of those accounts or concerns in this report because proper forensic investigations have not been undertaken and any premature disclosure may adversely affect investigations. We have also done this to ensure procedural fairness is not denied to relevant people.

We are not in a position to comment on the accuracy or truth of these accounts or concerns. We trust, however, that Tasmania Police and others will appropriately consider the matters we have referred and any support they require to properly investigate those matters.

2.3 Powers

Commissions of inquiry are rare in Tasmania. There have only been two others since 1990.[41] Unlike other forms of inquiry and review, commissions of inquiry have extraordinary powers, which are similar to royal commissions in other Australian states. These include powers to:

- compel witnesses to give evidence and produce documents[42]
- apply for a warrant to enter private premises to conduct a search and take documents[43]
- apply for a warrant to use surveillance or listening devices[44]
- hold public hearings and private sessions, including examining witnesses under oath.[45]

Witnesses do not have the right to refuse to give evidence or produce a document on the grounds that they may incriminate themselves.[46]

In announcing our Commission of Inquiry, the Premier stated that a key reason for recommending its establishment 'is the power of that Inquiry to compel witnesses to provide evidence'.[47]

Unlike many other forms of investigation and review, reports of commissions of inquiry must be tabled in Parliament and are therefore available to the public.[48]

In applying our broad powers, we have conducted a far-reaching examination. We have conducted 37 days of public hearings, held more than 120 sessions with Commissioners, examined more than 160 witnesses, received more than 260 statements and reviewed more than 95,000 documents. More about the conduct of our Commission of Inquiry is set out in Section 3.

2.3.1 Legislative and regulatory amendments

To ensure our Commission of Inquiry was appropriately empowered, several amendments were made to the Commissions of Inquiry Act and associated legislation. In March 2021, Parliament passed the Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act 2021 to amend various Acts.[49] Most of the amendments were taken to have started on 1 March 2021.[50]

The amendments:

- clarified the Governor's power to amend or vary the matters that a commission of inquiry is directed to examine
- provided for a commission of inquiry to conduct private sessions with individuals when appropriate (refer to Section 3.3.2 for more about the nature of these sessions)
- provided extra support for vulnerable witnesses to give evidence, including giving evidence anonymously and using special measures, such as witness intermediaries
- created additional requirements to provide procedural fairness where a witness to a commission of inquiry or another person may be subject to a finding of misconduct or other adverse finding
- clarified a commission of inquiry's power to use listening and surveillance devices
- empowered a commission of inquiry to inspect documents when privilege is claimed
- enabled a commission of inquiry to share information with law enforcement and other authorities for the purposes of ensuring the safety and protection of children (child safe reporting)
- enabled the Ombudsman to refer matters under the Public Interest Disclosures Act 2002 to a commission of inquiry
- established exemptions to various confidentiality provisions for people who have been affected by abuse in the child protection and youth justice systems to access their records, to enable them to share that information with a commission of inquiry and to take part in private sessions, as well as the use of that information in civil and criminal proceedings.[51]

In addition, the Commissions of Inquiry Regulations 2021 commenced on 14 July 2021 to support the operation of our Commission of Inquiry. These regulations negated provisions in various Acts that would otherwise have regulated or restricted information collected by, on behalf of, or provided to our Commission of Inquiry, including in the case of State Service employees who wanted to engage with our Inquiry.

We considered many of these new regulations to be necessary so that we could give the public and State Service employees more information about our processes and their relevant rights. Unfortunately, the delay in these regulations commencing due to consultation and authorisation processes required by the State hampered our capacity to provide this information in a timely manner.

2.3.2 Rights and protections of witnesses who provided information

The rights and protections available under the Commissions of Inquiry Act supported those who gave us information, including confidentially and anonymously.

The Act creates several offences in relation to those rights and protections. For example, it is an offence for:

- an employer to prejudice a person's employment or dismiss them because that person has given evidence or produced any document or thing to our Commission of Inquiry (or because of the content of that evidence, document or thing)[52]
- a person to intentionally prevent, or try to prevent, another person from producing any document or thing to our Commission of Inquiry[53]
- a person to punish another person or cause them loss, damage or disadvantage because that other person has given evidence or produced any document or thing to our Commission of Inquiry (or because of the content of that evidence, document or thing).[54]

The Commissions of Inquiry Act also limits the way information provided to our Inquiry can be used. The evidence that a person has provided to our Inquiry, such as a witness statement or oral evidence, is not admissible in other legal proceedings, except in very limited circumstances.[55] A person who appears before our Commission of Inquiry is given the same protections and immunities as a witness who appears before the Supreme Court.[56] This includes being protected against defamation and negligence actions.

Importantly, however, our Commission of Inquiry is inquiring into certain facts and matters. This does not prevent the State from also inquiring into those facts and matters. If information is available to our Inquiry and the State, both can investigate and, in the case of the State, take action in response to those facts or matters. For example, if it is alleged that a State Service employee has breached the State Service Code of Conduct, the State can still investigate that allegation and take any action it considers appropriate, provided it does not rely solely on evidence before our Inquiry. In this example, the State must already have this information or have obtained it through its own investigations. Also, our Commission of Inquiry can share information with, and refer matters to, the State and appropriate authorities for investigation.

2.3.3 Power to make referrals to appropriate authorities

Commissions of inquiry are not courts. They do not have the power to determine whether someone has committed a crime or is legally liable for their actions. Instead, if a commission of inquiry has any information that may be relevant to a criminal prosecution or disciplinary matter, that information can be referred to the appropriate authorities.[57] In addition, our Inquiry is legally bound to report certain matters. For example, if we reasonably believe matters constitute an 'abuse offence' against a child, we must disclose that information to a police officer as soon as practicable.[58]

During our Commission of Inquiry, we referred more than 100 people to appropriate authorities. Referrals were made to a range of organisations and people, including the:

- Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme
- Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency ('Ahpra')
- Assistant Commissioner, Tasmania Police
- Secretary, Department for Education, Children and Young People and, before that, the Secretary, Department of Communities and the Secretary, Department of Education
- Secretary, Department of Health
- Secretary, State Growth
- Teachers Registration Board.

In several cases, a referral was unnecessary because those involved were already subject to an investigation, proceedings, disciplinary findings or criminal conviction.

In addition, the Order of the Governor required us to report to the appropriate authorities where we identified a risk or potential risk to the welfare of a child or children generally.[59] We also had an obligation to take steps to prevent abuse or neglect if we knew, or suspected on reasonable grounds, that a child was suffering, had suffered or is likely to suffer abuse or neglect.[60] These steps can include reporting our concerns to the Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People or a community-based intake service.[61] During our Commission of Inquiry, we made more than 230 referrals to Tasmanian and other authorities regarding risks or potential risks to the welfare of children.

2.3.4 Power to make a finding of misconduct and an adverse finding

Our Commission of Inquiry has the power to make findings or draw conclusions from evidence we gather. Under section 19 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act, if we intend to make an adverse finding against a person, we must first notify the person in writing, including the details of the adverse finding, and allow the person at least 10 working days to respond to the findings before our Inquiry's report is finalised.[62] The rules of procedural fairness apply if our final report makes an adverse finding about that person.[63] In Volumes 3–6 we make a number of adverse findings against individuals and the State. Each individual and the State were given written notice of these findings.

Under section 18 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act, we also have the power to make a finding of misconduct against a person.[64] Misconduct is defined in the Commissions of Inquiry Act as:

> … conduct by a person that could reasonably be considered likely to result in a criminal charge, civil liability, disciplinary proceedings, or other legal proceedings, being brought against that person in respect of the conduct.[65]

Before making a finding of misconduct, if we are satisfied that an allegation of misconduct should be made against a person before calling that person to give evidence, we must give the person notice of the allegation of misconduct and provide them with an opportunity to respond to the notice (a 'section 18 notice').[66] The notice must give the person a reasonable period before they have to give evidence in response to the allegation.[67] It must outline the allegation and the evidence that supports it.[68] In response, the person may make oral or written submissions, give evidence to contradict or explain the allegation, cross-examine the person making the allegation, and call witnesses.[69] The person has a right to be represented by legal counsel.[70] We issued 30 section 18 notices to 22 people. In Volume 6, we make one finding of misconduct.

During our Inquiry, various interpretations of sections 18 and 19 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act, and the relationship between them, were presented by the State and lawyers acting for individuals. In relation to state servants, some have argued that the interpretations of these provisions have the effect that if our Commission of Inquiry wishes to make an adverse comment about the conduct of a state servant, this may effectively be a finding of misconduct against that person and require the specific process under section 18 to be followed. This argument is based on the fact that the definition of misconduct includes conduct that 'could reasonably be considered likely to result in … disciplinary proceedings' and conduct by state servants that might attract adverse comment could require consideration of whether there has been a breach of the State Service Principles or Code of Conduct, and hence give rise to a disciplinary proceeding (even if the outcome of such proceeding is uncertain). A similar argument could be made about any person who, by virtue of their profession or employment, might be subject to any form of disciplinary proceeding.

We consider that there should be scope for a commission of inquiry to make adverse comments about state servants without this automatically or necessarily also constituting findings of misconduct. We consider the Commissions of Inquiry Act reflects that there can be both types of findings and that a range of conduct might be criticised without it constituting misconduct.

Our view is that section 18 only applies to the extent that we consider any allegations, or make any findings, of misconduct. We consider that, under section 19 of the Act, we can make adverse findings that are not findings of misconduct. In those circumstances, we consider that it is not necessary to issue a notice under section 18, provided we comply with sections 19(2A) and 19(2B) of the Act.

We have maintained that distinction in the language of our report, where we have only designated one of our findings to be a finding of misconduct. We understand that lawyers would adopt the most beneficial interpretation for their clients and seek to minimise any adverse findings or findings of misconduct, but note that the State also advocated for the interpretation that had the effect of combining adverse comment and misconduct in relation to a person's conduct. We quote at length:

> … the findings against individuals in this Inquiry must still be characterised as misconduct findings. The State does not accept any argument that section 18 of the Act must be 'read down' to provide a 'functional interpretation'. This Inquiry is 'out of the ordinary' in that it focuses on workers who are in a highly regulated profession. Unlike many Inquiries which could be constituted under the Act, these are findings made against State Servants. As the Commission is aware, State Servants are subject to the statutory Code of Conduct found within the State Service Act 2000. Any adverse findings will bring the full effect of the Code of Conduct into play against any named individual and accordingly, adverse finding is likely to result in the consideration of disciplinary proceedings against that worker.
>
> … Any finding which may have the result of leading to disciplinary proceedings are findings of misconduct and as such, those workers have all the protections afforded them pursuant to section 18 of the Act.[71]

To avoid drawn-out legal argument and dispute, we adapted our procedural fairness processes to align with this interpretation and to avoid making adverse findings against individuals where they may have been considered to be findings of misconduct.

The Commissions of Inquiry Act shares some similarities with legislation in other Australian jurisdictions in relation to royal commissions and commissions of inquiry. Like most of these other jurisdictions, Tasmanian legislation provides that an inquiry is not bound by the rules of evidence (section 20(1)) and must observe the rules of procedural fairness (section 3(b)(i)).[72] We are not aware, however, of any other Australian jurisdiction imposing the requirements for a finding of misconduct that exist in Tasmania under section 18.[73]

In our view, the procedural requirements under section 18 for making a finding of misconduct are onerous. In particular, the requirement to provide reasonable notice with a level of specificity about the allegation, and the evidence supporting the allegation, while concurrently running an inquisitorial process within a limited timeframe, presents practical difficulties. Also, providing a person who receives a notice of an allegation of misconduct the option to choose how to respond, which might include requiring further hearings, also significantly limits the capacity of a commission of inquiry to conduct that inquiry in the manner it considers appropriate, including to appropriately address any trauma-informed considerations in relation to vulnerable people.

While procedural fairness—including a person's right to know any potential adverse findings against them and to be able to respond to those findings—is a cornerstone of our legal system, it is not clear to us why this right could not be adequately met through the procedural fairness requirements set out in section 19, as relevantly supported by the common law.

These complexities and challenges were discussed even before the Commissions of Inquiry Act was introduced in 1995. A 1993 report from the Law Reform Commission noted that:

> [a] balance must be maintained between the rights of individuals and the need for the commission conducting the public inquiry to properly and fully investigate and report upon the issues referred to it.[74]

The Commission of Inquiry into the Death of Joseph Gilewicz in 2000 identified specific difficulties in achieving this balance. Some, but not all, of these concerns were addressed in the Commissions of Inquiry Amendment Act 2000.[75] Despite the amendments, the section of the Act relating to misconduct was still thought by some to be 'overly complicated' and inflexible, hampering the ability of commissions to achieve their goals.[76] A 2003 Tasmania Law Reform Institute report therefore recommended further amendments to the Act.[77] Once again, some but not all of these concerns were addressed in the Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act, which was said to implement the work of the Tasmania Law Reform Institute and the Australian Law Reform Commission.[78] Relevantly, this amending Act created separate misconduct (section 18) and adverse (section 19) findings processes, which we find overly complicated and ultimately unnecessary. Indeed, the Australian Law Reform Commission focused on adverse findings (that might include findings of misconduct) and suggested that procedural fairness process matters might be better addressed outside legislation (for example, through policy guidance) to offer greater flexibility.[79] This amending Act also sought to amend the definition of 'misconduct' to address concerns it was too broad. But it ultimately inserted a new definition that, as explained above, is also broad and problematic in practice.

As a matter of principle, we consider it would be better for an inquiry to make any findings it wishes, including adverse findings, subject to complying with procedural fairness. It should be a matter for the inquiry to choose whether a finding is of such seriousness, given the subject matter of the inquiry, that it might be appropriate to describe it as a finding of misconduct. In our view, it is unnecessary for an inquiry to follow any other procedural requirements in relation to such a finding, noting that the seriousness of the matter should also be taken into account in any balance of probabilities deliberations.

Also, forcing an inquiry to adopt extra 'misconduct' processes in relation to a broad category of conduct, not all of which may be of equal seriousness, risks unnecessarily increasing the impact on those who receive a notice of such alleged findings. Once again, it would be better for the inquiry to have the flexibility to treat any finding, including an adverse finding, in the way that is most appropriate and fair in the circumstances, rather than being artificially required to treat all adverse comments as 'misconduct'.

In considering other Australian jurisdictions, it is not clear to us why the Tasmanian legislation requires separate misconduct processes. This position is inconsistent with contemporary inquiry practices. Ultimately, we are concerned the Tasmanian legislation invites arguments and disputes that prevent local inquiries from being as effective and efficient as they might be, and so limits the impact they can have for the benefit of the community.

We have outlined our concerns about section 18 and other provisions under the Tasmanian legislation in Chapter 23.

The findings we make in this report are based on a civil standard of proof. That is, we were satisfied that a matter had been proved on the balance of probabilities, rather than proved to the criminal standard of beyond reasonable doubt. We based our assessment on the following principles, as set out by Justice Dixon in Briginshaw v Briginshaw:

> … it is enough that the affirmative of an allegation is made out to the reasonable satisfaction of the tribunal. But reasonable satisfaction is not a state of mind that is attained or established independently of the nature and consequence of the fact or facts to be proved. The seriousness of an allegation made, the inherent unlikelihood of an occurrence of a given description, or the gravity of the consequences flowing from a particular finding are considerations which must affect the answer to the question whether the issue has been proved to the reasonable satisfaction of the tribunal … the nature of the issue necessarily affects the process by which reasonable satisfaction is attained.[80]

The findings in this report seek to discharge our terms of reference, which ultimately aim to inform systemic reforms. These findings are not, and cannot be, substitutes for criminal prosecutions or civil or disciplinary proceedings. As indicated above, the State can investigate, prosecute or bring other proceedings in relation to the facts and matters that are relevant to this report, including where our Commission of Inquiry has referred matters to the State or appropriate authorities. Under section 21 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act, the State cannot generally use evidence given before our Inquiry directly. However, the rights and protections under the Commissions of Inquiry Act do not prevent the State conducting its own investigations. Indeed, it would defeat the purpose of a commission of inquiry if the State could not take appropriate action in relation to the underlying facts and matters.

3 Conduct

Our Commission of Inquiry's job was to understand the complexity of institutional responses to child sexual abuse in government funded institutions, and to identify ways to create tangible and lasting change in these institutions. In this section, we outline how we approached our task.

We intend that the work of our Inquiry will protect Tasmanian children and young people from sexual abuse in and in connection with these institutions. We hope it will increase community understanding and improve responses to child sexual abuse and its impacts.

3.1 Who we heard from

To help accomplish our task, we engaged with more than 500 people including:

- Tasmanian children
- victim-survivors—children, young people and adults
- the families, communities and supporters of victim-survivors
- government and institutional representatives
- key service providers and stakeholders
- community members with relevant information
- experts in the field.

We acknowledge the strength and commitment to change demonstrated by many of those who came forward to talk to us about their own experiences or about their attempts to protect children and ensure effective responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse.

3.1.1 Information handling

Much of the evidence we considered was given by victim-survivors and their loved ones and communities. We were particularly careful to treat this evidence respectfully. Accordingly, we put in place a procedure for handling information provided by victim-survivors. This procedure was possible because of recent changes to laws relevant to sexual assault.

The #LetHerSpeak campaign—also known as #LetUsSpeak—was founded in 2018 to 'abolish sexual assault victim gag-laws in Tasmania, the Northern Territory and, more recently, Victoria'.[81] Advocates described these laws as 'gag-laws' because they had the consequence of:

- silencing victim-survivors who wanted to speak out
- removing victim-survivors' control over their experiences and denying personal agency
- maintaining the social stigma around sexual violence
- enabling and protecting offenders
- disempowering victim-survivors
- restricting public education around sexual assault.

After significant public pressure, some laws were changed to allow victim-survivors of sexual abuse to self-disclose or permit third parties to disclose their identity, and for courts to make orders to permit disclosure.[82]

As a result of the #LetHerSpeak campaign and legal amendments, people who shared information with our Commission of Inquiry could tell us how they wanted their information handled. Before we began receiving information from prospective participants, we explained that we could treat their information as:

- public—information could be viewed, referenced, quoted or published as required by Commissioners and Commission of Inquiry staff, and attributed to the participant
- anonymous—information could be used, but identifying details about the participant were removed and not published or made public
- confidential—information could only be viewed by Commissioners and Commission of Inquiry staff, and not used or published in the report.

We told participants that they could choose their preferred information-handling option and could later change their mind about how their information was handled. We also emailed a diagrammatic fact sheet titled 'How will my information be handled?' to victim-survivors who registered their interest in contributing to our Inquiry. This gave them time to digest and consider this information before taking part.

3.1.2 Support for people sharing information

We were aware that providing information about institutional responses to child sexual abuse is a complex process. It could be experienced as challenging, distressing, validating, triggering or healing, and could invoke other reactions. We therefore wanted to ensure our interactions with people sharing information were trauma-informed. This refers to understanding the impact of trauma on a victim-survivor and interacting in ways that support recovery and reduce the possibility of retraumatisation.[83] Chapters 19 and 21 detail why it is important for all services interacting with victim-survivors to provide trauma-informed care.

The core principles of trauma-informed care are safety, trustworthiness, choice, collaboration and empowerment.[84] We sought to implement these principles from our first contact with victim-survivors. We tried to be open and transparent about the Commission of Inquiry's processes so that our role and limitations were clear. In particular, and to reduce the likelihood of retraumatisation, our sessions with a Commissioner were adjusted according to victim-survivors' choices.[85] Victim-survivors could bring a support person, meet in whatever setting felt most comfortable (including online) and control what information to share and how it was used.

People who took part in our Inquiry could also access counselling if needed. During and after their engagement with us, they could speak with an independent counsellor or an appropriately trained member of our team. In this way, we provided psychological first aid, risk assessments, safety planning, referrals to services and other means of support.

Aboriginal engagement officers were also available to provide culturally sensitive support to Aboriginal people who wanted their contribution to our Inquiry facilitated by an Aboriginal person.

3.2 Our staff

Many dedicated and hardworking staff made conducting a comprehensive inquiry possible.

We were well supported in our work by staff across four teams:

- Our Community Engagement Team comprised professionals with experience assisting vulnerable people (such as victim-survivors of child sexual abuse). This team worked closely with two Aboriginal engagement officers. The team supported our Inquiry's consultation processes, including sessions with a Commissioner, stakeholder consultations, engagement with Aboriginal communities, site visits and roundtable discussions and briefings. This team also included a media and stakeholder engagement officer, who assisted with community and stakeholder consultations, and liaised with the media to convey information about our activities and communicate with the public.
- Our Policy and Research Team comprised policy officers and an investigator seconded from the Australian Federal Police (the Australian Federal Police paid for this secondment). This team handled research strategies and programs that informed the strategic direction of our Commission of Inquiry. The team developed investigation strategies and programs, informed the hearings and stakeholder consultations and briefings, led the drafting of our final report and ensured we were well informed to make strong recommendations that could be feasibly implemented.

- Our Operations Team established our Commission of Inquiry's offices and coordinated staff across four states. This team provided logistical support, secured venues for public hearings and other Commission of Inquiry events, made travel arrangements, and ensured that public hearings ran smoothly and efficiently. They also took care of finance, human resources, infrastructure, decommissioning and archiving.
- Our Legal Team included Counsel Assisting, General Counsel and Solicitors Assisting. This team of lawyers provided our Inquiry with legal advice, administered inquiry procedures, sought an extensive amount of material, and conducted proper and effective hearings. The team identified and called appropriate witnesses and questioned them in a way that elicited useful evidence for our consideration. Our Legal Team also helped develop our final report.

Staff of our Commission of Inquiry and the Legal Team are named in Appendix C.

We express our gratitude to the Commission of Inquiry staff and the Legal Team who so ably assisted us to undertake our inquiries, prepare our final report and make recommendations.

3.3 Our forms of inquiry

The information and evidence that have informed the discussions and recommendations in this report have been obtained through multiple forms of inquiry including:

- written submissions
- sessions with a Commissioner
- sessions with our Community Engagement Team
- public and targeted stakeholder consultations
- consultations with Aboriginal communities
- site visits to youth detention and youth justice facilities
- research undertaken by our Legal Team and commissioned researchers
- public hearings
- roundtable discussions and briefings with government and agency representatives.

Because our Commission of Inquiry coincided with the COVID-19 pandemic, some of these forms of inquiry could not go ahead in person as planned. In line with COVID-19–safe protocols and relevant directions under the Public Health Act 1997 ('Public Health Act'), we conducted our Inquiry online using remote-access technology, when necessary and appropriate.[86] There were some benefits to technology-facilitated access, such as extending access to victim-survivors and experts based interstate and overseas.

Each form of inquiry is described in the following sections. Rather than standing alone, evidence obtained through each method informed our approach to, and discussions held in, other forums.

3.3.1 Written submissions

On 13 May 2021, we published an information paper calling for written submissions that addressed our terms of reference. The paper explained the scope of our Inquiry and that submissions would help inform our 'understanding of the gaps, challenges and problems with the Tasmanian Government's responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional settings'.[87] The paper also included a list of guiding questions and details about the submission process.

We welcomed written submissions in any length or format, to be submitted online, by mail or by email. People wanting to submit a hard copy of their written submission could do so with the support of our Operations Team. Those who needed help to write a submission could get support from Tasmania Legal Aid and our Community Engagement Team.

We invited victim-survivors and their supporters to tell us about their experiences and the ways in which the Tasmanian Government's responses to allegations and incidents of child sexual abuse might be improved.[88]

Within a month, we had received 60 written submissions. To enable as many people as possible to contribute, we then simplified the submission process and extended the closing date for submissions from 2 July 2021 to 3 September 2021. Our Commission of Inquiry continued to receive and consider submissions after this time.

By 14 February 2022, we had received 143 submissions from a wide range of people and organisations. Our Legal Team assessed each submission to determine whether the subject matter was within our terms of reference, as well as whether the submission should be treated as public, anonymous or confidential. Some 139 of the 143 submissions were within our terms of reference. Of these, 45 submissions were public, 49 were confidential and 45 were anonymous. Tasmania Legal Aid assisted four people to make submissions.

Our Policy and Research Team reviewed and further analysed the submissions, categorising those making allegations about instances of child sexual abuse and those identifying systemic issues in relation to child sexual abuse.

From 143 submissions, we noted 160 individual allegations of instances of child sexual abuse (excluding one submission that contained hundreds of allegations). We further analysed this material against criteria including whether the allegation concerned an adult abuser or harmful sexual behaviours, and to which relevant case study or thematic area the allegation related. Because submitters were not asked to provide this information, we note that the following quantitative information is an approximation and based on volunteered information available in the submissions.

Of the 160 allegations, 132 related to adult abusers, 14 to harmful sexual behaviours and 14 were unclear.

Among these specific allegations:

- 63 allegations related to child sexual abuse in schools, with many raising concerns about abuse occurring before 2000
- 25 allegations related to Ashley Youth Detention Centre
- 25 allegations related to health services, particularly the offending of Mr Griffin
- 6 allegations related to out of home care.

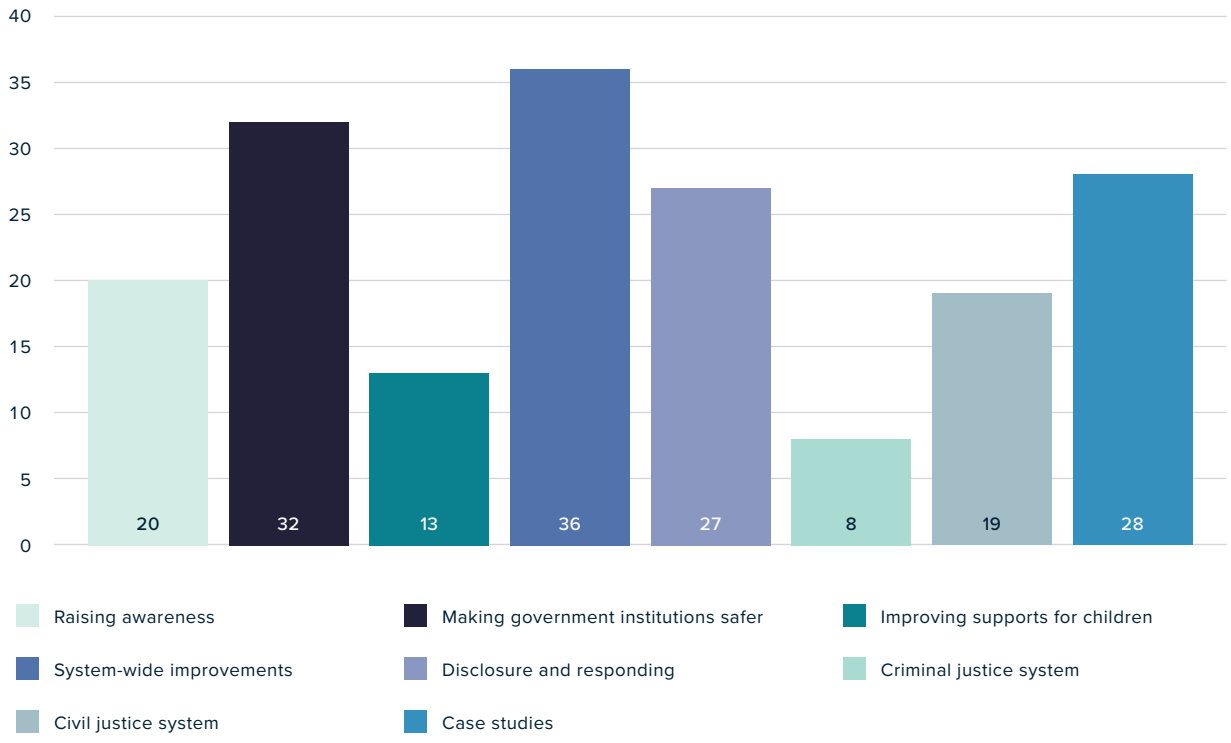
As indicated above, all submissions were coded for systemic issues relevant to child sexual abuse, including the following themes (noting that some submissions addressed more than one theme):

- 20 submissions addressed topics relevant to raising awareness of and preventing child sexual abuse, including calling for prevention and early intervention measures, addressing Tasmanian attitudes to child sexual abuse, and the need for a community-wide response
- 32 submissions addressed topics relevant to making government institutions safer, such as addressing the physical design of buildings, calling for child safe standards, improving screening practices (such as professional registration and registration to work with vulnerable people), training for staff to recognise abuse, and developing codes of professional conduct for staff and a reportable conduct scheme
- 13 submissions addressed topics relevant to improving supports for children, including supporting children with specific backgrounds or experiences (such as being Aboriginal or having disability), how to support adults to understand when children are making disclosures to them, and providing supports, including therapeutic responses, for children displaying or experiencing harmful sexual behaviours

- 36 submissions addressed topics relevant to system-wide improvements, including improving coordination across agencies, strengthening mandatory reporting, improving record keeping, strengthening oversight bodies (such as the Commissioner for Children and Young People, the Ombudsman and the Integrity Commission), and increasing funding
- 27 submissions addressed topics relevant to improving institutions' identification of and response to disclosures, including barriers to making complaints, concerns about Tasmania's culture and size, having clear complaints processes, and difficulties with disciplinary processes and internal investigation processes
- 8 submissions addressed topics relevant to improving the criminal justice system, including police responses, criminal offences and procedures, bail and sentencing, and training legal practitioners in matters relevant to child sexual abuse
- 19 submissions addressed topics relevant to civil justice matters, redress and support for victim-survivors, including the National Redress Scheme, the conduct of civil litigation matters and therapeutic supports for victim-survivors, as well as preserving records and providing official apologies
- 28 submissions addressed topics relevant to our four focus institutions—education, youth detention, out of home care and health.

These themes are summarised in Figure 1.1.

Figure 1.1: Systemic themes from submissions to our Commission of Inquiry



From these submissions, we gained a sense of the problems in the Tasmanian Government's response to child sexual abuse, including:

- a lack of a systemic response to child sexual abuse
- fears of reprisals for speaking out about child sexual abuse
- concerns about misconduct and cover-ups
- a lack of human empathy in responses to child sexual abuse
- a lack of priority given to the safety of children
- problems with disciplinary processes.

The firsthand insight and experiences conveyed in the submissions we received, as well as observations made by organisations, deepened our understanding of the nature and breadth of child sexual abuse in government institutions. We appreciate the time people spent considering and writing their submissions. We are particularly grateful to people who provided accounts of their personal experiences, sometimes for the first time.

3.3.2 Sessions with a Commissioner

By 17 July 2023 (from 13 August 2021), 132 people affected by child sexual abuse had shared their experience with a Commissioner in person, online, by video-conference or on the telephone. Sessions with a Commissioner were due to be completed by the end of February 2023 to allow information shared to be included in our final report. In practice, some sessions were held after this date, and Commission staff continued to receive information from people who wished to share it.

Because it can be distressing and exhausting for victim-survivors and their supporters to recount traumatising experiences, each session with a Commissioner was designed to be welcoming and trauma-informed. Many people who attended a session later reported feeling supported during their engagement with our Commission of Inquiry, which we hope reflects the sense of privilege and respect we felt when people trusted us with their experiences. For example, one participant said after their session with a Commissioner: 'Thank you for listening to my story. I think that, in a way, I can have some closure now'.[89] Another said, 'I'm relieved that I'm being taken seriously, I'm relieved that someone out there aside from me cares this happened and happens … It's validation. I have validation and that means so much'.[90] We discovered while undertaking our Inquiry that the very existence of our Inquiry had a positive impact on many victim-survivors. For example, one participant told us:

> Thank you for all your work. Thank you for addressing the concerns of survivors, and for looking at a difficult problem with a fresh set of eyes … Your work has had a major positive impact on my life experience (and others I'm sure) and has been integral to my own healing.[91]

Sessions with a Commissioner had a profound impact on the Commissioners and inquiry staff. We consider it a privilege to have spent time with the victim-survivors, their loved ones and supporters, who have shared their stories and experiences of sexual abuse and their attempts to obtain justice, healing and the protection of others. The strength and resilience of the people who spoke to us in these sessions often restored our faith in humanity in the face of confronting conduct by others. These sessions have helped us understand the varied and complex ways in which trauma can profoundly alter the everyday lives of many people in our community. Our task would have been made far more difficult without victim-survivors and their supporters placing their trust in us. We do not take that trust for granted.

Registering for a session

Tasmanians became aware of sessions with a Commissioner in several ways. Many learned about sessions because of their previous engagement with us—by writing a submission, contacting us by telephone or email, or attending a stakeholder consultation. Other paths for engagement included referrals from our Aboriginal engagement officers and the 'Sessions with a Commissioner' page on our website. People interested in attending a session with a Commissioner generally registered their interest by emailing us or calling our 1800 number. People in prison could contact us via our 1800 number, which was placed on prison telephone systems.

When a person called to register for a session, they were connected to a member of our Community Engagement Team, who then became their point of contact for the length of their engagement with us. The Community Engagement Team assessed the eligibility of each person to attend a session based on the nature of the information they wanted to share and the relevance of this information to our Inquiry.

Next, the team talked to people about what to expect during a session and supported them to make an informed choice about how the information they may contribute should be managed. We also outlined our mandatory reporting obligations to participants.

The wellbeing of people attending a session was of paramount importance to us. During the registration process, the Community Engagement Team determined each person's support needs and let them know that we would provide them with access to counselling supports before, during and after their session with a Commissioner. The Aboriginal engagement officers offered culturally sensitive support to Aboriginal participants.

Conducting a session

Commissioners spoke with victim-survivors, their loved ones and supporters, as well as people with information about Tasmanian Government institutions. We heard from a diverse group of people who were located variously in regional and metropolitan areas across Tasmania. We spoke with people in prison and other secure or residential environments, and with people from different age groups, including teenagers. We also spoke to people with an experience of child sexual abuse in a Tasmanian Government institution who now live interstate or overseas.

Many parents and caregivers took part in a session on behalf of their children. Although it was open to children to have their own session with a Commissioner, children most commonly contributed to our Inquiry through the child-centred research project discussed in Section 3.3.8.

Sessions usually ran for one hour. They were conducted in a range of formats and settings depending on the needs of the participant. In-person meetings were held in private meeting rooms. Virtual sessions were conducted (primarily using Microsoft Teams) with participants who spoke from locations in which they felt safe and assured of privacy. Sessions were attended by the participant, a Commissioner and a member of our Community Engagement Team. Participants decided how to use the time available and what they wanted to talk about. Participants could also choose to bring a support person or lawyer. People providing support did so on the understanding that information disclosed and discussed during a session would be used only for the purpose of our Commission of Inquiry and in line with the participant's expressed wishes about confidentiality.

When the session concluded, we arranged counselling support and transport home for participants if requested. Table 1.1 displays the data collected about Commissioner sessions and Table 1.2 shows the primary institution type in which session participants described child sexual abuse occurring.

Table 1.1: Sessions with a Commissioner data

Session, submission and participant-specific data	Total
Number of sessions held	132
Sessions held face to face	78
Sessions held by telephone	3
Sessions held by videoconference	51
Sessions held with people living interstate	15
Sessions held with people living overseas	5
Participant location—northern Tasmania	45
Participant location—North West Tasmania	7
Participant location—southern Tasmania	59
Participant location—eastern Tasmania	1
Age of youngest and oldest participant	17 and 72
Gender diverse participants	3
Female participants	82
Male participants	47
Participants who identified as Aboriginal	16
Participants who wanted their information to be public	45
Participants who wanted their information to be anonymous	71
Participants who wanted their information to be confidential	16
Pathway for participant engagement—written submission	44
Pathway for participant engagement—telephone or email	65
Pathway for participant engagement—referral	16
Pathway for participant engagement—stakeholder consultation	7

Table 1.2: Participant information

Primary institution type	Victim-survivor	Supporter of victim-survivor	Third party with information	Total
Health (excluding in relation to Mr Griffin)	7	3	9	19
Health (in relation to Mr Griffin)	11	5	8	24
Education	22	11	13	46
Out of home care	11	2	5	18
Ashley Youth Detention Centre	6	1	6	13
Other*	4	2	6	12
Total	61	24	47	132

* 'Other' refers to institutions other than those that could be categorised as health, education, out of home care or Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

Key themes

Participants brought a range of issues to our attention during their sessions with a Commissioner. Many spoke of their lived experience in government funded institutions such as schools, hospitals, out of home care facilities and Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

Below are the themes that struck us from personally attending these sessions:

- Child sexual abuse victim-survivors showed extraordinary courage and generosity in their motivation to make systems better and to protect other children.
- Child sexual abuse has significant and lifelong impacts on emotional, physical and spiritual wellbeing, as well as developmental capacity and milestones.
- Victim-survivors showed tremendous strength and resilience; they make positive contributions to their families, their communities and/or through their work while living with the pain and lasting impacts of child sexual abuse.
- Children have often been poorly treated in institutional settings, particularly children with special needs, children already exposed to abuse and trauma and children without family to stand up for them.
- Institutional responses to allegations, complaints and disclosures of child sexual abuse have sometimes been inadequate. Some responses have minimised the abuse, children have not been believed or not offered support, investigations have been non-existent, hurried and/or inefficient, and abusers have been protected and relocated to other workplaces.
- The responses to child sexual abuse in school, health, out of home care and detention settings, and in the justice system, have often not been informed by an understanding of victim-survivor trauma.
- Clear reporting and complaint mechanisms have often been lacking. At times, staff have feared reprisal, bullying or loss of their job and career prospects if they raised concerns about child sexual abuse.
- At times, toxic workplace cultures have meant that identifying risks and problematic behaviours has been discouraged among staff, and shifting responsibility and blame has been common.
- Too often, staff across institutions have not had the knowledge to recognise grooming or understand child safety reporting requirements.

- At times, redress and compensation processes have been difficult, not adapted to the impacts on victim-survivors and not focused enough on therapeutic supports for victim-survivors.
- Victim-survivors and their parents or supporters have frequently struggled to access affordable, timely therapeutic and practical supports to meet their needs.

3.3.3 Sessions with our Community Engagement Team

If a person was interested in sharing their experiences but did not want to write a submission or talk directly with a Commissioner, or their experience fell outside our terms of reference, we gave them the option of speaking one-on-one over the telephone with a member of our Community Engagement Team.

When we received information this way, the Community Engagement Team member first ensured that the caller felt safe, was in an appropriate location, and had privacy. The same protocols that applied to a session with a Commissioner about the use of information were applied in each session with a member of our Community Engagement Team, and were explained to the caller.

During the conversation, the team member took notes and asked clarifying questions when needed. The conversation was not otherwise recorded.

Eighty-three people chose to share information in this way. Although only 49 of these conversations were in the scope of our Inquiry, we believe it was important to extend an opportunity for all interested people to share information and understand our work.

3.3.4 Stakeholder consultations

Between 13 August and 13 December 2021, we held 21 targeted and public stakeholder consultations. We also held several informal discussions with individuals and groups. We spoke to people with experience of government institutions and relevant sectors, including teachers, social workers, police, healthcare professionals, specialist child sexual abuse professionals, people working with children and young people, academic experts, staff from local councils, community leaders, and representatives of Aboriginal communities and culturally and linguistically diverse communities.[92]

Stakeholder consultations were conducted in metropolitan and regional locations, as well as online. Each consultation ran for about 90 minutes. Consultations with many attendees were guided by an external facilitator, and Commission of Inquiry staff members took notes on the day.

More than 150 people attended these consultations. They provided a wealth of information relevant to our terms of reference and informed other aspects of our Inquiry, such as priority topics for our later public hearings. We thank everyone who attended a consultation for taking the time to share their expertise and insight with us.

Public stakeholder consultations

Of the 21 stakeholder sessions we held, seven were public consultations in Hobart, Launceston, Devonport (two sessions), Burnie, Queenstown and Scamander. Those who wanted to take part registered in advance. Attendance at each session ranged from one person to 41 people (refer to Table 1.3). In total, we heard from more than 100 people during our public consultations.

At each consultation, participants worked in small groups to discuss topics related to current government responses to child sexual abuse. In relation to each topic, participants were asked:

- What works well?
- What is not working well?
- How could the current system be improved?

At the end of each consultation, a Commissioner provided an overview of what we heard.

Table 1.3: Public stakeholder consultations

Date	Location	Number of participants
13 August 2021	Hobart	41
19 August 2021	Launceston	29
23 August 2021	Devonport	13
23 August 2021	Devonport	1
24 August 2021	Burnie	11
27 August 2021	Queenstown	10
31 August 2021	Scamander	4

Information received during public stakeholder consultations was wide-ranging and reflected the lived experiences of participants in dealing with child protection and child safety issues in various institutional settings. Consultations gave us a detailed insight into the struggles that victim-survivors, communities and frontline workers faced, and continue to face, as they try to negotiate systemic gaps and failures.

Importantly, participants in consultations highlighted statewide and regionally-specific issues, giving us a clear and immediate picture of the issues relevant to child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutional settings as a whole.

Key themes

Key themes that emerged from public stakeholder consultations included:

- Many Tasmanians showed persistence and courage in raising issues to protect children.
- There was an absence or failure of mechanisms to respond to known risks and, if there were mechanisms, transparency and/or knowledge about them was lacking.
- There was a fear of reprisal and a sense that those who spoke out (victim-survivor or whistleblower) would be punished.
- There was a lack of care and compassion in responding to victim-survivors.
- Tasmanian institutional responses to prevent and respond to child sexual abuse were absent or out of date and did not incorporate contemporary knowledge.
- There was a failure to understand or consider that child sexual abuse, including grooming, was continuing to take place in Tasmanian Government institutions.

Participants also provided feedback on issues and ideas for improvement—for example, in prevention, reporting and responding, as well as on organisational, systemic and regional issues.

Across all stakeholder consultations, participants were asked about, but most struggled to identify, what was working well.

Targeted stakeholder consultations

We conducted 14 targeted stakeholder consultations in Hobart, Launceston and online (refer to Table 1.4). Attendance ranged from one person to 15 people per consultation. In total, we heard from more than 50 invited participants who regularly dealt with child sexual abuse matters, such as police and judicial officers, service providers, academics and advocates.

These targeted consultations allowed us to focus on a particular theme or issue, often identified through the submissions or the public consultations. Our questions and discussions at these consultations varied according to the stakeholder or stakeholder group we were meeting and the theme we were exploring. Information was provided in a private and closed setting, and although we draw on information provided in these consultations in our report, we have not identified individual participants or identified themes in detail here.

Table 1.4: Targeted stakeholder consultations

Date	Location	Number of participants
19 August 2021	Launceston	4
20 August 2021	Hobart/online	8
25 August 2021	Hobart/online	6
26 August 2021	Hobart	7
1 September 2021	Hobart/online	2
2 September 2021	Hobart	1
2 September 2021	Hobart	4
9 September 2021	Hobart	1
16 September 2021	Hobart	3
15 October 2021	Hobart	1
25 October 2021	Hobart/online	15
29 October 2021	Hobart/online	8
23 November 2021	Hobart/online	2
13 December 2021	Hobart	1

3.3.5 Engagement with Aboriginal communities

One of the continuing impacts of colonisation is that Aboriginal children are over-represented in certain government institutions, including the out of home care system and youth detention (refer to Volumes 4 and 5 for more on these institutions). We worked with two Aboriginal engagement officers to ensure our consultation processes with Aboriginal communities were culturally safe and inclusive, and that Aboriginal perspectives were heard and reflected in our findings.

Tasmanian Aboriginal context

In Australia, the definition of 'Aboriginal' has been subject to different classification systems at different times.[93] In the current Tasmanian context, the issue of who should be able to identify as Aboriginal is contentious and central to longstanding community divisions, notably between the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre and other Aboriginal-led organisations.[94]

The Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre was founded in the early 1970s. It is the earliest government funded and highest profile Aboriginal organisation in Tasmania.[95] However, Aboriginal communities in Tasmania are diverse and represented by numerous organisations.[96]

The Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre previously endorsed state-based eligibility criteria as a prerequisite to accessing services funded for Aboriginal people, namely documented evidence of Aboriginal ancestry. Concerns have since been raised about this criteria because people who could not prove their ancestry through public records were excluded from accessing services.[97]

In 2016, the Tasmanian Government decided to redefine eligibility criteria for accessing Aboriginal-specific services. The Government adopted a definition of Aboriginal that removed the need for documentary evidence of Aboriginal descent. Currently, eligibility for access to Aboriginal services is based on:

- completing an Eligibility Form for Tasmanian Government Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Specific Programs and Services[98]
- providing a statement from an Aboriginal organisation, as well as a statutory declaration of self-identification.[99]

The Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre opposed this change because it was concerned that non-Aboriginal people would identify as Aboriginal to access funding earmarked for Aboriginal communities, and therefore 'put a strain on resources'.[100]

We are conscious of the over-representation of Aboriginal children in some government institutions (such as out of home care and youth detention) as a direct and continuing impact of colonisation. We considered it our responsibility to listen and learn from the experiences and expertise of as many Aboriginal people as possible. We therefore sought to engage Aboriginal organisations across Tasmania, including the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre, to inform our Inquiry. We did not consider it the role or appropriate function of our Commission of Inquiry to determine who is Aboriginal. We therefore accepted the self-identified cultural identity of all people who engaged with us.

Engagement through community consultation

In mid to late 2021, our Community Engagement Team contacted 22 Aboriginal organisations via letter, telephone and/or email to initiate conversations about how communities might wish to engage with our Inquiry.[101] Ten of these organisations agreed to pass on information about our Commission of Inquiry to their members.

The Community Engagement Team also met with several prominent Aboriginal community members and organisations for further advice on developing an effective engagement strategy. This process led to engaging two Aboriginal engagement officers, who worked with our Inquiry to organise and facilitate statewide community consultations with Aboriginal people. Various community organisations or regions hosted 10 consultations (refer to Table 1.5). We then prepared a summary of reforms we were considering that were most relevant to Aboriginal communities. This was provided to community members and organisations that had attended consultations, and they were invited to provide feedback. This process was undertaken in response to advice from Aboriginal community members about how our Commission of Inquiry could engage in meaningful consultation.

Before holding consultations, we organised for all Commission of Inquiry staff to attend cultural awareness training. The Community Engagement Team received more in-depth training so they were better equipped to take part in consultations with Aboriginal communities.

Table 1.5: Consultations with Aboriginal communities

Date	Area of Tasmania	Number of participants
8 April 2022	North West	8
24 May 2022	North West	12
31 May 2022	Northern	6
3 June 2022	Southern	6
18 July 2022	Northern	8
19 July 2022	Northern	8
28 September 2022	North West	12
24 October 2022	Southern	16
21 February 2023	Southern	4
22 February 2023	Southern	5

Other forms of engagement

Aboriginal people also took part in our Inquiry in other ways. Some Aboriginal people contacted us independently or after attending a consultation. Others came to us via our Aboriginal engagement officers.

Sixteen Aboriginal people took part in sessions with a Commissioner. Another five people who identified as Aboriginal gave us information over the telephone or in writing. However, we did not routinely collect demographic data from people we spoke with on the telephone, and it was not always appropriate to ask our standard demographic questions of people participating in sessions with a Commissioner. It is therefore likely that these numbers are conservative.

We received a written statement from the chief executive officer of the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre, who also gave evidence during a public hearing (refer to Section 3.3.9).[102] We also received a written submission from the Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service.[103]

Of the 59 children and young people who took part in our primary research project (refer to Section 3.3.8), 11 identified as Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander.[104]

We convey our deepest thanks to the Aboriginal people who contributed their insight to our Inquiry. They have informed our views and the recommendations we make in this report.

Key themes

The information we received from Aboriginal members of the community was wide-ranging. For Aboriginal people, child sexual abuse is inextricably linked to colonisation and its traumatic intergenerational impacts. As with the approach taken by the National Royal Commission, we decided to include information from Aboriginal people that did not fit within our terms of reference but better reflected the whole story that has led to the over-representation of Aboriginal children in child sexual abuse statistics.[105] It was of vital importance that we listened to all that Aboriginal people had to say and reflected their perspectives in our findings and recommendations.

Key themes that emerged from our consultations with Aboriginal people included:

- Prevention and healing
    - There has been a lack of education and prevention programs for Aboriginal communities, specific to child sexual abuse.
    - Significant numbers of Aboriginal children have been abused by members of their own community because of the trauma of colonisation and dispossession. There has been a culture of silence around this and, as a result, these children have been more vulnerable to abuse in institutions, as well as being affected by another layer of trauma.
    - Conversely, there are false assumptions about Aboriginal culture and parenting that inaccurately identify the risk of child sexual abuse.
    - Culture and cultural programs are essential to healing Aboriginal children who have experienced sexual abuse, as well as to strengthening communities and thereby preventing abuse.
- Child Safety Services and Tasmania Police
    - Many Aboriginal families fear that Child Safety Services will remove their children, which has been a barrier to reporting child sexual abuse.
    - There is a lack of trust in police in Aboriginal communities due to experiences of mistreatment, which has also been a barrier to reporting child sexual abuse.
    - Aboriginal children and families have experienced culturally inappropriate and negative treatment from Child Safety Services.
    - Sexual abuse of Aboriginal children in out of home care has been prevalent.

    - There is a need for culturally appropriate alternatives to out of home care and child safety interventions, governed by Aboriginal people.
- Ashley Youth Detention Centre
    - Many Aboriginal children have been negatively affected by Ashley Youth Detention Centre—abuse has been prevalent, and there has been minimal cultural care and follow-up support.
    - There is a need for culturally appropriate youth justice alternatives governed by Aboriginal people.
    - There has been insufficient funding and a lack of culturally appropriate support for victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. There is a need for Aboriginal-led programs and safe cultural spaces.
- Other challenges
    - Designing and implementing initiatives tailored to Aboriginal children in government institutions and their families is complex. There has been a lack of support for Aboriginal people working in these institutions.
    - Distributing resources and implementing new programs across Tasmanian Aboriginal communities has been challenging due to divisions between communities.

3.3.6 Site visits to youth detention and youth justice facilities

In 2021 and 2022, we visited four institutions that detain children and young people. Our first site visit was to the only youth detention centre in Tasmania: Ashley Youth Detention Centre at Deloraine. This detention centre was a major focus of our Inquiry. The other site visits were to youth detention and youth justice facilities in other states and territories. We visited these facilities to understand and compare different models of detention.

During site visits (summarised in the following sections), we saw the facilities and workings of each complex, spoke directly with staff and young people, and learned about their model of care and approach to behaviour management. We also observed the institution's relationship with the community at large.

We discuss Ashley Youth Detention Centre and alternative detention models in detail in Volume 5.

Ashley Youth Detention Centre

On 18 August 2021, President Neave, Commissioner Bromfield and Commissioner Benjamin visited Ashley Youth Detention Centre. They were accompanied by three Commission of Inquiry staff members, as well as representatives of the Solicitor for the State and the Department of Communities, being the Deputy Secretary and Executive Director for Ashley Youth Detention Centre. These two departmental officials were there to support centre staff. The assistant manager and other centre representatives hosted the visit.

The visit occurred at the insistence of our Commission of Inquiry. Upon arrival, Commissioners were met with consternation about our visit and assurances that there were no issues of concern at Ashley Youth Detention Centre. This was in direct contrast to other youth detention centres in other states, where, despite having no powers, Commissioners were welcomed, visits were low key and staff spoke openly about their strengths and the challenges of operating youth detention facilities. Our experience at Ashley Youth Detention Centre was consistent with the accounts of others who have suggested that the Centre is a closed institution with a culture of cover-up and denial, as further evidenced in Volume 5.

Ashley Youth Detention Centre is Tasmania's sole custodial facility for children between the ages of 10 and 18. At the time of our visit, most children at the Centre were on remand.

On 9 September 2021, the Government announced that Ashley Youth Detention Centre would close within three years.[106]

Adelaide Youth Training Centre—Kurlana Tapa

On 14 October 2021, Commissioner Bromfield and a Commission of Inquiry staff member visited Kurlana Tapa, the Adelaide Youth Training Centre at Cavan in South Australia. The general manager of Youth Justice, South Australian Department of Human Services, hosted this visit. COVID-19 restrictions prevented us from entering the units at the centre, but we could visit other buildings as well as the grounds, including the Aboriginal cultural garden. Commissioner Benjamin also visited the centre on 2 June 2022, which was again hosted by the general manager of Youth Justice. With COVID-19 restrictions now eased, Commissioner Benjamin visited the educational facilities, health facilities, sporting and activity centres, and residential buildings.

Adelaide Youth Training Centre is a custodial facility for young people between the ages of 10 and 20. We were told that the numbers of children detained in South Australia had declined over time, but that most of the smaller number of children placed in the centre require intensive and complex supports and case management.

Cobham Youth Justice Centre

On 18 May 2022, Commissioner Benjamin visited the Cobham Youth Justice Centre at Claremont Meadows in New South Wales. The visit was organised with the executive director of Youth Justice New South Wales and was hosted by the acting centre manager at Cobham and the acting director of Custodial Operations, Youth Justice New South Wales.

Cobham Youth Justice Centre detains boys and young men between the ages of 15 and 20, who often present with drug and mental health issues. A significant proportion are from Aboriginal and Pacific Islander communities.

Bimberi Youth Justice Centre

On two occasions in 2022, Commissioners visited the Bimberi Youth Justice Centre in Gungahlin in the Australian Capital Territory. On 20 May, Bimberi's centre manager hosted Commissioner Benjamin. On 10 October, Bimberi's acting executive branch manager hosted President Neave.

Bimberi Youth Justice Centre uses a 'school campus model' and is the first youth justice facility in Australia to comply with human rights legislation.[107] It accommodates up to 40 children and young people between the ages of 12 and 21. Young people receive a health assessment when they arrive. Some have significant and complex mental health issues. Most are at the centre on remand.

3.3.7 Visit to Launceston General Hospital

On 14 March 2023, Commissioner Benjamin and a Commission of Inquiry staff member visited the Launceston General Hospital's child and adolescent and paediatrics wards. Our Commission of Inquiry instigated the visit, which the Department of Health facilitated. Hospital staff welcomed us and provided a comprehensive tour and explanation of the recently completed renovations.

3.3.8 Research

For further context with regard to what victim-survivors and other stakeholders were telling us and to inform priority topics for our public hearings (refer to Section 3.3.9), we undertook considerable research relevant to our terms of reference. This research included commissioned literature reviews and reviews of policy and related documents provided by the State. We also commissioned independent research to learn directly from the experiences of Tasmanian children and young people.

Literature and policy review

Our Legal Team collated more than 95,000 documents produced by agencies and government departments. We obtained this information in numerous ways, including by exercising our power to issue notice to produce documents. The Legal and Policy and Research teams reviewed this material. Table 1.6 lists documents that informed our hearings.

The National Royal Commission undertook extensive research on child sexual abuse in institutional settings and added significantly to the body of academic work on this issue. We reviewed the work of the National Royal Commission to inform our Inquiry.

In addition, after a targeted tender process, we funded the Australian Centre for Child Protection at the University of South Australia to source peer-reviewed articles on the topic of child sexual abuse, published since 2016.[108] The results of this search provided recent academic insight into five key areas:

- supporting children
- disclosure and response
- systems oversight
- making government institutions safe
- justice and support for victim-survivors.[109]

Table 1.6: Summary of documents that informed the hearings

Topic	Education	Out of home care	Health	Ashley Youth Detention Centre	Access to justice	The future	Other	Total
Requests for statement or information issued	13	7	51	67	12	0	3	140
Notices to produce material issued	3	0	13	4	2	0	8	31
Questions on notice	2	3	7	5	1	3	6	27
Orders made	7	6	2	4	1	1	0	21
Material produced	N/A	N/A	N/A	N/A	N/A	N/A	N/A	95,000+ documents

* Because requests for statement or information were issued to people under more than one category, the total value is less than the sum. The total also excludes those requests that did not progress for various reasons.

Commissioned research

In 2021, after a targeted tender process, we commissioned research from Associate Professor Tim Moore and Emeritus Professor Morag McArthur, initially via the Australian Centre for Child Protection, University of South Australia. The research project later moved to the Institute of Child Protection Studies at the Australian Catholic University in line with academic convention when Associate Professor Moore changed institutions. The purpose of this research was to hear directly from Tasmanian children and young people about their experiences and perspectives relevant to their safety in institutions.

The research involved speaking with 59 Tasmanian children and young people between the ages of 10 and 20 who had a variety of experiences with Tasmanian institutions in our areas of interest. In line with our key focus areas, participants were invited to reflect on their experiences in government schools, out of home care, hospitals or in Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

The researchers engaged children and young people in discussions about their experiences and feelings of safety in government institutions, their ability to raise safety concerns, and their awareness of high-risk and harmful adult and peer behaviours.

The report of this research, titled Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations, was provided to us in October 2022. The key findings of this report included:

- Most children and young people felt safe most of the time in institutions, but those who had experienced youth detention or been in out of home care were more likely to share experiences of violence, abuse and victimisation in institutions.[110]
- Access to trusted adults was important to make children and young people feel safe, recognising the role they can play in protecting them and advocating for them.[111]
- Children and young people reported feeling safer when they felt respected, valued and cared for, and they appreciated when adults involved them in decision making and listened to their concerns and ideas.[112]

The research report concluded that for institutions to be (and to feel) safer for children and young people, they needed to:

- embed child safety as a shared responsibility and ensure children and young people feel empowered and supported to share their safety concerns and engage meaningfully with the adults caring for them[113]
- have clear strategies to improve safety that are understood and visible for children and young people, including information about what to do if they are hurt or harmed[114]
- recognise that the past maltreatment of children and young people will heighten their risk of further abuse, requiring institutions to recognise and understand the impacts of trauma and to work with other agencies to minimise risks to children, and ensure they receive any therapeutic support they may need.[115]

Our Commission of Inquiry, along with two young people with experiences in Tasmanian Government institutions, launched the research report and an animation of a report summary designed for children and young people in February 2023.

More specific findings from this research (particularly how it relates to our focus institutions) are described throughout this report.

3.3.9 Public hearings

The primary purpose of holding public hearings was to explore ways in which the Department of Education, the Department of Health (particularly Launceston General Hospital), Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the out of home care system have dealt with the risk and occurrences of child sexual abuse in their institutions. We also dedicated a few hearing days to considering system-wide issues such as oversight of institutions, the statewide response to child sexual abuse, state disciplinary processes and the justice response to child sexual abuse.

In hearings that focused on specific institutions, we examined and evaluated the effectiveness of past and current Tasmanian systems, laws, policies and practices relevant to preventing and responding to child sexual abuse in that institutional context. Where appropriate, these hearings were informed by the accounts of victim-survivors or specific case studies that illustrated the themes we had observed. At these hearings, we also discussed how children might be better protected from sexual abuse in that institutional context, and how the Tasmanian Government might better address and alleviate the impact of past and future child sexual abuse.[116]

We held public hearings over 37 days between October 2021 and September 2022. Hearings took place in three venues: in Hobart at the Mövenpick Hotel and the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, and in Launceston at the Country Club Tasmania. The tribunal kindly provided its facilities free of charge.

Members of the public and the media were generally welcome to attend hearings in person or to watch our livestream. We usually provided public access to records of our proceedings. Daily hearing lists, transcripts, some witness statements and orders were published on our website and were also available in a range of accessible formats on request.

We were committed to being open and transparent, respecting the preferences of victim-survivors, and considering the effect that evidence from these hearings may have on other investigations, legal proceedings and the wider community. At times, our Commission of Inquiry made restricted publication orders to limit the publication of information that may identify victim-survivors, abusers or other people who may have been referred to during the hearings. Our Inquiry made those orders when we were satisfied that the public interest in the reporting on the identities of certain people was outweighed by legal and privacy considerations. We redacted (or did not publish) information in transcripts and witness statements in line with the restricted publication orders. These orders were published on our website and made available outside the hearing room and to media.

We recognised that, in some circumstances, it was important to protect the identity of a witness by allowing them to give their evidence using a pseudonym. In these circumstances, Counsel Assisting read from the witness's statement or their evidence was not livestreamed. Members of the public could be present to hear that evidence in the hearing room. In addition, we have used pseudonyms to refer to abusers, as required by law, throughout our Inquiry and in this report.[117]

We also received evidence in a closed hearing where we considered it necessary, including to avoid prejudicing current investigations or proceedings. In that circumstance, only certain people could be present in the hearing room. Transcripts of closed hearings were not published on our website.

We conducted hearings in line with our COVID-19 Vaccination Policy and the Public Health Act. We engaged specialist consultants to provide counselling support to witnesses and attendees.

The hearings process

We identified witnesses for public hearings from our stakeholder consultations, sessions with a Commissioner, public submissions and through other research activities. Individuals and organisations were generally issued with a notice to appear or to prepare a witness statement. Interested parties who wanted to give evidence could apply for leave from their workplace to appear at a public hearing. Witnesses were offered help to prepare for a hearing and counselling support.

Counsel Assisting our Commission of Inquiry, supported by our Legal and Policy and Research teams, led the hearings. Counsel Assisting, in consultation with the Legal and Policy and Research teams, determined the topics of hearings and questioned witnesses, subject to President Neave's direction.

Counsel Assisting's general approach to examining witnesses was informed by the victim-survivors and their families and supporters who had been in contact with our Commission of Inquiry. Counsel Assisting aimed to ensure these voices were heard and that the need for systemic change was considered in light of their experiences.[118]

Witnesses gave evidence orally or by written statement or both, and did so under oath or affirmation.

People granted leave to appear could also ask for leave, through their legal representative, to examine or cross-examine a witness, at the discretion of the President. Leave to cross-examine a witness was requested and granted once during our hearings.[119]

The role of Commissioners at public hearings was to listen and learn, and to assess the evidence. This evidence, along with all other evidence that we have received during our Inquiry, has informed our recommendations to the Tasmanian Government.

Hearings schedule

Our first public hearing was held in Hobart on 26 October 2021. Due to the ongoing impact of the COVID-19 pandemic, President Neave attended this hearing remotely. At this hearing, President Neave gave an overview of our Inquiry's progress and next steps. Counsel Assisting summarised the themes and lines of inquiry that had emerged from our work to date.

The next public hearing was held on 2 May 2022. Hearings then continued over the next four months. Each set of hearings had a particular focus, as outlined in Table 1.7.

Table 1.7: Public hearings

Date	Area of focus	Location
26 October 2021	Overview	Hobart
2–6 May 2022	Week 1: Common themes	Hobart
9–13 May 2022	Week 2: Education	Hobart
14–17 June 2022	Week 3: Out of home care	Hobart
27 June–1 July 2022	Week 4: Health	Launceston
4–8 July 2022	Week 5: Health / Criminal justice	Launceston
18–19 August 2022	Week 6: Ashley Youth Detention Centre	Hobart
22–26 August 2022	Week 7: Ashley Youth Detention Centre	Hobart
7 September 2022	Week 8: Ashley Youth Detention Centre	Hobart
8–9 September 2022	Week 8: Health	Hobart
12–13 September 2022	Week 9: Moving forward	Hobart

Who we heard from

We heard from 165 witnesses at public hearings. Most hearings began with evidence from people who had been directly or indirectly affected by child sexual abuse in the institutional settings under review. We heard from victim-survivors and their families and supporters, and from people who have advocated for reform.

We also heard from witnesses who held government and agency roles, including the:

- Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet
- Secretary of the Department of Justice
- Secretary of the Department of Education
- Secretary of the Department of Communities
- Secretary of the Department of Health
- Commissioner of Police

- Director of Public Prosecutions
- Solicitor-General
- Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme
- Registrar of the Teachers Registration Board
- Child Advocate
- Commissioner for Children and Young People
- Ombudsman (who is also the Health Complaints Commissioner and Custodial Inspector)
- Chief Executive Officer of the Integrity Commission.

We also heard from several Deputy Secretaries and managers of government departments, as well as academics, professionals and other experts working in the field of child safety in Tasmania and from other jurisdictions.

Throughout this report, we refer to current Secretaries and staff of relevant government departments by name. These Secretaries are responsible—and therefore accountable—for the Tasmanian Government's current responses to child sexual abuse in institutions. We have chosen not to name most past Secretaries and departmental staff because our recommendations are based on current systems, policies and practice.

Table 1.8 provides a summary of our public hearings across our areas of focus.

Table 1.8: Summary of hearings

Topic	Education	Out of home care	Health	Ashley Youth Detention Centre	Access to justice	The future	Other	Total
Number of hearing days	5	4	9	8	3	2	6	37 (including opening hearing)
Pages of transcripts	552	503	970	1,054	316	173	137	3,705
Witnesses called	21	27	36	36	13	10	31	165 (some called multiple times)
Witnesses not called but who gave sworn statements	2	5	17	29	0	0	1	51 (some also appeared in other weeks)*
Documents to support Counsel Assisting and parties appearing during hearings	504	529	1,772	1,497	171	72	254	4,779

* Some witnesses gave sworn statements for a hearing topic and then gave oral evidence on a different hearing topic.

What we learned

The public hearings brought much new information to light. They helped us to better understand the systemic and cultural issues relevant to our terms of reference that were unique to Tasmania and had not been addressed by the National Royal Commission. They also allowed us to closely examine the conduct of individuals and institutions in relation to specific reports of child sexual abuse, particularly in education, out of home care, health services and youth detention.

We heard that past and present Tasmanian governments have collectively failed to adequately prioritise the safety of children or the wellbeing of victim-survivors. Prominent among the themes to emerge from the evidence was the need for achievable reform that could be implemented in simple steps.[120]

Public hearings also offered another opportunity for victim-survivors to speak about their experiences, and for the community, including our Commission of Inquiry, to bear witness. We thank victim-survivors for coming forward and sharing their hopes that tangible, meaningful change will result from our work.

We are aware that thousands of people across Tasmania and Australia followed the progress of our hearings, and we thank the community for its interest. We believe there is a greater community awareness of the prevalence and impact of child sexual abuse in government institutions because of our hearings.

3.3.10 Roundtable discussions and briefings

Targeted discussions with senior staff from government agencies and statutory authorities were another source of evidence that informed our Inquiry. These discussions enabled us to better understand aspects of the system and proposals for reform.

On 25 October 2022, we held a roundtable discussion in Hobart with representatives of the Department of Justice, the Director of Public Prosecutions, Tasmania Legal Aid, the Law Society and the University of Tasmania. The topic of this discussion was the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Bill 2022. The Bill introduces legislative amendments in response to the recommendations of the National Royal Commission.[121] The purpose of this discussion was to understand the Tasmanian Government's reform intentions and progress relevant to child sexual abuse.

On 16 November and 5 December 2022, we received briefings from representatives of the Department of Justice on the Bill that became the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023. The Act establishes the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework in response to recommendations of the National Royal Commission. The Act also sets out new child safe standards and a reportable conduct scheme.[122]

On 9 December 2022, President Neave and Commissioner Benjamin held a roundtable discussion in Melbourne with representatives of Victoria Police. The topic of this discussion was child sexual abuse specialisation in police services. The purpose of the discussion was to understand how a police service in another jurisdiction responds to child sexual abuse in government institutions, with a view to comparing this model with the current response of Tasmania Police.

On Thursday 29 June 2023, we met with the co-chairs of the Child Safe Governance Review, Adjunct Professors Karen Crawshaw PSM and Debora Picone AO, to receive an update on the implementation of their recommendations by the Department of Health and Launceston General Hospital. The Child Safe Governance Review was established by the Department of Health in July 2022 in response to evidence that emerged from our public hearings in relation to responses to child sexual abuse at Launceston General Hospital.[123]

On Tuesday 4 July 2023, we met with Timothy Bullard, Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People. The purpose of this meeting was to discuss ways to improve responses to allegations of child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours within the Department and across the State Service.

On Wednesday 5 July 2023, we held a roundtable discussion with Jenny Gale, Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet and Head of the State Service, along with representatives from the State Service Management Office. The topic of this discussion was ways to reform the State's disciplinary processes, including the State Service Act 2000, the State Service Code of Conduct, and Employment Directions.

4 The structure of this report

This report reflects the evidence we received through all our methods of inquiry. We make findings about the conduct of individuals and the systemic problems we identified. We also outline our recommendations for the future, to help prevent child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions, and to improve responses when it does occur.

Our report has eight volumes:

- Volume 1 provides a summary of our report and our recommendations.
- Volume 2 (this volume) outlines the establishment, scope and conduct of our Inquiry, the international, national and Tasmanian context of our Inquiry, and our understanding of child sexual abuse in an institutional context.

- Volumes 3–6 outline our findings and recommendations for the specific institutional contexts we were directed, or chose, to inquire into, namely schools (Volume 3), out of home care (Volume 4), youth detention (Volume 5) and health services (Volume 6). These volumes differ in their structure, style and approach, which reflects the nature and extent of the evidence we received and the nature of the response of the relevant organisations (and departments) to that evidence.
- Volume 7 provides our findings and recommendations for the criminal and civil justice systems.
- Our final volume, Volume 8, outlines our recommendations for system-wide reforms, including to support the Government to implement our recommendations and to monitor this implementation.

All material referred to in our report is current at 10 February 2023, unless otherwise specified.

5 Conclusion

Since our establishment in March 2021, we have undertaken extensive work to inform our Inquiry into systemic problems in the Tasmanian Government's response to child sexual abuse in its institutions. We have been informed by submissions, sessions with Commissioners, consultations, engagement with Aboriginal communities, site visits, research, hearings and roundtables, as well as an enormous number of government documents.

Hearing from victim-survivors, their families and supporters has been particularly important to us, and we thank all those who shared their experiences.

All aspects of our Inquiry have informed the views and recommendations in this report. We trust we have done the task justice.

Notes

1 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>; Loretta Lohberger, 'Class Action Prepared Against Tasmanian Government Alleging Abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre', ABC News (online, 28 July 2020) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2020-07-28/class-action-amid-alleged-abuse-at-ashley-youth-detention-centre/12496558>; 'Episode One: Just Jim', The Nurse (Camille Bianchi, Transcript, undated) 73–74.

2 Emily Baker, 'What We Know about the Allegations Against Tasmanian Nurse James Griffin', ABC News (online, 8 December 2020) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2020-12-08/nurse-james-geoffrey-griffin-what-we-know/12953076>.

3 The Nurse (Camille Bianchi, 2020) <https://open.spotify.com/show/2CG58YDV7p8vamvYq7WhgK>.

4 Angela Sdrinis Legal, 'The Ashley Youth Detention Centre (AYDC) Class Action', AYDC Class Action (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.angelasdrinislegal.com.au/aydc-class-action.html>. Refer to, for example, Amber Wilson, 'Former Rose Bay Science Teacher Jailed for Grooming and Molesting Year 9 Student Over Months', The Mercury (online, 29 October 2020) <https://www.themercury.com.au/truecrimeaustralia/police-courts/former-rose-bay-science-teacher-jailed-for-grooming-and-molesting-year-9-student-over-months/news-story/c5b8f5f876e3a80bb560e62624c93699>; Nina Funnell, 'Serial Paedophile James (Jim) Geoffrey Griffin Worked with Sick children in a Tasmanian Hospital', The Mercury (online, 13 October 2020) <https://www.themercury.com.au/truecrimeaustralia/police-courts/serial-paedophile-james-jim-geoffrey-griffin-worked-with-sick-children-in-a-tasmanian-hospital/news-story/75b06f07cdf097c140540e9c410e70ba>; Amber Wilson, 'Ashley Youth Detention Centre Abuse Alleged Over Decades', The Mercury (online, 29 July 2020) <https://www.themercury.com.au/truecrimeaustralia/police-courts/ashley-youth-detention-centre-abuse-alleged-over-decades/news-story/51525cdb89721476a4b1b4821d2c5f1f>; Emily Baker, 'Rape Accusations Against Three Government Departments – What Comes Next?', ABC News (online, 20 November 2020) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2020-11-20/no-commission-of-inquiry-after-child-rape-allegations/12901386>.

5 Refer to, for example, April McLennan and Edith Bevin, 'Survivors of Child Sexual Abuse Taking Education Department to Court For Negligence', ABC News (online, 6 May 2020) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2020-05-06/education-department-sued-over-sexual-abuse-allegations/12220836>; Amber Wilson, 'Sex Abuse Survivor Takes Govt to Court After Months of Delays', The Mercury (online, 4 March 2020) <https://www.themercury.com.au/truecrimeaustralia/police-courts/sex-abuse-survivor-takes-govt-to-court-after-months-of-delays/news-story/770ad2687c11cb6b51b71a54186eaa66>.

6 Katrina Munting quoted in Loretta Lohberger, 'Former Rose Bay High Student Katrina Munting, Sexually Abused by Teacher Marcus Pollard, Speaks Out', ABC News (online, 11 November 2020) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2020-11-11/sexual-abuse-survivor-tells-her-story/12867770>.

7 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

8 Transcript of Camille Bianchi, 5 May 2022, 445 [4–5].

9 The Attorney-General and Minister for Health implemented an independent investigation into the systems of the Tasmanian Health Service, Department of Health and other relevant government agencies concerning the management of allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in the matter of James Griffin: Department of Justice, Independent Investigation into the THS and the Management of Child Sexual Abuse (Web Page, 22 October 2020) <https://www.justice.tas.gov.au/news_and_events/investigation-into-ths-child-sexual-abuse-allegations>. The Department of Communities initiated an investigation of three current employees of Ashley Youth Detention Centre who were the subject of allegations of abuse. The staff were stood down pending investigation: Roger Jaensch, 'Allegations Against Staff at AYDC' (Media release, 19 November 2020) <http://www.rogerjaensch.com.au/allegations-against-staff-at-aydc/>. The Minister for Education initiated an independent inquiry to examine systems in the Department of Education relevant to minimising the risk of child sexual abuse within Tasmanian Government schools. The report of the Inquiry was submitted in June 2021. For the final report, refer to: Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 7 June 2021) 1.

10 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

11 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

12 Peter Gutwein, Premier of Tasmania, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

13 Peter Gutwein, Premier of Tasmania, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

14 Peter Gutwein, Premier of Tasmania, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

15 Erin Cooper and Emily Baker, 'Tasmania Police Took Years to Charge Alleged Paedophile Nurse Who Worked With Children, Review Finds', ABC News (online, 26 February 2021) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2021-02-26/police-took-years-to-investigate-alleged-paedophile-nurse/13196044>.

16 Department of Communities, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), January 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Department of Education, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), 22 February 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Department of Health, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), February 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. Refer to Appendix H for the methodology used to calculate these numbers.

17 Department of Communities, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), January 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Department of Education, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), 22 February 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Department of Health, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), February 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. Refer to Appendix H for the methodology used to calculate these numbers.

18 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021 (refer to Appendix A).

19 James Dunlevie and Daniel Miller, 'Tasmanian Premier Peter Gutwein Reveals He Is a Victim of Child Sexual Abuse', ABC News (online, 11 March 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-03-11/tas-gutwein-divulges-own-sexual-abuse-encounter/100903018>.

20 James Dunlevie and Daniel Miller, 'Tasmanian Premier Peter Gutwein Reveals He Is a Victim of Child Sexual Abuse', ABC News (online, 11 March 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-03-11/tas-gutwein-divulges-own-sexual-abuse-encounter/100903018>.

21 James Dunlevie and Daniel Miller, 'Tasmanian Premier Peter Gutwein Reveals He Is a Victim of Child Sexual Abuse', ABC News (online, 11 March 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-03-11/tas-gutwein-divulges-own-sexual-abuse-encounter/100903018>.

22 'Liberal MP Pays the Price For Crossing the Floor', ABC News (online, 4 December 2003) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2003-12-04/liberal-mp-pays-the-price-for-crossing-the-floor/100330>.

23 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 2 (refer to Appendix A).

24 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 3 (refer to Appendix A).

25 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 7 February 2022 (refer to Appendix A).

26 For details, refer to the terms of reference prepared by our Commission of Inquiry to align with the Order of the Governor at Appendix B. Refer also to Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 3 (refer to Appendix A).

27 For details, refer to the terms of reference at Appendix B. Refer also to Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 4 (refer to Appendix A).

28 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 4 (refer to Appendix A).

29 For details, refer to the terms of reference at Appendix B. Refer also to Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 5 (refer to Appendix A). Refer also to Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 1, 19. For the purposes of this Commission of Inquiry, we have replaced the word 'fondling' with the trauma-informed term 'touching'.

30 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 9.

31 National Office for Child Safety, 'Discussion paper from the National Clinical Reference Group – Language and Terminology' (Discussion Paper, December 2022).

32 Refer to, for example, the National Royal Commission discussion of the Australian Defence Force's apprentice school (Balcombe), which was marked by a failure to 'address harmful bullying conduct and the culture of intimidation' and where 'the system of management was ineffective in preventing and responding to child sexual abuse'. Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) Preface and Executive Summary, 93.

33 For details, refer to the terms of reference at Appendix B. Refer also to Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 6 (refer to Appendix A).

34 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 115.

35 For details, refer to the terms of reference at Appendix B. Refer also to Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 6 (refer to Appendix A).

36 Non-government schools were not within scope because they are predominantly funded by the Australian Government.

37 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 4 (refer to Appendix A).

38 If, during our Inquiry, we identify potential contraventions of the law, we have the power to refer these matters to appropriate authorities: Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 34A.

39 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 18(1).

40 Transcript of Michael Salter, 2 May 2022, 71 [40–42].

41 In 1990, a royal commission was established to investigate an attempt to bribe a member of the Tasmanian Parliament to cross the floor of the House of Assembly in Tasmania following the 1989 election. The royal commission, known as the Carter Commission, was established under the Evidence Act 1910. In 1995, the Commissions of Inquiry Act was passed. In 2000, the Commission of Inquiry into the Death of Joseph Gilewicz was established. It was the first Commission of Inquiry conducted since the Commissions of Inquiry Act commenced. Our Commission of Inquiry is the second.

42 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 22.

43 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 24.

44 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 ss 24A, 24B.

45 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 ss 5, 13, 19A, 25.

46 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 26.

47 Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020), <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

48 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 10. Section 10(3) of the Act provides that 'The Governor may omit a part of the report before it is tabled in Parliament if satisfied that the public interest in the disclosure of the matters set out in that part of the report is significantly outweighed by any other consideration, including public security, privacy of personal or financial affairs or the right of any person to a fair trial'.

49 The Act amended the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, the Children, Young Persons and their Families Act 1997, the Youth Justice Act 1997 and the Public Interest Disclosures Act 2002.

50 Parts 2 and 6 commenced upon receiving the Royal Assent on 22 April 2021: Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act 2021 s 2.

51 Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Act 2021.

52 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 33(3).

53 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 33(1).

54 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 33(2).

55 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 21.

56 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 ss 8(5), 19B(2).

57 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021 (refer to Appendix A).

58 'Abuse offences' include: sexual offences, homicide, grievous bodily harm, assault, various offences endangering life and health, rape, abduction, stalking and bullying. This requirement also applies to attempts to commit these offences: Criminal Code Act 1924 s 105A(1).

59 Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 8 (refer to Appendix A).

60 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 13.

61 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 13(2).

62 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 19(2A).

63 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 19(2B).

64 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 18.

65 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 3.

66 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 18(6).

67 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 18(2), subject to subsection (2A).

68 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 18(1).

69 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 18(3).

70 Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 18(4)(b).

71 Office of the Solicitor-General, Department of Health Procedural Fairness Response, 28 April 2023, 4.

72 For provisions stating that an inquiry is not bound by rules of evidence, refer to Royal Commissions Act 1991 (ACT) s 23(b); Inquiries Act 1945 (NT) s 6; Commissions of Inquiry Act 1950 (Qld) s 17; Royal Commissions Act 1917 (SA) s 7; Inquiries Act 2014 (Vic) s 14. For provisions concerning compliance with procedural fairness requirements refer to Royal Commissions Act 1991 (ACT) s 23(a); Inquiries Act 2014 (Vic) s 12(a).

73 But refer to Royal Commissions Act 1991 (ACT) s 35A; Inquiries Act 2014 (Vic) s 36. These provisions concern procedural requirements where adverse comments or findings are proposed to be made. Refer generally to Royal Commissions Act 1902 (Cth); Royal Commissions Act 1923 (NSW); Inquiries Act 1945 (NT); Commission of Inquiry Act 1950 (Qld); Royal Commissions Act 1917 (SA); Royal Commissions Act 1968 (WA).

74 Law Reform Commissioner of Tasmania, Report on the Procedural Aspects of Royal Commissions and Boards of Inquiry (Report No. 70, 1993) 24.

75 Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Report on the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 (Final Report No. 3, August 2003) 17.

76 Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Report on the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 (Final Report No. 3, August 2003) 17.

77 Tasmania Law Reform Institute, Report on the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 (Final Report No. 3, August 2003) 17–22.

78 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 18 March 2021, 48 (Elise Archer, Minister for Justice).

79 Australian Law Reform Commission, Making Inquiries: A New Statutory Framework (Report No. 111, October 2009) 32, 377 [15.26], 383 [15.48].

80 Briginshaw v Briginshaw (1938) 60 CLR 336 at 362–363. Refer also to Evidence Act 2001 s 140. Our Commission of Inquiry is not required to comply with the rules of evidence; refer to Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995 s 20(1).

81 #LetHerSpeak, About (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.letusspeak.com.au>.

82 Relevant legal amendments included: Evidence Act 2001 s 194K; Judicial Proceedings Reports Act 1958 (Vic) s 4(1A); Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) s 9(1).

83 Antonia Quadara and Cathryn Hunter, 'Principles of Trauma-informed Approaches to Child Sexual Abuse' (Discussion Paper prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 5.

84 Cathy Kezelman and Pam Stavropoulos, Organisational Guidelines for Trauma Informed Service Delivery (Policy Document, Blue Knot Foundation, 2020) 24.

85 Cathy Kezelman and Pam Stavropoulos, Organisational Guidelines for Trauma Informed Service Delivery (Policy Document, Blue Knot Foundation, 2020) 24.

86 Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, Practice Direction No. 4 – Sessions with a Commissioner, 28 June 2021.

87 Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, Information Paper, 13 May 2021, 1.

88 Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, Information Paper, 13 May 2021, 1.

89 Anonymous session, 20 February 2023.

90 Text message from Anonymous to Commission of Inquiry staff member, 26 May 2022.

91 Email from Anonymous to Commission of Inquiry staff member, 26 January 2022.

92 Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, Consultations (Web Page, 2023) <http://www.commissionofinquiry.tas.gov.au/consultations>.

93 Dr John Gardiner-Garden, Parliament of Australia,'Defining Aboriginality in Australia' (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.aph.gov.au/about_parliament/parliamentary_departments/parliamentary_library/publications_archive/cib/cib0203/03cib10>.

94 Lyndall Ryan, Tasmanian Aborigines: A History Since 1803 (Allen & Unwin, 2012) ch 21.

95 Lyndall Ryan, Tasmanian Aborigines: A History Since 1803 (Allen & Unwin, 2012) 309.

96 Australian Government Office of the Registrar of Indigenous Corporations (Web Page, 30 November 2022) <https://register.oric.gov.au/PrintCorporationSearch.aspx?state=TAS>.

97 Rosemary Bolger, 'Tasmanian Aboriginality Test Changes Proposed By Premier Will Hodgman', ABC News (online, 21 January 2016) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2016-01-21/changes-to-tasmanian-aboriginality-test-premier-will-hodgman/7105758>.

98 Kate Warner, Tim McCormack and Fauve Kurnadi, Pathway to Truth-Telling and Treaty: Report to Premier Peter Gutwein (Report, November 2021) 58.

99 Kate Warner, Tim McCormack and Fauve Kurnadi, Pathway to Truth-Telling and Treaty: Report to Premier Peter Gutwein (Report, November 2021) 58.

100 'Aboriginality Test Changes Will "Swamp the Community With White People", Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre Fears', ABC News (online, 22 January 2016) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2016-01-22/concerns-for-tasmanian-aboriginality-test-changes/7106664>.

101 Organisations contacted: Aboriginal Land Council of Tasmania, Ballawinne Aboriginal Corporation, Brumby Hill Aboriginal Corporation, Cape Barren Island Aboriginal Association Inc., Circular Head Aboriginal Corporation, Elders Council of Tasmania Aboriginal Corporation, Flinders Island Aboriginal Association Inc., Indigenous Tasmanians Aboriginal Corporation, Karadi Aboriginal Corporation, Leprena Uniting Aboriginal and Islander Christian Congress, Lia Pootah Aboriginal Corporation, melythina tiakana warrana Aboriginal Corporation, Reconciliation Tasmania, Riawunna – UTAS Aboriginal Services, Six Rivers Aboriginal Corporation, South East Tasmanian Aboriginal Corporation, Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre, Tasmanian Aboriginal Childcare Association, Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service, Tasmanian Regional Aboriginal Communities Alliance, Weetapoona Aboriginal Corporation.

102 Statement of Heather Lee Sculthorpe, 15 June 2022.

103 Submission 150 Tasmanian Aboriginal Legal Service, 8 November 2022.

104 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 30.

105 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, A Brief Guide to the Final Report: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Communities (Final Report, December 2017).

106 Peter Gutwein and Sarah Courtney, 'Ashley Youth Detention Centre to Close' (Media Release, 9 September 2021) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/ashley_youth_detention_centre_to_close>.

107 Emma Davidson, Bimberi Headline Indicators Report – November 2022 (Report to Legislative Assembly, Australian Capital Territory Government, November 2022) 1.

108 Given Commissioner Bromfield's role as Professor and Director of the Australian Centre for Child Protection at the University of South Australia, she was not involved in decision making regarding the procurement of research to avoid any conflict of interest. Accordingly, Commissioner Bromfield was not involved in the conduct of the tender or in the results of the tender process. Commissioner Bromfield was also not involved in the preparation of the tender response on behalf of the Australian Centre for Child Protection or its conduct of any research commissioned by our Commission of Inquiry.

109 Stewart McDougall et al, Project Report: Identifying Relevant Literature for the Tasmanian Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings (Report, 2021).

110 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 63.

111 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 64.

112 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 58–59, 63.

113 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 63–64.

114 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 63–64.

115 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 64.

116 Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, Practice Direction No. 5 – Hearings, 12 April 2022.

117 Evidence Act 2001 s 194K.

118 Transcript of Ms Bennett, 2 May 2022, 11 [18–21].

119 The request was made on behalf of Mr Stuart Watson by Mr Simon Gates in relation to the evidence of Ms Leanne McLean, Commissioner for Children and Young People, on 24 August 2022.

120 Transcript of Ms Bennett, 13 September 2022, 4048 [35–42].

121 Parliament of Tasmania, Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Bill 2022 Fact Sheet (Web Page, 2022) <http://www.parliament.tas.gov.au/Bills/Bills2022pdf/notes/3_of_2022-Fact%20Sheet.pdf>.

122 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023.

123 Jeremy Rockliff and Kathrine Morgan-Wicks, 'Child Safe Governance Review of the Launceston General Hospital and Human Resources' (Media Release, 3 July 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/child_safe_governance_review_of_the_launceston_general_hospital_and_human_resources>.

2 The Tasmanian, national and international contexts

1 Introduction

Globally, community awareness and understanding of the scale and impact of child sexual abuse in institutional settings has increased significantly over the past 10 to 20 years. Major national and international inquiries put these issues in the spotlight, describing the experiences of victim-survivors, their families and their advocates.

In Australia, the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('National Royal Commission') ran from 2013 to 2017. The National Royal Commission raised awareness of the experiences of victim-survivors, whose abuse spanned decades and occurred in multiple government and non-government institutions.

In this chapter, we describe the context in which our Commission of Inquiry was established in Tasmania, nationally and internationally. We briefly outline:

- Australia's international obligations in relation to children and international inquiries into institutional child sexual abuse
- the work of the National Royal Commission and the approaches to implementing its recommendations across Australia
- key national offices, strategies and frameworks relevant to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts
- civil litigation and redress schemes

- reports and inquiries relevant to child sexual abuse in Tasmania over the past 30 years
- key frameworks, strategies and plans that form the current policy context in Tasmania
- the current system for responding to child sexual abuse in Tasmania
- our Commission of Inquiry's observations about Tasmania's culture and history in shaping the concerns about child sexual abuse in Government institutions and institutional responses to these concerns.

2 International context

2.1 International obligations and inquiries

Australia has ratified several international treaties, protocols and declarations relevant to safeguarding the rights of children and promoting their best interests. The Tasmanian Government is not a direct party to these international instruments, and their provisions do not automatically apply in Australian domestic law. However, the human rights protections contained in them should underpin any policy response to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts in Australia.

2.1.1 Convention on the Rights of the Child

In 1990, Australia ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child.[1] All children in Australia, including Tasmania, should enjoy the rights contained in the Convention. Its four guiding principles are:

- respect for the best interests of the child as a primary consideration
- the right to survival and development
- the right of all children to express their views freely on all matters affecting them
- the right of all children to enjoy all the rights of the Convention without discrimination of any kind.[2]

Articles 19 and 34 of the Convention are particularly relevant to child sexual abuse. These provisions collectively provide children with the right to be protected from all forms of violence and harm, including sexual abuse in institutions.

Australia is also a party to the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography.[3]

2.1.2 Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Australia is also a party to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.[4] The United Nations (UN) Committee against Torture monitors parties' compliance with that Convention.

In 2017, the Australian Government ratified the Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ('OPCAT').[5] The OPCAT establishes a preventive system of regular visits to 'places of detention' to protect incarcerated people against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The Australian Government has indicated this would include youth justice facilities but not residential secure facilities.[6]

Parties to the OPCAT must set up independent national bodies for preventing torture and ill-treatment, which are called national preventive mechanisms.[7] The OPCAT also established the UN Subcommittee on Prevention to monitor conditions in detention and to advise on OPCAT implementation.[8]

The Australian Government is implementing a nationwide model, with preventive mechanisms nominated for the Commonwealth and each state and territory.[9] In 2021, the Tasmanian Parliament enacted the OPCAT Implementation Act 2021 to establish Tasmania's national preventive mechanisms and to enable the UN Subcommittee on Prevention to exercise its mandate in Tasmania. Richard Connock, who exercises additional oversight roles including as the Ombudsman and Custodial Inspector, was announced as the Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism in February 2022.[10]

In its December 2022 concluding observations on Australia's sixth periodic report, the UN Subcommittee noted that the practice of keeping children in solitary confinement at Ashley Youth Detention Centre contravened the Convention and the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the 'Nelson Mandela Rules').[11] The UN Committee stated in relation to youth justice in Australia generally that it was seriously concerned by:

- the low age of criminal responsibility
- the over-representation of Aboriginal children and children with disabilities in the youth justice system
- reports of abuse, racist remarks and use of restraint
- the high number of children in detention
- the lack of segregation between children and adults in detention
- children's lack of awareness of their rights and how to report abuses.[12]

2.1.3 Other relevant instruments

Australia is a party to the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.[13] Australia also supports the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, although this is a non-binding instrument.[14] These instruments apply to adults and children.[15] There are no specific provisions in these instruments in relation to sexual abuse.[16] However, Australia's ratification of the two Conventions and its support for the Declaration signals the need to consider the specific vulnerabilities of children with disability, children from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and Aboriginal children.

In addition to these instruments, Australia is a party to the Hague Convention on Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Recognition, Enforcement and Co-operation in Respect of Parental Responsibility and Measures for the Protection of Children, which entered into force in Australia in August 2003 and provides for international cooperation in recognising child protection measures.[17] Australia is also a party to the 1980 Hague Child Abduction Convention, which also now applies to Australian domestic family law.[18]

2.1.4 International inquiries

Since 1999, there have been extensive inquiries into institutional child sexual abuse conducted in Canada, Ireland, New Zealand, the United Kingdom (with separate inquiries in England and Wales, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Jersey) and the United States.[19] The period under review in these inquiries extends from 1922 to 2018.[20]

These inquiries reported on common themes of physical, sexual and emotional abuse as well as:

- neglect, fear and other factors that prevented children from reporting
- a reluctance among adults, including employees, to report abuse to authorities
- awareness of abuse and known abusers in communities
- a lack of appropriate procedures to prevent and respond to abuse
- where procedures did exist, poor or inconsistent implementation.

3 National context

3.1 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse

In November 2012, the Australian Government announced the National Royal Commission.[21] During its inquiry, the National Royal Commission published several interim and topic-specific reports, concluding with its final report in December 2017.[22] Its findings and recommendations applied to the Commonwealth, state and territory governments, and non-government organisations. As previously noted, our Commission of Inquiry builds on, but does not repeat, the work of the National Royal Commission.

As part of its five-year inquiry, the National Royal Commission examined responses to child sexual abuse in Australian public, private, community and religious institutions. It considered in detail child sexual abuse that occurred in those institutions over many decades and the inadequacy of the responses to this abuse.

The National Royal Commission made 409 recommendations aimed at making institutions safer for children, preventing child sexual abuse, improving identification and responses, and providing redress and better supports for victim-survivors. Those recommendations were informed by submissions from and consultations with members of the Tasmanian community including two Tasmanian case studies and 188 private sessions in Tasmania.[23]

The Commonwealth, state and territory governments, together with parts of the non-government sector, are responsible for implementing the recommendations of the National Royal Commission. In their formal responses to the recommendations, each jurisdiction identified which recommendations they were responsible for implementing and those that would be implemented by the Commonwealth Government, other states and territories or non-government institutions. There is considerable variation between the reponses of the states and territories in terms of the level of detail and the action taken in response to specific recommendations.[24]

There is also some variation and uncertainty in the allocation of responsibility for implementation. For example, the Tasmanian Government initially noted that responsibility for recommendations to assess children displaying harmful sexual behaviours and to adequately fund therapeutic responses was ‘to be determined’.[25] However, the Tasmanian Government’s 2022 progress report and action plan noted it had engaged the Sexual Assault Support Service to deliver a statewide therapeutic program for children and young people displaying problematic and harmful sexual behaviours, which began in April 2021.[26] This engagement implemented a commitment under Safe Homes, Families and Communities: Tasmania’s Action Plan for Family and Sexual Violence 2019–2022.[27]

More importantly, from its progress report in 2020 onwards, the Government began referring to its action plans for family violence as also including 'sexual violence' and fulfilling many of the National Royal Commission's recommendations.[28] Our concerns about this approach—combining the response to family violence with institutional child sexual abuse—are discussed in Chapter 19.

The Tasmanian Government established a response unit now referred to as the Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit ('Royal Commission Response Unit'), in the Department of Justice to lead implementation of the National Royal Commission recommendations.[29] Among other things, the Royal Commission Response Unit coordinates annual reporting requirements in relation to the Tasmanian Government's implementation of the recommendations and the Government's response to relevant National Redress claims.

At the time our Commission of Inquiry began, some National Royal Commission recommendations had been implemented or were in progress, such as reforms to the criminal justice system. However, other key recommendations—such as establishing a reportable conduct scheme and child safe organisations—had not been implemented. As part of our Commission of Inquiry, we considered why there had been little progress and coordination of the Tasmanian Government's response to some recommendations. In some instances, we found a lack of clarity or sense of ownership or responsibility for implementation. We also noted delays and uneven implementation. For example, consultation on the first draft of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Bill began in December 2020, three years after the National Royal Commission delivered its final report; however, a final version of the Bill was not introduced to Parliament until November 2022 (refer to Chapter 18 for more about the Child and Youth Safe Standards).[30]

3.2 Key national offices, strategies and frameworks

Over the past decade, various national reforms have been introduced to better protect children in institutional contexts and to provide redress for victim-survivors. Many of these strategies and activities implement National Royal Commission recommendations. The following section briefly outlines key offices, strategies and frameworks that promote child safety.

3.2.1 Key agencies and offices

At the national level, the following agencies and offices contribute to promoting child safety, particularly in relation to child sexual abuse:

- National Children's Commissioner—established in 2012, the role sits within the Australian Human Rights Commission.[31] The National Children's Commissioner developed the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations.

- Commonwealth Government, National Office for Child Safety—established in 2018, the office leads the development and implementation of several national priorities recommended by the National Royal Commission.[32] These priorities include the National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse, the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations and the Commonwealth Child Safe Framework. The office is also responsible for improving information-sharing arrangements to strengthen child safety and wellbeing. It receives annual progress reports from non-government institutions on implementing the National Royal Commission recommendations.
- National Centre for Action on Child Sexual Abuse—currently funded by the Australian Government, the centre is a not-for-profit joint venture between the Blue Knot Foundation, The Healing Foundation and the Australian Childhood Foundation. It was established following the National Royal Commission and aims to 'increase understanding of child sexual abuse, promote effective ways for protecting children, guide best practice responses and pathways to healing for survivors and reduce the harm it causes'.[33]
- The Department of Social Services—the Department has responsibility for Safe and Supported: the National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children 2021–23 and the National Plan to End Violence against Women and Children 2022–32, and for administering the National Redress Scheme that compensates victim-survivors of child abuse.[34]

3.2.2 Key strategies and frameworks

The agencies and offices outlined above contributed to various national strategies and frameworks and oversee their implementation. These strategies and frameworks include:

- National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–30—recommended by the National Royal Commission and overseen by the National Office for Child Safety, the National Strategy was developed by the Australian Government in partnership with state and territory governments. It aims to establish a 'nationally coordinated and consistent way to prevent and better respond to child sexual abuse in all settings'.[35] It is implemented through action plans. The first two action plans run for four years from 2021 to 2024.[36]
- Safe and Supported: the National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children 2021–2031—developed by the Commonwealth, state and territory governments, together with Aboriginal representatives and the non-government sector, this national framework supports the right of children and young people to grow up 'safe, connected and supported in their family, community and culture', with the goal of making significant and sustained progress in reducing the rate of child abuse and neglect and its intergenerational impacts.[37] The framework also embeds the priority reforms in the National Agreement on Closing the Gap. It is implemented through two sets of action plans.

- National Principles for Child Safe Organisations—the former Council of Australian Governments endorsed the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations in February 2019 to align with and support the child safe standards recommended by the National Royal Commission.[38] The National Principles are designed to 'build capacity and deliver child safety and wellbeing in organisations, families and communities and prevent future harm'.[39]
- Commonwealth Child Safe Framework—developed in 2019 in response to recommendations of the National Royal Commission, the framework 'sets minimum standards for Commonwealth entities to create and maintain behaviours and practices that are safe for children'.[40]
- National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022–2032—developed and endorsed by Commonwealth, state and territory ministers with responsibility for women's safety, the plan builds on the previous National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children 2010–2022. It commits to ending violence against women and children in one generation.[41]

4 Tasmanian context

4.1 Past Tasmanian inquiries and reports

Over the past 30 years, numerous inquiries and reports initiated by the Tasmanian Government and independent agencies have reviewed the treatment of children in institutional contexts in Tasmania.

Since 1989, at least 14 Tasmanian reports or inquiries have considered issues relevant to child sexual abuse in institutional settings.[42] Together, they made almost 600 recommendations for reform. Most of these reports considered system-wide concerns in the context of child protection, while a small number focused on a particular issue such as child sexual abuse. Only two reports, in 1989 and 1998, specifically explored child sexual abuse in institutional settings in detail.[43]

The various reports and inquiries identified recurring themes including:

- a strong desire from agencies and organisations that work with or care for children to keep children safe
- an overwhelmed child protection system that has struggled for many years, if not decades

- a poor workplace culture in Tasmania's child safety system
- unclear and incomplete policies, procedures and guidelines for working with children who have been sexually abused
- deficiencies in information documentation, management and sharing, particularly in relation to decision-making processes concerning children at risk of abuse or neglect
- a lack of training and support for those who work with children who are victim-survivors of abuse, including sexual abuse
- a lack of suitable out of home care placements for children who are victim-survivors of sexual abuse or have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours against other children
- a lack of training and support for carers who look after children who are victim-survivors of sexual abuse or who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours against other children
- a lack of early intervention in cases involving child sexual abuse, as well as poor availability of specific services for children
- the need for legislative reforms to modernise offences relating to child sexual abuse and improve court processes for children who experience sexual abuse
- resistance to calls for a commission of inquiry into child protection and other related areas.

Past reports repeatedly highlight that the systems in place to protect children from abuse and neglect, including child sexual abuse, do not perform as intended. The reports also highlight that recommendations have not always been implemented in a timely manner, are under-resourced, or, when implemented, are not subject to appropriate monitoring and oversight to ensure the intended outcomes are achieved.

In addition to these 14 inquiries and reports, since 2005 there have been at least eight reports concerning the Tasmanian health system, 18 reports concerning out of home care and 12 reports concerning Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[44] Between them, these reports have made more than 500 recommendations for reform. Most of these reports do not consider the issue of child sexual abuse in detail. However, they concern factors that can influence the culture and safety in these institutional environments, which have the potential to increase the risk of child sexual abuse occurring or not being identified. These factors also shape organisational responses to incidents and allegations of child sexual abuse.

Most recently, the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, completed in June 2021, made 20 recommendations about changes to governance and leadership, policies and procedures, training and professional development.[45] The independent review into the health system and investigation of staff at Ashley Youth Detention Centre announced in late 2020 ceased when our Commission of Inquiry started.[46] Relevant reports and inquiries are discussed in more detail in the chapters on these institutions (refer to Volumes 3–6).

Despite these past reports, which have collectively made more than 1,000 recommendations, the increasing concerns about child sexual abuse in institutional contexts suggest there is a pattern of poor implementation of recommended reforms and a need for stronger intervention to adequately protect children.

4.2 Tasmanian Claims of Abuse in State Care Program

Tasmania's Claims of Abuse in State Care Program was announced in 2003 and was accessible to anyone who had been abused in state care in Tasmania.[47] It had tri-partisan support and was designed to 'acknowledge the past failures of the Out of Home Care system and to help those who had been abused in State Government care'.[48] The program offered ex gratia payments of up to $60,000 to claimants, although this was reduced to $35,000 in the program's fourth and final round from 2011 to 2013.[49] Between 2004 and 2013:

- 2,414 claimants applied, of whom 1,848 were assessed as eligible
- $54.8 million dollars in payments were made.[50]

Although each of the program's four rounds produced reports, the third report was not made publicly available and we were not able to access a copy. In addition, there is no overall analysis of the data showing how many claims of child sexual abuse were made in relation to different types of care. Excluding the 995 claimants from the third round for whom data are not available, 510 people made claims of sexual abuse in state care.[51]

Under the scheme, claimants could discuss the effect of the abuse they experienced. They identified a range of physical, psychological and social impacts including:

- ongoing health conditions, mental health issues and trauma
- low sense of self-esteem and self-worth
- difficulties with parenting
- misuse of alcohol and drugs.[52]

Claimants were also offered counselling sessions and the opportunity to receive legal advice.[53]

At the conclusion of the Claims of Abuse in State Care Program, the Abuse in State Care Support Service was established to help people who had not applied for redress under the program.[54] This service is still in operation, although it only offers minimal support. We discuss this scheme in more detail in Volume 5 and Chapter 17.

4.3 Tasmanian policy context

As outlined above, the Tasmanian Government has committed to various national frameworks and strategies and to the National Redress Scheme. It has also enacted civil and criminal justice reforms to implement key National Royal Commission recommendations. Separate to these reforms, the Government has developed state-level frameworks and strategies. This section provides an overview of key frameworks, strategies and plans, which are examined in detail in Chapter 19.

Tasmania has also had a Commissioner for Children and Young People since 2000. The Commissioner's role is considered further in Chapter 18.

To better protect children and respond to incidents of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts, the National Royal Commission recommended that all state and territory governments enact child safe standards and a reportable conduct scheme.[55] The Tasmanian Government's efforts to enact these standards and scheme are discussed in more detail in Chapter 18.

4.3.1 Survivors at the Centre

In November 2022, the Tasmanian Government released its third whole of government plan to prevent and respond to family and sexual violence: Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027.[56]

Survivors at the Centre, and previous action plans, address family and sexual violence in a single overarching plan. While many of the 38 actions in Survivors at the Centre are relevant to children, particularly in the context of family violence, only two actions specifically concern sexual violence and abuse in relation to children and young people.[57] A further 10 actions are relevant to sexual assault services, which could include child sexual abuse, depending on how they are implemented.[58]

It is important to differentiate between the Government's response to family violence and its response to sexual violence, including child sexual abuse. Family violence can include familial child sexual abuse, but we are concerned that addressing child sexual abuse in the context of family violence does not adequately address abuse within schools, health care settings, out of home care and youth detention. These concerns are considered further in Chapter 19.

4.3.2 Strong Families—Safe Kids

In 2016, the Department of Health and Human Services released its report, Redesign of Child Protection Services Tasmania: 'Strong Families—Safe Kids'.[59] The report aimed to redesign child protection services to address 'entrenched culture, processes and structures of the current Child Protection Services' identified by the then Minister for Human Services, who further noted in a statement to Parliament that the child protection system 'faces potential collapse if comprehensive reform action is not taken'.[60] The scope of our Commission of Inquiry does not extend to all aspects of the child protection system, although some of the structures in that system are relevant to institutional child sexual abuse.

In response to the report, the Government, among other things, established the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line ('Advice and Referral Line') as the first point of contact for anyone with a concern about child wellbeing and safety.[61] Concerns about child sexual abuse, including within institutional settings, are reported to the Advice and Referral Line in the first instance.

In June 2018, the Government also published the Tasmanian Child and Youth Wellbeing Framework, which aims to implement a common understanding across services and the community.[62] As part of this framework, the Government committed to developing a child and youth wellbeing strategy.[63] The new strategy, It Takes a Tasmanian Village: Child and Youth Wellbeing Strategy, was launched in August 2021.[64] The strategy includes a priority to support children and young people at risk. Within this priority, it commits to considering 'the development of a Tasmanian approach, including models of multidisciplinary practice, to address child sexual exploitation'.[65] Other than this commitment, the strategy does not specifically prioritise responses to child sexual abuse.

5 The Tasmanian community, culture and history

Any response to child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions needs to consider Tasmania's culture and demographics. Tasmania is an island state, with a small, regionally dispersed population. It comprises just over 2 per cent of the Australian population, with about 571,000 residents.[66] Founded as a penal colony for British convicts in the early 19th century, it has a history of relatively low social and economic mobility, high cultural homogeneity and, until the past decade, limited inward migration.

Tasmania's relatively small size, history and geographic isolation create a sense of separation from the rest of Australia. However, this sense is not unique. There are parallels with other island states and nations that have been subject to similar inquiries into child sexual abuse, such as Ireland and Jersey.[67] Like those jurisdictions, social connections in the Tasmanian community are frequently close and deep, established over generations.

These connections create a strong sense of community identity and can be a significant source of strength and resilience. However, they can also be a source of harm. For example, the Independent Jersey Care Inquiry heard frequent references to the 'Jersey Way', noting in its report:

> On some occasions it was used in a positive way, to describe a strong culture of community and voluntary involvement across the island, and this is something we recognise as a strength of the island … On most occasions, however, the 'Jersey Way' was used in a pejorative way, to describe a perceived system whereby serious issues are swept under the carpet and people escape being held to account for abuses perpetrated.[68]

Ultimately, the Independent Jersey Care Inquiry concluded that 'an inappropriate regard for the "Jersey Way" is likely to have inhibited the prompt development of policy and legislation concerning children'.[69]

This section provides a brief demographic profile of Tasmania, with a focus on children and discussion of various socioeconomic factors. It then considers elements of Tasmania's culture and history that have deterred victim-survivors, their families and others from reporting child sexual abuse in institutional contexts and have also contributed to poor responses to reports of abuse.

5.1 Demographics

5.1.1 Children in Tasmania: geography, cultural diversity and vulnerability

Children aged 19 or younger (the age brackets measured by the Australian Bureau of Statistics) make up 23.2 per cent of the Tasmanian population.[70] This is slightly lower than the 25 per cent of the overall Australian population.[71] While this Tasmanian cohort has a broad geographical distribution, most live in the Hobart region (54,904), followed by Launceston and the north-east (33,270), west and North West (25,801) and south-east (8,517).[72]

Tasmania has been relatively culturally homogeneous. In 2014, only 8.8 per cent of Tasmanian children and youth aged 12 to 24 years had culturally and linguistically diverse ancestry, compared with the national average of 25.1 per cent.[73] Cultural diversity is now changing.

Based on Australian Bureau of Statistics data as of 30 June 2021, Tasmania has a high proportion of children who identify as Aboriginal, at 11.4 per cent of children aged 19 years or younger, compared with 6.74 per cent nationally.[74] The proportion is the second highest in Australia after the Northern Territory.[75]

The proportion of children aged 14 years or younger with disability is higher in Tasmania at 10.2 per cent of the population of children, compared with the national average of 7.7 per cent.[76]

Tasmania has a relatively low number of children in contact with child protection services. In 2019–20, 2,234 Tasmanian children received child protection services.[77] This figure represents 19.8 per 1,000 children receiving services, compared with a national rate of 31.0 per 1,000 children.[78] We note that receiving child protection services is defined as one or more of the following occurring: being subject to an investigation of a notification, being on a care and protection order, or being in out of home care.[79] This definition does not include children assessed by child protection intake who are 'screened out'. The data for Tasmania further exclude children not under care and protection orders placed with relatives, for whom a financial contribution is made under the Supported Extended Family or Relatives Allowance programs.[80]

The number of children in youth detention in Tasmania is also low. In the 2019–20 financial year, the average daily number of young people in youth detention was 15.4.[81] While the number of children in detention is low, the rate of children in detention is relatively high. In the June quarter of 2020, the rate of children aged 10 to 17 in detention in Tasmania was 2.3 per 10,000 people, whereas South Australia, Victoria and New South Wales had rates of 1.8, 1.9 and 2.0 per 10,000 people respectively. The national average was 2.6 per 10,000 people.[82]

5.1.2 Socioeconomic profile

Tasmania has a higher proportion of people living in its most socioeconomically disadvantaged areas compared with the national average.[83] It is also marked by low sociogeographic mobility. According to Professor Richard Eccleston of the University of Tasmania:

> Research suggests that those residing in these socioeconomically disadvantaged areas are less mobile and unlikely to move around the State to seek employment or live in other communities … It is also common for families living in socioeconomically disadvantaged areas of Tasmania to have lived in the same community for generations. This creates a strong sense of connectedness in those communities which may also contribute to the lack of intrastate movement amongst these populations.[84]

Tasmania's relatively homogenous population has been maintained, until recently, by low inward migration.[85] However, since 2015, the trend has been reversed, with a net increase in migration from interstate and overseas.[86]

On several key economic metrics, Tasmania performs worse than the national average. For example, Tasmania has the lowest labour market participation rate, the lowest average weekly ordinary time–cash earnings and the highest underemployment rate in the country.[87]

It is generally accepted that, on average, Tasmanians also have poorer literacy rates and educational outcomes than other Australians.[88] A survey undertaken by the Australian Bureau of Statistics found that the literacy skills of Tasmanians aged 15–74 were consistently below the national average, as were numeracy skills, health literacy skills and problem-solving skills.[89] Educational outcomes for Tasmanians are similarly below the national average, as shown by poorer results in the National Assessment Program—Literacy and Numeracy.[90]

5.2 Culture

> What is it about Tasmania as a community that makes us reluctant to deal with this?[91]

During hearings, and through submissions and consultations, we heard about the unique culture and history of Tasmania. Witnesses and participants pointed to the connectedness of local communities as a source of support and resilience. However, many also pointed to a darker aspect of this connection that may deter people from speaking up about abuse, lead them to accept behaviour that should not be tolerated and result in inadequate institutional responses when incidents of abuse are reported. In an article for The Conversation, Rodney Croome, a Tasmanian social reform activist, described the contradictions at the centre of Tasmania's culture:

> Tasmania is both the abominable Fatal Shore and the felicitous Apple Isle, together at the same time. The fact that such a paradox can exist in the heart of a single people and place is not easy to grasp. But without at least attempting to grapple with Tasmania's contradictions, the island remains impossible to explain.[92]

When considering the influence of culture, we distinguish between culture in a 'societal' sense and organisational culture. We refer to Tasmanian societal culture as consisting of many intangible aspects of Tasmania's social life including 'shared, socially learned knowledge and patterns of behaviour'.[93] We use the term 'organisational culture' to refer to the values, ethics, attitudes, behaviours and traditions that influence the social and psychological environment of an institution or organisation.[94] However, it is also important to note that, while distinct, there is overlap between 'societal-level cultural influences' and 'organisational culture' because the factors that shape the latter are related to, or are situated within, the former.[95] This section considers how culture in the societal sense has influenced organisational and institutional responses to child sexual abuse in Tasmania.

As previously outlined, Tasmania is a small island community that for much of its history has been relatively remote and, to an extent, isolated from what many in the community refer to as 'the mainland'. Compared with more populous states such as Victoria and New South Wales, Tasmania is a more regionalised community, with families frequently living and working in the same area for generations. Up until the past decade, Tasmania has had low rates of inward migration. As stated by Tasmanian historian Professor Cassandra Pybus:

> Historically, Tasmania has had less multicultural immigration, and more outward migration, than other jurisdictions. Tasmania was an extremely monocultural place in the early 1980s and into the 21st century. As a result, until quite recently, there have been fewer opportunities for cultural change propelled by external influences.[96]

In consultations, sessions with a Commissioner and submissions, people frequently spoke of 'everyone knowing everyone' and of overlapping connections in their personal and professional lives.[97] This overlap is reflected in recent research that found a higher proportion of recruitment for jobs in Tasmania occurs through personal networks compared with other jurisdictions. As cited by Professor Eccleston, a report by the Tasmanian Policy Exchange found that:

> Tasmanian employers rely more heavily on informal networks for recruitment than any other state. Specifically, 32% of recruitment in Tasmania occurs without the job being advertised (the second highest being Northern Territory at 26%) and 38% of recruitment occurs via word of mouth (the second highest being Northern Territory at 24%).[98]

Government institutions are major employers in some local areas, creating a strong connection and economic reliance between the community and local institution. For example, as outlined in Chapter 10, Ashley Youth Detention Centre is a major employer in the area around Deloraine.

5.2.1 Support and resilience: the strengths of close connections

As noted above, we heard of the support and strength many Tasmanians derive from their close community connections. Referring to the socioeconomic measures outlined above, Professor Eccleston stated:

> We've got many strengths in the community which are not captured in those basic economic metrics, with a strong sense of connectedness, community identity and resilience that really comes from our history and I think the nature of our community.[99]

In a 2013 article for The Conversation, demographer Lisa Denny wrote:

> Tasmanians are resourceful and innovative people; they have to be, to continually adapt to the challenges presented by the makeup of our population, the diverse terrain and our isolation by virtue of our island status. It is thanks to this resourcefulness that Tasmania exists as it does today ...[100]

We also heard that Tasmania's relatively small size and closely connected communities can make institutions more agile in responding to issues, sharing information and implementing changes to policy and process (or at least they have the potential to do so). For example, in his evidence during the hearings, victim-survivor Samuel Leishman stated:

> We talk about Tasmania as being a small jurisdiction and a small island, and it's isolating and, you know, we don't have the resources and how difficult all of that is because of that and we have to look at other states and see what they're doing … and let's just do this piecemeal approach down here. I sometimes think, well, why do we look at it like that, why can't we look at Tasmania as being a small, isolated state and that's actually our advantage? We are small, we can set the standards and we can be the one that says, this is the benchmark that everyone else has to meet, and we can do that because we're small and because we're isolated. There's no reason why we can't do things better here than the rest of the country.[101]

5.2.2 Silencing, reprisals and denial: the harmful impact of close connections

While close personal and professional connections can be a source of strength, they can also lead to silencing and suppression of those who would otherwise speak out about abuse, retribution against those who do and acceptance of behaviour that should be questioned. They may also cause poor institutional responses to formal reports of abuse, extending in some instances to obfuscation and denial. In addition, there is the human tendency to disbelieve that a person one knows and likes could perpetrate child sexual abuse, which has prevented people seeing the obvious or believing those who speak up. The Nurse podcast reported one person expressing fear about raising concerns against the Tasmanian Government:

> I am so sorry I can't do this—I feel it would be a target on my back and I have seen too many others who speak out get victimised. I don't want to spend the rest of my life looking over my shoulder and I'm petrified for the impact this could have on my family. I would never know, if that contract doesn't get renewed, or that job application doesn't go through, if it's because I spoke out against the Tasmanian Government. I would never know if I've put my family at risk and that's the one thing more important than this.[102]

Over the course of our Commission of Inquiry, we heard of instances where fear of reprisal affecting people's personal and professional lives deterred them from making reports of child sexual abuse through official channels. In her statement, Professor Pybus described the link between Tasmania's small size and the reluctance to report and respond to abuse:

> A potential discloser of child sexual abuse is likely to know someone who is in some way connected with or implicated in the abuse. Everyone up and down the chain from the alleged perpetrator would be concerned about the implications of a report, > and taking action on a report, in terms of negative press, employment prospects and so on. This can create a fear of reprisal and a reluctance to take … proper disciplinary action at the institutional level.[103]

One victim-survivor submitted she felt 'totally powerless against the system' and in making a complaint 'it certainly crosses my mind, that I am committing career suicide as many will "not believe", "view me differently", "treat me as other and a liar"'.[104]

Another victim-survivor, Rachel (a pseudonym), described the impact of living in the same small community as her alleged abuser following a public statement that purported to clear the alleged abuser of a breach of the State Service Act 2000 ('State Service Act'): 'I wanted to hide. I ended up leaving that community. I didn't want to stay there, and even to today I'm so fearful of being in that community'.[105]

Participants at community consultations gave similar examples of professional repercussions for people who reported abuse or 'dobbed', such as not being given a promotion or being isolated at work. One participant said reminding someone that they owed their position to their connection with another person was a 'very Tasmanian activity', stating 'people were tapped—someone said to me "I own you"—everyone owes their jobs to other people'.[106] These comments align with the Tasmanian Policy Exchange's research previously outlined about the role of informal networks in recruitment.

Victim-survivors and others also worried they would not be believed if they reported the abuse, noting a tendency to believe and protect adults over children. In evidence to our Commission of Inquiry, journalist Emily Baker stated:

> I think in a small place like Tasmania there's a fear about personal repercussions, professional repercussions, what the broader community might think of them, that they won't be believed … that nothing will change.[107]

In sessions with a Commissioner, several people referred to the influence of employee unions in protecting members' interests when allegations of child sexual abuse are made against them, rather than the interests of the child.[108]

Others felt their concerns would be dismissed as an overreaction or misinterpretation of behaviours that in other circumstances would be considered grooming or red flags indicating a risk of abuse. As discussed in The Nurse podcast, comments on the behaviour of James Griffin in Launceston were dismissed as 'that's just Jim'.[109] In evidence, Professor Eccleston commented:

> In a very relatively tightly connected community, if you are aware of abuse, misconduct or other illegal activities, perhaps you might be in denial. You know, I know this person's families, forebears … so you may be less willing to disclose.[110]

Because of these pressures, witnesses and others reported feeling a lack of trust in official channels to make complaints. When journalist Camille Bianchi was asked during examination whether she was the first port of call for her sources, she responded: 'I think I was the last port of call … the perception was that there was no other outlet'.[111]

In discussing a systemic 'culture of silence and reprisal' across the State Service, whistleblower Alysha (a pseudonym) described her experience as a member of staff who raised concerns about the treatment of children at Ashley Youth Detention Centre.[112] She felt she had little choice but to go to the media:

> I never wanted to 'blow the whistle' or engage with the media. I could think of nothing worse then or now. It was out of sheer despair and having exhausted all 'typical' and 'more palatable' reporting avenues that I felt I needed to, as a matter of public interest and out of feelings of personal and professional obligation to ensure someone responded in an appropriate manner to what I have witnessed at the Centre. After having had a rewarding, successful life prior to the Centre, I deeply resent what I have been put through and the lengths that I have been required to take to be heard regarding these matters … the media can sometimes be the only effective avenue available to whistle-blowers in Tasmania—which signifies a significant gap in the system. No one should have to feel like they need to choose between public safety and their personal safety.
>
> …
>
> I have witnessed a culture and entrenched belief system that … protects staff accused of wrongdoing, and persecutes those that promote change, or who report misconduct.[113]

Close connections can also drive parochialism, which can create boundaries between communities. We heard about divisions and distinctions that contribute to forming community identity and a sense of loyalty. For example, we heard of the distinction between 'mainlanders' and Tasmanians, and between the north and south of Tasmania. Within these boundaries, distinctions continue to multiply to create smaller and smaller divisions.

These distinctions create a sense of protectiveness within a community that can manifest in a reluctance to criticise or be self-reflective or to publicly acknowledge and respond to problems. In commenting on the role of the local media, journalist Ms Baker noted that when working for the newspaper The Examiner:

> … the sense was, we're here to champion the north, we're here to talk up the north, we'll tell good stories about the north and I do think that's an important role that a local newspaper plays, you're part of the community's identity and you should be of course telling the good stories that come with that. Sometimes there are not good stories though …[114]

Journalists also reported being pressured not to report on allegations of abuse because they are 'private matters' that should not be aired in public.[115] Ms Bianchi referred to 'a sense of, "this isn't nice, this isn't productive, this isn't helpful"'.[116] More seriously, journalists referred to pressures from State Service employees suggesting that their reporting would directly harm children and others.[117] Ms Baker stated 'there have been several occasions when I've been told … that I'm going to cause someone to take their own life, my reporting will lead to that dreadful outcome … That is often used'.[118]

This tendency in Tasmanian culture to deny or suppress reports of misconduct affects an institution's responses to allegations of child sexual abuse. It can lead to an institutional culture of 'don't ask, don't tell', where people in hierarchies seek to protect themselves and those in senior positions from knowledge that is difficult to handle. In a government context, this 'don't ask, don't tell' culture may lead public servants to not brief ministers or departmental secretaries on matters of concern. Conversely, ministers and secretaries may benefit from not asking difficult questions.

In consultations, participants spoke of a cultural tendency towards covering up, conflicts of interest and a lack of transparency in responses to allegations of abuse.[119] In the context of limited staff availability in Tasmania, one participant spoke of raising concerns about another staff member and being told: 'Save your breath, we need the person'.[120] In his statement to our Commission of Inquiry, Professor Eccleston suggested a possible link between poor institutional responses and limited workforce mobility in the State Service:

> … longevity of employment within the [State Service] can be a double-edged sword. It results in an older and more stable workforce but is perhaps less dynamic and diverse, and implementing cultural change can be a slower process. Given the broader community dynamics in Tasmania, there is also a risk that obligations to colleagues might trump obligations to uphold high ethical standards in the workplace.[121]

Similarly, we heard evidence of requests for information from government agencies being met with delays and refusals. Ms Bianchi described lengthy processes when seeking documents from the Department of Health under the Right to Information Act 2009, which involved referral to the Ombudsman for review.[122] The process to obtain the requested documents took approximately 22 months.[123]

The Ombudsman's Annual Report 2021–22 states that it was concerning that 95 per cent of the external reviews of Right to Information requests conducted in 2021–22 'identified issues with the manner in which the public authority had responded to a request for assessed disclosure'.[124] While some progress had been made compared with previous years, the Ombudsman wrote:

> The express object of the [Right to Information] Act is clear in relation to its pro-disclosure focus, seeking to increase government accountability and acknowledging that the public has a right to the information held by public > authorities who are acting on behalf of the people of Tasmania. Too often, sadly, adherence to this object is not evident in practice and a closed, and at times obstructive, approach is taken when responding to requests for assessed disclosure which come before my office.[125]

In 2020, the Ombudsman reported that for the year 2018–19, the rate at which Tasmanian Government institutions refused access to any information in response to Right to Information requests (30 per cent) was 7.5 times the rate of Australia's most open jurisdictions, Victoria and the Northern Territory (4 per cent).[126]

Commenting on institutional responses to claims of child sexual abuse and suppression of information, journalist David Killick suggested that: 'Keeping bad news—or any news—from reaching the public isn't some kind of aberration. It is the defining characteristic of this state's political culture'.[127]

5.2.3 The influence of history

Some people suggest that the fear of speaking out in Tasmania has its roots in Tasmania's history as a penal colony and the social structures and cultural norms that have been sustained on the island since that time. Mr Killick said:

> It is a relic of our convict past, this fear of speaking out. It is a straight line from 'Don't upset the overseer' to 'Don't trouble the Minister'.[128]

Professor Pybus said:

> The persistence of colonial societal features—a well-entrenched elite, mistrust of authority within portions of the population, and a pervasive sense of shame—provide some explanation for the occurrence of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian institutions being unreported and unaddressed. In this environment, the silencing of disclosures and conversations about sexual abuse has been normalised over many decades.[129]

Of course, other jurisdictions without a colonial past also experience a reluctance to disclose child sexual abuse—as evidenced by the many international inquiries into child sexual abuse. However, Tasmania's history provides a specific context for this reluctance in relation to our Commission of Inquiry.

Professor Pybus spoke of the division between the descendants of convicts and free settlers, which lasted longer than in other jurisdictions due to low inward migration. She noted that: 'even into the 20th century, there has been less intermarriage between people of the free settler and convict classes in Tasmania, compared to other states'.[130] These divisions are linked to the sense already described that 'everyone knows everyone', with family connections going back generations.

Professor Pybus connected Tasmania's history of brutal penal institutions, which controlled the convict classes and their children, with more recent abusive institutional environments for children. She asked: 'if you look at a place like Point Puer in the 19th century and a place like the Ashley Boys Home in the 20th century, you'd say, what is the difference between these two places? To what extent is the same licence for abuse going to be operating?'[131]

Our Commission of Inquiry's fundamental purpose is to effect genuine cultural change to better prevent and respond to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts. There is some evidence of a cultural shift in this regard. During the hearings, Professor Pybus noted recent changes in the Tasmanian community leading to cultural change. She stated: 'the demographics are changing dramatically and with it is coming a breakdown of the kind of traditional cultural relationships that have kept a sort of code of silence'.[132] She further commented:

> Tasmanian society is now much more cosmopolitan than it was even 15 years ago. It has become an attractive place for others to emigrate. Demographic change in Tasmania has been a key driver of a shift in cultural attitudes. In 2022, I think there is a huge openness in the community, and a greater desire to have difficult conversations and make recompense.[133]

Both Professor Pybus and Professor Eccleston identified that the Commission of Inquiry itself was playing a role in changing the Tasmanian culture of secrecy and staying silent by:

- allowing a process of 'truth-telling'
- acknowledging and raising awareness about the occurrence of child sexual abuse
- making it clear that child sexual abuse is unacceptable
- providing redress and support for victim-survivors
- establishing ways for addressing such abuse when it occurs.[134]

6 Current response to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts

It was difficult for our Commission of Inquiry to determine the current Tasmanian response to child sexual abuse in institutional contexts. We asked the Tasmanian Government to describe their child sexual abuse system but only received brief descriptions of different efforts by various agencies, without an overarching outline of the system.[135] The section below is our best attempt at providing an outline of the current Tasmanian response to child sexual abuse in an institutional context, including efforts for identifying, responding to and preventing child sexual abuse, and supports for victim-survivors. The Tasmanian child sexual abuse response system, as with all jurisdictions, crosses multiple agencies. Each element is discussed in more detail in subsequent chapters.

6.1 Prevention

The Tasmania Government is a party to the recently released National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–30. The National Strategy focuses on preventing child sexual abuse.[136] The Tasmanian Government has recently announced or implemented some initiatives with a connection to preventing child sexual abuse, including educational programs and resources.[137]

6.2 Individual agencies

Individual agencies within the Tasmanian Government are responsible for preventing, identifying, reporting and responding to child sexual abuse within their organisation. Agencies achieve this by ensuring their organisations are child safe, as recommended by the National Royal Commission and articulated in the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations. This is currently a voluntary process. The National Principles for Child Safe Organisations are:

1. Child safety and wellbeing is embedded in organisational leadership, governance and culture.
2. Children and young people are informed about their rights, participate in decisions affecting them and are taken seriously.
3. Families and communities are informed and involved in promoting child safety and wellbeing.
4. Equity is upheld and diverse needs respected in policy and practice.
5. People working with children and young people are suitable and supported to reflect child safety and wellbeing values in practice.
6. Processes to respond to complaints and concerns are child focused.

7. Staff and volunteers are equipped with the knowledge, skills and awareness to keep children and young people safe through ongoing education and training.
8. Physical and online environments promote safety and wellbeing while minimising the opportunity for children and young people to be harmed.
9. Implementation of the national child safe principles is regularly reviewed and improved.
10. Policies and procedures document how the organisation is safe for children and young people.[138]

A legislative framework that includes a plan for implementing the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations has been underway since 2020, with the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Bill 2022 introduced into the Parliament of Tasmania in November 2022 and passed into law on 13 June 2023. Under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 ('Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act'), government departments that provide services specifically for children (such as schools) or provide facilities specifically for use by children who are under their supervision (such as out of home care or youth detention) must comply with a set of 10 Child and Youth Safe Standards.[139]

Among other important standards, Standard 6 of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act provides that organisations must have child-focused processes to respond to complaints of child sexual abuse. In the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations, this includes processes for making notifications to relevant bodies and disciplinary processes.[140] Staff or organisations may have mandatory or voluntary reporting obligations in relation to child sexual abuse under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ('Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act') (to Child Safety Services), the Criminal Code Act 1924 ('Criminal Code Act') (to police), the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the National Disability Insurance Scheme (to the scheme's Quality and Safeguards Commission) and professional registration frameworks (such as to the regulatory bodies for teachers or health practitioners).[141]

Tasmanian Government organisations' disciplinary processes in response to staff alleged to have committed child sexual abuse or related conduct are governed by the State Service Employment Framework. This framework is shaped by:

- the State Service Act, which outlines the rights and responsibilities of state servants and Heads of Agencies (that is, secretaries of departments)
- the State Service Code of Conduct contained within section 9 of the State Service Act, which outlines the expected conduct of public servants
- Employment Directions issued by the minister administering the State Service Act, which outline how Heads of Agencies can respond when they are concerned about the conduct or performance of state servants.[142]

6.3 Agencies responding to abuse

6.3.1 Child Safety Service

Section 13 of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act states that an adult who knows, or believes or suspects on reasonable grounds, that a child is suffering, or is likely to suffer, abuse or neglect, has a responsibility to take steps to prevent it from occurring.[143] One step an adult may take is to inform Child Safety Services of their knowledge, belief or suspicion.[144] In addition, under section 14 of the Act, members of certain professions are mandatory reporters. If, in carrying out official duties or during their work (paid or voluntary), a mandatory reporter believes or suspects on reasonable grounds, or knows, that a child has been or is being abused or neglected, they must inform Child Safety Services.[145]

The role of Child Safety Services is to protect children and young people who are at risk of abuse or neglect, including sexual abuse.[146] The Advice and Referral Line is the first point of contact for anyone with concerns about the safety or wellbeing of a child.[147] Staff at the Advice and Referral Line assess reports and may refer callers to appropriate services or determine to take no further action.[148]

When a matter warrants a child safety assessment and response, the case is transferred to Child Safety Services.[149] If a child is at immediate risk of harm, staff will attend as soon as practicable and take responsibility for the care and protection of the child.[150] Where a child has been or is at risk of being sexually abused, or has displayed harmful sexual behaviours, child safety staff are guided by an internal procedure outlining the steps involved in receiving notifications, conducting an assessment, contacting police, arranging a medical examination and completing follow-up actions and referrals.[151]

In some cases, a child who has experienced institutional child sexual abuse may have a protective parent and not need a child safety response, or the reported risk may be about a potential risk to unidentified children. Factors such as these may affect whether a response from Child Safety Services is required in a particular case. It may instead be referred to police.

The Department for Education, Children and Young People (formerly the Department of Communities) has an obligation under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 ('Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act') to notify the Registrar if it becomes aware of, or suspects on reasonable grounds, that a person registered under the Act has engaged in 'reportable behaviour', which includes child sexual abuse and related conduct.[152]

Staff within the Department also have an obligation to report abuse to police as soon as practicable under section 105A of the Criminal Code Act.[153]

6.3.2 Police

A victim-survivor of child sexual abuse or their caregiver can report their abuse to police, as can others. In addition, under section 105A of the Criminal Code Act, it is an offence not to report a sexual offence against a child.

The Tasmania Police Victims Unit manages sexual assault, and the Serious and Organised Crime division manages child exploitation material. Police analyse reports and information about child sexual abuse to determine whether any offences have been committed.[154] Police have several reporting obligations to other agencies concerning child sexual abuse, including to Child Safety Services and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.[155] Under information-sharing frameworks, child sexual abuse may be investigated as part of a joint response by police and Child Safety Services. Tasmania Police is the lead agency in matters involving an alleged offence, and Child Safety Services are the lead agency in ongoing care and protection matters.[156]

6.3.3 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act

Under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, people carrying out certain activities must be registered to work with children, including people who work in schools, youth justice, out of home care and child health services.[157] The Scheme is one tool to protect children from people who may pose a risk to their safety.

There are specific obligations to report 'reportable behaviour' (behaviour that poses a risk of harm to vulnerable people, whether by reason of neglect, abuse or other conduct) by a person who is registered under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act.[158] The Registrar may conduct an additional risk assessment on a registered person if there is new, relevant information about them.[159] This risk assessment may include requiring additional information from a registered person.[160] The Registrar may disclose information about the result of a risk assessment, registration and related information to another registration or licensing body.[161] Where a person has received a negative risk assessment or had their registration suspended or cancelled, this information may also be disclosed to 'prescribed entities' (currently government agencies and police) if the Registrar considers it appropriate to protect vulnerable people from harm.[162]

6.3.4 Professional registration bodies

Some professions, such as teachers and many health professionals, need to be registered to work in their professional roles. These registration schemes require a certain standard of conduct from those registered. This is to protect the safety of the community and the reputation of the profession.

In Tasmania, the Teachers Registration Board undertakes ongoing vetting processes to ensure people employed as teachers are of 'good character and fit to teach'.[163] The Teachers Registration Act 2000 requires an employer to notify the Teachers Registration Board if it takes any disciplinary action or dismisses a teacher due to 'unacceptable behaviour' (behaviour that does not satisfy a standard of behaviour generally expected of a teacher, is otherwise disgraceful and improper, or shows the person is unfit to be a teacher).[164] Employers must also notify the Teachers Registration Board where the person has resigned or retired in circumstances that may have allowed the employer to consider any behaviour of the person to be unacceptable.[165] Registered teachers must also notify the Teachers Registration Board, in certain circumstances, when they are charged with a prescribed offence, as well as when they are found guilty of committing such an offence.[166] Following an inquiry into matters of concern, the Teachers Registration Board can suspend or cancel a teacher's registration.[167]

In the health sector, the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency ('Ahpra') performs a similar role in ensuring that 'only health practitioners with the skills and qualifications to provide competent and ethical care are registered to practise'.[168] Ahpra is the national organisation responsible for implementing the National Registration and Accreditation Scheme in Australia.[169] It works with National Health Practitioner Boards across 15 health professions, from doctors and nurses to dentists and physiotherapists, and has its functions set out in the Health Practitioner Regulation National Law Act 2009 (Qld).[170]

Registered health practitioners and employers must report 'notifiable conduct', which includes engaging in sexual misconduct in connection with the practice of the practitioner's profession.[171] Following consideration of a notification, a National Board may form the reasonable belief that a health practitioner has engaged in professional misconduct and refer a matter to the relevant state or territory tribunal for determination.[172] In Tasmania, this is the Tasmanian Civil and Administrative Tribunal. The Tribunal may impose conditions or disciplinary actions, including cancellation of registration.[173]

6.4 Oversight bodies

The Tasmanian Commissioner for Children and Young People notes there is 'currently no oversight mechanism which sets the overarching expectation or benchmark' for how government agencies should investigate child sexual abuse.[174] Several Tasmanian institutions or roles provide oversight mechanisms that may respond to complaints about child sexual abuse or about other institutions' responses to such complaints. These include the:

- Commissioner for Children and Young People
- Ombudsman

- Integrity Commission
- Auditor-General
- Health Complaints Commissioner
- Custodial Inspector
- Child Advocate.

The institution-specific volumes in this report discuss oversight bodies that relate to particular institutional contexts or groups of children. These bodies include the Child Advocate, the Custodial Inspector and the Health Complaints Commissioner (refer to Volumes 4, 5 and 6 respectively). There are also national bodies that may provide a degree of oversight, such as the National Disability Insurance Scheme's Quality and Safeguards Commission and the Australian Commission on Safety and Quality in Health Care.

6.4.1 Commissioner for Children and Young People

The Commissioner for Children and Young People is an independent statutory officer established under the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016 ('Commissioner for Children and Young People Act'). The Commissioner must act independently and impartially in the public interest when exercising functions and powers under the Act.[175]

While not charged with the primary response to reports of abuse, the Commissioner is regularly contacted by community members who have concerns about the wellbeing of children and young people.[176] When this occurs, the Commissioner's office provides information about referral options and, in some cases, may share concerns with a 'relevant authority' where this is lawful and appropriate.[177]

Under the Commissioner for Children and Young People Act, the Commissioner has various powers, including the ability to investigate and make recommendations in relation to systems, policies and practices of organisations (both government and non-government) that provide services affecting children and young people.[178] However, the Commissioner does not have the authority to investigate or review 'a specific decision made in respect of an individual case or specific circumstances' unless requested by the relevant minister.[179]

The Commissioner has specific oversight of some institutions where children are particularly vulnerable to sexual abuse, specifically out of home care and youth detention. The independent Out-of-Home Care Monitoring Program was established in 2018.[180] The program focuses on systemic issues in institutional and administrative practices, as separate from complaint handling and individual advocacy.[181] It monitors out of home care service provision, visits out of home care providers, has discussions with advocacy organisations, peak bodies and key stakeholders, and engages with children and young people in out of home care.[182]

The Commissioner also undertakes independent oversight of children's rights and wellbeing in youth detention, together with the Ombudsman and Custodial Inspector.[183] The Commissioner has a statutory function to act as an advocate for a young person in youth detention under the Youth Justice Act 1997 ('Youth Justice Act').[184] This includes assessing the physical and emotional wellbeing of the young person.[185]

The Commissioner's broader functions further contribute to the overall governmental response to child sexual abuse. For example, the Commissioner helps develop legislation and policy, including ensuring the State satisfies its national and international obligations in respect of children and young people generally.[186]

6.4.2 Ombudsman

The Ombudsman is an independent statutory officer appointed by the Governor under the Ombudsman Act 1978 ('Ombudsman Act'). The Ombudsman investigates the administrative actions of public authorities to ensure they are lawful, reasonable and fair.[187]

The Ombudsman may receive complaints from people with concerns about the administrative actions of public authorities if complaints cannot be resolved directly with the authority.[188] This may include complaints about how child sexual abuse allegations and incidents are handled in institutional contexts.

Most complaints are resolved by way of preliminary inquiries, where public authorities provide information to address complaints and improve processes.[189] However, where appropriate, the Ombudsman may conduct an investigation on the basis of a complaint or on the Ombudsman's own motion.[190] Following an investigation, a report is prepared for the public authority that may contain recommendations to remedy actions.[191] The report may also be provided to the relevant minister and to Parliament.[192] Importantly, the Ombudsman does not have the power to compel a public authority to adopt recommendations, although these are 'ordinarily accepted and acted upon'.[193]

In addition, the Youth Justice Act gives a young person the right to complain to the Ombudsman about the standard of care, accommodation or treatment they receive while in a detention centre.[194] The Ombudsman Act also requires that organisations and agencies take all available steps to help a person detained in custody to make a complaint without delay.[195]

6.4.3 Integrity Commission

The Integrity Commission is an independent statutory authority established under the Integrity Commission Act 2009 ('Integrity Commission Act'). Under the Act, the Integrity Commission has several functions and powers related to public officers, including:

- receiving and assessing complaints or information relating to matters involving misconduct
- investigating matters related to misconduct
- referring complaints to other appropriate parties for investigation and action.[196]

The Integrity Commission investigates allegations of serious misconduct in line with the investigative processes and powers set out in the Integrity Commission Act.[197] The Act defines 'serious misconduct' as 'misconduct by any public officer that could, if proved, be a crime or an offence of a serious nature, or misconduct providing reasonable grounds for terminating the public officer's appointment'.[198] Child sexual abuse in institutional contexts would likely be covered by this definition, as could some failures to adequately respond to such abuse.

Following an investigation, the Board of the Integrity Commission may dismiss a matter, refer it to a public authority for investigation (along with any recommendations), require the matter be further investigated, recommend the Premier establish a commission of inquiry or undertake an inquiry by the Integrity Tribunal.[199] After determining the outcome of an investigation, the Board of the Integrity Commission also considers whether a report should be tabled in Parliament.[200]

The Integrity Commission also has a responsibility to educate public officers and the public about integrity in public administration, as well as guiding public officers in the conduct and performance of their duties.[201] It encourages public authorities to notify the Integrity Commission when they receive misconduct allegations and undertake internal investigations. This assists the Integrity Commission to identify misconduct trends and risks, as well as the capacity of public authorities to manage allegations of misconduct.[202]

6.4.4 Auditor-General

The functions and powers of the Auditor-General are set out in the Audit Act 2008.[203] The Auditor-General is supported in this role by the Tasmanian Audit Office.[204] As an independent statutory officer appointed by the Governor, the Auditor-General is not subject to the direction or control of the Parliament or Government.[205] The purpose of the Auditor-General and the Tasmanian Audit Office is to 'provide independent assurance to the Tasmanian Parliament and the community on the performance and accountability of the Tasmanian Public Sector'.[206]

This is primarily achieved through financial, performance and compliance audits as well as investigations of state entities, the outcomes of which are reported to Parliament.[207] Notably for our Commission of Inquiry, the Auditor-General could inquire into systemic matters relevant to preventing and responding to child sexual abuse.[208]

6.5 Support

There are two main sexual assault services in Tasmania: the Sexual Assault Support Service (in southern Tasmania) and Laurel House (in northern Tasmania). Both services provide immediate and longer-term support for victim-survivors of sexual abuse.[209] Victim-survivors can also get support through the Government's 24-hour crisis line, 1800 MY SUPPORT, which offers immediate support and information concerning sexual abuse.[210]

Victim-survivors may access therapeutic support, particularly longer-term support, via other pathways. These include Victims of Crime, the National Redress Scheme, mainstream counselling or mental health services and national online or telephone sexual support services.

The Tasmanian Government is currently piloting two multidisciplinary centres ('Arch' centres) that will co-locate sexual assault support services with other specialised services for victim-survivors of sexual violence.[211]

6.6 Justice and redress

Victim-survivors can seek formal redress or justice for their abuse through different avenues. They can seek justice through civil compensation claims or the criminal justice system, or they can seek redress via the National Redress Scheme. The criminal and civil justice options place what could be seen as higher demands on the victim-survivor, including the need to provide a statement under oath and provide the alleged abuser with natural justice. The National Redress Scheme allows victim-survivors to seek recognition and justice from the institution in which their abuse occurred, without the need to interact with the person who abused them.

6.6.1 Civil claims

In 2020, the Tasmanian Government introduced significant changes to civil compensation claims for child sexual abuse in response to National Royal Commission recommendations. Amendments to Tasmania's Limitation Act 1974 and Civil Liability Act 2002 included removing limitation periods for personal injury proceedings concerning victim-survivors of child abuse, enabling courts to set aside a previously settled right of action in relation to child abuse and expanding organisations' duty to prevent child abuse and vicarious liability.[212]

A victim-survivor may seek civil compensation from the person who abused them or from the institution that may be held legally responsible for the conduct of the abuser, such as by being their employer. In the context of institutional abuse, this means that victim-survivors may initiate civil claims against the State of Tasmania. Claims may be settled out of court or, if contested, the victim-survivor must satisfy a court on the balance of probabilities that their abuse occurred and caused them harm. If satisfied, the court will determine damages.

Recent changes making it easier for the State to be held liable for the actions of employees have resulted in an increase in civil claims against the State. In August 2022, lawyers lodged a class action on behalf of more than 100 claimants seeking compensation from the State of Tasmania, with four lead plaintiffs alleging systemic negligence in the management of Ashley Youth Detention Centre from 1961 to at least December 2019.[213]

6.6.2 Criminal claims

Victim-survivors can also seek justice through the criminal justice system by making a report to police and hoping their abuser is charged, prosecuted by the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions and convicted by a court. In this scenario, the abuse must satisfy the elements of a child sexual assault offence and be proven beyond reasonable doubt.

There are currently no criminal offences related to institutional responsibility for child sexual abuse, although the Government is proposing to introduce a failure-to-report offence.

6.6.3 National Redress Scheme

The Australian Government set up the National Redress Scheme in July 2018.[214] It enables victim-survivors of institutional child sexual abuse to seek financial compensation of up to $150,000, counselling and a direct personal response from the responsible institution.[215]

The scheme's purpose is to:

- acknowledge that many children were sexually abused in Australian institutions
- recognise the suffering they endured because of this abuse
- hold institutions accountable for this abuse
- help victim-survivors gain access to counselling, a direct personal response from the institution and a redress payment.[216]

The National Redress Scheme is scheduled to run for 10 years and is only available to people abused prior to 1 July 2018, although we express some concerns about this in Chapter 17. The Tasmanian Government joined the National Redress Scheme and enacted legislation to enable non-government institutions to join in 2018.[217] By April 2022:

- 689 claims had been made against Tasmanian Government agencies
- 494 of these claimants were offered redress
- 48 claims were not approved
- a further 147 claims were yet to be determined at the national level.[218]

7 Reforms made during our Commission of Inquiry

The Tasmanian Government and its institutions have responded to problems revealed by our Commission of Inquiry in our public hearings and engagement work. In May 2022, the Government announced a package of Keeping Children Safer actions as an interim response to evidence from victim-survivors, state representatives and experts at our first public hearing.[219] During our Commission of Inquiry, the Government continued to make reforms or commitments to reforms.

The Tasmanian Government provided Parliament with an update on their Keeping Children Safer actions in November 2022. All 30 actions in this response are reproduced in Appendix D. The Department for Education, Children and Young People also provided an update to our Commission of Inquiry on 9 February 2023.[220] In summary, the Government has already:

- established the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People in the Department for Education, Children and Young People and drafted the Safeguarding Framework
- appointed a Safeguarding Lead in every government school and established a statewide Safeguarding Network
- appointed extra senior support staff in education as well as two Student Support Response Coordinators who will be responsible for managing responses to incidents of child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours
- rolled out annual, compulsory training on mandatory reporting for all staff in child-facing departments
- commissioned a project designed to improve the safety of children in out of home care

- undertaken the Child Safe Governance Review at Launceston General Hospital
- outlined a plan for Ashley Youth Detention Centre and the youth justice system in the Keeping Kids Safe: A Plan for Ashley Youth Detention Centre Until its Intended Closure and the Draft Youth Justice Blueprint 2022–2032
- consulted on proposed legislation to introduce a new crime of failing to protect a child or a young person from people in authority, and other changes to the criminal law
- consulted on proposed legislation to introduce child safe standards, a reportable conduct scheme and a framework to ensure compliance (now the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023)
- established the Statewide Complaints Oversight Unit to handle future complaints about misconduct across Tasmanian health services, including child sexual abuse
- issued an apology to victim-survivors in Parliament.

The Government has also committed to:

- measures directed at supporting the rights of victim-survivors such as:
    - improving the Right to Information process
    - reviewing civil litigation procedures to ensure a trauma-informed approach
    - establishing two pilot multidisciplinary centres ('Arch' centres) to offer a best-practice model of support and safety services to victim-survivors of sexual and family violence
- reforming youth justice including:
    - closing Ashley Youth Detention Centre and establishing new youth justice facilities
    - introducing a new service delivery model focused on early intervention, diversion and rehabilitation
    - raising the minimum age of detention from 10 to 14 years
    - preparing the Draft Youth Justice First Action Plan 2023–2025
- measures designed to improve Child Safety Services including:
    - establishing out of home care standards and accreditation, and a carers register
    - allocating funding to develop and procure a Wellbeing, Care and Recovery Placement Program (therapeutic residential placement program)

    - establishing a community-led palawa Child Safe and Supported Policy Partnership Working Group to improve outcomes for Aboriginal children and families at risk of entering or in contact with the child safety or out of home care system
    - measures to support a skilled and ready child safety workforce
- actions to safeguard children and support their wellbeing in schools including:
    - appointing a further eight psychologists and eight social workers
    - rolling out safeguarding training for principals and school leaders, and developing Registration to Work with Vulnerable People training
- actions aimed at State Service employees including:
    - expanding the scope of regulated activities under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People legislation
    - establishing a central register of employees who have been terminated because of an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct
    - rolling out trauma-informed training across the State Service
- other actions such as:
    - designing a multimedia resource (tell someone) for children, young people and families to raise awareness of child sexual abuse
    - establishing information-sharing groups with other jurisdictions and engaging with representative bodies concerned with the safety and wellbeing of children and young people
    - establishing a whole of government Commission of Inquiry response unit
    - developing a website to publicly report progress on implementation of the interim response actions and expected delivery dates.[221]

The Government indicated that most of the proposed actions were underway. We discuss these recent and proposed reforms, where relevant, in subsequent chapters.

The Government said it will continue to publicly report on these actions via a dedicated webpage, established in January 2023.[222] It will expand the list when it receives our recommendations in August 2023. We understand that the Tasmanian Government has already set up a Commission of Inquiry response unit within the Department of Justice, to coordinate the implementation of our recommendations.

Other reforms the Government has undertaken in response to issues our Commission of Inquiry and other inquiries have identified include:

- bringing services related to children under the responsibility of one new agency —the Department for Education, Children and Young People
- establishing the Keeping Children Safer Working Group, reporting to the Secretaries Board
- implementing the recommendations of the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, including establishing the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People.

In December 2022, the Commissioner for Children and Young People announced an investigation into case management for children and young people in out of home care, focusing on the allocation of Child Safety Officers.

Notes

1 Convention on the Rights of the Child, opened for signature 20 November 1989, 1577 UNTS 3 (entered into force 2 September 1990).

2 Convention on the Rights of the Child, opened for signature 20 November 1989, 1577 UNTS 3 (entered into force 2 September 1990) parts 2(1), 3(1), 6(2) and 12(1).

3 Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography, opened for signature 25 May 2000, A/RES/54/263 (entered into force 18 January 2002).

4 Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, opened for signature 10 December 1984, 1465 UNTS 85 (entered into force 26 June 1987).

5 Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment, open for signature 18 December 2002, A/RES/57/199 (entered into force 22 June 2006).

6 Commonwealth Ombudsman, Implementation of the Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (OPCAT) Baseline Assessment of Australia's Readiness (Report Number 3, September 2019).

7 Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment, open for signature 18 December 2002, A/RES/57/199 (entered into force 22 June 2006) parts 17–23.

8 Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment, open for signature 18 December 2002, A/RES/57/199 (entered into force 22 June 2006) parts 2, 5–16.

9 Commonwealth Ombudsman, Monitoring places of detention – OPCAT (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.ombudsman.gov.au/industry-and-agency-oversight/monitoring-places-of-detention-opcat>.

10 Elise Archer, 'Appointment of the Tasmanian National Preventive Mechanism' (Media Release, 7 February 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/appointment_of_the_tasmanian_national_preventive_mechanism>.

11 UN General Assembly, United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Nelson Mandela Rules), GA Res 70/175, UN Doc A/RES/70/175 (8 January 2016, adopted 15 December 2015).

12 Committee against Torture, Concluding Observations on the Sixth Periodic Report of Australia, 75th sess, UN Doc CAT/C/AUS/CO/6 (5 December 2022) 11.

13 Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, opened for signature 30 March 2007, 2515 UNTS 3 (entered into force 3 May 2008); International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, opened for signature 21 December 1965, 660 UNTS 195 (entered into force 4 January 1969).

14 United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous People, GA Res 61/295, UN Doc A/RES/61/295 (2 October 2007, adopted 13 September 2007).

15 Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, opened for signature 30 March 2007, 2515 UNTS 3 (entered into force 3 May 2008) parts 1, 3, 4, 7, 8, 16, 18, 23, 24, 25, 30; International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, opened for signature 21 December 1965, 660 UNTS 195, (entered into force 4 January 1969) parts 1 and 2; United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous People, GA Res 61/295, UN Doc A/RES/61/295 (2 October 2007, adopted 13 September 2007) preamble and parts 7, 14, 17, 21, 22.

16 Article 16 of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities provides that States Parties shall take all appropriate legislative, administrative, social, educational and other measures to protect people with disabilities, both within and outside the home, from all forms of exploitation, violence and abuse, including their gender-based aspects.

17 Hague Convention of 19 October 1996 on Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Recognition, Enforcement and Co-operation in Respect of Parental Responsibility and Measures for the Protection of Children, concluded 19 October 1996 (entered into force 1 January 2002); Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 111CZ; Family Law (Child Protection Convention) Regulations (Cth) 2003.

18 Hague Convention of 25 October 1980 on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, concluded 25 October 1980 (entered into force 1 December 1983); Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 111B; Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations 1986 (Cth) r 1A.

19 National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls, Reclaiming Power and Place: The Final Report into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls (Canada) (Final Report, June 2019); Commission to Inquire into Child Abuse, Commission to Inquire into Child Abuse Report (Ireland) (Final Report, May 2009); Commission of Investigation, Report into the Catholic Diocese of Cloyne (Ireland) (Final Report, December 2010); Royal Commission of Inquiry into Abuse in Care*, Tāwharautia: Pūrongo o te Wā (New Zealand*) (Interim Report, December 2020); Independent Inquiry Child Sexual Abuse, Interim Report of the Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse (United Kingdom) (Interim Report, April 2018); Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry, Report of the Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry (Northern Ireland) (Final Report, June 2017); Scottish Child Abuse Inquiry <https://www.childabuseinquiry.scot>; Independent Jersey Care Inquiry, The Report of the Independent Jersey Care Inquiry 2017 (Jersey) (Final Report, July 2017); Karen J Terry et al, The Causes and Context of Sexual Abuse of Minors by Catholic Priests in the United States, 1950–2010 (Report presented to the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops by the John Jay College Research Team, May 2011).

20 For example, the Historical Abuse Inquiry in Northern Ireland spanned 1922 to 1995, and the Canadian Inquiry, Reclaiming Power and Place, spanned 1960 to 2018.

21 For further information, refer to Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse*, Homepage* (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.childabuseroyalcommission.gov.au>.

22 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017).

23 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 1, 27, 183, 189.

24 Refer to, for example, Government of Western Australia, Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse: Response by Minister McGurk on behalf of the Government of Western Australia (June 2018) 10, 11; Government of the Australian Capital Territory, The ACT Government Response to the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, June 2018) 2.

25 Recommendations 10.2 and 10.3 of the National Royal Commission, refer to Department of Justice, Tasmanian Response: Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (June 2018) 51.

26 Department of Justice, Fourth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2022: Implementing the Recommendations of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, December 2021) 26.

27 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Harmful Sexual Behaviours Program – Open for Referrals', Safe from Violence (Web Page, 15 June 2021) <https://www.safefromviolence.tas.gov.au/resources-hub/news-and-announcements/news/harmful-sexual-behaviours-program-open-for-referrals>.

28 Tasmanian Government, Second Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2020 (Report, December 2019) 15–17.

29 Child Abuse Royal Commission Response Unit, Department of Justice, 'Tasmanian Response to the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse' (Web Page, 15 December 2022) <https://www.justice.tas.gov.au/carcru/tasmanian-response-to-the-royal-commission>.

30 The Government's 2022 response and action plan notes that this work will be progressed through a Child and Youth Safe Framework: Tasmanian Government, Fourth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2022: Implementing the Recommendations of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (December 2021) 13–14. For more about progress on the Child and Youth Wellbeing Framework, refer to Section 4.3.

31 Australian Human Rights Commission Amendment (National Children's Commissioner) Act 2012 (Cth); Australian Human Rights Commission Act 1986 (Cth) pt IIAA. For further information, refer to Australian Human Rights Commission, Children's Rights (Web Page, 2023) <https://humanrights.gov.au/our-work/childrens-rights>.

32 National Office for Child Safety, Our Work (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.childsafety.gov.au/our-work>.

33 National Centre for Action on Child Sexual Abuse, About The National Centre for Action on Child Sexual Abuse (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.ncacsa.org.au>.

34 Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services), Safe and Supported: The National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children 2021–2031; Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services), The National Plan to End Violence against Women and Children 2022–2032.

35 Commonwealth of Australia (Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet), National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030 (2021) 18.

36 Commonwealth of Australia (Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet), National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030 (2021) 16.

37 Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services), Safe and Supported: the National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children 2021–2031 (2021) 6.

38 Australian Human Rights Commission, 'About the National Principles', Child Safe Organisations (Web Page, 2023) <https://childsafe.humanrights.gov.au/national-principles/about-national-principles>; Australian Human Rights Commission, National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (2018) 4.

39 Australian Human Rights Commission, National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (2018) 4.

40 Commonwealth of Australia (Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet), Commonwealth Child Safe Framework (2nd ed, 2020) 4.

41 Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services), National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022–2032 (2022) 14.

42 Tasmanian Government Child Abuse Support Services Task Force, Tasmanian Task Force Report on Child Sexual Assault: A Report to the Minister for Community Protection Board (Report, November 1989); Task Force on Sexual Assault and Rape in Tasmania, Report of the Task Force on Sexual Assault and Rape in Tasmania (Report, 1998); Patmalar Ambikapathy, Rights of Children with Disabilities and Services for Them: Office of the Commissioner for Children – Memorandum of Advice to Minister of Health and Human Services (September 2003); Patmalar Ambikapathy, Complaints Process for Abuse of Children in Care (Part 2): Office of the Commissioner for Children – Memorandum of Advice to Minister of Health and Human Services (September 2003); Patmalar Ambikapathy, Proposal for Legislation on Pre Employment Checks and Use of Criminal Intelligence: Commissioner for Children – Memorandum of Advice to Minister of Health and Human Services (February 2004); Ombudsman Tasmania, Listen to the Children: Review of Claims of Abuse from Adults in State Care as Children (Report, November 2004); Ombudsman Tasmania, Review of Claims of Abuse from Adults in State Care as Children (Final Report – Phase 2, June 2006); Commissioner for Children Tasmania, Who Is Listening to the Children Now? The Commissioner for Children's Response to Recommendations 8 and 9 of the Tasmanian Ombudsman's Report: 'Listen to the Children, Review of Claims of Abuse from Adults in State Care as Children' (Report, October 2006); Alison Jacob and David Fanning, Report on Child Protection Services in Tasmania (Report, October 2006); Commissioner for Children Tasmania, Inquiry into the Circumstances of a 12-Year-Old Girl under Guardianship of the Secretary: Final Report (Report, July 2010); Select Committee on Child Protection, Final Report (Report No 44, 2011); Department of Health and Human Services, Report of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014); Commissioner for Children Tasmania, Strengthening Child Safe Organisations (Report, September 2015); Department of Health and Human Services, Redesign of Child Protection Services Tasmania: 'Strong Families – Safe Kids' (Report, March 2016).

43 Tasmanian Government Child Abuse Support Services Task Force, Tasmanian Task Force Report on Child Sexual Assault: A Report to the Minister for Community Services (Report, November 1989); Task Force on Sexual Assault and Rape in Tasmania, Report of the Task Force on Sexual Assault and Rape in Tasmania (Report, 1998).

44 The reports concerning the Tasmanian health system relate to the Department of Health, the Tasmanian Health Service and Launceston General Hospital. The eight reports date from 2014 and do not constitute an exhaustive list. Reports were selected because of their relevance to the organisational context of the Tasmanian health system.

45 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 7 June 2021) 74–82. The Independent Education Inquiry nominally made 21 recommendations; however, recommendations 11 and 15 were duplicates (refer to page 79 of the Final Report).

46 According to the Second Reading speech for the Justice Miscellaneous (Commissions of Inquiry) Bill 2021: 'The commission of inquiry will also continue the investigation into the responses of the Tasmanian Health Service and the Department of Health to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in the matter of James Geoffrey Griffin and the Launceston General Hospital and the responses of the Department of Communities to allegations of child sexual abuse at Ashley Youth Detention Centre'. Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 18 March 2021, 48 (Elise Archer, Attorney-General).

47 Ombudsman Tasmania, Listen to the Children: Review of Claims of Abuse from Adults in State Care as Children (Report, November 2004) 1.

48 Tasmanian Government, 'Final Abuse in State Care Report Released' (Media Release, 6 November 2014) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/releases/final_abuse_in_state_care_report_released>.

49 Department of Health and Human Services, Report of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 3.

50 Department of Health and Human Services, Report of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 3.

51 Ombudsman Tasmania, Listen to the Children: Review of Claims of Abuse from Adults in State Care as Children (Report, November 2004) 25; Ombudsman Tasmania, Review of Claims of Abuse from Adults in State Care as Children (Final Report – Phase 2, June 2006) 6; Department of Health and Human Services, Report of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 13.

52 Department of Health and Human Services, Report of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 16–17.

53 Department of Health and Human Services, Report of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 18.

54 Department of Health and Human Services, Report of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 20.

55 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 28, Recommendation 6.8; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 24, Recommendation 7.9.

56 Tasmanian Government, Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 (November 2022) preface.

57 Tasmanian Government, Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 (November 2022) 19–20, Actions 24, 28.

58 Tasmanian Government, Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 (November 2022) 13–22, Actions 1, 2, 4, 5, 12, 14, 18, 31, 32, 35.

59 Department of Health and Human Services, Redesign of Child Protection Services Tasmania: Strong Families – Safe Kids (2016).

60 Statement to Parliament on 27 August 2015, Minister for Human Services, the Hon Jacquie Petrusma MP, quoted in: Department of Health and Human Services, Redesign of Child Protection Services Tasmania: Strong Families – Safe Kids (2016) 5, 10.

61 Tasmanian Government, Strong Families, Safe Kids (Web Page, 2023) <https://strongfamiliessafekids.tas.gov.au>.

62 Tasmanian Government, Tasmanian Child and Youth Wellbeing Framework (2018) 2.

63 Tasmanian Government, Strong Families Safe Kids: Next Steps Action Plan 2021–2023 (2021) 8.

64 Tasmanian Government, It Takes a Tasmanian Village: Child and Youth Wellbeing Strategy (2021).

65 Tasmanian Government, It Takes a Tasmanian Village: Child and Youth Wellbeing Strategy (2021) 36.

66 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Table 6: Population, by Age and Sex – States and Territories – at 30 June 2022', National, State and Territory Population (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/population/national-state-and-territory-population/latest-release>.

67 Commission to Inquire into Child Abuse, Commission to Inquire into Child Abuse Report (Ireland) (Final Report, May 2009); Commission of Investigation, Report into the Catholic Diocese of Cloyne (Ireland) (Final Report, December 2010); Independent Jersey Care Inquiry, The Report of the Independent Jersey Care Inquiry 2017 (Jersey) (Final Report, July 2017).

68 Independent Jersey Care Inquiry, The Report of the Independent Jersey Care Inquiry 2017 (Jersey) (Final Report, July 2017) vol 3, 63 [13.41] (emphasis omitted).

69 Independent Jersey Care Inquiry, The Report of the Independent Jersey Care Inquiry 2017 (Jersey) (Final Report, July 2017) vol 2, 27 [2.59].

70 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Table 6: Population, by Age and Sex – States and Territories – at 30 June 2022', National, State and Territory Population (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/population/national-state-and-territory-population/latest-release>.

71 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Table 6: Population, by Age and Sex – States and Territories – at 30 June 2022', National, State and Territory Population (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/population/national-state-and-territory-population/latest-release>.

72 Australian Bureau of Statistics, Greater Hobart: 2021 Census All Persons QuickStats (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/census/find-census-data/quickstats/2021/6GHOB>; Australian Bureau of Statistics, Launceston and North East: 2021 Census All Persons QuickStats (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/census/find-census-data/quickstats/2021/602>; Australian Bureau of Statistics, West and North West: 2021 Census All Persons QuickStats (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/census/find-census-data/quickstats/2021/604>; Australian Bureau of Statistics, South East: 2021 Census All Persons QuickStats (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/census/find-census-data/quickstats/2021/603>.

73 Professor Graeme Hugo et al, The CALD Youth Census Report 2014 (Report, Multicultural Youth Advocacy Network Australia, June 2014) 11, 18.

74 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Table 1: Estimated Resident Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Population, by Sex and Age Groups, States and Territories – 2021', Estimates of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians, 2021 (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/aboriginal-and-torres-strait-islander-peoples/estimates-aboriginal-and-torres-strait-islander-australians/jun-2021#age-and-sex-structure>; Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Table 6: Population, by Age and Sex – States and Territories – at 30 June 2021', National, State and Territory Population (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/population/national-state-and-territory-population/jun-2021#data-downloads-data-cubes>.

75 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Table 1: Estimated Resident Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Population, by Sex and Age Groups, States and Territories – 2021', Estimates of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/aboriginal-and-torres-strait-islander-peoples/estimates-aboriginal-and-torres-strait-islander-australians/jun-2021#age-and-sex-structure>; Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Table 6: Population, by Age and Sex – States and Territories – at 30 June 2021', National, State and Territory Population (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/population/national-state-and-territory-population/jun-2021#data-downloads-data-cubes>.

76 Australian Bureau of Statistics, Disability, Ageing and Carers, Australia: Summary of Findings (Web Page, 24 October 2019) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/health/disability/disability-ageing-and-carers-australia-summary-findings/latest-release#children-with-disability>; Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Table 5.1: All Persons, Disability Status, by Age and Living Arrangements – 2018, Estimate', Disability, Ageing and Carers, Australia: Tasmania 2018 (Catalogue No 4430.0, 5 February 2020) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/health/disability/disability-ageing-and-carers-australia-summary-findings/2018/44300do006_2018.xls>.

77 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Table 2.2: Children Receiving Child Protection Services, by State or Territory, 2019–2020', Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2019–2020 (Child Welfare series No 74, Catalogue No CWS 78, 2021) <https://www.aihw.gov.au/getmedia/e614c109-ac77-45ee-bbe5-23fa15f7967d/Data-tables_Child-protection-Australia-2019-20.xlsx.aspx>.

78 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Table 2.2: Children Receiving Child Protection Services, by State or Territory, 2019–2020', Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2019–2020 (Child Welfare series No 74, Catalogue No CWS 78, 2021) <https://www.aihw.gov.au/getmedia/e614c109-ac77-45ee-bbe5-23fa15f7967d/Data-tables_Child-protection-Australia-2019-20.xlsx.aspx>.

79 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Table 2.2: Children Receiving Child Protection Services, by State or Territory, 2019–2020', Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2019–2020 (Child Welfare series No 74, Catalogue No CWS 78, 2021) <https://www.aihw.gov.au/getmedia/e614c109-ac77-45ee-bbe5-23fa15f7967d/Data-tables_Child-protection-Australia-2019-20.xlsx.aspx>.

80 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Table 2.2: Children Receiving Child Protection Services, by State or Territory, 2019–2020', Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2019–2020 (Child Welfare series No 74, Catalogue No CWS 78, 2021) <https://www.aihw.gov.au/getmedia/e614c109-ac77-45ee-bbe5-23fa15f7967d/Data-tables_Child-protection-Australia-2019-20.xlsx.aspx>.

81 Department of Communities, Annual Report 2019–2020 (Report, October 2020) 49.

82 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Youth Detention Population in Australia 2020 (Report, 2021) 15–16.

83 'According to the ABS, more than 37% of Tasmania's population resides in its most socioeconomically disadvantaged (bottom 20% of the national income distribution) areas (which are mostly regional, inland areas) and less than 5% reside in its most advantaged (top 50%) areas (which are mostly clustered around Hobart, Launceston and select coastal areas). In contrast the Australian Capital Territory had the lowest proportion of people living in the most disadvantaged areas (0.7%) and the highest proportion of people in relatively advantaged areas (55%)'.Statement of Professor Richard Eccleston, 2 May 2022, 3 [14] referencing Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2071.0 – Census of Population and Housing: Reflecting Australia – Stories from the Census, 2016 (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/Lookup/by%20Subject/2071.0~2016~Main%20Features~Socio-Economic%20Advantage%20and%20Disadvantage~123>.

84 Statement of Professor Richard Eccleston, 2 May 2022, 3 [15].

85 Statement of Professor Richard Eccleston, 2 May 2022, 3 [16]–4 [17].

86 Statement of Professor Richard Eccleston, 2 May 2022, 5 [19]; Institute for Social Change, Tasmanian Demographic Analysis SnapShot – October 2021, 2 [figure 3] <https://blogs.utas.edu.au/isc/files/2021/10/Demographic-snapshot_Mar-qtr-2021_Oct-2021.pdf>.

87 Australian Bureau of Statistics, Average Weekly Earnings, Australia (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/labour/employment-and-unemployment/labour-force-australia/latest-release#states-and-territories> and <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/labour/earnings-and-working-conditions/average-weekly-earnings-australia/nov-2021#state-and-territory> referenced in Statement of Professor Richard Eccleston, 2 May 2022, 5–6 [23].

88 Refer to, for example, OECD Programme for International Student Assessment (PISA), Results from PISA 2018: Australia (Web Page, 2019) <https://www.oecd.org/pisa/publications/PISA2018_CN_AUS.pdf>; Manika Champ, 'Why Are Tasmanian Students Falling Behind the Rest of the Nation?', ABC News (online, 6 December 2019) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2019-12-06/explainer-education-performance-tasmanian-students/11771422>; Helena Burke, 'Tasmanian Adults Disproportionately Affected by Illiteracy', NCA NewsWire (online, 14 July 2021) <https://www.news.com.au/national/breaking-news/tasmanian-adults-disproportionately-affected-by-illiteracy/news-story/687c3b7483c49f8243c323b6f4e6bcc5>.

89 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Adult Literacy in Tasmania 2006', Tasmanian State and Regional Indicators, Jun 2008: Adult Literacy in Tasmania 2006 (Cat. No. 1307.6, 31 June 2008) <https://www.abs.gov.au/AUSSTATS/abs@.nsf/Lookup/1307.6Feature+Article1Jun+2008#State%20and%20Territory%20Comparisons>. Refer also to Australian Bureau of Statistics, Programme for the International Assessment of Adult Competencies, Australia: Statistics About the Competencies of Australians in the Domains of Literacy, Numeracy and Problem Solving Skills in Technology-Rich Environments, Reference Period 2011–2012 (Web Page, 9 October 2023) <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/education/programme-international-assessment-adult-competencies-australia/latest-release>.

90 Australian Government Productivity Commission, 'School Education', Report on Government Services 2023 (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.pc.gov.au/ongoing/report-on-government-services/2023/child-care-education-and-training/school-education>.

91 Launceston consultation, 19 August 2021.

92 Rodney Croome, 'Churning the Mud: Tasmania's Fertile Ground for Legal and Social Reform', The Conversation (online, 2013) <https://theconversation.com/churning-the-mud-tasmanias-fertile-ground-for-legal-and-social-reform-12180>.

93 James Peoples and Garrick Bailey, Humanity – An Introduction to Cultural Anthropology (11th ed, Cengage, 2017) 23.

94 Refer also to Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 2016) 15.

95 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 2016) 31.

96 Statement of Professor Cassandra Pybus, 29 April 2022, 5–6 [29].

97 Refer to, for example, Hobart consultation, 13 August 2021; Launceston consultation, 19 August 2021. Refer also to Session with Will Gordon, 30 November 2021; Submission 056 Engender Equality, 8.

98 Statement of Professor Richard Eccleston, 2 May 2022, 6 [24].

99 Transcript of Professor Richard Eccleston, 5 May 2022, 343 [33–37].

100 Lisa Denny, 'The Aspirational Tasmanian: Ready For the Right Kind of Change', The Conversation (online, 13 February 2013) <https://theconversation.com/the-aspirational-tasmanian-ready-for-the-right-kind-of-change-11943>.

101 Transcript of Samuel Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1064 [16–30].

102 Anonymous source quoted in 'Episode Eight: Under Pressure', The Nurse (Camille Bianchi, 1 December 2020) <https://open.spotify.com/epidose/0jKIC1VvDYaLGHrfAUDel?si=pA33syLUQIaC5CLoGNWmZw>.

103 Statement of Professor Cassandra Pybus, 29 April 2022, 7 [41].

104 Submission 009 Kerri Collins, 4.

105 The name 'Rachel' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022; Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 819 [35–37].

106 Launceston consultation, 19 August 2021.

107 Transcript of Emily Baker, 5 May 2022, 449 [43]–450 [1].

108 Session with Jack Davenport, 21 February 2022; Session with Adrian English, 17 September 2021; Anonymous session, 22 February 2022.

109 'Episode One: Just Jim', The Nurse (Camille Bianchi, 13 October 2020) <https://open.spotify.com/show/2CG58YDV7p8vamvYq7WhgK>.

110 Transcript of Professor Richard Eccleston, 5 May 2022, 347 [33–37].

111 Transcript of Camille Bianchi, 5 May 2022, 444 [26–31].

112 The name 'Alysha' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

113 Statement of 'Alysha', 16 August 2022, 85–86 [432], 86 [434–437].

114 Transcript of Emily Baker, 5 May 2022, 447 [41]–448 [1].

115 Transcript of Emily Baker and Camille Bianchi, 5 May 2022, 448 [19–44].

116 Transcript of Camille Bianchi, 5 May 2022, 448 [41–42].

117 Transcript of Emily Baker and Camille Bianchi, 5 May 2022, 457 [15–37].

118 Transcript of Emily Baker, 5 May 2022, 457 [15–21].

119 Refer to, for example, Hobart consultation, 13 August 2021; Launceston consultation, 19 August 2021.

120 Hobart consultation, 13 August 2021.

121 Statement of Professor Richard Eccleston, 2 May 2022, 9 [34].

122 Transcript of Camille Bianchi, 5 May 2022, 459–462.

123 Transcript of Camille Bianchi, 5 May 2022, 462 [21–22].

124 Ombudsman Tasmania, Annual Report 2021–22 (Report, 2022) 30.

125 Ombudsman Tasmania, Annual Report 2021–22 (Report, 2022) 30.

126 Ombudsman Tasmania, Annual Report 2019–20 (Report, 2020) 29, 75.

127 David Killick, 'Analysis: Culture of Cover-Up a Cancer On Tasmania's Democracy', The Mercury (online, 2020) <https://www.themercury.com.au/news/tasmania/analysis-culture-of-coverup-a-cancer-on-tasmanias-democracy/news-story/d12f9021cb14a67add8a875010180fe7>.

128 David Killick, 'Analysis: Culture of Cover-Up a Cancer On Tasmania's Democracy', The Mercury (online, 2020) <https://www.themercury.com.au/news/tasmania/analysis-culture-of-coverup-a-cancer-on-tasmanias-democracy/news-story/d12f9021cb14a67add8a875010180fe7>.

129 Statement of Professor Cassandra Pybus , 29 April 2022, 7 [40].

130 Statement of Professor Cassandra Pybus, 29 April 2022, 5 [25].

131 Transcript of Professor Cassandra Pybus, 5 May 2022, 350 [36–40].

132 Transcript of Professor Cassandra Pybus, 5 May 2022, 356 [47]–357 [3].

133 Statement of Professor Cassandra Pybus, 29 April 2022, 8 [43–44].

134 Transcript of Professors Richard Eccleston and Cassandra Pybus, 5 May 2022, 356 [18]–358 [2].

135 'Tasmanian Government's current service system', 23 August 2021, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Policy documents relating to responding to child sexual abuse, 23 August 2021, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

136 Commonwealth of Australia (Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet), National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030 (2021).

137 Department for Education, Children and Young People, About Respectful Relationships Education (Web Page, 2023) <https://respectfulrelationships.education.tas.gov.au/about/>; Department of Communities, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2023) 27; Bravehearts, Annual Report 2019–2020 (Report, 2020) 37; Department of Education, Annual Report, 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 14, 131.

138 Australian Human Rights Commission, National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (2018) 6.

139 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 14, sch 2.

140 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 sch 1; Australian Human Rights Commission, National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (2018) 14.

141 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 13; Criminal Code Act 1924 s 105A; National Disability Insurance Scheme Act (Cth) s 73Z; Health Practitioner Regulation National Law Act 2009 (Qld), ss 130, 140, 141, 141A, 142; Teachers Registration Act 2000 ss 18, 27A, 31; Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 53A; Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Regulations 2014 r 5A.

142 Department of Premier and Cabinet, Employment and Ministerial Directions (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.dpac.tas.gov.au/divisions/ssmo/employment_directions>.

143 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 13(1).

144 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 13(2).

145 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 14(2).

146 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Child Safety Service (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.decyp.tas.gov.au/children/child-safety-service/>.

147 Tasmanian Government, Strong Families Safe Kids (Web Page, 2023) <https://strongfamiliessafekids.tas.gov.au/#:~:text=Strong%20Families%2C%20Safe%20Kids%20Advice,risk%20children%20and%20their%20families>.

148 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ss 17, 17A, pt 4.

149 'Tasmanian Government's Current Service System', 23 August 2021, 11, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

150 'Keeping Children Safe Handbook: Department of Communities Tasmania (Children and Family Services) & Department of Police, Fire and Emergency Management (Tasmania Police)', (undated) 9, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

151 Department of Communities, 'Procedure: Assessing and responding to child sexual abuse', 4 November 2016, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

152 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 53A; 'Tasmanian Government's Current Service System', 23 August 2021, 12, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

153 Criminal Code Act 1924 s 105A.

154 'Tasmanian Government's Current Service System', 23 August 2021, 5, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

155 'Tasmanian Government's Current Service System', 23 August 2021, 7, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 14; Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 53A; Criminal Code Act 1924 s 105A.

156 'Keeping Children Safe Handbook: Department of Communities Tasmania (Children and Family Services) & Department of Police, Fire and Emergency Management (Tasmania Police)', (undated) 12, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

157 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 4A; Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Regulations 2014 rr 4H–40E.

158 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 53A; Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Regulations 2014 r 5A.

159 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 46.

160 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 46A.

161 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 54B.

162 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 54B(3); Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Regulations 2014 r 5B.

163 Teachers Registration Act 2000 pt 3, div 4; Teachers Registration Board Tasmania, Eligibility for Registration (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.trb.tas.gov.au/joining-the-profession/>.

164 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 31.

165 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 31.

166 Teachers Registration Act 2000 ss 18, 18A, 27A.

167 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 24. This also applies with respect to a Limited Authority to Teach.

168 Ahpra & National Boards, What We Do (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.ahpra.gov.au/About-Ahpra/What-We-Do.aspx>.

169 Ahpra & National Boards, About (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.ahpra.gov.au/About-Ahpra.aspx>.

170 Ahpra & National Boards, National Boards (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.ahpra.gov.au/National-Boards.aspx>; Health Practitioner Regulation National Law Act 2009 (Qld) s 25. The Health Practitioner Regulation National Law is implemented through an 'adoption of laws' model whereby Queensland is the lead jurisdiction. The substantive provisions of the Queensland legislation apply in Tasmania through the Health Practitioner Regulation National Law (Tasmania) Act 2010. Boards include the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Health Practice Board, Chinese Medicine Board, Chiropractic Board, Dental Board, Medical Board, Medical Radiation Practice Board, Nursing and Midwifery Board, Occupational Therapy Board, Optometry Board, Osteopathy Board, Paramedicine Board, Pharmacy Board, Physiotherapy Board, Podiatry Board and Psychology Board. The Act applies to Tasmanian by virtue of Health Practitioner Regulation National Law (Tasmania) Act 2010 s 4.

171 Health Practitioner Regulation National Law Act 2009 (Qld) s 140.

172 Health Practitioner Regulation National Law Act 2009 (Qld) s 193B.

173 Health Practitioner Regulation National Law Act 2009 (Qld) s 196.

174 Submission 074 Commissioner for Children and Young People, 7.

175 Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016 s 8(3).

176 Commissioner for Children and Young People, Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, 2021) 17.

177 Commissioner for Children and Young People, Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, 2021) 17; C*ommissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016* s 17(1).

178 Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016 s 11.

179 C*ommissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016* ss 9, 14.

180 Submission 074 Commissioner for Children and Young People, 8.

181 Commissioner for Children and Young People, Out-of-Home Care Monitoring (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.childcomm.tas.gov.au/out-of-home-care-monitoring/>.

182 Commissioner for Children and Young People, Annual Report 2019–20 (Report, 2020) 18.

183 Submission 074 Commissioner for Children and Young People, 11.

184 Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016 s 8(1)(b).

185 Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016 s 10(1)(d).

186 Commissioner for Children and Young People Act 2016 s 8(1)(f).

187 Ombudsman Tasmania, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 5.

188 Ombudsman Act 1978 ss 4A, 14.

189 Ombudsman Tasmania, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 5; Ombudsman Act 1978 s 20A.

190 Ombudsman Act 1978 s 13.

191 Ombudsman Act 1978 s 28(2).

192 Ombudsman Act 1978 s 28(3), (6); Ombudsman Tasmania, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 6.

193 Ombudsman Tasmania, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 6.

194 Youth Justice Act 1997 s 129(1)(d).

195 Ombudsman Act 1978 s 18.

196 Integrity Commission Act 2009 s 8.

197 Integrity Commission, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 17.

198 Integrity Commission Act 2009 s 4(1).

199 Integrity Commission, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 18.

200 Integrity Commission Act 2009 s 11(3). Refer also to Integrity Commission, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 18.

201 Integrity Commission Act 2009 s 8(1)(a), (b).

202 Integrity Commission, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 15.

203 Audit Act 2008 ss 7–9.

204 Audit Act 2008 s 4.

205 Tasmanian Audit Office, Annual Report 2019–20 (Report, 23 October 2020) 11; Tasmanian Audit Office, Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, 26 October 2021) 5. Refer also to Audit Act 2008 ss 9, 10.

206 Tasmanian Audit Office, Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, 26 October 2021) 5.

207 Tasmanian Audit Office, Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, 26 October 2021) 5.

208 Refer to, for example, Tasmanian Audit Office, Accessing Services for the Safety and Wellbeing of Children and Young People – The Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line (Report of the Auditor-General No. 6 of 2021–22, 21 June 2022).

209 Transcript of Jillian Maxwell, 3 May 2022, 134 [38]–135 [12].

210 Tasmania Police, Sexual Assault Support Services (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.police.tas.gov.au/useful-links/sexual-assault-support-services/>.

211 Department of Premier and Cabinet, Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 (November 2022) 9.

212 Limitation Act 1974 s 5B, s 5C and pt 10C, divs 2, 3.

213 Angela Sdrinis Legal, 'The Ashley Youth Detention Centre (AYDC) Class Action', AYDC Class Action (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.angelasdrinislegal.com.au/aydc-class-action.html>.

214 National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth). For information about the National Redress Scheme, refer to National Redress Scheme, National Redress Scheme (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.nationalredress.gov.au>.

215 National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse Act 2018 (Cth) s 16.

216 National Redress Scheme, About the National Redress Scheme (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.nationalredress.gov.au/about/about-scheme>.

217 National Redress Scheme for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse (Commonwealth Powers) Act 2018 s 7(1)(a)(ii).

218 Statement of Ginna Webster, 29 April 2022, 52 [335(a)–d)]. The Premier also referred to forecasts 'that Tasmanian claims for redress could be around 2000 people of which around half are expected to relate to Tasmanian Government institutions': Peter Gutwein, 'Premier's Statement – Commission of Inquiry' (Media Release, 23 November 2020) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/progress_on_the_new_burnie_ambulance_station/premiers_statement_-_commission_of_inquiry>.

219 'Keeping Children Safer Implementation Status Report', Keeping Children Safer (Policy Document, 31 May 2023) <https://www.dpac.tas.gov.au/keepingchildrensafer>.]

220 Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023.

221 'Keeping Children Safer Implementation Status Report', Keeping Children Safer (Policy Document, 31 May 2023) <https://www.dpac.tas.gov.au/keepingchildrensafer>; Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023.

222 Department of Premier and Cabinet, Tasmanian Government's Interim Response to the Commission of Inquiry (Report, 30 June 2023).

3 Child sexual abuse in institutions

1 Introduction

This chapter sets out what our Commission of Inquiry learned about child sexual abuse in institutional contexts. Understanding the nature, causes and effects of child sexual abuse helped us consider institutional failures and our recommendations to better prevent child sexual abuse in the future and respond appropriately to victim-survivors.

Our work was greatly informed by the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('National Royal Commission') that ran from January 2013 to December 2017. The National Royal Commission drew on thousands of personal stories, hundreds of written accounts, dozens of hearings and an extensive program of research.[1]

Although the National Royal Commission provided an important foundation for our Commission of Inquiry, our task was to examine the Tasmanian context. To this end, we commissioned our own research and sought and received evidence from many sources about child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government schools, hospitals, out of home care settings and the Ashley Youth Detention Centre.

We have no reason to believe that the nature, causes and effects of child sexual abuse in Tasmania differ substantially from the national experience, but there may be aspects of the Tasmanian context that require special consideration:

> Tasmania is a small community. People are closely connected through school, work, marriage, partnership or friendship circles. That context of close connection intensifies the concern about reporting and about making allegations against people. This presents difficulties for those individuals on whom we rely to … [raise] concerns and [remain] vigilant about matters of child safety.[2]

Tasmania's small population may also have implications for the availability of financial, human and other resources to address the risk of child sexual abuse.

We consider the specific Tasmanian context in more detail in Chapter 2 and throughout this report. In this chapter, we:

- briefly describe the different forms of child sexual abuse
- examine the factors that increase the risk of child sexual abuse occurring in an institutional context or compromise the ability or willingness of an institution to respond when it does occur
- describe the effects of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts on victim-survivors, their family members, communities and the broader society.

2 What is child sexual abuse?

As discussed in Chapter 1, our Commission of Inquiry has defined child sexual abuse as:

> Any act which exposes a child to, or involves a child in, sexual processes beyond his or her understanding or contrary to accepted community standards. Sexually abusive behaviours can include the [touching] of genitals, masturbation, oral sex, vaginal or anal penetration by a penis, finger or any other object, [touching] of breasts, voyeurism, exhibitionism, and exposing the child to or involving the child in pornography. It includes child grooming, which refers to actions deliberately undertaken with the aim of befriending and establishing an emotional connection with a child, to lower the child's inhibitions in preparation for sexual activity with the child; and
>
> Any related matters.[3]

We acknowledge the dynamics of child sexual abuse and that it may or may not be coercive. Professor Ben Mathews, Research Professor, Queensland University Technology School of Law, states:

> Child sexual abuse can be inflicted by an adult, or by an older (and sometimes even a younger) child. It is inflicted in secret, and usually by an adult who is known to the child or a family member. It can be inflicted in circumstances where force or coercion is clearly apparent, but it can also be inflicted where such coercion is not as stark but where the victim is not developmentally capable of understanding the acts and/or where the child is in a position of physical, cognitive, emotional or psychological vulnerability such that consent is not freely given.[4]

This is recognised in the criminal law, which makes it clear that children below the age of 17 years in Tasmania cannot legally consent to sexual acts, except in very limited circumstances.[5]

2.1 Forms of child sexual abuse

The two most common forms of child sexual abuse reported by victim-survivors to the National Royal Commission were non-penetrative contact abuse and penetrative abuse.[6] Non-penetrative contact abuse includes sexual touching of a child's body or making a child touch the abuser's body. These behaviours are described with terms including 'molestation, indecent assault, [touching], sexual harassment and sexual assault'.[7] Penetrative child sexual abuse refers to 'the insertion of a penis, another body part or an object into the vagina (including labia and other genitalia), anus or mouth'.[8] It may also be described as rape, sexual intercourse with a child or sexual assault.[9]

Other forms of child sexual abuse identified through research, and that we heard more about over the course of our Inquiry, include:

- violation of children and young people's privacy, such as forcing a child to undress or watching them in a private space
- exposing children and young people to sexual acts and material
- child sexual exploitation (historically called child prostitution)
- production, consumption, dissemination and exchange of child sexual exploitation material (historically called pornography)
- forcing children to witness the sexual abuse of others.[10]

'Grooming' is a common strategy used by abusers to enable, facilitate and conceal their sexual abuse of a child or young person by acting to gain the trust of a child over time. Grooming can involve 'psychological manipulation that is subtle, prolonged, calculated, controlling and premeditated', with the ultimate purpose of making a child compliant with abuse.[11] Abusers commonly use grooming to support them to gain access to the child or young person, initiate and maintain the abuse of that person, and conceal the abuse from others.[12]

Grooming behaviours can be difficult to identify because they are not necessarily overtly sexual and can be consistent with non-exploitative and even positive social behaviours.[13] Grooming can be so effective that the child or young person believes they 'consented' to the sexual acts or even that they are in a 'relationship' with the abuser. Victim-survivors told us that at the time of their abuse they admired or even 'loved' their abuser.[14] Leah Sallese gave evidence to our Inquiry that for a long time she understood sexual abuse by her teacher as an 'affair'.[15]

Tiffany Skeggs told us that her abuser:

> … fully groomed me to believe that I loved him and I had to protect him, that was my job. If I didn't do that it would destroy his family, it would destroy me; he was very clear about the fact that I would lose the respect of everybody that ever knew me.[16]

Abusers may also direct grooming behaviours towards adults and other significant people in the child or young person's life. The purpose of grooming others is to establish trust and cooperation that can facilitate the abuser's access to the child and help the abuser avoid detection.

'Institutional grooming' refers to grooming children in an institutional context. It involves abusers exploiting the institutional environment to carry out the abuse and to evade detection.[17] Abusers also groom people who work with children in institutions.[18]

Not everyone who breaches a professional boundary does so with an intent to groom. However, professional boundary breaches are a key warning sign for the risk of child sexual abuse.[19] Abusers may also use professional boundary breaches to 'test' how resistant the organisational culture is to perpetration, with their boundary breaches becoming incrementally more serious with each breach they get away with.[20]

Previous research and inquiries into grooming and professional boundary breaches by child sexual abusers show that boundary breaches should be considered cumulatively. When multiple breaches are considered together, a pattern of behaviour consistent with grooming may be revealed. As separate incidents they can seem innocuous, and it can be easier for abusers to provide plausible excuses to explain the behaviour.[21]

2.2 Child sexual abusers

The National Royal Commission found there is no 'typical profile' of child sexual abusers. Child sexual abusers are diverse and cannot be easily identified based on factors such as age, gender, background or behaviours.[22] However, it also sought to identify and understand characteristics that were frequently noted among abusers in institutional contexts. For example, abusers were frequently described as 'charming, charismatic and popular' when in public.[23] Abusers who use the institution or organisation within which they work to abuse children commonly hold roles associated with positions of leadership, power and authority, such as roles in religious ministries or as teachers.[24] Abusers in institutional settings may use techniques such as 'coercion, favouritism, alienation, secrecy, and boundary violations' to 'groom' or 'entrap' children and young people.[25]

Most victim-survivors who gave evidence to the National Royal Commission reported that their abusers were male.[26] Evidence presented to our Inquiry reflected previous findings that adults who sexually abuse children in institutional settings are predominantly male.[27] We did, however, hear about some female abusers.[28]

The National Royal Commission noted that while most adult abusers are male, most men do not sexually abuse children.[29] However, there is clearly a relationship between gender and sexual abuse perpetration and victimisation. A 2023 Australian study found significant gender differences in victim-survivors of child sexual abuse: women reported 'substantially more childhood sexual abuse' than men.[30] In addition, people who identified as gender diverse were found to be more likely to experience all types of child maltreatment.[31]

The National Royal Commission further identified several 'risk factors' that may contribute to the likelihood of a person becoming a sexual abuser of children.[32] These risk factors include:

- adverse experiences in childhood (such as abuse and neglect)
- interpersonal, relationship and emotional difficulties
- distorted beliefs and thinking errors (such as deviant sexual interests or distorted attitudes about sex and/or children)
- indirect influences such as contextual or trigger factors.[33]

However, while such risk factors may appear at higher rates in child sexual abusers, they cannot be reliably used to determine the likelihood of abuse occurring: 'There is no clear causal link that explains why a person becomes a perpetrator and no clear pathway to perpetration'.[34]

Only some abusers are preferentially sexually attracted to children.[35] They may actively seek out institutional settings that increase their opportunities to sexually abuse children.[36] Other abusers are opportunistic. They may only begin abusing children once they are in an institution where the culture and environment enable them to overcome their inhibitions.[37]

2.3 Harmful sexual behaviours

Harmful sexual behaviours are sexual behaviours displayed by children and young people that may:

- fall outside what is considered developmentally, socially and culturally expected
- cause harm to themselves or others
- occur face to face and/or via technology.[38]

When these behaviours involve another child or young person, they may include a lack of consent, reciprocity and mutuality, and involve the use of coercion, force or a misuse of power.[39]

Harmful sexual behaviours can include behaviours that are criminal. The effects of these behaviours on victim-survivors can be equal to those of adult-perpetrated child sexual abuse.[40] However, the emotional and sexual development of children who have engaged in such behaviour is different from that of adults. The culpability that attaches to children's behaviour, as well as prospects for rehabilitation, also differ from those of adults.[41]

Social and environmental factors that may influence children and young people's propensity to engage in harmful sexual behaviours include 'prior sexual, physical or emotional abuse, exposure to family violence, social difficulties, and exposure to and consumption of pornography'.[42]

The National Royal Commission reported that other children carried out just under one-quarter of the child sexual abuse reported to them.[43]

2.4 Characteristics of children associated with greater vulnerability to child sexual abuse

All children are potentially vulnerable to adult abusers because they depend on adults and lack comparative physical, social and legal power.[44] Aspects of some institutional settings have implications for this vulnerability of children because they are separated from those who usually protect them. In addition, the power imbalance between adults and children can be heightened in some institutional contexts, 'particularly those that are highly controlled, are isolated and exhibit hierarchical and authoritarian features'.[45] It is important to note that, while several factors may increase a particular child's vulnerability to sexual abuse, responsibility for abuse lies only with the abuser and the institution responsible for the child's safety, never with the child.[46]

While all children are vulnerable, some children may be more at risk of sexual abuse at different times, based on certain characteristics or circumstances.[47] Unfortunately, most children who have experienced sexual abuse have also experienced other types of maltreatment (exposure to domestic violence, emotional abuse, physical abuse and neglect).[48] Other risk factors include gender, age and developmental stage, family characteristics and circumstances, and the child's personal and physical characteristics.[49] However, these risk factors do not mean a child will be abused, nor does the presence of protective factors ensure a child's safety.[50]

Some groups of children are more vulnerable to sexual abuse due to being exposed to more of these risk factors. The National Royal Commission reported that, while Aboriginal children, children from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and children with disability are 'not inherently more vulnerable to sexual abuse', they are at increased risk because, among other things, they are more likely to have sustained contact with institutions within which abusers have opportunities to abuse them.[51] Aboriginal children, children from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and children with disability were also shown to experience added challenges that affected their likelihood of disclosing or reporting sexual abuse.[52]

3 Risks of child sexual abuse in institutions

Child sexual abuse can occur within any institution. However, some institutional contexts and cultures enable sexual abuse more than others.[53] This section focuses on the institutional factors that can increase the risk of abuse occurring in an institution, or an institution failing to identify or respond appropriately to child sexual abuse.

The National Royal Commission concluded that cultural, operational and environmental factors contribute to the likelihood of children being sexually abused and of abuse being identified, reported and responded to appropriately.[54] It explained that:

- Institutional cultural factors include leadership and organisational culture, which shape assumptions, values, beliefs and norms.[55]
- Operational factors include governance, internal structure, day-to-day practices, the approach to implementing child safe policies and the recruitment, screening and training of staff and volunteers.
- Environmental factors include the characteristics of physical and online spaces that enable potential adult abusers and children with harmful sexual behaviours to access victims.[56]

Some of these factors are highlighted in Sections 3.1, 3.2 and 3.3, with particular reference to child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government institutions.

3.1 Cultural factors

3.1.1 'Closed' or 'total' institutions

There is generally a higher risk of child sexual abuse occurring in institutions that are less 'open' and therefore less accountable to the broader community.[57] 'Closed' or 'total' institutions are those that exercise full control over a child's day-to-day life. In these institutions, children are subject to strict rules and procedures, are entirely dependent on the institution, and are isolated from the outside world.[58] Such institutions are often said to have the purpose of 'reforming' or 'protecting' children.

Because closed institutions are not common environments, they can become 'alternative moral universes'—the cultural norms and rules are established and maintained wholly within the institution and are distinct from the norms and rules of general society.[59] Closed institutions are also often hierarchical in nature, enforcing obedience to authority.[60] Staff, volunteers, children and young people may therefore be less inclined or feel less able to report or act on abuse. We note in the real world that these factors exist on a continuum that result in some institutions being more closed than others.

3.1.2 Leadership

An institution's leadership affects the risk of child sexual abuse. Leaders have decision-making power and so shape an institution's culture and practices. Leaders influence the culture of their institutions through the people they hire and fire, the behaviours they reward or punish, the issues they prioritise, how they respond to crises, and the attitudes and behaviours they model.[61]

The way leaders work to prevent or respond to child sexual abuse can be distorted by things such as the often competing expectations to avoid public or political exposure, protect budgets and stakeholder confidence, maintain reputational standards and avoid litigation.[62] Prioritising these factors can create a 'damage control' mindset that may lead to minimising or denying abuse, silencing victim-survivors, shifting risks elsewhere, or even, in extreme circumstances, actively concealing abuse.[63]

3.1.3 Trust and values

Some professions and institutions are highly trusted by the community. This can lead to a greater willingness to allow children to be unsupervised in their care, to be deferential and to second-guess suspicions or allegations of abuse when they arise.[64] In the past, such institutions have included religious or spiritual organisations, elite sports organisations and medical practices.[65] Children can find it harder to recognise abuse, or be discouraged from reporting abuse, when their family or community holds the institution, or the people in it, in high regard.[66]

In some settings, staff, volunteers and members can become 'fused' with the identity or 'values' of an institution. This may occur, for example, in relation to an elite school with a strong 'brand' and investment from alumni.[67] People associated with an organisation may overidentify with it, and they may become defensive if they perceive that the organisation is under threat. They may take threats to the reputation of the institution personally, which can lead them to prioritise the institution's reputation over the safety of children.[68]

3.1.4 Institutional culture and behavioural dynamics

Institutions comprise people who are conditioned by social norms and are susceptible to cognitive biases and psychological defences. Certain beliefs, behaviours and biases can influence a person's ability and willingness to identify and respond to child sexual abuse.

Broad community attitudes also inform institutional norms, although it is possible for institutions to develop values and norms that depart from those held in the community, sometimes significantly.[69] The views of people working in institutions are subject to various influences including:

- community attitudes about sexual abuse and the likelihood and frequency of it occurring
- attitudes about children's rights
- attitudes about gender, race and sexual orientation.[70]

Researchers have found that psychological defences, called 'techniques of neutralisation', can stop people from feeling guilty about engaging in misconduct or for failing to intervene when they perceive a person's behaviour as being wrong. In simple terms, these psychological defences can lead a person to:

- dismiss the capacity or humanity of a child or young person
- ignore the harm or distress a behaviour is causing
- believe they have no agency to change a situation
- believe they are doing 'good', or that the good they are doing outweighs the bad
- understand their failures—for example, to intervene in wrongdoing—as no worse than others' failures.[71]

It is generally very difficult for people to overcome these behaviours. The most effective strategies for changing such behaviours involve creating a safe space to consider alternative perspectives and engage in critical self-reflection.[72]

Within institutions, these behaviours can become part of a larger dynamic, or 'organisational culture', that works against protecting children from harm.[73] Organisational culture has been described as the 'assumptions, values and beliefs, and norms that distinguish appropriate from inappropriate attitudes and behaviours in an organisation'.[74] Organisational culture can be shaped through the messages and actions that are formally and informally communicated between staff and others in an institution, as well as by community attitudes.[75]

In the context of contemporary youth detention environments, the National Royal Commission identified the cultural characteristics of institutions that may increase the risk of child sexual abuse.[76] These included:

- failing to prioritise children's welfare and wellbeing[77]
- lack of voice—failing to provide children with the opportunity to communicate their views reflects a culture in which children are not listened to, and their views are not respected[78]

- disrespecting children[79]
- tolerating humiliating and degrading treatment of children—an institutional culture of dehumanising children can weaken the usual inhibitions or concerns of staff[80]
- engendering a strong sense of group allegiance—children are less likely to disclose abuse, and less likely to be believed, in institutions with strong group allegiance between adults[81]
- minimising the significance of harmful acts against children and young people.[82]

Research undertaken for the National Royal Commission found many barriers to identifying grooming or abusive behaviours in organisations. One barrier is the errors of reasoning that humans unconsciously employ daily. Errors of reasoning may contribute to the failure to notice or intervene in behaviours that indicate a risk of child sexual abuse.[83] Three significant errors of reasoning identified in the research are:

- Confirmation bias—being more likely to notice evidence that supports pre-existing views and overlook evidence that challenges them. For example, being unwilling to characterise the behaviour of a well-liked colleague as grooming.[84]
- The representativeness heuristic—assessing people based on assumptions about the category they belong to, such as professionals working in children's services. People tend to assume that employees of children's services are there to act in the best interests of children, even when there is evidence to the contrary.[85]
- The availability heuristic—paying attention to a limited range of information, particularly first impressions and information that is 'vivid, concrete, emotion-laden and recent', rather than considering information that may lead to a different view. For example, forming a positive first impression of someone and thereafter disregarding small indicators of grooming behaviour.[86]

The authors of this research noted that overcoming errors of reasoning can be challenging, so organisations need to actively create environments that help identify and overcome them.[87] In addition, dynamics in a workplace can affect a person's willingness to take any action that may damage their relationships with their colleagues or superiors.[88] In smaller communities, like Tasmania, these behavioural dynamics can extend from the workplace to the wider community; that is, people may fear they will lose their social relationships and standing if they act on a concern about a child or young person's safety where that concern may place them in conflict with existing social hierarchies or consensus (for example, where an alleged abuser has an otherwise 'good reputation' within the community).[89]

Abusers often exploit the beliefs, behaviours and biases of individuals, communities and institutions, which allows them to sexually abuse children and young people freely.

3.2 Operational factors

The nature of the services or activities an institution engages in with children can increase the risk of abuse. Risk is generally greater in institutions where there is:

- a high degree of physical or intimate contact with children—for example, medical, disability and child care[90]
- a high degree of institutional control over the day-to-day lives of children or their living environment—for example, youth detention, out of home care, boarding schools or inpatient health care[91]
- a strong emotional or psychological connection between the child and the institution—for example, religious organisations or sporting clubs[92]
- regular unsupervised contact with children.[93]

In 'closed' or 'total' institutions, control over children is often achieved through strict rules and procedures, and children may depend entirely on the institution to provide care.[94] Youth detention facilities and inpatient mental health services are such institutions.[95]

3.2.1 Management and governance

The management and governance structures of institutions can also affect the safety of children. For example, abuse can be difficult to report if there is a single manager in the hierarchy who is either the abuser or closely allied to them. Abuse can also be difficult to report where there is limited external scrutiny of the institution and its leadership.[96] Conversely, where there is no clear responsibility for child safety within an organisation, abusers can easily go undetected.

3.2.2 Child safe policies and norms

The policies and practices of an organisation provide important practical protections against abuse, as well as signalling the importance of child safety to staff and volunteers.

There is a greater risk of harm to children occurring in institutions that do not have child-centred policies for preventing, detecting and responding to abuse.[97] The absence of clear and appropriate policies creates ambiguity about appropriate standards of behaviour and makes it hard for staff and volunteers to know what to do if they have concerns about or receive disclosures of abuse.[98] People are less likely to make complaints or disclosures if they do not understand or are not confident that such disclosures will be managed effectively through a transparent process that also respects confidentiality.[99]

Child safe policies will not be effective if they do not define and articulate the process for addressing sexual abuse, if they are impractical, if staff are not trained or resourced to implement them, and if they are not promoted, monitored or enforced.[100]

Most organisational policies will also require a degree of interpretation or judgment. For example, legitimate efforts to build rapport and demonstrate care towards children can be mistaken for grooming behaviours. Organisations need to consider the context of the behaviour and promote an open culture that encourages staff to seek advice about concerns.[101] Safer organisations will generally describe in detail and explain discretions and ambiguities within policies and procedures, and support staff to use their judgment. Staff should feel safe to admit mistakes or breaches.[102]

Noncompliance can become normalised and accepted when institutions tolerate departures from otherwise robust policies—for example, by ignoring when teachers spend extra time with students unsupervised, or when staff have inappropriate non-sexual physical contact with children.[103] The effectiveness of the best policies will also erode over time if institutions do not empower the children and young people in their care to speak up about safety concerns.[104]

In 2015, the then Tasmanian Commissioner for Children and Young People, Mark Morrissey, conducted a review into child safe organisations. This review directly engaged with children and young people. It found that many of the children felt they were not listened to by adults, did not understand what abusive behaviour was, and were unaware of their right to safety from all forms of abuse and about what behaviour is unacceptable.[105]

Research we commissioned confirmed that to feel safe, children and young people need to have 'confidence in themselves as well as in adults' and organisations' efforts to keep them safe and respond when they have been harmed'.[106] Without the confidence that institutions will act to keep them safe, children and young people reported being less likely to raise concerns, disclose abuse or seek assistance.[107]

Children are also less likely to experience institutions as safe if the institution is not inclusive or does not embrace diversity.[108] Children who experience discrimination, whether relating to their culture/ethnicity, gender identity, sexual orientation, disability status, faith or other characteristics, are less inclined to report abuse because they may not feel confident they will be believed.[109] This reluctance may be exacerbated if the institution also fails to embrace the diverse backgrounds and characteristics of its staff.[110]

There are links between patriarchal 'macho' culture and abuse. Research shows that abuse is more prevalent in institutions that normalise aggressive or sexualised behaviours as valid expressions of masculinity.[111] Where institutions permit or require the routine use of force or violence (for example, threats, strip searching or restraints), staff can become desensitised. This makes it easier for them to minimise or tolerate harm against children in their care.[112]

In extreme cases, institutions can develop entrenched toxic behaviours involving 'hazing', bullying and overtly sexualised behaviours.[113] There is also evidence that abusive or bullying behaviours between staff and volunteers can be mirrored between children in institutions.[114]

We talk about the elements of a child safe organisation and their implementation in Tasmania in Chapter 18.

3.3 Environmental factors

An institution's physical environment can also increase the likelihood that a child or young person will be sexually abused. Abusers take advantage of spaces that are monitored infrequently.[115] The risk that sexual abuse will occur in an institutional setting is therefore increased when that setting is enclosed, isolated, difficult to supervise or has limited options for entry and exit.[116] In institutions such as schools, the physical design and layout can play a significant role in increasing or mitigating the risk that sexual abuse will occur by inhibiting or facilitating oversight, particularly in relation to higher risk spaces such as toilet blocks, professional offices or specialist classrooms.[117] More open design including large windows, with fewer closed or hidden spaces, can allow increased lines of sight into and between spaces where children are expected to be, increasing opportunities for oversight and potentially decreasing the risk of abuse.[118]

Inappropriate residential placements in youth detention or out of home care—such as placing younger children with older children or those who have displayed concerning behaviour—can also significantly increase the risk of abuse.[119] Inadequate adult supervision may enable children to display harmful sexual behaviours against others.[120]

Our Commission of Inquiry heard that children and young people in institutions are increasingly using online technology to engage with peers, people outside the institution, and staff and volunteers within the institution.[121] Although there are many positive aspects to online communication, using this type of communication also comes with significant challenges relevant to keeping children safe.[122] Abusers often use online environments, such as social networking sites and mobile phones, to groom children.[123] Children and young people's boundaries can be readily pushed by abusers online, who may progressively expose children and young people to intimate and sexualised messages and imagery.[124] Technology can enable abusers to have ongoing contact with children out of physical sight.[125]

Online environments can also be difficult for parents, institutional leaders and staff to monitor.[126] Mitigating the risk of abuse online relies on a nuanced understanding of how grooming works and when online contact is appropriate.[127] Authorities such as the eSafety Commissioner are undertaking research and developing educational materials and resources for parents and children to support safe online engagement.[128] Critically, in institutional contexts, children are better protected when they are aware of the rules for engagement through technology for adults in authority and are empowered to notify a parent or trusted adult if inappropriate contact occurs with a stranger or someone they know.[129]

4 The risk of child sexual abuse in particular institutions

This section provides an overview of the factors that increase the risk of child sexual abuse and compromise the ability of an institution to respond to abuse in hospitals, schools, detention centres and out of home care. In later chapters, we consider in depth how institutions in Tasmania that fall within these four categories have acted to prevent children from experiencing child sexual abuse and responded to children and adult victim-survivors.[130]

4.1 Hospitals and health institutions

Children in the care of any hospital are inherently vulnerable. Children in need of hospital-based medical care are often temporarily living away from their families and support networks, sometimes for long periods. Hospitals can be frightening and overwhelming places for children. Children who are admitted to hospital for extended periods due to illness or injury experience many of the features of a closed institution.

Risks of child sexual abuse are also present in health services more broadly. As the National Royal Commission observed, children and their parents often do not question a medical practitioner's access to intimate parts of a child's body because they 'believe that a health practitioner is acting in pursuit of a higher purpose … and not out of personal sexual gratification'.[131]

In research we commissioned into the safety of children in Tasmanian institutions, researchers spoke to a range of children and young people who had spent time in hospital. These researchers found that children sometimes did not feel safe or confident in hospital and that they relied heavily on parents or carers to advocate for them.[132] The often private one-on-one nature of medical care, where children and young people may not always have a parent present to advocate, places children in a vulnerable position.[133] Health professionals can also abuse children and young people under the guise of medical treatment (including with medication or medical instruments), which can make it more difficult for patients and their families to recognise the behaviour as abusive.[134]

We report on what we found on preventing and responding to child sexual abuse in Tasmanian health services in Volume 6 and make recommendations for system-wide improvement.

4.2 Schools and educational institutions

In Tasmanian schools, as elsewhere in Australia, teachers and other staff step into the role of supervisors for children, in place of their parents, during school hours. On the whole, Department for Education, Children and Young People employees provide a safe and supportive learning environment for Tasmanian students. Schools are the most common institution with which children engage; most children attend school, and schools are generally the place children spend the most time outside their homes. Schools are not inherently a high-risk environment, but the large population of children in schools and the length of time they spend there means many concerning sexual incidents have occurred in state school systems.[135]

There is also increasing recognition that some factors in the school environment can expose children and young people to a greater risk of sexual abuse. These factors are 'the amount of time children spend in school, the inherently hierarchical relationship between students and teachers (and other school staff), and the fact that children of different ages attend school together'.[136] It is not feasible within a busy school environment for adults to have their eyes on every child all the time, and incidents of child sexual abuse can occur quickly and do not always occur behind closed doors.

In Volume 3, we examine in detail responses to child sexual abuse in Tasmanian government schools and make recommendations for systemic improvements.

4.3 Youth detention

While the risk of child sexual abuse is present in all residential institutions, youth detention centres 'perhaps illustrate the highest level of risk'.[137] As mentioned, detention centres are 'closed' institutions. The National Royal Commission identified specific characteristics as increasing the risk of child sexual abuse in youth detention:

- a culture of humiliating and degrading treatment of children, deprivation of liberty and invading children's privacy
- a heightened power imbalance between staff and detained children, including the use of strict rules, isolation, discipline and punishment by staff
- young people detained in the centre having no say about their daily lives
- a culture that engenders strong group allegiance among staff, including management.[138]

Children and young people who are held in youth detention centres are more likely to have experienced past abuse or neglect. As noted in Section 2.4, past experiences of abuse and neglect have consistently been found to heighten children's risk of experiencing child sexual abuse. Children in detention are also at a disproportionate risk of being involved with child safety services or to be in the care of the state in out of home care. They are therefore less likely to have a trusted adult to whom they can turn for help.[139]

Children in youth detention face several other barriers to disclosing abuse due to the characteristics of that institution.[140] For example, cultural norms to not speak out or

'snitch' decrease the likelihood of children raising complaints, particularly where they are experiencing harm caused by another child or young person in detention.[141]

People who engage in sexual abuse in youth detention settings can include:

- youth workers and other custodial staff
- doctors, nurses, psychologists and other health professionals
- case managers, community, recreation and educational service providers
- chaplains and other religious personnel
- legal representatives
- people undertaking external inspection and complaint handling functions.[142]

There is also a high risk of young people in youth detention engaging in harmful sexual behaviours.[143] These behaviours may be modelled on how adults or older children have behaved towards them outside and inside detention settings.[144]

We report on what we found in relation to Ashley Youth Detention Centre in Volume 5.

4.4 Out of home care

For the purposes of our Commission of Inquiry, out of home care means formal care that is arranged or provided by the Tasmanian Government for children and young people who cannot live safely at home. Out of home care includes foster care, kinship care, respite care, sibling group care, residential care, third-party guardianship and therapeutic services for children in care.[145]

Children in out of home care spend a lot of time alone with adults who are outside their usual family or social environment. As the National Royal Commission observed, the 'very nature of out of home care involves adults having opportunities to be alone with children, primarily in home-based care but also in residential care settings, and to develop supportive relationships with those children'.[146] Unfortunately, this means that in some instances sexual abuse will occur.

People who sexually abuse children in out of home care include adults within the out of home care system, such as foster carers, residential care workers or child safety officers; adults outside the out of home care system who have access to children and young people in care; and other children within the system, such as another young person in the care setting.[147]

Adults who sexually abuse children in out of home care are more likely to be male, charismatic, controlling and in positions of power.[148] Abuse is often accompanied by grooming so children will trust the abuser and believe they have consented to the abuse.[149] As discussed earlier in relation to health settings, abusers also engage in

'institutional grooming', whereby they manipulate other staff and communities into trusting them so their abusive behaviour is not suspected.[150]

Adults outside the out of home care system can pose a risk to children in out of home care through child exploitation. While child sexual exploitation occurs across the general population, there are adults who actively target children in out of home care, particularly in residential care, due to their increased vulnerability to grooming and abuse.[151]

Children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours are a significant concern in out of home care. Research suggests a strong correlation between young people living in residential settings and engaging in, or being subjected to, harmful sexual behaviours.[152] Children in out of home care may be at greater risk of child sexual abuse by other children in their placement than by adult staff members.[153]

The National Royal Commission found that certain factors increase the risk that abusers will target a child or young person in out of home care. These factors generally relate to the vulnerability of the child in the eyes of the abuser and include the child's:

- previous experience of abuse or neglect
- loss of connection to family and culture
- lack of understanding of what constitutes abuse.[154]

Female children and young people seem to be at greater risk of child sexual abuse in out of home care. However, the evidence is difficult to interpret because male children and young people are less likely to disclose abuse.[155] Children with disability are about three times more likely than children who do not have a disability to experience sexual abuse in out of home care.[156] The exposure of Aboriginal children and young people to the risk of institutional child sexual abuse is increased by being in out of home care. Also, when Aboriginal children are placed with non-Aboriginal families, they can experience disconnection from culture that can render them even more vulnerable to sexual abuse.[157]

In Volume 4, we examine in detail responses to child sexual abuse in Tasmania's out of home care settings and make recommendations for reform.

5 The effects of child sexual abuse

This section examines the effects of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts on victim-survivors, as well as on their family members, communities and broader society. We also provide an overview of how institutional responses can reduce or aggravate the effects of child sexual abuse. In this section we draw on the work of the National Royal Commission and on what those affected by child sexual abuse in Tasmania told us.

5.1 Effects on victim-survivors

One victim-survivor told us:

> People have asked me about, you know, the impact and stuff like that and I just want to say that I got to survive but I didn't get to thrive. I will never get to know the person I could have been because of him … [158]

Sexual abuse causes profound trauma. It adversely affects children and young people's emotional and educational development, physical and mental health, the quality of their relationships, their connection to culture, and their sense of identity and wellbeing. These effects often continue into adulthood and can have lifelong consequences for a victim-survivor's ability to work, raise a family, feel part of a community and enjoy intimacy.[159] Trauma expert Bessel van der Kolk writes that traumatic experiences affect humans on multiple levels, leaving 'traces on our minds and emotions, on our capacity for joy and intimacy, and even on our biology and immune systems'.[160] He explains that:

> Trauma, by definition, is unbearable and intolerable. Most rape victims, combat soldiers, and children who have been molested become so upset when they think about what they experienced that they try to push it out of their minds, trying to act as if nothing happened, and move on. It takes tremendous energy to keep functioning while carrying the memory of terror, and the shame of utter weakness and vulnerability.[161]

The timeframe for experiencing the effects of child sexual abuse can vary. For some victim-survivors the effects are immediate and ongoing, for others they are temporary, while for others still they emerge later in life, when the trauma of the abuse is triggered by an event or different life stage.[162]

As the National Royal Commission observed, the factors that influence how a victim-survivor is affected by sexual abuse are complex, unique, profound, enduring and interconnected.[163] Some of these factors include:

- the type, duration and frequency of the abuse
- the relationship of the abuser to the child
- the victim-survivor's circumstances, experiences and characteristics
- the social, historical and institutional contexts of the abuse.[164]

A review of research findings prepared in 2017 for the National Royal Commission found that physical violence, penetration, prolonged/frequent abuse and grooming have all been associated with heightened detrimental effects for victims.[165] Prior maltreatment and trauma, such as exposure to domestic violence and neglect, can also intensify the impacts of sexual abuse.[166] Children with disability may experience particular and severe effects of abuse.[167]

Some victim-survivors experience cumulative or compounded trauma because of child sexual abuse and other forms of mistreatment and adverse life experiences, including heightened vulnerability due to intergenerational and collective trauma.[168]

Many victim-survivors who gave evidence to the National Royal Commission placed importance on the nature of their connection to the abuser and whether the abuser held a position of power over them.[169] This power may arise from the abuser's attributes, including their age, reputation, personality, professional expertise or role.[170] If the abuser was a trusted person or another child, feelings of betrayal were exacerbated for many victim-survivors.[171] One victim-survivor told us:

> That man was my favourite person in the world. He was so funny and kind and I absolutely adored him … He broke my trust so much.[172]

The effects of sexual abuse may also be exacerbated if the abuse occurred in 'closed' institutions that heighten a child's powerlessness and their capacity to remove themselves from the abuse, or to get support.[173] Victim-survivors are often retraumatised by the way that abusers, and those with authority in the institutions where the abuse happened, respond to allegations of child sexual abuse.[174]

We heard from many victim-survivors about the effect that abusers had on their lives. For example, victim-survivor Robert Boost told us that:

> … my whole life since the abuse or since that sort of 13, 14 year age, I have been running away from it and setting goals. So, initially I thought, you know, if I get a girlfriend, I will not feel this way anymore, and then for a moment everything's good, and then sort of the tortoise and the hare: I run away and … the tortoise catches up.[175]

We commonly heard that victim-survivors have problems with mental health and substance use as a consequence of sexual abuse. For example, Erin (a pseudonym) gave the following evidence to our Inquiry:

> … I went down a massive spiral … I started using ice, speed and smoking bongs. I drank a lot. This was my way of blocking things out and helping me forget … I've got PTSD, anxiety and depression. I struggle to trust males in particular. It impacts my relationships, which now impacts my children.[176]

We also heard about the distressing effects that sexual abuse had on victim-survivors' own parenting as adults. For example, victim-survivor Alex (a pseudonym) stated:

> I've got three kids. I won't allow them to have sleepovers. I never bath my eldest child. I'm certainly on a hyperalert status all the time, especially in public. When I take my kids to the park I sit there and I can work out, you know, this child to that family, to this person to that person, and sadly this goes on and these people don't wear red flags.[177]

The National Royal Commission noted that although child sexual abuse in any context has similar effects on victim-survivors, institutional settings can have specific impacts.[178] These include distrust and fear of institutions and authority.[179] Mr Boost told us of the effects of his abuse as a student:

> I have developed a deep distrust of institutions because of the perpetrator. I never thought I'd get to a point that I'd trust another institution, even one like this Commission. However, I realised that it is important for me to give evidence to help me accept that this abuse has happened, to tell the community that it happened to me, and to move forward with my healing process.[180]

Mr Boost went on to describe how his abuse shaped his world view and led him to distrust those who held power and authority in society:

> Through my life, I have come to understand that most people are decent and good-hearted, but there is still a large portion of sick and perverted people in society that will take advantage of vulnerable people. Because of this underground that I witnessed, I find it difficult to trust anyone … I do not like being under the power or control of another; it makes me feel uncomfortable to be in situations where there is a level of control over myself or my family. I try to avoid getting into that position.[181]

The National Royal Commission further found that the social and historical contexts in which child sexual abuse occurs can influence the way victims are affected. Community attitudes that children are inferior, lack of social awareness of child sexual abuse and the extent to which an institution is perceived to be a source of authority in the community can all exacerbate the impacts of sexual abuse on victim-survivors, as can gender stereotypes, racism and discriminatory attitudes to diverse sexual orientations.[182]

5.2 Effects on families and communities

Child sexual abuse can significantly affect the families of victim-survivors, others involved with the institution where the child sexual abuse occurred, religious and cultural groups (including Aboriginal communities) as well as broader society.[183] The National Royal Commission found that people who are affected by the trauma of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts also includes children who witness the abuse, staff in the associated institution, whistleblowers and the family members of abusers.[184]

One mother of a victim-survivor said:

> Sexual abuse doesn't just affect the victim. It affects the whole family. They all had to process this and deal with this and try to keep [name redacted] safe, and I needed support. All she got was a phone number for [a sexual assault service] and a phone call begging her not to go to the media.[185]

Sexual abuse causes 'cultural trauma'; that is, it affects the identity, cohesion and sense of safety of a community.[186] The cultural trauma of child sexual abuse for Aboriginal communities is particularly pronounced because of the underlying 'collective and intergenerational trauma' caused by colonisation, dispossession, discrimination and the forced removal of children from their families.[187]

Parents, partners and siblings of victim-survivors have all reported 'secondary traumatic stress', including hypervigilance, insomnia, exhaustion and hopelessness, after the sexual abuse of a family member.[188] For example, a parent of a victim-survivor said that:

> It's a fourth job for us. There are full-on email trails. Every time we make a complaint we have to revisit all the details and tell the whole story again. It's traumatic. You should only have to tell your story once. They wear you down. They did it the first time she was abused, and they were successful, but this time, no.[189]

Sexual abuse also has an intergenerational effect. Children of victim-survivors may grow up in unstable environments where they are exposed to their parent's trauma, mental illness and substance abuse. This increases the likelihood of victim-survivors' children being placed in out of home care, continuing the pattern of institutionalisation across generations.[190]

A person who witnessed the sexual assault of her friend by a foster carer described to us the traumatic effect of being a witness in the criminal justice process in a case where the abuser was acquitted:

> I lost hope. Later, in [the mid 2000s], when I was 16, I attempted suicide. In part, it was because I was extremely morally injured by the Tasmanian justice system. I couldn't reconcile how to live in a world which was so unjust, and that unjustness was public, and enshrined into law in a power differential that seemed unquestionably sanctioned.[191]

Some whistleblowers told us about their experiences of trying to raise the alarm about institutional handling of complaints of child sexual abuse. Will Gordon, the whistleblower in relation to the Launceston General Hospital's management of complaints about serial offender James Griffin, said:

> I stand by my convictions in my pursuit for the abuse of children to not be hidden behind closed doors and for those who are vulnerable to find their voice to speak and heal. This has caused hardship within my social, personal, and professional life, and yet I have continued in my objective because of my moral principles … I now struggle to have trust in family, colleagues, acquaintances, and friends due to the stories of abuse I have heard since fighting for this.[192]

Alysha (a pseudonym), a whistleblower who exposed failings at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, where she worked, expressed her anguish at trying to improve the safety of detainees:

> I had large boys crying to me and begging me to rescue them from the risk of sexual assault. The helplessness I felt, whilst telling them I would do all I could to ensure their safety—whilst knowing full well my recommendations would be undermined immediately—was soul destroying.[193]

5.3 Effects of institutional responses

How an institution responds to a child or young person who discloses abuse can either compound the distress and trauma they experience, or it can contribute to their healing and sense of justice. Inappropriate responses—including disbelief, hostility, or non-supportive and dismissive responses—can compound the negative effects of abuse and retraumatise a victim-survivor.[194] The responses of other institutions, such as police, the justice system, support services and health services, are just as important as that of the institution where the abuse occurred.[195]

Inappropriate responses—including failing to act after a disclosure, enabling the abuser to remain in their position, and adopting an adversarial, delayed or overcomplicated approach to redressing the abuse—further compound the trauma of the abuse for victim-survivors.[196] For example, one victim-survivor told us that:

> To take a child who is already in a situation of powerlessness—and the powerlessness is extraordinary, particularly in a school environment—but to then be suddenly thrust into this world of police officers and court rooms and lawyers and cross-examination … I've had three, four psychiatric evaluations and they are brutal, you know? So, how do we do this process? How do we find ways that are supportive and not retraumatising?[197]

'Institutional betrayal' describes the experience of a victim-survivor who is harmed by a trusted and powerful institution on which they depend for their security and wellbeing.[198] Institutional betrayal can refer to the failure of an institution to provide a safe environment for a victim-survivor, therefore putting that person at risk. It also refers to institutions that do not act once a disclosure of abuse is made, which can result in the continuation of abuse of the victim-survivor or other children.[199] We identified a sense of institutional betrayal in many of the victim-survivors and staff in the out of home care system, youth detention, schools and hospitals. Tiffany Skeggs, who was abused by Mr Griffin, told us that many of his victim-survivors had lost trust in Tasmanian government institutions:

> Even when I speak to people now, I struggle to tell them that they should come forward, and that they will be safe if they do. Because the reality at the moment is that it is not safe for them to do that … I have absolutely zero faith in referring them to any department, anywhere, in Tasmania.[200]

Victim-survivors reported to the National Royal Commission and to our Inquiry that being silenced or disbelieved after disclosure, punished, blamed for the abuse, or accused of lying, resulted in intense feelings of injustice, anger and shame.[201] The shock of enforced silence is evident in this account:

> One of the most demoralising things in my life was that after the perpetrator was acquitted, my friend and I were told that we couldn't mention his name or tell the truth publicly, because if we did we'd be liable for defamation. This left us feeling extremely angry, demoralised and disillusioned.[202]

Victim-survivors emphasised the importance of being heard and believed, and the importance of associated institutions acknowledging and accepting responsibility for the harm caused.[203] As one young person who participated in the research we commissioned said:

> Children would kinda get depressed [if adults don't protect them] because we're told the teachers are there to look out for us but when they don't help us, who are we supposed to turn to? … It makes you feel unsafe because you are all alone and you have to do it by yourself … You would feel horrible because there's no-one you can trust.[204]

Victim-survivors reported to us that poor institutional responses to their disclosures of abuse had adversely affected their capacity to work, participate in society and to trust or engage with institutions in general. Some victim-survivors said they also avoided accessing services—including services to manage trauma related to the abuse they suffered—which further impeded their healing.

We also heard that victim-survivors faced ostracism after identifying or disclosing child sexual abuse. When abusers continued to be employed or otherwise supported by an organisation after an allegation of abuse was upheld, victim-survivors, their family members and supporters felt isolated and sometimes forced to leave their community.

We have been deeply affected by the accounts we have heard of the profound impacts of child sexual abuse. We have also seen the courage and resilience of many victim-survivors who are living with the effects of child sexual abuse and continuing to make positive and important contributions through their families, communities, careers and advocacy. We are deeply grateful to every victim-survivor of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian institutions who came forward to share their experience with us.

In the following four volumes (Volumes 3, 4, 5 and 6), we discuss the Tasmanian Government's response to allegations of child sexual abuse in schools, out of home care, youth detention and health services, and make recommendations for reform. In Volume 7 we discuss the justice system's response to child sexual abuse, before discussing system-wide reforms in Volume 8. We trust that the recommendations we propose in those volumes will assist in preventing institutional child sexual abuse and improve the lives of those who do experience such abuse.

Notes

1 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 1, 26, 44–45.

2 Statement of Michael Guerzoni, 29 April 2022, 25 [85].

3 For details, refer to the Terms of Reference at Appendix B. Refer also to Order of the Governor of Tasmania made under the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1995, 15 March 2021, 5 (refer to Appendix A); Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 1, 19. For the purposes of this Commission of Inquiry, we have replaced the word 'fondling' with the trauma-informed term 'touching'.

4 Statement of Ben Mathews, 10 June 2022, 4 [12].

5 Refer to, for example, Criminal Code Act 1924 s 124.

6 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 32.

7 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 32. For the purposes of this Commission of Inquiry, we have replaced the word 'fondling' with the trauma-informed term 'touching'.

8 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 32.

9 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 32.

10 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 32–34.

11 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 41.

12 Patrick O'Leary, Emma Koh and Andrew Dare, 'Grooming and Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts' (Research Paper, Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 2017) 10.

13 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 40.

14 Refer to, for example, Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1052 [26–30]; Transcript of Robert Boost, 12 September 2022, 3888 [19–26].

15 Transcript of Leah Sallese, 8 July 2022, 2638 [5–9].

16 Transcript of Tiffany Skeggs, 30 June 2022, 2027 [38–42].

17 Anne-Marie McAlinden, 'Organisational Sex Offenders and 'Institutional Grooming': Lessons from the Savile and Other Inquiries' in Marcus Erooga (ed), Protecting Children and Adults from Abuse After Savile: What Organizations and Institutions Need to Do (Jessica Kingsley Publishers, 2018) 4–5.

18 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 44.

19 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 59. For examples, refer to Child Protection Systems Royal Commission — The Life They Deserve: Child Protection Systems Royal Commission Report (August 2016) vol 1, Summary and Report; Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 4 [24]–5 [25]; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, Case Study 2 — YMCA NSW's Response to the Conduct of Jonathan Lord (June 2014).

20 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 7, 26.

21 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 40–42; Anne-Marie McAlinden, '"Setting 'Em Up": Personal, Familial and Institutional Grooming in the Sexual Abuse of Children' (2006) 15(3)(3) Social and Legal Studies 339, 347; Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 24–25.

22 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 34, 94, 126.

23 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 94–95.

24 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 98.

25 Tamara Blakemore et al, Impacts of Institutional Child Sexual Abuse on Victims/Survivors: A Rapid Review of Research Findings (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2017) 76.

26 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 95.

27 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 95.

28 Refer to, for example, Anonymous session, 30 March 2022; Michael Atkin and Hannah Meagher, 'Youth Detention Centre's Damaging Legacy', ABC News (online, 8 February, 2023) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2023-02-08/reiby-detention-centre-sexual-abuse-730/101913320>.

29 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 126.

30 Divna Haslam et al, The Prevalence and Impact of Child Maltreatment in Australia: Findings from the Australian Child Maltreatment Study: Brief Report (Report, Australian Child Maltreatment Study, Queensland University of Technology, 2023) 21.

31 Divna Haslam et al, The Prevalence and Impact of Child Maltreatment in Australia: Findings from the Australian Child Maltreatment Study: Brief Report (Report, Australian Child Maltreatment Study, Queensland University of Technology, 2023) 21.

32 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 131.

33 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 131.

34 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 132.

35 American Psychiatric Association, Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders: DSM-5-TR (online at 2022) 'Pedophilic Disorder'.

36 Donald Palmer and Valerie Feldman, 'Toward a More Comprehensive Analysis of the Role of Organizational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts' (2017) 74 Child Abuse and Neglect 25.

37 Donald Palmer and Valerie Feldman, 'Toward a More Comprehensive Analysis of the Role of Organizational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts' (2017) 74 Child Abuse and Neglect 25.

38 Commonwealth of Australia (National Office for Child Safety), 'Discussion paper from the National Clinical Reference Group — Language and Terminology' (Discussion Paper, December 2022) 6.

39 Commonwealth of Australia (National Office for Child Safety), 'Discussion paper from the National Clinical Reference Group — Language and Terminology' (Discussion Paper, December 2022) 6.

40 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 10, 10.

41 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, Case Study 57 — Nature, Cause and Impact of Child Sexual Abuse, Opening by Senior Counsel Assisting (March 2017) 7–8 [27].

42 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 148.

43 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 102.

44 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 180.

45 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 180.

46 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 204.

47 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 180.

48 Divna Haslam et al, The Prevalence and Impact of Child Maltreatment in Australia: Findings from the Australian Child Maltreatment Study: Brief Report (Report, Australian Child Maltreatment Study, Queensland University of Technology, 2023) 22; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 51.

49 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 182–199.

50 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 182.

51 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 181.

52 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 181.

53 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 157.

54 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 158.

55 These influence, among other things, how individuals behave when interacting with children, what is understood to be appropriate and inappropriate behaviour, and how children's wellbeing and safety is prioritised. Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 158.

56 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 158.

57 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 158.

58 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 158.

59 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 38.

60 Donald Palmer and Valerie Feldman, 'Toward a More Comprehensive Analysis of the Role of Organizational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts' (2017) 74 Child Abuse and Neglect 30.

61 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 82.

62 Refer to Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 63, 85; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 162.

63 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 162–163.

64 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 174.

65 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 174.

66 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 192.

67 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 52.

68 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 51–53.

69 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 31.

70 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 33–35.

71 Donald Palmer and Valerie Feldman, 'Toward a More Comprehensive Analysis of the Role of Organizational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts' (2017) 74 Child Abuse and Neglect 29–30.

72 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 6.

73 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 8.

74 Statement of Donald Palmer, 2 April 2022, 4–5 [19].

75 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 26.

76 Refer to Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 48–50.

77 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 48–49.

78 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 49.

79 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 49, quoting Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 49.

80 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 49.

81 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 50.

82 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 29.

83 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 19.

84 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 19.

85 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 21.

86 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 22.

87 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 24–25.

88 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 30.

89 Independent Jersey Care Inquiry (Final Report, July 2017) vol 1, 52, 60–61 and Chapter 2, 12–14, 27. Refer also to Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 43, for discussion of how abusers can groom whole communities.

90 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 174; Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 56.

91 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 178.

92 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 174; Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 56.

93 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 174.

94 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 178.

95 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 178.

96 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 67.

97 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 172.

98 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 172.

99 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 164–165.

100 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 172.

101 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 12–13, 30.

102 Eileen Munro and Sheila Fish, Hear No Evil, See No Evil: Understanding Failure to Identify and Report Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, September 2015) 32.

103 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 166, 172.

104 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 160.

105 Commissioner for Children and Young People, Strengthening Child Safe Organisations (Report, September 2015) 10–12.

106 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 65.

107 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 65.

108 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 165.

109 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 165–166.

110 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 166.

111 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 53–55.

112 Donald Palmer and Valerie Feldman, 'Toward a More Comprehensive Analysis of the Role of Organizational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts' (2017) 74 Child Abuse and Neglect 29.

113 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 166.

114 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 166; Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 72.

115 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 177.

116 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 177.

117 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, June 2021) 64–66.

118 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, June 2021) 64–65.

119 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 179.

120 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 179.

121 Statement of Hilda Sirec, 28 April 2022, 6 [36].

122 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 346.

123 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 349.

124 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 179.

125 The name 'Rachel' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022; Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 815 [46]–816 [5].

126 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 349.

127 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 350.

128 Australian Government eSafety Commissioner (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.esafety.gov.au/>.

129 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 362–364.

130 Refer to Volumes 3–6.

131 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, Case Study 27 — The Response of Health Care Service Providers and Regulators in New South Wales and Victoria to Allegations of Child Sexual Abuse (March 2016) 4.

132 Refer to Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 27–28, 33, 45.

133 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, Case Study 27 — The Response of Health Care Service Providers and Regulators in New South Wales and Victoria to Allegations of Child Sexual Abuse (March 2016) 4; Julienne Zammit et al, Truth Project Thematic Report: Child Sexual Abuse in Healthcare Contexts (Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse, December 2020) 64. Refer also to the 'James Griffin' case study and the section on culture in Volume 6.

134 Julienne Zammit et al, Truth Project Thematic Report: Child Sexual Abuse in Healthcare Contexts (Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse, December 2020) 64.

135 Leah Bromfield et al, Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts 2008–13: Findings from Administrative Data (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 2017) 16.

136 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 30.

137 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 66, citing Patrick Parkinson and Judy Cashmore, Assessing the Different Dimensions and Degrees of Risk of Child Sexual Abuse in Institutions (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, June 2017) 92.

138 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 43.

139 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 20; Statement of Catia Malvaso, 29 April 2022, 7 [21]–8 [26].

140 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 102–106.

141 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 105.

142 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 81.

143 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 82.

144 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 15, 82.

145 Commissioner for Children and Young People, The Tasmanian Out-of-Home Care System and 'Being Healthy' Out-of-Home Care Monitoring Program 2018–19 (Monitoring Report No. 1, October 2019) 2–3.

146 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 91.

147 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 13.

148 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 72.

149 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 72.

150 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 78.

151 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 'Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Out-of-Home Care' (Consultation Paper, March 2016) 5, 26, 32; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 94.

152 Gemma McKibbin, 'Preventing Harmful Sexual Behaviour and Child Sexual Exploitation for Children & Young People Living in Residential Care: A Scoping Review in the Australian Context' (2017) 82 Children and Youth Services Review 373, 374.

153 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 71.

154 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 13.

155 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 70.

156 Gwynnyth Llewellyn, Sarah Wayland and Gabrielle Hindmarsh, Disability and Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, November 2016) 44.

157 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 215.

158 Anonymous session, 2 September 2021.

159 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 73. Refer also to vol 3, 77–156.

160 Bessel van der Kolk, The Body Keeps the Score: Mind, Brain and Body in the Transformation of Trauma (Penguin Press, 2015) 10.

161 Bessel van der Kolk, The Body Keeps the Score: Mind, Brain and Body in the Transformation of Trauma (Penguin Press, 2015) 10.

162 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 9, 25–27.

163 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 9, 11, 23.

164 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 10.

165 Tamara Blakemore et al, Impacts of Institutional Child Sexual Abuse on Victims/Survivors: A Rapid Review of Research Findings (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2017) 75–76.

166 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 47.

167 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 48.

168 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 29–30.

169 Tamara Blakemore et al, Impacts of Institutional Child Sexual Abuse on Victims/Survivors: A Rapid Review of Research Findings (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2017) 75.

170 Tamara Blakemore et al*, Impacts of Institutional Child Sexual Abuse on Victims/Survivors: A Rapid Review of Research Findings* (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2017) 75.

171 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 36–38.

172 Anonymous session, 25 March 2022.

173 Donald Palmer, Valerie Feldman and Gemma McKibbin, The Role of Organisational Culture in Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Final report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2016) 46; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 40.

174 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 73.

175 Transcript of Robert Boost, 12 September 2022, 3891 [21–27].

176 Statement of 'Erin', 18 July 2022, 8 [41–42]; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022.

177 The name 'Alex' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2022; Transcript of 'Alex', 27 June 2022, 1676 [19–25].

178 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 73.

179 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 73.

180 Statement of Robert Boost, 2 September 2022, 7 [40].

181 Statement of Robert Boost, 2 September 2022, 5 [27–28].

182 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 43; Tamara Blakemore et al, Impacts of Institutional Child Sexual Abuse on Victims/Survivors: A Rapid Review of Research Findings (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2017) 71.

183 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 202.

184 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 202, 220–231.

185 Anonymous session, 30 March 2022.

186 Kathleen McPhillips, '"Unbearable Knowledge": Managing Cultural Trauma at the Royal Commission' (2017) 27(2) Psychoanalytic Dialogues 130, 134–135; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 224.

187 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 225.

188 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 203; Antonia Quadara, Mary Stathopoulos and Rachel Carson, Family Relationships and the Disclosure of Institutional Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, July 2016) 43–44.

189 Anonymous session, 13 October 2021.

190 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 216–218.

191 Submission 148 Anonymous, 7.

192 Statement of Will Gordon, 30 March 2022, 16 [79], 17 [82].

193 'Alysha' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 18 August 2022; Statement of Alysha, 16 August 2022, 88 [445].

194 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 42; Tamara Blakemore et al, Impacts of Institutional Child Sexual Abuse on Victims/Survivors: A Rapid Review of Research Findings (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, December 2017) 79.

195 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 172.

196 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 183.

197 Anonymous session, 10 March 2022.

198 Carly Smith and Jennifer Freyd, 'Institutional Betrayal' (2014) 69 (6) American Psychologist 575.

199 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 178.

200 Session with Tiffany Skeggs, 29 November 2021.

201 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 174.

202 Anonymous session, 14 October 2022.

203 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 3, 173.

204 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 27.

Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings

Who was looking after me? Prioritising the safety of Tasmanian children

Volume 3: Children in schools

August 2023

Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings Report

Volume 3
Children in schools

The Honourable Marcia Neave AO
President and Commissioner

Professor Leah Bromfield
Commissioner

The Honourable Robert Benjamin AM SC
Commissioner

August 2023

Volume 3: Children in schools
978-0-6457694-3-2
Published August 2023

Suggested citation:
Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, August 2023).

Contents

CHAPTER 6

The way forward: Children in schools

Introduction to Volume 3

This volume focuses on children in Tasmanian government schools and how schools and the Department for Education, Children and Young People (formerly the Department of Education) prevent and respond to child sexual abuse.

A note on language

In October 2022, the Department of Education was renamed the Department for Education, Children and Young People, and given expanded functions. In addition to education, the new department is now responsible for the child protection and youth justice systems. In this volume, we use the term 'Department' to refer to either the Department of Education (as it then was) or the relevant functions that relate to education within the new Department for Education, Children and Young People. When we specifically mean the previous Department of Education or the new Department for Education, Children and Young People, we use the full name.

Every day, thousands of Tasmanian children are entrusted to the care of schools with the expectation they will be kept safe.

School is a place of learning, social connection and happiness for many students. Most school staff choose to work in the education system because they value children and want to educate and nurture them with care and compassion. We expect that these staff will welcome the improvements already underway to make children safer each day in the government school system.

However, for some children, schools have been a place of abuse and harm. Victim-survivors told us about their experiences of being abused by staff or fellow students. We heard about the trauma of their abuse and the betrayal many felt when their school or the Department failed to acknowledge the harm, to take prompt and effective action to support them, and to mitigate the risk to other children and young people.

Many of these children did not have a voice, and those who did speak out were often ignored, silenced and disbelieved. They lived with the burden of being abused, often alone and isolated. Their teachers, the Department and indeed the broader community failed to give them the care they needed and deserved.

The responsibility for this rests not with the child but with:

- the abusers who were allowed to work in the public education system
- the teachers and other staff who saw but did not intervene

- the principals and leaders who were told and did not believe
- State Service employees who treated the abuse of a child as an employment issue and focused on the rights and vocation of the adult instead of protecting children.

Many victim-survivors said that protecting others from harm was their main motivation for making a submission to our Commission of Inquiry, for attending a session with a Commissioner or for giving evidence as part of our hearings. We are indebted to everyone who shared their experience with us.

In August 2020, not long before the Government established our Commission of Inquiry, the Department announced the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('Independent Education Inquiry'). That inquiry was completed by Professors Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack in June 2021. It highlighted several problems, which we also heard about. These included:

- a narrow understanding of the types of conduct that can constitute or be a precursor to child sexual abuse, including failures to acknowledge the seriousness of professional boundary breaches or to recognise potential grooming behaviours
- unclear policies and procedures that were not fit-for-purpose and were applied inconsistently or were not understood by staff and the broader school community
- inadequate professional and skills development for staff and volunteers to understand their obligations and identify and effectively respond to child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours
- poor responses to disclosures and complaints about child sexual abuse, leading to delayed action to reduce risk, poor-quality investigations and not enough support for those affected
- inadequate guidance and training on how to prevent and respond to harmful sexual behaviours
- a lack of coordination and focus on the safety of children in the Department—with responsibilities for safeguarding children dispersed across different roles and units, too spread out to be effective.

The Department accepted all the Independent Education Inquiry's recommendations.

Through its Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People ('Office of Safeguarding'), set up in August 2021, the Department has been implementing these recommendations at the same time as our Commission of Inquiry has been underway. We endorse the Independent Education Inquiry's recommendations. Rather than duplicate them, we instead recommend that the Implementation Monitor evaluates their implementation (refer to Chapter 22, Recommendation 22.1).

However, some matters did not receive close attention in the Independent Education Inquiry. This was either because they fell outside its terms of reference or due to factors outside of the authors' control. We considered some of these issues in greater detail in our hearings, including:

- inconsistent and inadequate access to child sexual abuse prevention programs, which can—in an age-appropriate way—empower children and young people of all ages to understand their right to be safe from abuse and build their confidence to disclose their concerns to trusted adults
- the broader disciplinary framework to manage misconduct or complaints about employees in an educational context—including the level of arms-length advice and support required to ensure these are managed appropriately, prioritise children's safety, provide procedural fairness and uphold the integrity of disciplinary processes
- the powers and functions of the Teachers Registration Board—particularly its ability (or inability, as the case may be) to share and receive information, maintain visibility of teachers, impose professional development requirements and enforce the requirements of its legislation. We also considered whether the Board is appropriately resourced and empowered to acquit its functions.

To help illuminate the Department's policies, processes and systems, we selected several case studies, which we discuss in Chapter 5. For some of these, we include the voices of victim-survivors who provided firsthand accounts of their experiences.

The Department has long had strategies and safeguards designed to protect children and young people in its care. These include evolving policies and procedures, annual mandatory reporting training and requirements that staff and volunteers hold Registration to Work with Vulnerable People. The Teachers Registration Board also has measures to ensure that people registered to teach are safe and suitable to do so. Yet it was clear—best evidenced in the apologies delivered by the Secretary of the then Department of Education, Timothy Bullard, during hearings—that the Department has significantly failed to protect students. It must invest in change and improvement.

We heard from the Department about initiatives underway to ensure students are safe from sexual abuse. These include refreshed and improved policies, a more expansive training program for staff, introducing Safeguarding Leads in each school, building expertise in identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours, and a commitment to system reviews to drive reflection and continuous improvement. We commend and welcome these initiatives.

However, we identified some areas where more work is needed, and we make recommendations accordingly.

This volume has three chapters. In Chapter 4—Background and context—we outline Tasmania's education system, noting that we focus on government schools. We discuss the Independent Education Inquiry and its findings and recommendations in detail given its recency. We then outline the Government's response to the Independent Education Inquiry.

In Chapter 5—Case studies—we outline eight case studies, some of which we explored in detail in our hearings. In these case studies, we pinpoint systemic issues in the Department's responses to allegations of child sexual abuse, as well as recent improvements. These case studies and the problems they highlight informed our recommendations in Chapter 6.

The recommendations we make in Chapter 6 include:

- putting in place mandatory professional development and training requirements for staff and volunteers (targeted at their role responsibilities and degree of interaction with students) to ensure all those engaging with students have baseline knowledge about child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours that can be refreshed and built on over time
- providing greater guidance and mandated professional development on harmful sexual behaviours, recognising the complexity of these matters and the sensitivity, expertise and nuance required to respond to them appropriately
- increasing funding and powers for the Teachers Registration Board to enable it to respond quickly and effectively to identified risks posed by teachers, using a broader suite of regulatory tools and conditions to address concerning conduct by teachers
- establishing an Incident Management Directorate to oversee and manage complaints about child sexual abuse by staff. This Directorate should support schools to deal with distressing incidents according to best practice, while offering a degree of independence that builds the trust and confidence of affected students and their families and carers.

It is tempting to imagine that many of the problems described in this volume are problems of the past. While we can see improvement over time in how schools and the Department have responded to child sexual abuse—in line with growing community awareness and understanding of the dynamics and impacts of abuse—we continued to hear about many of the problems as recently as the time of writing, particularly in relation to harmful sexual behaviours.[1]

There is no room for complacency, and we expect—particularly as the Department's functions expand—a continued commitment to placing the needs and safety of children at the centre.

4 Background and context: Children in schools

1 Introduction

In this chapter, we give background and context to Tasmania's public education system, listing some facts and figures. This discussion notes the significant size of the Department in terms of its number of employees and the number of children and young people who are in its care every day. We briefly set out the Department's internal structure before and after it was expanded to include several functions of the former Department of Communities. We also give a basic overview of the Teachers Registration Board.

We then examine, in some detail, the Independent Education Inquiry's report. After providing some background and context to the report, we describe the key problems it identifies, set out the recommendations it makes and outline the Department's response to the report.

Throughout our Inquiry we have focused on schools, but all children in the Tasmanian education system (including those attending Child and Family Learning Centres) will benefit from efforts to prevent and better respond to child sexual abuse.

2 Tasmania's education system

2.1 The system in numbers

According to departmental data, in 2022 there were 61,252 students enrolled in Tasmanian government schools.[2] Just under half of those students were female (48.3 per cent) and just over half were male (51.6 per cent).[3] There were approximately 7,400 Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander students enrolled in government schools in 2022, representing 12.1 per cent of all students.[4]

The Department provides education services to these students through 195 government schools across the State.[5] In 2021–22, Tasmania had:

- 125 primary schools
- 29 secondary schools
- 25 combined primary and secondary schools
- eight senior secondary schools (colleges)
- eight support schools.[6]

The Department is also responsible for the State's libraries, which are administered by Libraries Tasmania.

In March 2022, Tasmania had 7,205 fully registered teachers, 3,778 provisionally registered teachers and 233 holders of Limited Authorities to Teach.[7] While the Teachers Registration Board does not have 'reliable information about where a teacher is employed', the Board's Watched Registrations list provides some indication of where teachers are working.[8] The Watched Registrations list (discussed in Chapter 6) gives employers access to information about teachers' Registration to Work with Vulnerable People status and whether or not there are conditions placed on their registration as teachers.[9]

Based on information on the Watched Registrations list, the Registrar of the Teachers Registration Board told us that, as of April 2022, there were 5,830 government school teachers and 3,438 non-government school teachers (1,862 teachers in Catholic schools and 1,576 teachers in independent schools).[10] Across all sectors, the Board had granted 310 Limited Authorities to Teach (noting that a person may hold more than one Limited Authority to Teach at a time).[11] A Limited Authority to Teach allows a person who wants to teach to do so if they have appropriate skills but no qualification or registration to teach. These are generally a temporary solution to fill role gaps.[12]

Overall, the Department employed 11,148 people in 2021–22.[13] Just over half of those (5,700) were employed as teachers (this includes 534 principals and assistant principals).[14] Of those people employed as teachers, 4,193 (73.6 per cent) were female and 1,507 (26.4 per cent) were male.[15] The average age of all female teachers was 49 years, and the average age of all male teachers was 44 years.[16] While data was provided about the number of female and male teachers by employment status (full-time fixed-term or full-time permanent; part-time fixed-term or part-time permanent), the Department did not publish the number of teachers on the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register in its 2021–22 annual report. However, the Government stated in early 2022 that there were nearly 1,700 relief teachers in Tasmania.[17] Other support staff employed in government schools in 2022 include teacher assistants (2,116), school psychologists (101), social workers (119), speech pathologists (56), nurses (84) and education support specialists (35).[18]

Our terms of reference require that we examine the Government's responses to child sexual abuse in government institutions. But some of the recommendations in this chapter may have broader application and may therefore also be relevant to non-government schools—particularly in relation to the Teachers Registration Board. This is because all teachers working in Tasmania, whether in government or non-government schools, must be registered with the Teachers Registration Board. According to the Australian Bureau of Statistics, in addition to the more than 60,000 students enrolled in Tasmanian government schools in 2022, there were 26,138 students enrolled in non-government schools.[19] Non-government schools include Catholic schools (38 schools) and independent schools (35 schools).[20] In Tasmania, non-government school registration is the responsibility of the Registrar, Education, and is overseen by the Non-Government Schools Registration Board.[21]

2.2 Department for Education, Children and Young People structure

In February 2022, the Tasmanian Government announced that the functions that support children in the Department of Communities would be transferred to the Department of Education.[22] The Government's rationale for these changes included reducing the 'siloed approach [to] … departmental structures' recommended by an Independent Review of the Tasmanian State Service, and improving services and outcomes for children and young people by strengthening departmental administrative structures.[23]

Timothy Bullard, the Secretary overseeing the expanded Department, told us that the new Department provides the opportunity to:

- combine collective, knowledge, skills, information and resources
- work collaboratively in the best interests of children and young people.[24]

The new Department for Education, Children and Young People began in October 2022. These changes occurred after our Commission of Inquiry was established and were made independently of it.

In our chapter on out of home care (Chapter 9), we note our reservations about the merger of the Child Safety Service into the new 'mega' department. Our main concern is that the attention that child protection requires may be difficult to achieve in a much larger departmental framework.

2.2.1 New departmental structure

Under the newly formed Department for Education, Children and Young People, the 'Keeping Children Safe' division—headed by a Deputy Secretary and encompassing Services for Children and Families and the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People—reports directly to the Secretary, and the new 'Services for Youth Justice' section reports to the Associate Secretary.[25] Most of the education functions of the new Department report to the Associate Secretary.

The Department has four portfolio services in relation to education:

- Portfolio Services for Development and Support—this portfolio service provides 'those directly working with children and young people with the technical guidance and support they need to build their capability to have the greatest positive impact'.[26] It includes Teaching and Learning, Wellbeing and Inclusion, Improvement Consultants, and People Capability and Development.
- Portfolio Services for Schools and Early Years—this portfolio service aims to 'inspire, support and engage all children and young people to learn more, every day'.[27] It includes Schools, Child and Family Learning Centres, and Learning Services (which support students and staff).
- Portfolio Services for Continuous Improvement and Evaluation—this portfolio service reviews and evaluates individual and system-level impacts of the Department. It includes Strategic Policy and Projects, Strategic Systems Development, External School Review, and Evaluation.
- Portfolio Services for Business Operations and Support—this portfolio provides human, financial and IT support. It includes People Services and Support, Legal Services, Information and Technology Services, and Organisational Safety.[28]

The Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People ('Office of Safeguarding') was established in response to an Independent Education Inquiry recommendation.[29] The Office of Safeguarding drives longer term cultural change and continuous improvement to help the Department be an 'exemplary child safe organisation'.[30] The Executive Director, Office of Safeguarding, is responsible for a strategy and policy framework to embed the national Child Safe Standards across the Department.[31] The work of the Office of Safeguarding also builds on the Department's wellbeing strategy. The Office of Safeguarding and its role in keeping Tasmanian students safe is discussed in Chapter 6.

Other agencies associated with the new Department are Education Regulation (including the Teachers Registration Board), the Office of the State Archivist and the Commissioner for Children and Young People.[32]

Most of the information and evidence provided to us, particularly in the case studies in Chapter 5, referred to the Department's previous structure. The former Department of Education had four divisions, and each had roles for protecting children and young people's safety: Support and Development division, Learning division, Strategy and Performance division, and Corporate and Business Services division.[33]

2.3 Education-related independent bodies

The Teachers Registration Board is an independent statutory body that works with the Department to ensure teachers are appropriately qualified and to investigate complaints.[34] The Board's primary functions include registering teachers to work in government, Catholic and independent schools in Tasmania.[35]

Tasmanian teachers must be registered with the Board to ensure they meet the required standards and have the necessary skills. According to the Board, 'registration promotes community confidence in the work of Tasmanian teachers and validates registered teachers as highly skilled professionals'.[36]

The Board also investigates complaints against teachers, and it may take disciplinary action where appropriate. This can include determining that a person is not of good character or is unfit to be a teacher. The Board works to improve teaching standards and maintains a code of ethics for teachers.[37]

In the financial year ending June 2020, the Teachers Registration Board had 12.8 full-time-equivalent positions. On average, the Board employed 14 part- and full-time employees.[38] The Board had a total revenue (and other income from transactions) of just over $2 million in 2020, with just over one-third of this coming from the Government. Before 2017, almost all the Board's revenue came from teacher registration fees.[39] The Government committed to providing the Board $375,000 in 2022–23 and $383,000 in 2023–24 as part of its Safeguarding Children and Young People initiatives. It said this will allow the Board to engage more staff (up to three more full-time-equivalent positions) to 'support the investigation of complaints and disciplinary processes'.[40]

Through submissions to our Inquiry and in our public hearings, we heard about several issues with the Board's current legislative underpinnings and processes—these are discussed in Chapter 6.

3 Independent Education Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse

The Independent Education Inquiry was announced in August 2020. Its purpose was to:

- examine what, if any, more actions and/or changes to the current systems applicable to, or used by, the Department should be made to minimise the risk of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian government schools
- complement, not substitute, the work of the National Royal Commission.[41]

Because our Commission of Inquiry was announced shortly after the start of the Independent Education Inquiry, the authors of the Independent Education Inquiry considered it appropriate to leave certain questions to be explored by us. Accordingly, the authors did not look at the roles of other government agencies (such as the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, the then Department of Communities and Tasmania Police) and the Tasmanian Government itself in responding to child sexual abuse allegations against Department of Education personnel or students. The authors did, however, make recommendations for better information sharing and coordination between the Department of Education and some of these agencies.

Professors Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack completed the Independent Education Inquiry in June 2021. The findings and recommendations section of their report was released to the public in November 2021. The Government has identified a range of legal issues, including the potential identification of people who contributed to the inquiry, as the reason for only releasing the section on findings and recommendations.[42] Shortly after this limited release, a full, albeit significantly redacted, version of the report was provided to the Australian Broadcasting Corporation under right to information laws.[43] At the time of writing in 2023, the Tasmanian Government has not made the full report publicly available.[44]

3.1 Systemic problems identified by the Independent Education Inquiry

The report makes observations about systemic problems that have undermined responses to child sexual abuse. These include problems with organisational culture, governance and staffing, policies and procedures, the physical environment of schools, recruitment and transfers, training and knowledge, record keeping and information sharing.

3.1.1 Organisational culture

Through consultations, the Independent Education Inquiry heard that the Department of Education had 'entrenched cultural values' that manifested in the 'prioritisation of adults' interests over those of students'.[45] Although it has improved over time, this culture still manifests in schools in several ways including:

- a belief that adults' voices should be believed over those of children
- a belief that complying with guidelines in interactions with students is primarily to protect adults
- a readiness to disbelieve students who complain of sexual abuse 'because it is easy [for students] to make false allegations' or due to their backgrounds or circumstances.[46] The false belief that children frequently lie about sexual abuse is discussed in Chapter 16.

While the report notes positive recent changes in the culture and leadership of the Department, it states that 'residual cultural problems' nevertheless remain.[47]

The research we commissioned conducted by Associate Professor Tim Moore and Emeritus Professor Morag McArthur about children's perceptions of safety in institutional settings, similarly identified the power imbalance between adults and children in schools. Students talked about double standards creating power imbalances between teachers and students that made them feel unsafe:

> … adults expect young people to be respectful and non-violent, but teachers still use their power over students, they can be disrespectful in the way that they speak to students, they work in ways that showed they were in charge and used that against students for example 'I can swear at you but you can't swear at me'.[48]

These children thought that broader societal attitudes often reflected in the school context: 'There's an issue at a societal level—as a community we don't really take sexual harassment seriously enough or take action. So sometimes that plays out at schools'.[49] They said it was therefore difficult to be sure they would be believed or taken seriously if they disclosed concerns.[50]

3.1.2 Governance and staffing

The report expressed concern that, at the time of its writing, there was:

> … no single point of oversight or responsibility in [the Department] for all aspects of student safeguarding, and therefore no effective restraint on the fragmentation of safeguarding efforts across the organisation.[51]

It recommended establishing a Director of Student Safeguarding position.
The Department has since set up the Office of Safeguarding and appointed Elizabeth Jack as Executive Director.[52] The Office of Safeguarding is discussed in Chapter 6.

The report also stated that in many of the schools visited, the demand for school support staff was far greater than the resources the Department allocated for these positions.[53] It noted that in trying to address this 'chronic shortage', the Department had deployed Student Wellbeing Teams to provide complex student case management support. However, the Independent Education Inquiry heard that the system seldom provided the 'support it was established to deliver', owing in large part to unclear policies and guidelines.[54]

We note that since the Independent Education Inquiry report was released, the Tasmanian Government has committed extra funding for professional support staff in schools. At the time of the Independent Education Inquiry, there were 110 social workers and 93 psychologists employed across Tasmania.[55] The 2022–23 State Budget outlines that funding is allocated to help employ eight more psychologists and eight more social workers 'to support student wellbeing and safety', plus another four senior support staff.[56]

3.1.3 Obligations, policies and procedures

The Independent Education Inquiry heard that the Department's 'policy environment' was 'confused and crowded', with new policies layered on top of existing ones. One senior official referred to the situation as 'dying by policy'.[57]

The difficulties were compounded by the lack of an effective, central portal for staff to access the information they needed. The Independent Education Inquiry observed firsthand 'how frustratingly difficult it is to find relevant policies and procedures, particularly through [the Department's] publicly accessible online Policy Library'.[58] Also, departmental staff had trouble applying or interpreting some policies and reported that policies about certain issues, including responding to harmful sexual behaviours, were lacking.[59]

The report expressed concern that, in some instances, there was a narrow interpretation of the requirement that employees must be acting 'in the course of their employment' for the State Service Code of Conduct to apply to their behaviour. This meant that inappropriate conduct occurring outside school hours or not on school grounds had not been subject to disciplinary proceedings.[60]

The report noted 'broad agreement' among those consulted that the State Service Code of Conduct was not suited to the distinct context of schools.[61] While there could be 'no objection' to the general principles of the State Service Code of Conduct, the lack of a Department-specific code of conduct meant that allegations of sexual abuse against teachers were investigated under the generic provisions of Employment Direction No. 5, and a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct had to be established before formal disciplinary proceedings could be instigated.[62] The report noted that departmental staff 'expressed strong support for a [Department]-specific code of conduct, both to formalise rules and expectations about behaviour in schools and to enable [Department]-specific responses and investigations'.[63] The report recommended that the Department drafts its own code of conduct.[64]

The Department's policies and procedures that relate to child safeguarding are discussed in Chapter 6.

3.1.4 Physical environment

The report observed that some school layouts created spaces that did not allow for third-party observation, increasing the opportunity for a person to sexually abuse children.[65]

Certain physical areas in schools—such as gyms, changing rooms, dedicated drama/music areas, secluded outdoor spaces behind buildings and other isolated spaces—were noted as common places that posed a risk to student safety.[66] The report recommended that schools be required to undertake 'safeguarding risk assessments' and create risk management plans to help mitigate these safety concerns. The report also noted that, encouragingly, newer school renovations and building projects are incorporating design elements that help reduce these risks.

3.1.5 Staff recruitment and transfers

The report acknowledged that the requirement for staff and volunteers in the Department to obtain Registration to Work with Vulnerable People was well understood and observed. However, it expressed concern about an apparent lack of appreciation for the 'limited, albeit important' role these checks have in safeguarding students.[67] The authors identified several aspects of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme that limit its usefulness in preventing child sexual abuse:

- Most convicted sex offenders had no prior record of sex offences and are therefore unlikely to have been discovered through the scheme.
- The impulse to sexually abuse children in an institution may not occur until the person is engaged by the institution, and this will not be picked up in pre-employment screening.
- The scheme does not apply to children, who may be more likely than adults to 'abuse other students'.[68]

The Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme is discussed in Chapter 18.

The report noted other problems involving teacher registration and transfers, in particular the national mutual registration scheme, which unscrupulous teachers can exploit to get registered in another jurisdiction.[69] The report recommended developing a student safeguarding policy that includes clear direction about how 'due diligence is to be exercised in staff recruitment and transfers'.[70]

3.1.6 Staff training, knowledge and skills

The Independent Education Inquiry heard staff were confused about how to respond to allegations of abuse, were not aware of some policies, and thought that policies were difficult to implement.[71] It also heard that trainee teachers were told to make a mandatory report whenever they had a slight suspicion, but many trainee teachers felt they would be perceived as causing trouble or potentially damaging 'a colleague's career or family'.[72] The report noted a lack of adequate training about safeguarding for trainee teachers.[73]

The Independent Education Inquiry heard that:

- there was a lack of training for staff about how to prevent and respond to child sexual abuse
- induction training for new teachers was 'skewed' towards responding to, rather than preventing, allegations of child sexual abuse
- there was a lack of training from the Department about how to receive disclosures and manage information.[74]

The report noted that, at the time of its writing, discussions were occurring at the senior executive level in the Department about rolling out 'preventative training for staff on grooming behaviours and to have ongoing training to recognise signs and patterns, as well as precursors to abusive behaviour'.[75] Training is discussed in Chapter 6.

3.1.7 Record keeping

The Independent Education Inquiry received unanimous feedback that the Department did 'not have a system of record keeping to track the number of cases, trends or features of child sexual abuse in Tasmanian Government schools'.[76] The Department's Legal Services unit provided the Independent Education Inquiry with a spreadsheet as evidence of the main departmental record of 'suspected, alleged or proven sexual abuse incidents involving [departmental] personnel and/or students'.[77] The spreadsheet was created in 2017 in anticipation of questions about the National Redress Scheme, civil claims, police investigations and privacy information requests. The spreadsheet was not a complete record of allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse in schools, nor did its design allow basic statistics to be calculated.[78]

The Independent Education Inquiry also considered the Department's Student Support System in this context, explained as a:

> ... digital repository of school records (including confidential notes by social workers and psychologists) which ... may include information about students affected by sexual and other abuse.[79]

Stakeholders described this system as antiquated, ineffective and time-consuming to use, and schools and individuals in schools used it inconsistently.[80]

The report stated that a lack of record keeping impeded investigations into current and historical allegations of child sexual abuse made against employees. It recommended that the Department implements a robust system for recording complaints.[81]

3.1.8 Information sharing and interagency relationships

The Independent Education Inquiry heard of a lack of systematic information sharing between schools about employment concerns involving teachers and other staff.[82] Also, in investigating teachers subject to child sexual abuse allegations, government agencies were unwilling to share information with one another and with non-government organisations.[83] We understand that some of that lack of information sharing is the result of Office of the Solicitor-General advice on information-sharing restrictions in the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 ('Personal Information Protection Act').[84]

The report noted that 'one of the most common barriers' to information sharing is the restriction on what information the Department can share with the Teachers Registration Board about allegations of child abuse and vice versa, owing to privacy legislation.[85] This is discussed in Chapter 6.

The Independent Education Inquiry also heard about inconsistencies in how the Department and other agencies, such as police, the Child Safety Service and the Sexual Assault Support Service, interact when dealing with suspected child sexual abuse in educational settings.[86] The authors recommended that the Department develops a memorandum of understanding with police to 'help clarify roles and responsibilities'.[87]

The issue of information sharing, and the scope and effect of Tasmania's privacy legislation, is discussed in Chapter 19.

3.2 Recommendations of the Independent Education Inquiry

The report made 20 recommendations about changes to governance/leadership, policies/procedures, training and professional development. In particular, it made recommendations to:

- improve record keeping to better track patterns and trends of child sexual abuse (recommendation 1)[88]
- ensure safeguarding decisions and actions are based on the principle of acting in the best interests of the child to address the 'residual cultural problem' of putting the interests of adults above those of children (recommendation 2)[89]
- create a focus on prevention rather than just responding to allegations or concerns (recommendation 3)[90]

- develop a comprehensive student safeguarding policy and improve existing policies for mandatory reporting, technology use and duty of care (recommendation 4)[91]
- establish a Director of Safeguarding in the Department (recommendation 5)[92]
- undertake mandatory safeguarding risk assessments in every school (recommendation 6)[93]
- place school safeguarding officers in every government school (recommendation 7)[94]
- improve teacher training and professional development (recommendations 8 and 9)[95]
- improve the ability of staff to identify and report concerning behaviour (recommendations 10 and 11)[96]
- develop a formal code of conduct to allow disciplinary action against staff (recommendation 12)[97]
- integrate student safeguarding policies so their position in the Department's set of safeguarding policies is clear (recommendations 13, 14 and 15; recommendation 15 is the same as recommendation 11)[98]
- develop protocols to respond to different types of sexual abuse (recommendation 16)[99]
- improve interagency relationships between police and the then Department of Communities through memorandums of understanding (recommendations 17 and 18)[100]
- improve public accessibility to policies (recommendations 19 and 20)[101]
- complete a systems review after all significant sexual abuse incidents to continually improve prevention and response (recommendation 21).[102]

3.3 The Department's response to the Independent Education Inquiry

The Department accepted all 20 of the Independent Education Inquiry's recommendations.[103] A publicly available table outlining the Department's planned implementation timeframe for the recommendations indicates that most were to be completed in either 2022 or 2023.[104] In a statement on 10 May 2022, Secretary Bullard provided us with a table outlining the work undertaken so far and the work that is planned in respect of each recommendation. This document indicates that recommendations 16 (response protocols), 17 (partnership with police) and 21 (system reviews to be conducted following an incident of child sexual abuse) have been completed.[105]

The Department told us that it had 'taken immediate action' to implement recommendation 5 (to establish a Director of Safeguarding) and that it had appointed Elizabeth Jack to the position of Executive Director of Safeguarding.[106]

The Department also stated that it has completed one other recommendation —recommendation 19 (improving public access to information about student safeguarding). The Department said this recommendation was satisfied by including on its website 'pages and information relating specifically to Safeguarding Children and Young people'.[107] The Department told us it will continue to update its website.[108] In Chapter 6, we discuss how the Department has generally improved access to safeguarding information.

Secretary Bullard provided us with another update in September 2022 on the Department's progress on implementing the Independent Education Inquiry's recommendations. While not specifically linking the Department's work on implementation to particular recommendations, the Secretary told us that the Department's 'activity in relation to the recommendations' included:

- consulting on a draft policy framework for safeguarding children and young people
- revising current policies and procedures 'to incorporate relevant information on safeguarding children and young people from the harm of abuse, including Mandatory Reporting, Grievance Resolution, Duty of Care, IT Conditions of Use, Work with Vulnerable People, Family Violence, and Billeting Students in Australia and Overseas'
- revising an online mandatory reporting training module
- working on embedding safeguarding officers in government schools
- engaging with the University of Tasmania on incorporating 'material on understanding, preventing, and responding to child sexual abuse, and trauma-informed practice in teacher training courses'
- developing a 'safeguarding professional learning module'
- improving the operation of the Department's case management platform to incorporate integrated 'safeguarding-focused recording, reporting, and monitoring capability'
- reviewing the Department's complaints and grievances processes to improve access by 'children and young people, parents/carers and the community'
- developing an external website with information for children and young people as well as parents and carers about abuse, including signs of abuse and where to go for help.[109]

Secretary Bullard told us that the system review conducted in response to a child sexual abuse incident in 2022 recommended improvements across several areas of the Department's procedures and responses.[110] He said the Department is using existing resources to finish implementing the system review recommendations, but that there is overlap between these recommendations and those of the Independent Education Inquiry, as well as other work underway in the Office of Safeguarding.[111] We discuss this system review in Chapter 6.

In addition to allocating departmental resources to implement the 'system review' recommendations, Secretary Bullard told us that 'additional funding has … been allocated through the State Budget process to support rollout of the recommendations'.[112] This includes:

- $26.1 million over four years from 2022–23 and $9.7 million ongoing to appoint Safeguarding Officers in every government school
- $2.6 million over four years from 2022–23 and $600,000 ongoing for mandatory professional development for all departmental staff towards understanding, preventing and responding to child sexual abuse in schools
- $1.27 million over two years from 2022–23 to provide more support for children and young people affected by harmful sexual behaviours, including four full-time-equivalent senior support staff with specialist expertise
- $3.8 million over four years from 2022–23 and $1.68 million ongoing to employ additional psychologists and social workers to directly support schools
- $2.6 million over three years from 2022–23 to fully staff the Office of Safeguarding to meet the demands of the work required to support all safeguarding-related activity across the Department.[113]

The 2022–23 State Budget states that resourcing for the following Independent Education Inquiry recommendations will come from the Department's existing resources:[114]

- Recommendation 7—all schools should appoint a school staff person to the role of Safeguarding Officer. This includes allocating $26 million for 72 full-time-equivalent positions across all schools.[115]
- Recommendation 9—training for principals, teachers and assistants should include information about understanding, preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse.
- Recommendation 10—developing training materials, instructions and guidelines for teachers and support staff in relation to 'reporting and recording concerns about staff and student behaviour that may be relevant to preventing sexual abuse, but that fall below the threshold required by the Department's Mandatory Reporting Procedures'.[116]

In April 2023, the Department released Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework, which sets out an 'overarching approach to safeguarding children and young people from abuse'.[117] Through this framework, the Department may have begun addressing some of our recommendations in this volume, but we could not fully consider this, given that we had ended the inquiry stage of our Commission of Inquiry when the framework was released. We have retained our recommendations considering this.

4 Conclusion

In this chapter, we have described the Tasmanian education system, focusing particularly on children in government schools. We have also discussed the recent Independent Education Inquiry and the Government's response to this. In the following chapter—Chapter 5—we present case studies that highlight the challenges the Department faces in preventing and responding effectively to child sexual abuse in schools.

Notes

1 Our Commission of Inquiry heard of these ongoing problems from victim-survivors, families and third parties who contacted us. For privacy and confidentiality reasons, we cannot publish details of these notifications.

2 Department of Education, Key Data (Report, 2022) 16. This figure includes students in Early Special, Kindergarten, Primary, Secondary, and Senior Secondary schools and is based on headcount.

3 Department of Education, Key Data (Report, 2022) 16. In respect of gender, 29 students preferred a term other than male or female and six preferred not to nominate a gender.

4 Department of Education, Key Data (Report, 2022) 17.

5 Department of Education, Annual Report 2021–2022 (Report, 2022) 4.

6 Department of Education, Annual Report 2021–2022 (Report, 2022) 4. The Department of Education also provides eSchool services for students who cannot attend a physical school and 12 Child and Family Learning Centres across the State.

7 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 3, Table 3.1.

8 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 3 [3.2–3.4].

9 Teachers Registration Board Tasmania, Watched Registrations (Web Page, 2021) <https://www.trb.tas.gov.au/watched-registrations/>.

10 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 3 [3.6].

11 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 4 [3.6].

12 Teachers Registration Board Tasmania, Limited Authority to Teach (Web Page, 2021) <https://www.trb.tas.gov.au/limited-authorities-to-teach/>.

13 Department of Education, Annual Report 2021–2022 (Report, 2022) 33. The total full-time-equivalent count was 8,661.94.

14 Department of Education, Annual Report 2021–2022 (Report, 2022) 33.

15 Department of Education, Annual Report 2021–2022 (Report, 2022) 33.

16 The calculation of the average age of teachers is based on ages for all teaching positions (Base Grade Teachers, Advanced Skills Teachers, Principals and Assistant Principals, and Non-School Based Band 4).

17 'Tas Education Minister Urged to "Come Clean" on Teacher Numbers', Education HQ (online, 4 March 2022) <https://educationhq.com/news/tas-education-minister-urged-to-come-clean-on-teacher-numbers-115236/>; Will Murray, 'Tasmania's COVID-19 Backfill Plan to Use Relief Teachers May Fall Short', ABC News (online, 10 February 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-02-10/relief-teachers-reject-covid-backfill-plan/100816986>.

18 Department of Education, Annual Report 2021–2022 (Report, 2022) 34.

19 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Schools', Education 2022 (15 February 2023) Table 90a <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/education/schools/2022/Table%2090a%20Key%20Information%2C%20by%20States%20and%20Territories%2C%202021%20to%202022.xlsx>.

20 The number of Tasmanian Catholic schools is reported in Department of Education, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 87. The number of independent schools is reported in Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Schools', Education 2022 (15 February 2023) Table 90a <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/people/education/schools/2022/Table%2090a%20Key%20Information%2C%20by%20States%20and%20Territories%2C%202021%20to%202022.xlsx>.

21 Non-Government Schools Registration Board, Registration of Non-government Schools (Web Page, 2022) <https://schoolregistration.tas.gov.au/registration-guidelines/>.

22 Peter Gutwein, 'Department Structures to Strengthen Tasmanian Outcomes' (Media Release, 24 February 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/department_structures_to_strengthen_tasmanian_outcomes>. The media release explained: 'The changes will be phased in from 1 July 2022, in a staged approach to be completed by 30 September 2022 and the Department of Communities will not exist after this date'.

23 Peter Gutwein, 'Department Structures to Strengthen Tasmanian Outcomes' (Media Release, 24 February 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/department_structures_to_strengthen_tasmanian_outcomes>.

24 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 12 [46].

25 Department for Education, Children and Young People, DECYP Organisational Chart (Web Page, 30 April 2023) <https://publicdocumentcentre.education.tas.gov.au/library/Shared%20Documents/DECYP-Organisation-Chart.pdf.>.

26 Department for Education, Children and Young People, DECYP Organisational Chart (Web Page, 30 April 2023) <https://publicdocumentcentre.education.tas.gov.au/library/Shared%20Documents/DECYP-Organisation-Chart.pdf>.

27 Department for Education, Children and Young People, DECYP Organisational Chart (Web Page, 30 April 2023) <https://publicdocumentcentre.education.tas.gov.au/library/Shared%20Documents/DECYP-Organisation-Chart.pdf>.

28 Department for Education, Children and Young People, DECYP Organisational Chart (Web Page, 30 April 2023) <https://publicdocumentcentre.education.tas.gov.au/library/Shared%20Documents/DECYP-Organisation-Chart.pdf>.

29 Department of Education, Department of Education Response to Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (9 November 2021) 5, Recommendation 5.

30 Department of Education, 'Safeguarding Children and Young People', Children, Youth and Families (Web Page, 25 July 2023) <https://www.education.tas.gov.au/about-us/safeguarding-children/>.

31 Department of Justice, 'Tasmanian Government's Current Service System', 22 September 2021, 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

32 Department for Education, Children and Young People, DECYP Organisational Chart (Web Page, 30 April 2023) <https://publicdocumentcentre.education.tas.gov.au/library/Shared%20Documents/DECYP-Organisation-Chart.pdf>.

33 Department of Education, Annual Report 2021–2022 (Report, 2021) 7.

34 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 6A.

35 Department of Education, Annual Report 2020–2021 (Report, 2021) 51.

36 Teachers Registration Board, About Us (Web Page, 30 April 2023) <https://www.trb.tas.gov.au/about-us/>.

37 Teachers Registration Board, Annual Report 2020 (Report, 2021) 2; refer also to Teachers Registration Board, Code of Professional Ethics for the Teaching Profession in Tasmania (undated).

38 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 7 [5.9].

39 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1006 [42]–1007 [1].

40 Tasmanian Government, Government Services: Budget Paper No 2 (2022) vol 1, 55–57.

41 Department of Education, Department of Education Response to Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (9 November 2021) 1.

42 Sarah Courtney, 'Statement on the Release of the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse' (Media Release, 9 November 2021) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/statement_on_the_release_of_the_independent_inquiry_into_the_tasmanian_department_of_educations_responses_to_child_sexual_abuse>.

43 Adam Langenberg, 'Tasmanian Education Department Sex Abuse Report Details "Some Record of Concern" About 41 Current Staff' ABC News (online, 10 Nov 2021) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2021-11-10/tas-education-department-review-child-sex-review-concerns-staff/100607564>.

44 A complete version of the final report was provided to our Commission of Inquiry.

45 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 8.

46 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 8.

47 Refer to Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 74–75, Recommendation 2.

48 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 46.

49 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 56.

50 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 57.

51 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 9.

52 Refer to Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 76, Recommendations 4 and 5; Department of Education, Department of Education Response to Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (9 November 2021) 3.

53 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 63.

54 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 63.

55 Department of Education, Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, 2021) 37.

56 Parliament of Tasmania, Government Services: Budget Paper No. 2 (2022) vol 1, 57. The amount committed is '$3.8 million over four years from 2022–23 and $1.68 million ongoing to employ additional psychologists and social workers to directly support schools': Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53].

57 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 9.

58 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 9.

59 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 10, 59, 70.

60 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 10.

61 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 10.

62 Refer to Employment Direction No. 5 – Procedures for the Investigation and Determination of whether an employee has breached the Code of Conduct; Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 10.

63 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 10.

64 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 79, Recommendation 12.

65 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 64–66.

66 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 66.

67 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 11.

68 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 11.

69 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 11.

70 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 11–12.

71 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse Report, 7 June 2021) 10.

72 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 12.

73 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 12.

74 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 13.

75 Refer to Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 78–79, Recommendations 8, 9 and 10; refer also to page 13.

76 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 13.

77 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 26.

78 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 26.

79 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 27.

80 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 13–14; 27.

81 Refer to Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 74, Recommendation 1.

82 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 68.

83 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 15.

84 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Procedural Fairness Response, 28 March 2023, 28.

85 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 14.

86 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 15–16.

87 Refer to Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 80, Recommendation 17; refer also to page 15.

88 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 74.

89 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 75.

90 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 75.

91 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 76.

92 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 76.

93 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 77.

94 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 77.

95 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 78.

96 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 78–79.

97 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 79.

98 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 79.

99 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse Report, 7 June 2021) 80.

100 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 80–81.

101 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 81–82.

102 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 82.

103 Department of Education, Department of Education Response to Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (9 November 2021) 1.

104 Department of Education, Department of Education Response to Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (9 November 2021) Annexure 1 ('Planned implementation timeframe of all Inquiry Report recommendations') 5–7. The timeframe for completion of Recommendation 21–Systems Reviews was listed as the end of 2021.

105 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, Annexure 36 (Excel spreadsheet: 'Planned and completed implementation of DoE Inquiry Recommendations', 10 May 2022) 6–7.

106 Department of Education, Department of Education Response to Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (9 November 2021) 3.

107 Department of Education, Department of Education Response to Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (9 November 2021) 6.

108 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Procedural Fairness Response, 28 March 2023, 5–6.

109 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 4–6 [15].

110 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53].

111 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53]; Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, Annexure 36 (Excel spreadsheet: 'Planned and completed implementation of DoE Inquiry Recommendations', 10 May 2022) 7.

112 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53].

113 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53].

114 Tasmanian Government, Parliament of Tasmania, Government Services: Budget Paper No. 2 (2022) vol 1, 55, note 2.

115 Refer to Roger Jaensch, '$26 million for Safeguarding Officers in Schools' (Media Release, 24 May 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/$26_million_for_safeguarding_officers_in_schools>; refer also to Tasmania, Estimates Committee B, House of Assembly, 8 June 2022, 36 (Roger Jaensch).

116 Tasmanian Government, Parliament of Tasmania, Government Services: Budget Paper No. 2 (2022) vol 1, 57.

117 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023).

5 Case studies: Children in schools

Content warning

Please be aware that the content in this report includes descriptions of child sexual abuse and may be distressing or raise issues of concern for some readers.

We encourage readers to exercise discretion in their engagement with this content and to seek support and care if required.

1 Introduction

Many people who engaged with our Commission of Inquiry told us about their experiences of sexual abuse while they were students in a government school. Through written submissions, evidence provided in our hearings and sessions with Commissioners, we heard how children and young people in schools suffered abuse by teachers and, in some instances, by other departmental staff or by students.[1] Often, the trauma that these children and young people experienced was made worse by the inadequate responses of adults who were in a position to help but did not do so. However, in some instances, even when adults did try to help, challenges with the Department's policies and the State's disciplinary processes meant their efforts, while well intentioned, were largely ineffective.

Several victim-survivors told us in detail about the abuse they suffered, the lax responses they received and the devastating and lasting effects this has had on their lives. In each case, the effects of the abuse were worsened and prolonged by multiple systemic problems that meant they have felt the need to continue to advocate for change for many years after the abuse occurred. The experiences of these victim-survivors, when they were children in the aftermath of their abuse and later as adults in their engagement with the Department, reveal shortcomings in how the Department handled these matters. We heard, for example, that:

- In some cases, there was an unwillingness by departmental staff to believe children and young people when they reported child sexual abuse, and their disclosures were not handled in a sensitive, trauma-informed way. Victim-survivors told us about the devastating effects this had on them.[2]
- There was a lack of support provided to children and young people who disclosed abuse. In one case, a victim-survivor said that a member of school staff told her that it was her responsibility to make the abuse stop.[3]
- In seeking information or support from the Department and other entities such as the Teachers Registration Board, some victim-survivors were given inconsistent or inadequate responses. Also, the complexities of the processes involved were sometimes not properly explained, leading to expectations that were not met. Ultimately, this exacerbated the trauma experienced by some victim-survivors.[4]

We provide accounts of their experiences in this chapter (refer to Case study—Kerri, Case study—Katrina, Case study—Sam and Case study—'Wayne', which includes the experience of 'Rachel'). These accounts draw on the submissions made by these victim-survivors, the evidence they gave in our hearings and documents provided to us by the State about these matters. They also include, where possible, responses and explanations from departmental and other government officials. We are deeply thankful to these victim-survivors for sharing their stories.

We also closely examine a further three case studies of allegations against teachers (refer to Case study—'Mark', Case study—'Jeremy', and Case study—'Brad'), as well as one recent case study about harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Case study—'Andy'). Four of our case studies—those of 'Wayne', 'Mark', 'Jeremy' and 'Brad'—were drawn from information the Department provided about its recent responses to child sexual. abuse matters, and they clarify the Department's recent policies and disciplinary systems. We describe the Department's recent responses in general terms in Section 2. The case studies we discuss give a sense of the common challenges across the system and offer a guide to potential solutions.

Even as adults, many of the victim-survivors who engaged with our Commission of Inquiry were still navigating the effects of the abuse they experienced as children.

Their personal accounts and the case studies in this chapter highlight the toll of child sexual abuse in an education setting. These accounts and case studies also illustrate many of the themes we explore in this volume.

While some accounts of child sexual abuse outlined in this chapter were outside our scope because they occurred before 2000, they have continuing relevance to understanding how we can better protect children from child sexual abuse in education settings. Also, several cases in which abuse occurred before 2000 fall within our terms of reference because the Tasmanian Government responses to these incidents continued through the 2000s, 2010s and 2020s.

2 The Department's recent response to child sexual abuse

This section outlines the information the Department provided to our Commission of Inquiry about recent suspensions in response to allegations of child sexual abuse. In Chapter 6, we discuss the Department's responses to child sexual abuse and our recommendations for improving them.

2.1 The Department's recent review of matters

The Tasmanian Government gave us information about the number of employees suspended over allegations of child sexual abuse or related behaviours up until the end of February 2023.[5] In relation to the Department of Education, 43 employees were suspended between January 2000 and February 2023 for child sexual abuse.[6] Almost half of these (20) occurred since November 2020 (the date of the announcement of our Commission of Inquiry).[7]

Timothy Bullard, Secretary, Department of Education, explained (in his statement and in our hearings) the process that led to identifying and suspending these current departmental employees and the steps the Department took in relation to those employees. We give an account of that process below. We note, however, that this information and its analysis is limited to the period covered by the relevant statement or evidence provided to us. Further, the conduct of employees of the Department who have been suspended since 2020 sometimes related to matters that occurred long ago and should have been addressed at the time.

Secretary Bullard explained the process that led to these recent suspensions. He told us that the Department analysed 'matters of concern' involving departmental employees. These matters were identified through a variety of sources, including 'civil claims, redress applications, Right to Information requests, internal records and verbal information'.[8] Matters of concern were entered on a spreadsheet, initially to help the Department estimate its liability for future redress and civil claims.[9] In December 2020, Secretary Bullard requested that the spreadsheet be analysed to determine how many departmental employees had a matter of concern on their file 'that could involve child sexual abuse'.[10] Initially, 21 employees were identified, but this later increased to 32.[11] By May 2022, we understand there had been 57 preliminary assessments into allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse or grooming behaviours conducted by the Department since January 2020.[12] Preliminary assessments, or 'preliminary investigations' as they are often called, are used to determine if the Head of Agency could, on the available evidence, form a reasonable belief that there has been a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. We discuss preliminary assessments in more detail in Chapter 6 and Chapter 20.

The Department's Workplace Relations section examined the initial 21 matters in early 2021, with some matters noted as more serious than others.[13] Workplace Relations staff assessed five of these matters as most serious and gave these priority.[14] Secretary Bullard told us that all 21 matters were discussed with police.[15] Secretary Bullard then reviewed these matters to determine if 'further investigation or management action was legally possible and/or required'.[16]

Secretary Bullard consulted the Office of the Solicitor-General to determine whether new Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations could be initiated (that is, an investigation into whether an employee has breached the State Service Code of Conduct).[17] Workplace Relations then referred each matter to Secretary Bullard separately:

> … via a Minute for determination as to whether [he] had reasonable grounds to believe that a breach of the Code of Conduct may have occurred and an [Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct] investigation was to be initiated.[18]

As indicated above, by May 2022, the Department conducted 57 preliminary assessments into allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse or grooming behaviours since January 2020, and 21 of these resulted in suspensions.[19] It appears that 50 of those assessments involved current employees.[20] Of the 57 preliminary assessments:

- 32 concerned historical re-examinations (or historical review matters), five of which resulted in Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations[21]
- 16 individuals, who we believe were subject to contemporary allegations, were also subject to Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations[22]
- another six matters involved relief employees (who we believe were 'marked as unsuitable for employment on the fixed term and relief employment register')[23]
- three matters were not referred for investigation.[24]

For the 32 employees subject to historical child sexual abuse allegations, the Department re-examined the matters to determine if previous 'management action was appropriate'.[25] As noted above, as at April 2022, five of those matters progressed to Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations. Secretary Bullard told us that of those five investigations, none had resulted in termination, and:

- two employees had received a sanction (for example, counselling or a lawful and reasonable direction)
- one employee had resigned (but the investigation was ongoing at the time of Secretary Bullard's statement)
- one employee was found not to have breached the State Service Code of Conduct
- one investigation was ongoing at the time of Secretary Bullard's statement.[26]

In relation to the 27 other employees subject to historical child sexual abuse allegations but not subject to an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation:

- two were issued with a lawful and reasonable direction
- four relief employees were told they were not eligible for relief employment and would be subject to formal investigation should they seek employment with the Department in the future
- no other action was taken in respect of 20 employees because the Secretary determined the allegations 'as not child sexual abuse or unable to form a reasonable belief the code may have been breached or matter subject to previous formal investigation'[27]
- one matter was still under review at the time of writing.[28]

In September 2022, Secretary Bullard notified us that the Department had suspended another 13 employees between April and September 2022.[29] According to Secretary Bullard, these suspensions were primarily in response to 'allegations of inappropriate touching or inappropriate language … between a teacher and a pupil'.[30] Secretary Bullard said that while the number of new allegations in this period may be 'shocking', it indicates that people are 'getting the message' that:

> … if you are a member of staff that has concerns about the actions of a colleague, report it in; but also too that children and young people are feeling that they have agency to raise these matters with trusted members of staff.[31]

We agree with Secretary Bullard that the wave of new reports is likely to indicate cultural change, but we consider the data should continue to be monitored because effective change would see this number decrease over time.

Secretary Bullard highlighted that the Department has recently improved the supports offered to employees subject to allegations of child sexual abuse. Counselling and psychological support is now available to employees, where requested, and a 'liaison officer' is appointed to communicate with employees about the matter.[32]

We analysed many of the recent suspensions (from an earlier September 2021 list), including the Department's response at the time of the original complaints and Workplace Relations' more recent briefings to the Secretary. Through this process, we selected four case studies to explore in detail. We also discuss three case studies that provide victim-survivor accounts of child sexual abuse that occurred before the year 2000, and the Tasmanian Government's response (including responses by the Department and justice systems post-2000), as well as one recent case study about harmful sexual behaviours.

Case study 1: Kerri

Kerri Collins contacted our Commission of Inquiry to share her experience of reporting sexual abuse as a young child while attending a government primary school in Tasmania. Giving evidence at our hearings, she told us about the difficulties she encountered after disclosing the alleged abuse as a child and the barriers she faced in seeking resolution as an adult. Her story spans several decades and reveals multiple problems in the response of the government departments, agencies and regulators involved.

1 The alleged incident

John (a pseudonym) was a teacher at the primary school Ms Collins attended. He was young, charismatic and well liked.[33] In 1991, Ms Collins and three other girls at the school disclosed to the school counsellor allegations that John had sexually abused each of them on numerous occasions over a two-year period when they were in years 1 to 3.[34] The abuse allegedly occurred during school, usually in an isolated area on school grounds. The girls were 11 years old at the time they made these disclosures.[35]

2 The initial response

Ms Collins told us that while the school counsellor believed her disclosures, responded appropriately and took meticulous notes, the school principal's response was 'highly inappropriate'.[36] When he learned of the disclosures, and before contacting the students' parents, Ms Collins told us that the principal called her and the other students into his office, individually, to question them.[37] Ms Collins recalled that the principal then asked her to sit on the (female) assistant principal's knee to 'demonstrate … the physical position [she] was in when [she] was sexually assaulted [by John]'.[38] Ms Collins told us that it was 'retraumatising for a child to be put in that position', and that:

> It's even distressing thinking about it; at the time I remember feeling extremely uncomfortable about having to be put in that position … not only what I was saying wasn't being believed, I had to actually show them … it was just the two of them … I didn't know if I was in trouble, I didn't know if my parents had been told, I had no idea.[39]

Ms Collins said it was clear to her that the principal did not believe her disclosure, nor the disclosures made by the other girls.[40] This was confirmed much later, in 2018, when a police officer informed Ms Collins that at the time these events had occurred, the principal allegedly told police 'a good Christian man like [John] would not do something like this'.[41]

The school notified Ms Collins' parents of her disclosure, and they contacted police. Ms Collins then made a statement to police; however, as far as she is aware, they did not follow up or investigate these matters at the time.[42] John left the school after several of the girls' parents tried to confront him. Ms Collins told us that the school reported that John had been moved to another school.[43] Ms Collins did not hear anything more about John for many years. Throughout this time, Ms Collins said that:

> I was not offered support or counselling by the school, and it was always my understanding that the principal did not believe us and that John remained employed by the Department of Education. I didn't know what restrictions (if any) were placed on his ability to work as a teacher.[44]

In our education hearings, we asked Ms Collins if she knew what had happened in response to the complaints she and others had made against John in 1991. She replied that she did not because no one had told her, not even when she went to police for the second time in 2001.[45]

Police did not refer the matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions.[46] In a letter to the complainants in 2004, the then Director of Public Prosecutions wrote that he thought the decision not to charge John in 1991 was an error, based on a misunderstanding of evidentiary standards relevant to child sexual abuse at the time.[47] During our hearings, Ms Collins stated that she was not surprised by these comments, describing police failure to proceed with the case against John as just another example of how the system had failed her throughout the process, and continues to do so.[48]

3 What happened next

These events affected Ms Collins into adulthood. While at university, the reality of the fact that John was still teaching—and had most likely been doing so since the time of the original complaints 10 years earlier—came 'crashing down' on Ms Collins.[49] In 2001, Ms Collins contacted the Sexual Assault Support Service and the service arranged an interview with police. The investigation into John was 'reopened'.[50] The three other students who had made complaints about John in the early 1990s also gave statements to police. John was arrested and charged in 2002.[51] The Department of Education varied John's duties so he did not have contact with students.[52]

Ms Collins told us that her experience of providing information to police as an adult in 2001 was vastly different from her experience of being questioned as a child 10 years earlier. As a child, she recalled having been questioned by a male police officer in an interview room with no windows and without her parents present.[53] In contrast, when giving her statement in 2001, Ms Collins told us that the officer she spoke with was a woman, whom Ms Collins felt was clearly trauma-informed, and was open and transparent about the process. Also, the interview took place at the Sexual Assault Support Service in a comfortable setting and in the presence of a trauma-informed worker from the service.[54]

John was committed to stand trial.[55] However, Ms Collins gave evidence that two weeks before John's trial was to begin, she got a phone call from the Director of Public Prosecutions saying he had decided not to prosecute John.[56] Ms Collins told us that she was 'furious' about the trial not proceeding and about the lack of information provided to her.[57]

We note that the DPP Prosecution Policy and Guidelines ('DPP Guidelines') now set out a process for informing complainants when a case is to be discharged. The DPP Guidelines state that such information should be imparted in person or, if this is not possible, by phone. The DPP Guidelines also outline the information that a complainant should be given.[58]

In the mid-2000s, concerned that John still had access to children in his role as a teacher, Ms Collins met with the shadow minister for education and contacted the then Commissioner for Children about her concerns.[59] She also contacted the Teachers Registration Board. Ms Collins told our Commission of Inquiry that her conversation with the Teachers Registration Board at that time left her feeling 'dismissed' and that the person she spoke to was 'extremely unhelpful'.[60]

Ms Collins recalled that the person she had spoken to at the Board told her she would need a lawyer to make a complaint about John and that it was unlikely she would succeed. She was also told that as part of the complaints process, she may have to appear in person with John in the same room. Ms Collins was unwilling to do this. Ms Collins' mother also wrote a letter to the Board about John but did not receive a reply.

In 2004, the Board received a registration application from John.[61] After considering a range of material in relation to John's application, the Board granted John registration.[62] The material the Board considered included a letter sent by the Department of Education advocating on John's behalf. Secretary Bullard and Ann Moxham, Registrar, Teachers Registration Board both condemned this letter.[63] Secretary Bullard agreed that the letter was 'entirely inappropriate' and was not focused on protecting children, and that Ms Collins was entitled to feel betrayed by such a letter.[64] Ms Moxham told us that the letter had two connotations: one was to pressure the Board and the other was to support the individual, both of which were inappropriate.[65]

Ms Moxham told us that, in re-examining the evidence that was before the Board when it made its decision to grant registration to John, it is not apparent that the Board sought any information about John from police (despite John having been charged with several offences). Ms Moxham also told us that the Board appears to have made its decision based on the matter having been dismissed in court.[66]

According to the Board, after contact with Ms Collins, the then Commissioner for Children wrote to the then Minister for Education outlining his concerns about the processes that had led the Board to grant registration to John. Ms Moxham wrote in a statement to us that this led the then Minister to request that the Board:

- develop written procedures for handling complaints
- establish a committee to review the process leading to the finding that John was of 'good character' (and his subsequent registration)
- review the decision to grant John registration if the committee determined that the process leading to John's registration was flawed.[67]

While the review called for by the Minister eventually led to changes to the Board's processes and procedures in respect of several matters, including how it deals with complaints and conducts inquiries, it did not prompt any change to John's registration.[68] John remained a registered teacher.

When we questioned why John's registration status remained unchanged after the review, Ms Moxham said this was 'difficult to understand', and in her view it was 'unforgivable'.[69] Ms Moxham conceded that the Board has still (at the time of our hearings) not examined how this failure occurred.[70] In relation to how the Board had handled Ms Collins' matter, Ms Moxham said: '[i]t is a really nasty black mark on our record, and I think our … current board is quite upset and concerned that this took place'.[71] She apologised to Ms Collins.

Around 2006, having exhausted other avenues, Ms Collins hired a lawyer to see if there was any other way to prevent John from teaching. Her lawyer advised that nothing more could be done.[72] At this point, Ms Collins was 26 years old and said her life had been 'on hold' for the past five years as she tried to navigate a complex and unsupportive system. She told our Inquiry: 'It had taken an enormous personal and emotional toll on me. I felt strangled by all of the doors that were closed as I tried to get someone to listen to me'.[73]

Ms Collins tried to put the alleged abuse, and the school and Department's responses to it, behind her and dedicated herself to her career and family. However, 14 years later, in 2018, she received a phone call from police. Much to her surprise, they wanted to speak to her about John. Another victim, now the fifth complainant to come forward with allegations against John, had told the National Royal Commission that she had been abused by John while she was a student at the same primary school as Ms Collins. Ms Collins agreed to speak with police.[74]

Police sought advice from Daryl Coates SC, Director of Public Prosecutions, in relation to the 2018 allegation against John, and about whether charges should be laid in respect of the historical allegations involving the original complaints.[75] In his response to police, and in his evidence to us, Mr Coates said that changes to the law since 2004 meant that if the complaints against John had been made in 2022, the prosecution would proceed because the charges would be cross-admissible, and the complaints would be heard together:[76]

> In my view, if each complaint had been made now for the first time, there would be sufficient evidence to charge the accused with indecent assault with respect of the complaints made by [redacted]; aggravated assault with respect of the complaint made by [redacted]; and maintaining a sexual relationship with respect to the complaint made by Kerri Munro [now Collins]. Each complaint would be cross-admissible as tendency evidence in respect of the other complainants' complaint. The evidence shows that he has a sexual interest, which he acts upon, on young girls [around primary school age], who are in his care, where he takes them to [redacted] room and places his hands down their pants. Undoubtedly, if there was a trial the complainants' credibility would be strongly contested, given they had spoken to each other and made some inconsistent statements. However, that now would be a question of fact for the jury to consider and not a question of admissibility.[77]

However, this does not answer the question about whether, given those changes to the law, the original charges against John could now be revived. In short, the answer given to us was 'no'.

Mr Coates told us that because the charges had been 'dismissed' in the Magistrates Court, John could no longer be re-charged nor could the charges be used as tendency evidence in respect of the fifth complainant.[78] We note, however, that in respect of the complaint involving Ms Collins (in relation to which John was charged with 'maintaining a sexual relationship with a young person', now referred to as 'persistent sexual abuse of a child'), there were questions about whether the charges had in fact been dismissed. Mr Coates told us that a prosecution 'cannot now be instituted because the charges of indecent assault (at the time being that which underpinned any indictable charges of persistent sexual abuse of a child) … [were] dismissed in the Magistrates Court'.[79] Refer to Chapter 16 for discussion of this issue.

As to whether Ms Collins' earlier complaint had in fact been dismissed, Mr Coates said in his letter to police:

> There is some doubt whether the complaint was dismissed or just remained adjourned [indefinitely]. The original complaint has been destroyed. It has not been recorded on the accused prior convictions as being dismissed. The Court record appears to state that the complaint was never dismissed. I have spoken to [redacted], who is now a Crown Counsel in my office. He is of the view that if he was asked to dismiss both complaints he would have done so. However, in my view it does not matter because if we proceeded the matter would be discharged by a Court as an abuse of process.[80]

Mr Coates gave several reasons as to why, in his view, proceeding with a prosecution against John would amount to an abuse of process. He stated that while the prosecution may not have formally dismissed the complaint, this was an administrative oversight.[81] He continued:

> Some 14 years have passed since the assurances [that the complaint would be dismissed] were given, the importance of finality, where an accused has been led to believe that the matters have been finalised for so long means that any prosecution now would be so fundamentally unfair as to be an abuse of process.[82]

It is apparent to us that procedural issues and mistakes in this case led to a considerable injustice:

- Police failed to charge John in 1991 because there was 'no corroborating evidence to support the complaints in these allegations, therefore there [was] not sufficient evidence to support any charges under the Criminal Code', based on a mistaken belief that corroboration was required.[83]
- Complaints were laid against John without 'comprehensive advice outlining the law and the evidence', which led to the prosecution being discharged based on difficulties posed by the law and evidence at the time (2004).
- The original complaint was destroyed and was not officially recorded by the Court as being dismissed. This meant there were doubts for some time about whether Ms Collins' complaint against John was legally 'dismissed' or remained adjourned indefinitely. If the former, John could not be tried in the future, nor could Ms Collins' evidence be used as evidence to support that John had a tendency to abuse children in any other charge of child sexual abuse against John. This was viewed as an administrative oversight.
- Mr Coates eventually determined that the case was dismissed. Mr Coates told us that he had spoken to the relevant staff and was satisfied that the complaints were in fact dismissed. This had serious implications for using Ms Collins' evidence in future legal proceedings. Accepting that there was an administrative error, and the charges were dismissed, it appears to us that because of that error, Tasmanian law did not permit the Director of Public Prosecutions to correct that error and required him instead to dismiss the charges, despite the outcome not favouring the complainants.[84]

When asked by Counsel Assisting about the sense of injustice that Ms Collins (and the other victim-survivors) must be feeling in respect of this matter, Mr Coates said:

> Look, I can see, as I said in my letter, I can see from their point of view that it's an injustice: I mean, I think it's an injustice, but there's nothing I can do about it. And, having said that I think it's an injustice, I'm not saying it's an injustice because the 2004 decision was wrong, because I don't think it was wrong in accordance with the law as it stood at that time.[85]

Ms Collins told us that those working on the case informed her that the 2018 complaint did not proceed because, had it done so, John would have been denied natural justice.[86] Mr Coates told us that his advice outlines, in great detail, the legal reasons why the complaint could not proceed and denies that it said that the 2018 complaint did not proceed because John would have been denied natural justice. It is possible that Mr Coates' advice was not accurately communicated to Ms Collins by those working on the case. The investigating officer asked Ms Collins whether she wanted to read the report prepared by the Director of Public Prosecutions in respect of the case. Ms Collins, being upset at the time, declined to read the report. Some months later, however, she changed her mind and asked if she could see the report. She recalled that her request was refused, with police explaining that there had been a direction from 'above' in Tasmania Police not to share information about the case.[87] Despite this, Ms Collins recalled that Tasmania Police told her that the Director of Public Prosecutions' report had stated that if the initial complaints against John had been made in 2018, John 'would be charged, he would be tried, he would be convicted and he would be imprisoned'.[88]

The Teachers Registration Board suspended John's registration to teach in 2020.[89] He retired from teaching in 2021. He has not faced trial in respect of any charges.

Case study 2: 'Mark'

This case study about a high school teacher, Mark (a pseudonym), is based on information the Department provided about its recent responses to child sexual abuse matters.[90]

1 The alleged incident

In 2016, a high school teacher, Jeff (a pseudonym), overheard two year 9 students, Jasmine (a pseudonym) and Heather (a pseudonym), discussing messages allegedly received by Jasmine from another teacher, Mark.[91] Jasmine and Heather told Jeff that Mark had been going through Jasmine's Facebook profile and 'liking' her photos.[92]

Screenshots of Mark's phone showed Mark contacting Jasmine with questions such as 'How's your holidays going?' and 'What you been doing?' Jasmine asked, 'who is this?' and 'why r u messaging me', later saying 'I reckon you should probably leave :)'.[93] Mark signs off 'Sorry my bad, drunk'.[94] Mark also commented 'nice sunset' on a photo Jasmine posted on Instagram.[95]

Jasmine told Jeff she felt quite intimidated by the fact that Mark had started talking to her and kept replying after she asked him to stop.[96] She later told a staff member that she felt uncomfortable about the exchange and avoided talking to Mark when she would see him at school.[97]

2 The initial response

Jeff reported the alleged incident to his principal, Justin (a pseudonym), and prepared a statement, which Justin provided to the Department of Education's Human Resources team.[98] After assessing the matter, the team referred the incident to a regional human resources manager, who conferred with Justin about how to manage the complaint.[99]

Justin sent a letter to Mark, which reflected his view that the alleged incidents did occur.[100] However, he accepted Mark's explanation that the contacts with Jasmine were made without Mark's knowledge, by a friend using his phone on one occasion, and a student using it on another occasion.[101] This explanation appears to have been accepted by Learning Services and Justin.[102] Mark was given a formal direction to ensure all his interactions with students in the future complied with the Guidelines on Professional Standards for Staff and that his mobile devices were kept secure to avoid opportunities for misuse.[103] He was warned that further instances of such conduct may constitute a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, but no formal sanctions were imposed.[104]

There is no record of Workplace Relations being notified of the outcome of the matter.[105] No notifications were made to police, the Child Safety Service, the Teachers Registration Board or the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme at that time.[106]

3 Departmental review

The Department identified Mark's case as a 'historical' incident warranting re-examination. In 2021, Workplace Relations briefed the Secretary on Mark's case and advised that it 'did not amount to sexual misconduct' and was 'adequately investigated at the time'.[107] The Secretary relied on this advice and no action was taken.[108]
The Teachers Registration Board was notified about the allegation later in 2021.[109]

4 What we heard

We asked for information about the handling of Mark's case, including a statement from Secretary Bullard.

Without making definitive findings in relation to the matter, Secretary Bullard conceded there were some shortcomings in the investigation of Jasmine's complaint, noting that some aspects of the investigation did not comply with policies and procedures at the time.[110]

In relation to the initial response by the school, Secretary Bullard told us:

- There are no records to suggest that Jasmine received any support or contact from a school social worker after making her complaint.[111] The principal, Justin, advised the Department that he was confident he had met with Jasmine on a number of occasions and offered psychological support, recalling that she was 'ok' and stating that the school social worker was likely to have made contact with Jasmine, but this could not be verified.[112]
- Justin did not follow up the allegation that a student had used Mark's phone to contact Jasmine, nor did he try to verify Mark's claim of someone else using his phone, by seeking information or statements that may confirm or contradict such a claim.[113]
- Learning Services did not provide Workplace Relations with copies of the text messages sent to Jasmine, nor Mark's response to the complaint at the time of the investigation.[114]
- Neither Justin nor Learning Services drew Mark's attention to the Social Media Policy (2014) in place at that time, which made it clear that communications of a 'personal nature' with students is inappropriate.[115]
- Neither Justin nor Learning Services reported the outcome of the complaint (being Justin's letter to Mark) to Workplace Relations. This meant that the Teachers Registration Board was not notified about the matter at that time.[116]

In relation to reopening Mark's case, Secretary Bullard accepted he was not bound by the advice of Workplace Relations and was solely responsible for the decision on whether to proceed with an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation.[117]

However, he described some problems with the advice he received in relation to Mark. These included:

- Workplace Relations may not have adequately established that Mark was not in control of his device, given that this explanation was not verified in any meaningful way, and that Mark himself claimed that he wrote the message 'sorry my bad, drunk' to Jasmine when he got his phone back.[118]
- Because Workplace Relations had not received screenshots of the messages to Jasmine, nor Mark's responses, these were not provided in the briefing to Secretary Bullard.[119] He only reviewed these later, in response to our questioning about the case.[120]

When making the initial decision, Secretary Bullard conceded he had formed the view that the allegations against Mark did not amount to sexual misconduct and that, at that time, he believed the matter had been dealt with because Mark had been counselled and received a formal direction.[121] However, in reviewing all the materials in light of our questions, Secretary Bullard told us that he has reflected on 'whether this was the right conclusion'.[122]

Secretary Bullard stated at hearings: 'I think there's a question on this one around whether it does constitute child sexual abuse … or simply a breach of a social media policy'.[123] However, he accepted that if the evidence against Mark had been reviewed in an investigation, that investigation might have revealed other 'pieces of data' relevant to Mark's conduct.[124]

Secretary Bullard advised us that he has referred Mark's case to Workplace Relations for fresh advice on a potential Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation.[125]

4.1 Justin

When we reviewed Mark's case, we learned that the principal of Mark's school, Justin, had been the subject of a disciplinary investigation earlier in his teaching career in response to an allegation that he had sex with a girl in her mid-teens after spotting her walking home intoxicated.[126] Justin denied he had sex with the girl, stating that he had only invited her into his house to ensure her safety.[127] Justin also reported that she had told him that she was 18 years old. During the investigation, the girl admitted that she had lied to Justin about her age but stated that she had told Justin she was under 18 years old.[128] At the time, the then Secretary reprimanded Justin 'for [his] action in leaving [himself] vulnerable to criticism as demonstrated by [the victim's] allegations of sexual intercourse'.[129]

Some years after this incident, Justin supported a teacher who challenged their termination for sexual misconduct towards students. As documented in a legal proceeding, Justin told this teacher that he had been promoted to principal despite being in a similar situation before. The teacher stated that Justin reassured him along the lines that the allegations would 'wash over'.[130]

In 2021, the Department also reinvestigated the allegations against Justin and concluded that he was not acting in the 'course of employment' at the time of the incident, which meant his conduct was not linked to his obligations under the State Service Code of Conduct.[131]

5 What has changed

Secretary Bullard told us that several improvements have been made to policies and practice since 2016. Those most relevant to Mark's case include the following:

- An incident of this nature would now be referred to the Secretary for consideration as a matter of course, rather than managed at the school level.[132]
- The Social Media Procedure (2020) is explicit in stating that staff members must not 'friend' or 'follow' a student (or allow students to friend or follow them) unless they are family members, and the contact is reasonable.[133] Mark's conduct would reflect a 'direct contravention' of these guidelines and would be central to any employment investigation.[134]
- Training has been offered in relation to this new policy, particularly aimed at departmental social media administrators (for example, those who manage the Facebook pages of schools).[135]
- Current thresholds of what constitutes 'child sexual abuse' in departmental guidelines have been broadened in line with that used by the National Royal Commission to include grooming behaviours, noting that Mark's conduct was not considered to constitute grooming at that time.[136]
- The Office of Safeguarding has been established and is working to raise awareness among schools about inappropriate conduct and grooming behaviours to ensure principals are equipped to identify such conduct, make appropriate notifications and advise Workplace Relations.[137]

6 Systemic issues

We agree with the reflections of Secretary Bullard about shortcomings in the handling of Mark's case. We would add that the Department's response to this relatively recent incident also demonstrates:

- lack of understanding of the broad range of conduct that can fall within the definition of sexual misconduct—while the messages Mark allegedly sent may not have been overtly sexual in content, the Department should have been open to the question of whether they could be construed as flirtatious and whether they could have been perceived to be grooming behaviours
- a readiness to minimise and downplay the seriousness of incidents without adequate investigation, recognising that in some instances the scale of the risk to children may only be uncovered by taking proactive steps to uncover more information
- poor understanding of the respective roles and responsibilities of Learning Services and Workplace Relations, which appear to have operated independently without adequate information sharing and collaboration
- an inclination to accept the accounts of adults over the reported concerns of children and young people—the Department could have been more sceptical about whether it was plausible that two separate people on two occasions accessed Mark's social media accounts to send messages to students at Mark's school, and his explanation should have been met with greater scrutiny
- too much deference to the view of the principal—while Justin did seek some advice on how to manage the matter from a regional human resources manager, this was largely limited to process and there was no 'check' on his inclination to accept the explanation without further inquiry (this is particularly concerning given Justin's own complaints history)
- the 2021 departmental review was (again) quick to downplay the potential seriousness of this matter and lacked overall rigour.

We note that on a strict interpretation of the State Service Code of Conduct, which requires a direct link between employment and the conduct in question, the earlier incident involving allegations that Justin had sexually penetrated a girl under the age of consent, who had allegedly been drinking at the time, could not be met with the seriousness it deserved. We also have concerns about the Department's framing of that situation as being a risk to Justin's career, rather than a potential risk to students —as well as not acknowledging the harm to the young woman involved.

Case study 3: 'Wayne'

This case study about Wayne (a pseudonym), a high school teacher, is mostly based on information the Department provided in relation to its recent responses to child sexual abuse matters.[138] Rachel (a pseudonym) gave evidence at our hearings.[139]

1 The alleged incident

In the early 2000s, Rachel was a smiley, bubbly and shy student who liked school.[140] Wayne, a teacher at her school, was well known in the small community in which they lived, and had a public image that made Rachel trust him.[141] Rachel told us that Wayne presented himself as 'more of a friend' to Rachel and, at the time, she thought he was a 'cool teacher'.[142] Rachel's mother, Anne (a pseudonym), was a single mother working two jobs who, after some convincing, accepted Wayne's offer to take Rachel to an activity outside school each week in which they were both involved and which Rachel was keen to pursue.[143]

When Rachel was 16 she went on an out-of-town trip connected to this activity with Wayne. Anne attended as her guardian and witnessed Wayne behave in an 'overly familiar' way with Rachel, given their teacher–student relationship.[144] Rachel told us that Anne had allegedly witnessed Wayne piggybacking Rachel, telling her she had a 'nice arse', drawing a penis on her ankle and tucking her into bed.[145] Wayne also gave Rachel a tank top imprinted with the words 'MILF in training'.[146] Anne described being 'in disbelief' when she allegedly saw Wayne kiss Rachel after he tucked her into bed.[147]

Shortly after the trip, in 2005, Anne reported her concerns about Wayne to the Department.[148] From the outset, Anne said the Department was 'very intimidating with my claim'.[149]

2 The initial response

Following a preliminary investigation, the Department advised Wayne of potential breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct in him buying the tank top.[150] An investigator was appointed to conduct a formal investigation.[151] Wayne was suspended from teaching pending the outcome.[152]

Rachel and Anne were allegedly told not to speak to anyone about the investigation and that if they did, they could be sued for defamation.[153] Rachel told us that she and Anne did not receive any counselling, support or check-ins during the process, which was particularly challenging for them because they lived in a small community where 'everyone seems to know everyone's business without actually knowing their business'.[154]

Rachel said that while she and her mother felt 'muzzled' during this time, Wayne allegedly put up petitions around the community asking people to support his reinstatement to his teaching role.[155] Rachel described the process as 'extremely slow and drawn out'.[156] Anne said: 'There was no one to help or advise me, I was not advised to contact the police or a lawyer. I felt isolated'.[157]

Rachel told us that she was scared and nervous speaking with the two male investigators the Department appointed to investigate her allegations.[158] She also told us that the interviews with investigators were 'gruelling'—that the questioning sometimes went for two hours, involved confronting questions and, on occasion, occurred without a support person of her choosing present.[159] Rachel said: 'I just felt like this little person with these men in suits hovering over the top of me'.[160]

Rachel also told us that she withheld some of her experiences with Wayne from the investigators. As an adult reflecting on this decision, Rachel stated: 'They did not make me feel that they would believe me'.[161] She explained that, at the time, she thought some aspects of her abuse were her fault and that she needed to protect Wayne from getting in trouble.[162] She spoke of crying in bed at night, asking herself 'Why me, why me, why can't I just tell them the truth?'[163]

During a later meeting with the Department, Rachel made more disclosures, including allegations that Wayne had kissed her and texted her that he loved her on a number of occasions, had shown her 'dirty jokes or videos' on his work computer and on at least one occasion had rubbed his hand up and down her leg and touched her crotch area over her clothing.[164] While telling investigators and her mother the extent of the alleged abuse, she said she 'had to sit on [her] hands because they would not stop shaking'.[165] Rachel told us that her mother was 'bawling her eyes out' as Rachel spoke.[166] She also told us that she was asked to demonstrate, to the adults in the room, how Wayne had touched her.[167] Other disclosures that Rachel made include allegations that Wayne:

- gave her alcohol
- would sometimes put a finger in her mouth and make her suck or would put her finger in his mouth and suck it
- gave her a letter at school saying he loved her and asking her to reply
- told her that once she left school and was 18 they could start dating
- told her to put her phone down her pants so that if she received text messages it would vibrate near her genitals.[168]

Rachel also made a statement to the Teachers Registration Board a few months after her later disclosures to the Department.[169]

Shortly after Rachel made these additional disclosures, the Department contacted the Child Protection Advice and Referral Service (as it was called then). The service informed the Department that once it formally received the allegations, it would notify police under the mandatory reporting protocol.[170] In mid-2007 the then Secretary of the Department was briefed on the additional disclosures and advised that:

- the allegations about the inappropriate computer material should not be pursued because it was difficult to establish, on the available evidence, whether the material was inappropriate (or the extent of its inappropriateness)[171]
- no other action should be taken in relation to the other allegations because the events took place outside school hours and outside school grounds, and that there were no witnesses and no more sources of evidence that could be pursued.[172]

In relation to the allegation that Wayne had given Rachel a tank top with an inappropriate message on it, the Department found that:

> [Wayne's] behaviour in this matter had the potential to adversely affect the integrity and good reputation of the State Service. However, given that the tank top has not been worn [by Rachel], it is not possible to establish a community view, regarding [Wayne's] actions bringing the State Service into disrepute, about a garment that has not been seen in public.
>
> Accordingly … [the Secretary was] unable to substantiate that a breach of part 14 of the State Services Act 2000 Code of Conduct has occurred.[173]

Rachel maintains that she did in fact wear the tank top with an inappropriate message on it and that the Department made a mistake in concluding that she did not.[174]

Most of Rachel's complaints were then formally referred to the Child Protection Advice and Referral Service, with a note from the Department that read in part: 'the department is not in a position to investigate the majority of these alleged incidents as they took place outside the school environment'.[175] Police notified the Department that they would not pursue the allegations.[176]

The then Secretary of the Department of Education sent Wayne a letter stating that 'all current [Department of Education] investigations are now concluded and I consider that these matters to be at an end and no formal sanction has been applied'.[177] The letter warned Wayne not to place himself in a position in the future where his 'conduct and behaviour towards students could be deemed to be inappropriate'.[178]

In 2007, a joint statement between Wayne and the Department was published in a local paper, which read: 'After an extensive investigation the Department of Education has determined that [Wayne] has not breached the State Service Act 2000 Code of Conduct'.[179]

Rachel described feeling 'hurt, confused, betrayed and neglected' by the Department, which had not communicated any outcome to her or given her any reasons for its decision.[180]

Around this time, Rachel reported the allegations of abuse to police.[181] After writing her statement by hand, as instructed by Tasmania Police officers, she was told that a possible charge against Wayne of 'assault with indecent intent' under the Police Offences Act 1935 ('Police Offences Act') had to have been reported within 12 months of the incident, which meant Wayne could not be charged or convicted of this offence.[182] The brief to the Secretary at the time stated that police had incorrectly advised the Department that the offence had a statute of limitation of two years.[183] Rachel said she felt extremely let down by the justice system and felt she was 'hit with a dead-end; no support and no closure'.[184]

In the same year, Wayne applied for renewal of his teaching registration with the Teachers Registration Board. In his application, Wayne declared that he had been the subject of an investigation.[185] The Board requested more information from Wayne, and from Anne and Rachel.[186] The Board also sought information from the Department about its investigations into Wayne's conduct. The Board was advised that all investigations had been concluded and that no breach of the State Service Code of Conduct had been found.[187] Despite this, the Board determined in 2008 that Wayne was not 'of good character' and refused to renew his registration.[188] Wayne sought to appeal the decision in the Magistrates Court, but his appeal was denied because it was not lodged within the relevant statutory time limit.[189]

In 2009, Wayne tried again to renew his registration. He provided a range of written references in support of his application.[190] Following advice from the Office of the Solicitor-General, the Board granted him registration for one year.[191] This came as a shock to Rachel, who reported receiving assurances from the Board that Wayne would never teach again.[192] She said she did not understand the various registration and renewal processes and what information Wayne had provided as part of those processes.[193] Rachel told us: 'I very much feel that, until this day, that we have been portrayed as liars'.[194]

3 Departmental review

Rachel's allegations were reinvestigated in 2021 as part of a broader review of historical complaints about current employees. As a result of this review, Wayne is the subject of a formal disciplinary investigation.[195]

Wayne's registration as a teacher was suspended in 2021, after his Registration to Work with Vulnerable People was cancelled.[196] Wayne then resigned from his position.[197] Department and Board investigations are ongoing.[198]

4 What we heard

When giving evidence at hearings, Rachel described her motivation for coming forward:

> I just don't want anyone to ever go through what I've gone through …[199]
>
> I want to advocate for those children that usually, that can't speak; I want to advocate for parents or caregivers that—I've seen what it's done to my mother. I've physically seen how it's just ripped her apart, how it's ripped me apart.[200]

Rachel went on to describe the impact of the abuse allegedly perpetrated on her, which includes nightmares, flashbacks and a diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder requiring medication to manage.[201] She refuses to place her children in a government school and described being overprotective and hypervigilant about her daughters' safety.[202] She has since left the community where she grew up (and where Anne still lives), saying 'I didn't want to stay there, and even today I'm so fearful of being in that community'.[203]

Anne told us that the impacts of Wayne's conduct and the response of the Department have also been ongoing for her:

> I am currently struggling with the stress and flood of emotions from [that time]. I struggle with trust issues and still feel ostracised by the staff that were at the school at the time of my complaint. The process is flawed and favours the perpetrator and protecting the Education Department's reputation.[204]

In response to requests for information about the handling of Wayne's matter, Secretary Bullard reviewed the Department's records, which caused him 'both personal and professional distress'.[205] He conceded a range of shortcomings in the Department's response, including the following:

- Certain allegations did not form part of a further investigation due to a limitation in the State Service Code of Conduct itself, rather than a shortcoming or failure of the Department, on the basis that they were 'not in the course of employment'.[206] However, the Department should have investigated Rachel's additional disclosures.[207] Secretary Bullard stated that the behaviour Rachel reported is 'entirely inappropriate of a teacher towards a student' regardless of whether it occurred in or outside the school environment.[208] He also stated that the Department's Conduct and Behaviour Standards were not referenced in any correspondence between the Department and Wayne. These standards provide that teachers should conduct themselves in a manner that does not bring the Department into disrepute, including outside school hours.[209]
- In relation to Rachel's initial disclosures, the question of whether she wore the offensive tank top was irrelevant to a determination of whether Wayne damaged the integrity and good reputation of the State Service. The gift of the item to Rachel (which he admitted) was grounds to consider that misconduct had occurred.[210]

- Wayne does not appear to have been advised about the additional disclosures Rachel reported.[211]
- Not all of Rachel's additional disclosures were investigated, but one that was —her allegation that Wayne had shown her inappropriate jokes or videos—was not investigated consistent with the relevant employment direction.[212] The allegation that Wayne gave a personal letter to Rachel at school appears to have been overlooked.[213] Secretary Bullard conceded that the failure to investigate all the matters disclosed by Rachel put other children and young people at risk.[214]
- The Department received more information about Wayne's conduct towards other young people, but there were no records to suggest that these allegations were investigated or provided to police.[215] One student made allegations about Wayne's conduct in relation to a former student and was ultimately forced to apologise to Wayne, at Wayne's insistence. Secretary Bullard described this as 'appalling' and as sending a signal to other young people that concerns were not worth raising.[216]

Secretary Bullard also acknowledged:

- Placing an advertisement in the local paper stating that all investigations into Wayne had been concluded was 'a significant failing' of the Department and 'horrifying' for Rachel.[217] It was also misleading, given Rachel's additional disclosures.[218]
- There was no evidence of support offered to Rachel and others involved in the matter.[219]
- The investigation took too long to be completed (more than two years).[220]
- The Department did not proactively notify the Teachers Registration Board of Rachel's complaints (the initial or later disclosures), which meant that the Board did not have knowledge of these matters until Wayne disclosed them when trying to renew his registration. Secretary Bullard conceded that Wayne's summary of the matter to the Board omitted details.[221]
- Correspondence from the Department in response to the Board's request for information when Wayne sought re-registration did not provide a 'proper, complete and accurate outline' of Rachel's disclosures—the Department only provided information about the limited matters that were investigated.[222] Secretary Bullard conceded that the Department, by omission, misled the Teachers Registration Board in this letter.[223]

Secretary Bullard said that if Rachel's complaint were made in 2022, it would be managed differently.[224] He told us that Wayne would be asked to leave the workplace pending a disciplinary investigation, appropriate notifications would be made to all relevant agencies, and the Secretary would make a determination about his conduct.[225]

Also, Rachel and Anne would have access to the school social worker and psychologist, and appropriate referrals would be made to support services, including sexual assault services.[226] There would also be a less restrictive interpretation of what constitutes 'in the course of employment' under the State Service Code of Conduct, to enable the Department to hold teachers to account for inappropriate conduct that occurs outside school hours, as evidenced by the investigation into Wayne.[227]

Reflecting on Rachel's discomfort with the male investigators who interviewed her, Secretary Bullard noted that there have been discussions in the Department about strategies to ensure an appropriate balance in the gender composition of investigators.[228]

Secretary Bullard went on to note that Workplace Relations now provides the Teachers Registration Board with a copy of the Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct letter sent to the employee and 'all relevant documentary evidence'.[229] The Board also receives the outcome of the Employment Direction No. 5 investigation as well as statements obtained during the investigation, where witnesses have given permission for these to be shared.[230]

Secretary Bullard recommended that, in the future, more wide-ranging language be used in the State Service Code of Conduct to directly capture conduct that 'arises from employment' or is 'connected to employment', such as teachers' conduct outside of school hours.[231] He told us the Department is adopting an expansive interpretation of these terms, which has not (yet) been tested by legal challenge.[232] We make recommendations for changes to the State Service Code of Conduct in Chapter 20.

5 Systemic issues

We agree with Secretary Bullard's reflections on the shortcomings of the Department's handling of Wayne's case. However, we express further shortcomings:

- The investigation process was not trauma-informed, child-centred or designed to elicit the best possible information and evidence to support the investigation. It failed to understand specific considerations that must be given to interviewing children and young people—including the need for shorter sessions, a safe and comfortable environment, the presence of trusted support people, and sensitive and appropriate questioning by an investigator that feels safe for the young person. It also failed to recognise that children and young people often disclose information in stages (as Rachel did) rather than all at once.
- Relevant policies and procedures were not followed, or referenced, in engagement with Wayne. Even at that time, policies required that teachers not bring the Department into disrepute outside the school environment.

Notifications to the Child Protection Advice and Referral Service were only made in response to Rachel's further disclosures, when arguably the Advice and Referral Service should have been notified immediately, ahead of the initial Employment Direction No.5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation.

- Rachel and Anne did not receive adequate support, care and communication throughout the investigation process. Assurances given to them (for example, that Wayne would not return to the school, or be able to be registered) were not implemented, which was highly upsetting and stressful for both.
- The approach to the investigation was overly technical and legalistic, which led to an unacceptable narrowing of the investigation and a failure to consider a pattern of behaviour that may amount to grooming. These failures meant that Rachel's disclosures were not investigated properly and potential risks to other children and young people were not identified and addressed. The Department appears to have been intimidated by Wayne's litigious and aggressive attitude towards the investigation and adopted an overly conservative approach to its own powers in response.
- The investigation took too long (notwithstanding the subsequent disclosures), which added to Rachel and Anne's distress, particularly given the upsetting dynamics the matter created in the small community in which they lived.
- The publication of the joint statement in the local paper in 2007 suggesting a comprehensive investigation into Wayne's conduct that effectively cleared him of any wrongdoing was appalling and cruel, particularly given the community context and that this was how Rachel and Anne discovered the outcome of the initial investigation.
- The letter from the Department to the Teachers Registration Board about Rachel's disclosures was misleading and inhibited the Board from properly executing its functions and responding to risks that Wayne may have posed to students. Overall, there was poor information sharing between the Department and the Board.
- That Wayne was re-registered (notwithstanding the substantial concerns held by the Board about his fitness to teach) following the Office of Solicitor-General's advice suggests that this advice failed to show adequate regard for child safety.
- Delays and failures by the Department and the school to report Rachel's allegations to child protection contributed to her allegations not being raised with police until after the statute of limitations had expired.
- There should not be a limitation period in the Police Offences Act in relation to offences connected to child sexual abuse. We note that this limitation period was removed in April 2023 through the Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act 2023.[233]

Case study 4: Katrina

Katrina Munting gave evidence at our hearings and shared her experience of being sexually abused while attending a state-run high school in Tasmania. Ms Munting enjoyed school; she was studious and wanted to be the first person from her family to go to university. However, Ms Munting told us that her life was drastically changed after being sexually abused by a teacher named Peter (a pseudonym) at her school.[234]

1 The incidents

Ms Munting was in year 9 in 1998 when she attended a school camp with Peter.[235] She recalls that Peter was very accommodating and that he engaged with the students in a friendly and familiar way. However, looking back (and with the benefit of her now considerable experience as a teacher herself), Ms Munting said that she now sees Peter's behaviour on this camp as being too familiar.[236] Peter had brought his dog to the camp, which allowed him to more readily initiate conversation with students and to be in close contact with them, particularly the female students:

> In break times, he would consistently be with groups of predominantly female students and engage in the students' personal conversations, rather than being with other staff … He would give … female students the job of 'watching' his dog. He was overly interested in the private lives of my peers and he was not concerned about how it would look for him to be having one-on-one conversations with students over the duration of the camp, which I observed him doing openly. In retrospect, I am concerned he was attempting to work out who would be an 'available' victim.[237]

A few months after camp, Ms Munting needed help with a school project. Although Peter was not her teacher at the time, he nevertheless volunteered to help. It was during this time that Peter's inappropriate behaviour towards Ms Munting escalated. As they worked together, he would 'accidentally' touch her. This progressed over time to his touching becoming 'more sexualised'.[238] Peter's change in behaviour was subtle and happened over time. It was not until Peter began to touch Ms Munting's breasts and buttocks that she realised it was 'definitely sexualised and not right'.[239] Despite this realisation, Ms Munting told us:

> I froze and allowed him to do as he will. As time progressed and the abuse became more intense, I increasingly realised how wrong it was; however, by then it was all too late to 'get out'.[240]

Later that same year, Peter singled Ms Munting out to go on another camp—one that was generally only attended by year 10 students. Peter's request was highly unusual and, had the invitation been made under different circumstances, Ms Munting told us that she would have been flattered.[241] However, given the ongoing abuse that was happening, she said she suspected Peter had ulterior motives for asking her to attend.[242] These misgivings proved correct, and Peter sexually abused Ms Munting during the camp.[243]

Peter continued to abuse Ms Munting during the school holidays between years 9 and 10. Ms Munting told us that he had her lie on the floor of his ute and drove her to his house where he sexually abused her.[244] Peter also became more intense verbally, telling Ms Munting that he loved her. He also often insisted she phone him (because if he called her, it would raise suspicion with Ms Munting's parents) and during these calls would insist she meet up with him.[245]

Ms Munting began year 10 in 1999 and the abuse continued. The frequency of the abuse was 'similar if not more frequent' during that period, and the amount of time that Ms Munting was spending with Peter had not gone unnoticed.[246] Halfway through term 2, one of Ms Munting's teachers (a senior teacher at the school) allegedly took her aside while she was in the library with her classmates and told her that it was not normal for her to be spending so much time with Peter. Ms Munting was mortified.[247] She told us that she:

> … ran from the room in tears and cried my eyes out in the toilets. I thought that the floodgates of hell were about to open. I thought that I would be in trouble from Peter, my parents and the school.[248]

Ms Munting also told us that she feared that 'her world was about to end', that all her goals and hopes for her future—her perception of what her life was going to be—had 'been shattered' because someone knew about what had been happening.[249] However, some time went by and despite her fears she did not get in trouble—in fact, nothing happened at all. Ms Munting said that her parents were not told and there was no follow-up by the school.[250]

When asked to reflect on how this senior teacher had allegedly communicated with her about Peter, Ms Munting replied that the conversation should not have taken place during class time and in the presence of her peers. Also, the teacher should have known that the nature of the conversation required that support be on hand during and after the conversation. Instead, no teachers came to find her or checked to see if she was okay. Ms Munting pointed out that the teacher who had confronted her clearly had suspicions about Peter and yet did nothing about them, other than to direct a veiled accusation at her:

> In hindsight those words, they haunt me: 'It has been noticed that you and Peter are spending time together or too much time together and that is not normal'. To say those words to a student and then do nothing to make it stop.
>
> Why wasn't Peter the one having that conversation? Why was he not getting in trouble? I was getting in trouble for what I was trapped in, and then for that to not have any follow-up was devastating … they had mortified me by what they had said, but what's even worse is, they hadn't acknowledged what they thought was going on and they did not make it stop. The abuse continued, he did not desist. I was the one that was expected to make it stop, I was the one that made it stop.[251]

Ms Munting said that sometime later she was told Peter had also been approached and told to 'watch himself':

> … that was it. Not that his actions were inappropriate, [or] what he was doing was criminal: 'Watch yourself'. In other words, 'Keep doing it, just do it better so no-one notices, will you?' Like, that's how I read that, 'Watch yourself'. How pathetic.[252]

The conversation with the senior teacher deeply frightened Ms Munting. She began to make excuses whenever Peter summoned her and tried to avoid being in places where he could abuse her. The abuse became less frequent and eventually, despite still being afraid of Peter, she stopped responding to him at all.[253] Ms Munting told us that a part of her thought that once suspicions had been raised, the abuse would stop. However, this was not the case. Ms Munting told us that she was 'devastated' that nothing was done: 'I had to make it stop and that was excruciating trying to work out how do you do that, how do you make something stop? It's essentially an ingrained pattern of power'.[254]

In response to her avoiding him, Ms Munting said that Peter began to leave notes for her in her locker insisting that she continue to meet with him, that he had to see her, and that he loved her. Ms Munting destroyed these letters.[255] Ms Munting told us that eventually Peter's behaviour towards her turned to disdain. She recalls that he would pass her in the hallway and, if no one was close by, he would mutter things like 'bitch' at her.[256]

Later in year 10, the school placed Ms Munting in Peter's class.[257] Three times a week that term, Ms Munting had to sit in class with her abuser for an hour. Ms Munting said she was 'deeply scared about what had happened, and ashamed'.[258] She tried to put it all behind her and focus on her studies.[259]

2 The disclosure

Ms Munting found she could not bury what had happened to her, so in 2000, she disclosed some of the abuse to her boyfriend. Ms Munting's boyfriend and his father then confronted the school.[260] The school principal took the complaint seriously, and Peter resigned from his position soon after.[261] Ms Munting was allegedly told that Peter would never teach again.[262] However, Ms Munting recalls that the school did not contact Ms Munting's parents about the abuse at any time. Nor did the school inform her about any investigation into Peter's behaviour. Ms Munting did not receive any support or counselling from the school. As far as Ms Munting is aware, police were never contacted.[263]

Ms Munting's mental health suffered over the years, and she eventually decided that, to progress in her healing process, she needed to report her abuse to police. With the encouragement and support of a friend who was a police officer, Ms Munting made a formal statement to police. This was a difficult process, and Ms Munting recalled that the detective 'demonstrated belief in all I had to say in my interview. The second detective in the room was a female; this helped'.[264] She told us that it was empowering to be 'heard and believed'.[265]

Peter was charged and eventually pleaded guilty to some of the charges, but he disputed various facts.[266] This meant that Ms Munting was subjected to 'cross examination as part of a "disputed facts hearing"' process that was 'harrowing and mortifying'. She told us that Peter sat close by and made 'dismissive noises and gestures while [she] was … being questioned by the Crown and the defence'.[267] The case was emotionally draining and psychologically painful for Ms Munting, and while she told us that she was well looked after by the Crown Prosecutor and witness support staff, overall, her experience of the criminal justice system was 'devastating'.[268]

Peter was sentenced to three years' imprisonment.[269]

While criminal proceedings were important to Ms Munting, she told us that she also wanted the Department of Education to admit its wrongdoing and to be held accountable.[270] A year after giving her statement to police, Ms Munting began writing to the Minister for Education requesting to speak with him so she could share her story. Each week for 16 weeks, Ms Munting wrote a unique letter to the Minister requesting an audience. She recalled receiving two or three replies—all declining her requests.[271] After the 16th week, she told us she received a reply that was different in nature and a meeting was arranged with the Deputy Secretary of the Department. Ms Munting told us that this was a good discussion and that the Deputy Secretary listened and apologised to her, though she thought that the Secretary should have attended the meeting. She believed she had been palmed off to the Deputy Secretary to shut her up.[272]

Ms Munting said that an apology from the Minister for Education would be 'exceptionally important'.[273] She told us that any such apology needs to be:

> … more than just that they're sorry that I was abused in their institution, you know, they need to be sorry that I was abused in their institution and they chose to ignore it, and they chose not to follow it up, and they chose to ignore me, and … they need to name up exactly what it is that they're sorry for, because I don't want a hollow 'I'm sorry'. What are you sorry for? Because, not only have I been devastated by the abuse, the fallout that I've had to deal with since has made it so much worse.[274]

3 The response

When asked about Ms Munting's and other witnesses' evidence to our Commission of Inquiry, Secretary Bullard apologised for the past failings of the Department and acknowledged the 'lasting, ongoing and negative impact that that has had on victims and survivors'.[275] He also acknowledged the Department's failure to help victim-survivors to recover and heal.

When asked specifically about Ms Munting's evidence in relation to what an apology should mean, Secretary Bullard said that the significance of the apology to Ms Munting was:

> … the Department's recognition of the harm that it's caused … the significance is to each and every person that receives that; they will make a determination about how important or not, how much validity or not they provide to that; all I can do is lead with my heart and provide that apology.[276]

In his statement to our Commission of Inquiry, Secretary Bullard also acknowledged the difficulties that could result from the Department's lack of communication with complainants.[277] Secretary Bullard apologised for the Department's past failings.[278]

Case study 5: 'Jeremy'

This case study about Jeremy (a pseudonym), a teacher, is based on information the Department provided in relation to its recent responses to child sexual abuse matters.[279]

1 The alleged incidents and response

Jeremy was employed by the Department of Education as a teacher until 2022.[280]

In 2012, several students at the same school made allegations about Jeremy's conduct.[281] These included allegations that he failed to maintain appropriate boundaries and that he was making inappropriate comments to them that were of a sexual nature.[282]

Departmental records show that, on becoming aware of the allegations, the assistant principal of the school met with each of the students separately to obtain information relevant to their complaints and had conversations with the students' parents.[283] Departmental records also show that the principal and assistant principal met with Jeremy to discuss the allegations, and that Jeremy admitted his behaviour 'was a bit loose' but 'not inappropriate' in the context of conversations with the students.[284] The principal's notes state that, in response, they told Jeremy that any 'conversation [with students] must be totally non-personal and not involve [a] sexual view of any nature. Not even [the] use [of the] word sex'.[285]

The assistant principal then sent an email to Jeremy outlining the actions that the school had taken in response to the allegations, including that the students involved had been moved out of Jeremy's class.[286]

With the assistance of the human resources team, the principal drafted a letter to the students' parents informing them that Jeremy had been spoken to about his unprofessional and inappropriate behaviour and had been made aware of his obligations under the State Service Code of Conduct.[287] Learning Services also sent a letter to Jeremy, confirming that his behaviour was inappropriate, and that Jeremy recognised that his behaviour was unacceptable. The letter served as 'a formal warning'.[288]

Four years later, in 2016, another student made allegations against Jeremy. This student said that Jeremy had allegedly taken her into a small storeroom that had an automatic lock and sexually abused her.[289] The student alleged that Jeremy had told her that she must not tell anyone what had happened, or he would go to jail and would have to kill himself. Later, Jeremy asked the student if she had enjoyed 'the lesson'.[290] These allegations were reported to police by someone external to the school.[291]

The school principal informed Learning Services of the allegations, advising that the 'student had had a few other instances with this teacher where his actions had been suspicious, [and] noting there was "enough to warrant extreme concern"'.[292]

Human Resources, and then the Department's Conduct and Investigations Unit, were informed of the allegations on the same day.[293]

The following morning Jeremy was sent home from work and, shortly after, the Department suspended him with pay.[294] The Department then initiated an investigation, in line with Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct, into whether Jeremy had breached the State Service Code of Conduct.[295] School staff were told that Jeremy was on leave.[296]

Departmental records show that the principal also notified the Child Protection Advice and Referral Service (as it was then known) and that two days after the school was made aware of the allegations the student made a statement to police.[297] Learning Services spoke with the student's mother to confirm that the allegations would be investigated, and a human resources team member met with the student and her family shortly after.[298]

The Department also notified the Teachers Registration Board of the allegations, and the Board suspended Jeremy's registration.[299] Jeremy appealed the decision to suspend his registration to the Magistrates Court, which ultimately ordered that the suspension be set aside pending the outcome of the Teachers Registration Board investigation.[300] The Court also directed that a condition be imposed on Jeremy's registration that he 'not seek or accept employment as a teacher within any Tasmanian School or TasTAFE pending the outcome of an enquiry'.[301] Ann Moxham, Registrar, Teachers Registration Board, described the Court's order as 'contrary to the function of the [Board]'.[302]

Soon after, the same student disclosed that there had been other incidents where Jeremy had behaved inappropriately towards her. One such incident occurred in 2015 when Jeremy allegedly hit her on the bottom with a badminton racquet.[303] The Department reported this allegation to police in August 2016.[304] Another incident, also alleged to have occurred in 2015, involved a teacher who had witnessed inappropriate behaviour by Jeremy towards the student, namely that Jeremy had placed his hand on the student's thigh.[305] The teacher had reported this alleged incident to the principal on the same day, but no other action was taken at the time.[306]

In late 2016, police charged Jeremy with two counts of indecent assault.[307]

Jeremy's teacher registration expired in mid-2016 (he had reached the end of his five-year registration cycle) and so he had to apply for a renewal.[308] In 2017, Jeremy's application for a renewal was refused on the basis that he was not registered to work with vulnerable people.[309]

The Teachers Registration Act 2000 had been amended in 2017 to require that a person seeking to register as a teacher must first be registered under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 ('Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act').[310] When Jeremy applied to be registered to work with vulnerable people in late 2016, a decision on his application was deferred, on the grounds that the outcome of the charges against him was likely to be relevant to deciding whether to grant him registration.[311] However, the Registrar decided not to grant Jeremy Registration to Work with Vulnerable People ahead of any legal outcome.[312] Jeremy appealed against this decision. His appeal was unsuccessful and so the Department stopped paying him in mid-2017.[313] However, the Magistrates Court stayed this decision (although it is not clear what effect this had on Jeremy's pay).[314]

In 2019, the Supreme Court acquitted Jeremy of indecent assault. He was then granted registration under the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act.[315]

In 2020, Jeremy applied to the Teachers Registration Board to have his registration as a teacher reinstated. The Board determined, however, that based on advice from the Office of the Solicitor-General, Jeremy would need to apply to become registered. Jeremy applied for registration in late 2020.[316] The Board has not registered Jeremy and is, at the time of writing, awaiting the outcome of an investigation to determine if he is of good character and fit to teach.[317] The Department lifted his suspension in the same year, on the basis that he could not teach because he did not hold current registration.[318]

2 Departmental review

The Department identified Jeremy's case as part of its review into the management of 'historical' child sexual misconduct allegations involving current employees.

There are few departmental records in relation to the 2012 allegations against Jeremy because the school handled these allegations internally and so they were not referred to the Secretary. Secretary Bullard told us that the 2012 allegations were 'reinvestigated' in 2021, in line with contemporary departmental procedures.[319]

In respect of the 2016 allegations, Secretary Bullard told us the Department had informed Jeremy that he would be subject to an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation, but this was 'put on hold' pending the charges against Jeremy and another police investigation into the matter.[320] Jeremy's trial concluded in 2019. The Department initiated its investigation in 2020.[321]

In mid-2021, the Department began another Employment Direction No. 5 investigation into the allegations made against Jeremy in 2012 and 2015.[322] After providing Jeremy the opportunity to show cause as to why his employment should not be terminated, Secretary Bullard terminated Jeremy's employment in early 2022.[323] Jeremy appealed this decision to the Tasmanian Industrial Commission.[324] At the time of writing, the appeal was ongoing.

Secretary Bullard stated that between the time Jeremy was asked to leave the school in 2016 and his termination in 2022, he did not return to 'his employment'.[325]

3 What we heard

Secretary Bullard conceded that there were shortcomings in the school's and the Department's responses to complaints about Jeremy. He told us that in relation to the allegations made by several students in 2012:

- Learning Services found no evidence that the Department supported the students after complaining about Jeremy's behaviour.[326]
- The principal of the school in question and/or Learning Services did not inform the Conduct and Investigations Unit about the allegations, nor was the Unit informed of the outcome of any investigation. This meant that a notification was not made to the Teachers Registration Board in respect of those allegations.[327]
- Notifications were not made to the Child Protection Advice and Referral Service, Tasmania Police or the Integrity Commission at the time.[328]
- A copy of the State Service Code of Conduct was sent to Jeremy, but the Department's Conduct and Behaviour Standards policy was not brought to his attention.[329]
- There are no records of the school communicating with the students involved other than the initial meeting between the principal and each of the students, and a letter sent from the principal to the students' parents.[330]

In respect of the allegations about Jeremy's conduct in 2015, Secretary Bullard advised that there were no departmental records of these allegations.[331] The principal was not asked to document the event in which a teacher allegedly witnessed Jeremy put his hand on the student's thigh, nor did the principal report it to the Department.[332] These allegations only came to light during Jeremy's trial in 2019.[333] Further:

- There were no records to show whether the student who made the complaint was given any support: '[t]o date, no records have been identified by Learning Services that indicate that a school teacher, social worker/psychologist offered and/or provided support to [the student] following her disclosure'.[334]
- As with the 2012 complaints, the school did not notify the Conduct and Investigations Unit, police or the Child Protection Advice and Referral Service, nor are there any records of communications between the school and the student or her family.[335]

Secretary Bullard stated that the school's responses to the 2012 and 2015 allegations did not comply with departmental policies and procedures that were in place at the time.[336]

While the school and the Department's responses to the allegations made against Jeremy in 2016 were an improvement on the handling of earlier allegations, there were still aspects that did not comply with departmental policies. As Secretary Bullard noted:

- There was no immediate report made to the Child Protection Advice and Referral Service in line with the Mandatory Reporting Procedure.[337]
- According to departmental policy, the student should have been referred to a staff member with specialised skills, and a plan developed to support the student.[338] There is no evidence that this occurred or that the student had access to the school social worker.[339]
- There are limited records of communication with the student (and her family) about the allegations, and there are no records of communications with other students or staff at the school.[340]
- The Integrity Commission was not notified about the allegations at the time.[341]
- There are no records of communication with the student or staff at the school regarding the 2016 allegations.[342]

4 What happened since and what needs to change

The information provided to us about Jeremy's case reveals several systemic and case-specific issues:

- Students' complaints were not adequately scrutinised.
- Not enough consideration was given to the risks posed to any child by a teacher who breached professional boundaries in a sexual manner with a child.
- Children were interviewed by personnel not trained in child interviewing techniques and child sexual abuse.
- The principal had too much discretion in deciding when to escalate concerns to the Department.
- Incidents were not appropriately reported to the Department of Education.
- Record keeping in relation to the complaints was poor.
- Communication between different units in the Department, and between the Department and other regulatory bodies such as the Teachers Registration Board, was poor.
- There was no communication (or communication was inadequate) with students, staff and the school community.
- Policies and procedures were not complied with.

- There was no support offered to students after their disclosures (or it was inadequate).
- There were unacceptable delays in disciplinary processes.

Secretary Bullard told us that the Department's responses to allegations such as those made against Jeremy in 2012 (and to an extent in 2015 and 2016) could be characterised as a 'mosaic of approaches'.[343] Secretary Bullard described this to us as:

> … let's make some decisions around how we might deal with this, is a conversation from a principal or a senior leader enough, do we need to go to Learning Services, Human Resources, or do I need to escalate it? So … there's a judgment made on the ground about the seriousness or otherwise, and as [was] quite rightly pointed out, until such matters are investigated, how are you going to know?[344]

Secretary Bullard also noted that in 2012 there was no protocol in place requiring that such matters be brought to the attention of Workplace Relations.

We heard that the current process for handling such allegations is very different:

> … every allegation that is raised must be referred to Workplace Relations and Workplace Relations must refer it to me [the Secretary]. Every allegation that is raised must be referred to the Teachers Registration Board, the Working with Vulnerable People Check and the Integrity Commission, and Teachers Registration Board where it relates to a teacher, and that is the process that sits in place now.[345]

Secretary Bullard elaborated that a 'best practice response' now involves a Senior Workplace Relations Consultant being briefed about the alleged conduct and discussing the matter with the Manager of Workplace Relations and the Assistant Director of Industrial Relations.[346] An assessment is then made 'as to the nature and seriousness of the allegations'.[347] There is no specific policy guiding this assessment, but the nature and seriousness of the conduct as well as whether the conduct is isolated or part of a pattern of behaviour will form part of the assessment.[348]

If the matter does not involve an allegation of child sexual abuse or inappropriate physical contact, the matter 'may be handled locally in consultation between the Principal and Learning Services, without a referral to the Secretary'.[349] If the matter is assessed as being 'more serious', the Secretary will be briefed by Workplace Relations on whether an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation should be initiated. If the matter involves an allegation of a sexual nature, the Secretary will be briefed regardless of the outcome of the assessment.[350] Where child sexual abuse is suspected, 'the employee is asked to immediately leave the workplace and await correspondence from the Secretary, pending any determination'.[351] Notifications are then made to police, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Teachers Registration Board if appropriate.[352]

We are pleased that the Department has made improvements in responding to allegations of child sexual abuse, however there are aspects of the Department's current response that continue to raise concerns. For example, the seriousness of allegations that do not involve child sexual abuse is assessed by Workplace Relations and Industrial Relations, apparently in the absence of any specific policy or criteria or subject matter expertise. In such cases, it may be that allegations against departmental staff, such as those made against Jeremy in 2012, are still resolved locally by the school principal and Learning Services. This means that it is possible that allegations that relate to behaviours associated with grooming or precursor conduct may not be brought to the attention of the Department or the Secretary. We have observed a theme across Tasmanian Government services of failure to identify professional boundary breaches as potential grooming behaviours. We note that, despite Secretary Bullard's assurance that he would be notified of all concerns about child sexual abuse including grooming and precursor conduct, it may be that some behaviours are not recognised and reported as such by school staff, or are not assessed as such by Workplace Relations.[353] Secretary Bullard conceded that some behaviours are 'nuanced' and that the Department needed to 'absolutely invest in training [the Department's] workforce to understand something that may or may not constitute a matter of concern'.[354]

In terms of the delay in starting the Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation into the 2016 allegations about Jeremy's conduct, Secretary Bullard stated that he was:

> … acutely aware of the tension that currently exists between undertaking an [Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct] investigation in a timely manner, in order to minimise distress to the child or young person who has made the allegation and also the employee being investigated, and the requirement not to jeopardise a police investigation and/or criminal proceedings.[355]

However, this does not adequately explain the time taken between the conclusion of Jeremy's trial in 2019 and resuming the Employment Direction No. 5 investigation in 2020. Secretary Bullard conceded that the delay in reactivating the investigation was 'not acceptable', but said that:[356]

> Workplace Relations … advised that the investigation did not recommence immediately upon the acquittal of [Jeremy] due to a general review of the matter, and meetings to determine the process and a pathway forward, including ongoing discussions about whether an [Employment Direction No.5—Breach of Code of Conduct] should be commenced or ceased.[357]

Secretary Bullard also told us that a complainant is not informed of the outcome of an Employment Direction No. 5 investigation because this is prohibited under legislation.[358] He agreed that not communicating the outcome of an investigation to a complainant was of 'significant concern'.[359] He told us that he had 'asked the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People to consider [the Department's] approach to these and other similar matters, where victims/survivors seek an outcome'.[360]

Secretary Bullard welcomed 'any thoughts the Commission might be able to share in relation to the Department's future approach to similar complaints and Employment Direction No. 5 investigations from the perspective of the complainant'.[361] We discuss approaches to Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations, including communication with complainants, in Chapter 20.

Case study 6: 'Brad'

This case study about Brad (a pseudonym), a relief teacher, is based on information the Department provided in relation to its recent responses to child sexual abuse matters.[362]

1 The alleged incidents

Brad was a teacher who worked in New South Wales for several years in the early 2000s. During this time, a number of allegations of sexualised and inappropriate conduct towards students were made against him.[363] Brad always denied wrongdoing, but the New South Wales Department of Education ultimately determined that he posed a 'medium risk of sexual and physical abuse towards students'.[364] As a result of this determination, Brad was formally monitored but allowed to keep teaching.[365] After ongoing concerns about Brad's behaviour, he was directed to undertake an improvement program, which he did not complete because he resigned from his position.[366]

In 2015, Brad moved to Tasmania and applied for registration with the Teachers Registration Board, intending to work as a casual teacher.[367] In his application for registration, Brad did not disclose that complaints had been made about him in New South Wales around a decade before.[368] Brad should have declared these complaints when he applied for registration (and a renewal of his registration) from the Tasmanian Board.[369]

Brad was registered as a teacher in Tasmania and multiple schools employed him for relief work.[370]

2 The initial response

In late December 2019, Principal A (a pseudonym) held concerns about Brad's alleged inappropriate comments to and physical contact with students.[371] Principal A informally contacted principals at other schools where Brad had been employed. Two other principals told Principal A that they also had concerns about Brad's behaviour when he had worked at their schools.[372] Principal A then advised Learning Services at the Department of Education of their concerns, as well as the concerns relayed to them by other principals. This was the first time Brad came to the Department's attention.[373]

The next day, a Senior Human Resources Coordinator from Learning Services contacted Brad. Because Learning Services had assessed the alleged behaviour reported by Principal A as 'at the lower level of seriousness', it deemed that a meeting with Brad was an appropriate response.[374] At the meeting with Learning Services, Brad was taken through his obligations under the relevant guidance material on professional conduct and standards.[375] Learning Services did not notify Workplace Relations or Legal Services about the information received from Principal A, and was apparently unaware of its ability to have Brad removed from the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register. Removal from the Register would have barred Brad's employment as a relief teacher by other government schools.[376]

The meeting with Brad to discuss his conduct and professional obligations occurred in early 2020.[377] Following this meeting, Learning Services maintained some concerns about Brad and sought more information from payroll about which schools Brad had previously worked at as a relief teacher.[378] Learning Services also spoke to all schools where Brad was subsequently placed, and monitored his behaviour.[379] Learning Services remained unaware of its ability to remove Brad from the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register.[380]

Brad continued to be the subject of allegations of inappropriate conduct.[381] A few months after Brad's meeting with Learning Services, Principal B (a pseudonym) contacted Learning Services after a student reported that Brad had allegedly sneaked up on her and touched her shoulders.[382] Principal B requested that Learning Services seek more information about Brad from other schools.[383] Immediately after the student's report, Principal B removed Brad from the classroom and instructed him that he would not work at the school again. Principal B also directed Brad to apologise to the student for his conduct.[384]

Learning Services added the information received from Principal B to the information already on record from Principal A and passed this information to the Teachers Registration Board in mid-2020.[385] Workplace Relations and Legal Services remained unaware of any concerns about Brad.[386]

Having been advised of concerns about Brad, the Teachers Registration Board made enquiries with the Department, including Legal Services, about Brad's conduct.[387] The Teachers Registration Board told Legal Services it had received information that Brad had inappropriately touched female students and that it would investigate the allegations.[388] The Department did not make notifications to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme or police on the basis that 'the concerns raised had not been particularised in enough detail to be considered allegations of child sexual abuse'.[389]

Later in 2020, a student at another school reported to a teacher that Brad had allegedly tapped her on the backside, held her hands, touched her shoulders and told her she was beautiful.[390] Principal C (a pseudonym) reported the alleged conduct to Learning Services and was told that Learning Services was aware of a history of similar behaviour.[391] Principal C forwarded their concern to the Teachers Registration Board and contacted Legal Services in the Department.[392]

The report from Principal C triggered a range of notifications.[393] The Board confirmed it would consider an emergency suspension of Brad's registration and would report Principal C's information to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme. Legal Services advised the Teachers Registration Board that the matter had been reported to police.[394] At this time, Workplace Relations removed Brad from the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register.[395]

Shortly after, in October, the Board notified the Department that it had suspended Brad's registration with immediate effect.[396] It also recommended that an inquiry into Brad's behaviour be undertaken to determine whether he was of good character and fit to teach, and that Brad be required to undergo a psychiatric or psychological examination.[397] During this period, Principal C also reported their concerns about Brad to the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line.[398]

Not long after this, the Advice and Referral Line got several reports from community members about Brad's complaints history in New South Wales and current complaints from Tasmanian schools.[399] As a result, staff at the then Department of Communities sought records and information from New South Wales and information from the Teachers Registration Board to inform their risk assessment.[400]

At the end of 2020, Brad's (suspended) registration lapsed when he failed to make a payment.[401]

In early 2021, the Department of Communities provided the Department of Education with a timeline of Brad's conduct.[402] In addition to the concerns of Principals A, B and C, this timeline included more details about complaints and concerns involving Brad.[403]

The Department of Communities timeline revealed that in 2018, when Brad was teaching at a primary school, he had also allegedly engaged in inappropriate conduct while teaching (which was not overtly sexual in nature). It was also reported that Brad had allegedly made other staff uncomfortable by standing too close to them.[404]

Throughout 2020, another primary school raised concerns about Brad, including that he was allegedly overly friendly with female students and had touched their shoulders and hands. Brad was repeatedly warned to keep his distance from students but continued to teach at the primary school for several months.[405]

Later that year, a different primary school received a complaint from a parent that Brad was allegedly physically touching students (holding their hands and putting his arms around them) and staring at female students. When the school followed up this complaint with Brad's class, students reported more concerns, including that Brad had allegedly been 'checking out' female students, threatening male students with violence (saying 'your head is going into my fist') and using his mobile phone in a way that made students worry that they were being filmed.[406]

Around this time, a senior manager at the Department asked a colleague at the Department of Communities whether their more extensive information about Brad had been provided to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme. The colleague responded:

> [The Child Safety Service] practice is we inform [Tasmania] Police when we are investigating matters where a person of concern relating to sexual abuse has direct contact with children. [Tasmania] Police would inform Registrar. This makes the lines of communication clear. [The Child Safety Service] responds to children, [Tasmania Police] responds to offenders. It would get very murky otherwise … We shall use this as a case study though to test the current systems in place and consider if there are any weaknesses in the current system.[407]

Secretary Bullard noted that while some of the other matters in the Department of Communities timeline were known to the Department, this timeline 'provides a far more extensive context'.[408]

The Department of Communities told the Department of Education it had notified the Child Safety Service and that it had provided its timeline to the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme.[409] It also advised that the matter was the subject of a police investigation.[410]

The Teachers Registration Board began its formal inquiry into Brad's conduct in early 2021.[411] The Board ultimately determined that Brad was not of good character and was not fit to teach.[412] This outcome was communicated to all relevant authorities, including interstate and New Zealand teacher registration authorities.[413]

Secretary Bullard noted that the Department is unaware of what support or communication may have been delivered to any affected students and their families or staff in relation to Brad's behaviour at one of the schools because the need for such supports would have been assessed at the school level.[414]

3 Departmental review

Brad's case was one of the 'historical' matters the Department reviewed in 2021. Secretary Bullard was then briefed on the extra information discovered in the Department of Communities timeline. Workplace Relations advised Secretary Bullard that there were no other steps to be taken because Brad was not an employee, had already been removed from the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register and was not registered with the Teachers Registration Board.[415]

In mid-2021, Secretary Bullard advised Brad of the allegations against him and sought a response from him. Secretary Bullard noted that because Brad was not a current employee, the Department could not pursue a formal investigation; however, Brad's future employment with the Department would depend on the outcome of an investigation.[416] Around this time the Teachers Registration Board notified Secretary Bullard of its findings in relation to Brad.[417]

4 What we heard

Secretary Bullard conceded that Brad's case highlighted the problem of limited information sharing—between Tasmania and other states and territories, between government departments in Tasmania, and within the Department itself.[418]

4.1 Information sharing

This case study highlights the way a lack of coordinated information sharing can allow complaints about a teacher's conduct to go unaddressed:

- The Teachers Registration Board was unaware of a history of allegations of concerning behaviour when it granted Brad's registration. Relying on Brad to disclose this history is a system weakness, given people in his position may well have a strong incentive to not disclose matters (particularly if they were managed relatively informally).
- The Department's screening process failed to pick up the concerning history of allegations against Brad in New South Wales. It is unclear what screening processes were used and whether any referee checks were undertaken. The fact that Brad had not been teaching for some time could have invited more scrutiny and checks into Brad's work history.
- Some principals who held concerns about Brad's alleged behaviour did not proactively report their concerns to the Department, perhaps opting to simply not re-engage Brad as a relief teacher. This meant that conduct suggesting a pattern of behaviour was not identified.
- Learning Services did not communicate the concerns about Brad to other areas of the Department—most critically, Workplace Relations—which meant that Brad was not removed from the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register at the earliest opportunity. The failure to communicate also meant that appropriate notifications were delayed and that Workplace Relations and Legal Services were ill-equipped to respond to later queries from the Teachers Registration Board.
- The Teachers Registration Board and the Department were not responding to the same information during the investigation into Brad—each communicated with the other in vague terms about 'concerns'. Secretary Bullard only received the Board's findings (and related information) about Brad after finalising the Department's investigation. Although Brad was no longer working for the Department (and therefore not an active risk to students) there may be circumstances where the Department will need information from the Board throughout its investigation to manage any risks to students. Also, the Department is only obliged to notify the Board about disciplinary matters it is pursuing in relation to 'employees', which means that the conduct of relief or casual teachers may remain unknown to the Board.

- Relevant parties were unclear whether information had been shared with other authorities, in particular police and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, and if information had been shared, what information and when. This required manually checking and double-checking sources and records, which increased the risk of important information being missed or not passed on.

When giving evidence at hearings, Secretary Bullard acknowledged that information sharing is critical for regulators and decision makers to identify patterns of behaviour:

> So, absolutely accept here that the fact that you have a person working in multiple schools displaying behaviour which I would argue on some of that behaviour should have been escalated, but on other behaviour you'd think, well, that's a one-off and a bit odd but, you know, not going to report; it's only when you see that accumulated as a set of evidence that you are alerted, very alerted, to the fact that there is an issue that needs to be dealt with.[419]

He added that the information-sharing provisions are confusing and complex, which might inhibit the ability of regulators to respond more quickly to risks.[420]

Secretary Bullard noted that New South Wales is leading a scoping project on national information sharing for teacher registration, alongside all state and territory education departments and teacher registration authorities. This includes providing advice on the scope of information sharing that will be necessary to support automatic mutual recognition of registration for teachers moving between states and territories.[421]

Secretary Bullard used Brad's situation to reflect on some of the key considerations for this work. For example, if information sharing is limited to formal disciplinary sanctions, then concerns about Brad could not be shared—in this case, the sanctions were not imposed because Brad resigned.[422] However, he noted that the sharing of 'granular details' between interstate agencies raises procedural fairness issues for employees.[423] He also shared his concerns that national mutual recognition reforms allow teachers registered in other jurisdictions to work in Tasmania without the knowledge or approval of the Teachers Registration Board.[424] Ann Moxham, Registrar, Teachers Registration Board, echoed Secretary Bullard's concerns about automatic mutual recognition, noting that it limits the ability of the Teachers Registration Board to carry out its good character and fitness to teach assessments, which are 'much broader' than the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People requirements.[425]

In relation to information sharing between the Department and the Teachers Registration Board, Secretary Bullard pointed to general prohibitions contained in the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 ('Personal Information Protection Act') that restrict the Department's ability to share information gleaned through an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct process with other agencies, including the Board.[426] He noted that this restriction applies to information such as letters to employees describing alleged breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct, witness statements, investigation reports and the Secretary's determination, unless individuals provide consent for their information to be disclosed.[427] Secretary Bullard also noted that the limited exceptions to this general prohibition likely only apply to criminal conduct or 'seriously improper conduct' and may not be enough to permit information sharing about conduct that does not meet the threshold of these categorisations.[428] He highlighted that the Personal Information Protection Act also creates barriers for information sharing between the Department and non-government schools.[429]

Ms Moxham told us that, on the advice of the Office of the Solicitor-General, the Department is precluded from providing its investigation materials to the Board. This means that the Board has to undertake its own investigation, which can lead to reinterviewing (and retraumatising) affected children.[430] Ms Moxham shared her belief as Registrar of the Teachers Registration Board that, contrary to this advice, the legislation does in fact permit such information sharing between the Department and the Board.[431] We discuss the issue of information sharing between the Department and the Teachers Registration Board in Chapter 6.

Ms Moxham noted that the Board has a range of powers to share information with other regulatory bodies in Australia and with employers, complying with different sections of the governing legislation.[432] She also noted that assessing the suitability of teachers arriving from New South Wales was particularly challenging because the accrediting body there does not conduct enquiries or disciplinary processes. When assessing an application for registration from a teacher who has come from New South Wales, the Teachers Registration Board must therefore ask that teacher's permission to seek information about them from the New South Wales Department of Education.[433]

Ms Moxham told us that the information flow between the Board and Tasmanian agencies such as the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and Children, Youth and Family Services is often one-way—when the Board provides information it does not 'get anything back'.[434] She stated, for example, that when the Registrar removes a Registration to Work with Vulnerable People, it will advise the Board of the removal but not the reasons why.[435] She also stated that Children, Youth and Family Services do not provide the Board with information, such as if a report is made to them about a teacher's parenting capacity, unless the teacher had declared the information when either registering or renewing their registration (which occurs every five years).[436] Ms Moxham also described the relatively informal ways in which the Board may become aware of important information about relief teachers—for example, via phone calls from Learning Services.[437]

Following an exchange in public hearings with Counsel Assisting, Ms Moxham was asked 'are there additional barriers to knowing where relief teachers are and how long they are teaching in a particular place?' She replied, '[i]t's 'almost impossible. It's pretty scary, isn't it?'[438]

Ms Moxham noted that, as far as she is aware, there are no reforms in progress to remedy the lack of visibility over where relief teachers are working, except in limited circumstances.[439] She described a current 'workaround' to improve visibility, namely a 'Watched Registration' list, maintained by individual schools (this list is discussed in Chapter 6). She noted, however, that relief teachers are not generally included on this list.[440]

Secretary Bullard said that Learning Services should have notified Workplace Relations about the information it was receiving regarding Brad and, had Workplace Relations been notified, 'swifter action may have occurred' at the departmental level, notwithstanding the challenges of investigating a relief teacher.[441] Secretary Bullard specified such action as earlier referrals to police, the Teachers Registration Board, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Integrity Commission.[442] Secretary Bullard attributed the failures to share information to a 'misunderstanding' about the actions that could be taken against relief teachers, which included removing them or flagging them on the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register.[443] In turn, the failure to remove Brad from the Register meant that he could continue relief teaching at other schools.[444] Secretary Bullard conceded that the mismanagement of Brad's case illustrated a systemic failing in terms of people not knowing the controls needed for relief teachers.[445]

Secretary Bullard highlighted to us that because Brad was a relief teacher rather than an 'employee' for the purposes of the State Service Act 2000 ('State Service Act'), he could not be subject to an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation. The State Service Act does not impose a sanction under the Employment Direction No. 5 process for someone who is not an employee.[446]

We consider that the provisions of the Personal Information Protection Act should be amended to ensure information sharing for protecting the safety of children (even where the conduct may not meet a criminal or serious misconduct threshold) is lawful. While privacy and procedural fairness protections are legitimate and should be respected, the safety of children must always be paramount (refer to Chapter 19 for discussion on this issue).

We also find that the Department should be empowered to undertake an investigation (like that conducted under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct) into casual and contracted staff. Where warranted, investigations of this type should continue even where a person is no longer contracted and unwilling to participate.

Following allegations of incidents of the type involving Brad, appropriate support should be offered to students and affected staff. The Department should record the nature and extent of such supports for record-keeping purposes.

4.2 Other systemic problems

In addition to issues around information sharing, Brad's case revealed a range of other problems including:

- inadequate exploration of the initial concerns raised about Brad, partly due to what appeared to be a limited understanding of the range of behaviours that can fall within the definition of child sexual abuse
- no central repository of information relating to complaints or concerns, which made it difficult to get a complete picture of issues of concern relating to employees (particularly relief teachers moving from school to school)
- a lack of clarity between the respective roles and responsibilities of Learning Services, Workplace Relations and Legal Services in responding to such concerns—including confusion about the operation of the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register
- delays in notifications—including reports to the Teachers Registration Board, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, police and the Child Safety Service—meant information about Brad was not acted upon promptly
- the Department ceasing its investigations into Brad's alleged conduct because he was not an employee, demonstrating an overreliance on industrial and disciplinary mechanisms in its response. Continuing investigations would have provided the Department with valuable information about Brad should he reapply for employment, as well as illuminating systemic issues relevant to other situations.

5 What has changed

Secretary Bullard advised us that since reviewing Brad's case, the Department has made the following changes:

- Since July 2021, if the Department receives complaints or disclosures about child sexual abuse, it notifies Workplace Relations and the relief teacher is immediately removed from any workplace and the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register.[447] The teacher is also subject to appropriate notifications to police, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Teachers Registration Board.[448] The Department invites the relief teacher to respond to the complaint and they must submit to an investigation before being able to return to work.[449]

- In October 2020, the Department updated its pre-employment questions for potential applicants to the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register. Applicants must now declare whether they have been the subject of current or past disciplinary matters or if they have been charged (or were convicted of) criminal charges, with disclosures assessed by Workplace Relations (although this requirement does not guarantee that they will do so).[450]
- The Department is developing and will trial a new case management platform. This platform will provide a mechanism for more information to be shared with schools (while 'ensuring fairness to employees') where previous concerns about conduct have been raised and investigated.[451] Secretary Bullard said the case management platform 'will provide a very easy way that schools can enter information of concern, with the matter then going through a chain of decision-making without schools having to take further action'.[452]
- As a matter of practice, people who give statements as part of Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations are advised that those statements may be used for other purposes (for example, statements may be forwarded to the Teachers Registration Board so it can assess an individual's fitness to teach). Those informing an Employment Direction No. 5 investigation can withdraw their consent to their statement being used in this way.[453]

Case study 7: Sam

Sam Leishman gave evidence at our hearings and shared his experience of being sexually abused as a young child while attending a government school in Tasmania. Mr Leishman grew up the youngest of five, in a happy and nurturing family environment.[454] In 1978, he began high school and met a science teacher known as Darrel Harington, despite not being in any of Mr Harington's classes.[455]

1 The incidents

Mr Harington took an interest in Mr Leishman. Mr Leishman told us: 'I guess I felt a little bit singled out, like, he was particularly interested in my activities … to the point of taking piano lessons off my piano teacher and that sort of thing'.[456] Mr Harington also came to know Mr Leishman's parents at various school events.[457]

In 1978, when Mr Leishman was 12 years old, Mr Harington began to sexually abuse him.[458] Mr Leishman shared with us an experience of spending time with Mr Harington outside school. He said his parents had allowed him to go to Mr Harington's house because 'they knew [Mr Harington] and obviously trusted him'.[459] On that day, Mr Harington bought fried chicken and Mr Leishman was impressed by Mr Harington's ability to name the various bones of the chicken.[460] Mr Leishman reiterated: 'This was a teacher I really admired, I really liked a lot'.[461]

Mr Harington began to ask Mr Leishman about girls, including whether he had a girlfriend. When Mr Leishman replied that he didn't, 'the mood sort of quickly changed'.[462] Mr Harington drove Mr Leishman to the shops and purchased an adult magazine, which he then began flicking through with Mr Leishman, asking him if it turned him on.[463] Mr Leishman described how he felt at this time: 'There was this nervous, terrifying excitement about me, within me'.[464]

Mr Harington then began a 'play fight sort of thing' with Mr Leishman, which ultimately led to Mr Harington sexually abusing him in a bedroom.[465] As part of this 'game', Mr Harington invited Mr Leishman to 'retaliate'. As Mr Leishman did not know what the word meant at the time, he needed Mr Harington to explain what this word meant.[466] Mr Leishman told us:

> So, as well as submitting to this [abuse], I also complied; I did what he wanted, or tried to do what he wanted me to do to him. And that was the first incident and he drove me home.[467]

When Mr Harington dropped Mr Leishman home that day, Mr Leishman was grappling with confusion and shame. He described Mr Harington looping back to ring the doorbell to check on him. When greeted by Mr Leishman's parents, Mr Harington invited himself into their home.[468] Mr Leishman explained how he felt:

> I was terrified initially, first of all, that he was going to tell my parents of this disgusting act that I'd just done with him, but he didn't, it just turned into a big drinking session with my parents and, they didn't know, they thought he was a friend.[469]

The abuse continued. Mr Leishman spent more time with Mr Harington, including going away with him for days at a time.[470] Mr Leishman described how after the 'initial terror' of the abuse, he began to feel 'more comfortable with what we were doing together'.[471] He explained, 'I thought at the time that I was equally responsible for my teacher's behaviour towards me, and that I had encouraged it'.[472]

However, over time, Mr Harington's interest in him waned: 'things shifted, there was no longer that connection'.[473] Mr Leishman described the complex feelings that resulted from this perceived rejection:

> So, what I thought was some sort of a relationship, I sensed it wasn't all of a sudden and it was just a physical thing, and that left me feeling, it's tough to say, but I felt pretty isolated and let down because I really admired this person.[474]

One day, some boys from Mr Leishman's school witnessed him going into a home with Mr Harington. Mr Leishman recalled:

> When we arrived at the unit there were two boys from my year in the carpark kicking a ball around, just messing around playing, and I thought—I just felt 'Oh my God I've been spotted in a car, these boys are going to know what's going on'. And because [Mr Harington] was so confident and sort of blasé, he just hopped out of the car, [and said] 'How are you going kids?' I just remember standing there thinking, 'Oh, this is so uncomfortable'. And after that he starts walking away towards the door of the unit and beckons me over, and I—it was terrible.
>
> The next day at school everything changed.[475]

Mr Leishman recalled the boys taunted him, saying 'how did you like sucking Harington's cock last night?'.[476] Mr Leishman described being the victim of bullying after this time:

> I'd managed to fly under the radar quite well until that point, but when—I mean, you can imagine in Tasmania in 1978 that quickly sort of bubbled and festered and turned into a huge problem for me.[477]

As the teasing and bullying became more widely known across the school, Mr Leishman told us that a teacher spoke to him, using words to the effect: 'I don't know what's going on between you and Mr Harington, but obviously something is and you need to make it stop'.[478]

The abuse continued for 12 months until Mr Harington transferred to another school.[479]

2 The disclosure

In 2014, when Mr Leishman was in his late 40s, he heard about the National Royal Commission and began to look at the materials on the website.[480] He realised his experiences were 'not uncommon' and began to recognise what Mr Harington did to him as child sexual abuse.[481] He decided to share his experience with the National Royal Commission. Mr Leishman described engaging with the National Royal Commission as 'a light bulb moment':[482]

> I rang the Royal Commission and that was—that was a great moment for me because it was like a little bit of a weight off my shoulder, and they were fantastic; they arranged a hearing for me—a private session for me and that initiated a lot of things that eventually led to me—the charges and everything against him.[483]

He told us that 'by speaking openly and honestly, I was able to view Harington's behaviours objectively and I began to put things into perspective'.[484] The process also revealed to him that Mr Harington had abused other students. This knowledge encouraged Mr Leishman to engage with the criminal justice process.[485]

In 2015, Mr Harington pleaded guilty to multiple charges of sexual abuse related to several victim-survivors, including Mr Leishman.[486]

Mr Leishman described his experiences of the National Royal Commission, police and the Tasmanian justice system more broadly as 'an overwhelmingly positive one'.[487] Of police, he said: 'The police get a lot of bad press, but they were very good with me'.[488] He described how valuable it was to feel like his matter was important and relevant, even though it happened a long time ago.[489] In giving his victim impact statement in court, he said: 'I was able to defend a child [myself] that had been confused, ashamed and bullied to the point of despair—forced to manage the most complex of emotions in isolation'.[490]

3 The response

After Mr Harington was sentenced, Mr Leishman expected to hear from the Department of Education. He said:

> I guess that was naïve to think that, but I thought that the Education Department must be curious about how this has happened and they must—they must at least want to investigate and find out how this could have possibly happened so, to me, it seemed sort of reasonable to expect that perhaps they might have got in touch with me.[491]

Secretary Bullard acknowledged that Mr Leishman's assumption was not unreasonable but explained that the Department does not receive information from the Director of Public Prosecutions about proceedings involving employees, ex-employees or students to enable such proactive contact.[492]

After allegedly receiving no contact from the Department, Mr Leishman wrote to the then Deputy Premier and Minister for Education and Training.[493] In that letter, dated November 2015, he wrote that he wanted to be heard and understood and to better understand the extent to which other teachers may have been aware of Mr Harington's abuse.[494]

Around a month later (in December 2015), the then Minister for Education, the Honourable Jeremy Rockliff MP, acknowledged the letter, indicating he was seeking advice from the Department about whether he could provide the information that Mr Leishman was requesting.[495] Mr Leishman assumed this meant he would hear something more in the new year.[496] However, months later, he told us that he still had not heard, and he wrote again in early 2016 expressing his disappointment at not having received a response.[497] Secretary Bullard noted that it was difficult to ascertain from Mr Leishman's file what contributed to the delay in responding to his letter but agreed that there did not seem to be 'an agile response'.[498]

We were told that it was not until 2017 that the Department contacted Mr Leishman. A meeting was arranged with the Deputy Secretary, Learning, which Mr Leishman attended. He described the meeting as 'a nice sort of two-way conversation' where he felt listened to 'to some degree'.[499] Secretary Bullard stated that in this meeting, the Deputy Secretary offered Mr Leishman an apology, listened to his experience and discussed the counselling support Mr Leishman was receiving.[500]

Mr Leishman told us that:

> … by that point I had questions as well: I wanted to know why he was teaching at my school, what other complaints they had about him, who knew what, was there any record of any sort of meetings and so forth that had taken place, what were the circumstances around his transfer to another school: I thought they were reasonable things to want to know.[501]

The Deputy Secretary committed to following up his queries, and ultimately advised that a Right to Information request was required. She offered Mr Leishman a fee waiver in respect of this request, direct access to a Right to Information Officer and offered to support him through the process.[502]

Mr Leishman told us that a few weeks after the meeting, Mr Leishman received a letter from Legal Services confirming that he would need to file a Right to Information request and that Mr Harington's consent would be required before any records could be released.[503] Mr Leishman reflected that:

> I felt completely stymied by the process. I felt like I was up against a wall, and I just didn't understand the implications of it. How does it sit with, I've given—I've been responsible for this man going to gaol, and then I'm going to ask him permission to give me information about the circumstances pertaining to that: it just didn't sit well at all. I thought, I just—this is a rabbit hole I'm not gonna go down, I just can't do it.[504]

Secretary Bullard acknowledged the 'real conflict' in situations where a victim-survivor seeks a record, such as a disciplinary file, that contains information about another person.[505] He confirmed that in such cases the Department requires the abuser's permission to release the information or must at least consult them on their views about the release of information about them. Secretary Bullard stated: 'my understanding is that Mr Leishman felt uncomfortable with that, and who wouldn't?'[506]

At hearings, Mr Leishman was asked whether he had since received the answers he was seeking. He replied: 'No, not fully. I still don't feel like everything's been laid out on the table'.[507] He ultimately withdrew his Right to Information request and his legal representative submitted a new request.[508] Secretary Bullard explained that when Mr Leishman sought information through his lawyer, Mr Harington refused the information release, but the decision-maker relied on public interest grounds to release some of the record.[509]

Mr Leishman told us that he received some information about Mr Harington's history of offending but not all the information that he wanted about his time at Mr Leishman's school.[510] Secretary Bullard informed us that there were no records to suggest that the Department was aware of Mr Harington's abuse of Mr Leishman until Mr Leishman wrote to the Department in 2015.[511]

In his statement to our Commission of Inquiry, Mr Leishman described what he felt was needed to improve the Department's response to victim-survivors in his situation:

> The process for victims to engage with and obtain information from the Department needs to be much clearer, with fewer barriers. It also needs to be focused on the needs of the individual victim-survivor. People like me need answers—even if they are not easy to hear.[512]

When asked whether there was a process in the Department to guide engagement with victim-survivors, Secretary Bullard noted that people in Mr Leishman's situation would generally be referred to the Redress Unit in the Department of Justice, which he described as 'trauma-informed'.[513] However, he accepted that the response to Mr Leishman's request for support and assistance from his Department following his letter to the Minister in 2015 was 'entirely inadequate'.[514] Secretary Bullard noted that, apart from Ms Pearce's interaction with Mr Leishman, he did not consider the Department's response to Mr Leishman to have been trauma-informed.[515] Secretary Bullard agreed that there should be a policy or procedure in the Department to 'assist in meeting the expectations necessary to demonstrate support, care, compassion and understanding of victim-survivors' experiences'.[516] He noted that he was conscious of the need to deal with circumstances such as this in a trauma-informed way and had asked the Office of Safeguarding to 'consider our approach to these and other similar matters'.[517]

Reflecting on Mr Leishman's evidence at hearings, Secretary Bullard said:

> I think that Mr Leishman's courage in revealing the betrayal of trust that happened to him as a result of an association that he made whilst he was in one of our schools is very confronting to hear, but also the barriers that then existed when he came forward later with an expectation that he would seek and receive support or acknowledgment from the Department of Education also makes me feel very disappointed and I have apologised to Mr Leishman and I'm very sorry, I'm very sorry for that.[518]

Mr Leishman acknowledged the personal apology he received from Secretary Bullard, which he feels he was 'gracious in accepting'.[519] He also said:

> I hope that by speaking about my experiences, this can lead to a change to the way in which the Department engages with victim-survivors of child sexual abuse from within the education system in Tasmania. It is my hope that Commissions of Inquiry, solicitors and formal processes don't need to get involved to encourage the Department to constructively engage with people like me, who have already suffered so much.[520]

Case study 8: 'Andy'

Andy (a pseudonym) is a young boy with a history of childhood trauma and child protection involvement.[521] We heard allegations that Andy had engaged in harmful sexual behaviours towards several children and young people. We heard from two families impacted by his alleged behaviour as recently as 2021. His alleged behaviours can be characterised as frequent, persistent and severe. We did not explore this case study through our hearings process, but we received information from the Department about this matter.

1 'Family A'

Family A (a pseudonym) has two children who are younger than Andy. The children met Andy through primary school but also spent time with him outside school hours.[522]

The parents told us they noticed some behavioural changes in their children, particularly one of them. These included difficulties regulating emotions, wetting themselves and becoming secretive. The child eventually disclosed that Andy was sexually abusing them, with their sibling often witnessing the alleged abuse. The children described these sexual behaviours as 'games', but allegedly involved violent and coercive sexual acts that occurred multiple times a week, including on school grounds, in circumstances where Andy was alone with the children.

The children's parents described some of the challenges they experienced in the aftermath of Andy's alleged behaviour. They felt the response was inadequate and that the school failed to recognise just how serious it was. The parents said they received an apology from the principal but were otherwise left in the dark about steps taken (including whether the matter was reported to the Department). They said that privacy concerns and Andy's right to an education were cited as justifications for not communicating with the parents or removing Andy from the school, and they felt that nothing was done.

The parents told us they ultimately removed their children from the school for the children's safety and wellbeing. They said the children continue to experience the effects of trauma from Andy's alleged behaviour. A lack of appropriately qualified mental health professionals made it difficult to access specialist child psychologists, and public waiting lists for psychologists are long.

The parent said of Andy: 'I'm sorry for that boy, I am truly—I don't blame him, I blame everyone else'. They reported hearing of Andy allegedly harming other children at the school.

2 ‘Family B’

A parent of two primary school aged children also described changes in the behaviour of one of their children not long after starting at Andy’s primary school.[523] Their child would regularly complain of ‘tummy aches’, not want to go to school and find it difficult to separate from their parent. The parent said that their child’s drawings became dark in content and their child began wetting themselves at school.

The child eventually disclosed that Andy was allegedly ‘doing things’ to them at school. The alleged harmful sexual behaviours were serious. Sometimes the child’s sibling would hold their hand during the abuse, so the child was not alone. The child said they were frightened of Andy because he would allegedly threaten to kill them.

The parent went to police with their child and the child made a statement. Andy was not interviewed because his parents allegedly did not consent. Based on the evidence available to us, it does not appear that any further action has been taken by police. When the parent reported the behaviour to the school, the parent said they waited nine days for the principal to come back to them. As with Family A, Family B (a pseudonym) said they also received no information about any potential responses to Andy’s alleged behaviour, with the principal citing confidentiality as the reason.[524] They felt that the school did nothing.

Family B said their child had changed since the alleged abuse by Andy. The parent stated that their child had changed their appearance, is often fearful and calls their parent at lunchtime for reassurance. The parent felt like there was great concern about Andy and what he may have been through, but that no one was worried about their child. The parent said: ‘I feel like we’ve been treated like the perpetrators’. They also referred to being aware of other victims.

3 The response

We did not ask the Department to respond during hearings to the information we received from Family A or Family B. However, the Department has since informed us of the following:

- The Department was not aware of any complaints, concerns or otherwise in respect of Andy’s alleged harmful sexual behaviour until Family B made allegations against Andy to the Department.
- School staff notified the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line and engaged with police regarding Andy’s alleged harmful sexual behaviours.
- The Department convened a School Leadership Team (including the principal, senior departmental staff and senior school employees) and a Student and Family Support Team (including a social worker, psychologist, a police officer, a support worker and a representative from the Child Safety Service) in response to the allegations made against Andy.

- The Department convened a Planning Team (including the principal, senior school staff, psychologists, a social worker and the student support leader) to respond to the needs of students affected by Andy's alleged harmful sexual behaviour, including Andy.
- The Department offered psychological support, social support, assistance with moving schools, tutoring, financial support and ongoing communication to Family B following the parent's complaints about Andy's alleged behaviour.
- The information provided by the Department did not suggest any comparable supports had been provided to Family A, who told us they were struggling to access appropriate therapeutic supports.
- School staff engaged in ongoing discussions with Andy's family about Andy's alleged behaviour.
- School staff prepared Risk Management Plans for Andy, including regular supervision.
- The Department offered psychological and other support to Andy's family.
- The Department increased the level of funding to Andy's school, to assist in putting necessary supervision and supports in place for Andy.
- The school communicated with families of children at the school about the supports available.[525]

4 Future responses to harmful sexual behaviours

We consider that a range of preventative actions may be taken to minimise the impact of severe harmful sexual behaviours such as those alleged to have been displayed by Andy:

- Clear policies are needed that guide principals to report more severe harmful sexual behaviours to the Department, to ensure they are supported to provide a best practice response (including the involvement of all appropriate school staff and other professionals or services).
- Appropriate referrals and reports should be made to specialist treatment services, the Child Safety Service and police in relation to the child displaying the behaviours. In cases regarding more severe harmful sexual behaviours, Child Safety Service or police intervention may be required if the child's carers are unable to take appropriate protective actions. In some cases, the child displaying the behaviours may be at risk of abuse and neglect, and require a Child Safety Service response.

- The ongoing local response within schools should be guided and supported by harmful sexual behaviours practice specialists who can advise on the development of safety and participation plans proportionate to the changing level of risk a child may pose. Where specialist treatment services are involved, they may also inform the safety and participation plan and ongoing risk assessments.
- Schools should be supported in deciding what should be communicated to whom, including consideration of the information needed by parents whose children have been harmed to feel confident their and other children will be safe.
- Schools should be supported to identify all children known or suspected to have been harmed so that children and families affected may access support.
- Where there are concerns that multiple children may have been harmed, schools may need to be supported to implement additional tailored sexual abuse education sessions to encourage further disclosures, and there may need to be appropriate communications to the school community.
- Where there are indications that a child has sexually harmed multiple children in a range of settings, agencies including the Department, Child Safety Service and police should share information to form a comprehensive understanding of the behaviours displayed, to inform the response.

Refer to Chapter 6 for our recommendations about harmful sexual behaviours.

3 Conclusion

The case studies we discuss in this chapter identify shortcomings in the Department's response to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly regarding addressing allegations in a timely way, conducting proper investigations, and facilitating appropriate and ongoing supports for children and young people, their families and school staff affected by abuse. Over the course of our Commission of Inquiry, there have been changes to the Department's approach to dealing with child sexual abuse matters. We are encouraged by this progress. However, there is still work to do.

While the changes the Department has made will go some way to improving responses to the issues that are apparent in the victim-survivors' experiences and case studies we discuss in this chapter, and the issues identified more broadly through our Inquiry and the Independent Education Inquiry, further improvements are needed. In Chapter 6, we explore what improvements should be made and how they can help to safeguard children and young people in the Department's care.

Notes

1 As noted in Chapter 1, we heard about 63 allegations of child sexual abuse in government schools. The number of people who made allegations does not necessarily correspond to the number of allegations, as some information we received contained more than one allegation.

2 Refer to Case studies 1, 3 and 4.

3 Refer to Case studies 1, 3 and 4.

4 Refer to Case studies 1, 3, 4 and 7.

5 A table detailing the number of state servants suspended due to allegations of child sexual abuse is regularly updated by the Department of Premier and Cabinet through its routine disclosures. Refer to Tasmanian Government, Department of Premier and Cabinet, Routine Disclosures (Web Page) <https://www.dpac.tas.gov.au/rti/routine_disclosure_log_-_departmental_information>.

6 Department of Education, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), 22 February 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. Refer to Appendix H for the methodology used to calculate these figures. There are, at times, discrepancies between the data provided to us by the Tasmanian Government through the ED trackers and the numbers provided by Secretaries of the Departments in their evidence and statements, or differences in the methodology adopted to calculate figures. We have highlighted these discrepancies throughout our report as relevant.

7 Department of Education, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), 22 February 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. Refer to Appendix H for the methodology used to calculate these figures.

8 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 48 [276].

9 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 908 [29–33].

10 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 49 [278].

11 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 49 [278]; Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 909 [8–13].

12 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 50 [296], [298]. We note that in evidence provided to us, the term 'preliminary investigation' is commonly used. However, we prefer the term 'preliminary assessment' because it more accurately reflects the nature of this process. Preliminary assessment is also the term the Integrity Commission prefers.

13 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 49 [278].

14 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 49 [281].

15 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 49 [280].

16 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 49 [282].

17 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 49 [288].

18 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 49 [289].

19 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 50 [296], [298].

20 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 51 [304].

21 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 51 [305–306].

22 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 50 [298].

23 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 50 [296].

24 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 50 [298].

25 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 51 [305].

26 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 51 [308].

27 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 51 [309].

28 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 51 [308–309].

29 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 3938 [41–43].

30 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 3939 [4–7].

31 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 3939 [12–17].

32 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 10 [60].

33 The name 'John' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 9 May 2022; Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 606 [28–30].

34 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 606 [36–39]; Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 1 [6].

35 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 1 [7].

36 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 607 [40].

37 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 1 [7]–2 [9].

38 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 1–2 [7].

39 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 607 [45]–608 [10].

40 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 2 [8].

41 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 2 [8].

42 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 2 [9].

43 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 2 [10].

44 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 2 [11].

45 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 613 [37].

46 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, 120 [395].

47 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, 120 [395].

48 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 614 [9–18].

49 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 612 [3–30].

50 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 2 [12].

51 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 2–3 [12].

52 Department of Education, 'Conduct of Investigation File of "John"', 21 February 2006, 11, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

53 Ms Collins said she was invited to have her father present, but recalls being too embarrassed to talk about her abuse in front of her father: Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 615 [1–37].

54 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 614 [25]–615 [37].

55 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 3 [14–16].

56 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 616 [31–37].

57 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 616 [39–44], 617 [3–10].

58 Director of Public Prosecutions, DPP Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2022) 17–18.

59 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 3 [15]; Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 622 [12–22].

60 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 620 [25–27]; Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 3 [16].

61 Materials provided to us indicate that the Department had moved John to a non-teaching position from around 2001—2002 as a result of the police investigation into the earlier allegations. Although not specifically stated, John's application to teach in 2004 was either a result of the fact that he was not previously required to be registered—the Teachers Registration Act received assent in late 2000—or because his registration had lapsed.

62 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1017 [14–17].

63 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1016 [46]–1017 [12]; Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 967 [38]–968 [2].

64 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 967 [38]–968 [2].

65 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1017 [3–12].

66 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 17 (Summary of complaints or allegations received in relation to 'John', 29 March 2022) 4.

67 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 17 (Summary of complaints or allegations received in relation to 'John', 29 March 2022) 5.

68 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1018 [25–37].

69 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1018 [39]–1019 [5].

70 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1019 [7–10].

71 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1019 [30–32].

72 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 4 [17].

73 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 4 [18].

74 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 4 [20]–5 [21].

75 Refer to letter from Daryl Coates to Tasmania Police, 29 November 2018.

76 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, 123 [403].

77 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, 123 [404].

78 Transcript of Daryl Coates, 7 July 2022, 2624 [47]–2625 [3]. The process for charges 'dismissed' in the Supreme Court differs from the process for charges 'dismissed' in the Magistrates Court. Charges cannot be used, even as tendency evidence, where a matter has been 'dismissed' in the Magistrates Court (refer to Tasmania v Finnegan [2011] TASSC 74 [3]). However, where a matter has been 'dismissed' in the Supreme Court, the Director of Public Prosecution Guidelines, which restate section 350(2) of the Criminal Code Act 1924, provide an avenue to allow that matter to be proceeded with again, providing that: 'Once a final decision has been made to discharge an accused, the decision will not be reviewed unless it is plainly wrong, i.e. it was based on incorrect or irrelevant material, or it was unreasonable, or unless new evidence becomes available' (refer to Director of Public Prosecutions, DPP Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2022) 10). In this case, the fifth complaint would constitute new evidence.

79 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, 124 [405].

80 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, Annexure E (Letter from Daryl Coates to Tasmania Police, 29 November 2018) 9.

81 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, Annexure E (Letter from Daryl Coates to Tasmania Police, 29 November 2018) 10.

82 Statement of Daryl Coates, 6 June 2022, Annexure E (Letter from Daryl Coates to Tasmania Police, 29 November 2018) 10.

83 Report of Tasmania Police regarding allegations made against 'John', 29 July 1991, 1; Letter from then Director of Public Prosecutions, 25 February 2004, 6.

84 Tasmania v Finnegan [2011] TASSC 74 [3].

85 Transcript of Daryl Coates, 7 July 2022, 2626 [4–10].

86 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 4 [20]–5 [22].

87 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 5 [23].

88 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 5 [23].

89 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1020 [2–4].

90 Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022.

91 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(b)(ii) (Statement by 'Jeff', 12 September 2016); The names 'Jeff', 'Jasmine' and 'Heather' are pseudonyms; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

92 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(b)(ii) (Statement by 'Jeff', 12 September 2016).

93 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(c)(i) (Notes of interview with [redacted], 12 September 2019) 2.

94 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(c)(i) (Notes of interview with [redacted], 12 September 2019) 2.

95 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(c)(i) (Notes of interview with [redacted], 12 September 2019) 2.

96 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(b)(ii) (Statement by 'Jeff', 12 September 2016).

97 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(c)(i) (Notes of interview with [redacted], 12 September 2019) 1.

98 The name 'Justin' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022; Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 19 [76(a)–(b)].

99 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 19 [76(c)].

100 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(c)(iii) (Letter from 'Justin' to 'Mark', 15 September 2016).

101 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(c)(iii) (Letter from 'Justin' to 'Mark', 15 September 2016).

102 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 21 [76(j)].

103 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(c)(iii) (Letter from 'Justin' to 'Mark', 15 September 2016).

104 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, Annexure 9(c)(iii) (Letter from 'Justin' to 'Mark', 15 September 2016).

105 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 21 [76(l)].

106 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 12 [59].

107 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 11 [55].

108 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(i)].

109 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 12 [58].

110 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 23 [84].

111 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 22[79].

112 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 22 [78–79].

113 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 23 [85(a)–(b)].

114 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 18 [76(l)].

115 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 23 [59(f)].

116 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 12 [59(d)].

117 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 14 [59(m)].

118 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(i)].

119 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(j)].

120 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 15 [59(k)].

121 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 14 [59(n)].

122 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 14 [59(h)].

123 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 975 [17–20].

124 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 975 [25–37].

125 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 14 [59(o)].

126 Timothy Bullard, 'Reasons for decision regarding reasonable grounds to believe there may have been a breach of the State Service Act Code of Conduct regarding "Justin"', 18 June 2021, 1 [2–4].

127 Timothy Bullard, 'Reasons for decision regarding reasonable grounds to believe there may have been a breach of the State Service Act Code of Conduct regarding "Justin"', 18 June 2021, 1 [2].

128 Timothy Bullard, 'Reasons for decision regarding reasonable grounds to believe there may have been a breach of the State Service Act Code of Conduct regarding "Justin"', 18 June 2021, 1 [3].

129 Minute to the Secretary, '"Justin" – Referral for Consideration of Investigation into Alleged Breaches of the State Service Act 2000 Code of Conduct and Suspension with Pay (Employment Direction 5)', 18 June 2021, 3.

130 The legal proceeding is not cited to protect the identities of the persons involved.

131 Timothy Bullard, 'Reasons for decision regarding reasonable grounds to believe there may have been a breach of the State Service Act Code of Conduct regarding "Justin"', 18 June 2021, 4 [25]–5 [29].

132 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 24 [86].

133 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(g)].

134 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 24 [88].

135 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 17 [72].

136 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 15 [62].

137 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Mark', 4 April 2022, 24 [87].

138 Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022.

139 Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022.

140 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 801 [46]–802 [1].

141 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 1 [4].

142 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 802 [15–21].

143 The name 'Anne' is a pseudonym' Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022; Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 803 [46]–804 [22]; refer also to Submission 092 'Anne', 1–2.

144 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 1–2 [6].

145 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 805 [27]–806 [11].

146 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 4 [5], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59]; refer also to Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 806 [26].

147 Submission 092 'Anne', 2.

148 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 4 [3], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

149 Submission 092 'Anne', 2.

150 Letter from then Secretary of the Department of Education to 'Wayne', 14 March 2006.

151 Letter from then Secretary of the Department of Education to 'Wayne', 14 March 2006.

152 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 4 [3], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

153 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 3 [13].

154 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 808 [30–32]; 809 [15–17].

155 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 809 [19–24].

156 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 2 [8].

157 Submission 092 'Anne', 2.

158 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 2–3 [11].

159 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 3 [12]. Refer also to Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 810 [25–40].

160 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 810 [1–3].

161 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 2 [10].

162 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 2 [9].

163 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 811 [21–22].

164 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 5 [7], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

165 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 3–4 [16].

166 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 813 [46–47].

167 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 815 [33–36].

168 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 25–26 [106(b)].

169 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 5 [25].

170 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 5 [8], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

171 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 5 [13(a)], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

172 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 6 [13(b)], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

173 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 4 [5], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

174 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 806 [31–34]; Email from 'Rachel' to Commission of Inquiry, 9 May 2023.

175 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 5 [11], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

176 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 5 [12], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

177 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 5 [9], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

178 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 5 [9], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

179 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 6 [14], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59]; Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 943 [39–46].

180 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 4 [21–22].

181 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 7 [32].

182 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 7 [33].

183 Department of Education, 'Briefing note – "Rachel" complaint (2007) against "Wayne"', 1 August 2007, 3.

184 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 7 [34].

185 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 10 (Summary of complaints or allegations against 'Wayne', 31 March 2022) 2 [1].

186 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 10 (Summary of complaints or allegations against 'Wayne', 31 March 2022) 2 [2].

187 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 6 [16–17], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 13 [59].

188 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 22 [18.2].

189 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 10 (Summary of complaints or allegations against 'Wayne', 31 March 2022) 2 [6].

190 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 10 (Summary of complaints or allegations against 'Wayne', 31 March 2022) 2 [7].

191 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 22 [18.3].

192 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 6 [29].

193 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 821 [30–35].

194 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 809 [29–30].

195 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 26 [107–108].

196 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 22 [18.5].

197 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 27 [109].

198 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 10 (Summary of complaints or allegations against 'Wayne', 31 March 2022) 1.

199 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 817 [33–34].

200 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 824 [24–28].

201 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 823 [37–44].

202 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 823 [32–35], 824 [18–19].

203 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 819 [36–38].

204 Submission 092 'Anne', 3.
205 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 945 [41–42].
206 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 25 [106(a)].
207 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 25 [106(a)].
208 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 26 [106(c)].
209 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 21 [94(b)].
210 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 25 [105(b)].
211 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 21 [94(c)].
212 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 21 [94(c)].
213 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 21 [94(c)].
214 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 960 [44]–961 [2].
215 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 26 [106(d)].
216 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 963 [14–22].
217 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 944 [1–2] and 945 [5].
218 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 944 [45].
219 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 30 [124].
220 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 926 [1].
221 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 946 [28–31].
222 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 31 [128].
223 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 950 [19–22].
224 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 23 [101].
225 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 23 [101].
226 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 30 [124].
227 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 22 [95]; Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 22 [96].
228 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 926 [25–29].
229 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 32 [129].
230 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 32 [130–131].
231 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 22 [99].
232 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Wayne', 4 April 2022, 22 [99].
233 Justice Miscellaneous (Royal Commission Amendments) Act 2023 s 39; Police Offences Act 1935 ss 35(5A) and (3).
234 The name 'Peter' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 10 May 2022.
235 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 2 [8].
236 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 2 [8].
237 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 2 [8].
238 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 2 [9].
239 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 2 [9].
240 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 2 [9].
241 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 703 [26–35].
242 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 703 [26–35].
243 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 703 [37–39]; Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 3 [11].
244 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 3 [12].
245 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 704 [18–29].
246 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 705 [11–17].
247 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 705 [23–35].

248 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 3 [13].

249 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 705 [31–35].

250 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 3 [14].

251 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 707 [11–15], [39–47].

252 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 708 [12–16].

253 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 3 [16].

254 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 711 [39–43].

255 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 709 [44]–710 [10].

256 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 710 [12–21].

257 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 710 [29–37].

258 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 4 [19].

259 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 4 [19].

260 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 4 [20–21].

261 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 4 [22].

262 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 4 [22].

263 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 5 [23–24].

264 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 6 [28].

265 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 6 [29].

266 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 7 [36].

267 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 7 [36].

268 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 6 [32], 7 [33], 8 [37].

269 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 8 [39].

270 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 713 [9–16].

271 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 713 [39]–714 [18].

272 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 714 [28]–715 [18].

273 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 716 [19–29].

274 Transcript of Katrina Munting, 10 May 2022, 716 [31–40].

275 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 888 [43–47].

276 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 894 [8–20].

277 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 12 [77–79]; Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 6 [31]; Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 889 [2–5].

278 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 888 [43]–889 [6].

279 The name 'Jeremy' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022.

280 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 31 [107]. Note, however, that Jeremy 'did not return to his employment' after 2016.

281 The facts of these incidents are outlined in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 33–34 [124]. They are also outlined in the Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 4 [2]. Secretary Bullard accepts the facts outlined in the Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, as accurately reflecting the allegations against Jeremy and responses of the Department—refer to Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 12 [58].

282 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 60 [231(a)]–61[231(c)]; Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 969 [13–20].

283 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 33 [124(b)], 35 [124(j)].

284 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 34 [124(g)].

285 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 34 [124(g)].

286 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 34 [124(i)].

287 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 35 [124(j)–(k)].

288 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 35 [124(m)].

289 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 972 [1–12]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 5 [4].

290 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 972 [1–12].

291 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 47 [169(b)]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 5 [5].

292 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 47 [169(c)].

293 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 47 [169(c)].

294 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 31 [109], 47 [169(f)]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 5 [6–7].

295 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 31 [109], 47 [169(f)]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 5 [6–7].

296 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 49 [171].

297 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 48 [169(g), (j)].

298 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 49 [172].

299 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 31 [111]–32 [112]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 5 [9–10].

300 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 31–32 [112]. The Secretary had suspended Jeremy's pay when his teacher registration was suspended. However, the Department began paying Jeremy again because of the decision of the Magistrates Court to set aside his suspension.

301 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 31–32 [112]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 6 [20–21].

302 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 22 [21.2].

303 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 61 [231(e)].

304 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 44 [155]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 5 [8], 6 [12].

305 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 43 [151], 61 [231(d)].

306 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 43 [151].

307 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 51 [182].

308 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 11 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Jeremy', 30 March 2022) 4 [9].

309 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 11 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Jeremy', 30 March 2022) 5 [10].

310 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 32 [115].

311 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 32 [116].

312 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 32 [116].

313 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 32 [116].

314 Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 6 [19].

315 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 33 [121–122]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 6 [20–21].

316 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 11 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Jeremy', 30 March 2022) 6 [18]–7 [21].

317 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 11 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Jeremy', 30 March 2022) 1, 6 [17]–8 [29].

318 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 32 [117].

319 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 60 [230].

320 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 31 [109], 51 [181–182].

321 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 52 [186].

322 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 52 [190].

323 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 53 [201].

324 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 43 [149].

325 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 31 [107].

326 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(a)].

327 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(b)].

328 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(c)–(e)].

329 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(f)].

330 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 13 [59(a), (g)].

331 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 14 [60(b)].

332 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 43 [151]; refer also to Request for Statement served on the Department of Education, 24 February 2022, 5–6 [8], 6 [12].

333 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 971 [1–23].

334 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 14 [60(a)].

335 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 14 [60(b)].

336 In relation to the 2012 allegations refer to Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 38 [134]–40 [144]; in relation to the 2015 allegations refer to Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 45 [162]–46 [167].

337 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 56 [214].

338 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 57 [219].

339 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 49 [170] and 57 [219].

340 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 15 [61(d)–(e)].

341 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 15 [61(c)].

342 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 15 [61(e)].

343 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 955 [25–26].

344 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 970 [10–20].

345 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 955 [22–33].

346 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 20 [77(b)].

347 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 20 [77(b)].

348 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 20 [77(b)].

349 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 21 [77(f)].

350 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 20 [77(c)].

351 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 20 [77(c)].

352 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 20 [77(d)].

353 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 970 [10–20].

354 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 957 [21–29].

355 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 23 [88].

356 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 972 [25–41].

357 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 51–52 [185].

358 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 55 [208–209].

359 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 972 [43]–973 [9].

360 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 55 [211].

361 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Jeremy', 4 April 2022, 55 [211].

362 The name 'Brad' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022.

363 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-002) 1 [1], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 12 [57], 13 [59(a)].

364 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-002) 5 [5], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 53.

365 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 2 [4].

366 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 2 [4].

367 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 1 [1].

368 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 2 [5].

369 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 2 [5].

370 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-002) 5 [11], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 12 [53], 13 [61(a)]–14 [61(f)].

371 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 13 [61(c)]; The name 'Principal A' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

372 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 13 [61(c)], 33 [121(a)]; refer also to Department of Education, Timeline: Allegations of Inappropriate Conduct, 'Brad', undated, 1.

373 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 13 [61(c)].

374 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 13 [61(d)]–14 [61(e)].

375 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-002) 5 [13], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 12 [53], 14 [61(e)].

376 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 14 [61(f)], 33 [121(c)–(d)], 38 [142].

377 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 14 [61(d)].

378 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 14 [61(f)].

379 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 33 [121(b)(ii)].

380 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 14 [61(f)].

381 Request for Statement to Timothy Bullard (RFS-TAS-003) 5 [12]–6 [19], affirmed as correct in Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 12 [53], 34 [125], 35 [131].

382 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 34 [126]; The name 'Principal B; is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

383 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 34 [127(a)(iii)].

384 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 34 [127(a)(i), (ii)–128].

385 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 34 [127(b)].

386 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 34 [127(c)].

387 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 34 [127(b)–(c)].

388 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 14 [61(i)].

389 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 15 [61(k)].

390 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 35 [131].

391 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 35 [132(a)(ii)]; The name 'Principal C' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

392 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 35 [132(a)(iii)–(iv)].

393 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 15 [61(n)].

394 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 15 [61(n)].

395 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 15 [61(n)(iii)].

396 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 15 [61(o)], 39 [148].

397 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 2 [6(iii)–(iv)].

398 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 16 [61(p)].

399 Email from Mandy Clarke, Department of Communities, to Trudy Pearce, Deputy Secretary Learning, Department of Education 19 February 2021.

400 Email from Mandy Clarke, Department of Communities, to Trudy Pearce, Deputy Secretary Learning, Department of Education 19 February 2021.

401 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 2 [8].

402 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 16 [61(q)].

403 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 16 [61(q)].

404 Minute to the Secretary Timothy Bullard, '"Brad" – Referral for Consideration of Alleged Misconduct and Review of Historical Allegations', 13 July 2021, 2–3.

405 Minute to the Secretary Timothy Bullard, '"Brad" – Referral for Consideration of Alleged Misconduct and Review of Historical Allegations', 13 July 2021, 3.

406 Minute to the Secretary Timothy Bullard, '"Brad" – Referral for Consideration of Alleged Misconduct and Review of Historical Allegations', 13 July 2021, 3.

407 Email from Mandy Clarke, Department of Communities, to Trudy Pearce, Deputy Secretary Learning, Department of Education, 'Re: "Brad"', 21 February 2021.

408 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 13 [60].

409 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 16 [61(q)].

410 Minute to the Secretary Timothy Bullard, '"Brad" – Referral for Consideration of Alleged Misconduct and Review of Historical Allegations', 13 July 2021, 3.

411 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 3 [9].

412 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 3 [11].

413 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, Annexure 14 (Summary of complaints or allegations received against 'Brad', 31 March 2022) 3 [12].

414 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 33 [122–123].

415 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 16 [61(r)].

416 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 16 [61(s)].

417 Letter from Ann Moxham to Timothy Bullard, 16 July 2021.

418 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 17 [63].

419 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 979 [27–34].

420 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 985 [27–35].

421 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 17 [66]. Note that 'Brad' was not eligible for mutual recognition as he was not registered at the time he sought to begin teaching in Tasmania.

422 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 18–19 [72].

423 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 19 [73].

424 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 977 [21–30].

425 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1003 [27–34].

426 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 18 [69].

427 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 18 [69].

428 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 17 [70–71].

429 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 22 [85].

430 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 995 [18–25].

431 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1010 [7–11]. The Department emphasises that the legal advice it receives from the Office of the Solicitor-General is binding on the Department—refer to Department for Education, Children and Young People, Procedural Fairness Response, 28 March 2023, 28.

432 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1000 [6–12].

433 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1002 [38–46].

434 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1000 [21–25].

435 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1000 [33–36].

436 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1005 [11–25].

437 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1008 [33–44].

438 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1009 [8–11].

439 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1009 [19–24].

440 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 3 [3.3], 3–4 [3.6].

441 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 37 [135].

442 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 38 [141], 39 [151].

443 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 980 [34–39].

444 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 38 [142], [144].

445 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 982 [6–8].

446 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 12 [54].

447 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 12 [56], 40 [156].

448 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 12 [56].

449 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 12 [56].

450 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 20 [79].

451 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 26–27 [110].

452 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 982 [17–21].

453 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 985 [1–5].

454 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 1 [3].

455 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 1 [4].

456 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1048 [40–44].

457 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1048 [26–32].

458 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 1 [5].

459 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1049 [13–16].

460 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1049 [18–27].

461 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1049 [38–39].

462 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1048 [29–32].

463 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1049 [29–45].

464 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1050 [2–4].

465 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1050 [10–15].

466 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1050 [21–24].

467 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1050 [24–27].

468 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1050 [29]–1051 [5].

469 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1051 [6–11].

470 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1051 [27–33].

471 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1051 [33–36].

472 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 1 [5].

473 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1052 [12–13].
474 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1052 [26–30].
475 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1053 [4–8], [16–17].
476 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1053 [21–22].
477 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1053 [22–27].
478 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1053 [35–40].
479 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 1 [5].
480 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 1 [7].
481 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 1 [7].
482 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1055 [1–3].
483 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1056 [3–8].
484 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 1 [7].
485 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1056 [16–29].
486 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [8].
487 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [9].
488 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1056 [34–35].
489 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1057 [5–10].
490 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [10].
491 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1058 [40–45].
492 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1066 [31–41].
493 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [12].
494 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [12].
495 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, Annexure (Letter from Jeremy Rockliff to Sam Leishman, 23 December 2015) 1.
496 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1060 [29–34].
497 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1060 [40–46].
498 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1069 [17–18].
499 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1061 [20–21].
500 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 5 [31].
501 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1061 [22–28].
502 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 5 [33].
503 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [14].
504 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1062 [1–8].
505 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1071 [7–17].
506 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1071 [26–27].
507 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1063 [9–10].
508 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 5 [36].
509 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1071 [29–34].
510 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1063 [10–16].
511 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 4 [25–26].
512 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [16].
513 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1070 [1–14].
514 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 6 [41].
515 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 6 [46].
516 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 6 [46].

517 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 6 [43].

518 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1066 [15–24].

519 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1063 [35–38].

520 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [17].

521 The name 'Andy' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

522 The name 'Family A' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023. Anonymous session, 12 October 2022. The summary in this case study is from this anonymous session.

523 Anonymous session, 17 February 2022. The summary in this case study is from this anonymous session.

524 The name 'Family B' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

525 Department for Education, Children and Young People, DECYP Summary – Case Summary 'Andy' (March 2023).

6 The way forward: Children in schools

1 Introduction

In this chapter, we outline measures the Tasmanian Government should take to prevent child sexual abuse in government schools and improve responses when it does occur, noting that the Department for Education, Children and Young People has begun making significant changes, including developing an overarching child safeguarding policy framework. The Department's current child safeguarding measures are part of a shifting landscape as the Department responds to recommendations from the National Royal Commission, the Independent Education Review and matters identified through our Commission of Inquiry.

In Chapter 5, we identify shortcomings in the Department and other government entities' responses to allegations of child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours. We outline the measures the Department has taken to address these. In this chapter, we consider more steps the Department, and other government entities, should take to make schools safer for children, including:

- implementing mandatory child sexual abuse prevention education
- limiting the focus of the Office of Safeguarding primarily to safeguarding children in education settings
- refreshing and regularly reviewing child safeguarding policies and working to embed them in schools

- developing an education-specific professional conduct policy for staff and volunteers
- implementing a mandatory professional development program for educators, staff and others who work with children and young people (including volunteers) in schools
- establishing a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate to lead the response and investigation of complaints of child sexual abuse and related behaviours by staff
- developing education-specific policies, protocols and guidance for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours in schools, noting our recommendation in Chapter 9 that the Department establishes a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to support all the Department's portfolios
- strengthening the Teachers Registration Board's ability to safeguard children through changes to the law.

We consider our recommendations in this chapter will help the Department to further improve its approach to safeguarding students (and younger children) in its care, and increase the ability of the Teachers Registration Board to protect all children in Tasmanian schools—government and non-government.

2 Child sexual abuse prevention education in schools

Targeted child sexual abuse prevention education programs can help children and young people to identify grooming or sexually abusive behaviours, give them confidence about asserting their boundaries, and empower them to report any violations. Such programs can also help challenge harmful norms or attitudes at an early stage, particularly around issues of consent. They can be a powerful tool in preventing child sexual abuse.

In this section, we examine the role of child sexual abuse prevention programs in schools. These programs vary in design and delivery and are discretionary in Tasmania. We outline evidence of the elements of successful programs and recommend that best practice programs form part of the mandatory curriculum in Tasmanian schools, together with respectful relationships and consent education.

Prevention programs in schools should form only part of a broader prevention strategy. In recommending more investment in prevention programs, we want to be clear that the burden of preventing abuse should not fall on children and young people. It is not their responsibility to know or interpret adult behaviour, nor is it their job to keep themselves safe from abuse and harm. Even the objectives of the best programs can be overborne by abusers, who often deploy a range of tactics and manipulations to enforce compliance and silence.

However, we do consider that prevention education programs have an important role to play in educating and empowering children and young people about their bodily autonomy and about what constitutes healthy and acceptable sexual behaviour. Such programs are a source of important information about how to navigate or respond to any threats to their safety. These programs should complement other prevention efforts including national community-wide prevention strategies.[1] For more discussion on prevention, refer to Chapter 18.

2.1 Children's perceptions

Some children who took part in research we commissioned, conducted by Associate Professor Tim Moore and Emeritus Professor Morag McArthur, told us that sex education in schools did not cover everything they thought was relevant:

> You talk about relationships and stuff but not really like modern day issues like online stuff and, no offence, adults can be pretty clueless about this stuff. And if they teach you in a way that proves they've got no idea then you're not going to go with them.[2]

They thought there was not enough teaching about adult–child sexual abuse, institutional child sexual abuse and who to turn to if they experience harm.[3]

We heard from a number of victim-survivors who did not recognise their experiences as abuse until much later in life—sometimes only becoming aware of the dynamics and features of grooming and abuse as adults. For example, Leah Sallese, a victim-survivor, described the following interaction with her psychotherapist:

> I said: 'I had an affair with my teacher' and he said, 'Wait a minute, what?' He said: 'No, you didn't, that's childhood sexual abuse'. So that's the first time, as a 40-something-year-old woman, that I ever questioned what I had in my mind as a narrative my whole life.[4]

Sam Leishman, another victim-survivor whose experience we discuss in Chapter 5, described having a similar revelation as an adult:

> I happened to see a grab of news and it was Julia Gillard talking about the [National] Royal Commission and how it was progressing, and I'd never thought about what happened to me as child abuse, funnily enough. I thought it's something that I initiated, that I had done and that it was just a one-off thing that this man was attracted to me for some reason and it was—it was a single thing that happened. And, out of curiosity I got on to the website … I was just staggered, because by that stage there was volumes and volumes and volumes of work that they had done, and story after story, and I started reading through them and I thought, 'Shit, that happened to me', yeah. So it was sort of like a light-bulb moment.[5]

Victim-survivor Rachel (a pseudonym), whose experience we discuss in Chapter 5, recommended to us that an 'educational program promoting awareness for appropriate student–teacher relationships in and out of school is implemented into the curriculum'.[6]

Victim-survivor Kerri Collins noted how sex education helped her understand what had happened to her and fellow victim-survivors when she was very young:

> You knew it was wrong but you didn't understand, because we were so young, and then after that you did understand—like, you'd done sex education at school and those sorts of things and you knew that what happened wasn't right. But then, how do you tell somebody that, and how do you—you know, as a child you're second guessing yourself, like, is that me, did I do that, was that my fault?[7]

We also saw evidence of problematic attitudes towards consent and relationships among Tasmanian children and young people, which is particularly relevant to harmful sexual behaviours between children. A study conducted by Anglicare Tasmania's Social Action and Research Centre heard from 17 young Tasmanians about their experiences of domestic violence. Collectively they described 18 separate relationships involving sexual violence or abuse they had experienced.[8] One participant in the study, Sahar, said:

> They [young men and boys] envision like a big scary man, like dragging a woman into an alleyway and raping her, a stranger. But it's not like that at all. It's usually almost always somebody that you know, and it's partners. But they don't recognise that. They've got this, like, such a movie vision of what rape is in their head that they wouldn't even realise if they'd done it themselves.[9]

Contrary to the common belief that gender equality is improving through generational change, those working to address violence in the community told the study author about young men in particular holding worryingly regressive views, with one worker known as Bernie saying: 'That 1970s attitude, male attitude, exists here strongly in Tasmania'.[10] A family violence worker known as Jo said she noticed young women tending to experience more extreme violence than older generations at the hands of younger partners, saying: 'Young people are supposed to be getting all of this preventative stuff … But these young guys can be very traditional in their views of women'.[11]

We are also conscious that online digital technology is rapidly changing and some aspects of this can continue to support harmful attitudes. For example, the rise in pornography on the internet creates a high risk of children and young people seeing or seeking pornography online. The eSafety Commissioner notes that:

> … exposure to graphic, violent or misleading messages about sexual practices and gender stereotypes could give [children and young people] the wrong idea about sex and intimate relationships.[12]

Kathryn Fordyce, Chief Executive Officer, Laurel House, pointed to the absence of statewide consistency in prevention programs across primary and high school students, as well as in early childhood support services.[13] Ms Fordyce said:

> There is a lot more work needed in organisations of all types including schools, health and disability services to ensure that we address the drivers of sexual violence, to teach children about respectful relationships and how to speak up when they feel unsafe or when something has happened to them. Unfortunately, there are social norms that mean we condition children, especially those with disabilities and health conditions, to be compliant and submissive … All too often adults ignore a child's attempt to maintain their bodily autonomy, and then those same adults are surprised when children are abused and do not report it.[14]

2.2 National Royal Commission recommendations

The National Royal Commission recommended that the Australian Government implements a national strategy to prevent child sexual abuse. This strategy would encompass complementary initiatives, including prevention education delivered through school settings 'that aims to increase children's knowledge of child sexual abuse and build practical skills to assist in strengthening self-protective skills and strategies'.[15] The National Royal Commission also recommended that schools extend education on issues of child sexual abuse and online safety to parents and carers.[16]

The National Royal Commission commissioned an Australia-wide audit of child sexual abuse prevention policies and curriculums across 32 primary school systems, covering government, Catholic and independent school sectors.[17] The audit found that only 12.5 per cent of school systems had curriculums that included specific child sexual abuse prevention education and there was considerable variation across jurisdictions in the type of material available on prevention.[18] There is no equivalent audit for secondary school policies and curriculums, but there may be opportunity in the Health and Physical Education learning area to address child sexual abuse.[19]

The audit report also found a lack of strategies to help teachers adapt content for particular groups of students such as Aboriginal children, children with disability or children from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.[20]

The National Royal Commission recommended a nationally consistent approach to prevention education in all schools and preschools, stating: 'Child sexual abuse prevention education could be integrated with education aimed at preventing all forms of violence against children, in any setting'.[21]

2.3 Features of effective child sexual abuse prevention programs

Professor Kerryann Walsh, an expert in child sexual abuse prevention, told us that although there are different examples of prevention education programs, good programs share common features, including that they:

- cover topics such as body ownership, private parts, appropriate versus inappropriate touching, distinguishing types of secrets, and who and how to tell
- are delivered interactively in groups, where teachers and children engage with the content together through strategies such as rehearsal and role-play
- use resources and materials that are diverse, spanning film, plays, songs, puppets and other methods
- are delivered in shorter modules over an extended period, which enables them to be discussed and absorbed (for example, 20-minute sessions delivered once per week over five to six weeks).[22]

Professor Walsh said that child sexual abuse prevention education should begin as early as possible—by parents in the earliest years, then in childcare, long daycare and kindergartens.[23] She also said that prevention education should continue until the end of schooling.[24]

Professor Walsh also explained that, while it is important to teach about risks of child sexual abuse from adults with sensitivity and care, studies have shown that such education does not tend to increase or decrease children's fear or anxiety across the board.[25] She also noted that the risk of prevention programs increasing a child's anxiety is lower 'as programs have improved over the years and become more sensitive to children and more developmentally appropriate'.[26]

Through submissions and hearings, we heard about the importance of parents and carers also engaging with content delivered about child sexual abuse. Body Safety Australia described its work designing and delivering professional development for teachers, young people and their families, noting:

> We believe education for children is most effective when delivering in conjunction with information sessions for parents and teachers. Preventative education for parents, teachers and children facilitates discussion between children and the adults in their lives. While schools can and must provide some measure of protection, it is essential that parents and families continue to be the main providers of safety and assistance to children.[27]

Professor Walsh echoed this, saying that 'homework' (where the school sets activities to be completed at home) can help to engage parents or carers in the programs, plus it provides an avenue for them to reinforce the content.[28] She acknowledged that some children do not have the benefit of engaged and supportive parents, which makes accessing information at school particularly important.[29]

Body Safety Australia cited common reasons teachers prefer prevention education to be delivered by external providers. These include teachers feeling unequipped to deliver the content, a belief that it is easier for children and young people to ask questions about this content and engage with a person they do not see every day, and a fear of damaging the parent–teacher relationship if they deliver confronting content.[30] We heard similar concerns in our Burnie stakeholder consultation, with one participant expressing concerns that there could be difficulties with teachers delivering respectful relationships programs because the programs involve discussions with children that could be inappropriate for teachers to participate in.[31]

Professor Walsh noted that not all teachers will be suited or able to deliver such curriculum (noting some may be victim-survivors themselves).[32] Professor Walsh suggested that a smaller cohort of teachers with specialist training and ongoing supervision could be tasked with delivering the material across year levels.[33] Children and young people may feel more comfortable disclosing their worries or concerns to teachers. Using teachers, rather than external providers, to deliver this material would help avoid sending an unintentional message that teachers are unwilling to talk to students about child sexual abuse. Incorporating prevention education into the curriculum will support it being delivered by teachers in a school.

2.4 Child sexual abuse programs in government schools

Child sexual abuse prevention education programs are varied and largely voluntary in Tasmania. This is consistent with most other jurisdictions. As noted by Professor Walsh, the availability of programs across Australia is 'patchy'.[34] Only two jurisdictions—Western Australia and South Australia (the latter of which is discussed in Section 2.5)—have mandated sexual abuse prevention programs in schools.[35]

Departmental Secretary Timothy Bullard informed us that the Department 'supports a range of evidence-based and age-appropriate programs to address respectful relationships, consent, sexuality, body ownership and protective behaviours'.[36] For government schools, the prevention curriculum is generally contained in the Health and Physical Education area of the Australian Curriculum under the 'relationships and sexuality' and 'safety' focus areas.[37] Secretary Bullard foreshadowed further work to support teachers to implement the Australian Curriculum on respectful relationships and consent, including updates and revisions to support the latest version endorsed nationally by education ministers in April 2022.[38]

Safe Homes, Families, Communities: Tasmania's Action Plan for Family and Sexual Violence 2019–2022 committed to implementing prevention strategies, including embedding respectful relationships education in schools and delivering a program for children and young people targeted at harmful sexual behaviours.[39] The Tasmanian Government's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027: Survivors at the Centre expands on this commitment by developing 'a suite of resources' that improves the Tasmanian community's understanding of 'consent, coercive control and grooming'.[40] The plan also states that a dedicated position will be created in the Department to help schools embed respectful relationships education.[41]

According to the Department's website, the Respectful Relationships Program is an 'essential element' of Safe Homes, Families, Communities.[42] The program consists of resources to support schools, communities and individuals to understand the causes of family and sexual violence, and to reduce violence.[43] This includes the Respectful Schools Respectful Behaviour: Building Inclusive Practice in Schools resource, which 'supports school communities to build respectful, safe and supportive learning environments'.[44] Our understanding is that this resource focuses on preventing family and gender-based violence but does not directly address child sexual abuse, harmful sexual behaviours or the online environment.

The Department also supports other programs and initiatives that 'align with and complement content covered through the Australian Curriculum', although these are not mandatory and are at the discretion of principals.[45] Elizabeth Jack, Executive Director, Office of Safeguarding, explained:

> Schools tend to use the programs that they believe work best for their context because all our schools are in different environments, they're a different size, they might have different issues with their student cohort. The principal and school leaders normally make that determination. So there will be professional support staff, for instance, that might contribute to that so that they determine what is best to be run in their school.[46]

Secretary Bullard highlighted some programs and educational activities for young people in school settings in Tasmania including:

- Ditto's Keep Safe Adventure Program from the Bravehearts Foundation, delivered in the early years of school[47]
- the Sexual Assault and Prevention Program and 'Consent is a Conversation' workshops delivered by the Sexual Assault Support Service[48]
- the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program, delivered by the Sexual Assault Support Service, focusing on children and young people exhibiting harmful sexual behaviours.[49]

Ms Jack identified more than 20 programs delivered in schools, highlighting to us that there is no consistent approach across Tasmanian government schools.[50] At our Hobart consultation, we heard that although information about prevention was available in schools, some principals may be reluctant to engage with it.[51] The Launceston consultation also highlighted the discretionary nature of many programs.[52]

Some prevention programs at schools are fee-based, and others are offered at no charge if the Department has a formal agreement with a program provider (under a grant deed) to provide a certain number of programs.[53] Where a school wishes to have a program that is not available under a grant deed, they generally need to fund this through individual budgets, known as School Resource Packages, in consultation with the school principal.[54]

Decisions about which programs the Department endorses are 'guided by departmental policies and guidelines, with consideration being given to alignment with the curriculum and the quality of the program'.[55] Ms Jack noted she has received advice that suggests the programs currently running in schools are appropriate and accredited.[56] However, she indicated that the Office of Safeguarding, together with other business units across the Department, would undertake 'a review of available programs to ensure the programs being offered by schools are appropriate at a whole-of-system level, while still suiting the context for each individual school'.[57]

The Department usually captures participation data for programs funded through a grant deed, but for other programs, this data is generally 'maintained at the local school level'.[58] Noting this variability and the voluntary nature of such programs, Ms Jack confirmed the Office of Safeguarding's intention to work with other business units across the Department, to better capture engagement data 'including outcomes and trends related to program participation'.[59]

2.5 Mandated sexual abuse prevention education

Professor Walsh told us that programs are more likely to be delivered when they are compulsory.[60] Professor Walsh warned that in a tight resourcing environment, principals can overlook programs that require discretionary funding:

> I think the literature would tell us that [schools] will only look for a sexual abuse prevention program when they have an incident; it will be reactionary why they do it. So, that is very hard for schools to do when they commit their budget at the start of the school year, there's just no wriggle room in budgets to suddenly get somebody in to deliver a program when an event happens, even though we know that's not what should happen but in practice that's often how it plays out.[61]

On the question of mandated programs, Ms Jack noted:

> The Office [of Safeguarding] is in the early stages of discussion with both the Support and Development and Learning divisions regarding opportunities to better > identify, recommend, monitor and (where necessary) make mandatory, prevention programs in schools, noting that schools also need the ability to make decisions based on their own local context and need.[62]

Secretary Bullard listed considerations for making these programs mandatory including:

- alignment with the curriculum and how the program can be integrated in school timetables
- consideration of who delivers the program (teachers, social workers or external providers) and the resourcing required to enable effective delivery
- acknowledging a parent or carer's right to request their child not participate in a particular program
- the need to evaluate the impact of any programs delivered.[63]

Secretary Bullard went on to note the risk that such programs could be seen as a 'substitute for other services and processes that protect children'.[64] Also, programs should not be viewed as a 'solution' alone but should be placed in a broader safeguarding system.[65] We agree with this statement.

In addition to the Australian Curriculum (and complementary to its 'relationships and sexuality' and 'safety' focus areas), South Australia has the Keeping Safe: Child Protection Curriculum.[66] Professor Walsh described South Australia's program as the 'soundest' model because it has been developed over some time and has been 'so well thought through'.[67]

The Keeping Safe: Child Protection Curriculum is mandated in all South Australian Department for Education preschools and schools for children and young people from the age of three through to year 12 and covers child safety and respectful relationships. It is delivered by teachers in the school setting. It has support materials specifically for Aboriginal children and young people, children from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and children with disability or additional needs.[68] It also has resources for parents and carers.[69] We understand schools in other jurisdictions have adopted this curriculum, as have some independent schools in South Australia.[70]

We consider it is important that children and young people receive child sexual abuse prevention education throughout their schooling. While we recognise the multiple competing priorities in school curriculums and budgets, the finding in the Australian Child Maltreatment Study that more than one in four Australian young people aged 16 to 24 years have experienced child sexual abuse suggests this is a priority that must be addressed.[71] For this to occur, prevention education needs to be mandated across all schools and in Tasmanian government funded early learning preschool programs, through to year 12. All Tasmanian students should have the benefit of programs designed to help them learn and understand their right to be safe from sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours. It is also efficient to have a single, consistent approach to programs across the State. We are not convinced there is justification for the existing variety of approaches at the local level, but note that individual schools may wish to supplement mandated curriculum content to reflect their own context or circumstances.

We consider that the Department should adopt the South Australian model of mandated prevention education. This is a significant reform agenda but one we consider vital to preventing child sexual abuse. Safeguarding Leads, supported by the Office of Safeguarding, should actively support and champion the mandatory curriculum in schools. The Department may wish to explore opportunities for cross-jurisdictional collaboration with South Australia for implementing this mandatory curriculum.

The Department should develop a plan for sustained implementation that clearly articulates the goals and objectives of the curriculum and defines the roles and responsibilities of key participants. We see potential to incorporate the Respectful Relationships and Consent Education program committed to by the Government in this curriculum, as is the approach in South Australia.[72] The Department should evaluate the effectiveness of the mandatory curriculum after five years of implementation, with evaluation criteria created as part of the process of developing the curriculum.

The Tasmanian Government could also consider making the mandatory child sexual abuse prevention curriculum available to non-government schools.

Recommendation 6.1

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should introduce and fund a mandatory child sexual abuse prevention curriculum as part of the mandatory respectful behaviours curriculum from early learning programs to Year 12, across all types of government schools (including specialist schools).
2. This mandatory prevention curriculum should draw on expert evidence of best practice and successful approaches adopted in other states and territories, including South Australia's mandatory curriculum.
3. The Department should develop a plan for sustained implementation of the mandatory prevention curriculum. The plan should:
    a. set out the goals and objectives of implementing the mandatory prevention curriculum
    b. define the roles and responsibilities of key participants
    c. include criteria for evaluating the curriculum.
4. The Department should evaluate the effectiveness of the mandatory prevention curriculum five years after its implementation.

3 Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People

This section examines the purpose and functions of the Office of Safeguarding and offers some early reflections on its operation. We acknowledge that the Office of Safeguarding is in the process of implementing recommendations from the Independent Education Inquiry. It is important that this occurs effectively, in line with the recommendations' objectives.

Given that the Office of Safeguarding is in its relative infancy, we did not receive extensive evidence about its performance. However, we have made some early observations of its work, as well as offering our reflections on how it may best deliver on its ambitions. We recommend that the Office of Safeguarding focuses its attention on the school and educational context, concentrating on prevention, risk identification, policy development and related workforce development.

3.1 Establishing the Office of Safeguarding

The Independent Education Inquiry recommended establishing a Director of Safeguarding in the then Department of Education in order to, among other things, develop a student safeguarding policy, support risk assessments and management plans in every school, be a point of contact for School Safeguarding Officers and oversee their induction and training.[73] One of the Independent Education Inquiry's primary concerns was how the Department could embed prevention into its child safeguarding system.[74]

Elizabeth Jack was appointed as the inaugural Executive Director of Safeguarding Children and Young People.[75] The role's Statement of Duties outlines its function as:

> To promote and protect the wellbeing of children and young people in all Education Department settings by leading and providing strategic advice and direction in relation to the Department's culture, systems, practices, processes, procedures and professional learning, relating to safeguarding children and young people from harm of abuse.[76]

Ms Jack described the duties of the Executive Director of Safeguarding Children and Young People as including:

- implementing the recommendations of the Independent Education Inquiry and of the National Royal Commission allocated to the Department of Education (Ms Jack also noted that she would likely be responsible for implementing relevant recommendations of our Commission of Inquiry)[77]

- supporting 'operational responses to safeguarding children and young people' led by other departmental business units, including Workplace Relations, Legal Services, Learning Services and Student Support[78]
- championing child safeguarding issues with the Department's Executive Group, other senior staff, school principals and departmental staff[79]
- ensuring strategic communications with students, staff and stakeholders to raise awareness of safeguarding issues.[80]

The Office of Safeguarding has (at the time of writing) six dedicated staff (primarily roles in policy analysis, project management and communications) and receives some support from the Department's Strategic Policy and Planning and Strategic Systems Development areas.[81]

Secretary Bullard confirmed a State Budget allocation of $2.6 million over three years beginning in 2022–23 to 'fully staff the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People to meet the demands of the work required to support all safeguarding-related activity across the Department'.[82]

We understand Ms Jack has now moved to the position of Deputy Secretary, Keeping Children Safe, which oversees the Office of Safeguarding as well as Services for Children and Families (which includes the Child Safety Service, the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line and out of home care).[83] We discuss our concerns with this organisational structure in Chapter 9. Here we focus on the role of the Office of Safeguarding.

3.2 Working strategically and sustainably for greatest impact

The Office of Safeguarding has an ambitious program of work considering its relatively small team. It relies on the cooperation and goodwill of a range of other parties—including the various departmental portfolios, departmental business units and individual schools—to achieve its objectives. In this section, we discuss some of its early areas of responsibility, including appointing Student Safeguarding Officers, undertaking systemic reviews and commenting on the Department's responses to allegations of child sexual abuse by staff.

We also note that the Office of Safeguarding led the Department's work on developing Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework ('Safeguarding Framework') for safeguarding children and young people, which was released in April 2023.[84] We discuss this Safeguarding Framework in Section 4.

3.2.1 Student Safeguarding Officers

Student Safeguarding Officers (also referred to as Safeguarding Leads) can expand the reach and impact of the Office of Safeguarding and embed its priorities at the local level.

The Independent Education Inquiry recommended appointing Student Safeguarding Officers in schools with the following responsibilities:

- ensuring relevant safeguarding information is reported and recorded
- contributing to school safeguarding risk assessment and management plans
- acting as a point of contact for students and staff about safeguarding concerns
- ensuring the best interests of students are at the forefront of decisions and actions of the school.[85]

Secretary Bullard gave evidence that the State Budget allocated $26.1 million over four years (and $9.7 million ongoing) to appoint Student Safeguarding Officers in every government school.[86]

Ms Jack described the role of Student Safeguarding Officers as:

> … the Safeguarding Officer will be there to help the principal lead the work we're doing to put children and young people at the centre of every decision and action we take. They will be there to help with the development of risk assessment plans and monitor those plans …[87]

The Office of Safeguarding will induct and train Student Safeguarding Officers and support them to develop local safeguarding assessments and risk management plans, as recommended by the Independent Education Inquiry.[88]

Professor Walsh supports creating specialist portfolios to help lift overall capability in a school. She noted that the:

> … development of specialised roles would mean not every teacher would need to possess the maximum level of expertise. Instead, teachers could readily consult with an expert within the school as necessary.[89]

She said that, ideally, there would be a child protection and safeguarding lead as well as a digital safety lead, accompanied by 'elevated status, remuneration and progression commensurate with the degree of expertise required'.[90]

Ms Jack was adamant that the Office of Safeguarding would not simply add a title or give staff extra responsibilities without adequate resourcing. She explained:

> … it may be that we take some of an existing person's role away and give them the safeguarding role if they are the right person, or it might be a recruitment of new staff depending on the skills and experience we require.[91]

We agree that safeguarding roles should be recognised, resourced and rewarded. Student Safeguarding Officers will have an important role in making the work of the Office of Safeguarding tangible and meaningful.

In his February 2023 update, Secretary Bullard told us that, as part of the Department's response to the Independent Education Inquiry, a 'staged roll out' of its 'Safeguarding in Schools' model had begun in November 2022.[92] Implementing Safeguarding in Schools requires all government schools to nominate a Safeguarding Lead during the 2023 school year. Safeguarding Leads are to then receive 'tailored safeguarding resources and supports to ensure they are equipped with the skills and understanding needed to plan and implement strategies to support the safety of all students'.[93] Secretary Bullard told us that all Safeguarding Leads will be provided with 'professional learning' in mandatory reporting and in identifying and addressing child sexual abuse, 'including grooming, and risk management'.[94] Under the model, the Office of Safeguarding will work with Safeguarding Leads to help them improve their skills in risk management and assessment, to enable them to 'put in place risk management plans that focus on preventing, identifying and mitigating the risks of child sexual abuse'.[95]

Children interviewed for our commissioned research said they wanted a trusted confidant who was accessible and preferably proactive in engaging students about worries or concerns.[96] They also told our commissioned researchers that they felt safer when they were asked for their feedback about how things could be improved. They said that schools might feel safer if they had feedback channels such as a 'worries' box where children could confidentially raise concerns with the principal, or that the principal should proactively seek feedback from students and hold regular 'safety sessions' with students in focus groups to reflect on and improve safety measures.[97] We consider Safeguarding Leads could actively encourage the engagement and participation of students to enhance their sense of safety in their school.

3.2.2 Systemic reviews

Every 'incident or episode of sexual abuse in a school can be seen as a failure of its primary safeguarding systems'.[98] The Independent Education Inquiry recommended conducting reviews following incidents to encourage reflection and examine opportunities to strengthen safeguarding responses.[99]

In November 2021, the Department's Executive Group endorsed the process for conducting systemic reviews, noting that it may be subject to change following a 'test and try' approach in December 2021.[100] This 'test and try' review followed a report of child sexual abuse by an employee against a high school student, in which criminal charges were laid.[101]

The members of this Review Panel, as agreed by the Executive, were:

- Executive Director, Safeguarding Children and Young People (Chair)
- Director, Learning Services (Southern Region)
- Director, Legal Services and Workplace Relations
- Deputy Secretary, Corporate Services of the then Department of Communities
- Senior Project Manager, Safeguarding Children and Young People (Secretariat).[102]

The review focused 'on the systems, processes and policies that were used by [departmental] staff involved in the incident or episode, rather than any one individual's actions or decisions'.[103] It was also not designed to be a formal audit or a precursor to any disciplinary or punitive action.[104]

On 3 December 2021, the Review Panel met and discussed the process. Questions for consideration covered the themes of 'prevention of abuse, early intervention and support for action and decision-making'.[105] Other matters considered included the physical environment of the school, records and information capturing the response to the incident and support available to the student and affected staff.[106]

Members of the review team met with key staff (including the principal) and conducted a site visit to observe the physical environment of the school.[107] The team also considered record keeping and information sharing in the response to the matter.[108]

The review made 16 wide-ranging recommendations, covering professional development, internal and external communication, policies and guidelines, consideration of risks in future capital works, and awareness and understanding of relevant policies and procedures.[109]

A survey of the participants interviewed for the review revealed generally positive feedback about the process. One participant described it as 'liberating'; another felt 'supported, respected and heard'.[110]

It is pleasing that the Department has begun these reviews, and we note that the review process itself will be refined and improved over time. However, we make the following observations:

- On the face of the review, its intended audience and distribution are unclear. The Department has since clarified that the review was undertaken to provide the Department's Executive and senior staff with information about system gaps and opportunities to improve the way the Department supports staff to prevent, identify and respond to child sexual abuse. Where the Review Panel saw other opportunities for system improvements, these were shared with relevant business units across the agency.[111]

- The review made several recommendations, some of which overlap with existing recommendations or planned work and others that reflect new initiatives. Some of the Review Panel's recommendations are ambitious and would require significant investment and effort to meaningfully embed. Others were drafted in ways that make acquittal or 'success' ambiguous.
- Any new or added recommendations should be drafted so that outcomes can be meaningfully measured and evaluated against specified objectives. A role holder should be allocated to act on those objectives. The implementation of recommendations should be monitored and reported on at regular intervals. Effective implementation of changes or improvements flowing from systemic reviews is key to building trust and credibility in the review processes.
- On the face of the review, it does not appear that it contemplated involving the relevant young person and/or their family.[112] We acknowledge this may not always be appropriate (including potentially in this case) and, if undertaken, would need to be conducted by skilled professionals in a trauma-informed and age-appropriate way. However, systemic reviews should recognise the valuable information that children and young people, as well as their families and others in the school community, can provide about their experiences of safeguarding. Reviews should also empower young people to share their experiences if they wish to do so. Inviting young people and their carers and families to be involved can also show that the Department has taken their experiences seriously and is committed to improvement into the future. We would suggest that if a Review Panel determines not to invite a young person and/or their family to participate, it should include an explanation of this decision in its report.
- It is not clear that a particular method was used to conduct the review. Using a predefined method (or a combination of methods)—for example, a root cause analysis or after-action review—helps provide consistency across reviews and ensure they are comprehensive and objective. Also, a framework for review questions should be considered before conducting a review.
- The Review Panel does not appear to have included a subject matter expert; we suggest that future panels should include someone with relevant expertise. For example, for a matter involving child sexual abuse, at least one member of the Review Panel should have expertise in child sexual abuse and perpetrator tactics to help advise other panel members in interpreting information. This will also help ensure all aspects of the incident are thoroughly examined and that reviews are comprehensive.

- The review process demonstrated by the then Serious Events Review Team in the former Department of Communities appears much more targeted and reflects a better process (Serious Events Review Team investigations are discussed in Chapter 9 and Chapter 12).

In general, implementing effective systemic reviews can contribute to a workforce culture that is reflective rather than defensive, that acknowledges mistakes, and that values feedback and suggestions for improvement. We acknowledge that achieving this takes time and strong leadership, and we consider that a clear and considered framework for systems reviews will help to achieve this. We commend the Department on having completed its first systemic review and offer the comments above as reflections to support continuous improvement in the review process itself rather than criticism. We particularly commend the conduct of the review resulting in positive feedback from review participants.

3.2.3 The role of the Office of Safeguarding in incidents—Integrity Commission audit findings

Our Commission of Inquiry was given an audit report, prepared by the Integrity Commission, into the Department's handling of a complaint about the conduct of a teacher towards some students. Overall, the Integrity Commission's audit was positive about the Department's management of the matter, but it did make some critical observations about the contribution of the Executive Director, Office of Safeguarding, in relation to the complaint.

The auditor's assessment of the Executive Director was largely based on a one-page document that was at the front of the complaint file and appeared to be a 'review' of the file. The Executive Director noted on this document that the conduct subject to the complaint was inappropriate and did not comply with the State Service Code of Conduct. However, the Executive Director also noted that 'there was no intent behind these actions/behaviours to indicate grooming behaviour'.[113] The Integrity Commission disagreed with this assessment.[114]

The Integrity Commission expressed concern about the role of the Executive Director in 'reviewing' the file, in particular:

- The Executive Director's role (and influence over decision-making) is unclear on disciplinary and misconduct matters.[115]
- There is no clear framework for the 'review' or evidence of a method or supporting evidence for the assessment.[116]
- It did not appear, in the view of the Integrity Commission, that the Executive Director had relevant skills or expertise to assess whether behaviour constitutes grooming.[117]

In relation to the Executive Director, the Integrity Commission concluded:

> While Ms Jack's role may have overall Agency responsibilities, in relation to [Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct] matters it is important to clarify the role of the Safeguarding Children and Young People division. The Secretary must be confident that senior executives in the Department will provide comprehensive, considered, probative and relevant advice. In contrast to the considered, reasoned advice and recommendations provided by the Department's Workplace Relations officers, Ms Jack's advice is of limited value and seems misleading. The value of her review is unclear, and—from my perspective—undermined an otherwise appropriately managed matter.[118]

Ms Jack told us that she did not have a 'direct operational role in responding to allegations, incidents, disclosures or suspicions of child sexual abuse'.[119] The Department in fact advised that the Executive Director did not undertake a formal review of this specific case because the Office of Safeguarding is not formally involved in investigating breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct. The Department told us that the Executive Director was asked to consider the information as a 'critical friend' and offer her initial views.

The role and functions of the Office of Safeguarding should be clearly defined to avoid duplication and confusion, and to properly recognise where the Office of Safeguarding can add value relative to other divisions and business units.

We consider that the Office of Safeguarding should focus on policy, guidance and prevention in education, rather than engaging in investigating individual incidents. We are aware of the importance for those working in policy roles to be informed by what is occurring in practice. We consider it useful for the Office of Safeguarding to have some visibility of incidents (particularly high-level trends or areas of concern) to help inform its priorities, and we suggest that communication between the Office of Safeguarding and our proposed Child-Related Incident Management Directorate regularly occurs. However, the Office of Safeguarding should not have a role in assessing or evaluating the appropriateness of responses to incidents. We consider that this role sits most appropriately in our proposed Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, discussed in Section 6.

3.3 Focusing the Office of Safeguarding's role in an expanded Department

We asked Secretary Bullard about how the Office of Safeguarding will operate in an expanded Department for Education, Children and Young People. We were particularly interested to know whether the Office of Safeguarding will assume functions beyond education, such as youth justice and out of home care. Secretary Bullard stated that the Office of Safeguarding will 'work right across the new department'.[120]

Extending the role of the Office of Safeguarding to work across all portfolios in the expanded Department presents some challenges:

- A large reform agenda—The Independent Education Inquiry proposed a large reform agenda for schools, and our recommendations in this chapter add to that agenda.
- The need for specialist expertise in out of home care, youth detention and child protection—In Chapter 9 we identify that child protection, including out of home care, has unique features that require the Department to have a high level of expertise as well as active and engaged executive leadership. In Chapter 12 we outline the specific need for reform in youth justice and outline a substantial reform agenda. These portfolios require different considerations and a deeper understanding of abuse, neglect and perpetration than may be required in an education context.
- Increased workload—We note in Section 3.1 that the Office of Safeguarding had a staff of six with plans to recruit another four staff, and that it received some support from the Department's Strategic Policy and Planning and Strategic Systems Development areas. We consider that in an expanded Department, the increase in size and complexity of the role of the Office of Safeguarding, which was recommended by the Independent Education Inquiry specifically regarding schools and education, would place significant pressure on existing staff and would likely require a considerable increase in staff to cope with the increased workload.

For these reasons, we are sceptical about the effectiveness of the Office of Safeguarding operating across all portfolios in the expanded Department. We recommend that responsibility for policy formulation and implementation remains with the respective portfolios of out of home care and youth justice and that the role of the Office of Safeguarding remains (or refocuses) on schools and education.

The Office of Safeguarding must have clearly defined priorities and appropriate resourcing. To achieve its ambitions, the Office of Safeguarding will need to be disciplined and strategic. We consider that the Office's priorities should closely align with the yet-to-be implemented recommendations of the National Royal Commission, the Independent Education Inquiry and our Commission of Inquiry in relation to schools and education. The implementation of these complex recommendations must reflect intended outcomes in all their depth and complexity. This will take time.

We are keen to see the Office of Safeguarding succeed and add genuine value to the safeguarding efforts of the Department in relation to schools and education. We do not wish to make premature judgments on its performance, but it is important that the Office of Safeguarding is accountable for its work. Establishing the Office of Safeguarding, and its associated work program, should support children to feel safe at school.

In Chapter 22, we recommend that a Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor evaluates the Government's child safeguarding measures, including the implementation of the Independent Education Inquiry's recommendations. In relation to schools and education, this evaluation could consider children's sense of safety in schools.

Recommendation 6.2

1. The Office of Safeguarding within the Department for Education, Children and Young People should focus primarily on safeguarding children in the education context, with a particular focus on prevention, risk identification, policy development and related workforce development.
2. The Office of Safeguarding should not be involved in critical incident management beyond learning from systemic reviews and trend data.

4 Policies, procedures and guidance

Policies and procedures support schools to respond to child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours. Their importance is reflected across several National Principles for Child Safe Organisations, particularly Principle 10, which states: 'Policies and procedures document how the organisation is safe for children and young people'.[121]

Professor Walsh noted that because teachers encounter incidents of child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours infrequently, they require 'access to high quality, on demand guidance materials', which should be regularly updated.[122]

In this section, we discuss the evidence we heard about the Department's policies on child sexual abuse, including the findings and recommendations of the Independent Education Inquiry.

We recognise the significant reform happening in relation to the Department's policies, including the recent release of an overarching Safeguarding Framework (discussed further in Section 4.1.2). Many policies and procedures that the Independent Education Inquiry examined or were provided to us have since been revised, retired or are under development at the time of writing. Some examples of how policies have changed over time (and how these changes would affect child sexual abuse complaints) are explored in the case studies in Chapter 5.

We are pleased that this area is receiving the attention it needs. We recommend that the Department ensures its child safeguarding policies are publicly available and regularly reviewed. We also recommend developing an education-specific professional conduct policy for schools. Of course, policies alone are ineffective in improving practice if they are not part of a cohesive policy framework that is accessible and integrated into operations. In Section 5, we recommend mandatory professional development and training for all staff and volunteers, which should occur with close reference to the refreshed safeguarding policies.

4.1 Policy improvements

4.1.1 Independent Education Inquiry

The Independent Education Inquiry made several observations about the Department's policies and procedures, including that its safeguarding policies were numerous, confusing and inaccessible, and that there was not enough focus on harmful sexual behaviours.[123] Similarly, one teacher told us:

> The Department may have had policies and procedures about child sexual abuse detection and response, or harmful sexual behaviours, but I was not ever made aware of them, and I do not know where they were located, if they existed.[124]

Some of the Department's policies on child sexual abuse were out of date or did not reflect best practice. Social worker and victim-survivor Kerri Collins described documentation on mandatory reporting, in particular, as being 'very old'.[125] Fellow social worker Debra Drake told us that the responsibility for updating, customising and delivering outdated and ill-suited mandatory reporting materials often fell to social work staff.[126]

Our case studies identified several shortcomings in relation to policies and procedures, namely:

- characterisations of child sexual abuse were not broad enough to capture grooming behaviours and did not identify professional boundary breaches as serious or as possible indications of grooming behaviour—refer to the 'Wayne' and 'Mark' case studies in Chapter 5
- an absence of clear procedures for managing the inappropriate conduct of relief teachers and a lack of feedback pathways on their performance, which meant that concerning behaviour may only be identified due to proactive school leaders—refer to the 'Brad' case study in Chapter 5
- lack of clarity around appropriate social media use by school staff, which can create difficulties disciplining staff in response to complaints that a staff member has sent inappropriate messages to students—refer to the 'Mark' case study in Chapter 5

- neither the State Service Code of Conduct nor departmental policies clearly covered inappropriate conduct outside the school environment. The Solicitor-General has interpreted the law strictly, making it difficult to discipline teachers whose behaviour occurs outside the school setting. Even when the Code of Conduct arguably applies, it may be difficult to substantiate serious complaints by a student against a teacher—refer to the 'Wayne' case study in Chapter 5.

The Independent Education Inquiry recommended that the Department does the following in relation to policies and procedures:

- develops a comprehensive student safeguarding policy and improves existing policies on mandatory reporting, use of technology and duty of care (recommendation 4)[127]
- improves the ability of staff to identify and report concerning behaviour (recommendations 10 and 11)[128]
- develops an education-specific code of conduct to facilitate disciplinary action against staff (recommendation 12)[129]
- integrates student safeguarding policies so their position within the Department's safeguarding policies is clear (recommendations 11, 13 and 14)[130]
- develops protocols to respond to different types of sexual abuse (recommendation 16)[131]
- improves public accessibility to policies (recommendations 19 and 20).[132]

4.1.2 The Department's response

The Department accepted these recommendations and set up the Office of Safeguarding, which is tasked with implementing them—this work is due to be completed by the end of 2023.[133] We discuss the role of the Office of Safeguarding in Section 3.

Since the Independent Education Inquiry report was released, the Department has undertaken the following activities in relation to policies:

- examined 'approximately 70 existing policies and procedures that all contribute in some way to the Department's safeguarding system' to inform development of an overarching safeguarding framework recommended by the Independent Education Inquiry[134]
- updated the mandatory reporting procedure to ensure it is clear and easy to understand[135]

- updated the processes for recording and checking Registration to Work with Vulnerable People statuses, including introducing kiosks to ensure any visitors to school sites have been appropriately screened[136]
- developed a new Safeguarding Children and Young People website to provide students and their families and carers with information on child sexual abuse and how to report concerns[137]
- developed and internally published Advice for Staff on Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse, with accompanying flowcharts for principals (including a flowchart for harmful sexual behaviours)[138]
- distributed updated flowcharts on 'preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse' to schools[139]
- implemented an interim Child Safe Code of Conduct for its staff.[140]

We heard some positive feedback about the recent policy changes. For example, Ms Collins described some policies relating to grooming and sexual assault as 'quite good'.[141] Principal Monique Carter also noted that recently revised flowcharts designed for principals to respond to child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours were clearer and easier to follow.[142]

The Department published its framework for safeguarding children and young people in April 2023.[143] The Safeguarding Framework is structured around the National Principles for Child Safe Organisations 'with a particular emphasis on sexual abuse'.[144] It provides some definitions of various forms of child sexual abuse and gives detailed examples of conduct that may constitute grooming.[145] The Safeguarding Framework encompasses the broader remit of the Department, which includes out of home care and youth justice.[146] It lists the relevant policies in relation to child safeguarding, which include:

- a child safe culture
- reporting obligations
- responding to incidents, disclosures and suspicions
- worker conduct and professional conduct
- duty of care
- risk management
- information sharing
- record keeping.

The Safeguarding Framework provides a welcome overarching framework to the Department's response to child sexual abuse, although we note many of the relevant policies listed in the Safeguarding Framework are not publicly available.[147]

We were particularly pleased to note that the Safeguarding Framework adopts a child participation model that is 'grounded in the [United Nations] Convention on the Rights of the Child and promotes a rights-based approach to the active involvement of children and young people in decision-making'.[148]

We hope that child participation is carried through in policy development and review. As noted, children and young people need to be involved in the systems and processes that impact them at schools.

4.2 Learning from South Australia—policies and guidance

Alana Girvin, former Director, Incident Management Directorate, South Australia, described fundamental changes to the way the South Australian Department for Education responds to child sexual abuse following the 2012–13 Report of the Independent Education Inquiry ('Debelle Inquiry'). The Debelle Inquiry began in response to the mishandling of a sexual abuse case, which was the subject of significant community concern.

We heard that the South Australian Department for Education relies on the following policies:

- Code of Ethics (similar to Tasmania's State Service Code of Conduct), by which all public servants are bound
- Protective Practices for Staff in their Interactions with Children and Young People: Guidelines for Staff Working or Volunteering in Education or Care Settings ('Protective Practices Policy')—this policy is 'relatively prescriptive' and gives examples of boundary violations, such as the unaccompanied transport of young people, filming or photographing of students when not authorised to do so, or initiating or permitting unnecessary or inappropriate physical contact with a child or young person (massage, kisses or tickling games).[149] It forms part of the Code of Ethics[150]
- Responding to Problem Sexual Behaviour in Children and Young People, which describes processes for managing harmful sexual behaviour[151]
- Information Sharing Guidelines, which dictate what information is shared about child abuse allegations, when and with whom[152]

- Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings, which provides a comprehensive step-by-step guide on how to respond to a complaint or disclosure. Ms Girvin told us that all staff are trained to know this guide 'inside out'.[153]

These policies are publicly available and central to the accompanying mandatory professional development program in South Australia, outlined in Section 5.

Ms Girvin described how South Australia's Protective Practices Policy forms part of the South Australian Department for Education's Code of Ethics.

The National Royal Commission also found that:

> … institutions that deal with children should have a code of conduct that outlines behaviour towards children that the institution considers unacceptable, encompassing concerning conduct, misconduct and criminal conduct.[154]

The National Royal Commission recommended that a child-focused code of conduct should:

- include clear definitions of child sexual abuse and grooming
- require that all breaches or suspected breaches of the code be reported
- outline clear processes for responding to breaches
- specify consequences for breaches
- detail the protections available to those who make complaints or report potential breaches.[155]

In relation to the South Australia's Protective Practices Policy, Ms Girvin noted:

> In my opinion, it is important in an education setting … to have bespoke policies to clearly identify conduct with respect to children, including boundary breaches and child sexual abuse.[156]

She added that the level of detail in the policy helps staff feel confident about the Department's expectations.[157] Ms Girvin emphasised that protective policies are 'designed to safeguard children, not to protect adults against allegations of misconduct':[158]

> Policies must assist adults to understand appropriate boundaries in relation to their role and interactions with children and young people. Bespoke policies enable staff to feel confident about the Department's expectations and conduct obligations and enable line managers to clearly address any concerns raised in performance management discussions and written records.[159]

Ms Girvin went on to describe how the Protective Practices Policy serves an 'educative function' by defining what grooming is and giving examples of how it can occur.

The policy creates proactive obligations on teachers to report any suspected grooming by colleagues or risk being in breach of the Code of Ethics themselves.[160] She told us that the clarity of the policy helped minimise discretion and prevarication: 'I think it changed the culture immediately; whether people thought it was right or wrong, didn't matter, it wasn't a debate'.[161]

We were impressed by the nuance in the guidance provided to staff working in rural and regional communities, where maintaining professional boundaries may be more challenging due to shared social and community events with students and their families.[162] We believe the Department could benefit from the experience of its South Australian counterpart in implementing child safeguarding policies.

4.3 Our observations

We acknowledge the Department is working to refresh, combine and promote safeguarding policies. This reform must translate into meaningful improvements to child safety in schools.

We consider that the best way to support the Department's new policies and procedures being adopted broadly across schools is through the mandatory professional development and training we recommend in Section 5. We also consider that the Department should ensure its new policies stay up to date by establishing a regular policy review program. These policies should also be publicly available so children and their parents and carers know what to expect in relation to the conduct of staff and volunteers, as well as in relation to the Department's response to concerns or allegations of child sexual abuse.

In relation to professional conduct, in Chapter 20 we recommend that all Heads of Agencies whose agencies provide services to children should develop a professional conduct policy for the agency's staff, contractors and volunteers. We specify that a breach of such policies may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. Professional conduct policies should be based on National Royal Commission recommendations about codes of conduct and should focus on the distinctive operational environments and challenges presented in each of these sectors.[163] As outlined in Chapter 20, the professional conduct policy should have the following features:

- explain what behaviours are unacceptable including concerning conduct, misconduct or criminal conduct
- define and prohibit child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations
- acknowledge the challenge of maintaining professional boundaries in small communities and provide clear identification of, instructions about, and examples of how to manage conflicts of interest and professional boundaries in small communities

- provide guidance on identifying behaviours that are indicative of child sexual abuse, grooming and boundary violations that are relevant to the particular context of the organisation (in this case schools)
- outline the types of behaviours that must be reported to authorities, including what behaviours should be reported to police, child protection authorities, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme or other relevant agencies, such as the Teachers Registration Board
- provide that not following reasonable directions is a breach of professional standards
- provide that a failure to report a breach or suspected breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the policy
- outline the protections available to individuals who make complaints or reports in good faith
- provide and clearly outline response mechanisms for alleged breaches of the policy
- specify the penalties for breach, including that a breach of the policy may be taken to be a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct and may result in disciplinary action
- cross-reference any other policies, procedures and guidelines that support, inform or otherwise relate to the professional conduct policy, for example, complaint handling or child protection policies or other codes of conduct relevant to particular professions.

In Chapter 20, we also specify that the professional conduct policy should be:

- easily accessible to everyone in the Department and communicated by a range of mechanisms
- explained to, acknowledged and signed by all employees
- accompanied by training and professional development
- communicated to children and young people and their families through a range of mechanisms including publication on the Department's public-facing website.

We are pleased to note that the Safeguarding Framework lists different professional conduct policies for 'learning', the Child Safety Service and out of home care, and youth justice. We consider this approach appropriate to account for the distinct risks that arise in different areas. These professional conduct policies should apply to staff, volunteers and contractors.

In relation to responding to incidents, concerns and complaints about child sexual abuse, we recommend in Section 6 establishing a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate to help schools (and other agencies) respond to allegations of child sexual abuse by staff. We also recommend this Directorate develops guidelines and resources to support this response. The Department's policies should reflect the new process this Directorate will support.

In Section 7, we make recommendations about harmful sexual behaviours, including developing appropriate policies, protocols and guidance to support staff responding to incidents in schools.

Recommendation 6.3

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should make its child safeguarding policies publicly available, including policies on mandatory reporting, professional conduct, and responses to allegations and concerns about child sexual abuse.
2. The Department should establish a regular review process for its child safeguarding policies.

Recommendation 6.4

The Department for Education, Children and Young People, in developing a professional conduct policy (Recommendation 20.2), should ensure:

a. there is a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in schools

b. the professional conduct policy for schools, in addition to the matters set out in Recommendation 20.2, specifies expectations outlined in other relevant school policies and procedures, including those covering online technology and a duty of care owed by staff members

c. the professional conduct policy for schools spells out expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, relief teachers, contractors and sub-contractors

d. the Department uses appropriate mechanisms to ensure compliance by volunteers, relief teachers, contractors and sub-contractors with the professional conduct policy for schools.

5 Professional development for school staff

Teachers, other staff and volunteers in schools should have appropriate professional development to understand their obligations towards students, particularly as these obligations relate to maintaining professional boundaries and complying with relevant policies and procedures. Appropriate professional development clarifies the Department's expectations of adult behaviour and supports them to identify and respond to inappropriate behaviour by other adults.

In addition, teachers are uniquely placed to identify signs of abuse and harm. They know their students, often over many years, and will frequently be able to notice concerning changes in behaviour. Teachers may also be aware of risks faced by a student outside school (for example, if the student is known to the Child Safety Service), allowing them to pay closer attention to signs of abuse. Students often regard teachers as trusted adults, particularly if they do not have protective parents or other adults in their lives. For all these reasons, teachers should be equipped to identify abuse and harm at the earliest opportunity and to respond with sensitivity and confidence if they receive a complaint or disclosure.

5.1 Current training

During our hearings we heard that only mandatory reporting training was compulsory for departmental staff.[164]

Teacher Nigel Russell gave evidence that apart from one session on mandatory reporting training:

> In all the time that I was teaching in the Tasmanian education system, I don't remember receiving any training from the Department around child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours.[165]

Mr Russell emphasised the importance of teachers being able to 'spot' risks to children and to normalise conversations about child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours. He noted that this might be achieved through increased training.[166]

Principal Monique Carter noted that there is no central provision for annual mandatory reporting training and that this is resourced by schools themselves through their social work budgets.[167] As a result, we heard that child safety training is often informal (for example, managed locally by principals) or ad hoc, depending on the priorities and budget of the school. Ms Collins said:

> The Department of Education does not mandate a particular content to mandatory reporting training. This means that not all schools undertake that training, and > it is generally up to the principal as to whether this takes place, and in what form … I sometimes find that mandatory reporting training is not treated with the prominence or seriousness that it deserves.[168]

We heard that principals play a critical role in promoting and reinforcing policies in their school environment. They are responsible for ensuring their staff understand child safety policies at the beginning of every school year.[169]

Ms Collins described the importance of a principal's attitude when promoting and reinforcing policies:

> There are some principals who are just incredible, you know, and they have just got such really good insight around what is and isn't okay, staff boundaries, all of those things. There's others that get nervous and either want to maintain the relationship with the family or, I'm not sure why, but there are staff that aren't allowed to or don't feel they're allowed to mandatory report without running it past the principal first. We tell them that that's not the case, but that's definitely a culture that's developed within the school and it's also by the principal.[170]

As a principal, Ms Carter also described the value and importance of policies in dictating appropriate behaviour for staff, as well as the valuable reference point they offer when counselling staff on their behaviour.[171] However, she acknowledged that the success of policies and procedures relies on a principal's motivation to embed them. She stated that if a principal is not motivated to promote safeguarding policies, this could impede the school's effective application of policies overall.[172]

Steven Smith, Senior Industrial Advocate of the Australian Education Union Tasmanian Branch, also believes that the degree to which different principals and other school leaders promote policies varies from school to school: 'The impression I have is that employees are aware of these policies. However, the extent of understanding is variable'.[173] Mr Smith said he was not aware of any methods the Department uses to record or track whether staff have read or understood policies.[174] He also highlighted a 'concerning gap' in training and policy induction for relief educators and teaching assistants and was unclear about how schools might convey policies to new staff who have joined the school after the annual policy refresher, which generally occurs at the beginning of term 1.[175]

We consider that mandatory professional development on child sexual abuse, harmful sexual behaviours and relevant child safeguarding policies, for all education staff and volunteers, would address this inconsistency in knowledge and training across schools.

5.2 Recent departmental initiatives

The Department has recently made efforts to offer broader professional development beyond the compulsory mandatory reporting training.

When reflecting on barriers to implementing changes, Secretary Bullard noted that the scale of the then Department of Education (which had more than 10,000 employees across 200 sites) was a challenge in developing and delivering professional development, as was the 'diversity of skills, knowledge and capabilities' of the workforce.[176] Ms Carter said that the volume of information for teachers and 'ensuring we have access to the best and most accurate learning resources and materials is also a challenge'.[177]

Secretary Bullard felt that these challenges could be overcome with strong leadership, a 'differentiated approach to training and delivery' and appropriate engagement strategies.[178] By way of example, he highlighted the Department's recent efforts to raise awareness of child sexual abuse with staff through a range of communication forums, including via its website and intranet, emails to staff, online presentations, discussions at its Divisional Leaders Group and Principal Briefings, and discussions with peak organisations such as the Tasmanian Principals' Association, the Tasmanian Association of State School Organisations, Tasmanian School Administrators' Association, Catholic Education Tasmania, Independent Schools Tasmania and the Department's LGBTIQ+ Working Group.[179]

In May 2022, Secretary Bullard described a range of initiatives underway to strengthen professional development of staff while recognising that 'processes alone will not change behaviour'.[180] These initiatives include:

- a review and update of mandatory reporting training as a priority, to be rolled out as compulsory annual training no later than the start of term 1, 2023[181]
- new professional development modules for school principals covering a range of topics on preventing, understanding and responding to child sexual abuse, which will also form part of compulsory annual training[182]
- new mandated professional development requirements as part of school leadership and management prerequisites, with topics covering core legal responsibilities, safeguarding children and young people, parental and community engagement, issues and complaints, the ethical conduct framework and industrial relations[183]
- a move to an online training environment, which will enable the Department to track training completion at the individual level, rather than relying on principal certification.[184]

Secretary Bullard informed us in February 2023 that the Department had developed professional development modules for all staff on mandatory reporting and Registration to Work with Vulnerable People. The mandatory reporting module is compulsory for all staff and must be completed annually. The Department tracks when staff complete the module. If staff do not complete it, this triggers a reminder.[185] The Registration to Work with Vulnerable People module is, at the time of writing, being amended to incorporate Child and Family Services and Youth Justice. An online module is expected to be rolled out 'later in 2023'.[186]

The Department also 'soft launched' (in October 2022) an online professional development module for principals and site leaders on student safeguarding. The module gives an overview of the National Child Safe Standards and the Rights of the Child and advice on trauma-informed approaches to 'incidents, disclosures or suspicions of child sexual abuse in school settings'.[187] Secretary Bullard said that work has now begun on 'amending and augmenting' the module so it can be used by all departmental staff and that it will be made available 'department-wide later in 2023'.[188]

Secretary Bullard further noted that extra funding has been allocated through the State Budget, including $2.6 million over four years from 2022–23 (and $600,000 ongoing), for 'mandatory professional development' for all departmental staff in 'understanding, preventing and responding to child sexual abuse in schools'.[189]

We support this increased focus on professional development and outline in Sections 5.3 and 5.4 some of the components needed for professional development directed at preventing and responding to child sexual abuse.

5.3 Learning from South Australia—professional development

South Australia's Debelle Inquiry recommended that all key staff be trained to implement policies and procedures effectively.[190] In South Australia, anyone who works or volunteers in an education setting must have completed the 'Responding to Risks of Harm, Abuse and Neglect: Education and Care' training. This training is delivered at two levels:

- masterclass course—for all new staff who work directly with children and young people, covering the fundamentals as well as another four-hour facilitator-led masterclass
- fundamental course—a two-hour self-directed online course designed as a refresher for those already certified, and as core knowledge for volunteers, bus drivers, canteen workers or corporate staff who do not work directly with children.[191]

The training focuses on the South Australian Department for Education's key child sexual abuse policies, which are listed in Section 4.2—particularly the Protective Practices Policy and mandatory reporting obligations.[192] This training is compulsory for all staff and volunteers working in the South Australian Department for Education. Ms Girvin reflected that this training has led to more proactive responses to complaints and concerns:

> Because of the training I truly believe that—and because of the culture we're in—I truly believe that teachers believe children in the main and respond immediately. And, even if they have doubts, that whole thing, it's not for me to make a judgment, it's for somebody else to make a judgment, so they report.[193]

5.4 Compulsory and ongoing professional development

We were impressed that the South Australian model requires training of all adults working in schools. In addition to employed and registered teachers, other staff encounter children and young people on school grounds. Ms Carter said that schools often have a range of other staff and volunteers onsite, including grounds people, cleaners, office staff, literacy support staff and others who would benefit from regular training.[194]

We recommend an approach that, in line with the South Australian model, provides foundational as well as more advanced professional development for staff on school premises. This professional development approach should closely align with the Department's policies, procedures and guidance material. Specifically, such training should include information about the prevalence and impacts of child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours, common signs of grooming and abuse, professional and ethical behaviours with students, and importantly, what to do if a disclosure or complaint is made (including mandatory reporting requirements). It should be compulsory, with a requirement to update regularly.

There is an opportunity for Tasmania to improve on the South Australian model by supplementing the masterclass and fundamentals modules with advanced modules that could help develop the expertise of Tasmanian teaching staff, rather than having them solely participate in 'refresher courses' for core knowledge. Professor Walsh highlighted the importance of ongoing professional development for teachers (including principals) to 'refresh, update, and build their knowledge about child sexual abuse throughout their careers'.[195]

We make similar recommendations for professional development for all the government institutions we have examined in this report. The Tasmanian Government could consider increasing efficiency by sharing foundational child sexual abuse training content across child-facing service areas.

Recommendation 6.5

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should adopt and implement a training certification program that is mandatory for all education staff and volunteers. This training should be structured to provide basic and advanced levels of training for different role holders and targeted most directly at staff and volunteers operating in higher-risk settings.
2. Training should cover:
    a. key safeguarding policies of the Department, including appropriate standards of behaviour between adults and students and what to do if child sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours are witnessed or disclosed
    b. relevant legal obligations, including requirements for reporting to Tasmania Police, Child Safety Services, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Independent Regulator under the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, and the Teachers Registration Board.
3. Training should be refreshed periodically and delivered at a time and in a format that will maximise engagement. It should be centrally recorded to monitor participation.
4. The Department should work with the Teachers Registration Board to establish the minimum training requirements for teachers (Recommendation 6.15).

5.5 Tertiary-level teacher education

Future teachers should be supported to understand their professional obligations and the risks of child sexual abuse during their teacher education. As the Independent Education Inquiry noted:

> The disparity in power [between teachers and students] needs to be emphasised in training at the very start of their career—while teachers in training are being inducted into the profession.[196]

We agree with the Independent Education Inquiry's recommendation and the National Royal Commission that child safeguarding should form part of teachers' tertiary training.

There is limited child safety content embedded in the teacher curriculum at the University of Tasmania, where most teachers in Tasmanian government schools are educated.[197]

The Australian Professional Standards for Teachers, which inform the tertiary curriculum, contain responsibilities connected to mandatory reporting and appropriate standards of behaviour in the following areas:

- Standard 7.1 stipulates that teachers 'understand and apply the key principles described in codes of ethics and conduct for the teaching profession'.
- Standard 7.2 stipulates that teachers understand 'relevant legislative, administrative and organisational policies and processes … according to school stage'.[198]

The focus of the Professional Standards reflects the Independent Education Inquiry's finding that training and education on child sexual abuse at the tertiary level is generally confined to mandatory reporting, duty of care and the ethical obligations of teachers.[199]

The Department has a strong interest in the tertiary training the University of Tasmania delivers, given that so many of its graduates go on to become employees. Yet the Independent Education Inquiry described a 'largely indirect' relationship between the Department and the University of Tasmania, as follows:

- A Teachers Registration Board-approved and Australian Institute for Teaching and School Leadership-supported panel of nationally trained accreditation members accredits the Bachelor of Education and Master of Teaching courses.[200]
- The Teachers Registration Board then undertakes an annual reporting process as part of the ongoing oversight of the programs in line with the national standards and Australian Institute for Teaching and School Leadership processes, as well as undertaking a review of accredited courses every five years.[201]
- Departmental staff sit (alongside non-government school representatives) on the Course Advisory Committee for the same courses.[202]

The Independent Education Inquiry recommended that the Department works with the University of Tasmania to introduce content on preventing and responding to child sexual abuse in schools into its curriculum.[203] Professor Walsh similarly recommended that education on child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours should begin during tertiary training and 'build incrementally from that point'.[204] She added that 'quality service provision in educational settings is dependent upon the acquisition of specialist knowledge and skills'.[205]

The National Royal Commission noted that education for tertiary students is 'part of a career-long continuum of building capacity in staff to prevent child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours by children'.[206] It suggested that a curriculum should be included in all tertiary courses aimed at preparing students 'for child-related occupations' and that any such curriculum covers topics including:

- the nature and incidence of child sexual abuse, and the risk and protective factors for victim-survivors and abusers
- the long-term impacts of child sexual abuse and the critical importance of preventing abuse for children in the future

- how to talk to children, recognise behavioural indicators of abuse, including the grooming of children and adults, and the importance of maintaining professional boundaries with child clients
- online safety, including the impact of online pornography on attitudes and its use as a grooming tool
- common myths and stereotypes that can enable abuse to occur and impede identification and disclosure of abuse
- best practice approaches to the prevention of and early intervention for child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours by children and young people
- how and where to seek help for people who are concerned that a child may be at risk
- common psychological and other impacts on victim-survivors and their families
- the spectrum of healthy to harmful sexual behaviours displayed by children and young people.[207]

The Department and the University of Tasmania both acknowledge that course content on understanding and preventing child sexual abuse is not yet embedded in either the Bachelor of Education or Master of Teaching and agree that it should be.[208] We also heard that harmful sexual behaviours content is not a core component of teacher training or continuing professional development.[209]

Secretary Bullard said that the Department has been working with the University of Tasmania on incorporating suitable content about child sexual abuse into university courses and professional development activities.[210] This includes the University of Tasmania establishing a Trauma Informed Practice Research Lab. The Lab will build an evidence base for trauma-informed practice and principles that support classroom educators to recognise behaviours associated with child sexual abuse (including grooming), and how to prevent and respond to it.[211]

Correspondence between the Department and the University of Tasmania reflects a commitment that:

> [The University of Tasmania's] School of Education, the Trauma Informed Practice Research Lab and [the Department] will work together over the course of 2022 to support the development of a set of principles, protocols and practices relating to responsibilities and responses to child sexual abuse.[212]

We endorse the efforts of the Department and the University of Tasmania to address this gap in its tertiary curriculum. While outside our terms of reference, we note the potential for child sexual abuse to co-occur with other forms of abuse and neglect, and we encourage the Department and the University of Tasmania to ensure these reforms also improve knowledge about other forms of abuse and neglect.

6 Responding to and investigating complaints and concerns

The Department has a vital role in keeping children safe by responding to incidents of child sexual abuse in education settings. This role includes investigating complaints (often in consultation with police), supporting victim-survivors, making findings and disciplining employees if an allegation is substantiated, as well as making relevant notifications to external authorities.

The case studies we discuss in Chapter 5, like the Independent Education Inquiry, identify shortcomings in the Department's response to allegations of child sexual abuse, particularly in addressing allegations in a timely way, conducting proper investigations and facilitating appropriate and ongoing supports for children and young people, their families and school staff affected by abuse. More specifically, the systemic problems we identify include:

- School leaders had a high degree of discretion when responding to concerns or complaints of child sexual abuse, leading to inconsistent responses.
- Complaints were not fully explored, due partly to poor understanding of child sexual abuse and grooming behaviours and, sometimes, the belief that complaints made by children were unreliable.
- Record keeping was inadequate and there was no comprehensive central source of information about complaints or concerns. This made it difficult to get a complete picture of issues of concern relating to individual employees (particularly relief teachers moving from school to school).
- There was a lack of clarity about the different roles and responsibilities of Learning Services, Workplace Relations and Legal Services in responding to concerns.
- There were delays in notifications to relevant entities, including in reports to the Teachers Registration Board, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, Tasmania Police and the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line.
- There was poor information sharing between these entities.
- Narrow and legalistic interpretations of the State Service Code of Conduct meant that, despite information suggesting that children might be at risk, the behaviour did not result in disciplinary action. This was particularly the case when behaviour occurred outside school grounds.

- Investigations tended to consider each individual allegation in a complaint separately rather than assessing whether the allegations reflected a pattern of behaviour consistent with sexual abuse or grooming.
- Investigation processes were slow, not trauma-informed, did not reflect good practice in interviewing children, and did not appear to understand grooming behaviours.
- Some recent briefings by Workplace Relations to the Secretary were poor, included little detail of the allegations and lacked an understanding of child sexual abuse and related concerns.
- Investigations ended if a teacher resigned.
- There was not enough support, care and communication provided to children, parents, staff and the school community.

The South Australian Debelle Inquiry made extensive recommendations about responding to allegations of child sexual abuse, including how the disciplinary process should be conducted. The South Australian Department for Education implemented these recommendations through its Incident Management Directorate. This Directorate receives, investigates and coordinates the response to incidents and allegations of employee misconduct. In this section, we recommend that the Tasmanian Government sets up a similar Directorate.

Given many recent changes to the Department's procedures following the Independent Education Inquiry, we begin by providing an overview of the Department's response framework at the time of writing, before discussing some of the ongoing issues that have become clear over the course of our Inquiry.

In the final part of this section, we consider the South Australian model in some detail to give a sense of best practice in responding to child sexual abuse. On the evidence before us, this model appears to have built the trust and confidence—among children and young people, their families, site leaders and school staff—that complaints of misconduct will be taken seriously and addressed appropriately.[213]

We note that the Tasmanian Government has legislated Child and Youth Safe Standards and a Reportable Conduct Scheme in the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023. All schools will be captured by these schemes.[214] The Reportable Conduct Scheme will require heads of relevant entities to notify an Independent Regulator of any reportable conduct (which includes inappropriate sexualised contact with children or sexual abuse) by staff and volunteers regardless of where that conduct occurred, and provide an outline of the steps taken to respond to that conduct as soon as possible, and no later than 30 days.[215] The Independent Regulator will oversee investigations and be empowered to offer guidance and assistance, and to intervene in the event it is not satisfied with the approach adopted.[216]

We consider the introduction of the Reportable Conduct Scheme and Child and Youth Safe Standards will encourage prioritising children's safety in managing concerns about staff and volunteer conduct, lead to greater rigour and transparency in investigations, and improve information sharing between agencies. This will address many of the problems raised in our hearings. (For further discussion of the Reportable Conduct Scheme, refer to Chapter 18.)

Our recommendations to strengthen the Department's responses to complaints and concerns about child sexual abuse will support the Department to show best practice in managing complaints and complying with its obligations under the Reportable Conduct Scheme.

6.1 The Department's response to child sexual abuse

In this section, we outline how the Department currently responds to allegations of child sexual abuse.

6.1.1 Guidance for staff on the initial response

As previously noted, the Department has published flowcharts to help guide staff responses to an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse. The flowcharts give step-by-step instructions on reporting obligations, supporting the complainant, contacting parents or carers, 'critical reflection' and record keeping.[217] The flowcharts also state that all actions are to be guided by the principal, site leader or delegate.

The Advice for School Staff: Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse flowchart sets out the steps staff must take when an incident is witnessed or disclosed, or an allegation is made, of child sexual abuse. The flowchart advises, in step 1, that the need for emergency action (such as contacting emergency services) must be assessed.[218]

Step 2 sets out reporting, advising that mandatory reporting obligations must be followed. If the matter involves a current member of staff then the principal must be notified of the incident or allegation (unless the principal is the subject of the allegation, in which case the Director of Operations, Learning, must be notified). The school must then contact Workplace Relations.[219] Within 24 hours of an allegation being reported to Workplace Relations, the Department must notify police, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Teachers Registration Board (if the allegation is about a teacher), the Integrity Commission and the Department's Legal Services unit.[220] If the matter involves a former employee, then Legal Services must be contacted. The flowchart advises that if the person who is the subject of the allegation is confirmed to be working at another location as an employee of the Department, then Legal Services will refer the matter to Workplace Relations. In matters involving former employees, Legal Services must (as soon as possible or within 24 hours) notify police, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Teachers Registration Board (if the matter involves a teacher).[221]

Step 3 involves ensuring the school provides appropriate support for the child or young person and advises that staff should not interview a child or young person.[222]

Step 4 provides information on contacting parents or carers, including that the staff member who is appointed as the lead for the matter must first consult with Workplace Relations, Legal Services and/or Learning Services to be advised on what information can be shared, and at what stage.[223]

Finally, step 5 gives instructions for ongoing support, critical reflection and documentation. It sets out that staff involved may need to be supported, that critical reflection on the incident may be required and that all aspects of the incident must be recorded in line with the Department's Records Management Policy.[224]

Secretary Bullard explained the Department's process for responding to an allegation of child sexual abuse if a departmental (as distinct from a school) employee is the 'first receiver' of the allegation (for example, if Learning Services receives the complaint).[225]

If the subject of the allegation is a current employee, the 'first receiver' at the Department must, within 24 hours, inform the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, the relevant school principal (if the allegation relates to a school-based employee), Workplace Relations (if the allegation relates to a principal) or the relevant departmental director or manager (if the allegation or incident does not relate to a school-based employee).[226]

Within Workplace Relations, notifications are made to the Assistant Director, Industrial Relations or the Manager, Workplace Relations (for clarity, we will refer only to Workplace Relations unless it is necessary to draw a distinction between these two positions). Once notified, Workplace Relations will provide the person referring the complaint with preliminary advice about what information may need to be gathered and whether the employee subject to the allegations should be 'immediately directed to leave the workplace pending receipt of formal correspondence from the Secretary'.[227] Workplace Relations will also direct the referrer to make a mandatory report to the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, if this has not already been done.[228]

If the incident or allegation relates to a permanent or fixed-term employee, Workplace Relations will advise the employee of the allegation and ask them to 'remain away from the workplace whilst the matter is given further consideration'.[229] If the employee is a relief teacher, Recruitment and Employment (within Human Resources at the Department) is instructed to 'mark' the employee as unsuitable for employment on the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register, which means the relief teacher can no longer be employed by government schools.[230] The process for dealing with relief employees is discussed below.

Within 24 hours of a notification, Workplace Relations must also notify the Secretary of the Department and 'the relevant Deputy Secretary, Director of Workplace Relations and Legal Services' about the complaint.[231] Notifications must also be made to police, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Teachers Registration Board (if the employee is a teacher), the Integrity Commission, the Head of the State Service and the Minister's Office (deidentifying the employee).[232]

If an allegation is raised about a former employee, Workplace Relations should be immediately contacted.[233] Workplace Relations will then refer the matter to Legal Services. Within 24 hours of being notified, Legal Services must notify police, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Teachers Registration Board (if the employee is a teacher).[234]

Secretary Bullard told us that support for complainants, parents and other students is coordinated directly through the relevant school and can involve contact with 'onsite professional support staff or more broadly via contact with the Professional Support unit within Learning Services'.[235] He noted that ongoing communication with complainants, parents, other children and officials is carried out by senior staff at the school, including 'the principal, Social Workers and Senior School Psychologists'.[236]

Secretary Bullard also told us there are no formal reporting lines between schools that would allow them to share information about an allegation or incident of child sexual abuse.[237] He stated that if there was an allegation or incident against an employee who had worked at multiple schools, Workplace Relations would check with those schools to determine whether there were any other matters of concern related to the employee's conduct.[238] We heard that, in some instances, schools rely on informal networks to assess the 'safety' of prospective employees.[239]

6.1.2 The investigative process

Secretary Bullard informed us that after the Department has been notified of an incident, allegation or suspicion of child sexual abuse by an employee or volunteer in an education context, an investigation is initiated within 48 hours.[240]

The investigation process will follow one of two courses, depending on whether the employee is fixed term or permanent, or a relief employee. If the employee is fixed term or permanent, the allegation is referred to the Secretary of the Department 'for consideration of an [Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct] … investigation for an alleged breach of the State Service Act 2000 Code of Conduct'.[241]

Workplace Relations will prepare a brief and accompanying documents for the Secretary.[242] If the Secretary forms a reasonable belief that the State Service Code of Conduct may have been breached, the allegation must be investigated. The Department then appoints an external investigator.[243] The investigator will interview the child or young person and other relevant parties as required, and the employee against whom the allegation has been made. The investigator will prepare an investigation report for the Secretary, which the relevant employee also receives.[244] The Secretary will consider the report and decide if a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct has occurred. If a determination is made that there has been a breach, the Secretary will decide what sanctions should apply.[245] Possible sanctions for breaches of the Code of Conduct include counselling, a reprimand or termination.[246] Employees may also be required to comply with any lawful and reasonable direction given by the Secretary.[247]

Investigations of potential breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct examine the employee's conduct against the provisions in the Code of Conduct. Usually, the employee's conduct is assessed against the following sections of the State Service Act 2000 ('State Service Act'):

> 9(1) An employee must behave honestly and with integrity in the course of State Service employment.
>
> 9(2) An employee must act with care and diligence in the course of State Service employment.
>
> 9(3) An employee, when acting in the course of State Service employment, must treat everyone with respect and without harassment, victimisation or discrimination.
>
> 9(14) An employee must at all times behave in a way that does not adversely affect the integrity and good reputation of the State Service.[248]

The first three of these provisions require that the relevant conduct be 'in the course of State Service employment'. Secretary Bullard told us that an Employee Direction No. 5—Breach of the Code of Conduct investigation will be triggered 'even where a question remains as to whether or not the conduct was "in the course of employment"', acknowledging that this is a matter that he considers 'should be explored as part of the investigation rather than impede an investigation commencing'.[249] (We discuss the requirement for conduct to be 'in the course of employment' in more detail in Chapter 20 and make recommendations to modify that requirement.)

As noted above, if the subject of the allegation is a relief employee, a different investigatory process follows. A matter involving a relief employee is referred to the Secretary, who will determine if there has been a breach of departmental policy (for example, the Conduct and Behaviour Standards policy), not the State Service Code of Conduct, because relief employees are not covered by the State Service Act.[250] If the Secretary considers there may have been a breach of a departmental policy, the Secretary will write to the employee seeking a response to the allegations.[251] Depending on the relief employee's response, further enquiries, coordinated through Workplace Relations and the relevant principal, may be made.[252]

After considering the relief employee's response, the Secretary determines whether the person poses an unacceptable risk to students or whether conditions should be imposed on the person before they are eligible for future employment.[253] A determination that the relief employee poses an unacceptable risk and is therefore unsuitable for employment will result in their removal from the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register.[254] Secretary Bullard emphasised that a different test is employed for relief staff because they are not subject to restrictive code of conduct provisions:

> … once a relief employee has been marked as unsuitable for employment on the fixed term and relief register, they are no longer available for employment, nor does the Department have any obligation to offer further employment. However, this process and the resulting decisions have been adopted through a duty of care lens, which is outside the existing employment framework, particularly code of conduct provisions, but is the paramount consideration.[255]

We are unsure what, if any, benefit is gained by using different investigative processes for relief employees. As we understand it, the reason for the difference is that relief teachers are not covered by the State Service Act and therefore cannot be subject to sanctions for breaches under the State Service Code of Conduct.[256] We discuss how to hold contractors, volunteers and temporary staff, including relief teachers, accountable for their professional conduct in Chapter 20.

6.2 Current challenges

We have identified gaps in the Department's response to allegations of child sexual abuse that require further reflection and improvement. In particular, we are concerned with aspects of the Department's investigative process, the lack of appropriate support for complainants and victim-survivors after an allegation is made, and whether the State Service Code of Conduct is suitable for assessing allegations of, and sanctions for, child sexual abuse. This section considers the Department's response to allegations of child sexual abuse perpetrated by adults and does not include harmful sexual behaviours displayed by children. We discuss the Department's response to harmful sexual behaviours displayed by children in Section 7.

6.2.1 Preliminary assessments

There is considerable discretion in undertaking preliminary assessments. Secretary Bullard told us that any allegation of child sexual abuse is referred to him for consideration as to whether there has been a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct (based on a reasonable belief that this may be the case).[257] He explained that:

> In circumstances where a matter is unclear as to whether child sexual abuse may have occurred and following initial assessment there is no risk to children, an action can include further preliminary inquiries to enable further and better particulars to be obtained. This may involve discussions with staff or students and obtaining statements or similar material.[258]

We understand that, in some instances, the Department may need to gather more information before it can proceed with a matter—such as whether the alleged abuser worked at a particular school—but we are concerned that preliminary assessments occur outside policy or legal frameworks and are not subject to any formal rules. Essentially, as we have observed across our institution-specific inquiries, preliminary assessments appear to have been treated as mini-investigations and have developed as a way to deal with disciplinary matters before engaging with the more involved Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct process. The quality and appropriateness of the preliminary assessment can rely heavily on the skills and experience of the staff member undertaking it. A poor preliminary assessment can result in non-trauma informed, harmful engagements, such as Kerri Collins told us she experienced (refer to Chapter 5).

The lack of formal processes for a preliminary assessment means that even the small protections in place to support a trauma-informed investigation for disciplinary processes do not apply to preliminary assessments. For example, Steven Smith of the Australian Education Union told us that while Employment Direction No. 5 requires that interviews conducted with children be 'sensitive and appropriate', this is not a requirement for 'preliminary investigations', including for interviews with students conducted by educators and principals.[259] Mr Smith's view was that from the time an allegation is raised, 'there should be a clear process for engaging with the children involved and trained staff who undertake those interviews and processes'.[260]

We are pleased to note that the Department's flowchart, Advice for School Staff—Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse cautions that in supporting a child or young person who has suffered sexual abuse, staff should not question or conduct an interview with the child or young person.[261] However, we would like to see a specific policy on the process of conducting a preliminary assessment, which specifies the scope and timeframes of any preliminary assessments, as well as who can conduct them. The Integrity Commission's Guide to Managing Misconduct in the Tasmanian Public Sector outlines best practice for preliminary assessments.[262] We make recommendations about the State Service Code of Conduct and associated investigative processes, including preliminary assessments, in Chapter 20.

6.2.2 Accountability and flexibility

Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct is specific in the processes that must be followed and does not allow for different responses depending on the level of seriousness of the allegations. During our hearings, we asked Secretary Bullard how the Department decides which investigations should be prioritised. He responded that under Employment Direction No. 5, matters were assessed as they came to his attention.[263] Secretary Bullard informed us that there is sometimes a queue of matters requiring investigation.[264] He noted that in the past, a Head of Agency could refer more serious matters directly to the State Service Commissioner, providing for greater efficiencies in handling complaints.[265] The Department later told us that all allegations of serious misconduct, including child sexual abuse, are dealt with immediately.[266] It said:

> … if a serious matter is reported to [the Department], it is progressed immediately through our established process and is responsive to the level of seriousness. All allegations that involve serious misconduct, e.g. assault, theft or child sexual abuse, are dealt with immediately. Lower-level conduct, though still regarded as serious (such as an allegation involving verbal comments or exchanges), is still dealt with expeditiously, but due to [Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct] provisions, must follow the same process.[267]

Despite the Department's statements about how they prioritise investigations, we are concerned that the Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct process leaves little flexibility to triage complaints and ensure the most serious are dealt with promptly. Quite apart from the effect of delay on the child who may have been abused, this may delay action to protect other children and young people. We outline an alternative process in Chapter 20. We also consider that it must be clear that all types of allegations about child sexual abuse and related matters (including verbal comments and exchanges, and professional boundary breaches) should be regarded as high priority.

We also asked Secretary Bullard what accountability mechanisms were in place to give the Department confidence that their processes for dealing with allegations of child sexual abuse are working. Secretary Bullard responded:

> … every allegation that is raised must be referred to Workplace Relations and Workplace Relations must refer it to me. Every allegation that is raised must be referred to the … Working with Vulnerable People Check and the Integrity Commission, and Teachers Registration Board where it relates to a teacher, and that is the process that sits in place now.[268]

Secretary Bullard said staff now have increased awareness of the requirement to report all matters of concern. He acknowledged that the Department can only respond to an allegation if conduct is recognised by observers as child sexual abuse, grooming or a professional conduct breach, and he noted the importance of training in this regard.[269] We make recommendations about improved training in Section 5.

6.2.3 Investigations where the person is no longer an employee

In some instances, workers will resign or retire before an investigation into their conduct is complete. At the time of giving evidence, Secretary Bullard said that the Department did not have the jurisdiction to carry out an investigation in relation to a former employee—that is, an employee who had resigned or retired.[270]

The practice was for the Secretary to write to the employee letting them know:

> … that a condition precedent of future employment will be for an investigation to be undertaken and a resolution attained prior to commencing employment. … Furthermore, recruitment screening mechanisms also apply should an application for employment be made.[271]

We note some of the problems with this process in Chapter 5 (refer to the 'Brad' case study).

We are pleased that under the recently passed Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, investigations into workers whose employment with the Department ends during the investigation must be completed.[272] Also, the Act allows for information sharing (including investigations into the conduct of a previous employee) between relevant entities, such as the Teachers Registration Board, which enables important information to be shared in circumstances where teachers may move to another school in the State or to another jurisdiction.[273] We note, also, that the Teachers Registration Act 2000 ('Teachers Registration Act') requires employers to notify the Teachers Registration Board if a registered teacher resigns or retires in circumstances where the employer may have had grounds to consider the teacher's behaviour to be unacceptable.[274]

In Chapter 20, we recommend that investigations be conducted, where appropriate, even if an employee has resigned before an investigation begins—that is, investigations should be conducted into former employees if warranted—and that all misconduct-related matters be recorded, regardless of the outcome (refer to Recommendation 20.9).

In addition, where the Department cannot undertake disciplinary action, it should ensure it has made all reports to relevant bodies—such as the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, the Teachers Registration Board and the Independent Regulator of the Reportable Conduct Scheme.[275] The Department should also report breaches of the Code of Conduct by former employees to the new Register for Tasmanian State Service Code of Conduct Breaches in the State Service Management Office, Department of Premier and Cabinet, to ensure they are not employed elsewhere in the State Service in the future.[276] Agencies should check with the State Service Management Office if people are on this register when screening new staff. In our chapter on State Service disciplinary processes, we further discuss a register of misconduct-related matters (refer to Chapter 20).

6.2.4 Investigators

It is fundamental to ensure that the investigation process does not further traumatise victim-survivors. The qualifications, skills and approach of investigators is central to achieving this aim. Victim-survivor Rachel told us that, in her case, investigators did not conduct themselves in a trauma-informed way and so she felt unable to tell them what had happened to her:[277]

> … there were, from what I remember, two men in suits in a small office at school; I didn't—it wasn't a safe place for me, reflecting back, because I wasn't willing to come out with anything, but I just felt like this little person with these men in suits hovering over the top of me, and scared, I feared it.[278]

Secretary Bullard gave evidence that the 'vast majority of recent investigations' into allegations of child sexual abuse are conducted by a single, independent investigation service.[279] That service is staffed by two male investigators.[280] The Department also occasionally uses three other investigative services, each staffed by single investigators—two of these investigators are female and one is male.[281] While Workplace Relations helps investigators to contact schools and to gather documents and other relevant information, investigators are independent of the Department (including the Secretary).[282]

Mr Smith, of the Australian Education Union, pointed out that Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct instructs the Head of Agency to ensure investigatory interviews with children are conducted 'sensitively and appropriately', but he has not seen a policy in this respect, nor any practices 'to monitor compliance'.[283] Mr Smith believes that investigators should be trained to recognise grooming behaviours, as should others involved in decisions about the investigative process.[284]

While the Department's investigators may each have many years of experience and various qualifications, we note that none of them has qualifications in interviewing children, trauma-informed interviewing techniques, or identifying and responding to child sexual abuse.[285] Also, the Department does not provide specific training for investigators who investigate matters involving children or child sexual abuse, or in trauma-informed interviewing techniques.[286]

Secretary Bullard reported that investigations must also be conducted with 'procedural fairness and in a timely manner, that is within a reasonable time and free from unreasonable delay'.[287] When the Department's investigation into Rachel's case was undertaken in the 2000s, she told us that it took two years:

> … two years is a very long time [for the alleged abuser] to be investigated. I wasn't coping at all. I started drinking. I hated myself. I would see him … and when I saw him I was so fearful of running into him. I did run into him, he smiled arrogantly and I had to run away from him.[288]

Lengthy delays may also place other children at risk.

Secretary Bullard said that factors affecting how long an investigation takes include the complexity or seriousness of the allegations, the number of witnesses and whether police were also investigating with a view to charging the employee (in which case, police may request that the Department waits for the outcome of the police investigation).[289] Secretary Bullard noted that when a delay does occur, it can be 'compounded at a number of points' in the investigative process.[290]

When questioned about why there were no specific timeframes placed on investigators, Secretary Bullard stated that the Department does not want to appear to be 'fettering the independence' of the investigator, adding that, in a small jurisdiction like Tasmania, there is a limited pool from which people capable of undertaking these investigations to the required standard can be drawn.[291]

We consider it reasonable that the Department sets a timeframe at the outset of an investigation that accounts for the complexity of the matter and provides the investigator with an opportunity to explain why more time may be needed before this timeframe expires.

We are pleased to note that in September 2022, in response to evidence provided by victim-survivors, the Department stated it was revising its approach to conducting investigations, including:

> .... ensuring that departmental staff and investigators take a trauma-informed approach in their dealings with children and young people impacted by sexual abuse as well as adult victim-survivors.[292]

Specific measures taken by the Department include:

- Setting a general timeframe of 12 weeks (from the appointment of an investigator), within which the investigation report should be completed.[293] The Department now requires 'early notification of any delay including whether an extension will be required'.[294] Investigators must provide monthly progress updates on the investigation to the Department.[295] Investigators are further required to communicate to the Department any discovery of information during their investigation that may constitute a (further) breach of the State Service Code of Conduct.[296]
- Ensuring that if an investigation requires interviewing students, that 'trauma-informed practice' is used.[297] This may include considering the 'time, location, and support to ensure the student feels safe, with appropriate trust, empowerment and choice built in' to the interview process.[298]

We also understand that, under further planned changes, the Department will require potential investigators to demonstrate 'a range of standards' including:

- experience in engaging with children and young people in stressful or traumatising situations
- training in trauma-informed practices, including the ability to apply trauma-informed practices to investigations
- experience and training (or the commitment to attend training) in contemporary interviewing techniques for children and young people.[299]

Secretary Bullard told us that the Department will set up a Standing Panel of investigators to ensure investigators have appropriate qualifications. The Standing Panel will be recruited through a tender process.[300] Investigators appointed to the panel will conduct State Service Code of Conduct investigations for the Department as well as other State Service agencies.[301] The Department should consider seeking tenders from investigators in other Australian jurisdictions as well as Tasmania.

We support these changes to the Department's approach. However, in terms of the required qualifications for investigators, we note that training in child sexual abuse, in particular identifying grooming behaviours and boundary breaches, is missing. We are concerned that some developments that have improved best-practice police responses to child sexual abuse are not being adopted in non-criminal settings. We discuss these developments in more detail in Chapter 16, but they include:

- taking a 'whole story' approach to interviewing a victim-survivor to allow for a pattern of behaviour and extra corroborating context to be apparent
- ensuring the environment of the interview is comfortable for the victim-survivor, and that they have a support person present if they choose, to minimise the need for multiple interviews through techniques such as video recordings
- engaging in a developmentally appropriate and trauma-informed interaction with vulnerable witnesses (for example, children and young people, people with disability, adult victim-survivors).

We recommend that training in child sexual abuse and related concerns be included in the relevant standards.

6.2.5 Support for victim-survivors

Research we commissioned highlighted the importance of supporting children and young people who have disclosed abuse. The researchers found that a key concern of children and young people following an incident is that the response is not visible—for example, there may be little or no communication with the child or young person about what the school is doing or intends to do about the complaint, and little or no support offered by way of counselling.[302]

Victim-survivors told us they received limited or no support from the school or the Department following their allegation of abuse:

- Victim-survivor Katrina Munting (refer to Case study 4 in Chapter 5) told us that after her disclosure she was not informed about what, if any, action was taken in response: 'so far as I know, there were no inquiries made to determine the extent of what Peter had done. I received no support for the psychological issues that arose for me then, which have persisted'.[303]
- Victim-survivor Kerri Collins (refer to Case study 1 in Chapter 5) similarly attested that after she alleged abuse in the late 1980s: 'I was not offered with support or counselling by the school, and it was always my understanding that the principal did not believe us'.[304]

- In an extraordinary scenario, Rachel (refer to Case study 3 in Chapter 5) described her hurt and confusion when she discovered the outcome of an investigation into her complaints in the local paper. The paper reported that following an 'extensive' investigation, it was determined that her abuser had not breached the Code of Conduct. Rachel told us that she did not receive any reasons from the Department for the decision and felt 'betrayed and publicly humiliated' by the Department: 'they had failed to support their student and chose instead to protect the teacher'.[305]

We also heard about the impact child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours can have on staff and parents. Staff may witness abuse or harmful sexual behaviours and receive disclosures. They may need to come to terms with complaints about colleagues and manage ongoing anxiety or concerns with families and carers. Some will inevitably see the effects of abuse on victim-survivors in their classrooms:

- Nigel Russell, a former high school teacher, told us about the devastating and lasting effects he suffered after witnessing an incident involving harmful sexual behaviours in his classroom. Mr Russell said: 'The principal of the school refused to acknowledge the incident for what it was, a sexual assault'.[306]
- Robert Boost gave evidence that, in 2020, a relief teacher at his daughter's school made inappropriate comments to some of the girls at the school. Mr Boost told us that teachers made complaints to the principal. Mr Boost said that neither the school nor the Department communicated anything about the situation to parents, nor was the incident raised with staff—the member of staff who had made the inappropriate comments simply did not show up for work the next day and nothing was ever communicated by the Department about what had happened.[307]

When asked what sort of information from the Department would have helped him, as a parent of a child at that school, Mr Boost responded that 'it didn't need to have any detail, just that there was an incident and … if any kids needed counselling or if parents had queries, to contact the principal, just as simple as that'.[308]

He also reflected:

> … how do we instil trust in an institution like the Department of Education when this person potentially the next day could have just gone to another school and done the same thing. … [The Department is] so worried about adults' feelings that they're not … protecting the kids … they're so worried about it not getting out and it being bad publicity or whatnot. That kind of behaviour needs to be called out and … it's for everyone's benefit that they knew that that happened at that school.[309]

A clear and consistent process for communicating with victim-survivors is important beyond any initial departmental response. This is evident in the impact of poor communication on victim-survivor Sam Leishman, who was not contacted by the Department after the high-profile conviction of teacher Darrel Harington in early 2020 (refer to Case study 7 in Chapter 5).[310]

In this respect, we note that the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 provides for feedback to children and young people after an investigation.[311]

At hearings, Secretary Bullard acknowledged that a lack of communication from the Department to victim-survivors could be construed as inaction and can inhibit their ability to achieve closure.[312] He stated that:

> … providing information and communicating with the various parties involved is difficult given confidentiality provisions and procedural fairness requirements particularly in relation to unsubstantiated allegations and with disciplinary actions imposed on an employee.[313]

We are pleased to note that since hearing from victim-survivors, the Department is planning to allocate dedicated case managers when an allegation of sexual abuse is made. The case manager will be 'accountable for ensuring that the supports required are provided to the child and their family, both immediately and over the course of time'.[314] This support should be extended to adult victim-survivors where required. We consider this case manager role should sit within the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate we recommend in Recommendation 6.6.

In an update provided to us in February 2023, Secretary Bullard said that the Department had filled two 'Student Support Response Coordinator' positions. He explained that the coordinators are:

> … responsible for professional management of responses to incidents of child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviour, ensuring that the best interests of the children and young people are the central consideration.[315]

Other responsibilities include ensuring the 'capture and storage' of school records about child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours 'meet legislative and departmental requirements and can support analysis to understand trends' and inform improvements.[316] On the information provided to us, it is unclear what role the coordinators will have, if any, in supporting students and how they will work with case managers.

6.2.6 Codes of conduct

The Independent Education Inquiry noted there was 'broad agreement' that the State Service Code of Conduct is not suited to the distinct context of schools and that this creates difficulties for the Department when responding to concerns or allegations of child sexual abuse.[317] Formal disciplinary proceedings require a breach of the State Service Code of Conduct. Also, the requirement that the conduct must have occurred in the course of their employment 'has been interpreted narrowly to mean that if the conduct in question did not occur at school or on a school activity the employee cannot be subjected to disciplinary proceedings'.[318] We heard that this interpretation has allowed some teachers to argue that allegations of child sexual abuse against them have no merit because the conduct did not occur on school grounds or during school hours.[319]

The Independent Education Inquiry recommended that the Department develops a 'schools-specific' code of conduct covering employees and volunteers.[320] As discussed in Chapter 4, the Department accepted all the recommendations.

When asked how the Department was approaching recommendations that an education-specific code of conduct be developed, Secretary Bullard told us that there were challenges with having two codes—that is, an education-specific code as well as the State Service Code of Conduct—because under the current drafting of the State Service Act there are practical barriers to introducing more codes of conduct.[321]

In Section 4, we discuss the need for an education-specific professional conduct policy, and we make a recommendation for this (refer to Recommendation 6.4). We consider this will avoid the problems associated with a separate education-specific code of conduct, while meeting the intent of the recommendation of the Independent Education Inquiry.

6.3 Learning from South Australia: a model for responding to child sexual abuse in educational settings

One of the recommendations of the Debelle Inquiry in South Australia was establishing an Incident Management Directorate ('the Directorate') in the South Australian Department for Education.[322]

The role of the Directorate is to:

> … coordinate the receipt, assessment and response of incidents, particularly those of a severe/critical nature, those requiring urgent attention and/or the investigation of allegations of employee serious misconduct and all associated disciplinary processes.[323]

In contrast to the Department's current responses to allegations of child sexual abuse, which occur primarily through Workplace Relations within the human resources unit, the South Australian Directorate operates independently of human resources in the South Australian Department for Education.

The policies that inform the Directorate's work include the South Australian Public Sector Code of Ethics and the Protective Practices Policy, which have prescriptive guidelines on matters that may be subject to disciplinary action, such as boundary breaches and grooming.[324] The Directorate's work is also informed by the South Australian Department for Education's Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings guidelines, which are based on recommendations in the Debelle Inquiry report.[325]

We heard that the outcome of establishing the Directorate, alongside implementing the Debelle Inquiry's recommendations, has provided a comprehensive framework for responding to child sexual abuse in educational settings in South Australia. Alana Girvin, former Director of the Directorate, told us that part of the success of the unit is due to an awareness among departmental and school staff that clear processes will be followed in the wake of any allegations of child sexual abuse. This includes informing the school community of the allegations, informing families when a person is charged and activating processes for terminating employment if an allegation is upheld.[326] According to Ms Girvin, 'although the Directorate is concerned with investigation and response, my strong feeling is that its work has also had a preventative effect'.[327]

Ms Girvin's further observations about the success of the Directorate are worth quoting at length:

> While I was the Director of the Directorate, the Directorate received a lot of informal feedback from site leaders who were so thankful for the support they received from their Case Manager. For example, I heard lots of feedback along the following lines, which I think is a sign of the Directorate's success: 'thank you for your support. This was obviously a horrible situation and I never wanted to have to go through it in my career, but I felt supported and it has gone as smoothly as it possibly could have. You were there to listen to me at 9 o'clock at night'.
>
> In relation to allegations of sexual misconduct matters the Directorate measures its success in terms of the timely response, flow of accurate information, the effectiveness of the case management and single file and adherence to the guidelines/procedures.
>
> In my view, another reflection of the Directorate's success is that the education union was supportive, or at least did not object, to the Directorate's work and its implementation of the Debelle recommendations.[328]

Other key features instrumental to the success of the Directorate include:

- its operational independence from the South Australian Department for Education's human resources unit
- an articulated process which applies even when conduct does not amount to criminal behaviour
- a close relationship with South Australia Police and an obligation on South Australia Police to notify the South Australian Department for Education of particular matters
- the use of investigators with policing backgrounds who act on the evidence
- a case manager to support every principal in relation to responding to an allegation.[329]

In the box below, we outline in detail key aspects of the South Australian Directorate model, as a starting point for the Tasmanian Government to adopt a similar model—a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate. We consider this a central recommendation that will support a significant change to the Tasmanian Government response to allegations of child sexual abuse by staff.

South Australia's Incident Management Directorate

The South Australian Incident Management Directorate has three key units: the Incident Report Management Unit ('Response Unit'), the Investigations Unit and the Misconduct and Disciplinary Advice Unit. Importantly, the Directorate's role extends to independent schools.[330]

Response Unit

The Directorate's Response Unit case manages allegations of sexual abuse and oversees the Incident Report Management System.[331] The Response Unit aims to ensure that:

- parents and carers can be confident that the wellbeing and safety needs of their children are met
- 'incidents (particularly those of a severe/critical nature) and reports of serious misconduct are responded to in an effective and timely manner, with respect, transparently and professionally'.[332]

Ms Girvin told us that case management involves assisting site leaders and principals to implement the Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct guidelines.[333] Importantly, the Response Unit acts as the 'prime point of contact for site leaders' and oversees the 'single file' for all matters involving allegations of child sexual abuse.[334]

All 'critical incidents', which include harmful sexual behaviours by students, as well as fights and 'inappropriate parent behaviour', are logged in the Response Unit's Incident Report Management System.[335] When an incident report is entered into the system, a 'severity rating … is automatically applied to … [the] incident report … dependent upon the categories and site actions selected by the person completing the report'.[336] Critical Incident Coordinators review the incident reports each day to ensure 'all appropriate actions are being taken' by 'sites' (schools).[337]

Ms Girvin told us that when an allegation is referred for investigation:

> … an Intake and Assessment Officer (whose role is line managed under the Incident Report Management Unit) assesses whether an allegation or incident is capable (if established) of constituting serious misconduct. If the answer to that question is 'no', then the Directorate will refer the matter to the Performance Management and Incapacity Unit within the corporate office. This unit will assist site leaders with performance management matters and minor misconduct matters.
>
> If the Intake and Assessment Officer determines that it is not to be investigated, the report will be referred to the appropriate corporate office and recorded in the central online Incident Report Management System, as well as in any documentation kept on site. If there are ongoing problematic behaviours, [the report] may be relevant for the Directorate to investigate [those other behaviours].[338]

When an Intake and Assessment Officer receives a report that contains allegations of serious misconduct, such as child sexual abuse, the Officer will gather all relevant information and present it to an Assessment Panel.[339] Assessment Panels are composed of the '[Directorate] Director, Assistant Director, Investigations Unit Manager and Misconduct Unit Principal Investigator'.[340]

Because school principals often have little to no experience with managing serious allegations involving child sexual abuse, the Response Unit has a vital role in offering support and assistance to navigate the response process. The Response Unit provides principals and other site leaders with a case manager who is available during and outside work hours.[341] Case managers also help to minimise a site leader's discretion in the process, allowing them to focus on the aspects of their role that are within the scope of their skills and training.[342]

According to Ms Girvin, once parents have been informed about an allegation of child sexual abuse, 'rumours and gossip can run rampant. It often follows that the site leader is blamed'.[343] While the Directorate does not play a role in managing information in this situation (with responsibility for this resting with site leaders and their managers), the assigned case manager can provide support to, and discuss concerns with, the site leader in this situation.[344]

Investigations Unit

The Directorate's Investigations Unit investigates all allegations of 'possible serious employee misconduct'.[345]

Investigators gather evidence, interview witnesses and take witness statements. They then prepare reports for the adjudicators to consider.[346] Adjudicators sit in the Directorate's Misconduct Disciplinary Advice Unit. The South Australian process distinguishes between investigators who gather the evidence and adjudicators who make recommendations based on that evidence for review by the Department's Chief Executive (or Chief Operating Officer and the Director of the Directorate).[347]

All Investigation Unit investigators have a policing background and must complete 'Specialist Vulnerable Witness Forensic Interview Training', which is provided by the Centre for Investigative Interviewing at Griffith University.[348]

Ms Girvin noted that if, during an investigation, the investigator identifies ways in which aspects of the response process could be improved, the Directorate may request that the Executive Director of Partnerships, Schools and Preschools reviews the relevant process, ensuring a pathway for continual improvement over time.[349] We envisage that Tasmania's Office of Safeguarding could play a similar role.

Misconduct Disciplinary Advice Unit

The Directorate's Misconduct Disciplinary Advice Unit is staffed by 'Misconduct Adjudicators'. The primary function of the unit is to examine the reports prepared by the Investigations Unit and 'determine if the evidence demonstrates serious misconduct'.[350] If it does, a briefing is prepared for the 'delegate (Chief Executive/ Chief Operating Officer)' outlining:

a. a summary of the allegation and the evidence gathered by the investigators

b. the adjudicator's conclusion as to whether there is evidence of serious misconduct

c. the adjudicator's recommendation as to any disciplinary sanction that should be made.[351]

Ms Girvin told us that adjudicators in the Misconduct Disciplinary Advice Unit have legal qualifications. Unlike investigators, they have not met the accused or any witnesses, allowing them to appraise the evidence with 'an independent eye'.[352]

6.4 An Incident Management Directorate

The National Royal Commission identified a number of ways institutions should handle complaints and respond to child sexual abuse allegations (using a 'child safe' approach), including for:

- Investigating complaints—investigations should be conducted by impartial, objective, trained investigators.[353]
- Interviewing children—children should not be questioned by someone 'without relevant specialist skills, such as child development, trauma-related behaviours, indicators of abuse and investigative techniques'.[354]

- Communicating with the affected parties—many people associated with the institution will be affected by a complaint of child sexual abuse, and policies and procedures should outline what information can be shared, when and in what circumstances.[355]
- Providing support and assistance to complainants—'concern and support' for the person making the complaint 'must be at the heart of an institution's response'.[356] Institutions should respond in a supportive and protective way to child and adult victim-survivors of child sexual abuse. Responses should be sensitive so as to not compound or cause more harm.[357] Victim-survivors and other affected parties (including the subject of the complaint) should have access to support, therapeutic treatment services and advocacy.[358]
- Providing support and assistance to others—'secondary victims may also require information, advocacy, support and therapeutic treatment as part of an institution's complaint handling process'.[359]

The South Australian model embodies many of the features that the National Royal Commission recognised as being instrumental to an institution's ability to respond to concerns or complaints of child sexual abuse in a way that is sensitive and child focused.

We recommend that the Tasmanian Government establishes a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate to oversee and respond to allegations of child sexual abuse by staff, including grooming, breaches of professional conduct policies and sexual misconduct (as defined by the Reportable Conduct Scheme). This Directorate should be based on the South Australian model and have three distinct units and functions—case management of the response, investigation and adjudication.

We recommend that this Directorate oversees the response to allegations about staff in relation to the education, the Child Safety Service, out of home care and youth justice contexts (refer to also Chapter 9 and Chapter 12). In addition to child sexual abuse, the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate should respond to other forms of staff-perpetrated abuse in schools, out of home care and youth justice, including other serious care concerns, excessive use of force and inappropriate isolation and search allegations. It could also respond to child-related critical incidents in health or family violence and homelessness services. To enable this, the unit responsible for case management should be staffed by people with knowledge and expertise of each of these organisational contexts.

During our hearings, Secretary Bullard was asked for his views on the South Australian model. He stated that he was very supportive but questioned whether a similar model should perhaps apply across the State Service in Tasmania rather than sit within the Department, considering the relatively small size of the Department and the Tasmanian State Service.[360] We note that the State has indicated that a shared capability framework for the investigation of serious Code of Conduct breaches would be developed by June 2023 and a Project Manager was appointed in September 2022.[361] We encourage the State to consider the role of the Directorate within the context of the shared capability framework.

We note in Chapter 5 that there have been many matters raised with the Department in recent years. Given we propose that the Directorate oversees schools, out of home care and youth justice, we consider that there will be a significant workload for the Directorate.

Despite this, we have not specified where this Directorate should be established in the Tasmanian Government, but note that the Department of Premier and Cabinet, with its responsibility for all State Servants, or the Department for Education, Children and Young People, with its responsibility for most child-facing state services, are obvious options. We recommend a similar functional capacity in the Department of Health, although again have not specified if this should form part of the same Directorate or a health-specific one (refer to Chapter 15, Recommendation 15.17).

Recommendation 6.6

1. The Tasmanian Government should establish a Child-Related Incident Management Directorate to respond to:
    a. allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct by staff, breaches of the State Service Code of Conduct and professional conduct policies, and reportable conduct (as defined by the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023) in schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth justice
    b. other forms of staff-perpetrated abuse in schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth justice, including other serious care concerns and allegations of excessive use of force, inappropriate isolation or inappropriate searches of children and young people in detention.
2. The directorate should comprise three units tasked as follows:
    a. Incident Report Management Unit. This unit should be responsible for case management—that is, assisting child-facing services within the Department for Education, Children and Young People with the management of incidents or allegations of child sexual abuse and related conduct, including being the point of contact for these services.
    b. Investigations Unit. This unit should undertake preliminary assessments and investigations. It should comprise appropriately trained and skilled investigators or use external investigators with the requisite qualifications and training.

c. Adjudication Unit. This unit should examine the investigation reports prepared by investigators and make recommendations to the Head of Agency about what disciplinary decisions are available and the appropriate response. The unit should be staffed by personnel with relevant experience, including a background in law.

3. The directorate should appoint staff with knowledge of schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care, and youth justice.
4. Within 12 months of appointment, all staff in the Investigations Unit should:
   a. undertake specialist training in interviewing vulnerable witnesses
   b. undertake training in child development, child sexual abuse and trauma-related behaviours.
5. The directorate should maintain a case management platform and oversee a 'single file' for all child sexual abuse allegations and concerns about staff, including recording matters that do not result in disciplinary action.
6. The Tasmanian Government should decide where in the State Service this directorate should be established. Wherever it is established, it should be separated from traditional human resources functions.

6.5 Guidelines for managing allegations of sexual misconduct

Government and non-government education sectors in South Australia jointly developed the guidelines for Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct. This is to 'ensure that staff, children and parents can expect the same standards of child protection practice no matter which sector they access'.[362]

The guidelines cover the government, independent and Catholic school sectors in South Australia. They apply to situations involving sexual misconduct by adults against children or young people. They aim to reduce further trauma for children and young people, parents and the staff involved when an incident occurs.[363]

The guidelines support the work of the Incident Management Directorate by guiding the response to an allegation of misconduct from first notification, through to the investigation and beyond. They are easily accessible on the South Australian Department for Education's website, rendering the process publicly accountable.

6.5.1 The immediate response

Staff and volunteers who are involved in managing an incident of child sexual abuse may need to recall events or conversations later, such as in court proceedings. Accordingly, the Debelle Inquiry emphasised that it was critical for site leaders and other members of staff to 'keep a written record of all conversations relating to the allegations' of child sexual assault.[364] The importance of making notes as soon as possible after conversations occur is incorporated into the South Australian guidelines.[365]

Ms Girvin summarised the immediate response to an allegation of sexual misconduct under the guidelines as follows, noting that these steps are not always undertaken in a sequential order and that some actions may be undertaken at the same time:[366]

> (a) Step 1: Obtain medical assistance for the child or young person if required.
>
> (b) Step 2: Receive report of the allegation. If the allegation is made to a staff member, it should be immediately reported to the site leader. If the allegation concerns the site leader, the report should be made to the relevant sector office.
>
> (c) Step 3: Report the allegation to SA Police.
>
> (d) Step 4: Notify the Child Abuse Report Line.
>
> (e) Step 5: Take basic steps to preserve any evidence, if applicable. For example, by blocking access to the site's computer network if an allegation regarding child pornography is made or locking the room in which an incident is alleged to have occurred.
>
> (f) Step 6: Inform the sector office and establish who will be assisting.
>
> (g) Step 7: Prevent the accused person from having any access to or further contact with children and young people.
>
> (h) Step 8: Inform parents of the victim of the allegation, unless the parent is the accused person.
>
> (i) Step 9: Inform the accused person of his or her immediate work requirements.
>
> (j) Step 10: Complete sector specific reporting requirements, including for State schools, the Department's critical incident report through the Incident Response Management System.
>
> (k) Step 11: Document all information/discussions/observations.

In our analysis, the Tasmanian Department's flowcharts outline a similar immediate response.[367]

6.5.2 The ongoing response

Unlike the Tasmanian flowcharts, the South Australian guidelines take a comprehensive approach to responding to allegations of misconduct beyond the initial response. The guidelines provide direction on:

- the employment status of the 'accused person'
- delivering counselling and support to affected parties
- undertaking a risk assessment
- responsibly providing appropriate information to affected parties.[368]

In relation to the employment status of the accused person, the guidelines provide that the site leader should consult with the relevant 'sector office' (in the case of the public sector, the Directorate) to determine whether to suspend the person from duty pending the outcome of an investigation. If suspended, a formal letter is sent to the accused person. If the accused person is a volunteer, their role is terminated immediately.[369]

The Debelle Inquiry noted in its report that in the aftermath of the event that precipitated its inquiry, a common complaint of parents was the lack of appropriate counselling.[370]

The Inquiry recommended that continuing support should be offered to victim-survivors, their parents, other children or parents in the school community, and staff.[371]

The South Australian guidelines are detailed and require that appropriate support is provided to:

- victim-survivors and their parents—site leaders should meet with the parents and discuss continuing support for the child or young person. A written report of the meeting should be prepared and signed by the parents. Next, 'a support and safety plan should be finalised, covering all aspects of the victim's and the family's ongoing needs and agreed actions'. Site leaders or the relevant sector office must monitor the wellbeing of the victim and the victim's family through regular reviews of the plan[372]
- other children or young people and parents of the school—the counselling or support offered to children or young people and parents should vary depending on the circumstances of the incident. If a risk assessment finds that a wider group of parents should be informed, 'then, generally speaking, the same services as outlined above should be offered'[373]
- staff members—staff (including the site leader) can be profoundly affected by sexual misconduct allegations and their ongoing wellbeing needs to be considered, particularly those who were close to the person subject to the allegations. Staff 'will need clear guidance on how to respond to particular requests such as acting as a witness'.[374] Staff should be reminded of the availability of supports in the weeks and months that follow, and the effect of potentially stressful events (for example, the conclusion of a trial) should be anticipated and monitored[375]
- counselling and the option of alternative placements should be considered for relatives of the accused person who are employees or enrolled students at the site or in the sector.[376]

The Debelle Inquiry's report emphasised that how counselling is offered is important. Where possible, counselling should not be offered in 'a mere letter'.[377] However, any offer of counselling should be followed up in writing.[378] The Department should also 'offer counselling as quickly as possible, if not immediately, after it learns of the allegations'.[379]

The Debelle report also emphasises the importance of ensuring the safety, health and wellbeing of other children in the wake of an allegation against a staff member. It advocates conducting a risk assessment to discover whether there might be other victim-survivors of the alleged offending.[380]

Under the South Australian guidelines, risk assessments are conducted by the Directorate 'in consultation with the site leader, drawing on information provided by South Australia Police'.[381]

In making the risk assessment, the following factors are considered:

- the nature of the offending
- the circumstances in which the alleged offending occurred
- the place or places where the alleged offending occurred
- the age and gender of the victim
- the age and gender of the accused person
- whether the accused person had regular and frequent contact with other children or a group or groups of children and the nature and circumstances of that contact
- the opportunities that were available to the accused person to offend against other children.[382]

The Debelle Inquiry also recommended that the South Australian Department for Education develops a policy that guides the communication of an allegation to the school community.[383] This communication must achieve a balance between the rights of staff, students and parents to be informed, and the right of an individual staff member not to be identified before an assessment and/or investigation of the allegation. Avoiding liability for defamation is also a consideration when communicating about an allegation of child sexual abuse.

While there are laws in South Australia forbidding the publication of an accused person's name, the Debelle Inquiry found that:

> … it is proper for those with a legitimate interest in the matter to be informed of the alleged offending. Those who have a legitimate interest in the offending are the staff at the site, the members of the governing council of the site [school association committee], and parents of children who are likely to have been in contact with the accused person.[384]

Based on the Debelle Inquiry's recommendations, the South Australian guidelines provide detailed directions for communicating an allegation based on the audience and the stage of the response. This approach is outlined in Appendix E. In summary, it outlines appropriate communications for staff, governing councils and parents when:

- there is an allegation only
- the accused person has been charged
- the court process is over.

The supporting documentation provides template letters for each stage of the process. Examples of letters from the Debelle Inquiry can be found at Appendix E.

Secretary Bullard noted the approach taken in the Debelle Inquiry to communicating with relevant parties and the considerations relevant at each stage of the process. He stated that he would go further by including guidance on communication where 'the conduct does not amount to a criminal offence, or Police do not proceed with charges, but the Department investigates a potential breach of the State Service Code of Conduct'.[385]

In his February 2023 update on the safeguarding activities the Department was undertaking, Secretary Bullard informed us that there had been amendments to the letters sent to complainants and witnesses involved in Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct processes related to child sexual abuse matters. These letters, he said, are now more 'accessible and trauma-informed'.[386] While the relevant policy is still being drafted, we also understand that the Department will, where appropriate and authorised to do so, communicate information to relevant parties about a child sexual abuse incident within the Department's service areas, including schools.

6.5.3 Our observations

These developments outlined by Secretary Bullard are encouraging. We recommend that the Department develops a specific policy about responsible communication in the context of legal obligations. The policy should outline what communications the Department should make, and to whom they should make them, at particular stages of investigating a child sexual abuse matter. This should be based on the resources developed by the South Australian Department for Education for responding to allegations about staff.

Similar resources should be developed to support the response to allegations about harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Section 7).

We also recommend that the Department adopts a similar approach to that recommended by the Debelle Inquiry to the supports it provides to students, families, staff and the school community when dealing with child sexual abuse matters.

As indicated, we recommend that the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate oversees the response to allegations about staff in relation to the education, Child Safety Service, out of home care and youth justice contexts. Similarly, guidelines should be developed to assist in the response to allegations in all these institutional contexts.

Drawing on the South Australian example, the Department should also look to provide leadership to the Catholic and independent school sectors and consider ways to support a statewide approach to responding to child sexual abuse in schools.

Recommendation 6.7

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop guidelines that outline the ongoing supports that should be provided for victim-survivors, families, staff and the school community when there are allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse by staff or harmful sexual behaviours.
2. The guidelines should include policies, procedures, and templates for:
    a. Counselling and support—a counselling and support plan should be developed for victim-survivors and their parents and carers, other children or young people at the school, staff at the school, and the alleged perpetrator and their family.
    b. Risk assessment—a risk assessment should be conducted to determine whether there is any concern for the ongoing safety of other children and whether there may be other victim-survivors.
    c. Informing responsibly—the Department should develop specific policies that outline what communications should be made by the Department, and to whom they should be made, at particular stages of a child sexual abuse matter. These policies should take account of all legal obligations and the importance of informing victim-survivors, parents and the community. Communication may be needed with children and young people, staff, School Association Committees, parents, previous students and other schools.
3. Any policy outlining the communications that should be made by the Department should extend to matters where conduct does not amount to a criminal offence or where police do not proceed with charges but the matter is investigated as a possible breach of the State Service Code of Conduct, a professional conduct policy or reportable conduct under the Reportable Conduct Scheme.
4. Guidelines should also be developed for Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth justice contexts.

Recommendation 6.8

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should work with the Catholic and independent school sectors to adopt a statewide approach to responding to child sexual abuse in schools.

7 Harmful sexual behaviours in schools

Harmful sexual behaviours are sexual behaviours displayed by a child or young person:

> ... that [fall] outside what may be considered developmentally, socially, and culturally expected, may cause harm to [themselves] or others, and [occur] either face to face and/or via technology. When these behaviours involve another child or young person, they may include a lack of consent, reciprocity, mutuality, and involve the use of coercion, force, or a misuse of power.[387]

Harmful sexual behaviours are occurring in Tasmanian schools and are causing immense distress and harm to students, their families and staff. Lack of understanding about harmful sexual behaviours may mean that they are either not responded to at all, or the response is disproportionate to developmentally expected or less serious problematic sexual behaviours. Consistent with the Independent Education Inquiry, we heard that schools need better guidance and training in preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours.

Addressing harmful sexual behaviours requires schools to balance their duty of care to the child displaying harmful sexual behaviours and to other children. An understandable desire to respond to harmful sexual behaviours in a therapeutic and thoughtful way should not overshadow the real and very damaging experiences of victim-survivors of such behaviours. Principals may be reluctant to exclude young people displaying harmful sexual behaviours from school (with all the related impacts on their education), particularly if the child has disability or if their behaviours are a product of their own victimisation. However, failures to ensure the safety of students (particularly of victim-survivors of harmful sexual behaviours) has its own impacts on their ability to learn and thrive at school. Balancing what can sometimes be competing considerations requires tailored planning and responses to meet the unique circumstances of each situation. Schools will often need access to specialist knowledge and guidance to get this balance right.

The National Royal Commission made one specific recommendation (Recommendation 13.6) about harmful sexual behaviours in the education context:

> Consistent with the Child Safe Standards, complaint handling policies for schools ... should include effective policies and procedures for managing complaints about children with harmful sexual behaviours.[388]

The Department of Education considered that it had implemented this recommendation because it 'has existing policies/procedures/practices for managing complaints about children with harmful sexual behaviour'.[389]

However, questions around the effectiveness of the Department's policies and measures came up in the Independent Education Inquiry. That inquiry found significant uncertainties among departmental staff on how to respond appropriately to suspected or alleged harmful sexual behaviours in schools. It recommended developing protocols to respond to concerns or complaints of this nature.[390]

Leanne McLean, Commissioner for Children and Young People, acknowledged that the Department was developing a flowchart to help guide responses to harmful sexual behaviours, but she was concerned by the apparent lack of policy or procedure given that:

> … during my term as Commissioner, a number of incidents have been raised with me by members of the public related to harmful sexual behaviours in educational contexts, and in particular, the responses of Department of Education employees to such allegations.[391]

The Department told us of several initiatives to address this issue, including setting up a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Working Group, investing in staff expertise and developing clearer guidance for principals and staff. We discuss these initiatives and other changes throughout this section. However, we consider more needs to be done.

In this section, we begin by discussing the experiences of families affected by harmful sexual behaviours in schools. We outline steps taken since the Independent Education Inquiry to improve responses to harmful sexual behaviours in schools, including flowcharts developed to guide principals' responses and the role of the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program in supporting the understanding and response to harmful sexual behaviours. We then discuss continuing challenges for schools in understanding and responding to harmful sexual behaviours and review positive recent initiatives to increase specialist support to schools. Finally, we outline the recommendations we have made across our report that will continue to enhance prevention, identification and responses to harmful sexual behaviours in government schools, and which build on the positive recent developments in the Department for Education, Children and Young People. We conclude by recommending the Department develops better policies, protocols and guidance for schools responding to harmful sexual behaviours.

7.1 Experiences of families affected by harmful sexual behaviours in schools

Some families (and people working with them) told us about their experiences navigating harmful sexual behaviours in schools. These experiences included significant trauma and distress because of the incident(s), as well as the way the school and/or the Department responded. Problems included:

- incidents of harmful sexual behaviours being downplayed or minimised by teachers, principals or others, including failures by schools to appropriately acknowledge and apologise for the harm caused[392]
- principals having too much discretion to determine whether an incident constitutes harmful sexual behaviours and the steps taken (or not) to manage it[393]
- the movements and actions of a victim-survivor being controlled or restricted to manage their safety, rather than the behaviour of the child or young person who had engaged in harmful sexual behaviours being managed or closely supervised[394]
- victim-survivors having to continue to encounter the young person who harmed them at school in ways that affected their sense of safety and exacerbated trauma[395]
- poor communication to affected parties (particularly parents and carers) about steps being taken following a complaint or incident, with confidentiality often cited as justification[396]
- inadequate information sharing and record keeping by schools and the Department, which can make it difficult to determine patterns of harmful sexual behaviours (particularly where a young person engaging in such behaviour moves schools)[397]
- inadequate access to appropriate psychological and support services for victim-survivors and young people engaging in harmful sexual behaviours.[398]

Some of these issues have been described to us in incidents as recent as 2021 (refer to the case study of 'Andy' in Chapter 5).

Parents and caregivers of children who had experienced harmful sexual behaviours from other children came forward to share their and their children's experience with us. For example, the parents of one young child who was subjected to harmful sexual behaviours told us:

> Post care for us was so minimal. The Department of Education just said, 'I'm so sorry [redacted] I can't believe that's happened, would you like a call from Learning Support?' … I never got an apology from the Department of Education I never got any acknowledgement, I just got the principal telling me [they were] sorry, and that they did the best they could and that they really couldn't tell anybody about it.[399]

Parents of another young child said:

> If this had [have] been dealt with a little bit more … a little bit more personally, a little bit more listening right from the beginning, well, we wouldn't be in this situation. We just have no trust left.[400]

We also heard from parents who told us that the only reason their child got support was because they 'yelled very loudly' and because of their connections. They said, 'if we didn't have those … connections it would have been swept under the carpet'.[401]

Parents of victim-survivors of harmful sexual behaviours often expressed empathy for the child or young person engaging in the behaviours, recognising its complex drivers and the vulnerability of all the children and young people involved. These parents told us:

> We believe the system failed both our child and the offending child as well as us as a family. The long-term damage that has occurred to our daughter and our families' wellbeing has been a direct result of the education department not following protocol or having protocols in situ.[402]

Ignatius Kim, Clinical Lead, Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service, described his experience helping a 15-year-old girl who was sexually abused by another student on school grounds. He told us that he attended a meeting of the young woman and her parents with the school:

> I came away just really angry myself about what this family was met with, the response that they were met with, which was quite officious, two senior members of the school staff, and my clear impression was that it was clearly planned and rehearsed with a view to managing the meeting, perhaps with a sort of view focused on the reputational aspects.[403]

Mr Kim said that the young woman commented after the meeting that she had just wanted the school to apologise. Mr Kim reflected:

> You know, I think, if an apology had been forthcoming and a really authentic, you know, really compassionate approach had been taken in that meeting, I do think it could have gone some way.[404]

He noted that the student did not feel protected and continued to have inadvertent contact with the older male student who assaulted her. She was eventually forced to change schools.[405]

7.2 Challenges for schools in preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours

We heard about several challenges for schools in preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours, including practical challenges of maintaining safety for victim-survivors and staff while providing support for students who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours, a lack of staff confidence, and challenges with accessing professional support.

7.2.1 Difficulties maintaining safety for students and supporting staff

Understandably, principals can be reluctant to exclude students from schools, or to isolate or stigmatise them, recognising the importance of education and social connection. But this can make it difficult to maintain the safety of victim-survivors or other students and it can contribute to victim-survivors feeling unsafe at school and disengaging from their studies.

Renae Pepper from the Sexual Assault Support Service told us that the challenge of keeping children safe may be particularly acute in rural schools, where it can be difficult to effectively separate students—for example, if there is only one class for each year level, or limited space, facilities and staff.[406] She said that sometimes victim-survivors at rural schools would have to attend school feeling unsafe or anxious, or would disengage from school.[407]

Poor responses to harmful sexual behaviours can also affect staff involved.[408] Mr Russell told us:

> The lack of support offered by the Department following this [harmful sexual behaviour] incident made it hard for me to trust that the classroom would be a safe place for me or my students. My health has suffered because of this lack of support. I have had to seek my own support, and this has affected my ability to teach.[409]

7.2.2 Lack of confidence in identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours

Teachers and principals are often not confident in identifying harmful sexual behaviours. Ms Pepper described how most queries about harmful sexual behaviours that the service receives are from educators who do not fully understand the difference between normal sexual development and inappropriate behaviour, and therefore do not know how to respond.[410] She said:

> The skills gap, in terms of lack of training on harmful sexual behaviours for teachers, principals and support staff, has a very real cost for the children or young people affected by harmful sexual behaviours.[411]

Sometimes this lack of training and understanding results in inaction despite multiple reports of inappropriate behaviour, with Ms Pepper providing a recent (2021) example of a teacher not escalating complaints:

> The disclosures all related to a single child within the class, who was alleged to have been inappropriately touching the complainants. The classroom teacher had dismissed the reports and told the children not to 'tell lies' or 'be unkind'. It was not until the reports from a number of children, made over this extended six to twelve month period, made their way to the principal that they were acknowledged and addressed.[412]

Lack of training can also contribute to harsh discipline. Ms Pepper cited, as an example of an extreme response, the case of an eight-year-old boy who was expelled from school for holding another student's hand and kissing them on the cheek.[413]

We heard that having good guidance on harmful sexual behaviours is critical and in the absence of such guidance, 'the role of teachers becomes even more complex'.[414] Professor Walsh acknowledged that teachers do not have to have the expertise to determine whether consent has occurred, but at a minimum they should understand the spectrum of typical sexual behaviours for a child's age and stage and be able to identify signs to suggest that support services may be necessary.[415]

Ms Pepper agreed, stating that without such guidance there are 'really inconsistent responses' from schools:[416]

> There needs to be clear policies and procedures within individual schools as schools vary in numbers, structure, layout and ability to safety plan and protect all students, and there needs to be clear policies and procedures more broadly across [the Department] around mandatory reporting, contacting [Sexual Assault Support Service] for consultation and how investigations are carried out in regard to incidents.[417]

Ms Pepper highlighted the need for training for all schools on harmful sexual behaviours including 'how to respond appropriately and be trauma-informed, focusing on students feeling safe and able to engage in their education'.[418]

Dale Tolliday, a clinical adviser working in this area, said that judgment and discretion are important in managing harmful sexual behaviours incidents:

> It does not require a specialist [therapeutic] response in all cases, rather there must be different layers of support where the appropriate persons are given the permission and confidence to respond.[419]

We discuss mandatory professional development in Section 5.

7.2.3 Role of professional support staff

We heard evidence about the role that social workers, in particular, play in supporting and upskilling school staff in responding to harmful sexual behaviours (and child sexual abuse more broadly). In an anonymous submission to our Inquiry, we were told that:

> School social work and psychology are often the main intervention used in [the Department of Education for harmful sexual behaviours], however both professions are woefully understaffed. Both the … Australian Association of Social Workers and the Australian Psychological Society recommend 1 full-time social worker and psychologist per 500 students. The ratio in Tasmania is currently 1 full-time worker per 1,200 students.[420]

Ms Carter highlighted the value of social workers and professional support staff, not only in providing direct support to students but also in upskilling staff:

> I mean, training in a one-off session is good, but having the people there actually supporting you through is the best sort of professional learning so that you become confident and you grow your understanding.[421]

She recommended a universal 'realistic' allocation of such staff to schools.[422]

Social worker Debra Drake acknowledged that she saw children displaying harmful sexual behaviours in schools, but 'given the high caseloads of school social workers, we do not have the capacity to provide appropriate counselling for harmful sexual behaviours'.[423] Ms Drake reflected that such support would ideally be offered by specialist services that are well trained, adequately funded and external to schools.[424] Mr Kim said that 'school psychologists and school social workers are often stretched across several schools in their work week, so their consistency of presence is lacking and I think we need more of them'.[425]

Secretary Bullard responded to calls for increased social workers and support staff by highlighting that 'there has already been a significant increase in social workers and psychologists into the system' since 2014, also pointing to the broader safeguarding responsibilities of teachers:[426]

> And not saying that every teacher is a skilled social worker, but every teacher understands the importance of child safeguarding, understands what our expectations are, knows how to deal with a report and where to refer it.[427]

The 2021–22 State Budget has allocated $3.8 million over four years from 2022–23 (and $1.68 million ongoing) to employ extra psychologists and social workers to directly support schools.[428] These professional support staff would be ideally placed to respond to inappropriate and problematic sexual behaviours if they are provided with more professional development, guidance and practice resources to build their capability to do so. However, best practice responses suggest a more intensive specialist therapeutic response is likely to be needed for persistent, abusive and violent harmful sexual behaviours, such as a referral to a specialist service like the Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program, which we discuss further in the next section.

7.3 Processes to respond to harmful sexual behaviours in schools

Schools have access to some resources to support responses to harmful sexual behaviours, including specialist therapeutic supports provided externally and recent initiatives of the Department.

7.3.1 Programs and training on harmful sexual behaviours

Schools can make referrals to specialist programs for young people displaying harmful sexual behaviours and for those who have been harmed by the behaviours. They can also access training programs for school staff on identifying and responding to such conduct.

The Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program, offered by the Sexual Assault Support Service, is directed at children and young people (aged 17 or younger) who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours. Secretary Bullard described the two streams of the program:

- therapeutic intervention, assessment and case management for children and young people using harmful sexual behaviours—schools, family members or agencies can refer young people to this program[429]
- a shorter training session of about three hours for school staff (teaching years 3 to 12) on how to identify and respond to harmful sexual behaviours called 'HSB: Overview for Educators'.[430] This is offered on a fee-for-service basis and schools generally contact the Sexual Assault Support Service directly for this training.[431]

The Prevention, Assessment, Support and Treatment program and our recommendation for increased specialist services are discussed in Chapter 21.

7.3.2 Departmental initiatives to improve responses to harmful sexual behaviours

Secretary Bullard described recent departmental initiatives to prevent and respond to harmful sexual behaviours in Tasmanian schools. These include:

- building the capacity of school social workers and psychologists to respond to children and young people who are victim-survivors of harmful sexual behaviours (and child sexual abuse)[432]
- the Department's Harmful Sexual Behaviours Working Group (in operation since 2020), which identifies the signs of, and improves responses to, harmful sexual behaviours and equips support staff to identify it and respond in trauma-informed ways[433]
- appointing extra staff to 'oversee the coordination, case management and follow up of the support provided to children and young people impacted'.[434]

Following up on these initiatives, Secretary Bullard told us in February 2023 that the Department had committed to employing four more full-time-equivalent senior support staff—two psychologists and two social workers—'to provide further support for children and young people affected by harmful sexual behaviours or child sexual abuse'.[435]

He told us that three of the four positions had been filled, with the remaining position being readvertised in early 2023.[436] The Department has also filled two more Student Support Response Coordinator positions to manage 'responses to incidents of child sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviour, ensuring that the best interests of children and young people are the central consideration'.[437]

We see the opportunity for these positions to form a specialist Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to help schools (and other government institutions) correctly identify harmful sexual behaviours, respond locally to inappropriate and problematic behaviour and support a critical incident response to persistent, abusive or violent harmful sexual behaviours. We recommend a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit for education, out of home care and youth justice settings in Chapter 9 (Recommendation 9.28).

7.3.3 Steps in response to allegations of harmful sexual behaviours

Principals and 'site leaders' are guided by a departmental flowchart entitled Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Harmful Sexual Behaviour Initiated by a Child or Young Person when responding to disclosures or concerns about harmful sexual behaviours. The Department's Harmful Sexual Behaviours Working Group informed the updated version of this document.[438]

According to this flowchart, principals must collect information about the alleged behaviour and then 'immediately' consult a student support leader, senior professional support staff, a school social worker or a psychologist to assess the situation.[439] The reference for this assessment is Hackett's continuum of harmful sexual behaviours, which 'is based on a continuum model to demonstrate the range of sexual behaviours presented by children and young people, from those that are normal, to those that are highly deviant'.[440] Secretary Bullard explained:

> The context of the behaviour is then considered as part of the overall assessment (that is; do any of the students have a disability, what is the frequency of the behaviours, is there coercion, a difference of ages, etc.?).[441]

The flowchart divides behaviours into only two categories—'harmful or problematic' or 'developmentally appropriate'—and directs a different response for each category.

On our reading of the flowchart, we understand that if the behaviour is assessed as constituting harmful or problematic sexual behaviours, the student support leader and senior professional support staff must:

- notify the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line and police, and meet with parents/carers to 'inform, reassure and include in the response'
- form a care team and develop a risk assessment, safety plan and referrals for therapeutic support

- develop a 'community response/containment strategy' (where appropriate)
- store all documentation in the Student Support System.[442]

If, on the other hand, the behaviour is assessed as developmentally appropriate, the flowchart outlines the principal must notify parents/carers, provide support and 'educate regarding the nature of the incident' and 'update and consult' with relevant staff.[443] The school social worker or psychologist is to assess the needs of student(s) and provide support.[444] The principal must also ensure relevant documentation is stored in the Student Support System and turn their mind to how they can build understanding of consent and child sexual abuse prevention in their school.[445]

When considering the extent to which principals can apply discretion and depart from these requirements, Secretary Bullard was clear in stating:

> … all school principals have a mandated responsibility to follow all departmental policies and procedures, including those related to harmful sexual behaviours, and for ensuring staff are aware of and follow all relevant policies and procedures.[446]

Concerns about the flowchart

While we understand the desire for a simplified flowchart to guide principals' responses, we are concerned that reducing harmful sexual behaviours to an 'either/or' oversimplifies the issue and may give rise to inappropriate responses. The spectrum of behaviours described on Hackett's continuum requires a range of more nuanced responses than described in the flowchart. For instance, sexual behaviours that are assessed to be inappropriate or problematic on Hackett's continuum may not require statutory or specialist treatment responses, but will still require some form of local school response. We consider the guidance for developmentally appropriate behaviours to be more consistent with what would be expected for locally managed inappropriate or concerning sexual behaviours. We are concerned that the guidance in the flowchart for developmentally appropriate behaviours is not a proportionate or appropriate response to healthy sexual development. We are not clear as to why parents would be notified or records created for developmentally appropriate behaviours. As we outline below, the Department needs a more tailored response to the children and families involved, rather than an 'either/or' approach.

Also, any care plan and risk assessment should not be viewed as static. In any safety planning, the least intrusive actions necessary to secure the safety of all children and young people involved should be implemented. The plan should also recognise that risk is likely to change—for example, in response to effective treatment. Finally, we note that, where required, arrangements should be made for any background information, risk assessment and care plan to follow a child or young person (or children or young people) if they change schools in the aftermath of a harmful sexual behaviours incident, as is often the case.

While the flowchart covers the basics of an appropriate response, the policy should ensure attention is given to the child displaying the behaviours and any child (or children) and young people who were harmed by or witness to those behaviours, and their families. The flowchart also needs to be clearer about who takes particular actions. In Section 7.5, we recommend improved guidance on responding to harmful sexual behaviours. This guidance should align with and be complemented by the holistic across government approach to harmful sexual behaviours we recommend throughout our report, and which we summarise in relation to schools in Section 7.4.

7.4 A holistic approach to preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours

Given the challenges and complexities in balancing the needs of all children affected when a child displays harmful sexual behaviours, a holistic whole of government, whole of Department approach is needed. We have made recommendations across our report that will help improve the prevention and identification of, and responses to, harmful sexual behaviours in Tasmanian government schools:

- The Tasmanian Government should develop a statewide framework and plan for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours that provides a common understanding of harmful sexual behaviours and high-level guidance on how to respond, and clearly articulates the roles and responsibilities of different government and government funded agencies in the response (refer to Chapter 21, Recommendation 21.8).
- The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to support all child-facing areas of the Department (refer to Chapter 9, Recommendation 9.28). The role of the Unit would be to provide advice, support and guidance to local areas to facilitate consistent, best practice, proportionate approaches to responding to harmful sexual behaviours that balances the needs of victim-survivors, children who have displayed harmful sexual behaviours and other affected parties. The Unit would also lead harmful sexual behaviours policy development and build on the new positions already devoted to supporting responses to harmful sexual behaviours in schools, which were outlined above.
- The Tasmanian Government should fund and appropriately resource sexual assault and abuse therapeutic services, including for harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Chapter 21, Recommendations 21.1, 21.4 and 21.6).
- All teachers should have minimum mandatory education in child sexual abuse, grooming and harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Section 5 of this chapter, Recommendation 6.5). Our intent is that minimum mandatory education will assist teachers to develop a minimum level of knowledge and awareness of what are harmful sexual behaviours and how they should respond.

- There should be advanced professional education on responding to harmful sexual behaviours made available to employees who directly respond to harmful sexual behaviours. This would include principals, school social workers, school psychologists, child safety officers, youth workers and residential carers. This could be developed and provided by the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit or outsourced to specialist providers (refer to Chapter 9, Recommendation 9.28).
- There should be mandatory child sexual abuse prevention curriculum for students from early learning programs to year 12. We consider this education to be an important element in preventing harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Recommendation 6.1).

We also recommend detailed education-specific policies, protocols and guidance for principals and site leaders in identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours, which we discuss in Section 7.5.

7.5 Clear, specialised advice and support for schools responding to harmful sexual behaviours

While we consider that the revised flowchart for harmful sexual behaviours is an improvement on previous guidance, we consider it should be refined to allow for a more nuanced approach and underpinned by more comprehensive guidance that can explain in more detail how it should be applied. This includes greater guidance on:

- the recommended Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit, how and when to access the Unit and its role in supporting school responses
- correctly identifying and distinguishing developmentally appropriate, inappropriate and harmful sexual behaviours
- proportionate local responses to inappropriate and problematic sexual behaviours
- how the needs of children displaying harmful sexual behaviours, victim-survivors of harmful sexual behaviours and other children and young people can be addressed through safety assessment and school participation planning (including describing key considerations and possible features of a safety and school participation plan, balancing the safety of all children with the school participation needs of the child displaying harmful sexual behaviours)
- supports and guidance that can be offered to victim-survivors of harmful sexual behaviours, their family and other affected parties (such as teachers or other students) including what departmental and external supports are available
- strategies to ensure appropriate supervision, support and referrals/reports occur in response to a child displaying harmful sexual behaviours

- what information should be recorded and the circumstances in which it should be shared with external authorities, affected parties and other schools
- guidance about communicating with families, other children and affected parties—this includes supports such as template letters (similar to the approach to allegations of child sexual abuse by adults discussed in Section 6.5 of this chapter)
- review processes for safety and participation plans, recognising that risk is not static.

We consider this guidance should become part of core school procedures and be used by principals and site leaders in conjunction with advice, support and guidance from the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit. A public version of the policy should be easily accessible to the public on the Department's website with an appropriate level of detail to help parents/carers and the broader community understand the steps that will be taken in response to incidents, to help drive accountability, and to overcome the information vacuum that exacerbates distress and gives the impression (rightly or wrongly) that no action has been taken. Being able to point to more detailed guidance can also satisfy an understandable desire from the school community for information, without compromising aspects of an incident response that need to be managed privately for the young people involved.

Guidance should direct staff on when and how to seek support from the new Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit for help identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours in schools. The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit may provide guidance on how the students involved can be safely supported in the school, recommend involving professional support staff in schools to assist, or provide more intensive support where a child has displayed persistent, abusive and/or violent harmful sexual behaviours.

Recommendation 6.9

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop detailed education-specific policies, protocols and guidelines for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours in schools. The development of these policies, protocols and guidelines should be:

a. led and informed by the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28)

b. informed by the Tasmanian Government's statewide framework and plan to address harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 21.8).

8 Teacher registration

In her second reading speech for the Teachers Registration Bill 2000, the then Minister for Education said:

> Parents of students are entitled to a guarantee that their children are being taught by fully and appropriately qualified teachers who will not abuse their position of trust with students. This guarantee can be best achieved by having a fully and properly regulated teaching profession.[447]

The National Royal Commission recognised that teacher registration is a key mechanism through which Australian states and territories can ensure teachers meet minimum professional standards, including suitability to work with children. The National Royal Commission observed that, common to all Australian jurisdictions, teachers must:

- satisfy requirements related to professional learning and qualifications
- be able to meet the Australian Professional Standards for Teachers, including Standard 4 that requires teachers to 'maintain student safety'[448]
- pass criminal history checks and/or have current authorisation to work with vulnerable people
- observe any code of conduct concerning 'professional and ethical standards'.[449]

In Tasmania, the Teachers Registration Board plays an important role in protecting students from abuse by teachers. It does this by vetting the applications of new teachers for teacher registration, as well as the applications of continuing teachers seeking renewal of their registration, which is required every five years. The Board has the power to refuse, suspend or cancel the registration of a teacher if they (in the Teachers Registration Board's opinion) are not of good character or are not fit to teach. The Board's authority to permit or bar a person from teaching is an essential part of child safeguarding in the education system.

The Department also requires that all departmental employees, whether or not they have direct contact with children, hold Registration to Work with Vulnerable People.[450] This registration is a prerequisite to registration as a teacher. Non-teaching staff working in educational settings—for example, administrators, contractors, sports coaches, parent volunteers and maintenance staff—must also hold Registration to Work with Vulnerable People.[451]

As we discuss in Section 8.2, we heard that the teacher registration framework is not operating as well as it could, particularly for protecting children in schools.

In her second reading speech for the Teachers Registration Bill 2000, the then Minister for Education stated that the 'introduction of the legislation will protect children in government and non-government schools from the possibility of sexual or other abuse'.[452] Yet the Teachers Registration Act (which, among other things establishes the Teachers Registration Board), does not contain any provisions specifically requiring the Board to prevent, identify or report on child sexual abuse in schools, although it includes a good character requirement. Rather, the Act's provisions relate to teacher registration, good character and fitness to teach, and regulate how the Board should respond to complaints about teacher conduct, including about child sexual abuse.[453]

In this section, we provide an overview of the role and powers of the Teachers Registration Board. We then consider the shortcomings in the Board's operation and how these shortcomings might best be overcome.

8.1 The role of the Teachers Registration Board

All Australian states and territories require teachers to be registered (or accredited) by a statutory board or authority that is 'responsible for ensuring that registered persons have the appropriate professional qualifications and personal qualities to teach'.[454] In Tasmania, the Teachers Registration Board undertakes these functions, registering teachers to work in government, Catholic and independent schools.[455]

The Teachers Registration Board is an independent statutory authority established under the Teachers Registration Act. The Board consists of several people appointed by the Minister: a chairperson, practising teachers from schools across the independent, Catholic and government education sectors, a nominee of the University of Tasmania's Faculty of Education, a nominee of the Department, and a parent or guardian of a student attending a Tasmanian school.[456]

The Board regulates the teaching profession for the wellbeing and best interests of Tasmanian students.[457] One of its key functions is to register appropriately qualified teachers who 'have been determined to be of good character, competent, and fit to teach in Tasmanian schools'.[458]

The Board's other functions include:

- conducting investigations, inquiries and hearings to determine whether there have been breaches of the Act[459]
- taking disciplinary action, including placing conditions on, or suspending or cancelling, a teacher's registration[460]
- maintaining a code of ethics for the teaching profession.[461]

In performing its functions and in any action taken by the Board, the Board must 'consider the welfare and best interests of students to be of paramount importance'.[462]

While the Board has a much broader role than identifying, preventing or responding to child sexual abuse, the requirements of registration, along with other powers granted to the Board under the Act, mean that much of its work is 'aimed at preventing potential abusers from becoming registered as teachers'.[463]

All teachers who intend to work in a Tasmanian school or college must be a registered teacher or be granted a 'Limited Authority to Teach' by the Board.[464] A Limited Authority to Teach is designed to allow a person with specialist knowledge or skills, who is not a registered teacher, to teach in circumstances where there are no registered teachers with the requisite knowledge or skills available to fill the role.[465] It is an offence under the Act to teach without being registered or holding a Limited Authority to Teach.[466]

In determining if an applicant is of good character, the Board considers whether:

- the person has been charged with or convicted of an offence[467]
- the person holds a Registration to Work with Vulnerable People, including whether the person's Registration to Work with Vulnerable People status has ever been suspended or cancelled[468]
- the person has engaged in conduct that does not satisfy the standard generally expected of a teacher or is 'otherwise disgraceful or improper'[469]
- there are other matters the Board considers relevant such as 'employment and registration history and any previous and/or current disciplinary proceedings'.[470]

In determining whether an applicant is fit to teach, the Board may consider a person's medical or psychological conditions, their competence as a teacher and any other relevant matter.[471] The 'good character' assessment is most relevant to allegations of child sexual abuse and related concerns.

The Board requires applicants for registration to make declarations as to their character and fitness to teach and to authorise the Board to conduct a National Police Check.[472] The Board is also authorised to obtain information from a corresponding registration authority from interstate, a government department or a relevant body, and request that the applicant undergo psychiatric and/or psychological examination.[473] Registration is for up to five years, after which time a person must apply to have their registration renewed.[474]

The Board produces the resource Professional Boundaries: Guidelines for Tasmanian Teachers to educate applicants for registration, as well as registered teachers, about maintaining appropriate boundaries with students. The guidelines state that:

> For teachers, engaging in sexualised or romantic/sexual relationships with any student, regardless of their age, is completely inappropriate, and—depending on the age of the student—may also be a crime. It will result in disciplinary action.[475]

Teachers are advised that sexualised, romantic or sexual relationships with former students 'may breach teacher-student professional boundaries', including a 'relationship that commences within two years of the student completing compulsory education or turning 18 (whichever is later)' [original emphasis].[476] We discuss sexual abuse by a person in a position of authority in Chapter 16. The guidelines also define grooming and explain how to identify grooming behaviours.[477] Breaching the guidelines may result in a finding of 'misconduct, serious misconduct, and a lack of suitability/fitness to teach'.[478] Depending on the circumstances, a breach of the guidelines may also result in criminal charges.[479] The guidelines are provided to all applicants for teacher registration, who must declare on their application they have read and understood them. The guidelines are also given to all employers of teachers.[480]

Other provisions in the Teachers Registration Act regulate professional conduct and empower the Board to take action against a teacher for unprofessional conduct including sexual abuse:

- Section 18 requires registered teachers (or holders of a Limited Authority to Teach) to notify the Board if they are charged with or found guilty of a prescribed offence.[481] Prescribed offences include offences committed in Tasmania for which a sentence of imprisonment may be imposed, or an offence committed elsewhere if a sentence of imprisonment may have been imposed had the offence been committed in Tasmania.[482] The Board must notify employers and other registration authorities as soon as reasonably practicable after becoming aware that a registered teacher has been charged with or found guilty of a prescribed offence.[483] This would include a sexual offence.
- Section 19 provides that a person can complain to the Board in writing about the professional conduct or competence of a registered teacher (or a holder of a Limited Authority to Teach).[484] As soon as practicable after receiving a complaint, the Board must provide 'notice of the making of the complaint, the name of the complainant and the contents of the complaint' to the person who is the subject of the complaint and to the employers of that person.[485]
- Section 6A authorises the Board to investigate a complaint made under the Act.[486] When investigating the complaint, the Board will conduct a risk assessment for the alleged conduct and prepare a report for the relevant committee of the Board, which will determine an outcome.[487] In a 'high-risk situation'—for example, where the complaint alleges child sexual abuse—the investigation is expedited.[488] The Board may also recommend prosecution for offences committed against the Act, although the Registrar of the Teachers Registration Board, Ann Moxham, told us that, to the best of her knowledge, this has never happened.[489]

- Section 20 provides that the Board may inquire into any matter relating to a registered teacher (or holder of a Limited Authority to Teach), or someone who was formerly a registered teacher (or holder of a Limited Authority to Teach), including for disciplinary actions taken by an employer against a registered teacher.[490] Having completed an inquiry, the Board may impose conditions on the person's registration, suspend, revoke or cancel the person's registration, or determine that the complaint or disciplinary action is without substance.[491]
- Section 17BA, which was inserted into the Act in 2020, allows the Board to suspend or cancel a person's registration without an inquiry, if the person's Registration to Work with Vulnerable People has been suspended or revoked.[492]
- Section 24B covers 'emergency' situations and allows the Board to suspend a teacher's registration if it believes on reasonable grounds that the person may pose a risk to a student.[493] Ms Moxham told us that emergency suspensions are used when 'risk of harm to a student materialises and the [Board] is required to act expeditiously'.[494] Decisions about an 'emergency suspension [are] undertaken by reference to a risk assessment matrix procedure'.[495] Following an emergency suspension, the Board must ensure an inquiry is held as soon as possible.[496]
- Section 32A permits for the Board to share information with other relevant entities, including corresponding registration authorities in other jurisdictions, police, child protection authorities in Tasmania, and other state and national bodies such as the Australian Institute for Teaching and School Leadership.[497]

The Board can also impose conditions on a person's registration without an inquiry or investigation if it considers this to be warranted.[498] Conditions include that a teacher undertakes professional development, accesses coaching and/or mentoring, or that the teacher be monitored in-school and an assessment of their conduct provided to the Board.[499]

In 2020, there were 31 people whose registration was subject to conditions. Of these, 26 per cent had met the conditions imposed and 48 per cent were still being monitored. The other 26 per cent had their registration lapse or expire.[500]

Conditions placed on a teacher's registration are included in an online database established by the Board called Watched Registrations. This database is not publicly accessible but gives teachers' employers direct access to the Tasmanian Register of Teachers.[501] If a teacher's registration is subject to conditions, this is indicated by two asterisks against that teacher's name. However, the details of the conditions are not included in the database. School principals are advised to contact the Board's Professional Conduct Team to find out the specific nature of any conditions on a teacher's registration if the teacher appears on the Watched Registrations list.[502] The onus is on individual schools to update the list of teachers they employ on the database.[503]

8.2 Strengthening the Board's safeguarding measures

Through public hearings, witness statements, submissions and engagement with the community, as well as through information provided to us by the Department, we have identified problems with the teacher registration system. These problems undermine the Board's capacity to act in the best interests of Tasmanian students.

We heard that, as a result of advice provided by the Office of the Solicitor-General, the Department's approach to sharing information with the Teachers Registration Board about a teacher's conduct is restrictive and undermines the Board's ability to quickly assess whether a teacher should remain registered. We understand that the Government is considering solutions that will 'make it easier to share information about risks to children, including looking at whether issues of custom, practice and culture are creating unnecessary barriers'.[504] We support an approach that facilitates rather than restricts information sharing about risks to children and suggest that any changes in this regard include independent regulators such as the Teachers Registration Board. Information sharing must be supported by legislation in a way that prioritises the safety of children over privacy concerns.

We also heard that the Teachers Registration Act does not equip the Board to keep track of where teachers are employed, making it difficult for the Board to monitor teachers' conduct where concerns have been raised about the safety of children.

As reported by the National Royal Commission, a number of risks to children arise when information about child sexual abuse perpetrated by teachers (or others in educational settings) is not shared 'by and with schools (or other employers of teachers) and state and territory teacher registration authorities'.[505] A lack of information exchange can allow teachers who are or have been the subject of conduct complaints 'to move between schools, systems and jurisdictions' without conduct issues being identified or addressed.[506] We heard of situations where teachers in Tasmania, including some teachers from interstate, have continued to be registered and to teach despite concerns about their conduct at other schools.

In keeping with the National Royal Commission's finding that 'improved and consistent information on teacher registers should be considered' for inclusion on registers, we recommend that a teacher's place of employment be included on the Register of Teachers.[507]

We also heard:

- It is difficult for the Teachers Registration Board to enforce the provisions of the Teachers Registration Act, even in instances where it is aware that an unregistered teacher is teaching in a Tasmanian school.

- Changes to Commonwealth laws will mean that teachers from other jurisdictions are automatically recognised as being registered to teach in Tasmania, and this poses risks to child safety.
- The Board is not authorised to mandate training and ongoing professional development as a prerequisite to teacher registration.
- Insufficient resourcing has undermined the Board's capacity to fulfil its statutory obligations relevant to ensuring teachers comply with professional standards.

We make recommendations that address each of these issues in the following sections.

8.2.1 Information sharing

Information sharing between institutions with responsibilities for children's safety and wellbeing, and between those institutions and relevant professionals, is necessary to identify, prevent and respond to incidents and risks of child sexual abuse.[508]

The Teachers Registration Act governs what information the Board can and must share, and with whom and under what circumstances it is to be shared.

Information on the Register of Teachers that can be made publicly available is governed by section 25 of the Act, as set out in Appendix F. This information can be accessed via a search facility on the Board's website.[509] While any person can request certain information on the Register, the Act prohibits public access to information about a teacher's registration conditions or whether a registration has been previously suspended.[510] If the request for information comes from a 'teacher employing authority' (the Department, Catholic Education, the governing body of a registered school or TasTAFE), the Board may provide particulars of any conditions or suspension. The Act does not allow other information about a teacher's conduct to be released unless the teacher (or holder of a Limited Authority to Teach) gives their consent.

The Board can also share information about registered teachers, or someone who has applied to be registered, with other teacher registration authorities. This can include any information the Board comes across in performing its functions or exercising its powers in relation to registered teachers or a person who has applied to be registered.[511]

While the provisions of the Teachers Registration Act restrict what information the Board can share, Ms Moxham told us that to share information 'to prevent, identify, report on, and respond to child sexual abuse (as well as other potential and actual harms against students) in relation to teachers', the Board relies on the notification provisions in the Teachers Registration Act that allow the Board to 'do anything necessary or convenient to perform its functions'.[512]

Under the Teachers Registration Act, the Board can access police reports when considering an application for registration or renewal of registration.[513] Ms Moxham told us that, generally, police respond to these requests promptly.[514] But we were also told that in terms of criminal history checks, it would be more efficient if the Board could 'sync the entire register with Tasmania Police overnight so that information, including charges, is known in real-time'.[515] Also, the Board has no way of knowing when a registered teacher is currently charged with an offence.[516] While the Act requires that a person must notify the Board if they are charged with a prescribed offence, Ms Moxham told us is it is 'uncommon for people to provide these notifications'.[517]

Ms Moxham informed us that the Board has generally found it difficult to 'obtain primary evidence held by other agencies, bodies and employers in relation to people it regulates'.[518] This, we were told, has affected the Board's ability to conduct its own investigations with efficiency and can result in the Board not conducting investigations in a trauma-informed way.[519] Ms Moxham said that the way the Department provides information to the Board about professional conduct matters is 'patchy' and sometimes depends on who in the Department is in communication with the Board.[520]

While the Board will receive information from the Department about an allegation involving a teacher and the final decision about that allegation, it will not receive information collected during the investigation.[521] This makes it more difficult for the Board to determine if a teacher is of good character.

Ms Moxham told us that she understood limits on information sharing were due to advice from the Office of the Solicitor-General that the Department cannot disclose information collected in its investigations to a third party.[522] We understand this advice is based on an interpretation of the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 ('Personal Information Protection Act'), which we discuss in Chapter 19. This problem exists to varying degrees across education sectors in Tasmania, with some sectors recently changing their practices at the risk of breaching their privacy obligations.[523]

Ms Moxham noted three key reasons for sharing investigative information with the Board. First, children and young people should not be subjected to multiple interviews because this has the potential to cause or exacerbate trauma. Emily Sanders, Director, Regulation, Victorian Commission for Children and Young People, noted in her evidence:

> Reducing the number of times a child or young person is asked to give their account helps to minimise the risk of exacerbating trauma through an interview. We suggest organisations check if they can gain access to an interview conducted by other investigative agencies … to reduce multiple interviews.[524]

Second, the Board has limited resources, and using those resources to conduct investigations into matters already investigated is inefficient. Third, a significant amount of time may pass before the Board can investigate a matter (because the Department's disciplinary process may take a long time), and this may affect the quality of the evidence it can get.[525] We would add that delays in resolving a matter can also exacerbate a complainant's trauma.[526]

Secretary Bullard commented on aspects of Ms Moxham's characterisation of the Department providing information and the impact on Board investigations. He told us that the Department provides 'as much information as [it is] legally able' to the Board:[527]

> The Investigation Report into an [Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct] matter is not routinely provided … [to entities including the Teachers Registration Board]. This is on the basis of legal advice from the Office of the Solicitor General, that in the absence of consent, the provisions of the Personal Information Protection Act (PIP Act) prevent the Department from disclosing the [Employment Direction No. 5] report.[528]

Secretary Bullard also said that while he understood Ms Moxham's evidence to be that the Board will wait to receive a 'full investigation file' before starting its investigative processes, he 'wanted to be very clear' that when a matter of concern is raised, the Registrar could start investigating straightaway.[529] He also asserted there was nothing preventing the Board from conducting its own investigations into matters before receiving any information from the Department.[530] We note, however, that conducting parallel investigations into the same matter is not only a waste of resources, it may also cause further trauma to victim-survivors. Secretary Bullard ultimately agreed that it was 'nonsensical' for the Board to have to expend resources investigating a matter that has (or is being) investigated by the Department:[531]

> It does seem that we end up duplicating investigations in terms of, we undertake a process, I end up with a [large] file … it would be expedient to be able to provide that through to the Teachers Registration Board in full.[532]

We also heard of problems with the Board sharing information with the Department, particularly about relief teachers 'who have had employment conditions imposed upon them'.[533] This means that the Department may not know when allegations of unprofessional conduct have been made against relief teachers who are teaching in Tasmanian schools.[534] Ms Moxham told us that the Board responds to all requests for information from the Department of Justice under section 52A of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 ('Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act') for information about registered teachers.[535] Similar information sharing should occur with the Department.

Secretary Bullard was asked in hearings whether he would support removing any barriers to the flow of information between various regulators. He replied that he would be 'very supportive' of this.[536] Jenny Gale, Secretary, Department of Premier and Cabinet, informed us that her Department was working on a legislative reform as part of the Keeping Children Safer Actions that will enable certain information to be shared between the Department for Education, Children and Young People and entities such as the Teachers Registration Board.[537]

Ms Sanders provided evidence about how information sharing is facilitated in Victoria, with a view to avoiding the duplication of investigations. Under Victoria's Reportable Conduct Scheme, 'co-regulators' can be requested to conduct reportable conduct investigations while investigating for another purpose, such as disciplinary purposes.[538] In the Tasmanian context, this would operate, for example, to allow the Department or the Teachers Registration Board to investigate for the purposes of both an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct matter and an assessment of fitness to teach.

Ms Sanders noted that while different regulators may assess matters based on different criteria, in Victoria, the fact that there has not been a 'substantiated finding under the [Reportable Conduct] Scheme' by one co-regulator does not preclude another co-regulator, for example the Victorian Institute of Teaching (the Victorian equivalent of the Tasmanian Teachers Registration Board), from finding that professional conduct standards have been breached. Ms Sanders told us that if information sharing occurs properly, 'the co-regulators in a particular matter should all have access to the relevant information held by others that they need for their role'.[539]

In terms of information sharing across jurisdictions, the Teachers Registration Act specifies that the Board can provide limited information to corresponding teacher registration authorities.[540] The Board may also seek information from a corresponding authority about a registered teacher, on the proviso that written authorisation is provided by the teacher concerned.[541]

Secretary Bullard's view of information sharing across jurisdictions was that a 'coordinated response at the Commonwealth level to information sharing between state and territory education agencies would be useful'.[542] He noted that:

> A scoping project on national information sharing as it relates to teacher registrations is currently underway. It is being led by NSW with the involvement of all state and territory education departments, as well as all teacher registration authorities. The scope includes provision of advice on risks associated with the introduction of Automatic Mutual Recognition (AMR) for teachers.[543]

Automatic mutual recognition is discussed in Section 8.2.5.

The situation in Tasmania for sharing information between the Board and the Department—in particular, information gathered by the Department during its investigations into misconduct involving allegations or suspicions of child sexual abuse—is unsatisfactory. The situation does not prioritise the safety of children, nor meet the needs of victim-survivors.[544] The reluctance to share information between government entities, even when there would be clear benefits to children to do so, appears to be the product of an excessively risk-averse culture in the State Service, possibly influenced by narrow legal advice. Also, the focus is on the wrong risk—that of breaching a person's privacy, and not of exposing children to potential harm. As expressed by Secretary Gale, it 'almost beggars belief that people guard information as if they own it and that that would [potentially put] young children at risk'.[545]

There appears to be a clear desire on behalf of the Tasmanian Government to overcome actual and perceived barriers to sharing information about child sexual abuse in order to protect children. To help remedy the current situation, the Department of Premier and Cabinet is planning reforms for government-wide information sharing in the form of 'overarching legislation that would be superior to … all other … legislation in relation to that information'.[546] This issue is discussed in Chapters 18 and 19.

Presumably, the reforms noted by Secretary Gale will also affect how the Department shares information with entities such as the Teachers Registration Board and the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme. However, in the absence of more detail about the reforms, and irrespective of any changes to the privacy legislative framework, we recommend short- and long-term solutions to restrictions on sharing information between the Department and the Board.

There is a relatively straightforward interim solution to this issue: the Department can seek an exemption under the Personal Information Protection Act, thereby allowing it to share information about investigations into employees suspected of child sexual abuse with the Board.

Section 13 of the Personal Information Protection Act allows a 'personal information custodian' to apply for exemptions 'from compliance with any or all provisions' of the Act.[547] In determining whether or not to approve an application for an exemption, the Minister must be satisfied that 'the public benefit outweighs to a substantial degree the public benefit from compliance with the personal information protection principles'.[548] In our view, providing information to the Board in these circumstances would nearly always satisfy this requirement. We note that in a later hearing Secretary Bullard informed us there is 'work under way' towards applying for an exemption from the Act.[549]

While the longer-term measures in Recommendation 6.10 are being implemented, the Department should seek a section 13 exemption from the Personal Information Protection Act.

In the longer term, the Government should amend the Teachers Registration Act to support information sharing. An amended Act should empower the Teachers Registration Board to compel other entities to provide relevant information to the Board, including information gathered by the Department as part of an investigation into alleged misconduct by a teacher, in circumstances where child sexual abuse of a student by a registered teacher or holder of a Limited Authority to Teach is alleged or suspected. Providing such information will allow the Board to conduct investigations more efficiently, thereby reducing potential trauma to witnesses.

Part 6A of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act, which allows the Registrar under that Act to compel information or documents, provides a useful model for amendments to the Teachers Registration Act.[550] We note that the Personal Information Protection Act would not pose a barrier to sharing such information because if a provision of the Personal Information Protection Act is inconsistent with a provision in another Act, the other Act will prevail.[551] Also, the Personal Protection Principles in Schedule 1 of the Personal Information Protection Act allow personal information to be revealed if disclosure is required or authorised by another law.[552] This approach will help create consistency in the ability of independent regulators to request information relevant to child sexual abuse while limiting the personal information shared in these circumstances to that which is requested.

While allowing the Teachers Registration Board to compel information from other government entities will help improve the Board's investigative processes, the Board may still not know when to request that an entity provides such information. In other words, the Board may not be aware of child sexual abuse allegations or suspicions against a teacher. We understand the Department's policy is to notify the Board within 24 hours of receiving information about allegations of child sexual abuse by a teacher.[553] Secretary Bullard told us that the Department also notifies the Board when it starts a formal investigation into misconduct by a teacher under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct.[554]

We consider, however, that such notifications, which are vital to helping the Board safeguard children, should be legal requirements. Also, these notification requirements should apply to other entities that may have information about allegations or suspicions of child sexual abuse by a teacher. For example, other employers of teachers (such as non-government schools) the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, police and the Child Safety Service should all be subject to a mandatory requirement to notify the Board. Equally, the Board should be allowed to share information relevant to matters involving alleged or suspected child sexual abuse by a teacher, with all relevant entities. We note that under the new Child and Youth Safe Organisation Act 2023, entities will be able to share information relevant to the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.[555]

To facilitate more efficient information sharing and use of resources, and to reduce the possibility of investigations into child sexual abuse matters being duplicated, any investigation of allegations or suspicions of child sexual abuse by a teacher that the Department (or the Board) seeks to undertake should be done jointly, taking into account the relevant criteria of the Department and the Board.

Recommendation 6.10

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to:

a. allow the Teachers Registration Board to compel relevant entities—including the Department for Education, Children and Young People, other employers of teachers, the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme, police, and Child Safety Services—to give the Board information or documentation that is relevant to child sexual abuse matters involving a registered teacher or a holder of a Limited Authority to Teach

b. compel these relevant entities to notify the Teachers Registration Board when they become aware of allegations or suspicions of child sexual abuse by a teacher. Such entities should also be required to notify the Board if they begin any formal investigation that involves allegations or suspicions of child sexual abuse by a teacher or a holder of a Limited Authority to Teach, and the outcome of any investigation

c. allow entities, when investigating matters involving child sexual abuse by a registered teacher or holder of a Limited Authority to Teach, to jointly appoint investigators to investigate the matter, taking into account the different criteria required for investigations by the Department and the Board.

8.2.2 Keeping track of where teachers are working

Ms Moxham told us that the Teachers Registration Board 'does not have reliable information about where a teacher is employed' because a teacher's registration is not associated with a particular school, and under the Teachers Registration Act, there is no provision requiring that a teacher's location of employment be disclosed.[556] Also, a teacher does not have to inform the Board when they change their place of employment, although they must let the Board know about a change of residential address.[557] As Ms Moxham noted:

> Teachers are not required under the Act to update us whenever they change schools, only if they change address and they don't even always do that, and there's some limitations with our Act about actually pursuing them over those matters.[558]

As discussed in Section 8.1, the Watched Registrations list helps the Board keep track of teachers with conditions on their registration.[559] But this relies on individual schools to maintain updates. Ms Moxham noted that even if schools update their lists, the whereabouts of relief teachers may remain unknown to the Board because these teachers 'commonly do not appear on Watched Registration lists'.[560] Ms Moxham told us that 'it's almost impossible' for the Board to know where a relief teacher is employed on any given day.[561]

The National Royal Commission found that:

> … including employers' details [on teacher registers] may enable registration authorities to notify them of circumstances related to allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse by a teacher employee.[562]

Including such details may be particularly useful where teachers work at more than one school or in more than one school system.[563]

Most Australian jurisdictions require details about a teacher's place of employment to be recorded on the Register of Teachers or notified to the relevant teacher registration authority. Most jurisdictions also require that the relevant teacher registration authority be notified when a teacher's place of employment changes. In some Australian jurisdictions, there are penalties for failing to notify the relevant teacher registration authority of a change to place of employment. Tasmania is the only state that does not require place of employment to be included on the Register of Teachers.

We note that although most jurisdictions require teachers to notify the relevant registration authority of their place of employment, including any changes to their place of employment, there may be gaps in compliance. Such gaps mean that a registration authority may not know the whereabouts of an unknown number of teachers for a period. Another issue is that the requirement to inform the relevant authority of place of employment does not apply to relief teachers, who may teach at different schools within short periods.

To help keep children safe in Tasmanian schools, we consider that a teacher's work-related address(es) should be included on the Register of Teachers. This requirement should also apply to holders of a Limited Authority to Teach. When a registered teacher or a holder of a Limited Authority to Teach begins teaching at a different school, a notification should be made to the Teachers Registration Board, and the Register updated accordingly. Schools should be able to capture these details electronically, which would allow notifications to occur simply and quickly, thereby providing improved visibility of where teachers, particularly relief teachers, are teaching. Also, rather than requiring teachers (or a holder of a Limited Authority to Teach) to notify the Board, a more effective approach may be to require employers to make such notifications.

To facilitate the accurate and timely recording and exchange of information about teachers, we understand that improvements may be required to be made to the Register of Teachers. The Board noted that it would require resources for an upgraded, fit-for-purpose Customer Records Management System that can support information exchange in real time with third parties, including other jurisdictions. We were told this is proving to be a resourcing challenge that is delaying efforts to keep students safe.[564]

Recommendation 6.11

The Tasmanian Government should:

a. introduce legislation to amend the Teachers Registration Act 2000 (or regulations) to require details of the prospective or current place of employment of a teacher (or a holder of Limited Authority to Teach) to be included on the Register of Teachers

b. develop an electronic means of updating the Register of Teachers with details of the place of employment of a teacher (or a holder of Limited Authority to Teach)

c. require employers to make updates to a teacher's place of employment—including when a teacher (or a holder of Limited Authority to Teach) begins working at the school or is no longer working at the school

d. fund the Teachers Registration Board to develop an upgraded, fit-for-purpose Customer Records Management System to enable the Board to maintain a Register of Teachers which can support information exchange in real time with other bodies working with children, and other jurisdictions.

8.2.3 Improving compliance and enforcement

Under several provisions of the Teachers Registration Act, non-compliance with the provision attracts a penalty. For example, if a person who is not a registered teacher teaches in a school in Tasmania, they can be fined up to 50 penalty units (approximately $9,000 at the time of writing).[565] The Act also specifies that a person must not employ someone who is an unregistered teacher. The penalty is a fine of up to 50 penalty units for a first offence and up to 100 penalty units for a second offence (and an ongoing daily fine of 10 penalty units for each day the offence continues).[566] All other states and territories have similar provisions.[567]

We heard that:

- there are 'regular offenders who employ unregistered teachers'[568]
- although the Teachers Registration Act requires that teachers notify the Board if they are charged with a prescribed offence, teachers seldom comply with this provision[569]
- although the Act requires that employers notify the Board when they take disciplinary action or dismiss a teacher due to unacceptable behaviour, this provision is not always followed, at least by some independent schools[570]

- although the Act requires teachers to update the Board of changes to their residential address, some teachers do not do so, despite non-compliance attracting a penalty.[571]

Ms Moxham gave evidence that, despite the Act including 'enforcement' provisions for a range of 'offences', the Board has never undertaken an investigation to determine whether someone has contravened the provisions of the Act nor has it recommended prosecution against the Act.[572] Ms Moxham explained that this is largely due to the 'costly and time-consuming process of filing matters with the Administrative Division of the Magistrates Court' to have a fine issued for a contravention.[573] Regarding taking action against a school that employs an unregistered teacher, she stated:

> … the only process by which we can do that is to take the matter to the Magistrates Court, the administrative division of the Magistrates Court, and the time, energy, effort and resources to undertake that process has [worked] against the board ever taking any of those matters. So, we write letters, but you can imagine that if you've got a school that regularly offends and they've had five letters and a visit from us—no teeth. It's something that should be fixed in our Act.[574]

As with all legislation, effective enforcement is key to ensuring compliance with the Act. In turn, compliance with the Act is essential to ensuring that only qualified, fit and proper people are registered as teachers. Providing the Board with a simplified means of enforcing the provisions in the Act, particularly those that have relatively low-level sanctions attached, could help improve compliance with the Act and, in some instances, relieve the Board of costly and time-consuming enforcement processes.

As was pointed out in a submission to the Australian Law Reform Commission's Review of Federal Civil and Administrative Penalties, infringement schemes can be an appropriate means to address non-compliant behaviour, particularly in the context of a failure to provide notification or information to a regulator, which potentially reduces the effectiveness of the regulator 'in performing its regulatory functions'.[575] Such schemes have the advantage of providing a relatively quick and cost-effective means of dealing with contraventions of legislative provisions and are not uncommon in Tasmanian legislation.[576]

Under section 55 of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act, an infringement notice can be issued if the Registrar 'believes that the person has committed an infringement offence'.[577] Infringement offences are listed in Schedule 2 of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Regulations 2014. Infringement offences include engaging in a regulated activity as an unregistered person and employing an unregistered person in a regulated activity. Infringement notice schemes such as that in the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act are not uncommon in Tasmanian legislation and have the advantage of providing a relatively quick and efficient means of dealing with contraventions of legislative provisions.[578]

While other states and territories do not have infringement notice provisions in their teacher registration legislation, some jurisdictions do specify that breaches of particular provisions are strict liability offences. For example, in the Northern Territory it is an offence (as it is in Tasmania) to teach while unregistered or without authorisation (the maximum penalty for this is 50 penalty units). The Act specifies that this is a strict liability offence.[579] Similarly, in the Australian Capital Territory a person will commit an offence under the Teacher Quality Institute Act 2010 (ACT) if they teach in a school without being an approved teacher. This is also a strict liability offence (attracting a penalty of 50 penalty units).[580]

To enforce the Teachers Registration Act and thereby enhance the Board's ability to protect children and young people in Tasmanian schools, we recommend that the Act be amended to allow the Board to issue infringement notices for those provisions in the Act that carry penalties in the form of fines.

We understand that the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions provides advice to, and undertakes summary prosecutions on behalf of government departments and State Service agencies.[581] The Teachers Registration Board should consider entering an agreement with the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions to prosecute summary offences.

Recommendation 6.12

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Teachers Registration Act 2000 to allow administrative infringement notices to be issued for noncompliance with the provisions of the Act that currently carry penalties in the form of fines.

8.2.4 The emergency suspension provision

The Teachers Registration Act allows for an 'emergency suspension' of a teacher's registration if the Board believes, on reasonable grounds, that a registered teacher (or holder of a Limited Authority to Teach) poses 'a risk of harm to a student'.[582] In 2020, the Board used this provision to suspend the registration of six teachers.[583]

The emergency suspension provision has recently been subject to an appeal, which was upheld by the Magistrates Court. The Court found that if the Department has already suspended a teacher's employment, there is no 'emergency' justifying the Board to use the provision. The Court therefore ordered that the suspension of the teacher's registration be set aside, but that a condition be placed on his registration that he not be able to teach. The Registrar of the Teachers Registration Board described this as 'contrary to the function of the Board'.[584] This arose as an issue in the 'Jeremy' case study (refer to Chapter 5).

In other jurisdictions, there is no specification that the relevant registering authority must demonstrate an 'emergency' to suspend a teacher's registration. For example, in Queensland, the Education (Queensland College of Teachers) Act 2005 (Qld) says that a teacher may be suspended if they pose an unacceptable risk to children or if they are charged with a serious offence.[585]

The Victorian Institute of Teaching may suspend a teacher's registration if it forms a reasonable belief that the teacher poses an unacceptable risk of harm to children. The Institute may also suspend a registration if a person is charged with 'a Category B offence' (these include sexual offences).[586]

Ms Moxham told us that the 'emergency suspension' provision in the Teachers Registration Act should be amended to read 'immediate suspension', which 'would provide greater clarity about the purpose of the section'.[587] We agree. Also, allowing the Board to suspend registration where a person has been charged with a serious offence (as is the case in Queensland and Victoria) would help the Board to ensure children are protected in a timely manner in such circumstances.

Recommendation 6.13

The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend section 24B of the Teachers Registration Act 2000 to:

a. allow for the immediate rather than emergency suspension of registration or a Limited Authority to Teach when the Teachers Registration Board considers there is an unacceptable risk of harm to children

b. allow the Board to suspend a person's registration or a Limited Authority to Teach where that person has been charged with a serious offence.

8.2.5 Mutual and automatic mutual recognition for teachers

The national mutual recognition scheme allows registered and licensed professionals to work throughout Australia. Under the scheme, a registered teacher in another Australian jurisdiction can 'lodge a notice' to become a registered teacher in Tasmania. If the application is lodged correctly, within seven days the Board will provide the applicant with a notification of 'deemed registration'.[588] Once deemed registration is granted, the applicant can start teaching in Tasmania, pending the 'granting or refusal of substantive registration' within 30 days.[589] This is commonly referred to as mutual recognition.

A requirement for lodging a valid notice is that the teacher seeking mutual recognition must state whether they have been subject to any disciplinary proceedings in any other jurisdiction, including a 'preliminary investigation' or other action that could result in disciplinary proceedings.[590] Ms Moxham told us that if the notice contains any materially false or misleading information, the application may be refused.[591] The Board can receive and share relevant information with equivalent registration boards in other jurisdictions, to inform a decision to grant or refuse substantive registration.[592]

Building on the mutual recognition scheme, national changes to mutual recognition laws in 2021 provide for automatic mutual recognition in some circumstances. In Tasmania, teaching is exempt from the automatic recognition scheme until July 2025.[593] Once automatic mutual recognition is implemented, it will dispense with the requirement for a teacher to 'lodge a notice' for recognition of their registration in another jurisdiction.[594]

The Independent Education Inquiry heard about concerns with mutual recognition:

> An example provided to us described an applicant who falsified this declaration, gained registration as a relief teacher in Tasmania and went on to allegedly offend at multiple Tasmanian Government schools. We were told that a systemic weakness of the Mutual Recognition Act 1992 (Cth) is that a teacher's previous registration body is not obliged to disclose information about disciplinary proceedings to the teacher's new registration body. We heard that under the current processes in Tasmania, a teacher can obtain registration under the mutual recognition legislation much quicker than it takes to receive [Registration to Work with Vulnerable People]. This has the potential to result in instances where a teacher is able to begin work as a registered teacher in a school prior to being cleared to work with children.[595]

We heard similar concerns. Both Ms Moxham and Secretary Bullard expressed concerns about the mutual recognition scheme, particularly automatic mutual recognition.[596] Their primary concern was that the Board may not be notified if teachers from interstate start working in Tasmania. Without a requirement for notification, the Board cannot assess whether the person is suitable to work as a teacher in Tasmania, even if registered in their original jurisdiction.[597] The automatic mutual recognition scheme will also make it difficult for the Board to know who is working in this jurisdiction (and whether those who are working in Tasmania are registered in another jurisdiction). It may also make it difficult to validate teachers' principal place of residence and/or work, to monitor their ongoing eligibility to work under the Mutual Recognition Act 1992 (Cth), and to identify previous places of employment to access information about their conduct.[598]

We note that the Mutual Recognition Act 1992 (Cth) allows for an occupation to be excluded from the operation of the automatic mutual recognition scheme if automatic recognition poses a significant risk to consumer protection, environment protection, animal welfare or the health and safety of workers or the public. Exemptions from the scheme can be granted for up to five years.[599]

Given that the operation of the automatic mutual recognition scheme has been paused for teacher registration, we recommend that the Board continues to advocate at the national level that the risks posed by the scheme to the safety of children in Tasmanian schools be addressed before the exemption expires.

Recommendation 6.11 about teachers' employers being required to notify the Board of their place of employment may go some way to addressing some of the risks described above. The Board would be aware of a 'new' teacher in their jurisdiction and could conduct its own checks.

Recommendation 6.14

The Tasmanian Government, Department for Education, Children and Young People and the Teachers Registration Board should continue to advocate at the national level for an automatic mutual recognition scheme that takes into account risks to child safety and imposes measures to address these risks.

8.2.6 Professional development and training

During our hearings Ms Moxham indicated that it would be beneficial if training on mandatory reporting was part of Tasmania's teacher registration process.[600] She pointed out that in South Australia mandatory reporting training is a requirement of teacher registration; that is, teachers cannot be registered until they have successfully completed this training.[601] In Section 5, we make recommendations about compulsory and ongoing professional development on child safeguarding and related matters.

There is benefit in requiring that training for identifying, preventing and responding to child sexual abuse be completed as a prerequisite to registration. This is in keeping with the role of governments to enforce appropriate professional standards, as argued in the seminal work The Professions.[602] We note, however, that the Teachers Registration Board does not have the authority to set requirements for teacher registration.

We recommend that the Teachers Registration Act be amended to allow the Board to require that particular training be undertaken for the purpose of registration, renewal of registration and professional development. The content of that training should be set out in the Regulations so the Board can revise the training as required, without the need for more amendments to the principal Act.

Recommendation 6.15

1. The Tasmanian Government should introduce legislation to amend the Teachers Registration Act 2000 to allow the Teachers Registration Board to set requirements for minimum training and ongoing professional development.
2. The Teachers Registration Board should make child safeguarding training (Recommendation 6.5) a mandatory requirement for the granting of teacher registration and as part of ongoing registration requirements.

8.2.7 Resourcing

When asked whether the current level of funding was sufficient for the Teachers Registration Board to perform all its regulatory functions, Ms Moxham told us that 'the short answer to this question is no'.[603] She added that due to lack of funding, developing policy and procedures as well as 'leveraging … technical solutions' lag behind other parts of the Board's work.[604] If the Board is to take a more active role in enforcing the provisions of the Teachers Registration Act, this may place more pressure on available resources.

Ms Moxham told us that the ability to undertake investigations was also hampered by a lack of resources in a context where the Board is 'currently inundated with matters requiring complex and, in many cases, historical investigations'.[605] The Board's 'conduct team' comprises only two full-time investigators—a person who deals with applications (checking good character and fitness to teach based on national criminal history checks and other declarations made by applicants) and a person whose role primarily involves processing right to information requests.[606] Our recommendation that investigators be jointly appointed and for increased information sharing with the Board by relevant entities may help to reduce unnecessary duplication and thereby save resources.

Ms Moxham stated while the Board's funding was once exclusively sourced through registration fees, since 2017 it has also received some funding from the Tasmanian Government.

We heard that in the past the Board has advocated for a significant increase to teacher registration fees to help meet the costs of performing its functions under the Teachers Registration Act.[607] The Department has denied this request.[608] Instead, the Department reviewed the functions and powers of the Board and determined which areas were within the Board's 'central role of registration' and which were 'other'. 'Other' included functions concerned with professional conduct. More funding was then provided for roles deemed to not be part of the core teacher registration function of the Board (including functions concerned with professional conduct).[609] We are concerned that professional conduct matters were not seen as core business of the Board.

This funding is indexed to increase each year, but it is unclear for how long this will continue.[610] Ms Moxham noted that although the Board will receive extra funding in 2023 and 2024, this funding is akin to a two-year grant, 'not a structural/recurrent funding arrangement'.[611] According to Ms Moxham, greater certainty of funds would enable the Board to 'fully address [its] regulatory remit (inclusive of educative and co-regulation processes)'.[612]

We note that the Board also has concerns about how its funding arrangements may affect its independence. Ms Moxham's view was that 'ad hoc grants on a per annum or project basis' are not enough to ensure the independence of the Board and that, for the Board to be 'truly independent', funding should be drawn from consolidated revenue rather than the departmental purse.[613]

We also note that, in response to the recent Education Regulation Review, the Education Legislation Amendments (Education Regulation) Act 2022 has amended the Education Act 2016 to require the Registrar of the Teachers Registration Board and the Secretary of the Department to enter into a 'Framework Agreement'.[614] The Framework Agreement will cover matters such as the Registrar's staffing, budgets and the application of departmental policies.[615] The intention of the amendment is to further safeguard the independence of education regulators (such as the Board) by providing 'greater transparency and clarity on administrative support' provided by the Department.[616]

Ms Moxham told us that this amendment 'appears to give effect to what is already achieved by the [Teachers Registration Board] and the Department via Memoranda of Understanding and … Service Level Agreements'.[617] She also stated:

> … while ever the regulator is subject to the Department for the funding it needs over and above teacher registration fees (rather than from consolidated government revenue), the Department can continue to consider the regulator as a business unit of the Department and subject [to] its strategic intent, rather than to the important reforms needed to ensure the most efficient and effective use of resources for the best outcomes for the welfare and best interests of students (vulnerable children and young people).[618]

During our hearings, Secretary Bullard commented on Ms Moxham's concerns that changes effected by the Education Regulation Review mean that the Board will become less independent. His view was that rather than bringing the Board closer to Government, the changes will have the opposite effect, in part due to introducing a skills-based Board to replace the representative Board and the 'higher level of scrutiny and regulatory oversight to the activities of the [Teachers Registration Board]' that this change will bring.[619]

Ultimately, from the perspective of keeping children safe in Tasmanian schools, the most important point is that the Board can perform its statutory functions. Given Ms Moxham's concerns and noting that one of the purposes of establishing the Board was to 'protect children in government and non-government schools from the possibility of sexual or other abuse', consideration should be given to whether the Board's funding levels are enough for it to perform all of its functions under its Act—whether under current funding arrangements or through the new Framework Agreement.[620]

While the registration of teachers is a core function of the Board, those functions deemed 'other' by the Department—that is, functions concerned with professional conduct, compliance and enforcement—are equally important to protecting children and fostering student wellbeing. Adequate resources should be provided to enable the Teachers Registration Board to perform these functions, without which students may be at increased risk. In this respect, we note that the Review of Education Regulation report recommended that the Department develops a methodology, with input from regulators such as the Board, to determine sustainable funding.[621]

Recommendation 6.16

The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Teachers Registration Board is funded to perform its core function of regulating the professional conduct of teachers.

9 Conclusion

Schools should always be a safe place for children and young people. Students are entitled to expect that school staff will always act in their best interests and are equipped to help them if they disclose concerns. We acknowledge that, overwhelmingly, teachers and school staff are committed to ensuring the safety, wellbeing and educational achievement of students in their care. Their actions can have an enormous impact on the lives of children and young people—many teachers will shape the lives of their students for the better.

The Department should consistently strive to prevent child sexual abuse through strong screening and registration requirements, clear and practical policies and guidance, and a commitment to ongoing training and education. The Department can make an important contribution to the knowledge and confidence of young people, and their ability to recognise and understand risks to their safety, by providing child sexual abuse prevention education to all children in Tasmanian Government schools. The Teachers Registration Board should be equipped to robustly regulate the registration and professional conduct of teachers. The Board should have access to the powers, information and funding that it needs to acquit its functions and to be responsive to the risks that teachers may pose to students.

There are instances where students are not kept safe. Sometimes they are harmed by teachers who they trusted, in other instances by fellow students who display harmful sexual behaviours. While these incidents are more common than we would like to believe, they often occur relatively infrequently in the careers of individual principals and teachers. While school staff and leadership should have foundational skills in line with their responsibilities to receive a disclosure and know what to do, there is a place for specialist roles to closely guide and support schools when concerns are raised about a teacher's conduct or a student's safety. While it is inevitable that such incidents will cause distress and concern, the impact of abuse can be greatly alleviated by an effective and supportive response.

We are greatly encouraged by the efforts of the Department in implementing the recommendations of the Independent Education Inquiry and progressing a range of other safeguarding initiatives designed to improve the safety of students. We see great promise in these initiatives. However, we consider it is important that the Department be accountable for its commitments. We consider it appropriate that the Child Sexual Abuse Reform Implementation Monitor we recommend in Chapter 22 monitors the implementation of the Independent Education Inquiry's recommendations.

For many victim-survivors, the most pressing concern is preventing what happened to them from happening to another student. We expect the Department to share this commitment of victim-survivors and to prove this commitment through its actions.

Notes

1 Refer to, for example, Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet, National Strategy to Prevent and Respond to Child Sexual Abuse 2021–2030 (2021) 37–39; National Centre for Action on Child Sexual Abuse, Here for Change: Five Year Strategy 2023–2027 (June 2023) 22–23.

2 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 65.

3 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 65.

4 Transcript of Leah Sallese, 8 July 2022, 2638 [35–39].

5 Transcript of Sam Leishman, 13 May 2022, 1054 [35]–1055 [3].

6 The name 'Rachel' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022; Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 8 [38].

7 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 611 [27–34].

8 Carmel Hobbs, Young, In Love and In Danger: Teen Domestic Violence and Abuse in Tasmania (Report, Social Action & Research Centre, Anglicare Tasmania, November 2022) 50.

9 Carmel Hobbs, Young, In Love and In Danger: Teen Domestic Violence and Abuse in Tasmania (Report, Social Action & Research Centre, Anglicare Tasmania, November 2022) 63.

10 Carmel Hobbs, Young, In Love and In Danger: Teen Domestic Violence and Abuse in Tasmania (Report, Social Action & Research Centre, Anglicare Tasmania, November 2022) 40.

11 Carmel Hobbs, Young, In Love and In Danger: Teen Domestic Violence and Abuse in Tasmania (Report, Social Action & Research Centre, Anglicare Tasmania, November 2022) 40.

12 Australian Government eSafety Commissioner, 'Online Porn', Issues and Advice (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.esafety.gov.au/parents/issues-and-advice/online-porn>.

13 Statement of Kathryn Fordyce, 3 May 2022, 15 [47]–16 [48].

14 Statement of Kathryn Fordyce, 3 May 2022, 16 [50].

15 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, Recommendation 6.2.

16 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, Recommendation 6.2.

17 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 72.

18 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 72.

19 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 73.

20 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 156.

21 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 156.

22 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 11–12 [38].

23 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1105 [14–40].

24 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1106 [18–41].

25 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1107 [12–45].

26 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1107 [12–45].

27 Submission 067 Body Safety Australia, 2.

28 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1106 [6–14].

29 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1107 [28–34].

30 Submission 067 Body Safety Australia, 5.

31 Burnie consultation, 24 August 2021.

32 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 12 [39].

33 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 12 [39].

34 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 12 [42].

35 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1103 [17–21].

36 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 11 [63].

37 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 7 [36].

38 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 11 [67].

39 Tasmanian Government, Safe Homes, Families, Communities: Tasmania's Action Plan for Family and Sexual Violence 2019–2022 (2019) 9.

40 Tasmanian Government, Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 (November 2022) 19.

41 Tasmanian Government, Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 (November 2022) 19.

42 Tasmanian Government, 'About Respectful Relationships Education', Respectful Relationships (Web Page, 6 June 2023) <https://www.respectfulrelationships.education.tas.gov.au/about/>.

43 Tasmanian Government, 'About Respectful Relationships Education', Respectful Relationships (Web Page, 6 June 2023) <https://www.respectfulrelationships.education.tas.gov.au/about/>.

44 Tasmanian Government, 'School Leadership', Respectful Relationships (Web Page, 20 March 2023) <https://www.respectfulrelationships.education.tas.gov.au/school-leadership/>.

45 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 7 [37]; Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 31 [186].

46 Transcript of Elizabeth Jack, 13 May 2022, 1111 [2–9].

47 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 11 [64].

48 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 11 [65].

49 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 30 [19(d)].

50 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 6 (Table: 'Prevention Programs run across Tasmanian Government Schools', 29 April 2022).

51 Hobart consultation, 13 August 2021.

52 Launceston consultation, 19 August 2021.

53 Statement of Elizabeth Jack in response to Questions on Notice, 3 June 2022, 1.

54 Statement of Elizabeth Jack in response to Questions on Notice, 3 June 2022, 2.

55 Statement of Elizabeth Jack in response to Questions on Notice, 3 June 2022, 2.

56 Transcript of Elizabeth Jack, 13 May 2022, 1111 [11–14].

57 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 8 [39].

58 Statement of Elizabeth Jack in response to Questions on Notice, 3 June 2022, 2.

59 Statement of Elizabeth Jack in response to Questions on Notice, 3 June 2022, 2.

60 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 12 [39].

61 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1117 [14–22].

62 Statement of Elizabeth Jack in response to Questions on Notice, 3 June 2022, 3.

63 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 31 [187].

64 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 31 [187].

65 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 31 [187].

66 Department for Education South Australia, 'Keeping Safe: Child Protection Curriculum information for educators', Curriculum Programs (Web Page, 17 November 2022) <https://www.education.sa.gov.au/schools-and-educators/curriculum-and-teaching/curriculum-programs/keeping-safe-child-protection-curriculum-information-educators>.

67 Transcript of Kerryann Walsh, 13 May 2022, 1110 [19–21].

68 Department for Education South Australia, 'About', Keeping Safe: Child Protection Curriculum (Web Page, 19 July 2023) <https://kscpc.sa.edu.au/about/>.

69 Department for Education South Australia, 'Keeping Safe: Child Protection Curriculum information for parents and carers', Curriculum Programs (Web Page, 19 July 2023) <https://www.education.sa.gov.au/parents-and-families/curriculum-and-learning/early-years/keeping-safe-child-protection-curriculum-information-parents-and-carers>.

70 Department for Education South Australia, 'About', Keeping Safe: Child Protection Curriculum (Web Page, 19 July 2023) <https://kscpc.sa.edu.au/about/>.

71 Divna Haslam et al, The Prevalence and Impact of Child Maltreatment in Australia: Findings from the Australian Child Maltreatment Study: Brief Report (Report, Australian Child Maltreatment Study, Queensland University of Technology, 2023) 17.

72 Tasmanian Government, Survivors at the Centre: Tasmania's Third Family and Sexual Violence Action Plan 2022–2027 (November 2022) 19.

73 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 7 June 2021) Recommendations 5–7, 76–77.

74 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 7 June 2021) Recommendations 3, 75.

75 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 2 (Department of Education, 'Statement of Duties for Executive Director, Safeguarding Children and Young People', July 2021) 3 [13].

76 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 2 (Department of Education, 'Statement of Duties for Executive Director, Safeguarding Children and Young People,' July 2021) 3 [13].

77 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 6 [28].

78 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 5 [27].

79 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 6 [30].

80 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 6 [31].

81 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 4 [25–26].

82 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53].

83 Department for Education, Children and Young People, DECYP Organisational Chart (Web Page, 30 April 2023) <https://publicdocumentcentre.education.tas.gov.au/library/Shared%20Documents/DECYP-Organisation-Chart.pdf.>.

84 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023).

85 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 77.

86 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53].

87 Transcript of Elizabeth Jack, 13 May 2022, 1120 [13–19].

88 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 5 [26]; Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 77.

89 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 13 [46].

90 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 14 [49].

91 Transcript of Elizabeth Jack, 13 May 2022, 1119 [47]–1120 [10].

92 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 1.

93 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 1.

94 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 1.

95 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 1.

96 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 72.

97 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 49.

98 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 82.

99 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 82.

100 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 3.

101 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 4.

102 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 4.

103 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 3.

104 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 3.

105 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 8.

106 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 8.

107 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 7.

108 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 8.

109 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 12.

110 Department of Education, Safeguarding Children and Young People – System Review Panel Report (Report, 16 December 2021) 24.

111 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Procedural Fairness Response, 17 March 2023, 10.

112 The Department has since told us that although its deliberations were not detailed in the review, the Review Panel did give specific consideration to whether the relevant young person and/or their family should be invited to participate in an interview. We are told that the Review Panel determined that it would be inappropriate to do so in the circumstances. We consider it important that any similar future reports detail all critical deliberations. Department for Education, Children and Young People, Procedural Fairness Response, 17 March 2023, 11–12.

113 Integrity Commission, 'Audit Report: MM21/0102; MM20/0141', 10 August 2022, 15 [77].

114 Integrity Commission, 'Audit Report: MM21/0102; MM20/0141', 10 August 2022, 15 [78].

115 Integrity Commission, 'Audit Report: MM21/0102; MM20/0141', 10 August 2022, 15 [74].

116 Integrity Commission, 'Audit Report: MM21/0102; MM20/0141', 10 August 2022, 16 [82].

117 Integrity Commission, 'Audit Report: MM21/0102; MM20/0141', 10 August 2022, 16 [83].

118 Integrity Commission, 'Audit Report: MM21/0102; MM20/0141', 10 August 2022, 16 [85].

119 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, 9 [44].

120 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 3934 [35–37].

121 Australian Human Rights Commission, National Principles for Child Safe Organisations (2018) 6.

122 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 8 [24], [26].

123 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, 7 June 2021) 9, 17, 59, 70.

124 Statement of Nigel Russell, 29 April 2022, 2 [11].

125 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 636 [19–24].

126 Transcript of Debra Drake, 10 May 2022, 771 [12–46].

127 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 76.

128 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 78–79.

129 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 79.

130 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 79.

131 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse Report, 7 June 2021) 80.

132 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 81–82.

133 Statement of Stephen Smallbone, 28 April 2022, 8 [31]; Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 12 (Excel spreadsheet: 'Planned and completed implementation of DoE Inquiry Recommendations', 29 April 2022) 5.

134 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 7 [39].

135 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 43 [250].

136 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 14 [91].

137 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 23 [143].

138 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 27 [169].

139 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 2.

140 A URL link for the Child Safe Code of Conduct (Interim) can be found in Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023) 69.

141 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 636 [26–34].

142 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 752 [23–27].

143 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023).

144 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023) 6.

145 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023) 65.

146 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 6.

147 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023) 69.

148 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Safe. Secure. Supported. Our Safeguarding Framework (April 2023) 9.

149 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 6 [28].

150 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 4 [22].

151 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 5 [26].

152 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 5 [26].

153 Transcript of Alana Girvin, 11 May 2022, 862 [36–39].

154 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 185.

155 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 186.
156 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 4–5 [24].
157 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 4–5 [24].
158 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 5 [25].
159 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 5 [24].
160 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 6 [29].
161 Transcript of Alana Girvin, 11 May 2022, 863 [15–17].
162 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, Annexure ASG-3 (Guideline: 'Protective practices for staff in their interactions with children and young people', 2019) 11.
163 Refer to Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 186.
164 Transcript of Elizabeth Jack, 13 May 2022, 1114 [45–46].
165 Statement of Nigel Russell, 29 April 2022, 1 [8].
166 Statement of Nigel Russell, 29 April 2022, 4 [29]–5 [31].
167 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 773 [28–36].
168 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 9 [40].
169 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 760 [9–13].
170 Transcript of Kerri Collins, 9 May 2022, 637 [9–19].
171 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 759 [7–11].
172 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 760 [22–35].
173 Statement of Steven Smith, 22 April 2022, 5 [35].
174 Statement of Steven Smith, 22 April 2022, 6 [36].
175 Statement of Steven Smith, 22 April 2022, 6 [37].
176 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 15 [94].
177 Statement of Monique Carter, 26 April 2022, 8 [52].
178 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 15 [94].
179 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 22–23 [142].
180 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 22 [137].
181 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 6 [33].
182 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 6 [34].
183 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 32 [189].
184 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 987 [46]–988 [5].
185 Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 7.
186 Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 7.
187 Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 6.
188 Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 6.
189 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53].
190 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, Annexure ASG-2 ('Key Debelle Report Recommendations', 28 April 2022) 6 [16–17], [21]; refer to Recommendations 16, 17, 21.
191 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 5–6 [26].
192 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 5 [25].
193 Transcript of Alana Girvin, 11 May 2022, 868 [27–32].
194 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 774 [34–46], 775 [1–12].
195 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 6 [18].
196 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 9 [45].

197 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 12.

198 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 17 (Letter from Elizabeth Jack to Dean and Head of School, Education, University of Tasmania, 21 December 2021) 1–2.

199 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 12.

200 Teachers Registration Board, Procedural Fairness Response, 17 March 2023, 2.

201 Teachers Registration Board, Procedural Fairness Response, 17 March 2023, 2.

202 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 12.

203 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 78.

204 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 6 [18].

205 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 7 [23].

206 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 89.

207 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 6, 90.

208 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 17 (Letter from Elizabeth Jack to Dean and Head of School, Education, University of Tasmania, 21 December 2021) 1–2.

209 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 8 [25].

210 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 6 [35].

211 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 17 (Letter from Elizabeth Jack to Dean and Head of School, Education, University of Tasmania, 21 December 2021) 2.

212 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 17 (Letter from Elizabeth Jack to Dean and Head of School, Education, University of Tasmania, 21 December 2021) 2.

213 We note that increases and decreases in allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse must be viewed in a broader context. A decrease in reporting does not necessarily coincide with a decrease in incidents, just as an apparent increase in incidents may reflect increased awareness and reporting. For example, we note in Chapter 5 that Secretary Bullard has attributed a recent increase in reports in the Department to 'people getting the message'. However, over time, if the measures designed to prevent child sexual abuse and their implementation are successful, we would expect there to be an overall decrease in incidents, as appears to be the case in South Australia.

214 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 ss 14 and 22.

215 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 34.

216 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 30.

217 For example, Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022). Other flowcharts include: Department for Education, Children and Young People, Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse by a Current Department Employee or Volunteer (version 2.0, undated); Department for Education, Children and Young People, Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse by a Former Department Employee (version 2.0, undated); Department for Education, Children and Young People, Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse by an Adult in the Family or Community, Including Visitors in Schools (version 2.0, undated); Department for Education, Children and Young People, Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Harmful Sexual Behaviour (version 2.0, undated); Department for Education, Children and Young People, Online Child Sexual Abuse Material: Response Flowchart for Staff (version 2.0, undated). In February 2023, Secretary Bullard told us that flowcharts relating to preventing, identifying and responding to child sexual abuse were updated and distributed to schools: Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 2.

218 Refer to Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

219 Refer to Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

220 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

221 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022). The flowchart also provides contacts that should be made for matters involving harmful sexual behaviours and abuse by a family member or member of the community.

222 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

223 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

224 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

225 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 55 [336].

226 Department of Education, Department of Education Process Where an Allegations(s) of Child Sexual Abuse is Made Against a Current Employee (2021) 1. This policy is available on the Workplace Relations Child Sexual Abuse Intranet page.

227 Department of Education, Department of Education Process Where an Allegations(s) of Child Sexual Abuse is Made Against a Current Employee (2021) 1.

228 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 33 [191].

229 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 33 [191].

230 This occurs in relation to the fixed term and relief employment register: Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 33 [191].

231 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 33 [191].

232 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 33 [191].

233 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for DoE Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

234 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for DoE Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

235 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 33 [192].

236 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [193].

237 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 41 [244].

238 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 41 [244].

239 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 765 [3–40].

240 Department of Education, Department of Education Process Where an Allegations(s) of Child Sexual Abuse is Made Against a Current Employee (2021) 2.

241 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [194].

242 Department of Education, Department of Education Process Where an Allegations(s) of Child Sexual Abuse is Made Against a Current Employee (2021) 2.

243 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [194].

244 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [194].

245 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [194].

246 State Service Act 2000 s 10(1).

247 State Service Act 2000 s 9(6).

248 State Service Act 2000 s 9.

249 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 10 [60].

250 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [194].

251 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [194].

252 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [194].

253 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 34 [194].

254 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 35 [202].

255 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 36 [217].

256 Refer to State Service Act 2000 s 3 (definition of 'employee'), 10(1). Refer also to Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 35 [202].

257 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 56 [347].

258 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 56 [348].

259 Statement of Steven Smith, 22 April 2022, 6 [39].

260 Statement of Steven Smith, 22 April 2022, 6 [39].

261 Refer to Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for School Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022) 2.

262 Integrity Commission, Guide to Managing Misconduct in the Tasmanian Public Sector (March, 2021).

263 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 904 [4–9].

264 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 904 [23–30].

265 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 904 [11–21]. Refer also to Commissioner's Direction 5/2002.

266 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Procedural Fairness Response, 17 March 2023, 23.

267 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Procedural Fairness Response, 17 March 2023, 23.

268 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 955 [27–33].

269 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 957 [5–29].

270 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 960 [23–25].

271 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 57 [357].

272 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 35(3).

273 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 40(3).

274 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 31(3).

275 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023 s 34.

276 We note that the State Service Management Office issued practices, procedures and standards on 8 July 2022 that enabled these breaches to be recorded: State Service Management Office, Practices, Procedures and Standards No. 5: Register for Tasmanian State Service Code of Conduct Breaches Resulting in or that would have Resulted in Termination (8 July 2022).

277 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 811 [14–16].

278 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 809 [45]–810 [3].

279 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 56 [342].

280 Statement of Timothy Bullard in response to Questions on Notice, 6 June 2022, 2 [7].

281 Statement of Timothy Bullard in response to Questions on Notice, 6 June 2022, 2 [6]–3 [10].

282 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 56 [343–346].

283 Statement of Steven Smith, 22 April 2022, 6 [39]. Refer also to Employment Direction No. 5, Procedures for the Investigation and Determination of Whether an Employee Has Breached the Code of Conduct (2013) cl 7.3.

284 Statement of Steven Smith, 22 April 2022, 7 [39].

285 Statement of Timothy Bullard in response to Questions on Notice, 6 June 2022, 2 [6]–3 [10].

286 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 55 [341].

287 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 3 [24].

288 Transcript of 'Rachel', 11 May 2022, 813 [17–26].

289 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 58 [361–364].

290 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 901 [28–32].

291 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 11 May 2022, 902 [29–35].

292 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 6 [18].

293 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 10 [32].

294 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 10 [32].

295 Statement of Timothy Bullard in response to Questions on Notice, 6 June 2022, 3 [16].

296 Statement of Timothy Bullard in response to Questions on Notice, 6 June 2022, 3 [16].

297 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 10 [32].

298 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 10 [32].

299 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 6 [19].

300 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 10 [33].

301 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 10 [33].

302 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023) 47.

303 Statement of Katrina Munting, 5 April 2022, 5 [23]. The name 'Peter' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 10 May 2022.

304 Statement of Kerri Collins, 11 April 2022, 2 [11].

305 Statement of 'Rachel', 14 April 2022, 4 [22]–5 [23]. The name 'Wayne' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 11 May 2022.

306 Statement of Nigel Russell, 28 April 2022, 3 [22–23].

307 Transcript of Robert Boost, 12 September 2022, 3894 [34–47].

308 Transcript of Robert Boost, 12 September 2022, 3895 [10–18].

309 Transcript of Robert Boost, 12 September 2022, 3894 [45]–3895 [8].

310 Statement of Sam Leishman, 15 March 2022, 2 [11] and [15].

311 Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023, s 42.

312 Statement of Timothy Bullard, regarding Sam Leishman, 8 April 2022, 6 [43].

313 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 58 [365].

314 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 10 [60].

315 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 2.

316 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 2.

317 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, June 2021) 50, 10.

318 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, June 2021) 10.

319 Refer to, for example, Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 930 [9–43].

320 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, June 2021) 79, Recommendation 12.

321 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 3938 [26–30].

322 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 2 [11].

323 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 2 [14].

324 Department for Education, Protective Practices for Staff in Their Interactions with Children and Young People (2nd ed, Government of South Australia, 2019) 7.

325 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 3.

326 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 20 [86].

327 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 20 [87].

328 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 21 [88–90].

329 Conversation with Alana Girvin, former Director of the Incident Management Directorate in the South Australian Department for Education (staff, Commission of Inquiry, 3 March 2022).

330 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 2 [12].

331 The current Incident Report Management System is to be replaced from 2022 with a new system based on a new technology platform. Refer to Department for Education, Annual Report 2021 (Report, Government of South Australia, 2021) 37.

332 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 3 [15].

333 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 11 [43].

334 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 11 [43].

335 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 11 [43].

336 Department for Education, Management of Complaints, Incidents and Non-Compliance in Family Day Care and Respite Care Program Procedure (Government of South Australia, 2022) 6.

337 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 11 [43].

338 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 12 [44–45].

339 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 12 [46].

340 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 12 [46].

341 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 12 [49].

342 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 13 [50].

343 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 13 [51].

344 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 13 [53].

345 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 13 [54].

346 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 13 [56].

347 Transcript of Alana Girvin, 11 May 2022, 868 [41]–869 [4]; Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 16 [70].

348 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 14 [57].

349 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 15 [64].

350 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 15 [66].

351 Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 16–17 [70].

352 Transcript of Alan Girvin, 11 May 2022, 855 [6–11].

353 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 206.

354 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 206.

355 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 193.

356 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 211.

357 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 211

358 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 213.

359 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 7, 211.

360 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1092 [4–23].

361 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Keeping Children Safer Implementation Status Report', Keeping Children Safer (Policy Document, 31 May 2023) 6, Action 21 <https://www.dpac.tas.gov.au/keepingchildrensafer>.

362 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 3.

363 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 3.

364 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 231 [695]; Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 11 [3.1].

365 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 11 [3.1].

366 There are other actions that should be taken by the 'sector office': Statement of Alana Girvin, 28 April 2022, 8 [36].

367 Refer to Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for DoE Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022).

368 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 14 [3.3]; Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 252 [3.3].

369 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 14 [3.3.1]; Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 252 [3.3.1].

370 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 200 [610].

371 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 230 [692]–231 [693], 252 [3.3.2], 280 [12].

372 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 14 [3.3.2].

373 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 14 [3.3.2].

374 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 15 [3.3.2].

375 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 15 [3.3.2].

376 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 14 [3.3.2]; Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 252 [3.3.2].

377 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 231 [693].

378 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 231 [693], 252 [3.3.2], 280 [12].

379 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 231 [693].

380 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 183 [555], 252 [3.3.2], 253 [3.3.3].

381 Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 15 [3.3.3].

382 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 194 [592], 253 [3.3.3]. Refer also to Department for Education, Managing Allegations of Sexual Misconduct in SA Education and Care Settings (Government of South Australia, 2019) 15 [3.3.3].

383 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 277 [1–2].

384 Government of South Australia, Report of the Independent Education Inquiry (Report, 2013) 253–254 [3.3.4].

385 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 31 October 2022, 3 [13].

386 Letter from Timothy Bullard to the Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 8.

387 National Office for Child Safety, 'Discussion Paper from the National Clinical Reference Group – Language and Terminology' (Discussion Paper, December 2022); Statement of Dale Tolliday, 29 April 2022, 3 [14]. Harmful sexual behaviours are also discussed in the out of home care setting in Chapter 9, Ashley Youth Detention Centre in Chapter 12, and therapeutic interventions in Chapter 21. For more information about harmful sexual behaviours in institutional contexts, refer to the National Royal Commission's final report, which outlines important research and understanding of this form of child sexual abuse: Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 10.

388 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 29.

389 Department of Justice, 'Summary Table of Tasmanian Government Progress Towards Implementing the National Royal Commission Recommendations', 22 September 2021, 49 [13.6], produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

390 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 80.

391 Statement of Leanne McLean, 12 April 2022, 32 [111].

392 Anonymous session, 12 October 2022; Anonymous session, 16 August 2022; Anonymous session, 17 February 2022.

393 Submission 093 Anonymous, 1; Statement of Nigel Russell, 29 April 2022, 2–3 [15]; Transcript of Ignatius Kim, 9 May 2022, 689 [12–13].

394 Submission 093 Anonymous, 1; Submission 086 Angela Sdrinis Legal, 78; Statement of Ignatius Kim, 20 April 2022, 7 [45].

395 Anonymous session, 16 August 2022; Anonymous session, 12 October 2022; Anonymous session, 17 February 2022; Submission 086 Angela Sdrinis Legal, 78; Burnie consultation, 24 August 2021; Hobart consultation, 13 August 2021.

396 Submission 086 Angela Sdrinis Legal, 78; Anonymous session, 16 August 2022; Anonymous session, 12 October 2022; Anonymous session, 17 February 2022.

397 Consultation with Tasmania Police (Hobart), 25 August 2021; Anonymous session, 12 October 2022.

398 Burnie consultation, 24 August 2021; Hobart consultation, 13 August 2021.

399 Anonymous session, 12 October 2022.

400 Anonymous session, 17 February 2022.

401 Anonymous session, 13 October 2021.

402 Submission 093 Anonymous, 1.

403 Transcript of Ignatius Kim, 9 May 2022, 684 [39–45].

404 Transcript of Ignatius Kim, 9 May 2022, 686 [41–45].

405 Statement of Ignatius Kim, 20 April 2022, 7 [45]; Transcript of Ignatius Kim, 9 May 2022, 687 [1–6].

406 Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 12 [51].

407 Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 12 [51].

408 Statement of Nigel Russell, 28 April 2022, 3 [22–23].

409 Statement of Nigel Russell, 28 April 2022, 3 [22].

410 Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 6 [25].

411 Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 12 [50].

412 Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 6 [26].

413 Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 11 [46].

414 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 6 [19].

415 Statement of Kerryann Walsh, 15 April 2022, 6 [19].

416 Transcript of Renae Pepper, 10 May 2022, 733 [4–5].

417 Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 13 [51].

418 Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 13 [51].

419 Statement of Dale Tolliday, 29 April 2022, 17 [71].

420 Submission 078 Anonymous, 3.

421 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 774 [28–32].

422 Transcript of Monique Carter, 10 May 2022, 773 [22–24].

423 Statement of Debra Drake, 6 May 2022, 7 [45].

424 Statement of Debra Drake, 6 May 2022, 7 [44].

425 Transcript of Ignatius Kim, 9 May 2022, 688 [32–36].

426 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 988 [21–24].

427 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 988 [39–43].

428 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 13 [53].

429 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 30 [19(d)].

430 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 30 [19(d)]; Statement of Renae Pepper, 30 April 2022, 3 [14].

431 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 30 [19(d)].

432 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 12 [72].

433 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 12 [73], 39 [236].

434 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 12 [73].

435 Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 2.

436 Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 2.

437 Letter from Timothy Bullard to Commission of Inquiry, 9 February 2023, 2.

438 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 37 [226]–39 [235]; Department for Education, Children and Young People, 'Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Harmful Sexual Behaviour Initiated by a Child or Young Person (Flowchart)', undated, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

439 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 8 (Flowchart: 'Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse by a Current or Former DoE Employee', undated).

440 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 38 [229]; Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 8 (Flowchart: 'Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse by a Current or Former DoE Employee', undated).

441 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 38 [230].

442 Department for Education, Children and Young People, 'Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Harmful Sexual Behaviour Initiated by a Child or Young Person (Flowchart)', undated, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

443 Department for Education, Children and Young People, 'Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Harmful Sexual Behaviour Initiated by a Child or Young Person (Flowchart)', undated, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

444 Department for Education, Children and Young People, 'Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Harmful Sexual Behaviour Initiated by a Child or Young Person (Flowchart)', undated, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

445 Statement of Elizabeth Jack, 29 April 2022, Annexure 8 (Flowchart: 'Responding to Incidents, Disclosures or Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse by a Current or Former DoE Employee', undated).

446 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 10 May 2022, 40 [240].

447 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 14 November 2000, 43 (Paula Wriedt, Minister for Education).

448 Refer to Australian Professional Standards for Teachers, Standard 4, Focus area 4.4.

449 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 60.

450 Refer to Department for Education, Children and Young People, Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Policy (2021).

451 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 168.

452 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 14 November 2000, 40 (Paula Wriedt, Minister for Education).

453 In relation to applications for registration, refer to Teachers Registration Act 2000 pt 3. In relation to discipline and inquiries, refer to Teachers Registration Act 2000 pt 4.

454 Ben Mathews, Oversight and Regulatory Mechanisms Aimed at Protecting Children from Sexual Abuse: Understanding Current Evidence of Efficacy (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 2017) 88 [2.7.4.4.1].

455 Refer to Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 6A; Teachers Registration Board, Employing Teachers in Tasmania (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.trb.tas.gov.au/employing-teachers-in-tasmania/>.

456 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 6.

457 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 7A.

458 Teachers Registration Board, About Us (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.trb.tas.gov.au/about-us/>.

459 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 6A(d)–(e).

460 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 6A(f) s 24.

461 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 6A(i).

462 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 7A.

463 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 2 [1.5].

464 Under the Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 11, it is an offence to teach in these institutions without registration or a Limited Authority to Teach.

465 Teachers Registration Act 2000 pt 3, div 3.

466 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 11.

467 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 17J(a).

468 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 17J(a)(b).

469 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 17J(b); Teachers Registration Board, Determining Good Character and Fitness to Teach: Board Policy July 2020 (Version 1.2, 8 October 2022). The Teachers Registration Board may also take into account any other matter it considers relevant: Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 17J.

470 Teachers Registration Act 2000 ss 7A, 17J(c); Teachers Registration Board, Annual Report 2020 (Report, 2021) 30.

471 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 17K; Teachers Registration Board, Determining Good Character and Fitness to Teach: Board Policy July 2020 (Version 1.2, 8 October 2022).

472 Teachers Registration Board, Determining Good Character and Fitness to Teach: Board Policy July 2020 (Version 1.2, 8 October 2022).

473 Teachers Registration Board, Determining Good Character and Fitness to Teach: Board Policy July 2020 (Version 1.2, 8 October 2022).

474 Teachers Registration Act 2000 ss 16, 17A. Provisionally registered teachers should become fully registered within five years. Limited Authorities to Teach are granted for a period of up to two years.

475 Teachers Registration Board, Professional Boundaries: Guidelines for Tasmanian Teachers (2021) 8.

476 Teachers Registration Board, Professional Boundaries: Guidelines for Tasmanian Teachers (2021) 8.

477 Teachers Registration Board, Professional Boundaries: Guidelines for Tasmanian Teachers (2021) 7–8.

478 Teachers Registration Board, Professional Boundaries: Guidelines for Tasmanian Teachers (2021) 9.

479 Teachers Registration Board, Professional Boundaries: Guidelines for Tasmanian Teachers (2021) 9. Teachers must also abide by the Code of Professional Ethics, which is a statement about 'the ethical commitments, practices and aspirations that underpins the identity of the teaching profession in Tasmania'. Refer to Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 9 [6.3].

480 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 9 [6.2].

481 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 18.

482 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 3 (definition of 'prescribed offence').

483 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 27A(3)–(4).

484 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 19.

485 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 19(3)(a)(i)–(ii). Section 19(2) of the Teachers Registration Act 2000 requires complaints to be in writing and disclose the name and address of the complainant.

486 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 6A(d).

487 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 21 [13.2].

488 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 21 [13.4].

489 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 8 [5.13].

490 Teachers Registration Act 2000 ss 20(1)(a), 20(1)(c), 31.

491 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 24. This also applies in respect of a Limited Authority to Teach.

492 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 17BA(2)–(3).

493 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 24B.

494 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 17 [10.23].

495 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 17 [10.23].

496 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 24B(2)(b).

497 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 26A; Teachers Registration Regulations 2021 reg 5(1).

498 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 17(a).

499 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 18 [11.5].

500 Teachers Registration Board, Annual Report 2020 (Report, 2021) 43.

501 Watched Registrations contains a person's Teachers Registration Board number, their registration type, the expiry date of their registration and the cycle expiry date (end of five-year cycle registration). Refer to Teachers Registration Board, Watched Registrations (Web Page) <https://www.trb.tas.gov.au/watched-registrations>.

502 Teachers Registration Board, Watched Registrations (Web Page) <https://www.trb.tas.gov.au/watched-registrations>.

503 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 3 [3.4].

504 Statement of Jenny Gale, 23 November 2022, Annexure 3 (Keeping Children Safer – Implementation Status Report – as at 16 November 2022, Ref 18); refer to Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Keeping Children Safer Implementation Status Report', Keeping Children Safer (Policy Document, 31 May 2023) 5, Action 18 <https://www.dpac.tas.gov.au/keepingchildrensafer>.

505 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 248.

506 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 248. Refer also to vol 8, 283.

507 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 8, 292.

508 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 8, 30.

509 Refer to Teachers Registration Board, 'Teacher Search', TRB Online (Web Page) <https://trbonline.trb.tas.gov.au/Home/Search>. Information provided includes registration number, name, type of registration and date until which the person is registered.

510 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 25(4)(a).

511 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 32A.

512 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 13 [9.10].

513 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 17L.

514 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 13 [9.10].

515 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 13 [9.23].

516 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 13 [9.25].

517 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 13 [9.25].

518 Statement of Ann Moxham, 10 June 2022, 2 [2][A].

519 Statement of Ann Moxham, 10 June 2022, 2 [2][A]. Note that under the Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 12(3), the Board can request information relating to an applicant from any registration authority or any other person or government department. However, this only applies in respect of an application for registration and the applicant must authorise the Board to obtain the information.

520 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 995 [11–15].

521 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 995 [14–24].

522 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 995 [16–20]. Note that this would be subject to any other applicable exceptions to the application of the Act's principles as set out in sch 1 cl 2 of the Personal Information Protection Act 2004: sch 1 cl 2(1)(b).

523 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 995 [1–7], 1011 [35–36].

524 Statement of Emily Sanders, 5 May 2022, 22 [91].

525 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 998 [5–16].

526 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 997 [39–44].

527 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1081 [3–4].

528 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 3–4 [10].

529 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1091 [20–24].

530 Refer to Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1091 [9–12]; Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 3941 [37–44].

531 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1083 [34–42].

532 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1081 [39–44].

533 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 14.

534 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 14.

535 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 12 [9.16].

536 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1084 [10–14].

537 Transcript of Jenny Gale, 13 September 2022, 4021 [9–22].

538 Statement of Emily Sanders, 5 May 2022, 11 [46].

539 Statement of Emily Sanders, 5 May 2022, 11 [48].

540 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 32A(1).

541 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 32A(2).

542 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 17 [65].

543 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 'Brad', 4 April 2022, 17 [66].

544 It should also be noted that the Personal Information Act 2004 is also currently a barrier to keeping complainants informed about their complaints.

545 Transcript of Jenny Gale, 13 September 2022, 4022 [34–36].

546 Transcript of Jenny Gale, 13 September 2022, 4021 [17–21].

547 Personal Information Protection Act 2004 s 13.

548 Personal Information Protection Act 2004 s 14(1)(a).

549 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 September 2022, 3941 [12–15].

550 Refer to Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 52A.

551 Personal Information Protection Act 2004 s 4.

552 Personal Information Protection Act 2004 sch 1 cl 2(1)(f).

553 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 2 [6]. The notification is made by Workplace Relations. Refer to Department for Education, Children and Young People, Advice for DoE Staff – Responding to Incidents, Disclosures and Suspicions of Child Sexual Abuse (2022) 1.

554 Statement of Timothy Bullard, 6 June 2022, 2 [7].

555 Child and Youth Safe Organisation Act 2023 s 42.

556 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 3 [3.2]; Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1008 [12–20].

557 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1008 [11–21].

558 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1008 [14–20].

559 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1008 [22–26].

560 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 3 [3.6].

561 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1008 [8–11].

562 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 249.

563 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 13, 249.

564 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 8 [5.15]–9 [5.21].

565 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 11(1). A penalty unit is the base amount from which a monetary penalty is calculated. The base amount is adjusted each year according to movements in the consumer price index (for Hobart) in the previous year and notice of the amount is published in the Gazette: refer to Penalty Units and Other Penalties Act 1987. The penalty unit amount for 1 July 2022 to 30 June 2023 is $181.

566 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 27(1).

567 ACT Teacher Quality Institute Act 2010 (ACT) ss 28–29; Teacher Accreditation Act 2004 (NSW) s 28; Teacher Registration (Northern Territory) Act 2004 (NT) s 73; Education (Queensland College of Teachers) Act 2005 (Qld) ss 82–83; Teachers Registration and Standards Act 2004 (SA) s 20; Education and Training Reform Act 2006 (Vic) ss 2.6.56–2.6.56B; Teacher Registration Act 2012 (WA) ss 6–7.

568 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1012 [30–31].

569 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 13 [9.25]; Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 18. Section 3 of the Teachers Registration Act 2000 defines prescribed offences as offences for which a sentence of imprisonment may be imposed.

570 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1011 [44]–1012 [6].

571 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1008 [14–21].

572 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 8 [5.13]; refer to Teachers Registration Act 2000 ss 6A(e), 6A(l).

573 Statement of Ann Moxham, 10 June 2022, 3.

574 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1012 [19–29].

575 Australian Law Reform Commission, Principled Regulation: Federal Civil and Administrative Penalties in Australia (Report No 95, March 2003) 445.

576 Refer generally to Monetary Penalties Enforcement Act 2005. There are over 70 Tasmanian Acts that allow for infringement notices to be issued.

577 Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Act 2013 s 55(2).

578 Infringement notices are governed by the Monetary Penalties Enforcement Act 2005.

579 Teacher Registration (Northern Territory) Act 2004 (NT) s 73(1)–(2).

580 ACT Teacher Quality Institute Act 2010 (ACT) s 28.

581 Government of Tasmania, Director of Public Prosecutions, Prosecution Policy and Guidelines (2022) 121.

582 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 24B.

583 Teachers Registration Board, Annual Report 2020 (Report, 2021) 45.

584 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 22 [21.2].

585 Education (Queensland College of Teachers) Act 2005 (Qld) ss 48 and 49. 'Harm' is defined in s 7.

586 Refer to Victorian Institute of Teaching, Immediate Action (Web Page, 2021) <https://www.vit.vic.edu.au/conduct/immediate-action>.

587 Statement of Ann Moxham, 14 June 2022, 3 [2(C)].

588 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1004 [23–30]. Commonwealth legislation adopted in 1992 sets out the scheme (refer to Mutual Recognition Act 1992 (Cth)). All states and territories have implemented the scheme in their respective jurisdictions – for example, Mutual Recognition (Tasmania) Act 1993; Mutual Recognition (New South Wales) Act 1992 (NSW); Mutual Recognition (Victoria) Act 1998 (Vic); Mutual Recognition (Queensland) Act 1992 (Qld); Mutual Recognition (South Australia) Act 1993 (SA); Mutual Recognition (Western Australia) Act 2020 (WA); Mutual Recognition (Australian Capital Territory) Act 1992 (ACT); Mutual Recognition (Northern Territory) Act 1992 (NT). A similar scheme exists with New Zealand: refer to Trans-Tasman Mutual Recognition Act 1997 (Cth).

589 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1004 [23–30]; Teachers Registration Board, Mutual Recognition Policy (9 March 2022) 3.

590 Teachers Registration Board, Mutual Recognition Policy (9 March 2022) 2.

591 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 17 [10.28].

592 Teachers Registration Act 2000 s 32A.

593 Department of Treasury and Finance, 'Automatic mutual recognition for occupational licences', Economy (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.treasury.tas.gov.au/economy/economic-policy-and-reform/automatic-mutual-recognition>.

594 Refer to, for example, Department of Treasury and Finance, 'Automatic Mutual Recognition for Occupational Licences', Economy (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.treasury.tas.gov.au/economy/economic-policy-and-reform/automatic-mutual-recognition>; refer generally to Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet, Improving Occupational Mobility (Web Page) <https://deregulation.pmc.gov.au/priorities/improving-occupational-mobility>.

595 Stephen Smallbone and Tim McCormack, Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, 7 June 2021) 11.

596 Statement of Ann Moxham, 14 June 2022, 5; Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 977 [14–34].

597 Statement of Ann Moxham, 14 June 2022, 5.

598 Statement of Ann Moxham, 14 June 2022, 5.

599 Mutual Recognition Act 1992 (Cth) s 42S.

600 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1013 [9–18]. Mandatory reporting requirements are set out in the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997.

601 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1013 [9–18].

602 Alexander Morris Carr-Saunders and Paul Alexander Wilson, The Professions (Frank Cass & Co., 1964).

603 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 7 [5.6].

604 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1006 [32–37].

605 Statement of Ann Moxham, 27 April 2022, 8 [5.18].

606 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 999 [14–43].

607 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1007 [22–37].

608 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1007 [20–29].

609 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1007 [22–37].

610 Transcript of Ann Moxham, 12 May 2022, 1007 [37–40].

611 Statement of Ann Moxham, 10 June 2022, 4 [2(G)].

612 Statement of Ann Moxham, 10 June 2022, 5.

613 Statement of Ann Moxham, 10 June 2022, 4 [2(G)].

614 Education Legislation Amendments (Education Regulation) Act 2022 s 13.

615 Clause Notes, Education Legislation Amendments (Education Regulation) Bill 2021, cl 150, s 10C.

616 Refer to Review of Education Regulation Steering Committee, Review of Education Regulation – Steering Committee Report (Report, December 2020) 42, Recommendation 18.

617 Teachers Registration Board, Education Regulation Review – Draft Legislation: Response from the Board of the TRB, its Registrar and Staff (Web Page, undated) 10 <https://publicdocumentcentre.education.tas.gov.au/library/Shared Documents/Submission-7-Teachers-Registration-Board.pdf>.

618 Statement of Ann Moxham, 10 June 2022, 11 [13].

619 Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 13 May 2022, 1091 [26–43].

620 Tasmania, Parliamentary Debates, House of Assembly, 14 November 2000, 40 (Paula Wriedt, Minister for Education).

621 Review of Education Regulation Steering Committee, Review of Education Regulation – Steering Committee Report (Report, December 2020) 48, Recommendation 24.

Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings

Who was looking after me? Prioritising the safety of Tasmanian children

Volume 4: Children in out of home care

August 2023

Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings Report

Volume 4
Children in out of home care

The Honourable Marcia Neave AO
President and Commissioner

Professor Leah Bromfield
Commissioner

The Honourable Robert Benjamin AM SC
Commissioner

August 2023

Volume 4: Children in out of home care
978-0-6457694-4-9
Published August 2023

Suggested citation:
Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Report, August 2023).

Contents

CHAPTER 9

The way forward: Children in out of home care

Introduction to Volume 4

This volume considers the care of children who the Tasmanian Government have removed from their families of origin and placed in out of home care since 2000. This is in line with the Order establishing our Commission of Inquiry. Where we refer to children who were in care before 2000, their experiences are relevant to informing the present system.

Out of home care is provided when children cannot live with their families because of safety concerns. In most cases, these children are placed with kinship or foster carers. Placements in residential care settings are far less common.

The Government is obligated to protect children in out of home care from abuse, including sexual abuse. This is enshrined in the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ('Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act'). When a child is taken into care, the Secretary for the relevant department (currently the Department for Education, Children and Young People) applies to the Magistrates Court for guardianship and/or custody to be assigned to someone who is not the child's parent—either the Secretary of the Department or a third party—for the period of the order.[1] In exercising functions and powers under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, the Secretary and their delegated officers must give 'paramount consideration' to the 'best interests of the child'. The State is obligated to protect these children from further harm, as well as provide them with opportunities to heal and support them to flourish.[2]

Unlike other groups of children receiving support from the Government, those in care live within the system and rely on government or government funded services and workers for their welfare. Children in care do not always have an advocate external to the Government (a role normally assumed by parents) who can supervise, support and protect them. Therefore, there is a heavy burden of responsibility on a statutory authority that has used the powers of the State to legally remove a child from their family of origin. Any failure to protect children from abuse in care is a significant betrayal of the trust conferred upon the State by such powers.

Children in care often, if not inevitably, have unresolved trauma from experiences of abuse or neglect that gave rise to them being taken into care. Tragically, children in care are much more likely to experience further maltreatment and exploitation, including sexual abuse, than children who are not in out of home care, and they find it more difficult to talk about their abuse and to get support for their healing and growth.

The Government has been alerted to the risk of sexual abuse for children in care several times through the findings of previous reviews of the Tasmanian statutory child protection and out of home care systems. The National Royal Commission also examined this. Throughout this volume we consider the progress that the Department for Education, Children and Young People has made towards implementing the recommendations from these reports that relate to improving the safety of children in care from sexual abuse.

A note on language

Unless otherwise stated, references to ‘the Department’ in this volume are to the Tasmanian government department responsible for out of home care. During the period under examination by our Commission of Inquiry (that is, responses to reports of child sexual abuse since 1 January 2000), this Department has been called the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Communities (also referred to as Communities Tasmania) and the Department for Education, Children and Young People. In October 2022, departmental responsibility for out of home care transitioned from the Department of Communities to the newly formed Department for Education, Children and Young People. When we specifically refer to the previous Department of Communities or the new Department for Education, Children and Young People, we use the full name.

As described in the glossary, the terms ‘the Child Safety Service’ or 'Child Safety Services' are used generically across our report to describe the child protection functions of the Department, including its Strong Families, Safe Kids, Advice and Referral Line.

As well as assessing and investigating notifications about children in the community, the Child Safety Service (and specifically Child Safety Officers) perform case management functions for children in out of home care.

The Child Safety Service, including out of home care services and the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, are positioned within a Directorate, which has been variously named ‘Child and Youth Services’, ‘Children and Family Services’ and, currently, ‘Services for Children and Families’. We generally refer to the variously named Directorates as Services for Children and Families.

Our Inquiry into out of home care, laid out in this volume, has shown there is much more to be done. It has concluded that Tasmania’s out of home care system lacks many of the safeguards that help protect children from sexual abuse. We heard that few mechanisms are in place to engage Aboriginal communities in decision making about their children; there are no consistently applied standards for out of home care providers; professional development and other support for staff and carers is inconsistent; and monitoring and oversight of the system, internally and externally, is inadequate. Each of these problems, alone and together, increases the risk of child sexual abuse for children in care.

We also heard that the structures and processes to respond to reports of suspected child sexual abuse (as well as other abuses of children in care)—such as the care concern process and Serious Events Review Team—have been in transition, without a clear replacement. This means there has been no guarantee that the response to child sexual abuse has been consistent or appropriate. This failure of the State is deeply concerning and must be addressed as a matter of urgency.

We have concluded that problems in protecting children from, and responding to, child sexual abuse in out of home care partly stem from a lack of strategic, expert and active executive leadership. Fundamentally, however, these failings are the result of consecutive governments' chronic underfunding of, and failure to prioritise, out of home care and the statutory child protection system more generally

When approaching the issue of child sexual abuse in out of home care, we faced a dilemma: how to shine a light on an important issue for the safety of Tasmanian children in out of home care at the same time as acknowledging the challenging environment of child protection and the difficulties dedicated child protection workers face in any jurisdiction.

Soon after our hearings on out of home care in June 2022, a series of media articles highlighted problems in statutory child protection in every Australian jurisdiction.[3] Tasmania is not alone in facing the challenge of safeguarding children in care. However, the magnitude of the challenge should not deter those involved from continuing to try to improve the systems charged with protecting Tasmania's most vulnerable children, who have the right to be shielded from harm and given every opportunity to grow and thrive.

As former Child Safety Service staff told us, not only are many of the children who have been taken into care traumatised by their experiences of abuse and neglect, so too can the staff tasked with protecting them. We acknowledge that in scrutinising a traumatised system, people in that system may perceive our Inquiry as threatening.

We were reluctant to add to the stress that overburdened staff already feel. We consider most staff in the system are working to the best of their ability under difficult conditions and are often underappreciated. We acknowledge the skill and dedication required to work in child protection. To do their jobs well, Child Safety Service staff need to be enormously resourceful, particularly those on the 'frontline'. As a former Department employee noted in her statement:

> Many children and young people heal and thrive, due in no small part to their own extraordinary resilience and determination, and the commitment of those who care for them. This includes staff working in [the Child Safety Service], our service providers, our foster and kinship carers, and those supporting the [out of home care] system.[4]

We consider there should be greater accountability for Tasmania's out of home care system. Increased accountability for Government would motivate it to prioritise and assign the necessary resources to ensure the system works for the benefit of children in care. Increased accountability for executive staff would help to establish priorities, maintain the necessary structures and processes, and provide the leadership required to enable the out of home care system to operate safely for children in care.

We are also conscious that, because of our Inquiry, there will be families of children in care who become concerned about whether their children have been sexually abused. Family members may reasonably ask questions of the Child Safety Officer who is responsible for their child in care. We hope they will receive honest and transparent answers to their questions and be reassured that any known risks have been addressed.

While the scrutiny brought by our Inquiry may be unwelcome for some, there are many others who have bravely come forward because they believe, as we do, that the most vulnerable children in Tasmania—those who experience hurt, damage and shame, and are often forgotten—deserve the best possible protection from abuse, or further victimisation, when in out of home care. We have strived to be direct and honest in our assessment of the current system and of what needs to occur in future

This volume has three chapters. In Chapter 7, we cover the background and context for our Inquiry, describing Tasmania's out of home care system, discussing the risk factors and sources of risk for the sexual abuse of children in out of home care. We summarise the numerous reviews of the out of home care and child protection systems in Tasmania.

In Chapter 8, we outline our approach to inquiring into the out of home care system in Tasmania, including the scope of our Inquiry, the evidence we drew on and the picture we formed of the scale and nature of child sexual abuse in the system.

In Chapter 9, we analyse the systemic problems of out of home care in Tasmania that expose children to greater risk of sexual abuse. We make recommendations to change the system to measurably improve the safety and wellbeing of children in care.

7 Background and context: Children in out of home care

1 Introduction

In this chapter, we lay the foundation for our later analysis by understanding the Tasmanian out of home care system as it currently functions.

In Section 2, we describe the current arrangements for out of home care provision in Tasmania. We outline the legislative basis for the State removing a child into out of home care and the responsibilities of the statutory guardian of children in care—the Secretary of the Department. We detail the number of children in the various types of out of home care provided in Tasmania. Last, we describe the Department's organisational structure in relation to out of home care.

In Section 3, we briefly outline the risks and protective factors for sexual abuse of children in care identified by the National Royal Commission. Sources of risk include adults in the out of home care system, other children with whom children have contact while in care, and adults from outside the system who sexually exploit children in care. We identify the increased risk that some children face by virtue of their Aboriginality or disability.

Section 4 summarises the findings of the National Royal Commission, as well as those of the many reviews and reports into the out of home care and child protection systems in Tasmania that have been published since the early 2000s. We briefly consider the large number of recommendations that were made by these reviews but were too often not actioned.

2 Tasmania's out of home care system

In this section, we have attempted to describe the out of home care system in Tasmania. This was not an easy task. Our understanding of the system was derived from multiple sources and we have highlighted any contradictory information.

2.1 Defining 'out of home care'

The Department defines out of home care as:

> ... the system that provides formal care to children and young people who are assessed as unable to live safely at home. Where the Child Safety Service assesses that a child or young person is at risk in their home, they will seek a court application for the short or longer term care for those children and young people and an out of home care arrangement will be made for their day to day care. The Secretary of the Department of Communities Tasmania then becomes responsible for the care and protection of those children and young people.[5]

The Department's definition is broadly consistent with the nationally agreed definition of out of home care, namely: 'overnight care for children aged under 18 who are unable to live with their families due to child safety concerns', including 'placements approved by the relevant department for which there is ongoing case management and financial payment'.[6] Since 2018, for data collection purposes, the nationally agreed definition of out of home care has not formally included children on third-party guardianship orders. However, we consider that the Department still owes these children protection from abuse in care because the Department is the entity that statutorily intervened to remove the child from their family of origin and assigned guardianship or custody to a third party.[7] We explore this issue in more detail in Chapter 9.

In recent decades, Tasmania has followed other Australian jurisdictions in changing the way out of home care is provided. The out of home care model has moved from primarily housing children in large institutions to placing children in home-based settings with kinship or foster carers. Some children are still cared for in residential care settings, but these usually aim to be home-like and are small in scale.[8] Decreasing numbers of carers and increasing numbers of children in care have created, by necessity, new care types such as 'emergency care', which has paid rotational carers looking after children in temporary accommodation such as hotel rooms.[9] Different categories of out of home care are discussed in more detail in Section 2.5.

In Tasmania, the out of home care system primarily comprises the Department and non-government services that provide support to children on the Department's behalf. A range of government and non-government agencies also support 'the system'. These agencies are responsible for meeting the broad needs of children (including health, education and disability) and should play a part in protecting children.[10]

In this chapter, a reference to a child who is 'in out of home care', 'in care' or 'in the care of the Department' means a child who has been placed under the guardianship or custody of the Secretary—this includes children under a third-party guardianship order (their guardian is not the Secretary) following statutory removal by the Department, as the State retains obligations to protect such children.

2.2 A child's pathway through the system

2.2.1 Entering care

The Department typically becomes aware of a child who is at risk of abuse or neglect when someone who is concerned about the child contacts the Department's Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line ('Advice and Referral Line'). If staff on the Advice and Referral Line believe there is sufficient concern to warrant an assessment, they refer the matter to the Child Safety Service, whereupon a Child Safety Officer assesses the situation.[11]

If the assessment determines that the child needs care and protection, the Secretary can apply to the Magistrates Court (Children's Division) for a care and protection order for the child.[12] If the Court is satisfied that the child is at risk and that a care and protection order is necessary, it may make an order placing the child under the guardianship of the Secretary (among other possible orders).[13] Placing a child under the guardianship of the Secretary is a last resort, when a child cannot be properly protected from risk by any other means, and no other order would be in the child's best interests.[14] A child may be placed in care for a short time (for example, six months) or for a long time—sometimes until the child turns 18 years old.

Once a child has been placed under the Secretary's guardianship, the Secretary is responsible for deciding where the child should live, making arrangements for the child's education and medical treatment, and making any other arrangements for the child's care (these responsibilities are discussed in Chapter 9).[15] Increasingly, child protection departments across Australia are recognising that their obligations to support and care for children in care do not end when the child turns 18, with several states announcing extensions of support to the age of 21.[16]

When a Child Safety Officer collects the child to take them into care, they need to find somewhere for the child to stay until a longer-term arrangement can be made. Sometimes the Child Safety Officer can place the child with a family member (kinship care), but often the Child Safety Officer needs to find a temporary non-familial 'placement'. Respite carers or foster carers might look after the child until a decision is made about where the child should ultimately live.

The Child Safety Officer will try to find a foster family that is suitable for the child in the longer term. Often children will live with several foster carers throughout their time in care. For some children, their time in care is short-lived, but others 'grow up in care', living with carers or workers for more than a decade. Where possible, the number of placements is kept to a minimum, but many children live in multiple homes or settings, which can be unsettling and reinforce their sense of instability and rejection.

Some children cannot be placed with a foster family and are therefore placed in 'residential care', which is usually a house where the child lives on their own or with other children, under the supervision of youth workers or other paid carers. Although considered an option of 'last resort', many children are placed in residential care due to a lack of available foster or kinship carers, particularly a lack of carers who can meet the needs of children who are older, children with behavioural and mental health issues or those with disability. For some, residential care is the best placement option, but for many, residential care can be marked by an ongoing sense of a lack of safety and can lead to poorer outcomes.

The Department funds non-government organisations to provide some foster care and all residential care. The child's allocated Child Safety Officer supports the child on behalf of the Secretary, including by enrolling the child in school and ensuring they stay connected with their family of origin. Foster, kinship or paid residential carers provide the child with day-to-day physical, emotional and cultural support. Where a non-government service provider is contracted, it supports the carers to carry out their role.

At the time of writing, the Department had a team of Child Safety Officers who support the Department's own foster and kinship carers. These officers are separate to the Child Safety Officers who support children.

2.2.2 While in care

Children do best when they are surrounded by a network of supportive adults who understand and respond to their needs. While in care, it is the Department's policy that a child has a care team around them, coordinated by a Child Safety Officer.[17] This team should include important adults in the child's life—such as their carer, teacher, counsellor and paediatrician or doctor—and a representative from their cultural community (this is particularly important for Aboriginal children).[18]

The Department's policy is that the care team should meet regularly to develop and monitor the child's care plan. The plan should outline the child's needs and who is responsible for meeting those needs, and be updated to reflect the child's changing needs. Depending on the child's age, they may have a say in the plan through attending care team meetings.[19]

Members of the care team are jointly responsible for keeping the child safe from sexual abuse. They develop trusting relationships with the child, so if a child wants to disclose a concern about sexual abuse, they may feel comfortable to talk to a trusted adult in their care team. The Child Advocate can also help a child raise a concern or get help if they are not feeling heard. When a child (or anyone else) raises a safety concern or discloses abuse, the Department uses its 'care concern process' to investigate the matter (discussed in Chapter 9).

2.3 The Secretary's responsibilities as guardian

Under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, the Secretary is conferred 'the same rights, powers, duties, obligations and liabilities as a natural parent of the child' when assigned guardianship.[20] These duties include:

- deciding where the child will live, being mindful of securing a stable home[21]
- arranging education and medical care, and providing anything else that is necessary (including financial assistance)[22]
- providing for the physical, intellectual, psychological and emotional development of the child[23]
- reviewing the child's care and protection order to ensure it is still in the child's best interests.[24]

In carrying out the duties and responsibilities of a guardian, the Secretary must consider the best interests of the child to be paramount.[25] This is one of the objects of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, and the guiding principle that underpins all decisions the Department makes in relation to children.[26] The Secretary relies on a detailed instrument of delegation to exercise these duties and responsibilities through departmental staff.[27]

Section 10E of the Act sets out a range of matters that must be considered in determining the best interests of a child. These matters are directly relevant to reducing the risk of child sexual abuse for children in out of home care.

Section 10E of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act

1. In performing functions or exercising powers under this Act, the best interests of the child must be the paramount consideration.
2. Without limiting the matters that may be taken into account in determining the best interests of a child, the following matters are to be taken into account for that purpose:
    a. the need to protect the child from physical, psychological and other harm and from exploitation;

b. the views of the child, having regard to the maturity and understanding of the child;

c. the capacity and willingness of the child's parents or other family members to care for the child;

d. the nature of the child's relationships with his or her parents, other family members and other persons who are significant in the child's life, including siblings;

e. the child's need for stable and nurturing relationships with his or her parents, other family members, other persons who are significant in the child's life and the community;

f. the child's need for stability in living arrangements;

g. the child's physical, emotional, intellectual, spiritual, developmental and educational needs;

h. the attitude to the child, and to the responsibilities of parenthood, demonstrated by each of the child's guardians;

i. the need to provide opportunities for the child to achieve his or her full potential;

j. the child's age, maturity, sex, sexuality and cultural, ethnic and religious backgrounds;

k. any other special characteristics of the child;

l. the likely effect on the child of any changes in the child's circumstances;

m. the least intrusive intervention possible in all the circumstances;

n. the opportunities available for assisting the child to recover from any trauma experienced—

    i. in relation to being separated from his or her parents, family and community; or

    ii. as a result of abuse or neglect;

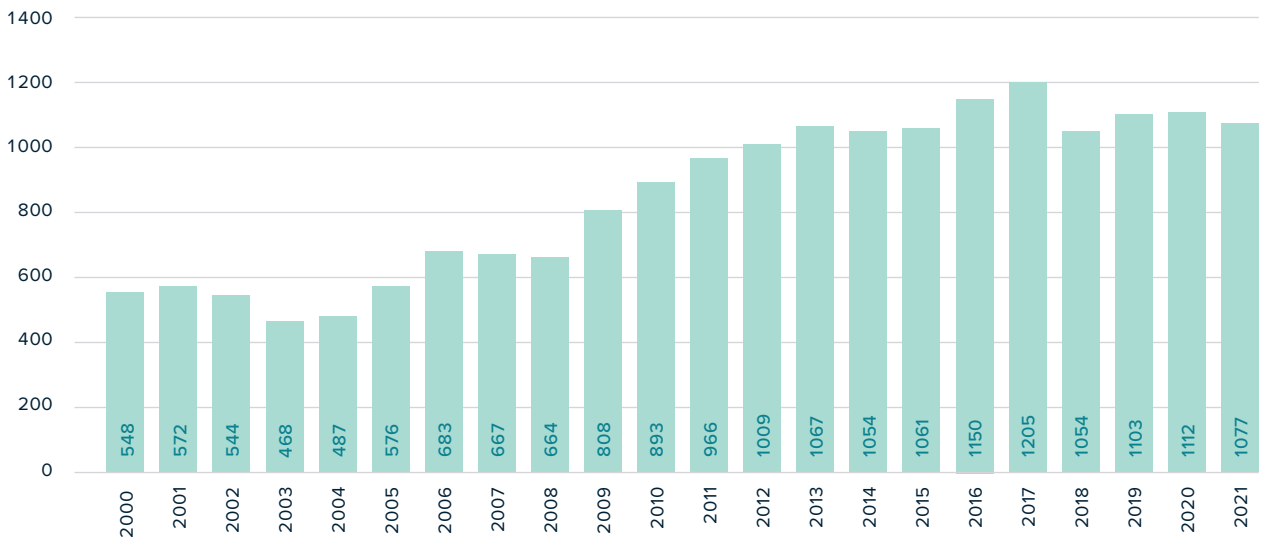
o. any persuasive reports of the child being harmed or at risk of harm and the cumulative effects of such harm or risk.

2.4 The number of children in care

The number of children in out of home care in Tasmania is reported monthly on the Department's website.[28] In April 2022, the website stated that 1,256 children were in out of home care in Tasmania; however, Michael Pervan, then Secretary, Department of Communities, reported that 1,034 children were in out of home care in the same period.[29] Secretary Pervan explained that the figures reported on the website include children on third-party guardianship orders.[30] For the sake of clarity, we will state whether data includes children on third-party guardianship orders where it is relevant to do so.

Since 2007, the number of children in out of home care in Tasmania in any given year has fluctuated, although the trend has been an increase (refer to Figure 7.1).

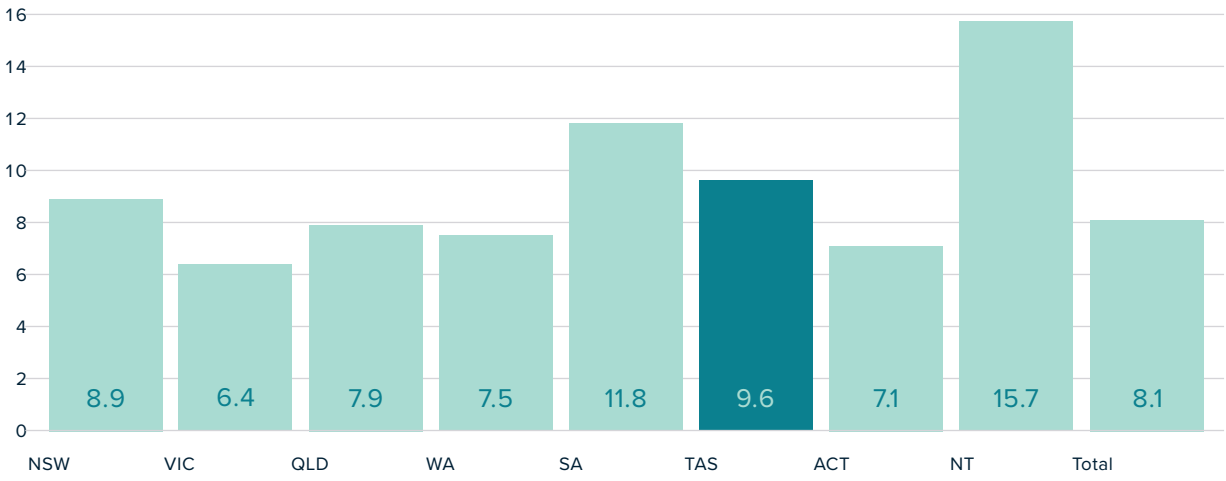
Figure 7.1: Number of children in out of home care in Tasmania, excluding third-party guardianship orders, from 30 June 2000 to 30 June 2021[31]



Source: Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child Protection Australia reports 2000–01 to 2020–21.

Given Tasmania's small population, it is also worth considering the relative number of children in care in Tasmania compared with other Australian jurisdictions. At 9.6 per 1,000 children in out of home care, Tasmania sits above the national average of 8.1 per 1,000 children (Figure 7.2).[32]

Figure 7.2: Rate of children per 1,000 in out of home care by state and territory[33]



Source: Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child Protection Australia 2020–21.

2.5 Types of out of home care

In her first Monitoring Report, covering 2018–19, Leanne McLean, Commissioner for Children and Young People, outlined the characteristics of the different forms of out of home care provided in Tasmania as follows:

> Foster care: A form of [out of home care] where the caregiver is authorised and provided a contribution for the cost of care by the state/territory for the care of the child. (This category excludes relatives/kin who are provided a contribution for the cost of care).
>
> Kinship care: A form of [out of home care] where the caregiver is either:
>
> - a relative (other than parents); or
> - considered to be a family member or a close friend; or > - a member of the child or young person's community (in accordance with their culture); and
> - who is provided a contribution for the cost of care by the state/territory for the care of the child.
>
> For Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children, a kinship carer may be another Indigenous person who is a member of their community or a compatible community or from the same language group.
>
> ...
>
> Residential care: Where the placement is in a residential building whose purpose is to provide placements for children where there are paid staff. It appears through monitoring activities that the term 'residential care' is used by [out of home care] providers to describe [out of home care] arrangements provided to children and young people by paid staff on a rostered 24/7 basis. Within this broad definition, arrangements of this sort ranged from a single child or young person living in a house with paid staff to two or more children and young people (who may or may not be related) living in a house with paid staff.

Respite care: A form of [out of home care] used to provide short-term accommodation for children and young people, where the intention is for the child to return to their prior home. In family-based [out of home care], this may be planned and regular to give the child's usual carers, parents or guardians a break.

...

Third-party guardianship: Transfer of guardianship to a third party is where a person other than the Secretary may be granted guardianship for a child or young person under a care and protection order. Under such an order, the guardian has the same rights, power, duties, obligations and liabilities as a natural parent of the child or young person would have.[34]

The Department describes sibling group care as 'a placement option for groups of three or more connected children who cannot be placed together in foster or kinship care'.[35]

More recently, the Department has funded children in residential care under 'special care packages', which were intended to enable 'a specific child's extraordinary level of need for care to be matched to care options including therapeutic, medical, disability or similar support'.[36] We discuss concerns about the Department's Special Care Package funding in Chapter 9.

Commissioner McLean reported that some children have 'independent living' arrangements.[37] Such arrangements presumably involve older children in care living independently, either in private or supported rental accommodation.

Table 7.1 sets out the most recent figures for the number of children in out of home care in Tasmania by the form of care (or type of placement). The table does not include children on third-party guardianship orders. National figures are included for comparison. The data indicates that:

- Like other jurisdictions, most children in out of home care in Tasmania live in a home-based environment.
- Within home-based care types, Tasmania has a higher proportion of children in foster care than in kinship care arrangements.
- Tasmania has a slightly lower proportion of children in residential care environments.

Table 7.1: Children in out of home care in Tasmania by type of placement, 2020–21[38]

Type of placement	Number of Tasmanian children	Placement type, Tasmania (%)	Placement type, national (%)
Foster care	556	51.6	36.1
Relative/kinship care	449	41.7	53.7
Other home-based care	0	0.0	1.3
Total home-based care	1,005	93.3	91.1
Family group homes	0	0.0	0.3
Residential care	64	5.9	7.3
Independent living	Not published due to small numbers	Not published due to small numbers	0.5
Other/unknown	Not published due to small numbers	Not published due to small numbers	0.8
Total	1,077	100.0	100.0

Source: Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child protection Australia 2020–21.

2.6 Government and non-government providers

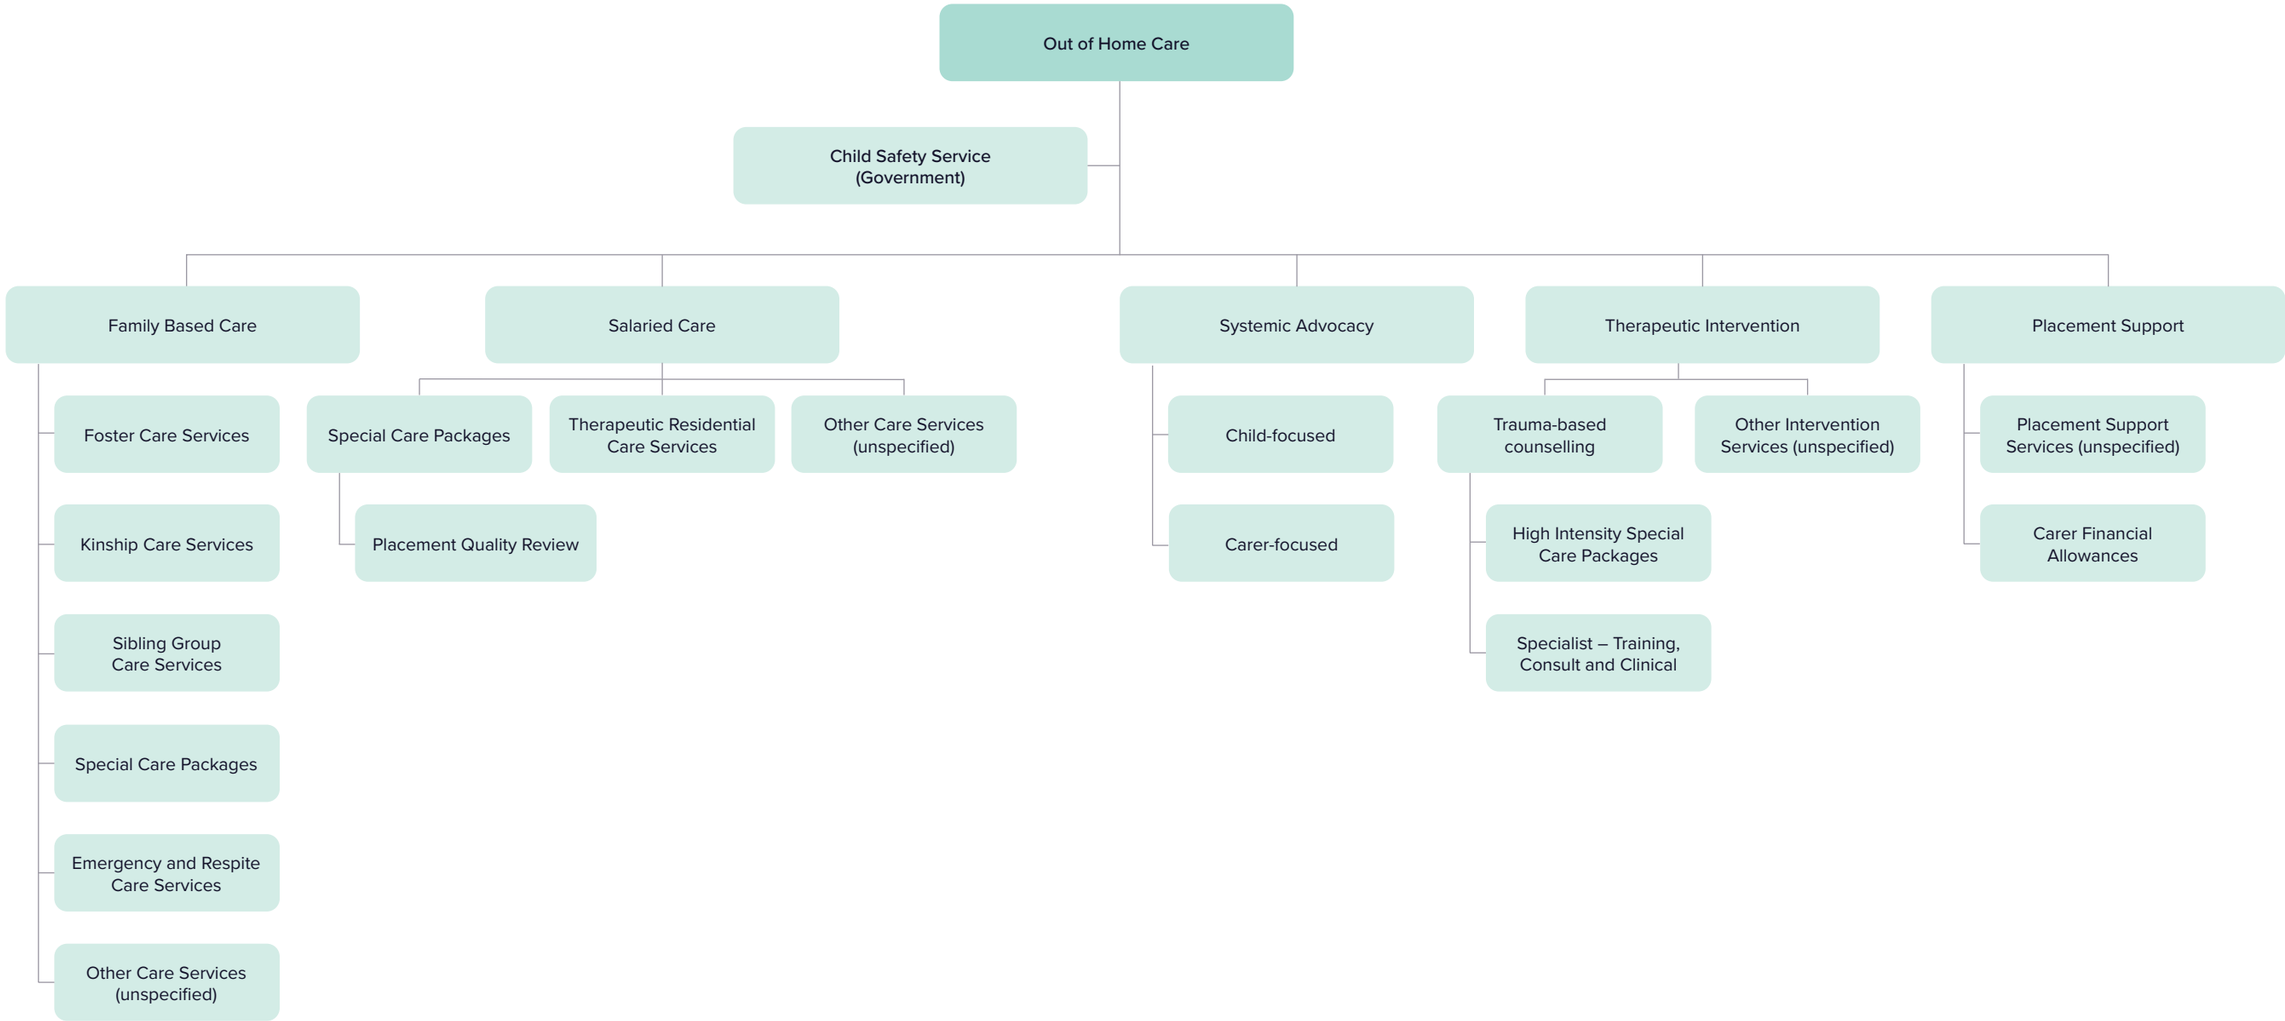
Out of home care in Tasmania is a 'hybrid system', where the Department directly provides some out of home care services and others are provided by Department funded non-government providers.[39]

The Department's out of home care 'service directory' maps the funded services available for children in out of home care under the categories of 'family-based care' (foster and kinship care) and 'salaried care' (residential care). Available funded support services are also independently listed in the directory.[40] This directory is reproduced at Figure 7.3.

Figure 7.3: Out of home care service directory provided by the Secretary[41]

On foldout →

Figure 7.3: Out of home care service directory provided by the Secretary[41]



Source: Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022.

We heard that the Department directly provides kinship care, foster care and respite care. It also supports children who are in independent living arrangements or on third-party guardianships.[42] The Department is the only facilitator of kinship care, but there are plans for a non-government organisation to share support for kinship care in the future.[43]

Of 968 children in family-based out of home care on 22 April 2022, the Department directly facilitated the care of 700 children (72 per cent), while the remaining 268 children (28 per cent) were living in foster care arrangements overseen and supported by non-government providers.[44] In 2020–21, 449 of the 1,005 children in departmental family-based care were living in kinship care.[45]

The non-government organisations the Department funded to provide out of home care services, or support for children in out of home care or their carers, in 2021–22 are listed in Table 7.2 (up to 22 April 2022). Several non-government providers—including Mosaic Support Services, Oak Tasmania and St Giles Society—are specialist disability support agencies.

Table 7.2: Non-government organisations the Department funded to provide out of home care services by type of service and number of children in the service, 1 July 2021 – 22 April 2022[46]

Organisation	Service provided	Number of children who received the service on 22 April 2022
Anglicare	Special care packages	1
Australian Childhood Foundation	Special care packages and Australian Childhood Foundation-only packages	Not reported
Australian Childhood Foundation	Therapeutic assessment and review	Not reported
Australian Childhood Foundation	Therapeutic services for children in out of home care	Not reported
Australian Childhood Foundation	Therapeutic operating model for the Many Colours One Direction program	Not reported
Baptcare	Family-based foster care	15
Caring Hearts	Special care packages	1
Catholic Care	Capability – salaried care	0
Catholic Care	A team for special care packages and Bringing Baby Home program	0
Catholic Care	Special care packages	5
Choice Supports Tasmania	Special care packages	1
CREATE Foundation Ltd	Advocacy (Connect, Empower and Change program)	Not reported
Devonfield	Special care packages	0
Eskleigh	Special care packages	2
Foster and Kinship Carers Association of Tasmania	Advocacy	Not reported

Organisation	Service provided	Number of children who received the service on 22 April 2022
Glenhaven Family Care Inc.	Emergency and respite care	3,000 (bed nights block-funded)
Glenhaven Family Care Inc.	A team for special care packages and Bringing Baby Home program	0
Glenhaven Family Care Inc.	Family-based foster care	21
Glenhaven Family Care Inc.	Special care packages	19
iCare	Special care packages	1
Inglis Support Services	Special care packages	1
Kennerley Children's Home Inc.	Emergency and respite care	2,158 (bed nights block-funded)
Kennerley Children's Home Inc.	Moving On Program (transition from care)	Not reported
Kennerley Children's Home Inc.	Family-based foster care	105
Key Assets	Sibling group care	59 (bed nights block-funded)
Life Without Barriers	Family-based foster care	66
Life Without Barriers	Special care packages	7
Langford	Special care packages	3
Many Colours One Direction (Northern Territory)	Special care packages	0
Mosaic Support Services	Special care packages	5
MSJ Aust	Special care packages	Not reported
Nexus	Special care packages	0
Oak Tasmania	Special care packages	0
St Giles Society	Special care packages	1

Source: Statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022.

The Foster and Kinship Carers Association of Tasmania advised us that Baptcare also provides statewide support for kinship carers.[47]

2.7 Number of foster and kinship carers

The Foster and Kinship Carers Association of Tasmania believes there are about 1,200 foster and kinship carers in Tasmania. Of these, the Department directly engaged about half, and non-government out of home care providers engaged the other half.[48]

According to the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, on 30 June 2021 there were 566 Tasmanian households that were officially caring for at least one child in out of home care as foster carers or kinship carers.[49] Table 7.3 lists the number of Tasmanian households, type of placement and number of children in each home. It shows that foster care households are more likely to have larger numbers of children in care living with them than kinship care households.

Table 7.3: Tasmanian carer households by number of children in the placement and type of placement, 2020–21[50]

Number of children in placement	Number of foster care households	Number of kinship care households
1	112 (41.6%)	196 (66.0%)
2	80 (29.7%)	68 (22.9%)
3+	77 (28.7%)	33 (11.1%)[51]
Total	269 (100%)	297 (100%)

Source: Derived from Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child Protection Australia 2020–21.

In addition to these figures, the Foster and Kinship Carers Association informed us of 'thousands' of informal kinship carers in Tasmania who are not included in official statistics and who do not have access to the same supports as formal carers.[52] While we acknowledge the incredible commitment of these informal kinship carers, their situations fall outside the scope of our Inquiry because the children they care for are not in 'institutional' care.

2.8 Department structure

In October 2022, the Department of Communities' child protection and out of home care functions transferred to the new Department for Education, Children and Young People.[53] In the new Department, the child protection and out of home care systems sit under an Executive Director who reports to a Deputy Secretary for Keeping Children Safe (refer to Appendix G for the organisational structure of the new Department). The Child Advocate, whose role is described in detail in Chapter 9, reports directly to the Secretary, as was the case in the Department of Communities. The current Secretary of the Department for Education, Children and Young People is Timothy Bullard.

Given that the Department of Communities was responsible for statutory child protection and out of home care for most of our Inquiry, it is also important to understand the structure of that Department, particularly the mechanisms that were in place to protect children from sexual abuse in out of home care and to respond when they had been harmed.[54]

Michael Pervan was the Secretary of the Department of Communities (and its predecessor, the Department of Health and Human Services), from May 2014 to October 2022, with a gap between July 2018 and September 2019, when Ginna Webster filled the role. Before this, between 2000 and May 2014, seven people held the position at different times.[55]

In the Department of Communities, the Children, Youth and Families division was one of four large service divisions that each sat under a Deputy Secretary. Within this division, an Executive Director headed Children and Family Services. The Child Advocate sat outside Children, Youth and Families and reported directly to the Secretary.

Secretary Pervan described Children and Family Services as follows:

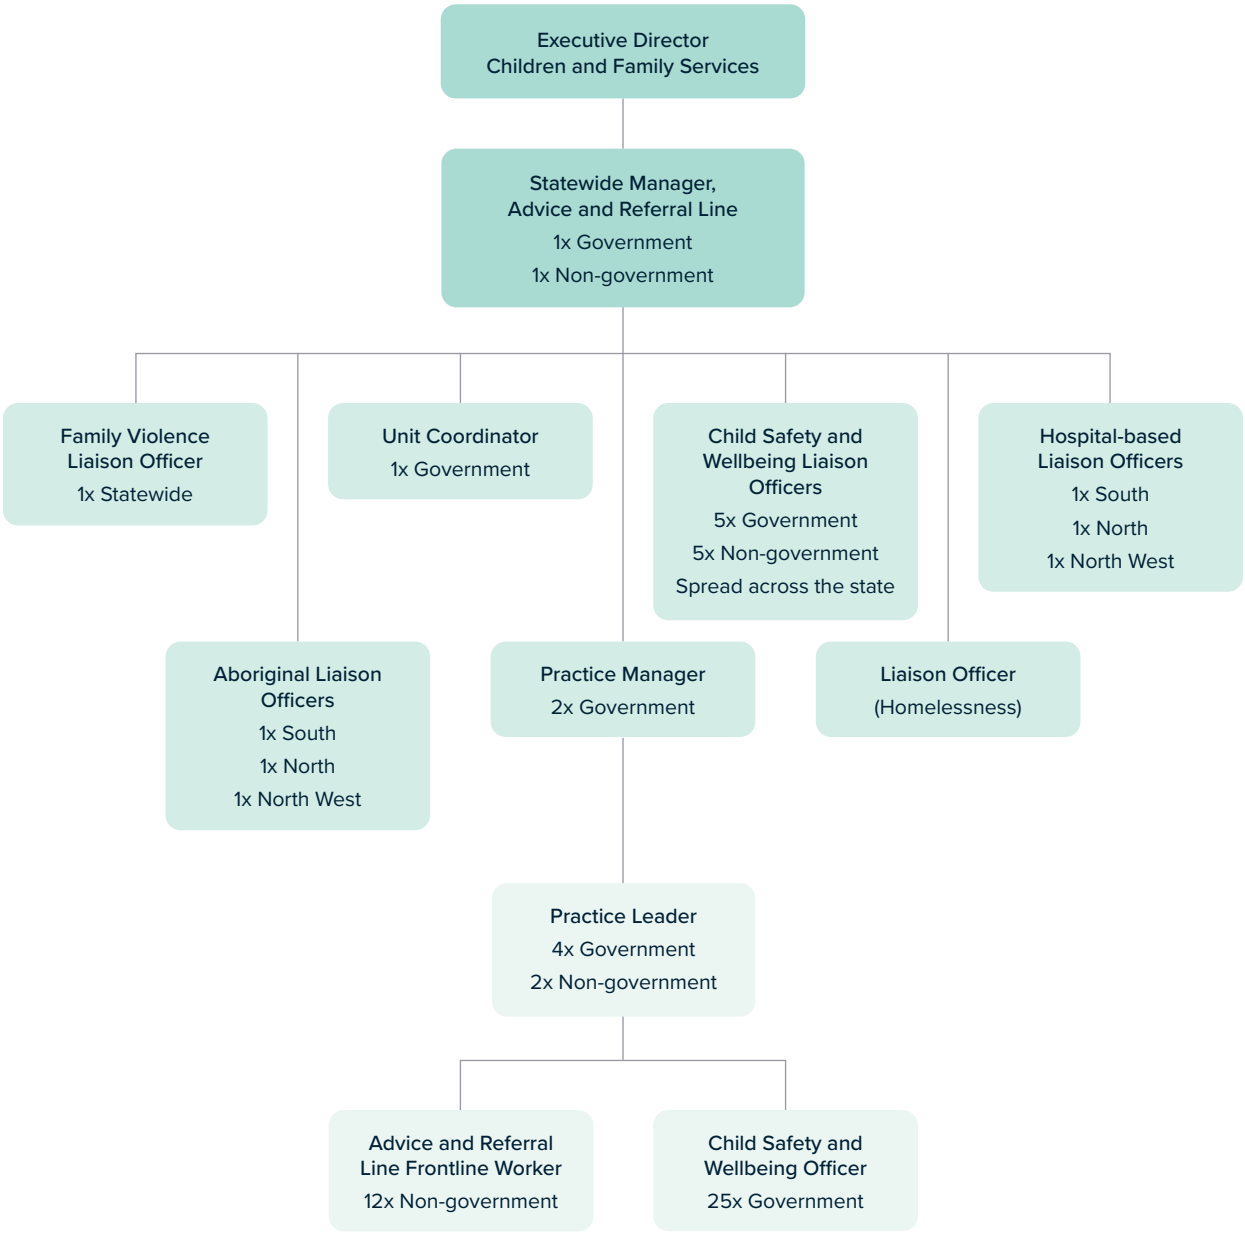
> Children and Family Services … includes the Strong Families Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, the Child Safety Service, Out of Home Care; Adoptions, Permanency and After Care Support, Intensive Family Engagement Services, and the Child Safety After-Hours Emergency Service, and is currently holding Community Youth Justice.[56]

We asked Secretary Pervan to describe the internal organisational structure of the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, the Child Safety Service and Out of Home Care services (which exist in the current and older organisational structures), and the ways in which these service components relate to one another on a day-to-day basis.[57] He indicated the following:

- The Advice and Referral Line receives concerns about the wellbeing of a child. A brief assessment decides if the concern requires advice and referral to support services, or referral to the Child Safety Service for support or investigation.[58]
- Child Safety Service staff are in regional offices and receive notifications of child abuse and neglect. Child Safety Officers provide case management for children who are being assessed for risk of harm or neglect, or who are already in out of home care.[59]
- Out of Home Care services recruit and assess prospective foster or kinship carers, provide support to carers, monitor compliance of foster carers with requirements, and facilitate placements for children with foster carers.[60]

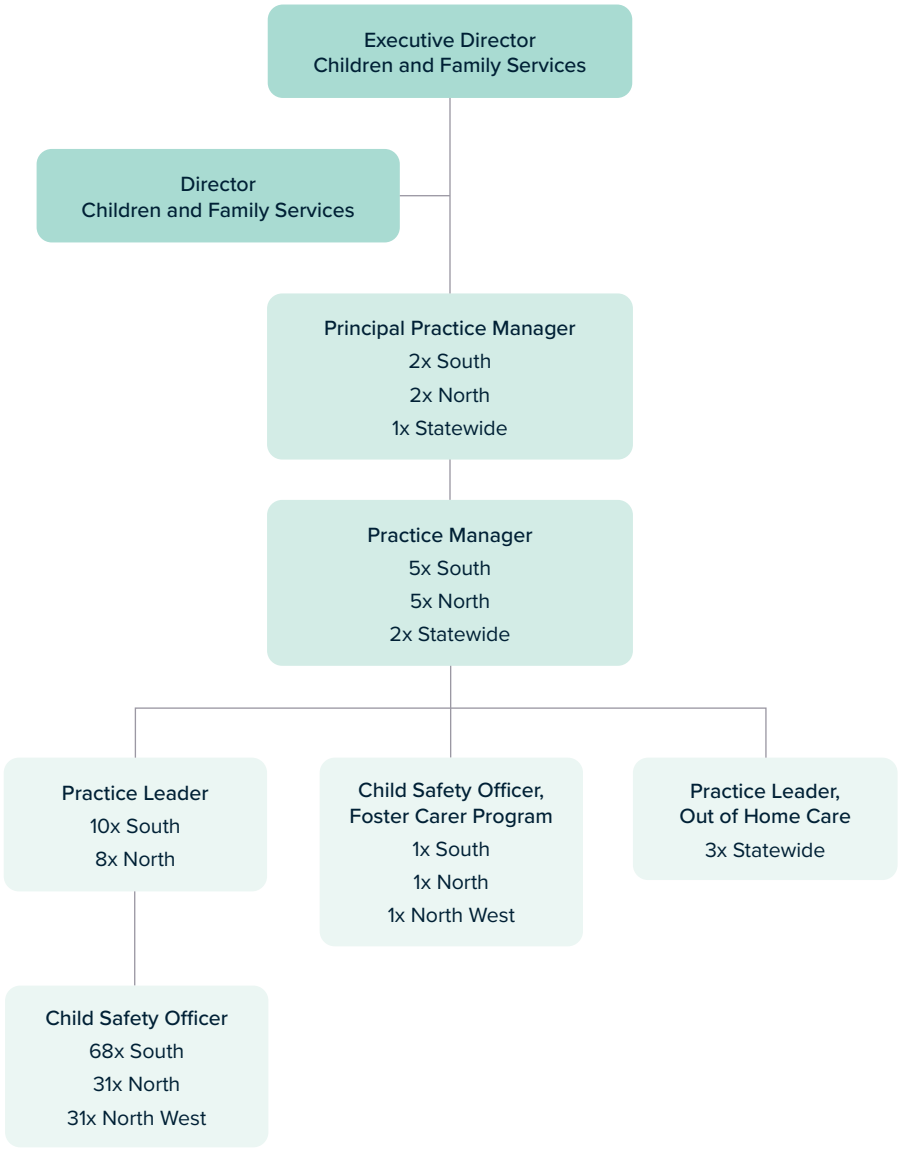
Secretary Pervan provided information on the reporting lines of staff on the Advice and Referral Line and in the Child Safety Service, as well as the full-time-equivalent staff allocation for each role (refer to Figure 7.4 and Figure 7.5). He advised us that the Child Safety Service receives more than $19.6 million in funding each year and employs 204.85 permanent full-time-equivalent staff.[61] Secretary Pervan also described the Out of Home Care services staffing complement and structure, which is shown at Figure 7.6. We understand these arrangements have been augmented in the new Department by additional funding for 10 new Child Safety Officer positions and 13 new administrative roles.[62] In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we have assumed this reflects the current internal organisation of the Advice and Referral Line and the Child Safety Service.

Figure 7.4: Staffing structure of the Advice and Referral Line[63]



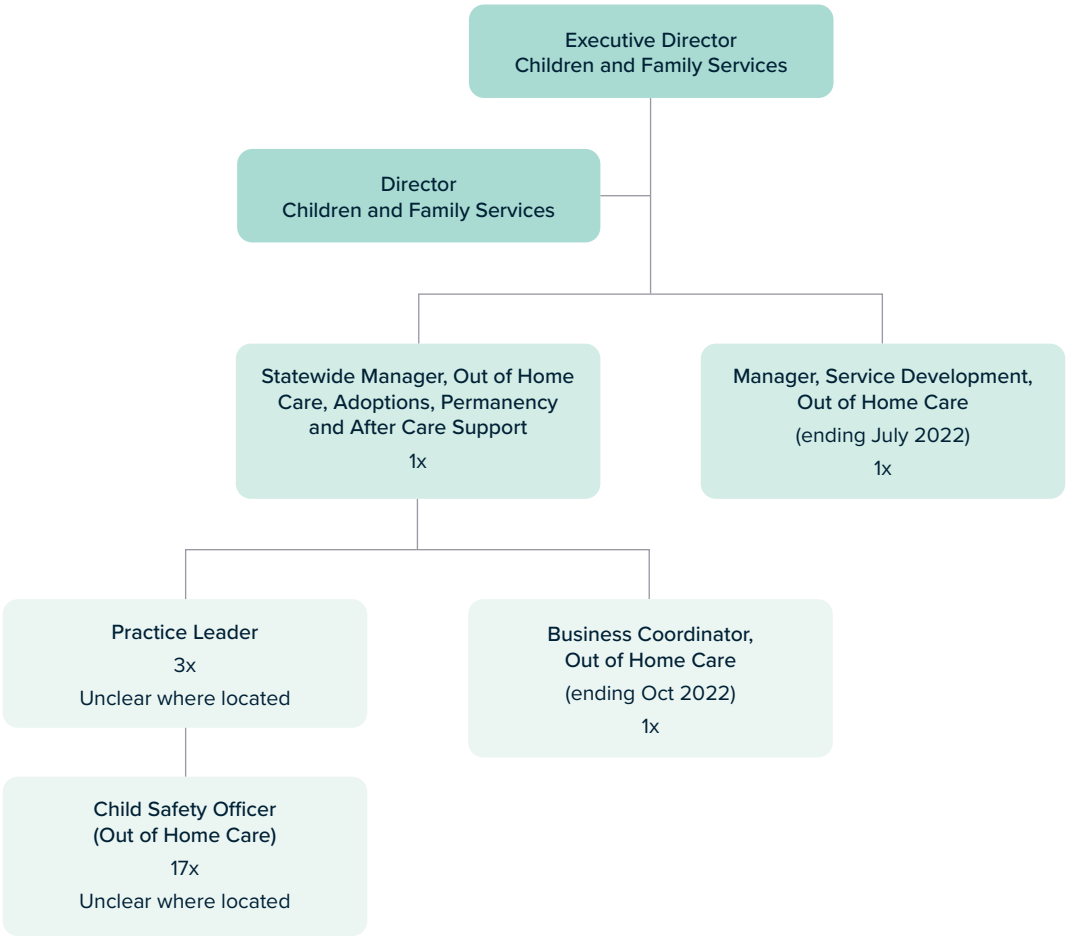
Source: Compiled from statement of Michel Pervan, 7 June 2022.

Figure 7.5: Staffing structure of Child Safety Services[64]



Source: Compiled from statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022.

Figure 7.6: Staffing structure of Out of Home Care services[65]



Source: Compiled from statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022.

When comparing the structure of the Out of Home Care services and the Child Safety Service, some information provided about some positions is unclear:

- the Practice Leader (Out of Home Care) positions appear in both structures but report to different managers
- the Child Safety Officer (Foster Carer Program) positions are in the Child Safety Service but would seem to sit more naturally in Out of Home Care services.

We heard that the Department's Out of Home Care team supports departmental carers, while the Child Safety Service provides case management for a child for the length of their contact with the Department, from their referral by the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line to their transition out of care.[66]

Claire Lovell, Executive Director, Children and Family Services, explained that the Out of Home Care teams work from three locations across the State (South, North and North West) and sit alongside the Child Safety Service teams, which provide assessment and case management for children in contact with the service or in out of home care.[67]

Ms Lovell told us that in June 2022 there were between 26 and 30 vacant positions across the Advice and Referral Line, Child Safety Service and Out of Home Care services.[68]

We heard that frontline practitioners may receive clinical supervision from senior practitioners who sit outside their direct line management; for example, staff in Out of Home Care services access clinical supervision from a Practice Manager (location unspecified) who has no line management responsibility for them.[69] Secretary Pervan also told us that an unspecified number of Clinical Practice Consultants and Educators were assigned to case management and out of home care teams in the Child Safety Service statewide to support clinical practice.[70] However, these roles were not included in the organisational charts or descriptions we received, so we have no other information about them.

Ms Lovell also told us that, in addition to the out of home care staffing contingent outlined above, the Manager of Strategic Commissioning, who sits outside the Children and Family Services portfolio, is responsible for engaging and contracting non-government organisations to provide out of home care services (among other commissioning activities for the Children, Youth and Families division).[71] She advised that this single role has limited capacity to oversee non-government organisations' compliance with contractual obligations.[72] Instead, oversight of contractual obligations is 'spread to different positions in different ways' between Child Safety Officers, reviews by the Australian Childhood Foundation and reports received from non-government agencies.[73] We discuss the need to improve commissioning in Chapter 9.

3 Child sexual abuse in care: risks and protective factors

The National Royal Commission heard horrific accounts of abuse in 'old-fashioned' care institutions. It also found that many children were still experiencing sexual abuse in contemporary out of home care:

> Despite reforms in every jurisdiction, there are weaknesses and systemic failures that continue to place children in care at risk of sexual abuse. Abuse by carers, family members, visitors and workers still occurs, and sexual exploitation, especially of children in residential care, is an emerging concern. Frequent placement changes, poor information sharing, gaps in training and supports, especially to kinship carers, still exist. Given the increasing number of children in care and the inherent vulnerability of children in care, such weaknesses need to be addressed.[74]

Despite the National Royal Commission having reported over five years ago, we heard that similar problems still exist in Tasmania. These problems are discussed throughout this chapter.

3.1 Factors that increase risk

As mentioned in Chapter 3, the National Royal Commission identified several factors that increase the risk of child sexual abuse.[75] Characteristics specific to the out of home care context that increase risk of child sexual abuse include:

- situational factors, such as aspects of the physical environment; the dislocation from culture that can occur when Aboriginal children are placed with non-Aboriginal families; a lack of culturally sensitive supports for children from culturally diverse backgrounds; and the absence of trusted adults created through disconnection from family and placement instability, including frequent placement moves[76]
- vulnerability factors, such as children lacking an understanding that particular behaviour is sexual abuse, prior maltreatment, being younger, having disability, or having a history of trauma or mental illness, which are disproportionately more likely in out of home care populations than the broader community[77]
- propensity factors, such as the risk of abusers targeting children in residential care settings for the purposes of child sexual exploitation[78]
- institutional factors, some of which are particularly associated with residential care, including:
    - placement of vulnerable children with other children or within families where they are at greater risk of harm (due to poor assessment, placement matching and monitoring)[79]
    - inadequate professional development and supervision of staff, lack of role clarity for staff and unclear expectations of relationships between staff and young people[80]
    - the absence of policies and procedures that protect children in care from sexual abuse, and an organisational culture that does not actively promote child welfare[81]
    - inconsistent data collection and reporting among service providers, making it difficult to monitor incidents and responses[82]
    - large caseloads that overwhelm child protection staff, reducing their ability to respond and their frequency of visits to children in care[83]
    - low remuneration, work stress and public criticism of child protection staff, making it difficult to attract and retain highly skilled staff.[84]

We identified that most of the institutional risk factors are present in Tasmania's statutory child protection system. In Chapter 9, we explore the policies and practices that the Department should adopt to reduce these and other risk factors as they relate to out of home care.

The National Royal Commission, Australian and international research has shown that children and young people in residential care are more likely to experience child sexual abuse, peer sexual victimisation and sexual exploitation than their peers in kinship and foster care (who are still at greater risk than those who do not live in care). This is often because children in residential care are more likely to have behavioural and mental health issues, have disabilities and be older than children in other placement types. They tend to lack a stable and secure relationship with a trusted adult and are also more likely to be placed with peers who engage in harmful sexual behaviours.[85]

3.2 Sources of risk

The main sources of risk for children in out of home care are the adults working in the statutory child protection system or other adults in their lives. Another source of risk is other children in the out of home care system.

3.2.1 Adults working in the child protection system

We recognise that most adults in the out of home care system are hard-working and committed people who are trying to provide children with the supports they need. Despite these positive contributions, the nature of out of home care—whereby foster carers and their family members, Child Safety Officers and staff from non-government organisations contracted by the Department have opportunities to be alone with children outside of public view—means that children are exposed to a greater risk of child sexual abuse.

Research commissioned by the National Royal Commission found the following:

- adults who sexually abuse children in out of home care settings are more likely to be male, charismatic, controlling and in positions of power[86]
- such abuse is often accompanied by grooming so children will trust the abuser and believe they have consented to the abuse[87]
- such abusers can engage in 'institutional grooming' where they manipulate systems and communities into trusting them and setting them outside the usual safety nets that exist to prevent child sexual abuse, and so can abuse multiple children over long periods.[88]

The National Royal Commission noted that it can be difficult to distinguish grooming from legitimate caring activities, particularly where the abuser is a carer. A key aspect of grooming is creating a trusting relationship with the child and making them feel special and cared for—the same behaviours we want from carers. Grooming is often associated with boundary breaches, such as taking a child on an unauthorised shopping trip or supplying them with alcohol, drugs or cigarettes.[89]

We heard of several instances of departmental staff having engaged in grooming behaviours and boundary violations. We identified many more allegations of sexual abuse of children by foster carers and adults associated with foster families. These issues are discussed in Chapter 8.

We address measures that can, reduce the risk to children in care from adults in the out of home care system in Chapter 9.

3.2.2 Adults outside the child protection system: child sexual exploitation

The National Royal Commission defined child sexual exploitation as arising when 'children are coerced or manipulated into engaging in sexual activity in return for something (such as alcohol, money or gifts)'.[90] It can take different forms, including the child perceiving it as a 'loving relationship' and the adult manipulating the child into sex work. It can also include the production, consumption, dissemination and exchange of child sexual exploitation material.[91] The abuser may meet the child in the community but often initially grooms a child online. In the context of out of home care, the relationship with the abuser is sometimes initiated by other children in care.[92]

In addition to unknown adults from the community, children in care may be at risk of child sexual abuse from adults and other family members from within their families of origin while on unsupervised contact visits. We heard of only a few instances of this form of harm.

We focus on the risk of child sexual exploitation and measures that are necessary to reduce the risk and respond more appropriately in Chapter 9.

3.2.3 Other children in the out of home care system: harmful sexual behaviours

The National Royal Commission noted that the out of home care sector has been aware of risks to children in out of home care from harmful sexual behaviours for some time; however, policies, procedures and professional development that address these risks was lacking in all Australian jurisdictions.[93] The National Royal Commission also noted that therapeutic treatment programs for young people who engage in harmful sexual behaviours were under-resourced and limited in their availability.[94]

We also identified that a high proportion of concerns about the sexual abuse of children in care in Tasmania related to the harmful sexual behaviours of other children (refer to Chapter 8). As we discuss in Chapter 9, the Department does not have a policy for preventing, identifying or responding to harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care and has only recently funded limited specialist support for children engaging in such behaviour. Chapter 21 discusses the broader need for a coordinated approach to harmful sexual behaviours in children across Tasmanian institutional settings.

3.3 Over-representation of particular groups of children

In addition to specific vulnerabilities referred to above, Aboriginal children and children with disability are at increased risk of experiencing sexual abuse in out of home care due to their over-representation in the system.

3.3.1 Aboriginal children

On 30 June 2021, there were 403 Aboriginal children in Tasmanian out of home care, which is 37.4 per cent of the number of children in out of home care.[95] The proportion of Aboriginal children in out of home care in Tasmania was 34.4 per 1,000 children compared with 6.5 per 1,000 non-Aboriginal children.[96] This means that Aboriginal children in Tasmania are a little over five times more likely to be in out of home care than non-Aboriginal children. However, because there are high numbers of children in care whose Aboriginal status is recorded as 'unknown', it is likely that the number is higher than reported.[97]

Australia-wide, the proportion of Aboriginal children in out of home care has increased over the past five years from 57.8 per 1,000 children in 2017 to 65.7 per 1,000 children in 2021.[98] Without urgent action to reverse this trend, the number of Aboriginal children in out of home care in Australia is predicted to increase by 54 per cent (to just over one in 10 children) by 2030.[99]

Aboriginal children are more likely to experience abuse and maltreatment in out of home care because they are over-represented and therefore 'have more contact with high risk institutional settings' such as 'residential and contemporary out of home care'.[100] The ongoing impacts of colonisation, the treatment of Aboriginal children in the past and subsequent intergenerational trauma continues to place them at risk.[101] There is also a range of culturally specific barriers to Aboriginal children disclosing abuse.[102] In Chapter 9, we examine the steps the Department is taking to address the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care, and we make recommendations for more significant reforms.

3.3.2 Children with disability

The Australian Bureau of Statistics reports that 10.2 per cent of children aged 0–14 years in Tasmania have disability, which is higher than the national average of 7.7 per cent.[103] When compared with the general population, Tasmanian statistics indicate that children and young people with known disability are over-represented in out of home care: 21.0 per cent have known disability, 47.2 per cent are recorded as having no disability and the disability status of the remaining 31.8 per cent of children in care is unknown.[104]

Research commissioned by the National Royal Commission noted that, in general, children with disability are about three times more likely to experience sexual abuse than children who do not have disability.[105] There is little Australian data to understand the reasons for this increased risk, although it is likely that multiple interacting factors are at play.[106]

The National Royal Commission observed that children with disability in out of home care face unique challenges because services and supports are not tailored to their individual needs.[107] Research commissioned by the National Royal Commission found that children with disability are more vulnerable to child sexual abuse in out of home care where:

- their disability means they need help with intimate care activities[108]
- they have an intellectual disability, behavioural disorder or communication disorder[109]
- the child and carers have little control over daily activities[110]
- the child is expected to be compliant[111]
- the child has difficulty communicating to others that child sexual abuse is occurring.[112]

Our examination of 22 departmental files, discussed in Chapter 8, confirmed these observations. As we explore in Chapter 9, there are several steps that the Department must take to reduce the risk of sexual abuse for children with disability in out of home care.

3.4 Protective factors

According to the National Royal Commission, maintaining positive connections with family, community and culture may be protective factors against sexual abuse for children in out of home care.[113]

The National Royal Commission heard that placing a child in kinship care increases the likelihood that he or she 'will grow up and know that they're loved, they're claimed, they belong'.[114] The National Royal Commission also heard that:

> Children who are part of a broader community with an interest in their wellbeing are more likely to be noticed when they are in danger and have networks of support to draw upon when they feel unsafe.[115]

For these reasons, kinship care may offset some of the 'psychic trauma' for a child caused by being removed from parents, provide the child with a familiar environment with known carers and maintain 'the perceived warmth and safety of a family during the placement process'.[116] Kinship care can also provide 'a strong parent/child relationship, family cohesion and positive social connection and support', which are all important protective factors for children in care.[117]

For Aboriginal children, connection to culture can increase protective factors by 'helping them to develop their identities, fostering high self-esteem, emotional strength and resilience', while positive relationships with their family and communities of origin can also increase protective factors against the risk of sexual abuse.[118] This is discussed in Chapter 9.

Associate Professor Tim Moore, Deputy Director, Institute of Child Protection Studies, Australian Catholic University, told us that healthy relationships with 'trustworthy adults' were 'more protective than risky':

> Inquiries and research has demonstrated that children and young people who are socially isolated are more at risk of experiencing abuse than their peers who are not, while those who are surrounded by trustworthy adults who will protect them, watch out for them and intervene and be available when they have safety concerns are safer than those who are not.[119]

The National Royal Commission also found that children in care who had regular visits from their Child Safety Officer were less likely to be sexually abused than children who were not visited regularly.[120] We explore the barriers to regular visitation in Chapter 9.

4 Previous reviews and reforms

In this section, we consider the Tasmanian Government's progress on implementing the numerous recommendations that have been made to improve the out of home care system in Tasmania since 2000, including the National Royal Commission's recommendations for contemporary out of home care.

4.1 National Royal Commission

The National Royal Commission made 22 recommendations aimed at improving the safety of children in contemporary out of home care. These recommendations encompassed:

- strengthening data collection and reporting (Recommendations 12.1–12.3)
- accrediting out of home care service providers (Recommendations 12.4 and 12.5)
- improving processes for authorising carers (Recommendations 12.6–12.8)
- developing a child sexual abuse prevention strategy (Recommendation 12.9)
- creating a culture that supports disclosure and identifying child sexual abuse (Recommendation 12.10)
- measures to strengthen the capacity of carers, residential care staff and child protection workers to understand trauma and abuse and its impact on children (Recommendation 12.11)
- measures to address the known risks of children in out of home care engaging in harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendations 12.12 and 12.13)
- measures to reduce the risk of child sexual exploitation in out of home care (Recommendations 12.14 and 12.15)
- strategies to increase placement stability to protect children in out of home care against the risk of sexual abuse (Recommendation 12.16)
- measures to support kinship carers and for children in care to maintain relationships with their birth families (Recommendation 12.17)
- developing an 'intensive therapeutic model of care framework' for residential care to meet the complex needs of children with histories of abuse and trauma, and regular professional development and supervision for residential care staff (Recommendations 12.18 and 12.19)
- measures to reduce the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care, including full implementation of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle (Recommendation 12.20)
- measures to improve out of home care systems' responses to children with disability, including adequate assessment, and developing and implementing care plans that identify specific risk management and safety strategies for the child (Recommendation 12.21)
- supporting care leavers who experienced sexual abuse while in care (Recommendation 12.22).[121]

The National Royal Commission also made seven recommendations for setting up and maintaining a carers' register (Recommendations 8.17–8.23).[122]

The Tasmanian Government has reported on its progress towards implementing the recommendations of the National Royal Commission in annual reports and action plans since 2018, most recently in December 2022 ('Fifth Progress Report').[123] In response to our notice to produce, the Department provided information that essentially replicated the Fifth Progress Report, with some minor additional details.[124] We note that in relation to the recommendations relevant for this chapter, the main updates in the Fifth Progress Report relate to the Government's release of the Tasmanian Out of Home Care Standards during 2022 (discussed in Chapter 9), a current review of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, plans for a Carer Register to be completed by 2024 and an Out of Home Care Accreditation Framework to be completed by 2026.[125]

Following is an overview of the Government's responses to the National Royal Commission recommendations. Throughout Chapter 9, we examine in detail the Government's progress on implementing relevant National Royal Commission recommendations where they relate to specific issues identified in the Tasmanian out of home care system.

4.2 Tasmanian reviews and reports into out of home care

Tasmanian out of home care is a highly examined system. We identified 22 reviews or reports on out of home care or statutory child protection in Tasmania since 2003, which, in total, contained several hundred recommendations. Of the 22 reviews or reports, 13 were either planned or responses to known general challenges facing the sector and nine were prompted by public reporting of specific adverse care situations. The reports were prepared by various entities, including the Commissioner for Children and Young People, the Tasmanian Auditor-General and the Tasmanian Government.

While most of the reports did not consider the issue of child sexual abuse in out of home care in detail, all raised important issues about out of home care in Tasmania and features of the system that increase the risks of child sexual abuse in that setting. The reports repeatedly highlighted that the systems in place to protect children from abuse and neglect, including child sexual abuse, had not performed in the way intended.

The remaining nine reports were strategic documents about out of home care or child protection in Tasmania that outlined the various attempts at reform in response to the recommendations made in the various reviews.

The Department has initiated three main reforms to out of home care since 2003: the Out of Home Care Strategic Framework (2007), Out of Home Care Reform in Tasmania (2014) and the Strategic Plan for Out of Home Care in Tasmania (2017). All reforms were ambitious and aimed to improve the experience of children in out of home care. Alongside these reforms, the Department has attempted two main reforms of the child protection system, the most recent being the 'Strong Families, Safe Kids' redesign. These reforms are discussed in Section 4.2.

However, despite attempts to reform Tasmania's child protection and out of home care systems, reviews continue to identify similar problems that directly affect the experience of children in care and increase their risk of child sexual abuse. These include:

- insufficient support for carers
- poor recruitment practices and insufficient support and professional development for staff
- inappropriate placements for children
- inadequate monitoring of children in care
- poor record keeping
- too few out of home care placements compared with the number of children in need
- poor monitoring of non-government out of home care providers and governance of funding agreements
- inadequate complaints processes
- over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care and low compliance with the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle
- over-representation of children with disability in out of home care
- poor support for children taking part in decision making
- variable understanding of and compliance with the National Standards for Out-of-Home Care, and poor monitoring of compliance
- no accreditation, registration or licensing system for out of home care providers
- poor information sharing between non-government providers and the Department.

Unfortunately, these themes have changed little over time and were echoed in the evidence we heard, which we explore in Chapter 9.

Some internal changes have been achieved over the past 19 years, such as appointing the Child Advocate and the incremental implementation of the Strong Families, Safe Kids redesign. However, out of home care is not a priority in that reform, and little apparent progress has been made on implementing the 2014 reform agenda Out of Home Care Reform in Tasmania. The various reports highlight that previous reform recommendations have not always been implemented in a timely manner, have been under-resourced or, when implemented, have not been subject to appropriate monitoring and oversight to ensure the intended outcomes are achieved.

Importantly, underfunding of statutory child protection was raised with us repeatedly as a fundamental contributing factor to the lack of implementation of recommendations over time. According to Sonya Enkelmann, a former Department employee:

> There seems to be a long tradition of undertaking reviews into Child Protection/Child Safety and [out of home care] which then quietly drop from sight. Understanding what sustains this systemic inertia is difficult and I will leave that to others – but a history of chronic underfunding in the Department to build its capacity and infrastructure cannot be overlooked. I am not referring to services (although they are too often underfunded) so much as capacity – having the right people and sufficient number of people in the right jobs to manage and implement change over the long term. A system in crisis is not well placed to manage change.[126]

Secretary Pervan described how:

> … budgetary pressure [from an expenditure overrun on special care packages] … resulted in an immediate loss of impetus for, and opportunity to, resource significant operational reforms in Family Based Care, which were suspended.[127]

He added that 'the Government has been consistent in not providing funds to the Department … to implement change', citing this factor as fundamental to the slow progress towards improving systems in the Department.[128]

In her statement, the Child Advocate also noted the pattern of repeated reviews and little change, commenting that 'Tasmania is guilty of partial reform' and needs 'doers not reviewers'.[129] She attributed this inertia to 'significant leadership churn' in the executive, underfunding of reforms, the lack of a focused change management team in the corporate structure and distraction caused by the demands of external scrutiny.[130] Other former senior departmental employees expressed similar views.[131]

Ms Lovell acknowledged that the Child Safety Service struggles to 'keep up with reasonable community expectation around the services that we deliver and the safety and quality of those services', as well as the demand on the service. She stated that efforts to reform the service have been repeatedly interrupted by new concerns demanding their focus:

> … we acknowledge that we're not doing well in relation to one aspect; we commit to doing better, we have a strategy around how to do that, but it's immediately superseded by the next area where it's determined that we're failing, and so on and so on.[132]

When providing evidence to our Inquiry, Ms Lovell's frustration was clear:

> We can't do everything at once, so the expectation on us—we certainly agree that we need to improve in all of those areas. That's what continuous improvement is about. But we can only do so much at once, and the more things we try and do simultaneously, it seems, the more that our efforts are diluted and we don't do anything as perfectly as we would aspire to.[133]

We imagine this sense of not being able to 'catch up' on reforms has affected the morale and culture of the Child Safety Service and those working in the out of home care sector.

Inertia in implementing recommendations of inquiries and reviews is not unique to Tasmania. Analyses of previous inquiries for the National Royal Commission highlighted factors that enable and constrain reforms in the child protection and out of home care systems. Central to successfully implementing reforms are effective leadership, adequate resourcing and sufficient internal and external accountability.[134] We explore these factors in relation to the Department in Chapter 9.

We are aware that our Commission of Inquiry is yet another review, with the potential to cause harm if our scrutiny does not translate into change. With this in mind, we aspire to recommendations that will help create a system that can sustain a journey of continuous improvement. Dr Samantha Crompvoets, an expert on organisational change processes, told us that sustainable organisational change can be achieved, but it can take a long time. She recommended regularly evaluating the impact of the change to track progress, breaking it down into manageable steps.[135] We recognise that even with the best leadership and systems of accountability, the reforms we recommend will not lead to meaningful improvements for children without the commitment of the Tasmanian Government to provide the infrastructure and resources to enable the Department to drive and sustain change.

We recognise that the Department has been undergoing change for many years and may well be fatigued by the partial reforms. While we have compassion for the people within an overwhelmed and underfunded system, it is our view that little meaningful change has been sustained for children and their families or carers. Improved experiences for children in care must be the benchmark for success, and a system that is enabled to create and sustain change is urgently required to achieve this outcome. We outline our recommendations for reform in Chapter 9.

Notes

1 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ss 5, 6. Before October 2022, the Department of Communities (also referred to as Communities Tasmania) was responsible for the out of home care system.

2 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 10B

3 'Attorney-General "Deeply Concerned" about Child Protection System', ABC News (online 21 June 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-06-21/attorney-general-deeply-concerned-about-child/13938526>; 'Veteran Child Protection Worker Calls Out Inadequate Staff Training', ABC NewsRadio (online 20 June 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-06-20/veteran-child-protection-worker-calls-out/13936804>; 'Calls for Overhaul of Australia's Child Protection System', ABC News (online 20 June 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-06-20/calls-for-overhaul-of-australias-child-protection/13936456>; 'National Children's Commissioner Critical of Government Inaction on Child Protection', ABC NewsRadio (online 20 June 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-06-20/national-childrens-commissioner-criticises/13936774>; 'The Forgotten Children Subjected to Abuse in State Care', ABC News (online 19 June 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-06-19/the-forgotten-children-subjected-to-abuse-in-state/13936094>; Katri Uibu, 'Bad Parent', ABC News (online, 20 June 2022) <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2022-06-20/hundreds-of-people-speak-out-against-child-protection-system/101094220>.

4 Statement of Sonya Enkelmann, 26 April 2022, 2–3 [11].

5 Department for Education, Children and Young People, 'Out of Home Care in Tasmania', Children, Youth and Families (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.decyp.tas.gov.au/children/out-of-home-care-in-tasmania/>.

6 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Child Protection Australia 2018–19 (Report, Child Welfare Series No 72, 18 March 2020) 44–45.

7 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Out-of-home care', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 26 May 2022) 5.1 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/contents/out-of-home-care>.

8 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) Preface and Executive Summary, 39.

9 For example, The Hon Margaret Nyland AM Commissioner, The Life They Deserve: Child Protection Systems Royal Commission Report (Summary and Report, August 2016) vol 1, 309, 312.

10 The Court can assign guardianship to any appropriate person, who may come from the child's family or community: refer to Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 42(4).

11 Transcript of Zaharenia Galanos, Jurek Stopczynski, Emily Churches and Rachel Hales, 4 May 2022, 315 [35–41].

12 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 42(2).

13 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ss 42(3), 42(4)(c)(i). Other orders that the Court can make include a supervision order (where the child remains with their natural guardian/s but the Secretary is responsible for supervising the welfare of the child), an order granting custody to the Secretary or another person, or an order granting guardianship to a person other than the Secretary (a third-party guardianship order): Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ss 42(4), 42A.

14 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 42(6).

15 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 69(1).

16 Refer to Department of Families, Fairness and Housing Victoria, 'Home Stretch', Young People (Web Page, 2021) <https://services.dffh.vic.gov.au/home-stretch#:~:text=Home%20Stretch%2C%20part%20of%20the,from%20a%20Better%20Futures%20worker>; Leanne Linard, Minister for Children and Youth Justice, 'Support for Young People Leaving Care Makes History (Media Release 18 June 2022) <https://statements.qld.gov.au/statements/95435>.

17 Child Safety Service, 'Care Teams and Care Planning Practice Advice', 8 December 2020, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

18 Child Safety Service, 'Care Teams and Care Planning Practice Advice', 8 December 2020, 3, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

19 Child Safety Service, 'Care Teams and Care Planning Practice Advice', 8 December 2020, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

20 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 5.

21 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 69(1)(a)–(c), (2)(d).

22 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 69(1)(d)–(f).

23 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 69(2)(c).

24 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 71(1)–(2).

25 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 s 69(2)(a).

26 Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ss 7(1)(a), 10E.

27 Department of Communities, 'Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997: Instrument of Delegation', 8 July 2022.

28 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Human Services Dashboard (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.decyp.tas.gov.au/about-us/department-data/human-services-dashboard/>.

29 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Human Services Dashboard (Web Page, 2022) <https://www.decyp.tas.gov.au/about-us/department-data/human-services-dashboard/>; Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, Annexure 36.

30 Statement of Michael Pervan, 4 August 2022, 1 [4–6].

31 Figures compiled from several Australian Institute of Health and Welfare Child Protection Australia reports 2000–01 to 2020–21 to cover the period. Source materials contain cautions about variations between years in how the total number was calculated. Reports can be found at Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Report Editions', Child Protection (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2021-22/report-editions>.

32 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page 15 June 2022), Table 5.1 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

33 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page 15 June 2022) Table 5.1 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

34 Commissioner for Children and Young People Tasmania, The Tasmanian Out-of-Home Care System and 'Being Healthy', Out-of-Home Care Monitoring Program 2018–19 (Monitoring Report No. 1, October 2019) 2–3.

35 Department for Education, Children and Young People, Out of Home Care in Tasmania (Web Page, 2023) <https://www.decyp.tas.gov.au/children/out-of-home-care-in-tasmania/>.

36 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 2 [10]–5 [18].

37 Commissioner for Children and Young People Tasmania, The Tasmanian Out-of-Home Care System and 'Being Healthy', Out-of-Home Care Monitoring Program 2018–19 (Monitoring Report No. 1, October 2019) 22–23.

38 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table S5.3 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>. Note that Tasmanian data has some limitations that can be viewed in the source document.

39 Statement of Sonya Enkelmann, 26 April 2022, 8–9 [25].

40 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, Annexure 26 (Diagram: 'Child and Family Services out of home care service directory', undated).

41 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, Annexure 26 (Diagram: 'Child and Family Services Out of Home Care Service Directory', undated).

42 Commissioner for Children and Young People Tasmania, The Tasmanian Out-of-Home Care System and 'Being Healthy', Out-of-Home Care Monitoring Program 2018–19 (Monitoring Report No. 1, October 2019) 23.

43 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 23 [91].

44 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 23 [92].

45 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page 15 June 2022) Table S5.3 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

46 Statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022, Annexure 83 (Table: 'Funding for out of home care services') 1–5.

47 Statement of Kim Backhouse, 8 June 2022, 10–11 [52].

48 Statement of Julian Watchorn, 8 June 2022, 2 [13].

49 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table S7.1 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

50 Derived from Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Tables S7.2, S7.3. Note that data limitations in relation to the kinship care households can be viewed in the source documents.

51 Tasmanian data for kinship care households with three or more children was 'unpublished', but it was possible to calculate the difference between total households and numbers in the other two categories.

52 Statement of Julian Watchorn, 8 June 2022, 3 [14].

53 On 24 February 2022 the Tasmanian Government announced that the dissolution of the Department of Communities would start on 1 July 2022 and that the child protection and out of home care functions would be assumed by the newly created Department for Education, Children and Young People: Peter Gutwein, 'Department Structures to Strengthen Tasmanian Outcomes' (Media Release, 24 February 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/department_structures_to_strengthen_tasmanian_outcomes>.

54 Before establishing the Department of Communities in July 2018, the child protection and out of home care functions sat within the Department of Health and Human Services: refer to Department of Justice, 'Tasmanian Government's Service System', 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. Statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022, Annexure 77 (Diagram: 'Communities Tasmania Organisational Structure', 12 April 2022).

55 Determined from annual reports, websites, media releases, Hansard and news articles.

56 Statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022, 3 [22].

57 Requests for statement served on Michael Pervan, 11, 22 and 26 April 2022.

58 Statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022, 7 [45].

59 Statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022, 7 [47].

60 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 22 [84].

61 Statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022, 16 [100].

62 Roger Jaensch, Minister for Education, Children and Youth, 'New Positions to Bolster Child Safety Workforce' (Media Release, 4 November 2022) <https://www.premier.tas.gov.au/site_resources_2015/additional_releases/new-positions-to-bolster-child-safety-workforce>; Roger Jaensch, Minister for Education, Children and Youth, 'New Initiatives Help Bolster Child Safety Workforce' (Media Release, 15 August 2022) <http://www.rogerjaensch.com.au/new-initiatives-help-bolster-child-safety-workforce/>.

63 Compiled from statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022, Annexure 7 (Table: Staffing of the Advice and Referral Line).

64 Compiled from statement of Michael Pervan, 7 June 2022, Annexure 18 (Table: Staffing for Child Safety Services, undated).

65 Compiled from statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 22 [81], 23 [88].

66 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 24 [97].

67 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1187 [11–17].

68 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1205 [9–17].

69 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 22 [82].

70 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 8 [24].

71 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1185 [35–41].

72 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1185 [46]–1186 [6].

73 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1186 [18–27].

74 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) Preface and Executive Summary, 40.

75 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 90.

76 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 39, 94, 111; Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) Preface and Executive Summary, 40.

77 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 26; Gwynnyth Llewellyn, Sarah Wayland and Gabrielle Hindmarsh, Disability and Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, November 2016) 44.

78 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 90, 116.

79 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 122–127, 207.

80 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 10, 38.

81 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 9–10.

82 Commissioner for Children and Young People Tasmania, The Tasmanian Out-of-Home Care System and 'Being Healthy', Out-of-Home Care Monitoring Program 2018–19 (Monitoring Report No. 1, October 2019) 28.

83 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 73.

84 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 73.

85 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023), 20–21.

86 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 72.

87 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 72.

88 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 78.

89 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 92.

90 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 'Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Out-of-Home Care' (Consultation Paper, March 2016) 5.

91 Statement of Hilda Sirec, 28 April 2022, 4 [2–24].

92 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 'Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Out-of-Home Care' (Consultation Paper, March 2016) 5; Commission for Children and Young People (Victoria), As a Good Parent Would (Report, August 2015) 14, 70 [288].

93 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 'Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Out-of-Home Care' (Consultation Paper, March 2016) 32.

94 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 'Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Out-of-Home Care' (Consultation Paper, March 2016) 32; refer also to Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, Good Practice in Responding to Young People with Harmful Sexual Behaviours: Key Findings and Future Directions (Research to Policy and Practice 18/2020, June 2020) 5.

95 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table S5.10 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

96 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table S5.10 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

97 Commissioner for Children and Young People Tasmania, The Tasmanian Out-of-Home Care System and 'Being Healthy', Out-of-Home Care Monitoring Program 2018–19 (Monitoring Report No. 1, October 2019) 31.

98 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables' Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table T3 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

99 SNAICC - National Voice for Our Children, The Family Matters Report 2021 (2021) 39.

100 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 84, 89.

101 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 90, 151.

102 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 2, 161.

103 Australian Bureau of Statistics, Disability, Ageing and Carers, Australia: Tasmania, 2018 (Catalogue No 4430.0, 24 October 2019) 'Table 3.1 All Persons, Disability Status, by Age – 2018, Estimate' <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/health/disability/disability-ageing-and-carers-australia-summary-findings/2018/44300do006_2018.xls>; Australian Bureau of Statistics, Disability, Ageing and Carers, Australia: Tasmania, 2018 (Catalogue No 4430.0, 5 February 2020) 'Table 5.1 All Persons, Disability Status by Age and Living Arrangements – 2018, Estimate' <https://www.abs.gov.au/statistics/health/disability/disability-ageing-and-carers-australia-summary-findings/2018/44300do006_2018.xls>.

104 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table S5.8 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

105 Gwynnyth Llewellyn, Sarah Wayland and Gabrielle Hindmarsh, Disability and Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, November 2016) 44.

106 Gwynnyth Llewellyn, Sarah Wayland and Gabrielle Hindmarsh, Disability and Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, November 2016) 34.

107 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 'Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Out-of-Home Care' (Consultation Paper, March 2016) 18.

108 Gwynnyth Llewellyn, Sarah Wayland and Gabrielle Hindmarsh, Disability and Child Sexual Abuse in institutional contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, November 2016) 44.

109 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 7.

110 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 27.

111 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 27.

112 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 27.

113 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 128.

114 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 204.

115 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 271.

116 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 204, quoting Aron R Shlonsky and Jill D Berrick, 'Assessing and Promoting Quality in Kin and Nonkin Foster Care' (2001) 75(1) Social Service Review 59, 63.

117 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 202.

118 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 215, 327, quoting Patricia Anderson et al, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Children and Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Contexts (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, 2017) 35.

119 Statement of Tim Moore, 28 April 2022, 17 [85].

120 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, October 2016) 71.

121 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 24–30.

122 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 8, 27–29.

123 Tasmanian Government, Fifth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2023 (Report, December 2022).

124 Notice to produce served on the State of Tasmania, 20 July 2021; Department of Communities, 'Recommendations—Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse Communities Tasmania Progress Update as at June 2021', 23 August 2021, 16–28, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

125 Tasmanian Government, Fifth Annual Progress Report and Action Plan 2023: Appendix A (Report, December 2022) 30–32, 41–50.

126 Statement of Sonya Enkelmann, 26 April 2022, 21 [87].

127 Statement of Michael Pervan, 6 June 2022, 5 [18].

128 Michael Pervan, Procedural Fairness Response: Annexure B, 22 May 2023, 8–9.

129 Statement of Sonya Pringle-Jones, 16 June 2022, 27 [71–72].

130 Statement of Sonya Pringle-Jones, 16 June 2022, 26 [68]–28 [73].

131 Statement of Caroline Brown, 9 June 2022, 2 [13]; Statement of Sonya Enkelmann, 26 April 2022, 21 [87].

132 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1210 [31–36].

133 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1211 [5–11].

134 Parenting Research Centre, Implementation of Recommendations Arising from Previous Inquiries of Relevance to the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse: Final Report (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, May 2015) 151–152.

135 Transcript of Samantha Crompvoets, 13 September 2022, 4038 [24]–4039 [21].

8 Case examples and our approach: Children in out of home care

Content warning

Please be aware that the content in this report includes descriptions of child sexual abuse and may be distressing or raise issues of concern for some readers.

We encourage readers to exercise discretion in their engagement with this content and to seek support and care if required.

1 Introduction

In this chapter we outline our approach to inquiring into the out of home care system in Tasmania. This includes the scope of our Commission of Inquiry, the evidence we drew on and the picture we formed of the scale and nature of child sexual abuse in this system.

2 Interpreting our scope

When considering the issue of sexual abuse of children in out of home care, we needed to establish the scope of our Inquiry.

First, the out of home care system sits within the broader statutory child protection system. For reasons discussed below, we have focused on out of home care specifically, and only include those aspects of the wider statutory child protection system that relate to the risk of sexual abuse for children in care.

Second, we decided to consider all aspects of out of home care in Tasmania that might affect the risk of sexual abuse to children. We explain our rationale later in this section.

2.1 Focusing on out of home care, not the whole of child protection

As discussed in Chapter 7, out of home care in Tasmania is part of the wider child protection system and sits alongside the Child Safety Service and Strong Families Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line ('Advice and Referral Line') functions in the Department.

Had we interpreted our terms of reference broadly, we might have inquired into the child protection system as a whole, on the basis that preventing children from entering out of home care would protect them from experiencing child sexual abuse while in care. With the exception of our discussion of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle in Chapter 9, we have not adopted this interpretation, because the core business of the child protection system is to respond to abuse and neglect in a familial, rather than institutional, setting. Moreover, the time and resources allocated to our Inquiry do not allow us to do justice to a review of the entire child protection system in addition to our inquiries into the health, education and youth detention systems. We note that the National Royal Commission did not examine the child protection system as a whole but similarly limited its inquiry to the out of home care system.

For these reasons, we have limited our Inquiry to those aspects of the Advice and Referral Line and Child Safety Service functions that relate directly to children who have been taken into the Department's care. For example, Child Safety Service decisions about where a child will live once a guardianship order has been made are within the scope of our Inquiry, whereas the actions of Child Safety Service staff in relation to children who are not yet in the care of the Department are outside the scope. Our decision to consider these aspects of the Department as out of scope should not be interpreted as an endorsement of these functions in Tasmania. In hearings and sessions with Commissioners, we heard evidence of problems in the statutory child protection system's responses to sexual abuse in and out of family settings. These included failings of the Advice and Referral Line and the Child Safety Service more broadly.[1] What we heard, while outside the scope of our Inquiry, was concerning.

Between 2000 and 2021, the rate of children in out of home care in Tasmania rose substantially from 548 children on 30 June 2000 (4.6 per 1,000 children living in Tasmania) to 1,077 children on 30 June 2021 (9.6 per 1,000 children).[2] During the same period the number of children living in Tasmania decreased.[3] Even more concerning, for every 1,000 Aboriginal children living in Tasmania in June 2021, 34.4 were in out of home care. This over-representation is a direct and continuing effect of colonisation.[4]

These figures show that the system is not preventing children from entering out of home care. The most effective strategy to prevent child sexual abuse in out of home care is for families and communities to be supported to keep children safe in their families of origin. This requires an appropriate child safety system.

We heard evidence about the importance of early intervention and prevention in an effective child safety system.[5] However, we caution against using the term 'early intervention' without being specific about the context and purpose of that intervention, particularly as the new Department brings together a broad range of children's services. For example, early intervention could be used to refer to intervention with:

- children in the early years
- families in need of support
- families with multiple and complex needs who are known to statutory child protection
- adolescents at risk of entry into youth justice, school disengagement or early parenting.

During our hearings, we heard from multiple witnesses about the significant number of children and their families in need, and the complexity of those needs that stem from a range of circumstances and experiences.[6]

There is also growing evidence of intergenerational contact with the statutory child protection system; that is, the children likely to end up in the system are often those born to parents with complex needs who themselves have had contact (perhaps for multiple generations) with the system. This research shows that most families known to the child protection system have multiple profound impacts that accumulate over time and need intensive therapeutic responses.[7] Concerns have been raised about whether the dominant governmental model of providing general family support is effectively meeting such multiple and complex needs.[8] Unmanaged mental illness, substance addiction, domestic violence and housing instability are common features in families known to statutory child protection.[9] A whole of government response is required to prevent these problems and treat children and adults for their impacts as well as the effects—often intergenerational—of abuse and neglect.

We note the results of the Australian Child Maltreatment Study, which showed that 62.2 per cent of the Australian population had experienced at least one form of child abuse, maltreatment or neglect.[10] The study also showed that this is not merely a historical problem: 40.2 per cent of young people aged 16–24 had experienced two or more forms of child maltreatment.[11] The study further showed that Australians who have experienced abuse and neglect are likely to experience profound mental health impacts.[12]

Given this context, we do not suggest a review of the statutory child protection system in Tasmania. Such a review would fail to address the factors that result in children and families becoming known to the Advice and Referral Line and the Child Safety Service.

Instead, we urge the Tasmanian Government to focus its efforts and resources on ensuring that it has a whole of government response to meeting the health and human service needs of children and adults who have experienced abuse or neglect. To break the intergenerational cycle of involvement in statutory child protection, the Government should provide coordinated responses that address the support and specialist intervention needs of:

- first-time parents with childhood histories of abuse and neglect
- families who have complex needs in which children have experienced abuse and neglect
- children and young people in out of home care and youth detention who are struggling to overcome the impacts of violence, abuse and neglect.

Using the language of a public health model, we see these as tertiary therapeutic needs that require an appropriate response (in addition to primary and secondary child abuse prevention and family support services) to serve the volume of families in this situation.

2.2 A broad understanding of out of home care

Within the out of home care system itself, we have taken a broad approach to our Inquiry to fully appreciate the risks and potential sources of protection for children in care.

While the sexual abuse of children in care remained central, many victim-survivors shared with us other experiences they had of violence, abuse and neglect in care. For some, these other experiences of abuse and neglect occurred alongside the sexual abuse; for others, their maltreatment increased their vulnerability to sexual victimisation and harm.[13]

In addition, the structures and processes to protect children from harm in out of home care are often the same as those needed to maintain children's wellbeing and care generally. Effective structures and processes provide children with trusted and responsible adult supervision and care, give children a voice, meet children's needs, and establish clear and supported avenues for raising and addressing concerns.

3 Evidence we have drawn on

Our understanding of the Tasmanian Government's responsibility for children in care is based on the extensive research from the National Royal Commission about the risks of child sexual abuse for children in out of home care.

We received information from numerous sources about the experiences of children in out of home care. These included submissions, community consultations, written and oral evidence at our hearings, and documents produced by the Tasmanian Government. We received targeted information about out of home care from the following sources:

- a stakeholder consultation session for non-government providers of out of home care held in Hobart on 25 October 2021
- the relevant sections of Child Safety Service files for 22 children who were in care between 2000 and 2021 and were recorded as having been at risk of child sexual abuse while in care[14]
- evidence provided in the out of home care hearings held in Hobart from 14 to 17 June 2022
- statements from local and interstate experts on preventing and responding to sexual abuse of children in out of home care
- material that was publicly available on the websites of the Department of Communities and the Department for Education, Children and Young People
- internal material available to staff on the Department of Communities and the Department for Education, Children and Young People's intranet
- strategic documents and reports, some of which were publicly available and some of which the Tasmanian Government provided in response to our notice to produce
- previous reviews and reform agendas for out of home care in Tasmania.

3.1 Evidence from children in care and victim-survivors

We considered it essential to understand the experience of out of home care from those people who spent time in care because they can best identify how the out of home care system has affected them.

We heard from children who live in out of home care about their experiences of the system as it is today. Many children, including those currently in out of home care, shared their experiences through a research project we commissioned from Associate Professor Tim Moore and Emeritus Professor Morag McArthur (refer to Chapter 1).[15]

In sessions with a Commissioner and through oral evidence at hearings, we heard directly from victim-survivors who recalled being sexually abused in out of home care as children. We also heard from their carers and family members.

We closely tracked the journey of some children in the 22 files we received from the Department (refer to Section 4).

The following case examples illustrate common experiences.

Case example: Azra

The alleged abuse

Azra told us that she does not know why she came to be in out of home care but that she was very young at the time.[16] In the 1990s, Azra recalled being placed in a foster home where she experienced physical and emotional abuse from her foster mother.[17] She said that once, when she was about five years old, her foster mother broke her arm and then slapped her for crying in pain.[18] Azra described her foster father as 'loving but passive' and said that he did not protect her from her foster mother's abuse.[19]

Azra felt unloved and unwanted, so when a person associated with the foster family started paying her attention, she said she experienced this attention as love.[20] When this man began to sexually abuse her, she did not identify what he was doing as wrong and even sought out his company to escape her foster mother's cruelty.[21] When one of her foster father's work colleagues also started sexually abusing her, Azra told us that she also did not recognise this as wrong.[22] In Azra's words, she only realised much later in life, when she had children of her own, that she had not recognised 'wrong love'.[23]

Azra said she recalls very few visits from her departmental case worker and reflected that she may have been able to tell her case worker about the physical and sexual abuse if she had seen her more often.[24] She thinks that the Department trusted the carers because of their standing in the community.[25] Later in life, friends of her foster parents admitted to Azra that they knew about her abuse and apologised for not doing or saying something.[26]

After Azra's sibling told someone about their foster mother's physical and emotional abuse, a representative of the Department interviewed Azra at school.[27] However, Azra's foster mother was present at this interview, so Azra was too frightened to tell the truth.[28] Azra told us that she remained in the same family until her behaviour became too extreme for them to manage, and they sent her away.[29]

The impact

Azra described the impact of the abuse she recalls: 'I'm not sure I can even begin to recover and learn to live like a normal person. I'm completely ruined'.[30] She said that all her romantic relationships have been violent, which she links to her 'skewed love maps', and she believes her childhood experiences have negatively affected her parenting, with her children suffering as a result.[31] Azra said she has been diagnosed with complex post-traumatic stress disorder and has flashbacks of the alleged abuse.[32] She has tried medication, therapy and illicit drugs in her attempts to cope.[33] She attributes still being alive to her children and pets.[34]

Reflections

Azra is concerned that abuse like what she recalls experiencing is continuing to happen to other children. She is aware of children currently in foster care who she believes are being sexually exploited or neglected, and that the care provider and the Department are aware of this but are not acting to protect the children.[35] She stated: 'It's too late for me, but it shouldn't be too late for them'.[36]

Azra proposed several ways that out of home care could be made safer for children, such as listening to the voices of adults who grew up in out of home care and developing strategies to help break the intergenerational cycle of out of home care:

> Now, more than ever, we need to have the mentality of it takes a village to raise a child, and frankly it takes a whole lot more to heal a traumatized child. Most parents with traumatic childhoods similar to mine want to do better, want to be better, but simply lack the resources and know-how to do so. We can help them and we can certainly better support current carers who take in these children who often come with more issues than Vogue. We need to stop relying on that one social worker. Each child and family needs that village of support. This will prevent future children from falling through the cracks.[37]

Azra noted her experience of feeling devalued as a person, both in out of home care and when she sought recourse for the abuse against her. Her view is that the Government should take responsibility for past failures to protect children:

> As an ex-ward of the state there has always been this stigma attached to me and to the many others like me. We are unfairly judged and completely dismissed because we are deemed 'trouble' and 'liars'. This shame should never have been mine to bear, nor any other victim of past sexual abuse whilst under government care. That should be on the Government's head. They should be ashamed and disgusted that they have sat back and allowed this to happen throughout the years knowing full well the damage it's done.[38]

What we can learn

While Azra's experiences in out of home care occurred before 2000, they have continuing relevance for understanding how we can better protect children from child sexual abuse in out of home care, including:

- the importance of adequately monitoring the safety of a child in out of home care and having other adults such as case workers who visit the child and with whom they can develop a relationship
- the vulnerability of children, particularly those who have no positive and appropriate relationships, to grooming and sexual abuse
- the need to ensure children in care receive sexuality and respectful relationship education, so they can recognise abuse for what it is
- the need for appropriate interviewing techniques following a disclosure, such as not interviewing children in the presence of the person who has had a complaint made about them
- the importance of ongoing support, including mental health and parenting support, for adults traumatised by their childhood experiences in out of home care.

Case example: Hudson[39]

Hudson (a pseudonym) was a small child when they came into Cassandra's (a pseudonym) care in the late 2010s, following a number of previous foster care placements.[40] Three years after entering her care, Cassandra discovered by chance that Hudson was Aboriginal.[41]

Cassandra told us that, at the time, there was a requirement for children to demonstrate Aboriginal heritage via specific documentation. She understood that although it was well known that Hudson was Aboriginal, Hudson's parents had not been able to provide the necessary documents. The outcome was Hudson did not receive cultural support in care.[42] Cassandra, herself an Aboriginal woman, described how she felt Hudson missed out on taking part in cultural programs due to this situation. She saw this as 'systemic racism' and a denial of Hudson's right to 'develop a positive sense of culture and identity'.[43]

Reflecting on the Child Safety Service, Cassandra referred to a 'broken system' and in her view, Hudson's case:

> … raises significant questions that must be answered, such as … how the failings of an individual Child Safety case worker can make or break a child's ability to not just heal but to learn and engage and be supported and appropriately resourced to do so.[44]

What we can learn

Hudson's case illustrates the importance of cultural identification for children in care and the importance of providing cultural supports.

Case example: Faye

The alleged abuse

Faye (a pseudonym) was placed into foster care with her sibling in the mid-1990s, when she was in late primary school.[45] Faye recalled that her foster parents provided food and material comforts, and although they were strict, she experienced a stability and security she had not experienced before.[46]

After one of the foster parents' adult sons moved back into the family home, Faye remembers case workers from the Department visiting and speaking with Faye and her sibling in the presence of their foster mother. She remembers these case workers asked if they wanted to stay in the home (which they did), although she does not remember them saying why they were asking. Faye told us she later found out that the son had been fired from his job for having a relationship with an underage person.[47] In retrospect, Faye thinks the case workers likely visited in response to the allegation. She told us:

> We hadn't been told what had happened with [the son] and didn't understand the implications or risk of him coming to live in the house with us. We were children. We should have been removed from the house by Children and Youth Services, at least until the allegation in relation to [the son] had been resolved.[48]

Faye said she and her sibling were left in the foster home, and case workers promised to visit regularly, but Faye said this didn't happen.[49]

Faye explained that she was in early high school when the foster parents' adult son gained Faye's and her sibling's trust by acting 'cool', bending the rules for them and taking their side. Faye now realises he was grooming them.[50] Faye told us that his sexual abuse of her started with him pressing his genitals against her during play wrestling and trying to kiss her.[51] Faye's bedroom was located away from her foster parents' bedroom, which she said made it possible for their son to sexually abuse her at night.[52]

Disclosure of the alleged abuse

Eventually, Faye said she told her sibling about the abuse and each agreed to never leave the other alone with their foster parent's son.[53] Faye said her sibling told their foster mother about the abuse. Faye said her foster mother laughed when Faye told her that the son had touched her on the vagina, and dismissed Faye's experience, asking: 'Is that all?' Faye remembers that her foster father, however, seemed to believe Faye and her sibling, saying words to the effect of: 'This has happened too many times. It can't be a coincidence; they must be telling the truth'.[54]

Faye recalled being quickly removed by the Department after she disclosed the alleged abuse, but she was heartbroken to be separated from her sibling, who was left with the family. She was also distraught when many of her few possessions were lost in the move. Faye believed her foster mother withheld these possessions as punishment for alleging abuse by the son.[55] Still, Faye missed her foster mother and wanted to see her again, but her foster mother did not attend an arranged meeting, and she never saw her again.[56]

The Department supported Faye to make a statement to police, but Faye did not feel able to proceed with charges at that time because of her sense of loyalty to her foster mother.[57] She said she received specialist sexual assault counselling but did not feel comfortable and found it hard to open up.[58]

Reflections

Faye believes the Department failed to protect her from a known risk of sexual abuse, stating:

> If there is any risk to a vulnerable child, that child should be removed from the environment. I accept that it would have been traumatising for them to remove me and my sibling from the home, but it would have been far less traumatising than the abuse I endured.
>
> They had the opportunity to protect me, but they didn't. They also failed to visit us more frequently, which they said they would. If they had have followed up I may have disclosed the abuse earlier.[59]

Although Faye was removed from the foster family, she said her sibling was left there, other children were placed there, and the family requested only girls be placed with them, despite their adult son being a known risk.[60]

What we can learn

We recognise that Faye was in care before 2000. However, Faye's case highlights important issues of continuing relevance in out of home care which, if not followed, may expose children to an increased risk of sexual abuse:

- placing children's safety at the centre of decision making—while it is important to take into account the wishes of a child, adults need to ensure they are taking responsibility for decisions about risks to safety
- ensuring all children in a placement are protected from risk of harm
- case workers regularly visiting children in care, to swiftly identify risks, build trust and enable disclosures[61]
- facilitating the security and support that children can gain from sibling relationships and having their own possessions.

Case example: Lucas[62]

Respite care

Lucas (a pseudonym), an Aboriginal man, and his partner Eleanor (a pseudonym), had a number of children in their care, including kinship care of several grandchildren.[63] The family occasionally accessed weekend respite care to cope with the complex needs of the children in their care.

On one occasion, Lucas told us he could not meet the respite carers at their home before his grandchildren went there for respite care. But he recalled being told that Child Safety Service staff had inspected the respite carers' home and assessed it as safe. Lucas said when he collected the children at the end of the weekend, he discovered an unsafe and filthy house. Lucas recalled that the children had not been adequately fed. When he arrived, Lucas said he saw an unknown man run away from the house and jump over the back fence. Lucas told us that it later transpired that neither Child Safety Service staff nor the non-government provider involved had inspected the house. Lucas stated that 'you think they're being cared for, and obviously they're not'.[64]

Once home, Lucas said his granddaughter, Matilda (a pseudonym), who was under the age of five, started talking about being kicked by the respite carer as well as a man putting his penis in her vagina.[65] Lucas told us that he and Eleanor eventually pieced together that several older male children had touched Matilda's genitals, and the carer had become aware of this. Lucas said a forensic hospital examination confirmed that male DNA was found on a vaginal swab. Following the abuse, Lucas recalled that Matilda began having nightmares and exhibiting behavioural changes.[66]

Reflections

Lucas told us he was very concerned about the out of home care system: 'The reality is, they've got no foster carers, they've got no emergency respite providers, they've got no respite providers'.[67] He was concerned that respite carers may not be 'doing it for the right reasons' and that they were not sufficiently remunerated for the hard work performed: 'If it were increased, I'm sure a lot more people would do it'.[68]

What we can learn

In addition to Lucas' concerns about the system's monitoring and support of respite carers, Lucas' experience illustrates the importance of:

- processes and resources for assessing, training and monitoring out of home care providers—this includes ensuring respite carers have the capacity to provide the care required
- increasing the number of carers available to meet demand, particularly within suitable timeframes
- ensuring clarity of roles when both non-government agencies and the Department are involved in providing out of home care.

Case example: Orson and Ivan

Early experiences in care

Orson (a pseudonym) was taken into care while under the age of five and made subject to an order granting guardianship to the State until he turned 18.[69] A few years later, concerns were raised that Orson had displayed aggression and sexualised behaviours towards other children. It was then decided that Orson should be placed with a foster family where he would be 'the only child or the youngest child'.[70]

The alleged abuse

Orson's new foster family already had an older child, Ivan (a pseudonym), in their care.[71] The foster carers expressed concern that they might not be able to keep Orson safe because Ivan had previously displayed sexualised behaviours towards other children. The Child Safety Service decided this risk could be adequately managed.[72]

Almost three years later, the foster carers again told the Child Safety Service they were worried that Ivan might abuse Orson. Around a year later, Orson told his carers that Ivan had sexually abused him and then punched him in the face when he told other children.[73] At this point, Orson's carers began monitoring Ivan at night and attempting to keep both children safe by the children 'never being unsupervised and not being permitted in the other's bedroom'.[74]

The response

The foster carers immediately reported Orson's allegations to his Child Safety Officer. The Department did not take any action. A later internal report noted that 'this matter should have been notified and addressed when the concerns were [first] reported'.[75]

The foster carers took various measures to keep Orson safe, including taking him with them everywhere they went.[76]

Several months later, Orson also reported the alleged abuse to his teacher, who notified the Child Safety Service.[77] Tasmania Police was informed and interviewed both children. Orson said that Ivan had raped him on multiple occasions since the start of the placement. The police did not pursue the matter due to insufficient evidence.[78]

The Child Safety Service referred the case to their Senior Quality Practice Advisor.[79] A safety plan developed at this time stipulated that Orson and Ivan could stay in the same placement provided they were not left alone together.[80] Orson's service provider expressed concern that he 'may be at risk' under this arrangement, given that it relied heavily on the carers' ongoing ability to provide 'a very high level of supervision'.[81] A Severe Abuse and Neglect report was finalised three months later. The report recommended an evaluation 'to ensure the service is effectively meeting the identified need' and noted that the current level of caregiver supervision was not sustainable.[82] There is no record that any protective actions followed this report.

New allegations

Six months later, Orson said that Ivan had sexually abused him again when they had been left alone together for a short period.[83] On this occasion, Tasmania Police sent the file to the Director of Public Prosecutions, and Ivan was charged with one count of rape.[84] Ivan was temporarily and then permanently removed from the home following 'grave concerns' expressed by Orson's service provider that he may be returned:

> [Orson] now needs those responsible for his care to prioritise his need for safety and recovery … To place him in a position of needing to be exposed to [Ivan] in any way will diminish his ability to feel safe in his home and will further retraumatise him.[85]

What we can learn

Orson and Ivan's case highlights the importance of the following in preventing sexual abuse and supporting children to heal:

- taking a preventative approach to placement decisions where known risks exist
- taking action to alleviate risk of harmful sexual behaviours in an out of home care placement when concerns are raised
- recognising that persistent and severe harmful sexual behaviour cannot be effectively managed by carer supervision and requires specialist treatment
- responding appropriately to disclosures of harmful sexual behaviours, addressing risks to all children and ensuring carers have the capacity to carry out the response
- the need to follow through on implementing recommendations when cases have been reviewed (such as those made in a Severe Abuse and Neglect report)
- providing trauma-informed responses and prioritising the safety and healing needs of a child who has experienced sexual violence.

Case example: Linda

Early experiences in care

Linda (a pseudonym) came into care at a young age with a 'highly significant trauma history' due to chronic abuse and neglect by her parents.[86] Linda was placed in kinship care for a number of years, during which several notifications were made to the Child Safety Service about the carers' tendency to perpetuate 'trauma due to inadequate and inappropriate parenting responses'.[87] The Child Safety Service sent a letter to the family outlining these issues but assessed that the risk did 'not meet a threshold' for intervention.[88]

When Linda was in her early teens, she began to self-harm and experience suicidal ideation.[89] She was admitted to hospital several times.[90] Linda's relationship with her carers ultimately broke down and the Child Safety Service applied for guardianship of Linda until she was 18.[91] Linda was placed with a residential care provider.[92]

The alleged abuse

In her mid-teens, Linda reported she had been taking nude photos of herself and sending them to men online who had requested them. In a statement to police, she disclosed she had also sent nude photos and videos to an older teenager who had expressed specific plans to 'lure little kids home' and 'engage in sexual activities with them'.[93] The Child Safety Service developed a safety plan for Linda that included extra monitoring, noting there was 'some potential for [Linda] to engage in these activities again as monitoring adolescent behaviour online in a residential care placement is problematic'.[94]

Linda was receiving treatment for mental health issues at this time and was later referred to the Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service for further support.[95]

Sometime later, Linda attempted suicide and was admitted to hospital.[96] She said she had been regularly leaving her placement to have unprotected sex with adult men she had met on social media, in exchange for illicit substances.[97] The Child Safety Service made a referral to Tasmania Police and deemed the probability of further harm to Linda 'highly likely'.[98]

Leaving care

Soon after, the residential care provider advised the Child Safety Service they could no longer adequately care for Linda because she was not supervised overnight and could leave the facility at any time.[99] The following day, a healthcare provider told the Child Safety Service that Linda intended to run away.[100] Child Safety Service staff asked Linda's care provider to speak with her about this, and Linda 'denied' this was her intention.[101] Five days later, Linda ran away.[102]

The residential care provider expressed feeling they had received 'little' or 'no response regarding their concerned call' to police about Linda going missing, prompting a meeting between Tasmania Police, the Child Safety Service and the provider.[103] At the meeting, police first advised that this type of concern 'would not be considered a priority' and that they could not return Linda to her placement if she was unwilling to go, had not committed a crime and was not in immediate danger.[104] But upon reflection, police agreed to start looking for Linda due to 'significant concerns' for her welfare and located her.[105] The Child Safety Service referred Linda to another child welfare service 'for assessment and case work to assist in building a safety network'.[106]

What we can learn

Linda's case involved a number of missed opportunities to protect her from risks of harm. Her experience highlights the importance of:

- providing a traumatised child with a safe, supportive placement where their needs can be addressed therapeutically
- a residential care provider having the resources and capacity to protect the physical and online safety of a young person in their care
- the Child Safety Service taking a leadership role in protecting vulnerable young people at significant risk
- the need to identify probable future harm based on previous risk-taking behaviour, abuse and mental health issues
- Tasmania Police playing a role in intervening early when presented with concerns about a vulnerable young person and illegal acts occurring (including sexual abuse and providing illicit drugs to a child)—they can play a role in preventing or disrupting perpetration or holding abusers accountable.

Case example: Brett

Coming into care

Brett was taken into the care of the Child Safety Service when he was in his first year of high school in the late 2000s.[107] At the time, he had moved from interstate to live with his father in Tasmania. He told us he generally felt loved and safe with his father.[108] Brett said he and his father had been diagnosed with mental health conditions and had been having loud arguments for about two weeks when the Child Safety Service arrived at their house and took Brett into the care of the Department.[109] Brett thought it would only be for a week, but the Child Safety Service applied for a six-month order.[110]

Once in out of home care, Brett lived in several different placements, including a rostered care house where one of the other residents had recently come out of youth detention and another was openly using illicit drugs.[111] When he was taken into care, Brett told us he stopped going to school and never returned.[112]

Brett recalled being confused and upset about being taken away from his father, so he tried to run home whenever he was able.[113]

The alleged abuse

During weekend respite from his foster placement, Brett said he was sexually abused by an older boy who was also in care.[114] The older boy told Brett not to tell anyone, but eventually Brett told his foster carer.[115] Brett told us his foster carer did not believe him.[116] Brett recalled he then told his father during a visit to his family. It was Brett's father who contacted police.[117] Brett explained that he tried to provide a statement to police about the sexual abuse, but he was too emotionally overwhelmed to finish it, so no further action was taken.[118]

Brett said he has accessed his Child Safety Service file, which included a record of his allegation of abuse by the older boy. Brett told us that the file indicated:

> They didn't believe I was sincere and it was just me trying to get out of another foster home. It said there would be an investigation but I was never spoken to.[119]

After the alleged abuse

As Brett was moved around placements, he continued to try to return to his father's care, even when he was moved to the other end of the state.[120] He said his desire to return to his father's care to feel safe only increased after the alleged abuse: 'That's where I wanted to be, you know, I mean, that's where—that's where I felt safe, you know what I mean, that's where I needed to be'.[121]

He said he also often slept rough because of the care he received in his placements, stating:

> … at that time anywhere was better than the care houses, so occasionally I would just sleep on the street or occasionally I'd—occasionally I'd break into a car and just sleep in the back of it …[122]

Because he had no income, Brett turned to stealing to provide for himself and eventually decided to engage in a robbery to pay for an aeroplane ticket to the mainland.[123] He was arrested and, within six months of being taken into care, he found himself remanded at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, where Brett said he was further abused.[124] We discuss Brett's experience in Ashley Youth Detention Centre in Chapter 11.

What we can learn

Brett's experience highlights the importance of:

- the out of home care system providing a stable, safe, consistent placement—Brett found himself at greater risk on a number of levels once he entered care, leading him to stop formal education and eventually engage in criminal behaviour to try to ensure his own safety

- carers having the capacity to identify risks and believe children when they disclose child sexual abuse, and reporting such disclosures
- the Child Safety Service investigating an allegation of child sexual abuse of a child in care.

Case example: Addison[125]

My entire life … no one has ever been there to protect me.[126]

Coming into care

Before 2000, the mother of Addison (a pseudonym) was raised in out of home care and sexually abused in one of her foster homes.[127] To her great distress, her children's experiences mirrored her own: Addison and her siblings were exposed to family violence, neglect and emotional abuse from a young age, and were ultimately taken into out of home care in the mid-2010s. Addison had also been sexually abused by a family member.[128]

The alleged abuse

Addison's experiences of sexual abuse did not end once she entered care. In one foster home she was abused by a 'foster uncle'.[129] In another, the abuse was perpetrated by her foster parents, Vanessa (a pseudonym) and Edmund (a pseudonym), and it was this abuse that most affected her.[130] Before this placement, Addison was never taught about personal hygiene and did not know she could shower alone. Addison told us Vanessa and Edmund exploited this lack of knowledge to abuse Addison, 'touching' her and eventually raping her in the shower, describing this as 'cleaning [her] insides'.[131] Addison was unaware that this was not normal: 'I was 12, I really didn't know what that meant, I didn't know that [Edmund] was having sex with me'.[132] The abuse continued for more than two years. Addison recalled that Vanessa also regularly physically abused her.

Addison said she also experienced neglect and suffered the trauma of witnessing other children being sexually and physically abused in foster homes and 'not knowing what to do'.[133]

The response

Addison tried to get help. She said she disclosed the abuse to a teacher at her school who immediately confronted Vanessa. This resulted in more severe physical punishments from Vanessa, 'sometimes using knives'.[134] Addison remembered also telling Department case workers of the abuse but said, time and time again, she was not believed: 'They didn't do anything about it'.[135] She said one case worker witnessed her being physically abused by Vanessa but chose to ignore it. It was not until Addison and her sister 'weren't taking no for an answer' that they were finally moved to other foster homes.[136]

When Addison said she was being abused by her 'foster uncle', Department staff told her to not worry about it because the abuser was already being investigated for another matter.[137] Addison felt her concerns were not heard. She told us she felt the response of police was similarly dismissive; Addison reported the abuse two years ago but heard nothing afterwards. She told us that she believed these institutions were uninterested in taking action because she had a history of mental health problems and her family was well known to the Department 'for all the wrong reasons'.[138] Addison feared for her younger siblings who were still under the guardianship of the Department: 'It's like they're blatantly ignoring us'.[139]

Journey in out of home care

The alleged abuse drastically affected Addison's subsequent experiences in care. Finally, presented with a 'good, loving family', Addison recalled that she could not regulate her behaviours and the placement broke down.[140] Addison remembered being moved to a group home where she felt her suicidal ideation was not managed in a trauma-informed way. For instance, Addison recalled that carers insisted on checking on her while she was showering, despite her abuse history and her requests for this not to occur. She said 'it wasn't until I didn't just put myself but other people at risk' that this ended.[141]

At 17, Addison said she was 'thrown into the world' by the Department without support or life skills for living independently.[142] She continued to struggle with mental health issues and developed an addiction to alcohol as a result.

> Everything that has happened has deteriorated my mental health to the point where it's a struggle just being alive … [The age of] Ten is the first time I can remember trying to take my own life.[143]

Reflecting on the impact of the abuse and the lack of support afterwards, Addison noted that her worries were not those of a typical teenager. She emphasised that her life could have been different and much of the abuse prevented had someone listened to and supported her:

> My worry should be college … I didn't want my life to end up at this point, but due to everything and the fact that I never got any support, I ended up here with fears that someone much older should have … As soon as someone reports, do something … You don't know how long that has been going on, or what point it can get to … People need to start taking kids seriously.[144]

What we can learn

Addison's case demonstrates the importance of:

- preventative education to help children to identify what is normal behaviour and what is abuse
- Department staff listening to, believing and acting on disclosures of child sexual abuse and physical abuse
- recognising the increased risk of subsequent abuse (even by other offenders) once sexual abuse has occurred
- understanding the risks of an 'informal' approach, such as speaking to the foster carers and not making an appropriate report
- providing adequate mental health support after disclosures of child sexual abuse where psychological difficulties are a factor
- ensuring carers have the resources and capacity to manage children's behaviours in the context of a history of trauma
- supporting care leavers, ensuring they are prepared for living independently, particularly given a trauma history (contributed to through child sexual abuse while in care)
- police ensuring they follow up with a person reporting child sexual abuse.

3.2 Evidence from those with inside knowledge

We received numerous submissions about problems with the out of home care system from people who have worked in the Department or with non-government service providers. They expressed strikingly similar concerns about how the Department has structured, funded and operated out of home care in Tasmania. Many of these former employees had also worked in child protection interstate or overseas, allowing them to compare Tasmania's out of home care system with systems elsewhere.

Most of the former employees, or those who had previous contact with the Department, who contacted us were willing to make a formal statement to our Inquiry, and some provided evidence at our hearings. However, a number expressed concern about the possibility of experiencing negative consequences from the Department for expressing critical views, including impacting any future engagement with the Department.[145]

One former senior employee described the Department as follows:

> My sense is that the [out of home care] system is at best dysfunctional. It can also be an abusive system, capable of causing harm and trauma in its own right. Situated in the broader child safety system, it is perceived by many within the sector as a closed, defensive system, its approach crisis-driven and reactive. It is extremely difficult for those outside of the Department to gain information on how [the Child Safety Service] and [the out of home care service] operate or even its structure. I found there existed a culture of distrust by many children and young people, carers and its own workers towards the Department.[146]

3.3 Evidence from the Department

Publicly available information about the out of home care system and its measures to reduce and respond to child sexual abuse within out of home care has lacked detail. In keeping with our approach to all the institutions we inquired into, we relied heavily on the former Secretary of the Department of Communities, Michael Pervan, to speak about the Department's operations. We also heard from the Executive Director of Children and Family Services, Claire Lovell, to assist our understanding of day-to-day decision making. Other members of the Department Executive, such as former Deputy Secretary for Children, Youth and Families, Mandy Clarke, were not asked by our Commission of Inquiry, nor offered by the State, to give evidence in relation to out of home care.

Despite the evidence we received about the evolution of the Department and areas that were under review, we remained unclear about key aspects of the Department's functioning in the present. We drew on Secretary Pervan's and Ms Lovell's evidence as well as material from the Department's Practice Manual, which guided staff practices and decision making relevant to out of home care. We outline our best understanding of the system in Chapter 7.

The challenges we confronted reflect the assertion of the former departmental employee quoted above—it is extremely difficult for those outside the Department to understand how the out of home care system is structured or operates.[147] We further observed difficulties among those inside the Department to explain the system's structures and operations.

4 The scale and nature of child sexual abuse in out of home care

There is little published information about the scale and nature of child sexual abuse in out of home care in Tasmania.

It is difficult to quantify the incidence of child sexual abuse in out of home care because such abuse appears to be under-reported.[148] The best publicly available data is produced by the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, which reports annually on the safety of Australian children in out of home care. Nationally, in 2020–21, 20.6 per cent of substantiated notifications of abuse or neglect of children in care related to child sexual abuse.[149]

Data on the Victorian Reportable Conduct Scheme published by that state's Commission for Children and Young People indicated that, in 2020–21, 1,877 allegations of misconduct were made across all sectors that involved working with children (including out of home care), 396 (or 21 per cent) related to 'sexual misconduct' and 137 (or 7 per cent) related to 'sexual offences'.[150] In 2020–21, there were 49 allegations of sexual misconduct and 32 allegations of sexual offences in the out of home care sector.[151] 'Physical violence' and 'significant neglect of a child' were reported more than any other type of abuse in out of home care in the same period.[152]

The 2014 final report of the Tasmanian Claims of Abuse in State Care Program provided some data about sexual abuse of children in care. This program operated in Tasmania from 2004 to 2013.[153] Of a total of 541 claimants between 2011 and 2013, 394 were assessed as having experienced abuse (not limited to sexual abuse) while in care, and therefore, eligible for an ex gratia payment.[154] Two hundred 'accepted' claims of sexual abuse while in care were made by 167 claimants (98 male and 69 female), which accounted for 21.4 per cent of overall accepted claims.[155] Foster care was the setting of 128 (or 26.6 per cent) of all claims, although the period and nature of the abuse were not reported.[156] Chapter 12 contains our recommendations about the Tasmanian Government's response to allegations against out of home care staff and carers identified in the Tasmanian Claims of Abuse in State Care Program.

4.1 Risk notifications of child sexual abuse in out of home care

To help us get a comprehensive picture of the risk of child sexual abuse in care during the period of our Inquiry, we asked the Department to provide the following information:

- the number of children in out of home care who had risk notifications raised about possible sexual abuse while in care
- information on complaints, investigations or disciplinary action in relation to any allegations or incidents of sexual abuse that related to children in out of home care
- the number of departmental staff who had been stood down (had their employment suspended) over allegations against them in relation to sexual abuse of children in the out of home care system.[157]

In each case, we asked the Department to indicate, where records provided such information, what the Department's response had been and the outcome of the concern or allegation. This information is discussed below.

Terminology regarding 'concerns'

The Department uses several different terms relating to concerns about the sexual abuse of children in care. Some are used in a general sense, but others have a specific meaning in the context of out of home care. The following definitions explain how we use these terms in this volume.

Allegation or concern—we use these terms interchangeably to describe the situation where the Department has been made aware that a child in care may have been, or was at risk of being, sexually abused.

Care concern—a field in the Child Protection Information System that staff can select when recording an allegation or concern about a child in care being abused or neglected (refer to Chapter 9 for more about the care concern process).[158]

Notification or risk notification—a field in the Child Protection Information System that a Child Safety Officer can select when recording an allegation or concern about a child who may or may not already be in care.[159]

Incident—a field in the Child Protection Information System that a Child Safety Officer can select when recording an allegation or concern about a child, who may or may not already be in care.[160]

Investigation—in the context of the sexual abuse of children in care, we use this term primarily to refer to the care concern process applicable to serious or severe allegations of abuse or neglect. The Department sometimes uses the term as part of its response to a notification. We make it clear if the term is being used in this way.

Assessment—following a risk notification or an incident, the Child Safety Service uses this term to describe the process of seeking information about the risk to a child who may or may not already be in care.[161]

Initially, the Department provided a list of 439 instances where children in out of home care were the subject of a risk notification relating to child sexual abuse between 1 July 2013 and 30 June 2021.[162] These risk notifications included concerns about children with harmful sexual behaviours. We understand the data was obtained from a broad search of the Child Protection Information System. It included a search of the system's records of all children under a care and protection order or in out of home care and where the record mentioned the word 'sexual' in an 'abuse type' field or in the abuse type field of the person believed responsible.[163] We understand this data reflects the number of concerns raised in relation to sexual abuse of children in out of home care—not the actual incidence of child sexual abuse in out of home care.

The Department reported the following information for each instance:

- the date of the notification
- the child's date of birth
- the child's age at the time of the notification
- the child's gender
- the child's Aboriginal status
- whether or not the child was identified as having disability
- the child's postcode at the time of the alleged incident
- the date of the alleged incident
- the alleged abuser's relationship to the child (for example, 'Carer: Foster or Parents')
- the alleged abuser's gender, date of birth, whether or not they were identified as having a disability, and their Aboriginal status.

The Department cautioned that its dataset was missing some information and the incidence of concerns about sexual abuse for children in care may be under-reported.[164] The Department also noted some limitations in the process of extracting this data from its Child Protection Information System, which may have adversely affected the quality of the data. In particular:

- The term 'care concern' was used as a search term but had not been consistently recorded by users when entering a risk notification into the system—a 'care concern' is a risk notification that a child in care is not being properly cared for and includes possible abuse or neglect of a child by a carer or someone associated with the household.
- The system allowed only one alleged person believed responsible to be recorded per incident, resulting in an undercounting of those believed responsible.
- The person believed responsible for many risk notifications was not recorded because the risk notification did not progress to assessment.[165]

4.1.1 Our analysis

Our analysis of the 439 risk notifications revealed the following:

- The risk notifications related to 299 children. Most children (68.6 per cent) were the subject of only one risk notification, but in a substantial number of cases (31.4 per cent), two or more risk notifications were made in relation to the same child.

In one case, the Department had recorded eight separate instances of alleged abuse of the same female child.

- Numbers of risk notifications per year ranged from 35 to 81, with an average of 50, which equates to about one risk notification of possible sexual abuse against a child in care per week.
- While the ratio of female to male children in out of home care is about equal, 65.8 per cent of risk notifications were about the possible sexual abuse of a girl in care.[166]
- While 21 per cent of children in out of home care were identified as having disability, 27.3 per cent of risk notifications were about the possible sexual abuse of a child with disability.[167]
- Of children in out of home care, 37.4 per cent were identified as Aboriginal, although it is likely that the Aboriginal status of a child was not always accurately recorded (refer to Chapter 9). Just over one-quarter (27.8 per cent) of risk notifications concerned the possible sexual abuse of an Aboriginal child.[168]
- The relationship of most people believed responsible (64.5 per cent) to the child concerned was recorded as 'not stated', although in some cases a deeper reading of the material identified the relationship.
- Of the alleged abusers whose relationship with the child was stated:
    - 17.1 per cent were adults in the role of a foster, kinship or residential carer
    - 16.2 per cent were identified as a parent or relative of the child
    - 2.3 per cent were identified as other children in care.

The low proportion of alleged abuse from other children contrasts with expert evidence indicating that children in out of home care are more likely to experience sexual harm from other children, rather than an adult carer.[169] It is possible this type of abuse is significantly under-reported or poorly recorded due to a lack of guidance to standardise identification and response (refer to Chapter 9). It is also possible some of the alleged abusers whose connection with the child was not recorded were other children or adults outside the care or family system who were engaged in child sexual exploitation.

Disputed figures

Secretary Pervan and Ms Lovell raised concerns about our analysis of the frequency of child sexual abuse risk notifications in out of home care.[170]

Ms Lovell told us the Department handled only 'small numbers' of care concerns—for instance, in 2021–22, she said the Department recorded 172 care concerns for children in care, which covered a broad range of concerns.[171] Ms Lovell warned that these figures should be 'interpreted with caution' due to 'inconsistent recording practices'.[172] It is not clear whether the inconsistent recording practices were perceived to have inflated or under-estimated the actual extent of suspected child sexual abuse in care. Secretary Pervan explained that a manual review by Practice Managers identified that, in the 2020–21 year, 24 of the care concerns related to the possible sexual abuse of a child in care, nine of which were substantiated.[173] And for the partial year from July 2021 to March 2022, Secretary Pervan stated there had been 13 notifications about the possible sexual abuse of children in care, five of which were substantiated.[174]

We understand that the data originally provided by the Department related to risk notifications in out of home care and not only those allegations categorised as care concerns in the Child Protection Information System. Ms Lovell explained that allegations that relate to carers, including in relation to child sexual abuse, are treated as care concerns. In contrast, allegations about abuse of children in care by people who are not carers are responded to using the standard 'Child Safety assessment'.[175] Therefore, we suspect the differences in figures have most likely arisen from the terms or categories used when recording concerns about children in care and during searches of the Department's databases.

Secretary Pervan was concerned our Inquiry had misinterpreted the initial data the Department had provided to us, and had consequently overestimated the number of children who had been sexually abused in care.[176] He said:

> … it would seem that numbers relating to potential child sexual abuse in multiple contexts were reported by Counsel Assisting [during the out of home care hearing] as being the number of incidents of child sexual abuse in out of home care.[177]

We have considered Secretary Pervan's concerns and conclude that our analysis of the data is sound for the following reasons.

Counsel Assisting used the term '439 allegations' each time she referred to these numbers.[178] In doing so, Counsel Assisting was pointing out that the Department was alerted to the possibility of sexual abuse of a child in care at the frequency of about one allegation per week, rather than one substantiated incident each week.[179] Each of those 439 allegations required a response from the Department, even if in the end they were not all substantiated. Failure to substantiate an allegation does not necessarily mean the alleged incident did not occur, but could mean that evidence was not sufficient to substantiate it or investigate it further.

As noted above, when the Department provided the original data on allegations, it cautioned that its dataset was missing some information due to limitations in its process for extracting data from the Child Protection Information System, and therefore, may under-report the true incidence of sexual abuse for children in care.[180]

As described in Section 4.1.2, we sampled 22 children's cases, which involved 55 allegations from the 439 allegations provided (12.5 per cent of the allegations reported). The sample was deliberately selected to illustrate a diversity of child sexual abuse risks and characteristics of children in care in Tasmania.[181] If the dataset contained irrelevant or false inclusions, we would have expected to see this reflected in our sample, but we did not. All 22 cases contained allegations of sexual abuse or concerns about the risk of sexual abuse for a child in care. We agree with Secretary Pervan's subsequent decision to address problems in recording child sexual abuse by widening the scope of the type of concerns recorded as a notification on the Child Protection Information System to include:

- generating notifications for observations of behaviour that may indicate abuse that would previously have been embedded in case notes and incident reports
- raising separate notifications for any children who have been exposed to a person believed responsible, even when the allegation does not relate directly to those children
- maintaining a very low bar for substantiation not linked to the evidentiary threshold used by police or courts, which we take to be the balance of probabilities
- substantiating for children who were at risk of abuse, or even future abuse, due to being exposed to an unsafe person
- initiating new notifications and new assessments if the first assessment is called into question after receiving new information or a review.[182]

We consider that this broader view of child sexual abuse more accurately reflects contemporary understanding of the variety and complexity of risk concerns involving the sexual abuse of children in care.

Secretary Pervan was conscious that making these changes would increase the data on concerns about the sexual abuse of children in care:

> Although the intentions of these changes is to improve safety for children, it will result in data indicating a higher number of notifications and substantiations. This may be misinterpreted as more children being at risk, or having experienced child sexual abuse.
>
> Unintended consequences can include [an] incorrect narrative being published and discussed publicly, stigmatisation of children in out of home care and difficulty in recruiting staff and carers to a service which is viewed negatively.[183]

In our view, broadening the data collected to include all risks of sexual abuse would improve safety for children in care by revealing a more accurate picture of concerns. Reputational issues may be managed by ensuring the public narrative is correctly informed of the reason behind the change in data collection—to improve the safety and wellbeing of children in care.

4.1.2 Detailed analysis of 22 cases

To better understand the nature of the 439 allegations and the Government's responses to them, we selected 20 children from the 299 children who were the subject of a concern about sexual abuse while in out of home care. Some of these were recorded as care concerns on the Child Protection Information System; others were recorded as notifications and some as incidents.[184]

The 20 children were selected to ensure our analysis included the experiences of children with a range of genders, Aboriginal status, disability status, geographical area, relationship of the alleged abuser to the child, and age of the child at the time of notification. We added the files of the two children who had the highest number of reported risk notifications—six and eight risk notifications respectively. The files we included were for children who were in care during the period from 2013 to 2021.

The Department provided 592 documents from the 22 children's files relevant to the concerns, including notification records of care concerns, placement summaries, file notes of telephone conversations, emails, correspondence between departmental staff and carers or specialist therapy providers, Tasmania Police referrals, minutes of care team meetings, 'investigation of serious abuse and neglect' reports and file notes of home visits. We did not examine the child's whole file. The Department produced a cover sheet for each child's file that summarised the risk notifications identified and the Department's process for selecting documents from the child's file.

A review of the files revealed the following:

- All the children in the sample were either known, or strongly suspected, to have a history of sexual abuse before coming into the Department's care. This is consistent with the known increased risk of sexual abuse for children in out of home care when they already have that history.[185]
- Multiple risk notifications of abuse or neglect in relation to a child in care was the norm in our sample. Across the 22 files reviewed, there were 55 risk notifications and most cases involved risk notifications of more than one form of child sexual abuse while in out of home care. The most common presentation was a combination of risk notifications relating to harmful sexual behaviours and abuse by an adult, or adults, whether a carer or a person outside the care environment.
- Risk notifications about harmful sexual behaviours were common. Eleven children were alleged to have either engaged in harmful sexual behaviours themselves, or experienced such behaviour from another child or children in care. Most of these children were alleged to have engaged in multiple instances of harmful sexual behaviours and/or been subject to more than one incident.
- Risk notifications about child sexual exploitation were represented. Four children in the sample were alleged to have been groomed or sexually exploited by multiple adults outside the care or family system, although some of the 'persons believed responsible' were recorded in the initial dataset as 'unstated'. All four of these children were female and three had a known intellectual disability. One of the risk notifications involved producing online child exploitation material and attempts to enlist the child to recruit other, very young children to be similarly exploited.
- Risk notifications of abuse by carers or residential care workers were also common. The files of 11 children contained risk notifications about a current or previous foster, residential or kinship carer.
- Sometimes risk notifications were recorded for a child when there was concern about possible exposure to risk, rather than a direct allegation. Three of the children had a risk notification recorded as a result of alleged sexual abuse of a sibling or another child in the same placement, but no allegation had been made a that time about the child in question.
- Children in out of home care were at risk of sexual abuse from a variety of sources. One risk notification involved a teacher allegedly grooming a child in care, another involved boundary breaches by a departmental employee, four risk notifications related to biological family members sexually abusing or grooming children during visitation, and one involved the alleged sexual assault of a girl by her same-aged boyfriend.

- The rate of criminal conviction was low. Of the 55 risk notifications recorded in the files, only two risk notifications were recorded as resulting in a criminal conviction. While police were involved in investigating many of the risk notifications and took statements, it was common for matters not to proceed to charges because the child did not want to give evidence.

These themes are similar to those identified by the National Royal Commission. They also reflect anecdotal evidence we heard at our targeted consultation with out of home care providers.

The Department's responses

Some aspects of the Department's responses to risk notifications of sexual abuse concerning children in out of home care appeared reasonable. Although it was not always clear what care concern process was followed (refer to Chapter 9 for more about care concern processes), overall there was evidence that departmental and out of home care staff undertook some form of investigation or assessment of each concern.

Positively, there was consistent evidence across the files that Tasmania Police were involved in investigating risk notifications of sexual abuse of children in out of home care. This evidence included formal referrals to and from police, and ongoing liaison about risk notifications in emails and file notes.

While there was evidence of some departmental staff and police describing children who were allegedly being sexually exploited outside the placement as engaging in 'risk taking behaviours', the Department and non-government out of home care providers appeared to regularly approach Tasmania Police for support with these concerns.[186] In addition to trying to educate the children involved about self-protective behaviours, staff had documented some proactive attempts to intervene, such as taking out a restraining order against an alleged abuser, police attending premises to retrieve a child, and staying in contact with the child.[187] We discuss the Department's response to child sexual exploitation in Chapter 9.

System and practice failures

The file reviews also revealed system and practice failures that may have adversely affected the Department's capacity to predict an increased risk of sexual abuse for a child in out of home care and therefore, to act protectively. These included the following:

- We observed inconsistent recording of Aboriginal status between documents within children's records, leading to uncertainty about a child's Aboriginal status. Without clarity of Aboriginal status, it would be difficult to know if cultural support was needed for a child.

- For those children who were identified as Aboriginal, we saw limited evidence in the records of the presence of cultural support plans or engagement in cultural support activities. Refer to Chapter 9 for a discussion of the need for cultural engagement for Aboriginal children in care and its centrality in protecting children from sexual abuse and facilitating disclosure.
- It was difficult to identify children with disability unless we read each file note in detail and again, this information was recorded inconsistently. Rarely did a child's disability feature as a vulnerability factor in the risk assessment section of a notification or assessment record. Our impression was that it would be difficult for staff accessing these records to identify the nature of the child's disability (and consequently, the support they might need) and to consider that information when assessing risk to a child, specifically in relation to the risk of child sexual abuse. In Chapter 9, we outline the importance of a clear understanding of each child's individual needs, including their disability support needs, to acting protectively.
- The review identified very few case and care plans among the documents provided. It is possible these documents were omitted during the Department's process of compiling the files for us. However, the absence of these plans is also consistent with concerns raised by witnesses such as Andrea Sturges from Kennerley Children's Services, who reported that less than 5 per cent of the 105 children in Kennerley's care had current case and care plans.[188] (Refer to Chapter 9 for a discussion of care plans.)
- The notes made by departmental staff often referred to following the 'care concern process', but it was not always clear which process was being followed: the 'quality of care concern' process or the more serious 'investigation of serious abuse and neglect' process. On occasion, notes referred to risk notifications being managed through other processes such as 'case consultation' or an 'incident response review' or a matter being 'handled in Assessment'. This use of different and unclear language made it difficult to assess what had occurred. We examine the care concern process in Chapter 9.
- The risk assessment section of the notification record was frequently not updated with current information to support the risk assessment and decision made, and often appeared to have been cut and pasted from previous notification records. In one instance, the risk assessment section content referred to the child being seven years of age and living with her parents, when she was in fact aged 17 and living in a residential care setting, and had been in care since she was seven.
- Staff regularly used the term 'self-selected' in their notes to describe why children and young people in care were not living in their placement. This confirmed concerns raised by others who work regularly with the Department of a pervasive practice among departmental staff of deferring responsibility to children to decide where they live rather than viewing them as missing from placement (refer to Chapter 9). This is particularly concerning in light of the National Royal Commission's observations on groomed compliance of children experiencing sexual exploitation.

Harmful sexual behaviours

In relation to risk notifications about harmful sexual behaviours between children in out of home care, we observed the following from the files:

- The nature of alleged harmful sexual behaviours ranged from developmentally inappropriate to coercive or violent sexual behaviours (refer to Chapter 21 for more on the continuum of harmful sexual behaviours).
- Positively, there was strong evidence of departmental staff appropriately referring children involved in alleged incidents to specialist support and intervention agencies, such as the Australian Childhood Foundation, Laurel House or the Sexual Assault Support Service.
- All children who were believed to have displayed or been subject to harmful sexual behaviours, were known to have been involved in sexualised or harmful sexual behaviours before being moved to the placement where the alleged incidents took place. We were concerned the Department may not have sufficiently considered the known risk factor of a history of harmful sexual behaviours when making placement decisions.
- 'Adult supervision' was a strategy departmental staff relied on regularly to manage the risk of harmful sexual behaviours between children in out of home care. We are concerned this approach is not practically achievable in a home or residential care setting (refer to Chapter 9 for a discussion of managing harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care).
- There was no evidence that departmental staff referred to any harmful sexual behaviours framework or policy documents when assessing and managing the risk of harmful sexual behaviours for a child.
- The Department's response to alleged incidents of harmful sexual behaviours was varied—in some instances, the Department immediately removed one of the children involved from the placement, and in others, it left the children in the placement with increased supervision from the carers. It was not apparent that the different responses were determined by the nature of the behaviour.
- Many of the children involved in an incident of harmful sexual behaviour had an intellectual disability. There was evidence on the files that when the child who displayed the harmful sexual behaviour had an intellectual disability, some departmental staff downplayed the impact of the behaviour on the other child.

4.2 The Department's response to incidents and allegations

We asked the Department to provide information about 'complaints made, or investigations, or disciplinary action' in response to any allegations or incidents of child sexual abuse in out of home care, from 1 January 2000 to 9 March 2022. We asked for:

- the names of the person reporting the incident, the alleged victim-survivor and the alleged abuser
- the dates of the alleged incident and when the allegation was raised
- a summary of the allegation
- who in the Department was involved in responding to the allegation or incident
- any actions taken by the Department such as reporting the incident to police or regulatory agencies
- the outcome of the allegation.[189]

We expected some overlap between the data already provided for 2013 to 2021, but this request differed from the initial data request in that we were asking primarily about the alleged abusers and the Department's response to them. The data the Department provided reflected this focus. It drew from the Children's Advice and Referral Line Digital Interface, the Child Protection Information System (from 2008 onwards), a manual review of documents produced for the Joint Review Team (a recent cross-jurisdictional document review led by Tasmania Police; refer to Chapter 16) and the Abuse in State Care Support Service (refer to Chapter 11). We understand the search of the documents focused on alleged abusers (the Department records these as 'persons believed responsible') and the Department's response to alleged abusers.

The Department told us minimal information was recorded for cases before the Child Protection Information System was introduced in 2008, and staff have only recently begun recording the persons believed responsible more consistently in the database.[190] The Department acknowledged a limitation of its data system for this purpose is that it is naturally 'child-centric', which means that relatively little information about other people in a child's life is captured on the child's record.[191]

Given this context, we expect the records the Department provided to us are not comprehensive in identifying those believed responsible for abuse in out of home care and that the data extracted underestimates the number of allegations of sexual abuse in out of home care.

Consequently, the Department listed 284 allegations, considerably fewer than the 439 instances they identified when the focus was on children's records rather than persons believed responsible.[192]

Acknowledging the data limitations, we reviewed this second list to understand how the Department responded to alleged sexual abuse of a child in care by an adult. After removing allegations of harmful sexual behaviours, we focused on 106 allegations concerning adults believed responsible and observed that:

- most allegations were against foster or kinship carers, or an associate of the carers
- very few allegations related to child sexual exploitation
- allegations were recorded for 72 different persons believed responsible
- concerningly, very few outcomes and actions resulting from the allegations were provided
- eighteen of the persons believed responsible had multiple allegations against them
- the care concern process was reported as having been initiated in 25–30 per cent of cases
- police referrals were recorded in about 40 per cent of cases.[193]

4.3 Staff suspensions and terminations following allegations of abuse

The Department has provided us with a list of suspensions between January 2000 and 2023 in relation to out of home care—this includes reference to four suspensions.[194] We received information from Secretary Pervan about one other suspension that was not included in the Department's list.[195] The four cases about which we received information from the Department are described in deidentified form below.

4.3.1 Suspension 1

In the late 2000s, a male child protection worker was suspended for alleged breaches of sections 9(2) and (14) of the State Service Act 2000. It was alleged he had sent 'inappropriate texts' to one of the teenagers he was case-managing and to a 'vulnerable young woman' over the age of 18. The terms of his suspension are unknown, but an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation determined he had breached sections 9(1), (3) and (14) of the Act. The Department referred the matter to Tasmania Police, but no charges were laid. The man's employment was terminated.[196]

The Department could not identify the date it was notified of the allegations attached to this suspension. The Department's records indicated two dates of suspension, six months apart. The Department therefore, could not say how long it had taken to suspend the employee after receiving the allegations. The man's employment was terminated five months after the Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation started.[197]

We received additional information that the man had been accused of sending inappropriate or sexualised texts to other children in care during his employment with the Department. The Department had conducted two previous Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigations, but it was not clear if the employee was suspended during these investigations. In these instances, the Department had issued 'lawful and reasonable directives' to desist after conducting investigations.[198]

4.3.2 Suspension 2

In the early 2000s, the Department became aware of allegations about a male departmental employee who worked as a carer. The allegations were that he was 'having a sexual relationship with a [child aged less than 18 years] under the guardianship of the Secretary'. Tasmania Police charged him with sexual abuse charges, including four counts of 'sexual intercourse with a young person'. According to the Department, 'at least 166 days' elapsed between the date police charged the man—when the Department became aware of the allegations—and the date he was suspended. The Department did not provide an explanation for the delay in suspending the man, nor did it describe the terms of his suspension or the outcome of the matter.[199]

4.3.3 Suspension 3

A long-serving male Child Safety Officer was suspended after the start of our Commission of Inquiry. The Department instigated an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation in relation to a longstanding pattern of boundary breaches involving children in the care of the Department. It was alleged the employee accessed the files of children in out of home care who were no longer under his management, interviewed children under his management at his home, and transported children in care in his personal vehicle. The Department advised that he had been given 'lawful and reasonable directives' and reminder letters of these directives, but his behaviour continued.[200] At the time of writing, we are unaware of the outcome of this matter.

4.3.4 Suspension 4

A male support worker employed by the Department was stood down after the start of our Commission of Inquiry. The Department instigated an Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct investigation into alleged unsafe practices by this worker, namely transporting children in care in an unsafe manner. The Department acknowledged it was aware of other concerns about the worker over a longer period, which had not resulted in an investigation. These concerns were:

- the worker being charged in the early 2000s with possession of child exploitation material that did not proceed to a conviction

- a conflict of interest arising from a personal relationship with a foster carer
- taking longer than was necessary to transport children in care, raising concerns about his activities with those children
- the negative response of a child in care to being transported by the worker.[201]

The Department advised us it had notified the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme of these concerns. Subsequently we received documentation indicating that the worker's registration to work with vulnerable people had been cancelled.[202]

These four cases constitute very few staff being suspended or terminated over more than 20 years. Because of poor record keeping, it is difficult to determine whether there has been more disciplinary action than that reported to us, or whether the Department has been slow to take action against staff for concerning behaviour.

5 Overview of systemic problems

Through our review of the information received by us—from children in care, case file reviews, from those working within and with the out of home care system, previous reviews and inquiries, and the documents and policies we have reviewed—we have identified a number of systemic problems with Tasmania's out of home care system that should be addressed to better protect children in care from the risks of child sexual abuse, and improve the response when abuse does occur. We elaborate on these problems in more detail in Chapter 9, where we discuss our reasoning for our recommendations for the way forward. However, in summary, these problems include:

- challenges in adopting measures to prevent child sexual abuse, including ensuring appropriate placements of children
- difficulties consistently putting in place risk mitigation strategies when risks are identified, such as providing early treatment for serious and concerning harmful sexual behaviours
- not consistently addressing the trauma children have experienced before or during their out of home care experience, increasing their risk of child sexual abuse or reducing their confidence in disclosing such abuse
- not consistently addressing the cultural needs of Aboriginal children, increasing their risk of child sexual abuse or reducing their confidence in disclosing such abuse
- insufficient supports for staff and carers to manage risks of child sexual abuse, or respond appropriately when it occurs

- inconsistent and uneven responses when children disclose child sexual abuse while in care.

We consider that these problems are, at least partially, a result of a system under pressure. They need to be addressed through changes to the systems and processes of out of home care generally, rather than tweaks to the system. In Chapter 9, we consider in detail various aspects of the out of home care system, and explain our recommendations for keeping children in care safe and for improving departmental responses to child sexual abuse.

Notes

1 For example, we heard that some professionals in the community experience 'pushback' from the Advice and Referral Line (Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1189 [38]–1191 [22]) and that the Advice and Referral Line was understaffed, poorly administered and characterised by inconsistent timeframes in responding to child safety concerns (Statement of Jack Davenport, 3 June 2022, 4 [30]). We also heard that the Child Safety Service took a 'very binary view' of decision making, whereby children were either left with their family or removed and placed under statutory orders (Statement of Andrea Sturges, 16 June 2022, 19 [73]).

2 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Summary', Child Protection Australia 1999–00 (Web Page, 10 May 2001) 2, 39 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-1999-00/contents/summary>; Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Table 5.1. Children in out of home care, by state or territory 30 June 2021', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/contents/out-of-home-care/how-many-children-were-in-out-of-home-care>.

3 Children 14 years of age and under: refer to Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Demographics and Education', Tasmania 2001 Census All Persons QuickStats (Web Page, 7 August 2001) <https://www.abs.gov.au/census/find-census-data/quickstats/2001/6>; Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'People and Population', Tasmania 2021 Census All persons QuickStats (Web Page, 2021) <https://www.abs.gov.au/census/find-census-data/quickstats/2021/6>.

4 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2020–21', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table S5.5 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2020-21/data>.

5 Transcript of Robyn Miller, 14 June 2022, 1253 [5–33]; Transcript of Jack Davenport, 15 June 2022, 1371 [5–15]; Transcript of Jodie Stokes, 15 June 2022, 1295 [40]–1296 [29]; Transcript of Heather Sculthorpe, 15 June 2022, 1303 [3–19]; Transcript of Catia Malvaso, 3 May 2022, 173 [10–24]; Transcript of Helen Milroy, 4 May 2022, 237 [37–43].

6 Transcript of Anne Hollonds, 2 May 2022, 58 [3–5]; Transcript of Brett McDermott, 3 May 2022, 170 [24–28], 170 [43]–171 [1], 177 [11–15]; Transcript of Sally Robinson, 4 May 2022, 251 [23–26], 262 [11–16]; Transcript of Ignatius Kim, 9 May 2022, 682 [32–33]; Transcript of Timothy Bullard, 12 May 2022, 988 [27–32]; Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1192 [9–19]; Transcript of Muriel Bamblett, 15 June 2022, 1332 [7–12]; Transcript of Elena Campbell, 7 July 2022, 2566 [26–41]; Transcript of Alison Grace, 26 August 2022, 3478 [26–35]; Transcript of Cathy Taylor, 12 September 2022, 3915 [6–18].

7 Refer generally to Olivia Octoman et al, 'Tailoring Service and System Design for Families Known to Child Protection: A Rapid Exploratory Analysis of the Characteristics of Families' (2022) 31(5) Child Abuse Review; Olivia Octoman et al, 'Subsequent Child Protection Contact for a Cohort of Children Reported to Child Protection Prenatally in One Australian Jurisdiction' (2023) 32(1) Child Abuse Review; Miriam Jennifer Maclean, Scott Anthony Sims and Melissa O'Donnell, 'Role of Pre-existing Adversity and Child Maltreatment on Mental Health Outcomes for Children Involved in Child Protection: Population-based Data Linkage Study' (2019) 9(7) BMJ Open; Jason M Armfield et al, 'Intergenerational Transmission of Child Maltreatment in South Australia, 1986–2017: A Retrospective Cohort Study' (2021) 6(7) Lancet Public Health.

8 Refer to Jenna Meiksans et al, 'Risk Factors Identified in Prenatal Child Protection Reports' (2021) 122 Children and Youth Services Review; Sarah Louise Cox et al, 'Opportunities to Strengthen Child Abuse Prevention Service Systems: A Jurisdictional Assessment of Child Welfare Interventions', Journal for the Society for Social Work and Research (forthcoming).

9 Leah Bromfield et al, Issues for the Safety and Wellbeing of Children in Families with Multiple and Complex Problems: The Co-occurrence of Domestic Violence, Parental Substance Misuse, and Mental Health Problems (NCPC Issues No 33, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2020) 1.

10 Australian Child Maltreatment Study, Queensland University of Technology, The Prevalence and Impact of Child Maltreatment in Australia: Findings from the Australian Child Maltreatment Study: Brief Report (Report, 2023) 14.

11 Australian Child Maltreatment Study, Queensland University of Technology, The Prevalence and Impact of Child Maltreatment in Australia: Findings from the Australian Child Maltreatment Study: Brief Report (Report, 2023) 3.

12 Australian Child Maltreatment Study, Queensland University of Technology, The Prevalence and Impact of Child Maltreatment in Australia: Findings from the Australian Child Maltreatment Study: Brief Report (Report, 2023) 24–27.

13 For example, Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1443 [21–23]; Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1173 [33–45]; Anonymous session, 29 October 2022. The name 'Faye' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 14 June 2022.

14 This was a sample of a much larger cohort of children identified by the Department; refer to Section 4.1.2 for methodology.

15 Tim Moore and Morag McArthur, Take notice, believe us and act! Exploring the safety of children and young people in government run organisations (Research Report prepared for the Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, February 2023).

16 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1442 [36–41].

17 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1443 [3–9].

18 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1443 [21–24].

19 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1443 [13].

20 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1444 [2–24].

21 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1444 [26–31].

22 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1444 [33–39].

23 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1444 [41–45], 1445 [5–11].

24 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1443 [37–39]; Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 3–4 [20].

25 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1449 [21–22].

26 Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 5 [33]–6 [34].

27 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1445 [13-22]; Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 4 [26]–5 [27].

28 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1445 [20–29].

29 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1446 [16–30].

30 Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 10 [59].

31 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1448 [25–46]; Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 10 [60].

32 Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 10 [62].

33 Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 10 [61].

34 Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 10 [61].

35 Transcript of Azra Beach, 16 June 2022, 1449 [27–47].

36 Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 10 [58].

37 Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 11–12 [70].

38 Statement of Azra Beach, 14 June 2022, 13 [77].

39 In relation to this case study, the Commission of Inquiry received the information on the basis that those providing it would remain anonymous. Consequently, the State has not been provided with identifying information in relation to the case study and has not had the opportunity to fully consider or respond to the details of the case study.

40 The names 'Hudson' and 'Cassandra' are pseudonyms; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

41 Letter from 'Cassandra' to Child Safety Team Leader, 2020, 3.

42 Conversation with 'Cassandra' (staff, Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, 18 October 2022).

43 Conversation with 'Cassandra' (staff, Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, 18 October 2022); Letter from 'Cassandra' to Child Safety Team Leader, 2020, 3–4.

44 Letter from 'Cassandra' to Child Safety Team Leader, 2020, 7.

45 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1169 [44–47].

46 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1170 [5–15].

47 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1170 [26]–1171 [1].

48 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1171 [5–13].

49 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1171 [15–17].

50 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1171 [19–27].

51 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1171 [29–35].

52 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1171 [37]–1172 [5].

53 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1172 [38–44].

54 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1172 [46]–1173 [28].

55 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1173 [33–45].

56 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1175 [7–10].

57 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1175 [3–7].

58 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1175 [12–25].

59 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1178 [33–45].

60 Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1173 [30–32], 1174 [6–7] [26–35].

61 Statement of 'Faye', 7 June 2022, 8 [40]; Transcript of 'Faye', 14 June 2022, 1178 [42–45].

62 Session with 'Lucas' (a pseudonym), 24 June 2022. The name 'Lucas' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

63 The name 'Eleanor' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

64 Session with 'Lucas', 24 June 2022.

65 The name 'Matilda' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

66 Session with 'Lucas', 24 June 2022.

67 Session with 'Lucas', 24 June 2022.

68 Session with 'Lucas', 24 June 2022.

69 Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 17 June 2022; Department of Communities, 'Child Safety History', 4 April 2022, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

70 Department of Communities, 'Investigation of Severe Abuse and Neglect Report', 12 February 2021, 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

71 Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 17 June 2022.

72 Department of Communities, 'Investigation of Severe Abuse and Neglect Report', 12 February 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

73 Department of Communities, 'Investigation of Severe Abuse and Neglect Report', 12 February 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

74 Department of Communities, 'Investigation of Severe Abuse and Neglect Report', 12 February 2021, 4, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

75 Department of Communities, 'Investigation of Severe Abuse and Neglect Report', 12 February 2021, 4, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

76 Department of Communities, 'Investigation of Severe Abuse and Neglect Report', 12 February 2021, 6, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

77 Department of Communities, 'Assessment Report', 3 March 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

78 Department of Communities, 'Investigation of Severe Abuse and Neglect Report', 12 February 2021, 5, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

79 Department of Communities, 'Referral to a Senior Quality and Practice Advisor (SQPA)', 25 November 2020, 4, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

80 Email from SQPA investigator to her manager, 22 December 2020, 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

81 Email from service provider to SQPA investigator, 18 January 2021, 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

82 Department of Communities, 'Investigation of Severe Abuse and Neglect Report', 12 February 2021, 7–8, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

83 Notification Report to the Child Safety Service, 11 August 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

84 Department of Communities, 'Responding to Quality of Care Concerns Relating to Children in Out of Home Care: Coordination Meeting – Agenda/Minutes', 12 August 2021, 3, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Letter from Tasmania Police to the Commission of Inquiry, 1 March 2023, 2.

85 Letter from service provider to Child Safety Officer, 17 August 2021, 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

86 Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 17 June 2022; Department of Communities, 'Child Safety History', 4 April 2022, 5, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

87 Department of Communities, 'Child Safety History', 4 April 2022, 5–6, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

88 Department of Communities, 'Child Safety History', 4 April 2022, 5, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

89 Affidavit of Child Safety Officer, Magistrates Court of Tasmania, 5 June 2019, 3 [12(b)], produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

90 Affidavit of Child Safety Officer, Magistrates Court of Tasmania, 5 June 2019, 3 [12(b)], produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

91 Affidavit of Child Safety Officer, Magistrates Court of Tasmania, 5 June 2019, 2 [5], 4 [15]–5 [19], produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

92 Department of Communities, 'Child Safety History', 4 April 2022, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

93 Department of Communities, 'Case note record of statement to Tasmania Police', 28 April 2020, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

94 Department of Communities, 'Child Safety History', 4 April 2022, 3, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

95 Department of Communities, 'Child Safety History', 4 April 2022, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

96 Department of Communities, 'Notification Report', 27 April 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

97 Department of Communities, 'Notification Report', 27 April 2021, 4–5, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

98 Department of Communities, 'Notification Report', 27 April 2021, 10, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

99 Department of Communities, 'Case Notes Report', April 2021, 1, 3, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

100 Department of Communities, 'Notification Report', 27 April 2021, 6, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

101 Department of Communities, 'Case Notes Report', April 2021, 7, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

102 Department of Communities, 'Notification Report', 27 April 2021, 8, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

103 Department of Communities, 'Case Notes Report', April 2021, 11, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

104 Department of Communities, 'Case Notes Report', April 2021, 11, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

105 Department of Communities, 'Case Notes Report', April 2021, 12, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

106 Department of Communities, 'Notification Report', 27 April 2021, 8, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

107 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1536 [8–37].

108 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1535 [3–13].

109 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1535 [27–41].

110 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1537 [25–38].

111 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1537 [13–23].

112 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1538 [27–38].

113 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1538 [1–11].

114 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1539 [22]–1540 [3].

115 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1540 [5–9].

116 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1540 [12-14].

117 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1540 [15–17].

118 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1540 [19–35].

119 Statement of Brett Robinson, 2 June 2022, 3 [16].

120 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1540 [40–45].

121 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1541 [14–16].

122 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1541 [25–28].

123 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1541 [44]–1542 [9].

124 Transcript of Brett Robinson, 17 June 2022, 1542 [12–25].

125 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022. In relation to this case study, the Commission of Inquiry received the information on the basis that those providing it would remain anonymous. Consequently, the State and Tasmania Police have not been provided with identifying information in relation to the case study and have not had the opportunity to fully consider or respond to the details of the case study.

126 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

127 The name 'Addison' is a pseudonym; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

128 Conversation with mother of 'Addison' (staff, Commission of Inquiry into the Tasmanian Government's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse in Institutional Settings, 26 August 2022).

129 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

130 The names 'Vanessa' and 'Edmund' are pseudonyms; Order of the Commission of Inquiry, restricted publication order, 30 August 2023.

131 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

132 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

133 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

134 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

135 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

136 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

137 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

138 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

139 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

140 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

141 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

142 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

143 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

144 Anonymous session, 29 September 2022.

145 Refer to Letter from Thirza White to the Commission of Inquiry, 15 July 2022, 1; Staff survey results indicate that only 45 per cent of respondents were confident they would be protected from reprisals if they spoke out: refer to Transcript of Michael Pervan, 17 June 2022, 1612 [3]–1613 [6]); Anonymous session, 21 October 2022.

146 Statement of Sonya Enkelmann, 26 April 2022, 3 [12].

147 Statement of Sonya Enkelmann, 26 April 2022, 3 [12].

148 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 99.

149 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables: Safety of Children in Care 2020–21', Safety of Children in Care 2020–21 (Web Page, 10 December 2021) Table 3 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/safety-of-children-in-care-2020-21/data>. We note the definition used to collect this data limits 'abuse in care' to substantiated instances of abuse by someone living with the child in care, or where the carer failed to prevent the abuse. For the purposes of this report, we have adopted a broader definition to include all forms and sources of child sexual abuse of children while they are in care, without any limitation to the involvement of people in the child's household. The Australian Institute of Health and Welfare's definition of 'substantiation' is: 'where it was concluded that there was reasonable cause to believe that the child had been, was being, or was likely to be, abused … [and] does not necessarily require sufficient evidence for a successful prosecution'—refer to Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Glossary', Child Protection (Web Page, 13 June 2023) <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports-data/health-welfare-services/child-protection/glossary>.

150 Commission for Children and Young People (Victoria), Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, October 2021) 79.

151 Commission for Children and Young People (Victoria), Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, October 2021) 80.

152 Commission for Children and Young People (Victoria), Annual Report 2020–21 (Report, October 2021) 80.

153 Eligibility required claimants to be aged 18 or over on 11 July 2003: Department of Health and Human Services, Review of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 3–4.

154 Department of Health and Human Services, Review of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 3, 18.

155 'Accepted' meant deemed eligible for a claim: Department of Health and Human Services, Review of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 13.

156 Department of Health and Human Services, Review of Claims of Abuse of Children in State Care: Final Report – Round 4 (Report, November 2014) 10, 12.

157 Notice to produce served on the State of Tasmania, 20 July 2021.

158 Refer to Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1213 [4–17].

159 Refer to Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1213 [25–30].

160 Department of Communities, 'Cover Sheet', 9 September 2021, 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

161 Refer to Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1213 [4–45].

162 Department of Communities, 'Excel Spreadsheet of Allegations Relating to Child Sexual Abuse of Children in Out of Home Care', August 2021, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

163 Department of Communities, 'Cover Sheet', August 2021, 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

164 Department of Communities, 'Cover Sheet', 9 September 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

165 Department of Communities, 'Cover Sheet', 9 September 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

166 Gender ratio of children in out of home care in Tasmania taken from Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2020–21', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table S5.6 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2021-22/data>.

167 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2020–21', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) table S5.8 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2021-22/data>.

168 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2020–21', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Table S5.5 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2021-22/data>.

169 Keith Kaufman et al, Risk Profiles for Institutional Child Sexual Abuse: A Literature Review (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, Sydney, October 2016) 71. Refer also to Statement of Dale Tolliday, 29 April 2022, 5 [19–20].

170 Statement of Michael Pervan, 4 August 2022, 2 [10]; Statement of Claire Lovell in response to Questions on Notice, 4 August 2022, 4 [7–8], 5 [18].

171 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1211 [40–41]; Statement of Claire Lovell in response to Questions on Notice, 4 August 2022, 5 [17].

172 Statement of Claire Lovell in response to Questions on Notice, 4 August 2022, 5 [18].

173 Statement of Michael Pervan, 4 August 2022, 2 [12]–3 [13].

174 Statement of Michael Pervan, 4 August 2022, 2 [12]–3 [13].

175 Transcript of Claire Lovell, 14 June 2022, 1213 [4–17].

176 Statement of Michael Pervan, 4 August 2022, 1 [4]–3 [15].

177 Statement of Michael Pervan, 4 August 2022, 2 [8].

178 This figure related to the period between 1 July 2013 and 30 June 2021.

179 Opening address of Rachel Ellyard, 14 June 2022, 1155 [17–35].

180 Department of Communities, 'Cover Sheet', 9 September 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

181 Demographic information derived from Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 'Data Tables: Child Protection Australia 2020–21', Child Protection Australia 2020–21 (Web Page, 15 June 2022) Tables S5.5, S5.6 and S5.8 <https://www.aihw.gov.au/reports/child-protection/child-protection-australia-2021-22/data>; State Growth Tasmania, 'Tasmania: Service Age Groups', id.community (Web Page, 2022) <https://profile.id.com.au/tasmania/service-age-groups>.

182 Statement of Michael Pervan, 4 August 2022, 3 [16]. Ms Lovell provided the same information in August 2022 (refer to Chapter 9 for further discussion of this): Statement of Claire Lovell, 4 August 2022, 5 [19]–6 [20].

183 Statement of Michael Pervan, 4 August 2022, 3–4 [17–18].

184 As pointed out by Ms Lovell, concerns about sexual abuse of children in care are not recorded consistently on the Child Protection Information System: Statement of Claire Lovell, 4 August 2022, 5 [18]. To capture all forms of recording, the original data sweep included a number of search terms, including 'care concern' as well as 'sexual' as the primary form of abuse: Department of Communities, 'Cover Sheet', 9 September 2021, 1, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

185 Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (Final Report, December 2017) vol 12, 13.

186 For example, 'Referral and Feedback form between Tasmania Police and Children, Youth and Families', 16 April 2021, 3–4, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; 'Referral and Feedback form between Tasmania Police and Children, Youth and Families', 29 April 2020, 1–2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; 'Referral and Feedback form between Tasmania Police and Children, Youth and Families', 12 April 2016, 2–3, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Department of Communities, 'Case Notes Report', 1 November 2016, 3, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

187 For example, 'Referral and Feedback form between Tasmania Police and Children, Youth and Families', 16 April 2021, 2, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Department of Communities, 'Case Notes Report', 4 May 2015, 79, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce; Magistrates Court of Tasmania, 'Interim Restraint Order', 18 March 2015, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

188 Transcript of Andrea Sturges, 16 June 2022, 1525 [5–7].

189 Notice to produce served on the Tasmanian Government, 9 March 2022, 13–14 [37].

190 Department of Communities, 'Cover Sheet', 4 April 2022, 1 [2], produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

191 Department of Communities, 'Cover Sheet', 4 April 2022, 1 [2], produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

192 Department of Communities, 'Item 37: Response Templates 1–10', 4 April 2022, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

193 Summarised from Department of Communities, 'Item 37: Response Templates 1–10', 4 April 2022, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

194 Department of Communities, 'ED tracker' (Excel spreadsheet), January 2023, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. Refer to Appendix H for more detail.

195 Letter from Michael Pervan to the Commission of Inquiry, 10 February 2022.

196 Department of Communities, 'ED tracker' (Excel Spreadsheet), 20 September 2021, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

197 Department of Communities, 'ED tracker' (Excel Spreadsheet), 20 September 2021, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce. Refer to Chapter 20 for more information on the Employment Direction No. 5 process.

198 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Memo to Child Safety Officer', 12 December 2016, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

199 Department of Communities, 'ED tracker' (Excel Spreadsheet), 20 September 2022, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

200 Letter from Michael Pervan to the Commission of Inquiry, 11 February 2022, 1–2.

201 Letter from Michael Pervan to the Commission of Inquiry, 10 February 2022, 1–2.

202 Department of Communities, 'List of Staff Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Statuses', 4 April 2022, produced by the Tasmanian Government in response to a Commission notice to produce.

9 The way forward: Children in out of home care

1 Introduction

Out of home care environments should be safe for children and young people. A child in care is entitled to expect the Government, departmental staff, out of home care service providers and carers will always act to keep them safe. A child in care should also expect that if they disclose sexual abuse, the adults around them will have the knowledge to recognise the disclosure and to put in place supports to respond immediately and appropriately, and to ensure they are protected from further harm.

In Chapters 7 and 8, we outline the background and context of the out of home care system, discuss the risks of child sexual abuse in out of home care, describe how we approached our inquiry into out of home care and provide a series of case examples to highlight areas where the out of home care system can be strengthened. In this chapter—Chapter 9—we outline our recommendations for better preventing child sexual abuse in the out of home care context, and better addressing it when such abuse occurs.

The key principle underpinning our recommendations is that a high-quality and well-functioning out of home care sector is the best way to protect children from child sexual abuse and to respond appropriately when it occurs. As discussed in Chapter 7, there are factors of a child protection system that increase the risk of children and young people experiencing sexual abuse in out of home care. If addressed, these risk factors can be transformed into protective factors; that is, the likelihood that children and young people will experience sexual abuse in out of home care decreases when:

- an out of home care system has structures and processes in place to identify and respond proactively to risks of abuse
- leadership oversees and is accountable for delivering care services that are trauma-informed
- children are empowered through active inclusion in decision making, individually and systemically
- staff are set up for success by providing a supportive work culture and conditions, including an organisational commitment to supervision, ongoing professional development and serviceable caseloads.

While we consider that many carers, out of home care providers and departmental staff are dedicated to ensuring the safety and wellbeing of children in their care, the out of home care system requires urgent attention and resourcing to rebuild and, consequently, enable them to succeed.

1.1 Structure of this chapter

In this chapter, we make recommendations to improve the out of home care system. These recommendations will strengthen the systems and structures that can decrease the risk of sexual abuse for children in care, as well as improve how the Department responds when abuse occurs. We also make recommendations to improve the independent oversight of the out of home care system.

This chapter is structured in the following way.

Section 2 considers the damage done to the out of home care system by chronic underfunding and the need to inject resources into the Department to ensure the full range of reforms can be achieved for children in care.

Section 3 examines the role of the Department in the out of home care system and recommends that the Government completes its outsourcing of all out of home care services to non-government providers while retaining responsibility for setting the strategic framework for out of home care, for case management and for monitoring and supporting quality care.

Section 4 considers the 'foundational pillars' required within the Child Safety Service to support staff to work with confidence and to make complex decisions about the safety of children in out of home care. We consider these foundational pillars of an out of home care system to be:

- expert and active leadership
- strong governance structures with internal accountability

- a clear strategic direction for the out of home care sector
- public and transparent policies
- a process for continuous improvement
- a strong and capable workforce.

We make recommendations around each of these pillars.

Section 5 discusses the experiences of Aboriginal children in out of home care and makes recommendations for fully implementing the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle. The Placement Principle is Australia's national policy framework for preventing Aboriginal children from entering the out of home care system, promoting the self-determination of Aboriginal communities in relation to child safe decision making, and ensuring Aboriginal children who enter out of home care stay connected to family, community and culture, and are ultimately returned to their families.

Section 6 focuses on the key mechanisms the Department needs to support quality out of home care, with a view to enabling staff to protect children in care from sexual abuse and other harm, and to respond appropriately when harm occurs. We focus on clinical supervision, case management, providing trauma-informed therapeutic care, expectations of adults in the out of home care system, record keeping and risk assessments.

Section 7 considers assessment and training of, and support for, carers. We discuss problems with record keeping and carer screening and recommend setting up a Carer Register. We consider carers in all types of out of home care, including kinship carers, respite carers and third-party guardianship.

In Section 8, we discuss the specific needs of individual children in care, including ensuring suitable and stable placements and regular contact with safety officers. Section 9 considers the specific needs of children, known as 'crossover children', who live in out of home care and spend time in youth detention. We recommend that Child Safety Officers be responsible for specific case management tasks while such children are in detention.

Section 10 assesses the current high risk of children in care experiencing harmful sexual behaviours and sexual exploitation. We recommend measures so the Department can address these risks.

Section 11 examines the Department's response to complaints and concerns about sexual abuse of children in care. We recommend changes to the Department's response process, including its handling of allegations against current employees and its policies and procedures for managing and reviewing complaints more generally.

In Section 12, we discuss the oversight of the out of home care system and advocacy for children in that system.

1.2 Our recommendations

Our recommendations in this chapter outline an ambitious reform agenda to establish a strong out of home care system equipped to better protect children from harm, including sexual harm. Key recommendations include:

- increased funding in every area of out of home care to meet the needs of children in care and fully implement this reform agenda
- outsourcing care to non-government providers, with obligations to comply with the National Standards for Out of Home Care and Child Safe Standards, and for reporting incidents and complaints
- developing an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care to strengthen children's say in their own care and in the way the out of home care system works
- strengthening executive leadership, including establishing an executive role specifically for out of home care, an Office of the Chief Practitioner and an Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice
- strong internal functions, governance and accountability measures including a Quality and Risk Committee and a harmful sexual behaviours unit
- an out of home care strategic plan to set a strong vision for out of home care and to guide policy and resource allocation
- developing a reporting framework for out of home care to inform quality assurance and continuous improvement processes
- a workforce strategy to increase recruitment and build capacity across the Child Safety Service and out of home care
- implementing all elements of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle, including increasing self-determination by promoting and supporting recognised Aboriginal organisations
- a Carer Register to ensure carers meet minimum standards and departmental expectations
- more clinical supervision, assessments, case management and therapeutic care to meet the unique needs of all children
- developing policies in key areas including professional conduct, mandatory reporting, harmful sexual behaviours, child sexual exploitation, and complaints and care concerns

- establishing key oversight roles, including setting up a Tasmanian Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, enhanced functions for the new Commission for Children and Young People in relation to out of home care, establishing the Child Advocate as an independent Deputy Commissioner and a community visitor scheme.

2 Chronic underfunding

Appropriate funding is a key pillar of a quality out of home care system. During our Commission of Inquiry, stakeholders frequently raised underfunding of child protection as a major contributing factor to poor implementation of reform recommendations over time. A former senior departmental employee, Sonya Enkelmann, observed:

> There seems to be a long tradition of undertaking reviews into Child Protection/ Child Safety and [out of home care] which then quietly drop from sight. Understanding what sustains this systemic inertia is difficult … but a history of chronic underfunding in the Department to build its capacity and infrastructure cannot be overlooked.[1]

In a statement to us, Michael Pervan, former Secretary of the Department of Communities, repeatedly noted budget constraints, including the redirection of resources to other departmental priorities, as hindering the reform agenda.[2] He stressed that funding for out of home care was the responsibility of the government of the day, and not his as Secretary.[3] Secretary Pervan advised that he:

> … was not given the resources he needed to run the Department in the manner that the Commission [of Inquiry] has concluded that it needed to be run, despite asking for them at every opportunity [from the Government].[4]

In fact, he told us that the Government effectively cut funding to the Department by requiring an 'efficiency dividend' from the Department that equated to a significant sum over several years.[5]

We consider that chronic underfunding of the Services for Children and Families section of the Department has adversely affected the Department's capacity to perform many of its functions. For example, the Child Advocate said in June 2022 that Services for Children and Families had only recently received dedicated human resources support from the Department to address the chronic workforce issues in the Child Safety Service.[6] She said that 'there is simply not the resource[s] for the breadth of roles in the portfolio to perform all corporate functions'.[7] Therefore, the task of responding to extra demands, such as external scrutiny, falls to key operational leadership positions.[8]

We consider that chronic under-resourcing has been at the expense of maintaining up-to-date and clear policies and procedures. It has stalled continuous improvement and strategic direction for the Department. It is particularly hard to understand how the amount spent per placement night could be decreasing over recent years when the cost of living has increased.[9] It raises questions about whether placements are adequately resourced to meet children's needs. At times, under-resourcing has hindered measures to protect the safety of children in care. Children in out of home care deserve better. They should be seen as the urgent priority, even in a context where there are limited resources.

Appropriate funding will be essential considering the significant reform agenda we outline in our recommendations in this chapter.

Recommendation 9.1

The Tasmanian Government should provide one-off funding to help implement the Commission of Inquiry's recommended out of home care reforms and significantly increase ongoing funding of out of home care, including out of home care services provided by Child Safety Services (such as out of home care governance and case management).

3 The Department's role

The Department is both a purchaser and a provider of out of home care services in Tasmania. The Department provides almost all kinship care and a significant amount of foster care for children in Tasmania. In 2007, the Department committed to outsourcing all forms of out of home care to non-government organisations by 2012.[10] This has not occurred.

Outsourcing out of home care services has the benefit of clarifying the Department's role as system manager and overseer and facilitator of quality service provision, and not as service provider. We heard consistent evidence that the non-government sector in Tasmania had, in general, made much more progress in implementing systems to protect the safety of children in care than the Department.

In this section, we consider how the Department can effectively distinguish its role by:

- outsourcing all forms of out of home care services to non-government providers, including kinship and emergency care arrangements
- retaining and developing its unique and necessary role in setting the strategic framework, monitoring and supporting quality care, and ensuring public accountability
- embedding active contract management and oversight for care services.

During the period of transition to a clearer role of purchaser and administrator, the Department should ensure there are arrangements in place to track the quality of care provided by carers the Department directly supports.

3.1 Outsourcing care to non-government providers

The 2007 Out of Home Care Strategic Framework outlined a five-year plan to outsource all out of home care in Tasmania to the non-government sector.[11] The framework indicated that the Department would support out of home care delivery by:

- providing strategic planning and policy and by overseeing continuous quality improvement, data collection and ICT infrastructure
- budgeting and purchasing out of home care services from the non-government sector and managing workforce development
- responding to complaints about out of home care
- maintaining a Carer Register and collaborating with the community sector.[12]

Departmental child protection teams were to work alongside non-government out of home care services and be responsible for case planning, case management, placement coordination and placement decision making.[13]

In our Inquiry, non-government organisations generally perceived an inherent conflict of interest in the Department being a provider of out of home care services and having a regulatory role over those services.[14] For example, Caroline Brown, a previous employee of the Department, suggested the Department should 'hold its statutory role only and be strong in the assessment of statutory risk and the legal processes that follow'.[15] Dr Julian Watchorn, clinical psychologist, Foster and Kinship Carers Association of Tasmania, expressed concern about the Department 'effectively assessing themselves on their own standards and protocols'.[16]

Evidence suggests that some non-government providers can offer better quality out of home care than their Government counterpart. We were told that non-government providers can offer more frequent and regular support to carers because their staff-to-carer ratios are much lower.[17] The Department said that it was struggling to find enough Child Safety Officers to support departmental carers, which was one of the reasons it stopped recruiting its own carers.[18]

Several out of home care providers said that non-government care providers apply higher standards and safeguarding principles to their services than does the Department.[19] They told us they created and implemented their own quality frameworks and conducted their own internal audits.[20] In particular, we observed that many of the non-government providers with a national footprint comply with the much higher standards set in other jurisdictions. For example, several non-government providers had arranged Child Safe accreditation for their services.[21] In contrast, the Department has not yet implemented the National Standards for Out-of-Home Care ('national out of home care standards') for itself. [22]

We consider that by the Department stepping away from directly providing out of home care but retaining its obligations for ensuring the safety and wellbeing of children under the guardianship of the Secretary, Tasmania may benefit from progress made nationally and keep Tasmanian children safer. Secretary Pervan told us that this proposal was the subject of a budget bid in January 2021, however it was not adopted.[23]

The Department should develop a plan with timeframes for achieving full transition, and the Government should allocate enough resources to complete it in full. Transition may take some time to implement because it requires the Department to improve the commissioning of new providers and for each carer household to be transitioned to a non-government provider. The process of developing a transition plan should begin immediately. The transition should be orderly, staged, and trauma-informed for carers and children currently in government care.[24] It should be guided by the following principles:

- children are supported throughout the process
- minimum disruption to the placements of children in care so children transition with their carers wherever possible
- minimum disruption to sibling placements
- consideration is given to the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle
- capacity is developed concurrently in Aboriginal community organisations to assume care of Aboriginal children (refer to Recommendation 9.15)
- transition priorities are developed, and timeframes established
- open and clear communication with all parties about the process, roles and expectations.

The Department should develop a minimum dataset to support transition.[25]

Recommendation 9.2

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should outsource the provision of all forms of out of home care to the non-government sector.
2. The Department should maintain and improve its role in:
    a. the budgeting and purchasing of out of home care services from the non-government sector
    b. establishing and leading the strategic plan and policy framework for out of home care

c. monitoring the quality of out of home care

d. providing case management and leadership in out of home care

e. ensuring carers and staff receive adequate education and skill development

f. responding to complaints and safety and wellbeing concerns about children in out of home care

g. cross-sector (government and non-government) data collection, ICT infrastructure and public reporting

h. carer registration and monitoring.

3. The outsourcing of the provision of out of home care should be achieved through an orderly, staged and trauma-informed transition process and commissioning strategy.

4. The Department should establish a minimum out of home care dataset and a plan for two-way data sharing between the Department and non-government out of home care providers.

3.2 Contract management and auditing

As 'the system owner', the Department is responsible for ensuring the out of home care services it contracts to non-government providers are achieving the right outcomes for children.[26]

As outlined below, the Department does not have the systems in place to ensure non-government providers comply with any contractual requirements specific to out of home care services. In particular:

- the Department does not appear to routinely include performance measures in its funding agreements with non-government out of home care providers that relate to outcomes for children in care
- the Department, at least until recently, lacked the capacity to audit non-government providers' compliance with contract obligations
- the Department appears to only require non-government providers to regularly report on basic statistics and financial acquittals.

We encourage the new Department for Education, Children and Young People, which has installed a specific 'Commissioning' section in the Services for Children and Families portfolio, to address the issues we identify.

3.2.1 Funding agreements

The new Department's Secretary, Timothy Bullard, told us that the previous department had a 'commissioning framework'.[27] In a statement to our Inquiry, former Secretary Pervan said the Department procured services as follows:

> Funding agreements are time-limited and Departmental processes that consider renewal of agreements provide a risk management control for service need, demand and capacity, and for financial, service performance and value for money considerations. This process requires a robust and defensible business case that includes outcome considerations of what providers do, how well did they do it, and if anyone is better off. The Departmental Procurement Review Committee is the governance structure that approves business cases for renewal. Through the commissioning process, Children, Youth and Families can continuously improve services and ensure they meet the contemporary needs of Child Safety Service as Service Users and children, young people and families.[28]

We received no other details about this approach.

The funding agreement template provided to us appears to be outdated.[29] It is a generic template to purchase any number of different human services and does not have standard inclusions that are specific to out of home care providers. It only includes generalist statements under the heading 'Service Provider's Obligations'.[30]

The funding agreement template has space to include individualised 'Key Performance Indicators' and 'Service Specialist Standards' but does not specify any standard indicators or standards that all providers might need to show.[31] The template refers generically to service providers supplying 'evidence of continuous quality improvement against recognised international, national or state standards relevant to the services being funded through this Agreement'.[32] The national out of home care standards and Child Safe Standards were not specifically mentioned.

3.2.2 Compliance with standards, a therapeutic approach and preventing child sexual abuse

The two key sets of standards that apply to the safety of children in care are the national out of home care standards and the National Child Safe Standards (now adopted as the Child and Youth Safe Standards by Tasmania in the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act 2023—'Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act'—therefore generally referred to in this report as the 'Child and Youth Safe Standards').[33]

It has been more than a decade since the then Commonwealth Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs released the national out of home care standards in 2011 as a priority of the National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children 2009–2020.[34] Tasmania committed to the national out of home care standards under the National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children 2009–2020 First

Action Plan.[35] The Tasmanian Government is already required to report on a number of measures derived from the national out of home care standards to the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare each year for its Safety in Care reports.[36]

We understand the Department has not adopted the national out of home care standards for out of home care providers. Instead, the Department engaged in a process to develop Tasmanian standards for out of home care, which Secretary Pervan said had 'evolved … too slowly'.[37] After two lengthy, detailed consultation processes between 2018 and 2021, the Department released the Tasmanian Out of Home Care Standards on 17 August 2022.[38] In the end, the Tasmanian Out of Home Care Standards aligned with the six domains of wellbeing in the existing Tasmanian Child and Youth Wellbeing Framework.[39] As indicated above, no standards were included in the contract templates we reviewed.

We consider that out of home care providers should be made to comply with the national out of home care standards and the Child and Youth Safe Standards at a minimum. As we discuss in Sections 3.2.3 and 4.5, these standards should also form a basis for an outcomes and performance reporting framework for children in care, with which the Department can evaluate the out of home care system and the wellbeing of children in care (refer to Recommendation 9.9). As we outline in Section 7, there is also a need for statewide expectations for carer assessment and registration.

In reforming Tasmania's out of home care sector, the Department has an opportunity to embed a shared understanding of trauma and the impact it has on children's learning, behaviour, relationships and feelings. In Section 6.3, we recommend that the Department leads the sector by identifying the components of a trauma-informed therapeutic model of care for the out of home care system (refer to Recommendation 9.18). The Department should require non-government out of home care providers to provide trauma-informed therapeutic care for children in care and report on how it is provided.

The Department should also require non-government providers to implement preventative measures for children in their care to reduce their risk of engaging in, or being subject to, harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Recommendation 9.28) or being sexually exploited (Recommendation 9.29). Providers should report to the Department on their delivery of these preventative measures. We explore the rationale for such specific interventions in Section 10, along with several examples of prevention initiatives that have been reported to be effective.

3.2.3 Monitoring compliance

A non-government out of home care provider told us that the Department has requested regular financial acquittals and statistical reports from providers but has not conducted regular audits or reviews.[40]

Ms Enkelmann, a former departmental employee, reported that the Department has a long history of being under-resourced to properly oversee and manage contracted services, referring to instances of providers not having contracts for Special Care Packages 'because they would not be monitored anyway'.[41]

Claire Lovell, Executive Director, Services for Children and Families, told us in June 2022 that there was one person in Children, Youth and Families who was responsible for engaging and contracting with non-government out of home care providers, the Manager of Strategic Commissioning.[42] She stated that this role was 'very busy' undertaking commissioning work for multiple areas in addition to the Child Safety Service and out of home care—custodial services, youth justice and new strategic project work.[43] The Child Advocate said the Department had repeatedly requested resourcing for a team of staff to effectively coordinate outsourcing and strategic commissioning without success.[44]

When asked how oversight and quality assurance of non-government providers was achieved given the limited resource of one role for commissioning, Ms Lovell explained that this responsibility was diffused across positions in the division. She gave the examples of Child Safety Officers making observations about a child's care and monthly reports from the non-government providers being useful forms of feedback.[45]

Encouragingly, after assuming responsibility for out of home care, Secretary Bullard agreed that one position across several work areas was inadequate and told us that he would be 'bolstering' the Strategic Commissioning function.[46]

3.2.4 New funding agreements

Strategic and effective contract management is essential in a system that outsources out of home care services. The Department should develop funding agreements that are specific to out of home care providers, with standard inclusions and unambiguous language. As well as reporting on agreed outcomes for children in care, the funding agreements must cover compliance with the national out of home care standards, the Child and Youth Safe Standards and reporting on trauma-informed and preventative care.

The Department should monitor reporting and compliance with funding agreements and ideally, provide government-developed best practice policies and resources to guide providers. Similarly, increased reporting requirements will come at a cost to non-government providers, and the Department should fund providers to cover these expenses.

The Department should require non-government providers to report on the outcomes and performance reporting framework to the Department and the Quality and Risk Committee (refer to Recommendation 9.5). The Department should use the outcomes and performance reporting framework for its periodic auditing of non-government providers (refer to Recommendations 9.3 and 9.9).

The Department should also require non-government providers to comply with the other relevant recommendations we outline in this report, including having registered carers and staff and carer compliance with minimum professional development obligations.

Recommendation 9.3

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop new funding agreements with non-government out of home care providers that set quality and accountability requirements, including:
    a. compliance with the National Standards for Out-of-Home Care
    b. compliance with the Child and Youth Safe Standards
    c. provision of trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care (Recommendation 9.18)
    d. adoption of preventive measures for harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
    e. only using carers who are registered on the Carer Register (Recommendation 9.20)
    f. governance and organisational structures to support monitoring and responding to child sexual abuse including grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
    g. sharing relevant information about carers and children in their care
    h. quarterly reporting to the Department on these requirements
    i. periodic reporting of data against the outcomes framework (Recommendation 9.9).
2. All funding agreements between the Department and non-government out of home care providers should require the Department to give providers:
    a. relevant information about carers and children in their care
    b. information about the provider's performance against the data outcomes framework and compliance with standards.
3. The Department should monitor and audit non-government out of home care providers' compliance with contracts.
4. The Tasmanian Government should resource non-government out of home care providers appropriately.

4 Establishing the pillars of reform

The Secretary—and hence their Department—is ultimately responsible for children in out of home care.[47] To discharge this heavy responsibility, the Department needs strong systems in place to understand what is happening for children in care and how the out of home care system needs to operate to best protect them.

In this section, we consider the foundational pillars required to support the Department to operate with confidence and to make complex decisions for the safety of children in out of home care. These foundational pillars should include:

- adequate funding (discussed above)
- expert and active executive leadership
- fit-for-purpose governance structures and processes
- a strategic plan for the out of home care system
- clear, accessible policies and procedures that set standards for ensuring the safety of children in care
- continuous improvement processes
- a workforce strategy for recruiting and retaining staff and carers, ensuring they are well equipped and supported to safeguard children in care
- establishing an Aboriginal policy leadership role in the Department.

These foundations will support an informed executive leadership to oversee the safety and wellbeing of children in out of home care, including processes to identify risks to children and to address incidents of abuse at the earliest opportunity.

4.1 Expert and active leadership

The Department should ensure leaders have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability requirements to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation. Leadership can ensure child safeguarding is valued and practised throughout the out of home care system through good governance, strategic planning, workforce development and clear policies and procedures, as well as cultivating an organisational culture that is safe, innovative and accountable.[48]

4.1.1 Addressing organisational culture

The National Royal Commission found that institutions with a 'closed' organisational culture and that resist change can make child sexual abuse more likely to occur and less likely to be dealt with properly when disclosed.[49] Leaders should instil a culture that ‘inhibits the perpetration of child sexual abuse, speeds the detection of abuse, and enhances the response to abuse’.[50] Professor Donald Palmer, an organisational misconduct researcher, stated that leaders ‘telegraph cultural content’ in several ways—by the people they hire and fire; the behaviour they reward and punish; the matters they focus on; the way they respond to crises; and the attitudes and behaviours they display.[51]

Several people who have worked across the Department and the non-government sector described the Department’s culture as ‘insular’.[52] For example, Ms Brown stated that the Department responds to external criticism by becoming defensive and developing an ‘us against them’ attitude so the service is resistant to change, particularly when that change is proposed by those external to the Department.[53] As a result, she said the Department struggles to partner with non-government providers, instead adopting a ‘command-and-control’ model of relationship. Similarly, Andrea Sturges, another former departmental employee who now works in the non-government sector, observed ‘the culture internally within Child Safety Services is very reactive and insular’.[54]

Ms Sturges further commented that the out of home care system is ‘very adversarial’.[55] She stated that this is reflected at the operational level by Child Safety Officers often not consulting the broader care team, which affects the quality of their decisions.[56] Ms Sturges reported that even some senior departmental staff seemed resistant at times to her attempts to raise concerns about the wellbeing of children in care.[57]

Ms Lovell spoke of a culture of hostility and conflict between stakeholders and the Child Safety Service, creating a barrier to well-functioning care teams. She said Child Safety Officers have had to put in extra effort to overcome this hostility.[58]

We acknowledge that working within the heavily criticised field of child protection can give rise to a defensive culture. For example, the Commissioner for Children and Young People said:

> … if departments are constantly receiving negative scrutiny through the media or through independent oversight bodies, it creates a culture of defensiveness, and I think I have experienced the culture of defensiveness …[59]

A department survey of staff from 2020 confirmed that staff also perceived cultural issues within the Department. Only 26 per cent of respondents thought that change was well managed within the Department, 55 per cent agreed that senior management modelled the values of the organisation and 45 per cent felt confident they would be protected from reprisals if they spoke out.[60] Fear of reprisal and a belief that an organisation may not respond could discourage staff from raising concerns about how child sexual abuse is being handled.

Secretary Pervan acknowledged that the Department had cultural problems.[61] At the time of our hearings, when responsibility for the statutory child protection and out of home care systems was about to move from the former Department of Communities to the new Department for Education, Children and Young People, Secretary Pervan expressed hope that the move would help improve the culture in the Child Safety Service:

> … they're moving to a new agency where a lot of those things are really well understood, and the safeguarding function is already well ahead in its thinking about how you move that culture.[62]

We, too, hope for a new culture in the Child Safety Service and consider this as, ultimately, the responsibility of the Department's executive leadership. Cultural change should form part of their key performance measures.

4.1.2 Leadership roles in out of home care

As mentioned, in October 2022, responsibility for the statutory child protection and out of home care systems moved to the newly created Department for Education, Children and Young People. Since this restructure, responsibility for the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line ('Advice and Referral Line'), the Child Safety Service and out of home care services are held by the Executive Director, Services for Children and Families (currently Ms Lovell).[63] The youth justice service area is the responsibility of the newly created Executive Director for Services for Youth Justice. Originally, these two Executive Directors reported directly to the Secretary, while responsibility for education was divided between two Deputy Secretaries, who reported to the Secretary.[64]

Under a June 2023 organisational restructure, the Executive Director, Services for Children and Families, now reports to a Deputy Secretary for 'Keeping Children Safe'.[65] This role reports directly to the Secretary, while an Associate Secretary leads the education and youth justice portfolios.

The Deputy Secretary for Keeping Children Safe is responsible for, among other things, Services for Children and Families and the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People. Services for Children and Families includes out of home care, the Child Safety Service, the Advice and Referral Line and family support services.

4.1.3 Strengthening leadership

Child protection, including out of home care, has unique and interrelated features that require the Department to have a high level of expertise and an active and engaged executive leadership, including:

- responsibility for the most vulnerable cohorts of children in the State who, along with their families of origin, exhibit challenging and complex behaviours

- being statutory guardian of children in out of home care, with a responsibility to be a 'good parent'
- carrying a high degree of risk for the safety and wellbeing of children in out of home care.

Although only a comparatively small percentage of Tasmanian children are in out of home care, other service divisions within the Department, while having responsibility for more children, do not carry this level of responsibility and risk.

More generally, the Secretary faces great challenges in managing what have been two large organisations with very different cultures, challenges and problems. We foresee risks for the quality of out of home care linked to the Department's relatively recent reconfiguration into a larger department, due to the new Department's substantial size and scope.

We recognise that some economies of scale can be achieved by child protection and out of home care being subsumed within a larger department. However, wherever responsibility for out of home care lies—in a separate department or one joined with education and other children's services—leadership must be resourced in a way that acknowledges the level of responsibility and risk.

Catherine Taylor, former Chief Executive of the Department for Child Protection in South Australia, told us about the challenges associated with child protection and out of home care being included in a 'mega-department' such as the Department for Education, Children and Young People.[66] She explained that when she joined the South Australian department it had recently been separated out from a much bigger department, which included education and child protection services, following recommendations made by the 2016 South Australian Child Protection Systems Royal Commission.[67] A key rationale for this separation was the belief that child protection needed a 'dedicated focus' and should be 'led by experience in child protection'.[68]

We consider this dedicated focus can be achieved in a larger department provided there is enough executive presence to set an operational and strategic direction and interpret advice with expertise. Based on her experience in South Australia and Queensland child protection and community services, Ms Taylor said that in any child protection service, expertise needs to be 'reflected across as much of the Executive leadership as possible'.[69] Importantly, she said key decision-makers who know the business of child protection and out of home care can advocate within a larger department to retain the required focus on the most vulnerable children.[70] She highlighted that all elements of the new Department (such as work health and safety, finance and human resources) must be informed by child protection expertise, so the services they deliver to child protection are appropriate.[71]

Considering this evidence, we welcome the addition of an Associate Secretary with responsibility for the education portfolio. This will allow the Secretary to focus on child protection, including out of home care, given the strategic, operational and reform responsibilities within the service area and the level of risk associated with the portfolio. We are also pleased that since the June 2023 restructure, there is a Deputy Secretary role to assist the Secretary. We recommend that a prerequisite for the key role of Deputy Secretary for Keeping Children Safe is knowledge and experience in child protection and out of home care.

We are concerned that the Deputy Secretary for Keeping Children Safe has a large task, including responsibility for both Services for Children and Families and the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People. The Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People was a key reform in response to the Independent Inquiry into the Tasmanian Department of Education's Responses to Child Sexual Abuse ('Independent Education Inquiry').[72] We discuss the role of the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People in Chapter 6. In short, we recommend in that chapter that the office focuses on prevention, risk identification, policy development and related workforce development for safeguarding children in the education context. We consider that the safeguarding needs of children in education are distinct from the safeguarding needs of children in out of home care. We question whether the same role holder should be responsible for both. We note the view expressed by Kathy Baker, Deputy Secretary, People and Culture in the former Department of Communities, about the then Deputy Secretary, Children, Youth and Families role, who said 'the volume of work that the Deputy Secretary … was undertaking at the time was significant. I consider the load on that role to be unsustainable'.[73]

We also note with some concern the scope of responsibility for the Executive Director for Services for Children and Families, which we understand includes the strategic, operational and critical incident leadership of the Child Safety Service, including commissioned non-government child abuse prevention, family support, child protection and out of home care. Evidence we heard indicated that even in the previous, smaller Department, out of home care reforms became overshadowed by the larger child protection reform agenda.[74]

We propose a significant out of home care reform agenda in this chapter that will need high-level executive support. Ensuring there is executive leadership specifically for out of home care, which we recommend below, will protect this reform agenda and ensure children in out of home care get the support they need. Funding this level of executive support will prove the Government's commitment to child safety in out of home care.

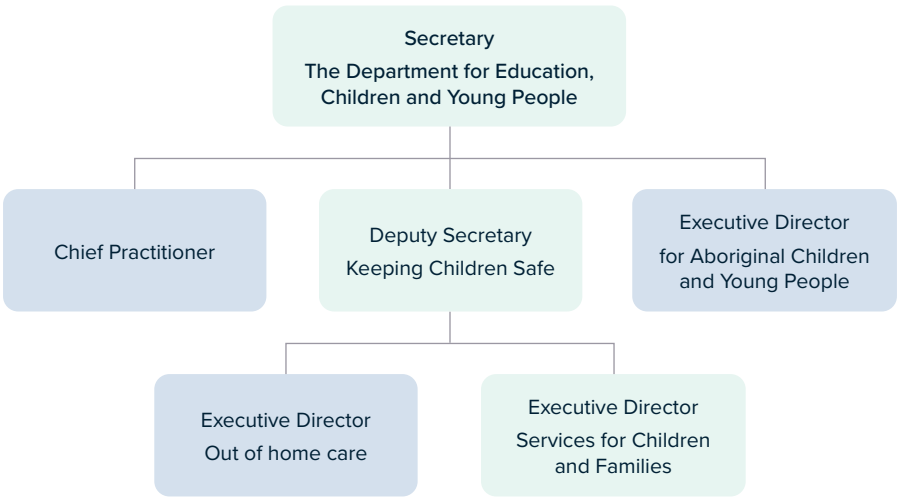
The executive position should be responsible for out of home care policy and operations.

In addition to the executive role for out of home care, we recommend that the Department establishes two more roles in its executive—a Chief Practitioner to oversee the clinical policy and practice for out of home care, the Child Safety Service and youth justice (refer to Recommendation 9.17), and an Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People (refer to Recommendation 9.7). We describe the location of these positions in the organisational structure in picture form in Figure 9.1

Finally, we consider it fundamental that centralised functions within the new Department, such as human resources, procurement and staff learning and development, reflect the different needs of the Child Safety Service and out of home care. This principle is reflected in recommendations we make in other sections of this chapter.

It is self-evident that relevant executive roles should require knowledge and understanding in child protection and out of home care, as well as experience in providing strategic direction and leadership. As already foreshadowed by the Premier, key performance measures should be built into these Head of Agency and leadership roles and include a specific focus on preventing sexual abuse in out of home care.[75]

Figure 9.1 New executive positions (shown in blue) in relation to relevant existing Department for Education, Children and Young People organisational structures.



Recommendation 9.4

1. The Tasmanian Government should fund and restructure the Department for Education, Children and Young People to ensure (in addition to the current roles of Deputy Secretary for Keeping Children Safe, and the Executive Director for Youth Justice):

    a. there is separate executive-level responsibility for out of home care services

    b. there is separate executive-level responsibility for the combined areas of Child Safety Services, the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line and family support services

    c. the classification level of these executive roles reflects the level of risk and responsibility carried by the positions

    d. the holders of these executive roles have knowledge and understanding in the area of child protection or out of home care and experience in providing strategic direction and leadership

    e. executive responsibility for child safeguarding in the education context is not combined with responsibility for child safeguarding in the children and family services context

    f. the role of Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People is established and supported by an Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice (Recommendation 9.7)

    g. the role of the Chief Practitioner is established and supported by an Office of the Chief Practitioner (Recommendation 9.17)

    h. expertise among members of the Department's executive is evenly balanced across the areas of education, Child Safety Services, out of home care, and youth justice

    i. the relevant specialist for out of home care and youth justice in the executive leads policy and practice development for those areas

    j. relevant centralised functions within the Department, such as human resources, procurement, and staff learning and development, address the distinct needs of schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth detention.

2. The Tasmanian Government should ensure that:

    a. the Secretary of the Department demonstrates active efforts to inform themselves about child protection and out of home care through individual professional development

    b. the Deputy Secretary for Keeping Children Safe has knowledge and understanding of the area of child protection or out of home care and experience in providing strategic direction and leadership

    c. the Secretary and Deputy Secretary, and the holders of the new executive roles, have key performance measures that include culture change in Child Safety Services and out of home care

    d. the Secretary and Deputy Secretary, and the holder of the new executive role responsible for out of home care, have key performance measures that include preventing sexual abuse in out of home care

    e. the Department has appropriate processes in place to ensure leaders have the knowledge, skills, aptitude and core capability requirements to effectively manage people and to lead a child safe organisation.

4.2 Governance

The National Royal Commission defined governance in the following way:

> Governance encompasses the systems, structures and policies that control the way an institution operates, and the mechanism by which the institution, and its people, can be held to account. Governance strongly influences an institution's practices and decision-making processes. It is embedded in the good behaviour and the good judgment of those responsible for running an institution.[76]

In talking about out of home care, we use the term 'governance' to describe systems that assist leadership to understand what is happening for children in care and that keep leadership accountable for addressing risks to these children. Good governance also requires structures and systems that provide clarity and direction and enable monitoring and evaluation of progress towards clear goals.[77] In the out of home care context, it is essential that executive leadership understands the experiences of children in care, including the quality of care they are receiving and any risks to children, including any risks of child sexual abuse. This involves monitoring trends and patterns in the out of home care sector, including through reviews of the handling of care concerns, serious events, harmful sexual behaviours or child deaths, and systemic issues.

Dr Kim Backhouse, Chief Executive Officer, Foster and Kinship Carers Association of Tasmania, called for every allegation of child sexual abuse in care to be reported to an agency's board of directors (or equivalent) because:

> At the end of the day, this is a contingent liability for the Board of directors, who have a duty of care to the organisation. If the agency has vulnerable children in their care and these kinds of allegations are being made within the organisation, then the Board needs to know about them.[78]

4.2.1 Challenges in monitoring out of home care

We struggled to identify a clear articulation of the out of home care sector, let alone trends and patterns.

In her first monitoring report in 2019, the Commissioner for Children and Young People, Leanne McLean, noted that the Department could not answer many of her questions about the welfare of children in care. She stated that for the Secretary to exercise the responsibility of guardian, the Department 'needs to have a base level of knowledge about the wellbeing of each child and young person in [out of home care]' and the data systems in place to support reporting and oversight.[79] This had not improved by the Commissioner's second report in 2023, with key information about children in care still difficult to find.[80]

In a similar vein, we found it difficult to obtain a definitive list of out of home care providers from the Department. The Department's first list omitted several providers published in the Commissioner for Children and Young People's monitoring report and which were supplied in a second list provided by the Department.[81]

Through our inquiries, we identified mechanisms that may have monitored the quality and safety aspects of out of home care, including:

- the Care Concerns Monitoring Group, which included the Commissioner for Children and Young People, and was set up to monitor the response to concerns about the care of children in out of home care[82]
- the Serious Events Review Committee, which comprised representatives internal and external to the Department, and oversaw the reports of the Serious Events Review Team.[83] The Serious Events Review Team investigated when a child or young person known to the Child Safety Service had experienced a 'serious event, such as death, serious injury or "near miss"'.[84]

These groups appear to have been disbanded or, at least, are not ongoing.[85] We are unclear as to whether the Care Concerns Monitoring Group ever met.[86] We discuss these groups in Section 11.

4.2.2 Departmental oversight of out of home care

Since establishing our Commission of Inquiry, the Department has convened several committees to oversee the Child Safety Service and out of home care.[87]

First convened in July 2021, the Practice Performance and Governance Committee meets monthly and was described as leading continuous quality improvement of professional practice for the Directorate of Children and Family Services. It is chaired by the Principal Practice Manager, and membership includes managerial staff across out of home care and the Child Safety Service.[88] Standing agenda items include:

- leadership, learning and culture, including practice framework and professional development planning and progress
- accessibility, flexibility and responsiveness of the Child Safety Service
- progress on new service initiatives
- risk management for emerging risks and case reviews of adverse incidents
- communication and information management.[89]

The Child Safety Statewide Service Development Committee was also formed in July 2021.[90] The purpose of this committee was described as providing statewide 'oversight and leadership of service development matters for the Child Safety Service'.[91] The terms of reference outlined the committee's focus as including:

- reviewing and designing services for children and families and related processes
- operational process and procedure review and development
- overseeing working arrangements with other agencies and stakeholders
- workforce planning and management
- continuous improvement.[92]

We were told that a Senior Managers Operations Group Practice and the Executive Leadership Group also met regularly.[93] Our impression was that the Department relies on these meetings for governance. While we welcome these reporting processes, we struggled to identify the extent to which key aspects of out of home care are monitored or strategic direction set through these committees, including reviews of the handling of care concerns, serious events, harmful sexual behaviours or child deaths, as well as systemic issues. The committees would also be hindered by the lack of data and reporting systems the Commissioner for Children and Young People identified. We discuss an outcomes and performance reporting framework in Section 4.5.

4.2.3 Lessons from other jurisdictions

In other jurisdictions, the departments and agencies responsible for out of home care ensure they have a 'line of sight' into the activities of carers. In particular, we heard that other jurisdictions and agencies report all allegations of abuse of children in care to their most senior managers to prevent claims of 'plausible deniability' by those in leadership positions.[94]

Ms Taylor, former Chief Executive of South Australia's Department of Child Protection, acknowledged it was not practical for every issue to be escalated to the Chief Executive or the relevant minister. Instead, she provided deidentified information about care concerns to her minister each month. In her view, however, good governance includes clear guidelines about what information should be escalated to whom and in what circumstances.[95] South Australia's Department for Child Protection also provides details of all serious sexual abuse in care concerns to the Guardian for Children and Young People in Out-of-Home Care.[96]

Dr Robyn Miller, Chief Executive Officer, MacKillop Family Services, and former Chief Practitioner for the Department of Human Services in Victoria, told us that her organisation had established a Residential Care Governance Group, which 'greatly improved oversight over residential care and has led to a targeted and data driven focus on issues' and 'enabled higher level planning and commitment to continuous improvement'.[97] She said similar monitoring could be implemented in Tasmania but requires the analysis of data such as 'Work Health and Safety, Stability of staff in homes, Incident reports, Work Cover'.[98]

4.2.4 Quality improvement and safety

Purposeful systems and structures to monitor and improve safety and to drive continuous improvement are an essential aspect of good governance. Ms Taylor emphasised the need to have roles in the Department that can oversee various quality assurance and continuous improvement approaches, such as 'deep dive[s]' into files to get real data to inform child protection policy and to drive better practice.[99]

We were unclear, based on the evidence we received, as to whether such a function exists.[100]

Secretary Pervan referred to a continuous improvement plan for safeguarding children:

> The Department has had a broader focus on Safeguarding Children, with a Continuous Improvement Plan being developed with specific actions. Some actions have been completed, and others are being progressed or paused due to the transition. The Continuous Improvement Plan included training with Child Wise for managers and directors. Professional learning for employees has now been put on hold, pending the transition [to the new Department].[101]

However, we did not receive a copy of this plan during our Inquiry, nor were its contents or timeframes described, beyond referring to the Child Wise training.[102] We could not locate a current quality and safety framework or quality improvement plan that applied specifically to the Department.

The Department's Practice Manual has a Transparency and Accountability policy and a Service Review and Continuous Improvement policy, both of which were created in 2015. These policies outline the Department's endorsement, at that time, for measuring performance and improving accountability and performance.[103] As with many of the Department's policy documents, these policies have not been reviewed and may not be actively followed in the present, given neither were significantly mentioned in evidence before us.[104]

Secretary Pervan referred to an intention to adopt the 'Signs of Safety Quality Assurance System'.[105] While he provided information about the Signs of Safety approach to child protection (a series of assessment and safety planning tools and approaches used to help determine whether a child living with their family of origin should be removed or can safely remain at home), we did not receive any information during our Inquiry about how it is being used as part of the quality assurance system, and we could not locate such material on the Department's intranet.[106] Its relevance to out of home care was not clear to us.

To the extent the continuous improvement plan for safeguarding children, Transparency and Accountability policy and Service Review and Continuous Improvement policy were driving action within the Department, it was not clear what governance structures there were for monitoring and reviewing this information to drive strategy development and continuous improvement.

We consider the Department could learn from the jurisdictions we discussed above and establish a clear governance structure for monitoring key aspects of out of home care. It should ensure it has a committee (whether already existing or newly established) that monitors the system performance of out of home care, oversees children's safety and wellbeing in out of home care, including child sexual abuse, and monitors progress on implementing the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the national out of home care standards. In other words, it should have the functions of a traditional quality and risk committee. In Section 4.5, we discuss developing an out of home care outcomes and performance reporting framework, which would help this committee monitor the performance of the out of home care system, including case management of children in care.

Given the level of responsibility and risk associated with children in out of home care and the Secretary's role as statutory guardian, we consider the Secretary should chair this committee.

The Department may elect to include relevant external parties, particularly given that, in the future, all providers of out of home care will be non-government organisations.

The functions of the Quality and Risk Committee would complement the oversight and external accountability role of the Commission for Children and Young People and provide greater operational support within the Department. We envisage the committee would also monitor quality and risk issues in the Youth Justice and the Child Safety Service directorates.

Recommendation 9.5

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish a Quality and Risk Committee for Child Safety Services, out of home care, and youth justice.
2. The Secretary of the Department should chair the committee.
3. The functions of the committee should include monitoring:
    a. the system performance of the out of home care sector
    b. the performance against the outcomes and reporting framework (Recommendation 9.9)
    c. children's safety and wellbeing in out of home care, including from child sexual abuse
    d. progress on implementing the Child and Youth Safe Standards and the National Standards for Out-of-Home care
    e. practices in youth detention, including in relation to searches, isolation and the use of force (Recommendations 12.31, 12.32 and 12.33).
4. The committee should report routinely to the Commission for Children and Young People.

4.2.5 Giving children a voice

Governance structures for out of home care should promote the voices of children in care to ensure their views are being heard. Professor Palmer who researches organisational misconduct, stated that children should be explicitly involved in designing child safety measures and have the same status, in terms of rights and obligations, as adults, particularly the right to be believed.[107]

Children's participation and empowerment will allow adult decision-makers, including the executive, to better understand how children in care experience their lives, and how they can better protect children from sexual abuse. Associate Professor Tim Moore, Deputy Director, Institute of Child Protection Studies at the Australian Catholic University, observed:

> Children and young people want to play a part in their own protection and, in building alliances with adults to develop strategies to meet their safety needs they can build confidence, awareness and an ability to turn to adults if they are being harmed. These 'participatory' strategies need to empower individual children and young people through child-friendly and proactive means as well as through collective activities such as youth advisory groups.[108]

The Department must listen to children. Standard 2 of the Child and Youth Safe Standards requires that 'Children and young people are informed about their rights, participate in decisions affecting them and are taken seriously'.[109] In addition, Standard 2 of the national out of home care standards requires 'children and young people participate in decisions that have an impact on their lives'.[110]

At the individual level, Part 1A of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 ('Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act') requires certain principles to be followed when dealing with children, many of which relate to children's rights to participate and be heard:

- treating a child 'with respect' including 'as far as practicable, the informed participation of the child'[111]
- taking the views of the child into account when determining the best interests of a child, 'having regard to the maturity and understanding of the child'[112]
- the child should be able to participate in any decisions that are made under the Act.[113]

It is essential the Department continues to work to make children's participation in decisions that affect them 'practice as usual' in its interactions with children in out of home care. In this section, we discuss children and young people's participation in systemic processes or decision making in out of home care. Children's participation in individual decision-making processes such as their care placement, care plans and case management is a guiding principle in our discussion of these matters below. Also, child-focused frontline practice needs to be reinformed through governance and monitoring that demonstrates the importance the Department places on children's voices in both the decisions that affect them directly as individuals and in the systems and governance of the Department.

In Chapter 19, we further discuss how children can be empowered by providing opportunities for them to participate in decisions that affect them, and in the design or review of systems that relate to them.

A key responsibility of the Child Advocate, whose role in the Department we discuss in detail later in this chapter, is to increase children's participation in decision making in out of home care, at the individual and systemic levels.[114]

The Child Advocate told us: 'systems working with children have a way to go to effectively embed the principle of child participation in practice and uphold children's rights to participate'.[115] She said she convened a time-limited youth consultation forum of children in care to get their input into several systemic improvements. She also developed an online questionnaire for children in care, called Viewpoint, which unfortunately has not been implemented.[116]

We encourage the Department to build on the Child Advocate's previous efforts to empower children in care, so their voices are routinely reflected in the Department's decisions. The Department needs to build child feedback and consultation into its systems and processes, including its quality assurance and improvement system. It should develop an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care, keeping in mind best practice principles for children's participation in organisations.[117] This should include implementing the Viewpoint online questionnaire, or equivalent, without delay.[118] It should also include establishing a permanent youth advisory group to provide continual input into departmental improvements.

Recommendation 9.6

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should, in consultation with the Commission for Children and Young People (Recommendation 18.6), develop an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care. This strategy should have regard to best practice principles for children's participation in organisations at the individual and systemic levels.
2. The empowerment and participation strategy should include:
    a. establishing a permanent out of home care advisory group to be involved in developing the out of home care strategic plan (Recommendation 9.8) and have ongoing input into the out of home care system
    b. building engagement with children into the Department's quality assurance and continuous improvement activities under the strategic plan (Recommendation 9.8)
    c. implementing the Viewpoint online questionnaire without delay
    d. regular monitoring and evaluation of the effectiveness of the empowerment and participation strategy.

3. The out of home care permanent advisory group should:

    a. include children, young people and young adults up to the age of 25 years with current or previous experience of out of home care in Tasmania, including Aboriginal people and people with disability

    b. have clear terms of reference developed in consultation with children, young people and young adults with experience of out of home care

    c. enable its members to participate in a safe and meaningful way and express their views on measures to empower children and young people in out of home care

    d. meet regularly, be chaired by a person independent of the Department and be attended by a senior departmental leader

    e. be adequately funded and resourced.

4.2.6 Aboriginal policy leadership

Aboriginal leadership in the Department is another key pillar in improving the quality of out of home care.

The organisational structure of the new Department does not include an area or role whose specific focus is the safety of Aboriginal children in the child protection, out of home care or youth justice systems. In our view, such a role is essential.

In Section 5, we discuss the growing over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care in Tasmania, which places them at increased risk of sexual abuse in this system. We also describe the Government's efforts to address over-representation. Significant reforms are required in Tasmania to reduce the number of Aboriginal children in out of home care and to protect Aboriginal children in care from sexual abuse. Effectively implementing the reforms we recommend in Section 5 will require carefully building relationships and partnerships with Aboriginal communities and establishing recognised Aboriginal organisations.

The Office of Aboriginal Affairs in the Department of Premier and Cabinet oversees and coordinates the Government's 'significant Aboriginal Affairs agenda', including Closing the Gap.[119] While this presumably includes efforts to achieve Target 12 of the National Agreement on Closing the Gap—to reduce the over-representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children in out of home care by 45 per cent by 2031[120]—we consider that the significant work required to achieve this goal in Tasmania should be led by the department with portfolio responsibility for the child safety and out of home care systems.

In South Australia, the Department for Child Protection includes an Aboriginal Practice Directorate whose role is to ensure the department's practice and services are culturally safe and respond to the needs of Aboriginal children and young people, and their families and communities.[121] The Director of Aboriginal Practice reports to the Deputy Chief Executive and is jointly responsible, with the Deputy Chief Executive, for implementing the department's annual Aboriginal action plans to improve child protection outcomes for Aboriginal children and families.[122] As well as establishing the Aboriginal Practice Directorate, the department has appointed 10 'Principal Aboriginal Consultants' and an 'Aboriginal Lead Practitioner'.[123]

We recommend establishing an Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice in the Department for Education, Children and Young People. This office should be headed by an Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People, who reports directly to the Secretary. They should work closely with the Office of Aboriginal Affairs in the Department of Premier and Cabinet. The Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People should be an identified position.

The Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People should be responsible for:

- overseeing and reporting on the implementation of Recommendation 9.15 (our recommendation for implementing the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle)
- facilitating departmental engagement and building partnerships with Aboriginal communities
- promoting and facilitating the approval of recognised Aboriginal organisations and their involvement in child safety decision making
- ensuring Aboriginal culture, views and interests are represented in the Department's activities
- promoting cultural safety for Aboriginal staff and Aboriginal children and families who encounter the Department
- increasing recruitment of Aboriginal staff in the Department
- implementing policies and procedures to ensure Aboriginal children in care are connected to culture, including through appropriate cultural support plans
- participating in the Quality and Risk Committee's monitoring of metrics concerning Aboriginal children in out of home care.

While this recommendation is driven specifically by our concern for the safety of Aboriginal children in out of home care and their exposure to the risks of sexual abuse while in care, it may also be appropriate for the role of Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People to include responsibilities for Aboriginal children in youth detention and in educational settings. As discussed in Chapter 10, Aboriginal children are grossly over-represented in youth detention in Tasmania and there is a need for specialised responses to Aboriginal children in custodial settings. The Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People could also oversee the implementation of these responses. There may be further benefits for this role to have a holistic focus on Aboriginal children and young people's engagement with services across the Department for Education, Children and Young People.

We are mindful of potential overlap with existing roles. In particular, the Office of Safeguarding Children and Young People is responsible for implementing the recommendations of the Independent Education Inquiry.[124] In Chapter 6, we recommend that this office restrict its focus to schools; a significant task in itself. However, consistent with the principle of self-determination, Aboriginal communities should lead Aboriginal strategy and reform.

In our view, the Department needs a position whose focus is the safety and wellbeing of Aboriginal children in out of home care and that there would be benefit in including youth justice and education in this role. The growing over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care and the serious risks this poses to those children requires urgent, dedicated and sustained attention.

Recommendation 9.7

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should appoint an Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People for the whole of the Department. The office holder should:

a. report directly to the Secretary

b. be supported by a sufficiently resourced Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice

c. oversee and report on the implementation of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle (Recommendation 9.15)

d. facilitate departmental engagement and build partnerships with Aboriginal communities

e. promote and help establish recognised Aboriginal organisations (Recommendation 9.15)

f. ensure Aboriginal culture, views and interests are represented in all departmental activities

g. promote cultural safety for Aboriginal staff and Aboriginal children and families who come into contact with the Department

h. increase recruitment of Aboriginal staff in the Department

i. participate in the Quality and Risk Committee at least every six months in discussions about the number of Aboriginal children in out of home care, the proportion of Aboriginal children placed with Aboriginal carers, the proportion of Aboriginal children in out of home care with a cultural support plan, reunification rates for Aboriginal children and other key performance indicators to be agreed with the Quality and Risk Committee.

4.3 Strategic planning for out of home care

A key pillar of the out of home care system is having a strategic direction for out of home care, including a goal of increasing the safety and wellbeing of children. The Department does not have a strategic plan in place for out of home care.

4.3.1 The state of strategic planning

Since 2007, there have been three main strategic frameworks relevant to out of home care:

- 2007—Out of Home Care Strategic Framework (Department of Health and Human Services)[125]
- 2014—Out of Home Care Reform in Tasmania, which outlined the Government's reform agenda for providing out of home care services[126]
- 2017—Strategic Plan for Out of Home Care in Tasmania (Department of Health and Human Services), which expired in 2019.[127]

These strategic plans were responses to previous reviews and inquiries, but none were fully implemented. They included reforms that, if implemented, would likely have made a significant difference to the safety of children in care.

We examined the most recent Strong Families Safe Kids: Next Steps Action Plan 2021–2023 to see what strategic direction it might provide specifically for out of home care.[128] We understand that the Department had previously directed considerable focus and resources to the original Strong Families, Safe Kids redesign, which had taken precedence over out of home care strategic reform.[129]

The 2021–2023 action plan has a list of priorities for out of home care that appear reasonable, such as improving data collection and developing an out of home care therapeutic framework and standards. However, these priorities are not coordinated under a strategic framework nor directed towards a strategic goal.

The Government described many of the actions under the plan as dependent on the review of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act (which is in progress), the passing of the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, developing a Carer Register and adopting out of home care standards for Tasmania. The out of home care standards have since been released and the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act has been passed. The Department was not expecting to complete other actions until 2024.[130]

4.3.2 The need for a strategic plan for out of home care

We consider that out of home care is not prioritised enough in the current child protection reform agenda. Steps need to be taken to ensure the Department can continue to manage the Strong Families, Safe Kids redesign, as well as to develop and maintain a strategic plan for out of home care and good governance.

Our review of previous strategic plans and policy documents revealed a time when the Department had established systems of governance, quality improvement and oversight. However, over time, the Department lost its focus on embedding these important systems and they are no longer supported.

We recommend that the Department develops a strategic plan for out of home care by July 2024. The strategic plan needs to promote a range of goals and objectives essential to ensuring the safety and wellbeing of children in care. As set out in the recommendations below, these should include goals and objectives discussed in detail elsewhere in this chapter, including:

- completing the transition of out of home care services to the non-government sector (refer to Recommendation 9.2)
- developing and implementing an Aboriginal out of home care model in Tasmania (refer to Recommendation 9.15)
- a process for ongoing carer registration and monitoring (refer to Recommendation 9.20)
- adopting the national out of home care standards and the Child and Youth Safe Standards, and developing an outcomes and performance reporting framework for out of home care (refer to Recommendation 9.3 and Recommendation 9.9)
- a therapeutic model for out of home care (refer to Recommendation 9.18)
- a workforce capacity-building strategy (refer to Recommendation 9.10)
- a comprehensive series of up-to-date policies and procedures (refer to Recommendation 9.8).

Recommendation 9.8

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop a strategic plan for the out of home care system. The plan should include:
    a. a vision for future models of out of home care in Tasmania
    b. the transition plan and commissioning strategy for outsourcing the provision of out of home care to the non-government sector (Recommendation 9.2)
    c. the empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care (Recommendation 9.6)
    d. implementation of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle (Recommendation 9.15)
    e. a commitment to trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care (Recommendation 9.18)
    f. a commitment to the National Standards for Out-of-Home Care and the Child and Youth Safe Standards
    g. a workforce capacity building strategy (Recommendation 9.10)
    h. developing a carer recruitment, support and retention strategy, in consultation with the non-government sector
    i. a process for ongoing carer accreditation, registration and monitoring (Recommendation 9.20)
    j. establishing the outcomes and performance reporting framework (Recommendation 9.9)
    k. building quality assurance and improvement into all activities
    l. an updated framework of policies for the safety and wellbeing of children in care, including updating key policies relating to
        i. complaints handling
        ii. harmful sexual behaviours
        iii. mandatory education for staff in child sexual abuse
        iv. care concern and critical incident reporting and management
        v. child sexual exploitation
        vi. how decisions can be appealed and reviewed

vii. professional conduct

viii. implementing the Child and Youth Safe Standards.

2. All policy documents should be published on the Department's website.
3. Each element of the strategic plan for the out of home care system should have a timeframe attached, with staggered implementation, and the plan should be fully implemented within five years.
4. The Secretary's key performance indicators should require the implementation of the strategic plan for the out of home care system within allocated timeframes.

4.4 Clear policies and procedures

Clear policies and procedures are another key pillar of a well-functioning out of home care system. The National Royal Commission found that children are at increased risk of being sexually abused when the organisation responsible for their care lacks a clear commitment and statement of intent that is reinforced through policies and procedures that promote child welfare and safety.[131] Consequently, the Child Safe Principles, now embedded in the Child and Youth Safe Organisations Act, recognise the importance of organisational policies and procedures in keeping children safe.[132]

Our review of the Department's policy documents most relevant to out of home care identified several areas for improvement, which we discuss below. It is especially difficult for frontline staff, children in care and stakeholders engaged with the Department when policies are inaccessible, out of date or inconsistent, or do not address key areas of providing out of home care.

4.4.1 Lack of accessibility

We reviewed 46 of the Department's policy documents, which included protocols, guidelines, practice directions, fact sheets and flow charts.[133] Overall, we observed that, while most policy documents were available to departmental staff on the Department's intranet, most were not publicly available on the Department's website, nor did foster and kinship carers have access to them.[134]

Similarly, children interviewed for our commissioned research into children's perceptions of safety often reported that they were not aware of their rights, what was expected of the adults who were responsible for their care or what safeguards were in place to ensure they were being protected from harm. They were more likely to identify people outside of the system to whom they would turn if they had concerns or had been harmed, indicating that they were unaware of the mechanisms through which they could disclose abuse or seek help.[135]

The inaccessibility of policy documents in Tasmania is not in keeping with the practices of other Australian child protection jurisdictions. For example, full practice manuals are freely accessible on the Queensland, South Australian, Australian Capital Territory and Victorian departments' websites.[136]

The Child Advocate told us that having policies and procedures publicly available online 'will go a long way in helping to demystify the service and considerably help people to navigate it'.[137] It would also provide greater understanding, accountability and oversight of the Department's actions.

4.4.2 Out of date and incomplete policies

Many policy documents on the Department's intranet are out of date, incomplete or missing. Consequently, even staff who had access to the online Practice Manual may not have located what they needed.

We heard that the Department prefers a more reflective approach to child safety practice that relies less on procedures and is guided more by principles.[138] While this approach may guide the decision making of Child Safety Officers, there are circumstances for which staff need specific policies and procedures to provide clear guidance and support best practice and ethical conduct in their work with children in out of home care. Where a principle-based approach is best practice, those principles and how they can be enacted should be outlined in policies and practice guidance.

Secretary Pervan acknowledged that key policies, such as those relating to care concerns for children in care, were out of date and confusing.[139] The Child Advocate said that the Department's leadership acknowledged there is 'ambiguity and conflict within procedural advice guiding practice' and indicated that progress on addressing this was interrupted by the redesign of the Department in 2021.[140]

Of the 46 policy documents we reviewed, 10 were current (updated within the past two years) and another three had been updated since the National Royal Commission released its recommendations in 2017.[141] Unfortunately, most policy documents we reviewed (the remaining 33) were undated or out of date.[142] Many referred to structures and positions that no longer exist or contained links that no longer work.[143]

4.4.3 Absent policies

Our review identified that the Department does not have a policy position in several key areas relevant to the safety of children in care. We list these key areas here, and explore each issue in more detail in later sections:

- harmful sexual behaviours (refer to Section 10.1)
- mandatory education for staff about child sexual abuse (refer to Section 4.6)

- how decisions can be reviewed or appealed by carers (refer to Section 12.4)
- professional conduct (refer to Section 6.4)[144]
- child sexual exploitation (refer to Section 10.2)
- how the Child and Youth Safe Standards are implemented in the Department.

We also identified a lack of clear policy guidance on quality improvement and safety, and on the reporting framework. We discuss these in the following section.

The absence of policies relevant to these issues places children in care at greater risk of sexual abuse.

4.4.4 Our observations

Overall, the Department's policy framework appears to have been neglected. The Department has reviewed some policies and procedures, but the progress of these reviews has been slow and, in some cases, may have been prompted by announcing our Commission of Inquiry.

Policies should be updated where they are out of date or no longer relevant, and developed where they do not exist. The Department's policies should be publicly accessible and become the reference for service quality benchmarks against which the Department should report to the Government to improve the Department's accountability and transparency. Publicly available policies and procedures will also enable those involved in the out of home care sector—children and young people, families of origin, carers, non-government providers and oversight bodies—to understand their rights and responsibilities, and what to expect from out of home care.

Above, we recommend that the Department's out of home care strategy includes key policies and that these are published on the Department's website.

The Tasmanian Government should enhance its financial and human resources investment in the Department to ensure appropriate policies and procedures can be put in place to protect children in out of home care.

4.5 Outcomes and performance reporting

A quality out of home care system needs strong quality assurance processes and monitoring against key performance measures. In Section 4.2, we recommend a Quality and Risk Committee. In this section, we discuss the need for outcomes and performance reporting.

The National Royal Commission found that the capacity to report on key performance indicators is important for protecting children from sexual abuse.[145] We are concerned about the Department's capacity to do this.

The Department's annual report contains very little information about children in care, their wellbeing or the quality of care they receive.[146] On the Department's website, the 'Services for children youth and families data' ('data dashboard') contains slightly more information than the annual report, reporting seven indicators on a monthly basis: the number of contacts received by the Advice and Referral Line and how many the Line resolved; the number of notifications to the Advice and Referral Line referred to the Child Safety Service for investigation; the 'average daily cases pending child safety assessment' (defined as 'the average number [of] cases referred for a child safety assessment which had not been allocated a case worker within priority timeframes'); the number of children in out of home care; the number of children restored to families; and the number of children transferred to third-party guardianship.[147]

Importantly, neither the Department's annual reports nor the data dashboard have information about performance measures that relate to the quality of care being provided, such as numbers and types of care concerns or complaints, or the number of children who have a current care plan.

In contrast to this level of reporting, the Department of Child Safety, Seniors and Disability Services in Queensland reports quarterly on multiple measures about its performance in out of home care, including allegations of harm for children in care.[148] The department also reports on, among other things, average Child Safety Officer caseloads, living arrangements of children on a child protection order by Aboriginal status and age, the percentage of Aboriginal children who have a cultural support plan, and the number of foster and kinship carer families by Aboriginal status.[149]

Leanne McLean, the Commissioner for Children and Young People, raised similar concerns as we do about the Department's data. In her first monitoring report on out of home care in 2019, Commissioner McLean noted that the Department's quarterly reports to her were incomplete and advocated the need for improved data collection and reporting.[150] In her second report in 2023, she commented that she was determined to 'increase the transparency of the Tasmanian Out-of-Home Care system' by publishing the 'best available data'. However, she had been hampered in her reporting by 'lengthy delays' from the Department in releasing information to her, including previously unpublished data.[151]

We note that a previous departmental framework for monitoring the outcomes for out of home care (developed in 2018) did not progress because it was 'dependent on new data capture capability'.[152] Improved data capture capabilities are necessary for the Department and external parties to properly monitor the wellbeing of children in care.

The Department should focus on monitoring outcomes for children in care that are relevant to increased risk and protection. To do so, the Department should develop a reporting framework that describes the safety and wellbeing of children in care (including all providers) as a key goal in its strategic plan (refer to Recommendation 9.8).

The national out of home care standards provide a starting point for this outcomes and performance reporting framework. They list 13 standards directed at improving the outcomes and experiences of children in care, including ensuring they are safe.[153] The standards correspond with many of the factors that protect children from sexual abuse in care, such as stable placements and safe connections with adults. Each standard has multiple reportable measures. Tasmania has been a signatory to these standards since their release in 2011. The Child and Youth Safe Standards should also be incorporated into the outcomes and performance reporting framework, which will become a requirement of funding agreements with non-government providers. We discuss funding agreements in Section 3.2.

Within the outcomes and performance reporting framework, the Department should require non-government out of home care providers to report any allegations or concerns about actual or risks of sexual abuse of a child in care, including grooming. The Department should record information about each instance, including the following:

- the source of risk or concern—for example, harmful sexual behaviours from another child, child sexual exploitation by an adult outside the care system, or child sexual abuse or related conduct by an adult within the care system
- the type of concern—for example, if actual abuse is alleged, exposure to situational risk or grooming behaviours
- the location of concern—in out of home care (including which type), in another institution, in the family or in the community
- action taken and outcomes.

To properly monitor the welfare of children in care, the Department should ensure providers report against a broad definition of sexual abuse including all forms, sources and signs of sexual abuse and precursor activities such as grooming, boundary breaches or absences from placement.

In establishing an outcomes and performance reporting framework, the Department should also develop the data capability to enable reporting against the framework, and routinely report against the framework.

Recommendation 9.9

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. establish an outcomes and performance reporting framework against which it can measure the performance of the out of home care sector, including in relation to child safety

b. develop the data capability to enable reporting against the framework

c. routinely report against the framework.

4.6 A workforce strategy

Another key pillar of a quality out of home care system is a skilled and supported workforce.

4.6.1 A shortage of staff

The Department does not have enough staff to undertake its core functions. Ms Lovell advised that as of 19 July 2022, there were 42 per cent of Child Safety Officer positions vacant in the North, 70 per cent in the North West and 37 per cent in the South.[154] Ms Lovell said these positions were vacant for several reasons, including planned and unplanned leave and that some roles were 'under recruitment'.[155] She said that COVID-related leave had exacerbated the vacancy situation, particularly in the North of the State, leaving many children without a Child Safety Officer.[156]

Ms Lovell acknowledged that the Department is 'experiencing a challenge' in filling the roles, a problem that has 'persisted for some time' despite employing various strategies to attract staff. She thought perhaps Tasmania's limited labour market with high competition for recruitment of skilled staff might be contributing to the problem.[157] As indicated above, the Child Advocate told us that the Department more broadly has only recently released human resources support to the Child Safety Service to improve recruitment and retention.[158]

Ms Lovell told us that 'inadequate workforce planning' had also led to a structure with many senior positions and frontline staff being promoted quickly into more senior roles, increasing turnover in Child Safety Officer positions. This means that frontline positions are generally held by less experienced staff.[159]

High staff turnover affects the safety of children. We heard that 'many (if not all) children in the out of home care system in Tasmania will have multiple [Child Safety Officers] over the course of their time in care'.[160] A child in care will likely find it increasingly difficult to establish a trusting relationship with each new Child Safety Officer, thus removing a protective factor for that child.[161] Indeed, several children in care interviewed for our commissioned research said they did not have a case worker or didn't know who they were, and often could not identify someone in 'the system' who could support them if they had safety concerns.[162]

We acknowledge that recruiting and retaining suitably skilled staff in child protection and out of home care is universally challenging for child protection services, and that the Department is undertaking planning for this.[163] A further challenge, as expressed by one out of home care provider, is that 'recruiting more case managers is unlikely to improve the situation unless there is also action to address the reasons for staff leaving and to improve staff retention'.[164]

4.6.2 Staff wellbeing

We heard that many staff in the Child Safety Service feel they have been traumatised.[165] Reflecting on the work she undertook with the Department, Ms Enkelmann said:

> I listened with great sadness to the harm experienced by children and young people in [out of home care], but also by carers and workers. People who wanted to care for these children sometimes ended up harmed themselves through burn out, vicarious trauma and overwhelming stress. There are too many good people – capable, hardworking and intelligent workers and carers – who have been harmed by the system in which they work or give their time. This harm continues. While I was prepared for frustration and anger by carers and workers, I was not prepared for the extent of trauma and harm inflicted by a system meant to prevent it.[166]

In addition to the impact on staff from the nature of the work they do, other pressures on the Child Safety Service have likely contributed to some staff members' experiences of trauma or compounded its effects, including the following:

- Departmental systems and structures do not always support staff and in some cases cause them harm.[167] One systemic issue that appeared to be causing harm was the unrealistic caseloads that frontline staff have to manage.[168]
- Staff had not been consulted about strategic decisions, which creates chaos and instability.[169] As a result, some staff feel disempowered to advocate on behalf of the children in their care.[170] As the Child Advocate stated 'children will be heard when staff are heard'.[171]
- Constant change and reprioritisation due to partial reform and 'leadership churn' has caused stress.[172]
- Some staff have experienced harassment, including death threats, and feelings of being disrespected by other professions.[173]

In her July–December 2021 biannual report to the Secretary, the Child Advocate drew on trauma theory to suggest that the Department is 'highly dysregulated' because it is a traumatised system.[174] The Child Advocate asked the question: 'How do we [the Department] achieve stability for children, when the system itself is so unstable?'[175]

The Community and Public Sector Union representing Child Safety Officers submitted to us that staff were leaving because of poor pay and unsustainable working conditions.[176] They reported one anonymous Child Safety Officer as saying:

> We keep coming to work every day because we want the best for the kids but our own system works against us. We aren't supported, we aren't resourced, and we don't have the processes we need to do good jobs. We are abused for the work we do, by other services as much as by clients, but we are powerless to improve the system. We aren't heard or listened to either.[177]

The union also said it 'holds a growing concern that there is an increasing fear among workers about raising concerns'.[178]

A former senior employee, Jack Davenport, described the Department's response to the mental health problems experienced by his colleagues due to vicarious trauma and workload pressures as, at best, 'passive and generally unresponsive'.[179] The union reported that Child Safety Officers would like 'trauma safe workplaces; improved debriefing and leave after major incidents, better mental health support'.[180]

Secretary Pervan told us that staff in the Department do not access their employee assistance service as much as needed, which is possibly the result of a culture of 'stoicism', whereby seeking help is viewed as not being able to do the job.[181] Secretary Pervan also said 'a lot more work needs to be done around … supporting the workforce's wellbeing, not just their professional capacity'.[182] He spoke highly of the Department's workplace health and safety team, who he said provide support to frontline workers, particularly when they take stress leave.[183] The main measure Secretary Pervan proposed to address stoicism was employing wellbeing officers who can 'chip away at that culture' over time.[184] He also referred to the role of Practice Managers to monitor staff wellbeing.[185]

There are staff in the Department who experience work stress as well as direct and vicarious trauma; therefore, trauma is likely embedded in the culture of the organisation. We are concerned about the impact of staff wellbeing on decisions they make, how they relate to stakeholders and how they respond to risk, which in turn may affect their ability to ensure children in care are safe. It appears that the current measures to address wellbeing in the Department, while possibly useful, are not addressing wellbeing effectively at the individual or the system level.

4.6.3 A workforce strategy

While we acknowledge the Department's recent efforts to improve workforce planning, the Department needs to develop a workforce strategy for now and into the future to recruit and retain staff who case manage children in care. This workforce strategy should form part of its out of home care strategic plan as outlined in Recommendation 9.8. The workforce strategy should identify the reasons skilled staff choose not to work for the Department or choose to leave prematurely and address these reasons in a meaningful way to improve the Department's reputation as an employer of choice.

In developing the workforce strategy, the Government may wish to consider approaches adopted by other jurisdictions to attract and retain a specialist workforce in similar areas. It should work with its national counterparts to leverage national incentives to increase staffing levels, such as immigration policies and subsidised tertiary education fees.[186]

Staff in the child and family welfare and out of home care sector move between the Department and other departments or non-government organisations. The Department's workforce strategy should take a whole of sector approach to generating long-term solutions to meeting the workforce needs of Tasmania's child and family welfare sector, while paying particular attention to the structural and systemic issues contributing to the view of the Department as an employer of choice.

If it is to improve the safety of children in care, the Department should include actions in its workforce strategy that explicitly address the wellbeing of the workforce. The measures the Department puts in place should be proportionate to what staff require to maintain their wellbeing and mitigate the risk of vicarious trauma.[187]

Recommendation 9.10

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should develop a workforce strategy for the child and family welfare sector to pursue the following objectives:

a. an increase in staff numbers and retention

b. workplace conditions that make the sector a more attractive employer, particularly in the Department

c. a reduction in unplanned staff vacancies, particularly in the Department

d. promoting staff wellbeing, at the individual and system levels, including by addressing the causes and effects of trauma and vicarious trauma

e. a workforce equipped with the knowledge and skills to respond effectively to the needs of children and families.

4.6.4 Child Safety Service staff minimum professional development

Ongoing professional development across out of home care services is critical to supporting quality of care for, and safeguarding of, children in care.[188]

At the time of writing, the mandatory professional development requirements for departmental staff are limited to inducting a staff member into a role. During their induction period, Child Safety Officers complete 12 education modules within a specified timeframe. Most of these modules cover basic child protection practice, but there are no modules specific to identifying and responding to child sexual abuse.[189] The Department 'encourages', but does not require, that staff refresh their skills and knowledge of these core topics periodically.[190]

The Department makes an extensive range of educational modules available to staff on an optional basis. These include modules on child sexual abuse and trauma-informed care, such as those on 'Working with Children with Sexualised Behaviours', 'Responding to Child Sexual Exploitation' and 'Introduction to Keeping Children Safe – how to engage with Tasmania Police when responding to allegations of child sexual abuse'.[191]

This range of educational modules provides a solid basis for professional development, assuming that the quality of these modules is high. Such education should assist staff to act in ways that help protect children in care. However, many of these modules should be mandatory for all staff. Also, staff should be expected to engage in a minimum number of professional development hours or activities per year.

4.6.5 Carer development

Capable and skilled carers can decrease the risk of sexual abuse and improve the response when it does occur.

All foster carers (but not kinship or paid residential carers) undertake the 'Shared Stories Shared Lives' educational module.[192] However, we were told there was no central record of the further education or professional development of carers.[193]

The Foster and Kinship Care Association of Tasmania is funded to provide professional development modules to carers from all agencies, but each out of home care provider also organises education for its own carers.[194] Dr Backhouse, from the Foster and Kinship Carers Association, told us that this approach to ongoing education for carers is not coordinated and results in unnecessary duplication.[195]

Some non-government out of home care providers spend a considerable amount each year on training their carers.[196] Former departmental employees told us that carers who are managed directly by the Department however, may not receive the level and breadth of ongoing education that non-government out of home care providers require of the carers they support.[197] These carers can only access the Foster and Kinship Carers Association sessions on an elective basis.[198] As a result, many carers may not engage in ongoing education.

Dr Backhouse expressed particular concern about this lack of ongoing education available to Department foster carers, who she said tended to be older carers who had been caring for children for a long time.[199]

Children interviewed for our commissioned research were often sceptical about their carers' knowledge and skills, particularly in relation to understanding and managing their trauma. The consequences of this were significant for some, who reported that their carers used disciplinary practices that caused them harm and could not give them the care and empathy they needed; this often resulted in placement breakdown.[200]

We consider that all carers should be required to attend a minimum level of professional development.

4.6.6 Understanding child sexual abuse and trauma

All staff and carers in the out of home care system need to understand child sexual abuse and respond appropriately if it does occur.[201]

We were told that specific knowledge of child sexual abuse, or experience working with children who have been sexually abused, were not requirements for the role of a Child Safety Officer. Neither was it mandatory to gain knowledge on the topic.[202]

During her time in the Victorian Department of Human Services, Dr Miller observed that Child Safety Officers often made mistakes when assessing the risk of sexual abuse because they lacked knowledge about the dynamics of sexual offending and how to gather information or evidence in relation to allegations.[203] Former employees said they had observed Child Safety Officers face similar difficulties in the Tasmanian Department.[204]

Dr Miller identified the need to specifically educate out of home care workers about sexual abuse for children in care, which she included as a key component of MacKillop Family Services' 'Power to Kids' program.[205] She said, as a result of that program, which sought to upskill workers to have 'brave conversations' with children in their care about sexual risks, workers could identify and intervene when they detect a sexual risk.[206] Dr Miller told us that consequently, there have been fewer incidences of harmful sexual behaviours, child sexual exploitation and dating violence in MacKillop's residential care homes.[207]

For Tasmanian carers, the Foster and Kinship Carers Handbook has a short section on responding to children who disclose sexual abuse.[208] However, Ms Enkelmann told us that there was no specific education routinely provided to carers on how to respond to disclosures of sexual abuse by children in their care.[209] Dr Backhouse suggested that carers would benefit from more information about how to support children who disclose sexual abuse.[210]

Understanding trauma is also essential to protecting children in care from sexual abuse and effectively responding when abuse happens. Other jurisdictions have adopted trauma-informed care models. For example, the Sanctuary Model is applied in MacKillop Family Services' residential care homes across Victoria and New South Wales. This model involves educating staff at all levels across the organisation in trauma and trauma-informed practice.[211] We are aware of other models of this nature; for example, some Australian out of home care providers such as Life Without Barriers use the 'Children and Residential Experiences' model developed by Martha and Jack Holden of Cornell University.[212]

While the Department offers several (mostly) elective professional development modules about trauma and trauma-informed therapeutic care, the Department's approach to trauma-informed care is not consistent.[213] We heard from Mary Dickins, a foster carer, that the Department's standard 'Shared Stories Shared Lives' sessions do not adequately prepare foster carers for the challenges of parenting a traumatised child, and that more guidance and support is needed.[214]

4.6.7 Knowledge and skill development

All departmental staff, non-government staff and volunteers in out of home care services, and residential, foster and kinship carers, should receive mandatory education specifically about child sexual abuse. Moreover, because child sexual abuse often co-occurs with other forms of child maltreatment, this education should cover identifying and responding to child sexual abuse, including grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation. Carers should also have mandatory professional development on trauma and trauma-informed care. They should keep their knowledge current through regular, mandatory refresher sessions or continuing professional development.[215] Ensuring such education is mandatory signals to staff, carers and children in care that the Department values the welfare of children in care and will not tolerate sexual abuse in any form.[216]

In our view, the Department in its role of overseeing the out of home care system, should determine the core knowledge and skills required for staff in non-government organisations providing carer assessment and support, as well as for residential, foster and kinship carers. It should also ensure non-government out of home care staff and carers have access to professional development in core knowledge and skills, recognising existing high-quality training available in Tasmania and developing or funding new training where required.

The Department will need to consider any systemic barriers to carers taking part in knowledge and skills development and consider options such as online modules, assistance with literacy difficulties or providing onsite childcare to support their participation. This will ensure a consistent high level of care is provided to children in out of home care and reduce duplication of sessions offered between providers with associated cost efficiencies.[217]

Professional development should also include the components of a trauma-informed therapeutic model of care for out of home care (refer to Recommendation 9.18). When establishing the Carer Register (refer to Recommendation 9.20), the Department should mandate that carers are trained in these key areas before gaining registration. The Department should ensure carers' skills and knowledge are refreshed periodically to maintain their registration. Professional development and registration processes for kinship carers should consider the different (and usually unplanned) pathway into caring for kinship carers.

The Department's overall aim should be to ensure mandatory education is delivered to as many people in the sector as possible in the most cost-effective way. Given the remote locations of some carers and staff, attention will need to be given to making professional development accessible. The Department may find it more cost-efficient to centralise some aspects of professional development across all its child-facing service areas but should ensure professional development is tailored to the specific contexts of each of the service areas.

Also, there will be core knowledge, such as in the areas of child sexual abuse and trauma, required for Child Safety Officers, residential carers and foster and kinship carers. However, the depth of knowledge and skills expected for each group will differ. Some staff and carers will need more advanced skills and knowledge than others. Therefore, it would be useful to include basic and advanced level modules, with all residential care staff, foster and kinships carers and volunteers completing at least basic education modules, with regular refresher or continuous professional development sessions. Consistent with the demands of their roles, Child Safety Officers will require a more advanced level of induction, continuous upskilling and professional development.

As discussed in Section 6.4, the Department should develop professional conduct policies that outline standards of behaviour for staff, volunteers and carers when interacting with and caring for children in care (refer to Recommendation 9.19). These policies should be specific to the nature and context of their role in caring for children. The Department should mandate regular professional development relevant to the professional conduct policy to reduce 'ethical drift' away from appropriate behaviour. The Foster and Kinship Carers Handbook will need updating to reflect the professional conduct policy and support carers to respond appropriately to the risk of sexual abuse in out of home care.

Recommendation 9.11

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish mandatory core knowledge requirements for Child Safety Officers, which include an understanding of:
    a. child sexual abuse, including grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
    b. the effects of trauma, trauma-informed care and therapeutic responses to trauma
    c. ethical and professional conduct.
2. The Department should ensure Child Safety Officers attain this knowledge during their induction period.
3. The Department should provide regular refresher training and continuous professional development opportunities to enable Child Safety Officers to continue to advance their knowledge and skills (advanced professional development).
4. In its role of overseeing the out of home care system, the Department should:
    a. determine the core knowledge and skills required for staff in non-government organisations providing carer assessment and support, and for residential, foster and kinship carers
    b. ensure non-government out of home care staff and carers have access to professional development in core knowledge and skills, recognising existing high-quality training available in Tasmania and developing or funding new training where required.

Recommendation 9.12

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should ensure the Foster and Kinship Carers Handbook is updated to include:
    a. information applicable to all carer types
    b. more information on child sexual abuse, including harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
    c. mandatory reporting requirements for carers
    d. the professional conduct policy for foster and kinship carers.

2. The Department should:
    a. make the Handbook available publicly on its website
    b. ensure the Handbook is regularly updated in line with any relevant changes to policy.

4.6.8 Learning organisation

Dr Miller emphasised the importance of a 'learning culture' for teams to function effectively in out of home care:

> Well-functioning and cohesive teams can be established and maintained through regular high quality supervision, reflective practice, a clear leadership presence in the residential care that supports / reinforces expectations and maintain an environment that acknowledges successes and learns from mistakes and critical incidents.[218]

Caroline Brown, a veteran of child protection across several jurisdictions, told us that the Department would make better, more consistent decisions (and likely attract less criticism) if it adopted an 'open approach to learning and critical thinking, analysis [and] reflective practice'.[219] Mr Davenport similarly stated that in addition to developing and delivering professional development for staff, the out of home care system in Tasmania needs to become 'a learning culture' that is 'open and reflective'.[220]

Ms Taylor, from South Australia's Department of Child Protection, told us how her department has dedicated roles that integrate new lessons into strategy, reform, quality and practice, which all staff are told about during monthly professional development sessions.[221] Her department's lead practitioner has developed practice guidance papers based on emerging evidence or lessons from critical incident reviews.[222]

The Tasmanian Department should implement purposeful mechanisms and processes to support and encourage a learning culture internally. We have recommended an Office of the Chief Practitioner (refer to Recommendation 9.17) and a Quality and Risk Committee (refer to Recommendation 9.5) as two ways to support and encourage a learning culture internally. Other mechanisms may include practice reviews and the implementation of reflective practice in individual or group supervision (refer to Section 6.2).

A learning culture is also supported through external learning partnerships.

As one of the smallest Australian child protection jurisdictions, the Tasmanian Department may not have enough scale to always undertake its own research, which would require specialist research knowledge and skills. The Department could look to child protection agencies in other jurisdictions that have developed learning partnerships to reflect on strengths and limitations in their practice and to support the development of best practice policy and practice guidance.

In the South Australian context, for instance, the Department for Child Protection has developed strategic partnerships with universities.[223] Ms Taylor also told us how important it was for the Department to 'use the knowledge and skills from other jurisdictions' and that '[t]here is a great strength in the child protection network nationally'.[224] The University of South Australia had also partnered with the Western Australian Department of Communities and the Australian Centre for Child Protection to develop a framework around harmful sexual behaviours among children and young people, and to provide workforce development in trauma and harmful sexual behaviours.[225] This type of partnering was a cost-efficient approach for a small jurisdiction.

A learning organisation also takes a continuous approach to professional development to support the workforce to advance their knowledge and skills and keep up to date with evolving evidence over the life of their careers. Micro-credentialling, which certifies the learning of a defined set of skills, knowledge and attributes through short courses, is growing quickly in higher education as a way for people to 'rapidly upskill and encourage lifelong learning'.[226] Such an approach incentivises learning, and staff feel valued by the investment in their ongoing development. In partnering with a centre of learning in the field of child protection and out of home care, the Department should take the opportunity to develop a micro-credentialling pathway to incentivise staff to stay in the child and family welfare sector as a vocation and ensure they have up-to-date evidence-based knowledge and skills.[227]

The Department should prioritise the development of links with other jurisdictions and child protection and out of home care research specialists to ensure departmental staff are aware of, and able to implement, contemporary, evidence-based approaches to keeping children safe in care.

Recommendation 9.13

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should ensure staff have access to the latest out of home care practice knowledge by becoming a learning organisation, including by:

a. implementing purposeful means for critical reflection and internal review

b. establishing strategic partnerships with specialist out of home care, child maltreatment and child protection researchers

c. engaging in cross-jurisdictional partnerships where there are opportunities for shared learning

d. developing opportunities for formal recognition of ongoing learning for staff through these partnerships, such as via micro-credentialling pathways.

5 Keeping Aboriginal children safe and connected to culture

The over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care exposes them to the risks of experiencing sexual abuse in care at a substantially higher rate than non-Aboriginal children.

There are several other factors that place Aboriginal children at increased risk of sexual abuse in Tasmanian out of home care. These include the limited involvement of Aboriginal communities and organisations in decision making about Aboriginal children in care, inappropriate out of home care placements for Aboriginal children, and a lack of cultural support and connection for Aboriginal children in care.

As indicated above, the 2020 National Agreement on Closing the Gap ('Closing the Gap') aims to reduce the rate of over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care by 45 per cent by 2031 (Target 12).[228] The Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander First Action Plan 2023-2026 and Closing the Gap identify the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle ('Placement Principle') as a key indicator for measuring progress towards achieving Target 12.[229] Despite its name suggesting that it focuses solely on the 'placement' of Aboriginal children, the Placement Principle has five elements:

- prevention
- partnership
- placement
- participation
- connection.[230]

Full implementation of the Placement Principle is critical to reducing Aboriginal over-representation in Tasmanian out of home care, improving responses to Aboriginal children in care and protecting them against the risk of child sexual abuse.

This section:

- explains our approach to the question of Aboriginal status in Tasmania
- briefly describes the drivers of Aboriginal over-representation in Tasmanian out of home care
- examines the Tasmanian Government's recent efforts to address over-representation in out of home care and the extent to which it has embedded the Placement Principle in legislation, policy and practice
- makes recommendations for fully implementing the Placement Principle in Tasmania.

5.1 Identifying Aboriginality

Not all Aboriginal children who come into care have their Aboriginal status identified, as was the case for Hudson (a pseudonym) in the case example in Chapter 8.[231] Not only did Hudson's carer tell us Hudson experienced sexual abuse while in care, but they also said Hudson was denied the opportunity to get involved in community and for cultural support that may have assisted their healing.

In almost every meeting we had with Aboriginal communities, participants raised concerns about how Aboriginal status is determined in Tasmania and who is responsible for determining it. This issue was also raised by Heather Sculthorpe, Chief Executive Officer, Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre, in her evidence.[232] We heard differing views about this issue, many of which were also reflected in the 2021 Pathway to Truth-Telling and Treaty report.[233] We agree that it must be for Aboriginal people to decide who is and who is not Aboriginal in Tasmania. It is beyond the scope of our Inquiry to make recommendations on this issue. However, it is within our terms of reference to address the increased risk of sexual abuse that Aboriginal children face in Tasmanian out of home care due to their over-representation in that system. To address this risk, the out of home care system must ensure Aboriginal children stay connected to their Aboriginal community and culture. Therefore, it is important to make two points.

First, in this section we refer to 'Aboriginal children in out of home care in Tasmania', rather than 'Tasmanian Aboriginal children in out of home care'. We have adopted this terminology because our recommendations are aimed at ensuring all Aboriginal children in out of home care in Tasmania, not only those recognised as having Tasmanian Aboriginal ancestry, are responded to in keeping with the Placement Principle and receive the benefit of services that Aboriginal organisations provide.

Second, it is crucial that the Aboriginal status of children in contact with the Child Safety Service be sensitively ascertained and accurately recorded as early as possible. Services for Children and Families staff are required to determine a client's Aboriginal status every time the client 'commence[s] an involvement with' the service.[234] Until recently, it seems that Aboriginal status has not always been consistently identified or accurately recorded.[235] However, in his statement, Secretary Pervan indicated that the Department was '[i]mproving collection and completion of Aboriginal status for children at the Advice and Referral Line and Child Safety Service'.[236] The Commissioner for Children and Young People confirmed that the Department had advanced significantly in this regard. In the time between her first and second monitoring reports on out of home care in Tasmania in 2019 and 2023, the proportion of children in care with an 'unknown' Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander status had fallen from 30 per cent to 1 per cent.[237]

5.2 Drivers of Aboriginal over-representation in out of home care

The rate of over-representation of Aboriginal children in Tasmanian out of home care has steadily increased since 2017.[238] This is an alarming trend that is not unique to Tasmania.

The 2022 Family Matters report identifies structural factors and service inadequacies that contribute to Aboriginal families encountering child protection systems and Aboriginal children entering out of home care at high rates.[239] These include:

- systemic racism in the child protection and other service systems[240]
- individual and collective experiences of trauma (including intergenerational trauma) resulting from colonisation[241]
- poverty and socioeconomic disadvantage stemming from colonisation[242]
- exposure to family violence[243]
- parental drug and alcohol misuse[244]
- mental health issues, including risks to children's mental health resulting from involvement with the child protection and out of home care systems[245]
- poor access to safe, affordable and quality housing[246]
- inadequate government investment in Aboriginal-led and culturally appropriate family support services.[247]

We heard evidence indicating that many of these factors are present in Tasmania.[248] In particular, we heard that systemic or institutional racism is a problem in the child safety system. According to Ms Sculthorpe:

> … every level of the child safety system has reinforced stereotypes about Aboriginal families, especially those families with previous experience of the child welfare and child protection systems … In some cases the community nature of child rearing has been misinterpreted as parental neglect of children … There has been a failure of child welfare authorities to recognise the strengths of Aboriginal family and community rather than concentrating solely on deficits.[249]

Several participants at our consultations with Aboriginal communities referred to the racism Aboriginal people continue to experience at the hands of government systems.[250] In relation to the child safety system, one community member said:

> I want to know why they look at Aboriginal people so harshly, why they judge us differently to everyone else. We're probably the most caring people in the world.[251]

Some participants referred to their lack of trust in the child protection and out of home care systems, indicating that Aboriginal children were removed from their families far too readily.[252]

Elders told us about the ongoing effects of intergenerational trauma on Aboriginal communities, including its adverse effects on the parenting skills of Aboriginal people, and the lack of support to address such trauma.[253] One participant told us:

> The internal and external bruises that come from being in foster care last for generations.[254]

The 1997 Bringing Them Home report highlighted the intergenerational effects of child removal and the 'direct association' between being removed as a child and later having a child removed.[255] More recently, research published in 2017 about the intergenerational links in the child protection system in New South Wales found that 60 per cent of Aboriginal children and young people in out of home care in 2014–15 had a parent who was known to the child protection system compared with 43 per cent of non-Aboriginal children and young people who were in out of home care in 2014–15.[256]

Participants in our community consultations also referred to the lack of safe and affordable housing for Aboriginal families and the absence of culturally safe support services—in particular, mental health and drug and alcohol services and support for family violence.[257] Several participants identified the need for improved mental health services for Aboriginal people, particularly children.[258]

All these factors are complex and interrelated. For the purposes of our Inquiry, they can be usefully considered through the lens of the Placement Principle.

5.3 Tasmania's efforts to implement the Placement Principle

In 2017, the National Royal Commission recommended that state and territory governments develop and execute plans to fully implement the Placement Principle.[259] The Tasmanian Government accepted this recommendation in principle.[260]

SNAICC - National Voice for Our Children ('SNAICC') undertakes an annual review of the progress of states and territories in implementing the Placement Principle. In its most recent review of Tasmania's progress, completed in 2021, SNAICC found limited implementation of the Placement Principle in Tasmania:

> Limited mechanisms to ensure Aboriginal participation in policy reform, decision-making, system and service design, or delivery has resulted in a child safety system that does not always meet the needs of Aboriginal children, their families, and communities.[261]

The Family Matters Report 2022 identified that Tasmania spends only 0.79 per cent of its total child protection expenditure on Aboriginal community organisations, by far the lowest of all Australian states.[262] Since then, the Government has made other commitments to fully implement the Placement Principle.[263] Most recently, the Tasmanian Government became a signatory to the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander First Action

Plan 2023-2026 under Safe and Supported: The National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children 2021-2031, which was released on 31 January 2023.[264] 'Action 5-Active Efforts' commits the Government to:

> … implementing all 5 elements of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle (ATSICPP), and improving the accountability of all governments and sectors in reducing the over-representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children and young people in child protection systems.[265]

5.3.1 Prevention

According to the 'prevention' element of the Placement Principle, each Aboriginal child 'has the right to be brought up within their own family and community'.[266] This requires that Aboriginal families have equal access to high-quality and culturally safe social supports, including targeted and intensive supports to address issues in family functioning and parental issues such as trauma, mental ill-health and family violence, as well as adequate housing.[267] It also requires governments to address institutional racism in child protection systems and other structural drivers of Aboriginal over-representation in out of home care.[268]

It is beyond the scope of our Inquiry to undertake a comprehensive assessment of prevention and early intervention services available to Aboriginal families that contribute to preventing or limiting the entry of Aboriginal children into out of home care.

However, we note that the Tasmanian Government funds the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre to provide intensive family engagement services to Aboriginal families whose children are at risk of being removed. Funding for this program is allocated on a per-family basis, described as a 'best practice funding model' that recognises the high level of support required for some families.[269] Packages enable the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre to develop tailored plans that focus on the physical, mental, social and cultural health and wellbeing of the entire family.[270] An evaluation of the Intensive Family Engagement Services program, undertaken in 2019, showed that almost 70 per cent of families that completed the program continued to care for their children.[271] This is a positive prevention measure.

SNAICC has suggested that the funding for family support and intensive family support in Tasmania be increased as a proportion of spending on child protection services.[272] Also, the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre's services are limited to Aboriginal children and families with Tasmanian Aboriginal ancestry as recognised by the centre.

We also note that, since 2020, three Aboriginal Liaison Officers have been appointed to the Department's Advice and Referral Line. These positions are located within Aboriginal organisations in each Tasmanian region. The Aboriginal Liaison Officer's role is to provide culturally focused advice and assistance to Aboriginal families. This may include referring families to Intensive Family Engagement Services, youth support or other Aboriginal support services.[273] The appointment of Aboriginal Liaison Officers is a positive prevention initiative. However, a Tasmanian Auditor-General report published in June 2022 found that the Aboriginal Liaison Officer roles 'have wide coverage and limited capacity and are not resourced to deliver fully all aspects of their role'.[274]

The 2021 Family Matters report recommended that states and territories increase investment in universal and targeted early intervention and prevention services for Aboriginal families, including family support and reunification services, at a rate equivalent to the representation of Aboriginal children in child protection.[275]

While Secretary Pervan indicated that the Department delivers education and resourcing to staff 'to develop cultural competency and culturally safe practice', we understand it is not mandatory.[276]

The Tasmanian Government has committed to establishing 'a range of initiatives to directly address and eliminate racism within and across the State Service' as part of implementing Closing the Gap.[277] This should include measures to address institutional racism in the Child Safety Service that may be contributing to the over-representation of Aboriginal children in the out of home care system.

5.3.2 Partnership

The 'partnership' element of the Placement Principle focuses on self-determination—the right of Aboriginal communities to exercise autonomy in their own affairs.[278] Self-determination involves more than consultation and participation; it requires that decision-making authority is transferred from governments to Aboriginal communities.[279]

In relation to the child safety and out of home care systems, the transfer of decision-making authority from government to Aboriginal organisations could take different forms. For example, Aboriginal organisations could be authorised or delegated to:

- case manage Aboriginal children on care and protection orders
- assume the role of statutory guardian of Aboriginal children who would otherwise be under the guardianship of the Secretary
- undertake investigations where a notification is made about an Aboriginal child, and be primarily responsible for decisions about that child
- receive notifications about Aboriginal children.

In 2014, the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre published luwutina mana-mapali krakani waranta – Keeping Our Children With Us. In preparing the report, the centre undertook extensive consultation with Aboriginal people and made 10 recommendations to improve the Tasmanian child protection system for Aboriginal children. The first, and principal, recommendation was:

> That the Tasmanian Government accept the wish of the Aboriginal community in Tasmania for the transfer of jurisdiction over child welfare and child protection to the Aboriginal community.[280]

This recommendation would appear to involve a complete transfer of all child safety decision-making authority and powers under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act, including the powers exercised by the Children's Court in relation to making care and protection orders. The report did not specify how equivalent decisions would be made after such a transfer of jurisdiction—for example, where a child needed to be removed from their family, but the family did not agree with this decision. However, the report recommended that the Act be amended to enable Aboriginal people 'to opt to have their matters dealt with under Aboriginal jurisdiction rather than under the Tasmanian legislation', suggesting that Aboriginal jurisdiction would not be exercised under the Act.[281]

Such a transfer of jurisdiction would enable full self-determination for Aboriginal communities for decisions about the care and protection of Aboriginal children. No Australian jurisdiction has yet effected such a large-scale transfer of authority to Aboriginal communities.

However, two jurisdictions—Victoria and Queensland—have taken 'essential first steps' towards implementing legislative, policy and practice changes to authorise Aboriginal organisations to make certain child protection decisions about Aboriginal children.[282]

In Victoria, the legislative framework allows the principal officer of an Aboriginal agency to 'perform specified functions and exercise specified powers conferred on the Secretary … in relation to a protection order' in respect of an Aboriginal child, or a non-Aboriginal child who is a sibling of an Aboriginal child subject to a relevant authorisation.[283] The Victorian Government has also made significant investment to transfer case management of Aboriginal children in out of home care from the Department of Families, Fairness and Housing and non-Aboriginal service providers to Aboriginal community-controlled organisations.[284] As an example of this model, Professor Muriel Bamblett, Chief Executive Officer, Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, told us that she has statutory guardianship of just over 100 Aboriginal children on certain child protection orders, and her organisation provides a number of forms of case management and support for those children.[285] She reported achieving a higher rate of reunification of Aboriginal children with their families—between 22 and 25 per cent—compared with the Victorian Department's reunification rate of between 12 and 15 per cent for Aboriginal children.[286] The Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency is involved in the next step—a trial of Aboriginal-led child protection investigations.[287]

In Queensland, the Child Protection Act 1999 (Qld) ('Queensland Child Protection Act') was similarly amended in 2017–18 to establish a framework for delegating the functions or powers of the Chief Executive of the Department of Children, Youth

Justice and Multicultural Affairs in relation to an Aboriginal child who needs protection or is likely to need protection.[288] These functions or powers may be delegated to an Aboriginal person who is the Chief Executive Officer of an 'appropriate Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander entity', and who is 'suitable' and 'appropriately qualified' to perform the delegated function or exercise the delegated power in relation to the child.[289] In 2021–22, the Queensland Government partnered with two Aboriginal community-controlled organisations and the Queensland Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Protection Peak to implement delegated authority for 40 children.[290]

In Tasmania, section 10G of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act provides that Aboriginal families, kinship groups, communities and organisations 'have a major, self-determining role in promoting the wellbeing of Aboriginal children' and that a kinship group, Aboriginal community or Aboriginal organisation nominated by the child's family should 'be allowed to contribute to the making of a decision under this Act in relation to the child'.[291] Similarly, the Child Safety Service practice advice states that the Aboriginal community 'must have a say about Aboriginal children'.[292]

Despite these legislative and policy requirements, we heard that the Department's involvement of Aboriginal organisations in decision making about Aboriginal children was inconsistent. Ms Sculthorpe told us that the Department has:

- not always been willing to work with the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre to identify placement options for Aboriginal children
- allowed non-Aboriginal non-government organisations to provide services to Aboriginal children in out of home care without consultation with the Aboriginal community
- on occasion failed to notify the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre when Aboriginal children in out of home care have been moved to different placements, with some children 'lost to the community' for a period
- ignored warnings from Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre staff of suspected sexual abuse or neglect by foster carers and, where those suspicions had been confirmed, failed to explain departmental decision-making processes.[293]

Aboriginal community members told us that partnerships between the Department and Aboriginal organisations can work well, but they depend on the personalities of the people involved.[294] They told us that the Child Safety Service does not listen enough to Aboriginal families, particularly in relation to culture, and does not understand the ways in which Aboriginal communities raise their children.[295]

Participants told us that self-determination in the child safety system was critical: 'We need our own Aboriginal people involved with a system to handle our Aboriginal children'.[296]

The notions of 'promoting wellbeing', 'being allowed to contribute' and 'having a say' are inadequate expressions of Aboriginal self-determination in decisions about the care and protection of Aboriginal children. Structures should be in place to support Aboriginal self-determination in child safety decision making as committed to under the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander First Action Plan 2023-2026.[297]

As part of its implementation plan to reduce the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care, the Government has committed to work with Aboriginal community-controlled organisations:

- to build their capacity to take on increased roles and responsibilities in the care and protection of Aboriginal children and to promote Aboriginal self-determination
- in relation to all planning and decision making for Aboriginal children in the child protection system
- to develop Aboriginal programs to deliver services to support Aboriginal children in the child protection system.[298]

Secretary Pervan indicated that the Tasmanian Government is making $5.3 million in funding available through the Closing the Gap Capacity Building Funding Program, which aims to build the capacity of Aboriginal organisations to co-design and deliver programs and services for Aboriginal people.[299]

These commitments are positive because they broadly focus on increasing Aboriginal self-determination for child safety. However, they lack detail, timeframes and allocated funding (apart from funding for capacity building). We did not see any specific evidence of progress on these actions.

The ad hoc approach to involving Aboriginal organisations in child safety decision making does not serve the interests of Aboriginal children in, or at risk of entering, the out of home care system. Self-determination requires that Aboriginal organisations be empowered to make decisions about the care and protection of Aboriginal children. There are different ways to achieve this.

Experience from jurisdictions where the transfer of decision-making authority has begun needs to be carefully considered. These processes require significant, long-term government investment, partnership and support.

In considering examples from other jurisdictions, we were also mindful of:

- the need to design an appropriate model or models for Tasmanian contexts
- the possibility of developing different models for different Aboriginal communities depending on the size, capacity and desire of specific Aboriginal organisations or groups to take on specific roles (refer to discussion under 'Participation')

- the need to ensure Aboriginal communities and organisations are fully resourced and their workforces fully supported to take on decision-making authority, in whatever form it is transferred
- the need for Aboriginal communities and organisations to be invested in and supported to enable them to perform functions transferred to them.

5.3.3 Placement

The 'placement' element of the Placement Principle requires that Aboriginal children who are removed from their families be placed according to the following hierarchy:

- Aboriginal relatives or extended family members, or other relatives or extended family members
- Aboriginal members of the child's community
- Aboriginal family-based carers.[300]

If none of these options is available, as a last resort the child may be placed with a non-Aboriginal carer or in a residential setting.[301] If the child is not placed with their extended Aboriginal family, the placement must be geographically close to the child's family.[302] Best practice requires child safety decision-makers to:

- exhaust all possible options at one level of the hierarchy before considering a lower-level placement
- consult with the child's family and community representatives to ensure all possible higher-level placement options have been considered.[303]

Section 10G of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act prioritises placement of an Aboriginal child, as far as practicable, with 'a member of the child's family'.[304] If this is not possible, then the child should be placed with an Aboriginal person in the child's community 'in accordance with local community practice' or with another Aboriginal person.[305] Last, is placement with a non-Aboriginal person who 'in the Secretary's opinion, is sensitive to the child's needs and capable of promoting the child's ongoing affiliation with the culture of the child's community and, if possible, the child's ongoing contact with his or her family'.[306]

The Act provides that, '[a]s far as is practicable, an Aboriginal child removed from his or her family and community, should be placed in close proximity to them'.[307]

In referring to 'a member of the child's family', which includes extended family (which, in turn, is broadly defined), the Act does not privilege Aboriginal members of the family over non-Aboriginal family members.[308]

Despite statutory requirements, Aboriginal children are placed with Aboriginal carers at a very low rate in Tasmania. According to the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, of Aboriginal children in out of home care in Tasmania on 30 June 2021:

- 10.7 per cent were living with Aboriginal relatives or kin—this is by far the lowest rate in Australia
- 5 per cent were living with an Aboriginal caregiver who is not a relative or kin
- 32.3 per cent were living with non-Aboriginal relatives or kin
- most (52.1 per cent) were living with non-Aboriginal carers who are not relatives or kin, in residential care or in another arrangement.[309]

This data is subject to the following caveats:

- The high number of carers whose Aboriginal status is unknown in Tasmania may affect the identification of children placed with Aboriginal caregivers.
- The data excludes children not under care and protection orders who are placed with relatives where a financial payment was offered but declined by the carer.[310]

Secretary Pervan told us that the Department was working to improve the 'collection and completion of Aboriginal status of carers'.[311] We emphasise that identifying a carer's Aboriginal status is important to support the placement of Aboriginal children with Aboriginal carers.

Tasmania has been criticised for an absence of programs aimed at identifying, recruiting and supporting Aboriginal kinship carers.[312] According to SNAICC, without progress to prioritise placement with kin or other Aboriginal carers, the number and rate of children placed in out of home care in Tasmania in keeping with the Placement Principle is likely to remain the lowest in Australia.[313]

Participants in our consultations with Aboriginal communities told us that Aboriginal carers want to look after Aboriginal children, but they did not always receive the support they needed to do so.[314] Many participants referred to the need for a safe place, run by Aboriginal people, for Aboriginal children who cannot remain at home:

> A place where the families and children can be, a safe place, and there you work with the parents, without the welfare coming and saying they are taking the children.[315]

There were different views about the preferred features of such a place. Suggestions included the following:

- it should be on Country, for cultural connection and safety[316]
- it should be staffed by Aboriginal carers[317]

- Elders should play a key role in supporting young people there[318]
- it should focus on healing and include in-house services such as a nurse and a visiting general practitioner[319]
- families should be able to visit their children there, and staff should be able to work with the parents and families to reconnect them with their children and culture[320]
- it could be a place where Aboriginal children return when they need assistance again or to reconnect with culture[321]
- their design should be flexible because what works in one part of Tasmania might not work in another and should be able to accept all Aboriginal children.[322]

Following an investigation in 2020 into Tasmanian children taking part in the Many Colours One Direction program in the Northern Territory, the Tasmanian Government commissioned an expert panel to provide advice on setting up a Tasmanian-based residential program for children in out of home care with highly complex needs. The expert panel observed the following:

- effective therapeutic supports within out of home care placements are 'essential to ensuring sustainability of placements'
- maintaining connections with family and kin, where possible, is a primary influencer of stability in an out of home care placement, and 'more could be done' in the Tasmanian system to prioritise the importance of relationships to promote placement stability
- additional placement options and new programs that support cultural connection and the concept of being 'On Country' should be introduced to enhance offerings in the out of home care system.[323]

The expert panel recommended that the Tasmanian Government funds new therapeutic programs that incorporate the positive elements of the Many Colours One Direction program, including individualised assessment, care arrangements, education and prosocial activities.[324] Such programs should:

- enable cultural connection
- include respite and mentoring
- include short to medium-term residential placement options
- embed flexible education models linked to the Australian Curriculum and vocational pathways for young people for whom mainstream educational settings are not productive

- be delivered by multiple entities and in a range of locations to avoid the stigmatisation of children and young people who access the program, as well as their families and communities and the organisation and the people who deliver them.[325]

While the expert panel did not recommend setting up such a program specifically for Aboriginal children, it recommended that the Government invests in 'genuine partnerships with the Aboriginal community' to support self-determination and build capacity towards Aboriginal organisations providing out of home care.[326] The Tasmanian Government accepted the recommendations of the expert panel, and Secretary Bullard advised us that the panel is considering proposals that have been submitted for a 'Wellbeing, Care and Recovery Placement Program'.[327]

We see considerable benefit in developing local, Aboriginal-led, trauma-informed residential programs for Aboriginal children in out of home care for whom an appropriate family-based placement with an Aboriginal carer cannot be found. Such programs must be designed in partnership with local Aboriginal communities and young people and be embedded in culture. They should ideally be on Country and incorporate culturally safe mental health, drug and alcohol and general health supports, as well as cultural, mentoring and education programs. They must be run by child-safe organisations. They should not be seen as a substitute for strategies and support to increase recruitment and retention of Aboriginal kinship and foster carers.

5.3.4 Participation

Aboriginal children, parents and family members must be able to participate in all child protection decisions affecting them, including placement decisions.[328] According to the national 2021 Family Matters report, this requires practices such as Aboriginal family-led decision making and 'respect and acknowledgment of cultural authority and traditional child-rearing practices'.[329]

The 'participation' element is reflected in Standard 3 of the national out of home care standards, which requires that Aboriginal communities 'participate in decisions concerning the care and placement of their children and young people'.[330]

Queensland and Western Australia have statutory frameworks for Aboriginal children and families taking part in child safety decision-making processes. The Queensland Child Protection Act has a framework for an 'independent Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander entity' ('independent person') to be involved in decision making about an Aboriginal child.[331] The independent person's role may also include:

- supporting the child and family during meetings with the Child Safety Service
- helping the family to share cultural information relevant to decision making for the child

- providing contextual information about Aboriginal tradition, the family group and their community
- supporting the child's and family's input
- helping the Child Safety Service understand this information.[332]

In Western Australia, amendments to the Children and Community Services Act 2004 (WA) (made in 2021 but yet to begin operation) require the Chief Executive Officer of the Department of Communities to consult with Aboriginal family and community members before making a placement arrangement for an Aboriginal child.[333] This approach is being piloted in two locations in Western Australia.[334] In Tasmania, the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act has a statutory framework for family group conferencing.[335] Where a family group conference is convened for an Aboriginal child, the Act requires the facilitator of the conference to consult with an appropriate 'recognised Aboriginal organisation' about who should be invited to attend the conference.[336] While the facilitator may invite a person nominated by a recognised Aboriginal organisation to the conference, there is no obligation to do so.[337]

According to SNAICC this legislative framework falls short of the necessary criteria to effectively implement the 'participation' element of the Placement Principle, particularly given there is no framework for Aboriginal family-led decision making in Tasmania.

We note that departmental practice advice for care teams and care planning states that, if a child identifies as Aboriginal, it is important that 'a representative from their culture and community' is included in the care team, but the Department cannot say how often this occurs due to data system limitations.[338]

Secretary Bullard advised us of the new 'Child Safe and Supported Policy Partnership Working Group', formed in January 2022 and involving the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre and Services for Children and Families.[339] Secretary Bullard said:

> The aim of the working group is to give Aboriginal families and communities the opportunity and empowerment to lead in a culturally appropriate manner and to make decisions in relation to their particular circumstances.[340]

We welcome any progress that the Tasmanian Government is making to improve its implementation of the Placement Principle. We encourage the Government to honour its commitments under the Safe and Supported Aboriginal Action Plan to improve the safety of Aboriginal children in care.

Aboriginal organisations and communities may have divergent views and we therefore encourage the Government to engage with as many Aboriginal organisations and communities as possible to deliver on its commitment.

The existing framework for the participation of recognised Aboriginal organisations appears unused. The Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act enables the Minister to declare an organisation to be a recognised Aboriginal organisation after 'consulting with the Aboriginal community or a section of the Aboriginal community'.[341] The Act does not specify criteria that an organisation must meet to be declared a recognised Aboriginal organisation. We could not identify any organisations that have been declared as Aboriginal organisations under the Act.[342]

Once recognised, Aboriginal organisations will need more resourcing so they can participate in decision making for Aboriginal children consistent with the participation element of the Placement Principle.

In terms of Aboriginal children taking part, the Act requires that children be given the opportunity to express their views about out of home care decisions that will affect them, and that those views be considered, recognising the child's maturity and understanding.[343]

In Tasmania, the Child Advocate acts on behalf of children and young people in care (note that, in Recommendation 9.33, we recommend changes to the role of the Child Advocate to provide it with greater independence). There is no role dedicated solely to advocating for Aboriginal children and young people in out of home care in Tasmania.

Other jurisdictions have offices dedicated to protecting the interests of Aboriginal children. For example, Richard Weston, New South Wales Deputy Children's Guardian for Aboriginal Children and Young People, said that one of the objectives of his role is to ensure a 'high standard of practice is met for Aboriginal children and young people in care' by out of home care providers.[344] Victoria and South Australia each have a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People. In May 2020, Queensland appointed Natalie Lewis, a descendant of the Gamilaraay Nation, as a Commissioner for the Queensland Family and Child Commission to support the Principal Commissioner 'with a strong and renewed focus on the systemic and structural issues disproportionately affecting Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children' in Queensland.[345] Legislation to establish an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Children and Young People Commissioner in the Australian Capital Territory was passed on 29 November 2022.[346]

The 2021 Family Matters report recommended that an Aboriginal children's commissioner be established in every state and territory, with legislated powers and functions to pursue better services for all Aboriginal children within their jurisdiction.[347] At the national level, the Safe and Supported Action Plan has committed the Commonwealth to establishing a National Advocate for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Children.[348]

The 2014 luwutina mana-mapali krakani waranta report recommended that the Tasmanian Government investigates setting up an Aboriginal children's commissioner based on the Victorian model, to oversee the implementation of child welfare and child protection services for Aboriginal children.[349]

In our view, establishing an independent Tasmanian Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, with legislated powers and functions to monitor the experiences of Aboriginal children in out of home care and youth detention, and to promote the safety and wellbeing of Aboriginal children more broadly, would provide an effective way to promote the voices of Aboriginal children. The Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People should work in partnership with the Commissioner for Children and Young People as part of a new Tasmanian Commission for Children and Young People, which has broader oversight functions than those of the current Commissioner for Children and Young People (refer to Chapter 18 for a discussion of the new Commission and to Section 12.6 of this chapter for a discussion of the new Commission's recommended oversight functions for out of home care).

The Western Australian or Queensland models for ensuring Aboriginal children, parents and family members participate in placement decisions may work well in Tasmania. Both models allow Aboriginal community organisations to play a role in facilitating participation and have the benefit of enabling existing Aboriginal community organisations or groups with local cultural knowledge of children and families within specific regions or areas to participate in child safety decision making for Aboriginal children in their communities. These organisations do not have to be direct service providers. The focus should be on receiving input from local Aboriginal communities. Given that the Act already includes the notion of 'recognised Aboriginal organisations', we recommend that this mechanism be used to implement the Western Australian model in Tasmania.[350]

In our view, there should be a legislative framework for recognised Aboriginal organisations to participate in child safety decision making, as in Western Australia. In particular, the Secretary should be required to consult a recognised Aboriginal organisation, nominated by an Aboriginal child (or sometimes their family of origin), before making any significant child safety decision for the child. At a minimum, consultation should occur before a decision is made to remove an Aboriginal child, and before any decision about placement. This should limit the number of Aboriginal children removed from their families of origin and allow more Aboriginal children to be placed with Aboriginal carers in keeping with the Placement Principle. Connection with family, community and culture are critical protective factors to protect Aboriginal children from child sexual abuse.

The Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice (refer to Recommendation 9.7) should help establish recognised Aboriginal organisations, including promoting their role, encouraging organisations to apply for approval, and building their capacity to participate in child safety decision making.

Establishing recognised Aboriginal organisations in different regions of Tasmania could also provide a way to support the future delegation or transfer of child safety functions and powers in respect of Aboriginal children (referred to above under 'Partnership').

5.3.5 Connection

The 'connection' element of the Placement Principle is concerned with ensuring Aboriginal children in out of home care—particularly those placed with non-Aboriginal carers—are supported to stay connected to their family, community, culture and Country.[351]

Connection to culture plays an important role in protecting Aboriginal children in out of home care against sexual abuse.[352] The National Royal Commission found that the disconnection from culture that can occur when an Aboriginal child is placed with a non-Aboriginal family is a factor that increases the risk that victim-survivors of child sexual abuse in out of home care will be unable to disclose that abuse.[353]

The 'connection' element requires cultural support plans to be developed, resourced, implemented and regularly reviewed for every Aboriginal child in out of home care.[354] This is consistent with Standard 10 of the national out of home care standards, which requires that children in care be supported to develop their identity through contact with their families, friends, culture, spiritual sources and communities.[355] It also aligns with Standard 4, which requires that each child in care has an individualised plan that details their health, education and other needs.[356]

The 'connection' element also requires a focus on family reunification, with reunification planning starting early and measures put in place to support reunification where it is possible.[357]

We heard from many Aboriginal community members about the loss of cultural connection experienced by Aboriginal children who are taken into care. One Aboriginal Elder said that the worst thing about Aboriginal children being sent to live with non-Aboriginal people was that they were no longer connected with their parents and culture.[358]

As outlined above, cultural support plans are an important means for maintaining an Aboriginal child's connection to culture while in out of home care. A cultural support plan is an integral part of their overall care plan and 'gives the child the opportunity to build a nurturing network around them and, in this way, develop their identity and sense of belonging'.[359]

According to the New South Wales Deputy Children's Guardian for Aboriginal Children and Young People:

> If a child is removed from their family and placed into out of home care, there should be a good cultural plan that keeps them connected to who they are, who their mob is, and that honours, respects and strengthens their identity as Aboriginal children and young people.[360]

We could not find out the proportion of Aboriginal children in Tasmanian out of home care with a cultural support plan. Nor could we locate any Child Safety Service policies or practice advice on preparing cultural support plans for Aboriginal children in out of home care. Unlike in other jurisdictions such as Victoria, Tasmanian legislation does not require a cultural support plan to be prepared for Aboriginal children under the guardianship of the Secretary.[361]

In 2019, the Tasmanian Commissioner for Children and Young People found that Aboriginal cultural planning was not being consistently conducted for Aboriginal children in out of home care.[362]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People reported that:

- Where cultural support plans had been prepared, they were often developed 'without ascertaining adequate knowledge of the child's cultural identity and community connections or their views'.[363]
- Some non-government out of home care providers appeared unsure about their responsibilities for developing cultural support plans for Aboriginal children, and most did not have the internal resources to undertake cultural planning.[364]

Standard 6 of the Tasmanian Out of Home Care Standards, released in June 2022, requires that out of home care providers support Aboriginal children to maintain connection to their family, community and culture in keeping with the Placement Principle, while Standard 7 requires providers to meet the cultural needs of Aboriginal children by implementing 'culturally safe' strategies.[365]

Meaningful cultural support planning is not a straightforward exercise. It should be led by those with cultural knowledge and expertise. It should be guided by and involve the child, family members, kin, Elders or others with cultural authority for the child, and Aboriginal organisations.[366] Those organisations should be supported and resourced to participate in developing and implementing cultural support plans.

Carers, Child Safety Officers and other people who are important in the child's life should also participate in developing cultural support plans.[367] Once a cultural support plan is developed for an Aboriginal child, it should be reviewed regularly to ensure the child's cultural connections are being maintained and their cultural needs are being met.[368]

Expectations for non-government out of home care providers should be clarified for developing and implementing cultural support plans for Aboriginal children. Although it is not appropriate for such providers to lead cultural planning processes, they should be expected to support and help develop and implement plans to ensure Aboriginal children in their placements are connected to community and culture. Clearly, this is particularly important when children have been placed with non-Aboriginal carers, noting that this should be a last resort under the Placement Principle.

5.4 Strengthening implementation of the Placement Principle

The Tasmanian Government has committed to implementing the Placement Principle, but we saw little evidence of implementation activity occurring before or during our Inquiry. The inadequacy of these efforts means Aboriginal children in Tasmanian out of home care have been at increased risk of sexual abuse.

We recommend that the Government fully implements all elements of the Placement Principle. This will require many measures to be undertaken to address the various elements of the Placement Principle. Implementing all these measures should help keep Aboriginal children and young people safe from sexual abuse in out of home care. These measures need to be implemented to ensure the system works in the interests of Aboriginal children.

More generally, the Government should adopt and report on measures to reduce institutional racism and support decolonising practices in the Department to reduce the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care. Through ongoing evaluation, the Department should monitor the sense of cultural safety experienced by Aboriginal staff, Aboriginal carers and Aboriginal children in care—as with all evaluation, the results should be reported publicly.

This recommendation complements many of the other recommendations in this chapter and report, by establishing:

- an Office of Aboriginal Policy and Practice in the Department, with an Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People who is responsible for overseeing the implementation of our recommendations for Aboriginal children in out of home care (refer to Recommendation 9.7)
- a Quality and Risk Committee to receive reports from the Executive Director for Aboriginal Children and Young People (refer to Recommendation 9.5).

Recommendation 9.14

The Tasmanian Government should appoint a Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People with statutory powers and functions to monitor the experiences of Aboriginal children in out of home care and youth detention.

Recommendation 9.15

The Tasmanian Government should fully implement all elements of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Child Placement Principle by:

a. increasing investment in Aboriginal-led targeted early intervention and prevention services for Aboriginal families, including family support and reunification services, to a rate equivalent to the representation of Aboriginal children in the Tasmanian child safety system

b. adopting and reporting on measures to reduce institutional racism and supporting decolonising practices in the Department for Education, Children and Young People to reduce the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care

c. ensuring that the Aboriginal status of all Aboriginal children in contact with Child Safety Services is accurately identified and recorded at the earliest opportunity, and appropriately shared with non-government out of home care providers and carers

d. introducing legislation to amend the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1997 to

    i. require decision makers to consult with a relevant recognised Aboriginal organisation in relation to any decision likely to have a significant impact on an Aboriginal child—in particular, decisions about whether to remove a child from their family and where a child should live

    ii. require the involvement of a relevant recognised Aboriginal organisation nominated by an Aboriginal child, or their advocate, in family group conferences, case planning and cultural support planning in respect of the child

    iii. create a statutory framework and plan co-designed with Aboriginal communities for transferring child safety decision-making authority for Aboriginal children to recognised Aboriginal organisations

e. partnering with Aboriginal communities to

   i. promote and support establishing recognised Aboriginal organisations with local knowledge of Aboriginal children, families and communities, to facilitate the participation of Aboriginal children and families in child safety and out of home care decision-making processes

   ii. develop a model or models for the transfer of child safety decision-making authority to recognised Aboriginal organisations

   iii. invest in recognised Aboriginal organisations' capacity to ensure they are fully resourced, and their workforces fully equipped and supported, to participate in child safety and out of home care decision-making processes for Aboriginal children, including involvement in cultural support planning, and to manage any transfer of decision-making authority for Aboriginal children

f. designing and establishing, in partnership with Aboriginal communities, fully resourced, Aboriginal-led, therapeutic residential programs for Aboriginal children who have been removed from their families and for whom an appropriate placement with an Aboriginal carer cannot be found

g. implementing systems to ensure every Aboriginal child in out of home care has a meaningful cultural support plan prepared by or with the involvement of a recognised Aboriginal organisation or an Aboriginal person with relevant cultural knowledge, and regularly reviewing cultural support plans to ensure cultural connections for Aboriginal children are being maintained

h. ensuring non-government out of home care providers comply with the 'placement' and 'connection' elements of the Placement Principle

i. ensuring the Aboriginal status of carers is identified and accurately recorded

j. providing mandatory professional development to Child Safety Services staff to ensure all interactions with and responses to Aboriginal children, families and organisations are culturally safe.

6 Supporting quality care

In Section 3, we recommend that, as part of the process of outsourcing out of home care services, the Department should remain responsible for strategic leadership and ensuring the quality of care that children in out of home care receive. In this section, we consider ways to support the quality of care Child Safety Service staff provide.

A significant proportion of departmental Child Safety Officers are involved in providing case management for the just over 1,000 children in care, under delegation from the Secretary. In this section, we recommend changes to the structures and practices of the Child Safety Service that will enhance the capacity of departmental staff to have 'eyes on' children in care which, in turn, will enable them to identify and respond to risks of child sexual abuse at the earliest possible opportunity. It will also increase opportunities for children in care to develop trusted relationships with adults, which is a protective factor in preventing child sexual abuse.[369] The purpose of our recommendations in this section are to ensure:

- all children in care have an allocated case manager who can be proactive and responsive to children's safety needs
- practice expertise is embedded at all levels of the Child Safety Service, ensuring accessible clinical supervision and reflective practice for Child Safety Officers
- trauma-informed therapeutic models of care are adopted for out of home care, which includes guidance on how departmental staff engage with children and families
- all Child Safety Service staff, carers and volunteers practise and understand standards of ethical conduct.

6.1 Case management

In Tasmania, Child Safety Officers are responsible for case management tasks for children in care, such as:

- establishing and facilitating a care team around the child
- coordinating the development and delivery of the child's care plan
- advocating for the child to access services to meet their needs
- identifying and supporting efforts to ensure the child is loved and safe
- maintaining a connection with the child to understand their views
- monitoring and responding to children's safety.[370]

The National Royal Commission found that when child protection staff have large caseloads, the risk of sexual abuse to children in care increases.[371] We heard that Child Safety Officers in Tasmania carry high caseloads, which diminishes their capacity to care for individual children; in particular, their ability to visit children regularly, attend to the child's case management needs and develop a relationship with each child.[372]

In her second monitoring report, the Commissioner for Children and Young People said that during the 2020–21 financial year, only 56.2 per cent of visits to children in care by their Child Safety Officer were conducted within the required timeframes.[373] The Community and Public Sector Union reported the comments of one Child Safety Officer: 'without workers to know and support these children there is no one to hear their voices and action what they need'.[374] As Faye (a pseudonym) told us (refer to Chapter 8), if a Child Safety Officer had visited more often, she may have disclosed the alleged abuse earlier.[375]

While Claire Lovell, the Executive Director of Children and Family Services, stated that the average caseload for a Child Safety Officer should be 15 children, we heard that some officers had carried caseloads of 50 children.[376] The Community and Public Sector Union reported an anonymous Child Safety Officer as saying a fair caseload was between six and eight for newer staff, no more than 10 for more experienced staff and a caseload of '15 [plus] is not realistic when they want us to do everything'.[377]

Some children do not have case workers at all. One child in care interviewed for our commissioned research said:

> I didn't even know my case worker back then … I don't have one now. I'm on an order but I don't have one. Child protection have not assigned me a case worker, I haven't got one, but I've got someone who's higher up trying to fill those shoes but you're not doing the same job because you're not seeing me.[378]

Ms Lovell told us that, as of 19 July 2022, 107 children in care did not have a Child Safety Officer directly allocated to them, which equated to approximately 10 per cent of children in care.[379] She said that these 107 children have been allocated to a team, members of which were collectively responsible for them. She acknowledged that these children will not receive the same level of support as children with an allocated Child Safety Officer.[380]

On 18 October 2022, during our Commission of Inquiry, the Leader of the Opposition made claims in the Tasmanian Parliament that the Department had removed active case management from all children in care on 18-year guardianship orders (children who will be in care until they turn 18). The Government did not respond directly to this claim.[381] On 27 October 2022, a teenager under an 18-year order, who had been in care for seven years, told us her Child Safety Officer had informed her on 29 September 2022 that:

> … about 300 children and young people were going to be removed from their [Child Safety Officers] and were going to be moved to two teams. Meaning me and all the other children on 18 Year Orders would have no worker of our own.[382]

This young person expressed concern about the 'mental trauma' this decision could cause, describing the support a Child Safety Officer can provide: 'While I am loved and safe, what about other children and young people that need someone looking out for them'.[383]

On 19 December 2022, the Commissioner for Children and Young People announced that she was conducting an 'own motion' investigation into the Department's new 'case management model', requesting submissions by 24 February 2023.[384]

In our view, it is essential that the Department ensures all children in care have a case manager. Also, current caseloads are unsustainable and potentially unsafe. We suggest the Government follows the example of other jurisdictions, such as Western Australia, by setting a maximum caseload for Child Safety Officers. This would allow them more time to invest in each child in care and improve child safeguarding.[385] We recommend key case management figures and activities are reported regularly, as they are in Queensland.[386]

Developing a workforce strategy (refer Recommendation 9.10) should help ensure there are enough Child Safety Officer positions for officers to safely meet their case management responsibilities for children in care.

Recommendation 9.16

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should:
    a. ensure all children in care, including those on guardianship orders until age 18, have a case manager
    b. set a maximum case load for Child Safety Officers.
2. The Department should report quarterly to the Quality and Risk Committee on the:
    a. number of children without an individual case manager
    b. average case load for Child Safety Officers
    c. average frequency of case manager visits children received, and the longest and shortest time periods between visits
    d. the number of children with a care team and Aboriginal representatives on the care team (where appropriate)
    e. average frequency of care team meetings
    f. percentage of children with a current care plan.
3. The Department should ensure these figures are published quarterly on its website.

6.2 Clinical supervision

The National Royal Commission found that a lack of clinical supervision for child protection workers increases the risk of child sexual abuse in institutional contexts.[387] Many child protection and out of home care systems use clinical practice supervision to support their frontline staff to make better clinical decisions, stay longer in the role and manage their vicarious trauma.

Dr Miller, from MacKillop Family Services, described the benefits of embedding clinical supervisors in the Victorian department's child protection teams.[388] Locating practice leadership close to the frontline of care modelled good practice for less experienced Child Safety Officers, who could get advice and support in real time.[389]

Secretary Pervan told us that the Department had made some moves towards improving clinical supervision by separating clinical practice from operational management and employing Practice Managers whose 'entire role' is to provide clinical supervision.[390] We understand that although they do not have designated caseloads, Practice Managers are required to pick up unallocated cases due to high rates of Child Safety Officer absence, which must detract from their ability to fulfil their substantive roles.[391]

We were also told of additional roles of Clinical Practice Consultants and Educators that support clinical practice.[392] However, we are unclear how many roles exist and where these positions sit within the structure of the Department. These positions could play a vital role in supporting good clinical decision making, particularly if they are in the Child Safety Service centres around the State for easy access by staff.

Regular clinical supervision can be deprioritised when workload pressures are high. It is important, therefore, that the Department ensures adequate funding and staffing is provided to allow time and capacity for appropriate supervision.[393]

In a small jurisdiction such as Tasmania, it may be difficult to attract practitioners with the experience and aptitude to effectively perform supervisory roles. We are concerned that some Practice Managers may have been fast-tracked to supervisory positions without the necessary experience.[394] Clinical supervisors must have enough experience in child protection to offer evidence-based advice on complex cases. Until enough experience is gained, the Department should ensure it funds virtual clinical supervision from other locations, including interstate, or consider using group supervision as a resource-effective approach.

Deborah Brewer, who managed the Department's Quality Improvement and Workforce Development team from 2017 to 2019, told us that when she worked in the Department, 'practice advisors' for the various regions were in one office in Hobart and were not present on the frontline.[395] In the three years since that observation was made, we hope that supervisors have been moved to regional offices. In any event, we recommend that clinical practice supervisors be co-located with Child Safety Officer teams.

Dr Miller and Ms Taylor also described the importance of having a Chief or Lead Practitioner in their respective departments. In South Australia and Victoria, the Chief Practitioner leads the clinical practice of child protection and out of home care through developing materials and resources, translating research into practice, overseeing clinical supervision for practitioners and consulting on difficult and complex cases.[396]

The Department does not have such a role formally in place currently, but it is our view that the Child Advocate is performing many functions of a Chief Practitioner alongside her advocacy duties.[397] However, as only one person, the Child Advocate does not have capacity to fully enact the role of Chief Practitioner as it is needed in the Department.

In our view, the role internal to the Department should have clarity—that of Chief Practitioner. Below, we recommend a new Child Advocate functioning as an external advocate for children (refer to Recommendation 9.33).

The Chief Practitioner should focus on developing the clinical capacity of practitioners, keeping the Department's practice up to date, developing trauma-informed out of home care and managing clinical supervision arrangements for practitioners. The Chief Practitioner should also be responsible for quality assurance measures, including conducting file audits and receiving care concerns (which we discuss in Section 11) and working closely with the Quality and Risk Committee to monitor data to identify systemic strengths and weaknesses within practice across the Child Safety Service and out of home care.

The Office of the Chief Practitioner should have a close working relationship with the Department's Learning and Development team, ensuring workforce development of the Child Safety Service and out of home care is designed and delivered to support the workforce to deliver best practice. To enhance knowledge and practice across the sector, the Office of the Chief Practitioner may also support the Department's strategic partnerships and collaboration, including with research and teaching institutions and non-government service delivery partners.

The Office of the Chief Practitioner will need dedicated support staff and would likely supervise the Practice Managers and Clinical Practice Consultants and Educators.

The Chief Practitioner should also lead the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit, which we discuss in Section 10.1.

6.3 Trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care

A history of trauma increases a child's vulnerability to being sexually abused in care and/or engaging in harmful sexual behaviours.[398] Addressing trauma will reduce a child's risk of sexual abuse in care.

Dr Miller told us that the out of home care system must be trauma-informed at its core: '[It] has to be designed on an assumption that children have experienced trauma' when they enter care.[399] Such a system should provide direct specialist therapy services for children to address their abuse and trauma symptoms (such as with a specialised counsellor) and day-to-day care that is informed by an understanding that children in care are often traumatised.[400] We discuss specialist trauma therapy in Section 8.2.

Julian Watchorn, the Clinical Psychologist from the Foster and Kinship Carers Association of Tasmania, considered that children should be screened for trauma symptoms as soon as they come into care to understand their specific trauma triggers and to assess their specific trauma therapy needs.[401] One child in care interviewed for our commissioned research talked about how each child has unique needs:

> Being kind and always making sure they take into consideration [the child's] feelings, and things, so that the young person feels like they can trust them. Well, I think the people that are carers, or are looking after the children, need to be very understanding and have to know that not every child is going to be the same, or even sometimes not similar whatsoever. It's very important that they are open to different [behaviour] … There's going to be challenges that they might have never experienced before, and they need to know how to deal with those instead of having a more violent or worse reaction.[402]

Dr Watchorn told us that without assistance, adults can find it difficult to recognise symptoms of trauma in children, but when they understand a child's trauma history and symptoms, they can respond therapeutically.[403] Another child in care interviewed for our commissioned research said that carers struggled to understand their trauma responses:

> Those next carers, there was a couple, they couldn't deal with me and [my sister's] emotional trauma. It sort of triggered them, so they had to move on, and we moved to somewhere that was two hours away from [where we went to school and had friends] and so I was at that point where I was like, 'I'm not standing for change anymore. I'm not standing for people just kind of pushing me around'.[404]

Experienced carer Mary Dickins told us that the carer screening and education sessions 'Shared Stories Shared Lives' is a 'good start' for educating carers about out of home care and why children are removed, but doesn't go far enough to prepare carers for the presentations of trauma and the task of therapeutically parenting a traumatised child.[405] She said skill development and support in 'therapeutic parenting and trauma-informed parenting are integral to being a better parent to [children in care]'.[406] We discuss the need for carer education in Section 4.6.

Some non-government out of home care providers who operate in Tasmania, such as Life Without Barriers, use a specific trauma-informed therapeutic model of care in their services. This does not appear to be the case for all providers.[407] The Commissioner for Children and Young People reported that only one non-government out of home care provider was funded to provide 'Therapeutic Residential Care' and the remainder provided 'other residential care'. We detail the types of care provided by various agencies in Chapter 7.[408]

Other jurisdictions have implemented agency-wide, trauma-informed approaches to ensure all children in care receive a trauma-informed therapeutic response, regardless of which care setting they live in. For instance, the Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency has embedded a trauma-informed therapeutic approach called Cultural Therapeutic Ways across the agency.[409] Although culturally specific to working with Aboriginal families, a core principle of this approach is an understanding of trauma that translates to all care settings.[410]

Similarly, MacKillop Family Services implements a trauma-informed framework called the Sanctuary Model across the organisation.[411] Every staff member at MacKillop Family Services has been trained in the model, which has measurably improved communication and morale among staff, reduced incidents of violence from children to staff by 41 per cent and reduced staff turnover for several years.[412] Staff have also been trained in an evidence-based 'Therapeutic Crisis Intervention' model.[413]

The South Australian Department for Child Protection has adopted the Sanctuary Model in its residential care settings.[414] Dr Miller thought that such a model could also be implemented in Tasmania, but she cautioned that to do this well, would require leadership and more resourcing from the Department.[415]

While the Department has taken some steps to delivering more trauma-informed, therapeutic care, the results are not yet consistent or comprehensive. Tasmanian children in care are not guaranteed to receive a trauma-informed service.

To reduce the risk of sexual abuse in care, the Department should assess children coming into care for trauma, and fund enough therapeutic support for those who need it. This assessment should be done through the holistic assessment we recommend in Section 8 (Recommendation 9.23). Also, the Department should adopt a whole of organisation, evidence-based approach to trauma-informed care for all children living in the out of home care system, regardless of setting.

The Department should lead the sector by identifying the key components of a trauma-informed, therapeutic model of care for out of home care. The Department should require non-government out of home care providers to deliver services that align with these key components of a trauma-informed therapeutic model of care and report on how it is provided. This work should be led by the Chief Practitioner.

Recommendation 9.17

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should appoint a Chief Practitioner to lead clinical practice and quality assurance across Child Safety Services, the Strong Families, Safe Kids Advice and Referral Line, and out of home care.
2. The Chief Practitioner should lead an Office of the Chief Practitioner, manage a team of clinical practice experts across Child Safety Services and report to the Secretary.
3. The Chief Practitioner should be responsible for:
    a. developing the clinical capacity of practitioners through professional development and supervision
    b. informing clinical policies, procedures and practice directions to ensure they reflect best practice in child protection and trauma-informed care
    c. receiving, triaging, recording, monitoring and coordinating responses to complaints about Child Safety Services and out of home care (Recommendation 9.31) and concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care (Recommendation 9.32)
    d. supporting best practice responses to children in out of home care experiencing or at risk of child sexual exploitation
    e. conducting file reviews and audits to inform an understanding of current clinical practice and identify areas for reform.
4. The Chief Practitioner should:
    a. work closely with the Quality and Risk Committee to monitor data to identify systemic strengths and weaknesses within practice across Child Safety Services and out of home care
    b. have a close working relationship with the Department's Learning and Development team, ensuring that workforce development of Child Safety Services and out of home care is designed and delivered to support best practice service provision
    c. support the Department's strategic partnerships and collaboration where appropriate, including with research and teaching institutions and non-government service delivery partners to enhance knowledge and practice across the sector (Recommendation 9.13).

5. The Department should ensure clinical practice experts are located in all regional offices of Child Safety Services across the state.
6. The Chief Practitioner should lead the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit (Recommendation 9.28).

Recommendation 9.18

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should require out of home care to be trauma-informed and therapeutic and identify the key components of trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care.
2. The Department should require non-government out of home care providers to deliver services that align with these key components of trauma-informed, therapeutic models of care, noting some providers have already adopted such models of care.
3. The Department should ensure children are assessed for trauma symptoms when entering care through the holistic assessment (Recommendation 9.23) and, where needed, receive appropriate therapy and intervention for their trauma.

6.4 Professional conduct policy

Research for the National Royal Commission found an increased risk of institutional child sexual abuse when expectations of conduct between children and staff are not made clear or are not consistently enforced.[416] The National Royal Commission recommended that a code of conduct have the following characteristics:

- applies to all staff and volunteers, including senior leaders and board members
- clearly describes acceptable and unacceptable behaviour of employees and volunteers towards children (for example, by illustrating behaviours with relevant examples)
- is communicated effectively to all staff
- requires signed acknowledgment by all staff and volunteers
- is published and is accessible to everyone in the institution (including children and families) and communicated throughout the institution using a range of modes and mechanisms

- if breached, requires a prompt response and includes clearly documented response mechanisms, on a continuum from remedial education and counselling through to suspension, termination and official reports.[417]

A number of people familiar with the out of home care sector told us that they believe child protection staff, carers and support workers need a robust and transparent code of conduct that clearly outlines standards and expected behaviour when interacting with and caring for children in care.[418]

Before 2023, the only policy relevant to conduct we could identify was the Department's Code of Conduct for Approved Carers, which covered topics such as the expected set up of physical facilities, confidentiality and providing timely medical attention for children in care. We could not find any policy that addressed appropriate conduct for protecting children from sexual abuse, such as grooming behaviour.[419] In February 2023, Services for Children and Families added an interim Child Safe Code of Conduct ('Interim Code') onto the Practice Manual intranet site that applies to 'all adults in Child Safety [Services]', including staff and volunteers.[420] It is described as:

> … an interim Child Safe Code of Conduct until a decision is made regarding the development of a broader Code for the Department as part of the National Child Safe Standards and Child and Youth Safe Organisations Framework for Tasmania.[421]

The Interim Code has many of the characteristics recommended by the National Royal Commission; for example, it applies to all staff and volunteers, clearly describes positive and unacceptable behaviours, including grooming, and requires signed acknowledgment. We recommend the Department builds on the Interim Code to develop and implement a professional conduct policy that has a specific code of conduct for all employees and volunteers in out of home care, and that includes all the core components described by the National Royal Commission above.

The professional conduct policy may differentiate between general principles and those specific to particular roles, such as carers or professional staff. The policy should contain important common information for all roles, including what constitutes a boundary violation, grooming behaviour and conflicts of interest.

We recognise, however, that the professional boundary expectations of a case manager will be different from that of a foster or kinship carer who is acting as the child's parent and may have cared for a child from infancy. There is a need in developing conduct policies to differentiate the expectations for different roles, and particularly for carers to be aware of a child's safety and wellbeing needs, including the need for nurturing and affection.

The professional conduct policy should address the challenges of maintaining professional boundaries in small communities, such as those in Tasmania, because of the presence of dual roles and inherent conflicts of interest. For example, a Child Safety Officer may need to investigate a family that attends the same school as their children, and the officer may use information they are privy to through social contacts as part of their assessment, in preference to proper procedures. In a larger jurisdiction, there are enough staff for another Child Safety Officer to step in so that roles and relationships remain more defined. 'Suspension 3' in Chapter 8, is an example of how professional boundary breaches can occur in child protection.

In the professional conduct policy, the Department should adopt a low tolerance approach to breaches. In relation to staff, the policy should spell out a process for reporting and responding to breaches. The professional conduct policy should direct that violating the code is grounds for disciplinary processes under Employment Direction No. 5—Breach of Code of Conduct (refer to Chapter 20) and will be managed by the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate (refer to Recommendation 6.6). In relation to carers, the policy should direct a breach to be reported to the Department for triaging by the Chief Practitioner in line with the new policy to guide responses to concerns about the safety and wellbeing of children in care (refer to Recommendation 9.32).

The National Royal Commission also recommended that education for institutional staff on problematic behaviours and boundary violations would prevent and identify grooming because it 'not only provides a basis for staff to recognise problematic behaviour but also potential offenders will know their behaviour is subject to scrutiny'.[422] We recommend mandatory, ongoing education on the professional conduct policy for all adults involved in out of home care.

Recommendation 9.19

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People, in developing a professional conduct policy (Recommendation 20.2), should ensure:
    a. there is a separate professional conduct policy for staff who have contact with children and young people in Child Safety Services and out of home care
    b. the professional conduct policy for Child Safety Services and out of home care, in addition to the matters set out in Recommendation 20.2, specifies expectations outlined in other relevant policies and procedures, including the policy on concerns about child safety and wellbeing and the duty of care owed by staff members
    c. the professional conduct policy for Child Safety Services and out of home care articulates expected standards of behaviour for volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors, and carers

d. the Department uses appropriate mechanisms to ensure compliance by volunteers, contractors and sub-contractors, and carers with the professional conduct policy for Child Safety Services and out of home care.

2. The Department should develop guidance material and information sessions for children in care about the expected behaviour of carers, staff, volunteers and adults in their lives.

6.5 Record keeping and risk assessments

The National Royal Commission found that accurate record keeping within institutions is an important systemic and structural component of protecting children from sexual abuse.[423]

6.5.1 The current system

The Department uses two database systems to record child safety information—the Child Protection Information System and the Children's Advice and Referral Digital Interface. Since 2008, the Child Safety Service has used the Child Protection Information System to record its activities in relation to children assessed as being at risk and in need of protection, as well as for those children in out of home care.[424] Advice and Referral Line staff also use the Children's Advice and Referral Digital Interface to record 'conversations' they have with callers, which may or may not progress to a referral to the Child Safety Service for more attention.[425] If the matter is referred to the Child Safety Service, the record of the conversation is transferred to the Child Protection Information System.[426]

Ms Lovell told us that as well as recording information about each child in care in the Child Protection Information System, the Department uses this system to record information about foster and kinship carers (or 'care households'), including notes made by Child Safety Officers on activities in care households.[427] The Department can also record the details of alleged child sexual abusers on the system, referred to in the database as 'Persons Believed Responsible'.

6.5.2 Persons Believed Responsible

The Department shares information about Persons Believed Responsible with the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme every day.[428] To improve data collection, the Department decided in 2021 to direct staff to record the alleged Person Believed Responsible on the system as soon as an allegation of harm was received, rather than waiting until the allegation was investigated or substantiated.[429]

A Person Believed Responsible can only be recorded on the Child Protection Information System and not on the Children's Advice and Referral Digital Interface.[430] Therefore, if the Advice and Referral Line does not refer a matter to the Child Safety Service for action, the alleged abuser is not recorded as a Person Believed Responsible and the Registrar of the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme will not be automatically advised of the allegation. We were also told that if the information was recorded against a Person Believed Responsible on the Child Protection Information System, it was slow and laborious to search for later.[431] Both these issues limit the Department's ability to track patterns of behaviour and multiple allegations against a particular person.

6.5.3 Limitations to access

Not all departmental staff can fully access one or both data systems. For instance, while the Child Advocate can read files on the Child Protection Information System, she cannot add to a client's file if she undertakes activities in relation to that child. Instead, she relies on handwritten notes in paper files and an email folder on her computer. She stated that plans to scan these handwritten notes into 'the system' had been repeatedly delayed.[432]

When asked about the ability of Child Safety Service managers to access information on the Department's databases about allegations of child sexual abuse, Ms Lovell responded that managers could access both data systems, but that they would need to run two searches—one in the Children's Advice and Referral Digital Interface and one in the Child Protection Information System.[433] This double-handling may increase the risk that relevant information is missed.

We heard from a current Child Safety Service staff member that while Advice and Referral Line staff (employed by the Department) have access to both databases, Child Safety Officers do not have access to the Children's Advice and Referral Digital Interface. We also heard about challenges with Advice and Referral Line staff employed by non-government organisations accessing the Child Protection Information System. This leads to a risk of information that is recorded in only one of the two systems being missed when it could be relevant to a risk assessment for a child in care.[434]

6.5.4 Recording risk assessments

As discussed in Chapter 8, we reviewed 22 case files of children in the Department's care who were at risk of sexual abuse or were displaying harmful sexual behaviours. We observed that frequently, the 'risk assessment' section of the notification record was not updated with new information to support the risk assessment—often the information appeared to have been cut and pasted from previous notification records. In one instance, the risk assessment content referred to the child being seven years of age and living with her parents, when she was in fact 17 and living in residential care. The risk assessment had not been updated from the time she was taken into care.

Accurate recording of information on assessing and managing the risk of sexual abuse for a child in care is vital. Outdated, inaccurate or insufficient information will not support the standard of risk assessment that children in out of home care deserve. The Department must address this practice urgently. The regular audits we recommend as part of the quality assurance and continuous improvement process (discussed in Section 4.2.4) should help improve record keeping.

7 Ensuring quality carers

The National Royal Commission recommended setting up a Carer Register for out of home care.[435] Carers and their households are the backbone of the out of home care system in any jurisdiction. There are many carers who provide excellent care to children under the guardianship of the Department. We also know that some carers, or those close to them, take advantage of the vulnerability of children in their care by sexually abusing them.

Carers can provide the stability and connection of a family environment for children who cannot live with their family of origin. Over time, a skilled, well-supported carer can help a child trust again, rendering them less vulnerable to being exploited and more likely to disclose if they are being sexually abused.[436] In Section 4.6, we recommend increased support and professional development for carers. In this section, we recommend all types of carers be registered with the Department, with minimum requirements for registration, and the capacity for deregistration.

7.1 Children's experiences of carers

Several children in care interviewed for our commissioned research reported positive, warm experiences in family-based (foster and kinship) care—for example, 'I felt safe all of the times, because me and my brother had wonderful carers'.[437]

Other children spoke of abuse at the hands of their carers or while under their care:

> Since I was like, what was I, 8 or 9 years old? I've been sexually, mentally and physically abused while in care, by multiple people including, like, youth and other adults.[438]

7.2 Carer screening

To become a foster carer in Tasmania, a person must complete a three-stage process whereby they: (1) participate in some basic education and screening sessions with other potential carers, called 'Shared Stories Shared Lives', (2) are subject to screening checks and (3) undertake assessment interviews.[439]

For foster carers, these checks happen before a child is placed in their care. However, we heard that kinship care arrangements were (necessarily) often organised at short notice with limited time for an assessment before initial placement—therefore, much of the assessment was instead completed after the child was placed in their kin's care.[440]

In foster and kinship care arrangements, all members of a carer's household over the age of 16 must hold Registration to Work with Vulnerable People.[441] Ms Lovell advised that carers are supposed to notify the Department if there are changes to their household makeup, to ensure any new household members over 16 years of age are also screened.[442]

7.3 Problems with carer records, assessment and review

Kim Backhouse from the Foster and Kinship Carers Association of Tasmania, expressed concern that there is 'no robust selection criteria that all new carers must meet' and that different non-government providers apply their own criteria.[443]

At the time of writing, any information that the Department holds about carers is recorded on the Child Protection Information System and the Children's Advice and Referral Digital Interface.[444] We discuss difficulties with these data systems in Sections 4.2.1 and 6.5.

In August 2022, we were advised that the Department had paused carer recruitment ('temporarily') to give itself time to ensure all existing carers had their Registration to Work with Vulnerable People.[445] We were concerned that the Department had such little oversight of carers' Registration to Work with Vulnerable People status.

We understand that it is departmental policy to review foster carers annually.[446] We also heard from the Department that the temporary pause in carer recruitment had enabled regional out of home care teams to 'continue improving the rate of up-to-date household reviews', from which we infer that such reviews were not previously up to date.[447]

Former departmental employee Sonya Enkelmann expressed concern that such reviews did not always occur.[448] Dr Backhouse was also concerned about the oversight of carers in remote areas of Tasmania because she was not confident that the Department, nor non-government out of home providers, were visiting those carers regularly.[449]

Andrea Sturges, who works in the non-government sector, said staff at Kennerley Children's Services visit their carers at least once a month for informal monitoring, as well as conducting annual reviews for quality of care and carers support plans.[450] Life Without Barriers formally reviews its carers each year.[451]

Beyond the basic screening checks described above, the Department should develop robust selection criteria that all carers must meet to be accepted and registered as carers. Moreover, the Department should ensure all out of home care providers visit carers regularly and review them at least annually.

7.4 Calls for a Carer Register

Many in the out of home care sector, including the Foster and Kinship Carers Association of Tasmania, support establishing a Carer Register.[452] The Association's 2018 survey of carers found that most also supported registration for carers, as well as mandatory training requirements for registration.[453]

Dr Backhouse suggested that a mandatory annual training schedule linked to ongoing registration would improve the consistency of care provided to children in out of home care.[454] She stated that while there are many carers who would like to receive more education and skill development, there is also a cohort of carers who do not.[455]

Dr Backhouse also highlighted a need for a formal deregistration process in cases where a child sexual abuse allegation against a carer was substantiated.[456] She recalled some type of internal process within the Department whereby a decision was made to no longer place children with that carer.[457] However, without a formal process, the carer has no right of appeal and they may be able to work in a care capacity elsewhere (including through a non-government out of home care provider), potentially posing a risk to children.[458] Dr Backhouse said that, in lieu of a formal registration/deregistration system, non-government providers also occasionally communicate between themselves to 'black ban' carers, which she pointed out was not a fair nor robust method.[459]

7.5 Kinship carers

Kinship carers look after children from their own extended family or community when the child's family of origin cannot. In Tasmania, 41.7 per cent of children under the guardianship of the Secretary live with a member of their family or community in a formal kinship care arrangement.[460]

We heard that kinship care is the Department's first choice if a child cannot live safely with their parents.[461]

While the National Royal Commission identified many benefits for children in care living with kin, they also identified some added risks of sexual abuse associated with this form of care, including:

- child protection authorities applying less rigorous screening and assessment processes to kinship carers in comparison with foster carers
- family loyalties and complex family dynamics interfering with keeping a child safe
- lower levels of monitoring, knowledge and skill development, and support for kinship carers, even though the needs of a child in a kinship care placement are likely to be equivalent to that of a child in foster care
- kinship carers facing added challenges caring for a child because they are often older (many are grandparents), financially disadvantaged and have poorer health.[462]

To address these specific risks, the National Royal Commission recommended that kinship carers receive the same education, skill development and support as foster carers, which we also recommend (refer to Recommendation 9.11). Registering kinship carers will provide a way to monitor their training and development history. The National Royal Commission also recommended a tailored approach for assessing the suitability of kinship carers.

As described briefly above, the assessment process for kinship carers does not differ substantially from the process used for foster carers. The Department should adopt a kinship care assessment approach that is informed by evidence and should consider models successfully used in other jurisdictions, which take into account that the kinship carer is being assessed to care for a child with whom they often already have a relationship.[463]

We recommend that kinship carers become registered carers as soon as possible after they take a child into their home. We recognise that many kinship carers will not be able to complete the mandatory education sessions for carer registration immediately. Therefore, we recommend initial conditional registration of kinship carers to allow them time to be supported to complete this training.

We expect the Department to provide the supports necessary for kinship carers to effectively care for the children placed with them. Kinship carers should not be disadvantaged due to issues of literacy, culture or geographical distance, and we expect the Department to sensitively assist carers to receive the support and knowledge they need to protect children in their care. In some exceptional cases, a kinship carer may have a valid reason to not participate in minimum training; therefore, kinship carers should be able to request an exemption.

7.6 Respite carers

Respite carers are essentially foster carers who will care for a child for short periods to allow the child's kinship or foster carers a break from the caring role. Foster carer Robyn Shoobridge told us that insufficient respite care meant she could not continue in her primary caring role for a child with high needs, leading to a placement breakdown and that child being cared for in a residential setting at the age of six.[464]

While respite care is clearly a vital part of the out of home care system, we heard of children being sexually abused in respite care.[465] Therefore, we recommend that registration requirements also be applied to respite carers.

7.7 Third-party guardianship

Courts make third-party guardianship orders under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act. This occurs on application from the Secretary of the Department, who proposes a person to become the child's independent guardian.[466] If an order is made to that effect, that person then assumes the same guardianship rights and responsibilities for the child 'as a natural parent of the child would have'.[467]

The Commissioner for Children and Young People reported that, as of 30 June 2018, 223 (or 17.5 per cent) of the children in out of home care in Tasmania were living in a third-party guardianship arrangement—a much higher rate than the Australian average of 1.4 per cent.[468] Secretary Pervan suggested that these figures had remained stable at 30 April 2022.[469]

Dr Backhouse told us that foster and kinship carers often ask to become third-party guardians for children already in their care to improve stability for those children.[470] This is referred to as a 'transfer of guardianship'. We heard it can take a long time for a transfer of guardianship to be progressed, if it happens at all.[471] The Department has not published criteria relevant to transfers of guardianship, making it difficult for carers to know if they meet the requirements.[472] This lack of transparency also makes external oversight and accountability of third-party guardians almost impossible.

The Department's position on its responsibilities for children in the care of third-party guardians is unclear. On one hand, the Department includes these children in its data dashboard of the numbers of children in care, and the Child Advocate included them in her mailout to all children in care in early 2020.[473] On the other hand, the national definition of 'out of home care' specifically excludes those children cared for by third-party guardians. We were also told that if the Advice and Referral Line was contacted about such children, they would respond in the same way as for a child who is not under the guardianship of the Secretary, so that 'children on third-party guardianship orders are not confused with children "in the care of the Secretary"'.[474]

Even if the day-to-day care of a child is provided by a third-party guardian, the Department has taken the significant step of removing that child from their family of origin and placing them permanently with another family. The Department should therefore assume some responsibility for ensuring these children are receiving safe, quality care.

We recommend that the same process for assessing, registering and monitoring all other carers applies to third-party guardians. Furthermore, if concerns are raised about the care of a child under third-party guardianship, this should be assessed through the same process as a concern about the wellbeing and safety of a child in care (refer to Section 11), not the standard Advice and Referral Line process. Supports should then be provided where appropriate, to prevent the placement from breakdown. Decisive action should be taken to protect all children, including those under third-party guardianship, from abuse in care.

7.8 Our observations

The Department has committed to setting up a Carer Register but has not done so to date.[475] We recommend that such a register sets minimum standards for screening, assessing and overseeing carers, and that all carers—foster, kinship, respite, paid residential and third-party guardians—are assessed for and meet the ongoing requirements of registration. For kinship carers, there should be conditional registration and the assessment process should be tailored to their individual context.

Once a Carer Register is established, children should only be placed with a registered carer. Carers should be required to satisfy annual reviews to maintain their status as a registered carer, and there should be criteria and processes in place for carer deregistration (which would include a breach of the professional conduct policy—refer to Section 6.4).

The Carer Register should be designed and managed in a way that makes it easy to update and allows for accurate and comprehensive information sharing across the Department's relevant data systems and the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People database. The processes and systems the Department puts in place for adding relief teachers to or removing them from the Fixed Term and Relief Employment Register, discussed in Chapter 6, could be applied to maintaining a Carer Register and deregistering carers.[476]

Recommendation 9.20

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish and maintain a Carer Register of all types of carers in the out of home care setting to ensure all third-party guardians, and foster, respite, kinship, and salaried residential carers can provide quality care to children and act protectively.
2. The Department should:
    a. set minimum requirements for registration as a carer
    b. record allegations of concern about a carer or members of their household
    c. set out a process for de-registering carers
    d. enable easy information sharing between the Carer Register, the Registration to Work with Vulnerable People Scheme and the Reportable Conduct Scheme.
3. The minimum requirements for carer registration should include:
    a. current Registration to Work with Vulnerable People and satisfactory National Police Checks
    b. best practice and tailored approaches to foster, kinship and residential carer screening and assessment
    c. mandatory knowledge and skill requirements for carers, including
        i. understanding child sexual abuse, including grooming, harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation
        ii. understanding the effects of trauma, trauma-informed care and therapeutic responses to trauma
        iii. understanding the professional conduct policy and ethical behaviour
    d. requiring other relevant adults who routinely spend time in the carer household to hold Registration to Work with Vulnerable People and to have been subject to carer assessment
    e. satisfactory annual carer reviews conducted by non-government providers and reported to the Carer Register.
4. The Department should provide for kinship carers to be provisionally registered for 12 months after assuming care of a child. During this time kinship carers should be required to complete their mandatory training requirements or apply for an exemption in exceptional circumstances.

5. Non-government out of home care providers should support kinship carers to access and complete the mandatory training required for full registration as a carer. The mandatory training should contain measures to overcome literacy difficulties, cultural difference or geographical remoteness.
6. The Department should only place children with a carer who is registered or provisionally registered on the Carer Register.
7. The Department should establish a mechanism for reviewing decisions about the registration or deregistration of carers.
8. The Tasmanian Government should adequately resource the Department to establish and maintain the Carer Register.

Recommendation 9.21

To improve placement stability and the oversight of the care of children by third-party guardians, the Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. make publicly available the criteria and process for a carer to become a third-party guardian

b. sufficiently resource the team responsible for third-party guardianship applications to ensure appropriate assessments and timely processing

c. require third-party guardians to be registered on the Carer Register to maintain their guardianship

d. ensure third-party guardians receive the same level of support in their caring role as received by foster or kinship carers

e. ensure children in third-party guardianship arrangements continue to have their safety and wellbeing supported and monitored (for example, through independent community visitors (Recommendation 9.34)).

8 Meeting children's needs

If a child's needs are well met in out of home care, their trauma and their vulnerability to sexual abuse are reduced. Not meeting a child's needs can increase a child's sense of isolation and disconnection that can increase their vulnerability to child sexual abuse.

In this section, we make recommendations that will assist the Department to better meet the needs of children in out of home care. Specifically, we recommend that the Department ensures:

- all children's individual needs are met, and children's views inform their assessments, placements and care planning
- all children entering care receive a thorough, multidisciplinary assessment
- all children are in suitable and stable out of home care placements to reduce placement breakdown and the associated increased risk of child sexual abuse
- Child Safety Officers have regular and ongoing contact with all children in out of home care
- each child has a comprehensive care plan to which they have contributed and that is tailored to their individual needs
- all children in care receive specialised, tailored supports for their individual needs.

8.1 Meeting individual needs

Standard 5 of the national out of home care standards requires that 'children and young people have their physical, developmental, psychosocial and mental health needs assessed and attended to in a timely way'.[477] All children's specific needs should be addressed, including attachment difficulties, disengagement from education and gender-specific needs.

Meeting the individual needs of children is particularly important for children who identify with diverse groups or have diverse needs, such as Aboriginal children, children from other culturally diverse backgrounds, children with disability, children with mental illness and children who identify as LGBTQIA+.

Children's participation in their care is vital to ensuring their needs are met. The Child Advocate explained that she gets involved in individual advocacy to help adults to:

> … understand what children who don't have a voice are trying to say, or alternatively, I am challenging adults about why they are not listening to children who are clearly expressing themselves.[478]

In Section 4.2.5, we emphasise the importance of empowering children in the out of home care system in relation to their individual care and at the system level. In that section, we recommend that the Department develops an empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care. In relation to their individual empowerment, the strategy should adopt a principle that children's views inform their assessments, placements and care planning.

Recommendation 9.22

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People's out of home care processes, including assessments, placements and care planning, should be tailored to address the specific needs of individual children.
2. These processes should address the specific needs of all children, including Aboriginal children, children from other culturally diverse backgrounds, children with disability, children with mental illness and children who identify as LGBTQIA+.
3. The Department's empowerment and participation strategy for children and young people in out of home care (Recommendation 9.6) should include processes that enable children's views to inform all elements of their individual care, including their assessments, placements and care planning.

8.2 Assessment and support

In its recommendation 12.21, the National Royal Commission emphasised that:

> Each state and territory government should ensure:
>
> a. the adequate assessment of all children with disability entering out-of-home care
>
> b. the availability and provision of therapeutic support
>
> c. support for disability-related needs
>
> d. the development and implementation of care plans that identify specific risk-management and safety strategies for individual children, including the identification of trusted and safe adults in the child's life.[479]

In this section, we focus on assessments for children in care with disability or mental health concerns.

8.2.1 Meeting a child's health needs

In her 2019 Monitoring Report, the Commissioner for Children and Young People found that the Department's ability to produce data about the health status of children in care was inadequate and that this undermined its capacity to meet their health needs:

> In the [Department]'s responses to both of the Commissioner's questionnaires, the [Department] acknowledged that "a lack of data on the health attributes of children in care" hinders the [Department]'s achievement of health outcomes for children and young people in care.[480]

We heard evidence that the Department is not always meeting the needs of children.[481] Some suggested that basic assessments were not conducted when a child first came into care.[482] We heard that some children in out of home care had undiagnosed learning disabilities or hearing or vision problems that had not been noted.[483]

While there is a range of standardised tools available to screen or assess the health and wellbeing of children coming into care, clinical psychologist, Dr Julian Watchorn, gave evidence that the Department has not used these tools as a matter of course.[484] He expressed a view that the main barriers to timely assessments of children when they are taken into care are resource constraints and the lack of availability of allied health specialists to conduct the assessments.[485]

Secretary Pervan told us that children coming into care were assessed at one of the three out of home care paediatric clinics around the State, which are funded by the Department of Health.[486] Secretary Bullard told us that the assessments provided are 'holistic'.[487] He further advised that the clinics referred children to the Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service and private practitioners for trauma and therapeutic interventions.[488] We note, however, as we discuss below, the Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service has not routinely accepted referrals for children with trauma or who are in out of home care, and the Child Advocate and others in the out of home care system reported that private practitioners are not easily accessible.[489]

Foster carer Ms Shoobridge, told us that the clinic she attended did not respond in a proactive way to her foster child but adopted a 'wait and see' approach. Ms Shoobridge could not wait because of the stress of managing the child's intense needs, so she self-funded a private multidisciplinary assessment for the child. The assessment identified significant disability-related needs and the child was then determined to be eligible for supports funded via the National Disability Insurance Scheme.[490]

We welcome the Department's paediatric review. For the Department to meet Standard 5 of the national out of home care standards, we would like to see all children receive a holistic assessment, including access to comprehensive multidisciplinary assessment where required, whether it is provided through the Department of Health clinics or through a multidisciplinary team based in the Department for Education, Children and Young People.

8.2.2 Disability

As discussed in Chapter 7, children with known disability are overrepresented in out of home care in Tasmania and nationally. Children with disability are almost three times as likely to experience sexual abuse in institutional settings than children who do not have a disability.[491] These rates are even higher for female children with intellectual and behaviour-related disabilities.[492]

The disability status of nearly one-third of children in care was recorded by the Department as 'not stated', leading the Commissioner for Children and Young People to express concern about the 'lack of detailed data about the care experience of children and young people with disability'.[493] The poor recording of disability status can make it difficult for staff to consider disability when making decisions about a child's risk of sexual abuse.

The National Royal Commission found several factors that further increase the risk of sexual abuse for children with disability in care. One risk factor was that out of home care services and supports were often not tailored to the individual needs of a child with disability.[494]

Child Safety Officers are responsible for accessing the National Disability Insurance Scheme on behalf of children in care. Carers therefore depend on Child Safety Officers to access this funding and for ensuring supports are in place for the children in their care. We heard that challenges arise when Child Safety Officers do not work collaboratively with carers to secure timely and appropriate supports under the scheme.[495] Ms Shoobridge's experience, described above, illustrates that some carers are having to self-fund applications to the Scheme.[496]

The National Disability Insurance Scheme is a complex system, and navigating it can be difficult for anyone, let alone where responsibilities are divided between an institutional guardian and a carer.[497] Applying to the Scheme can also be time consuming, in a context where Child Safety Officers are already working at capacity.

Given the specialised knowledge needed to navigate the National Disability Insurance Scheme and the demand on the scheme due to the large number of children in care with disability, the Department should have internal expertise to assist Child Safety Officers with applications. Dr Watchorn told us that he believed the Department had previously considered recruiting a specialised role to support children in out of home care to access the Scheme.[498]

8.2.3 Trauma and mental health

The National Royal Commission found that children who have a history of trauma and mental health difficulties are more vulnerable to sexual abuse.[499]

Professor Helen Milroy, a child and adolescent psychiatrist, told us that trauma and mental health difficulties are inevitably intertwined.[500] She explained, however, that the signs and symptoms of trauma are often missed or misunderstood, so children do not always get timely help:

> The disconnection between event and impact of trauma can mean that health practitioners and other important people in children's lives fail to recognise the little signs that a child might manifest and so therapeutic intervention does not occur soon enough. Often no one intervenes until adolescence when the young person is self-harming or suicidal, using drugs, or in the juvenile justice system.[501]

One child in care interviewed for our commissioned research said they thought their trauma was overlooked when they had mental health problems:

> … they believed I was psychotic and bipolar, and they don't give a fuck about trauma they just label [you with] something and throw you in there and think they can … I ended up going to hospital because I had suicidal thoughts because of my trauma and my pain and my stress from everything that was hitting me in August last year.[502]

Unfortunately, we heard that it can be difficult to find private and not-for-profit mental health services for children in care due to long waitlists.[503] Tasmania has a limited number of private child and adolescent psychiatrists and very few permanent ones in the public system. We heard that while there are private psychologists in most locations around the State, they are in high demand and difficult to access.[504] Many children in care cannot access the Government funded Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service when their presentation is deemed to be primarily trauma-related, even if their difficulties seem severe.[505]

Over the past five years, the Department has funded the Australian Childhood Foundation to provide trauma therapy support to children in care. However, only 30 children (along with their carers) are funded each year for this service.[506] This means that just under 3 per cent of children in care can access trauma-specific therapy at any one time.

Dr Watchorn told us that children are not routinely assessed for trauma when they come into care.[507] Ms Enkelmann expressed concerns that not treating trauma early is a false economy because, if untreated, trauma will often reappear in adolescence, when reversing the damage is much more challenging.[508] Many of the children interviewed for our commissioned research said they were left to manage their trauma alone.[509]

Professor Brett McDermott, Statewide Speciality Director, Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service, has been leading development of a specialist service for children in out of home care who have mental health difficulties. His model is based on a Queensland program and aims to deliver trauma-informed assessment and interventions through a multidisciplinary team that has low caseloads and can work with a child over a longer period. Professor McDermott told us that a feature of the service is that clinicians will also support those caring for the child through skill development and psychoeducation.[510]

We welcome this initiative, which may reduce the risk of sexual abuse for some children in care by addressing their mental health difficulties and trauma. Professor McDermott acknowledged that it may be difficult to recruit suitably qualified mental health clinicians for the service and that there may be limitations to the number of children the service can assist.[511]

8.2.4 Our observations

The Department needs to ensure children and young people in care have their emotional, physical, developmental, psychosocial and mental health needs (including trauma) assessed and attended to in a timely way. To help ensure this, we recommend that all children in care have access to multidisciplinary care, whether provided through the paediatric out of home care clinics or the Department.

The Department should recruit a specialised role to support children in out of home care to access the National Disability Insurance Scheme. Such a role could be the 'go to' within the Department for Child Safety Service staff who have questions or concerns about a child's access to the scheme. The role could also ensure eligibility under the scheme was assessed for all children with disability in out of home care, and if deemed eligible, the role could support Child Safety Officers to maintain the currency of the child's National Disability Insurance Scheme plan. This role should work closely with the multidisciplinary health team.

In conjunction with a new system-wide, trauma-informed therapeutic model of care (refer to Recommendation 9.18), the Department should increase funding for specialist trauma therapy services for children in care.

Given the signs and symptoms of trauma are not always obvious, we recommend routine assessment for trauma and mental health difficulties for all children coming into care. In this way, those who need professional assistance can be identified early, before their mental health worsens.

We recommend that the Department and out of home care providers report on the number of children in care who are receiving multidisciplinary health assessment, are eligible for the National Disability Insurance Scheme and are receiving specialised trauma support and counselling to the Quality and Risk Committee (refer to Recommendation 9.5).

Recommendation 9.23

1. The Tasmanian Government should ensure all children in care have access to:
    a. a timely holistic assessment when entering care across all domains of physical health, trauma and mental health, disability and educational need
    b. health and wellbeing assessments conducted annually, or more often where there is an identified need.
2. Multidisciplinary health teams should provide expert consultation to the care team around a child about the child's needs, and input into the child's care plan.
3. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should create a specialised role to support children in out of home care to access the National Disability Insurance Scheme.

Recommendation 9.24

1. The Tasmanian Government should increase funding for specialist trauma therapy services for children in care to ensure their needs are met.
2. The Tasmanian Government should ensure the Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service's new specialist mental health service for children in out of home care is resourced to meet demand.

8.3 Placement of children

The decision about where a child in out of home care will live is a challenge for child protection staff in any jurisdiction.

Children in out of home care benefit from a stable placement. The National Royal Commission observed that it takes time for a child to build enough trust with a carer to disclose sexual abuse, and that each time a child changes placement they suffer from loss of relationships.[512] Multiple placements may also increase a child's exposure to child sexual abusers, simply because they are exposed to more people in their home environment.

Children in care told us how placement changes affect them. One young person interviewed for our commissioned research said:

> Imagine if you're sitting in a wobbly chair. It feels like that, but emotionally. Like anything could just drop at any moment … I have never had an actual home. There has never been anywhere I've felt [is] like … [a] home, because over the last seven, eight years I've been in foster care, I've had seven, eight placements, so I've moved every year. And because I had never … there was never a place that was mine, which resulted in me feeling not safe.[513]

Another young person said:

> My sister, she's good at not getting emotionally attached because it's obviously a trauma response. The fact that we've moved so much, she doesn't get attached to people, unless she's known you for a very long amount of time, she will not trust you whatsoever … I, on the other hand, get very attached to people, very quickly. I suppose it's the opposite response as her.[514]

The National Royal Commission made the following recommendations to improve the safety and stability of placements for children in care and to reduce their risk of sexual abuse:

a. improved processes for 'matching' children with carers and other children in a placement, including in residential care

b. the provision of necessary information to carers about a child, prior to and during their placement, to enable carers to properly support the child

c. support and training for carers to deal with the different developmental needs of children as well as managing difficult situations and challenging behaviour.[515]

We consider the first two of these strategies in turn below. We discuss support and training for carers in Section 4.6.

8.3.1 Placement matching

Out of home care providers told us that departmental staff have often invested significant time and effort into finding the right place for a child to live.[516] We also heard that, despite these good intentions, placement options are constrained by insufficient numbers of carers and the need to find a placement often at short notice.[517]

Children in care told us they wanted better placement matching between the children themselves and with carers. One young person interviewed for our commissioned research said:

> Group homes don't always turn out well because there's multiple different kids that have all come from different backgrounds, all have their issues. That usually doesn't match a lot of the time. So, I feel like in group home situations, maybe put kids that have had similar backgrounds, rather than just be like, 'Hey, three random kids, plop'.[518]

At times, children are moved into residential care, simply because there is nowhere else for them to live.[519] Residential care carries a higher risk of child sexual abuse than family-based settings.[520] We also heard that, at times, the Department has placed too many high-needs children with a carer who could not reasonably be expected to meet all their needs.[521]

Placement matching involves understanding the child's individual needs, the needs of other children in the placement, and what each carer can provide.

A Carer Register (Recommendation 9.20) would allow the Department to identify carers with special skills or experience; however, unless more carers are recruited and retained (Recommendation 9.8) and alternative care options explored (refer to Section 8.3.3), options for placements will be limited to those available rather than those most suitable.

Other jurisdictions have structured processes to match children with the best carers. The New South Wales Department of Communities and Justice uses a Child Assessment Tool, which is designed to:

> … identify the most appropriate level of care for a child, based on assessment of their behaviour, and health and development needs. The tool improves transparency and consistency of placement decisions and focuses on the needs of the child.[522]

The New South Wales Department then uses 'Placement Matching Panels' to decide which carers will be most suitable for any given child.[523] The Queensland Department of Child Safety, Seniors and Disability Services uses a 'Foster care matching tool' to work systematically through a child's needs and the ability of the proposed carer to meet those needs.[524]

8.3.2 Information for carers

Dr Watchorn warned of an increased risk of harmful sexual behaviours occurring when carers are not given enough information about a child who comes into their care. Presumably, this is because carers are not aware of the need to take steps—such as increased supervision or declining to accept a child into their care—to mitigate the risk.[525]

The Department told us that carers receive 'detail on [the child's] previous carer history and trauma experience' before placement.[526] However, others working in the sector disagreed that this always occurs, telling us that carers often do not get enough information about the children they are caring for, making it very difficult to meet a child's needs.[527]

We were also told that the Department has cited privacy or confidentiality to justify not sharing information with carers about children in their care.[528] Dr Watchorn said that 'if sharing the information would reduce risk for the child, priority has to be with the interests of the child, not the confidentiality of information'.[529]

The Child Advocate stated that carers should have enough information about a child in their care 'to provide adequate care and attuned responses for that child to recover from the effects of trauma'.[530]

When carers have specific information about the child in their care, they are better able to anticipate triggers, respond appropriately to a child's trauma-related behaviour and manage risks.[531]

8.3.3 Funding according to needs

The Department funds out of home care through payments to carers and resourcing non-government agencies to support carers and provide residential care, if required. We are concerned that the current level of funding is not enough to adequately meet the needs of children in care and hence, can disrupt the stability of their placements.

Family-based care

Although foster and kinship carers are essentially volunteers, they receive a 'board payment' from the Department to cover costs of caring for a child. The payment amount depends on the age and assessed needs of the child (standard, intense or complex). At time of writing, Tasmania's 'board payment' was the lowest in Australia.[532]

Andrea Sturges, of the non-government out of home care provider Kennerley Children's Services, told us that the payment does not cover the actual costs of caring for a child, and it can be very difficult to get an increased rate of payment once it is set.[533] She also said that Department funding is not enough to cover providers' operational costs to support carers, so providers must make up the shortfall from their own funds.[534]

Residential care

Residential care is an expensive form of out of home care and least like a family environment when compared with foster or kinship care.[535]

In 2019, the Department 'revised' its funding for Special Care Packages for children in residential care; this resulted in some providers receiving less funding for children in their care on the basis that some children were deemed to not require 'non-material basics' services.[536] 'Non-material basics' services include those costs that exceed the costs of the minimum service that any child in out of home care receives. The Department told us that the revision of the payment system in 2019 was intended to improve the Department's financial controls for Special Care Packages.[537] The Department also said that, while the revised model has 'resulted in a reduction to the amount received by some care providers for some children where those children did not require "non-material basics"', it has 'improved financial oversight and achieved consistent costing for like items'.[538]

However, one provider told us that since then, all children, including children with disability, have received the same level of funding regardless of their needs.[539] We heard that funding continues to cover food, activities, rent and salaried staff but not extra supervision or allied health supports that might be needed for an individual child. We also heard that the Department had suggested to one provider that they cover children's supervision and health costs themselves.[540] This provider could not make up the shortfall and observed that as extra supports decreased, serious incidents and workplace injuries increased. Consequently, the provider exited the 'material basics' funding program.[541] This example highlights the importance of funding care for a child according to their needs.

We consider it unreasonable for the Department to require a non-government provider to supplement departmental funding with their own resources to care properly and safely for children under the Secretary's guardianship. It amounts to an abdication of the Secretary's duties, obligations and liabilities under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act.[542] We consider these circumstances likely arose due to prolonged underfunding of out of home care by the Tasmanian Government.

Alternatives to residential care

Ms Enkelmann suggested that we consider trauma-informed models of intensive therapeutic foster care being used in other Australian jurisdictions, such as the TrACK program in Victoria.[543]

Ms Enkelmann told us that the TrACK model is an alternative model of care for children not suited to traditional foster care. Under the model, carers are highly trained, paid at a much higher rate than other carers to allow them to care for the child full-time, and receive intensive support from an out of home care worker and therapeutic specialist.[544] Ms Enkelmann advised that this model was most effective when implemented proactively for a child and 'not as an option of last resort'.[545]

In her June 2022 report to the Secretary, the Child Advocate argued strongly for salaried family-based care.[546]

8.3.4 Improving the placement of children

There are several steps the Department could take to improve placements for children in out of home care. For example, we see value in the Department using a placement matching tool such as those described earlier. Even if the Department cannot find a perfect placement for a child, a tool would highlight the gaps in a carer's skill set, enabling the Department to provide that carer with tailored supports. It could also consider the child's existing relationships, such as where siblings are placed. A placement tool can also assist with decisions about placing children together in a facility. In particular, this could help avoid co-placements where children are at risk of harmful sexual behaviours.[547] In conjunction with this tool, carers must be supported by receiving information about the children in their care that can help protect them from sexual abuse.

The number, quality and stability of placements can also be improved by providing adequate funding to meet the needs of children in care. As we have seen, meeting children's needs and improving placement stability are protective factors in child sexual abuse. We agree with the Child Advocate that while salaried family-based care is more expensive than regular foster care, it would certainly be much less expensive than residential care, as well as providing the child with a safer and more therapeutic care environment and greater likelihood of developing a trusting relationship with an adult.[548] For this reason, we recommend introducing a salaried or professional care model.

Recommendation 9.25

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should improve placement stability and reduce the risk of sexual abuse of children in care by:

a. considering the views of the child or children about their out of home care placement

b. using placement matching guidelines to aid placement decisions and support planning

c. placing siblings together or maintaining sibling connection where safe to do so

d. ensuring carers are aware of any history of abuse in relation to the child and the child's specific needs relevant to this

e. introducing an intensive salaried or professional foster care model to allow children with challenging behaviours to remain in family-based care

f. funding all placements (including kinship, foster, respite and residential care) to fully meet all the child's assessed needs to the extent these are not covered by other schemes (such as the National Disability Insurance Scheme and public health or education services).

8.4 Care plans

The National Royal Commission stated that all children in care should have an individualised care plan.[549] In particular, all children with disability should have an individualised care plan that helps strengthen the child's safety. This should be based on adequate assessment of needs, incorporate 'specific risk management and safety strategies' and identify 'trusted adults in the child's life' (among other elements).[550]

Standard 4 of the national out of home care standards also requires that 'each child and young person has an individualised plan that details their health, education and other needs'.[551]

According to the Children, Youth and Families Practice Manual, the Department launched the current care teams and care planning process in December 2020.[552] The Department's care plan template covers the six domains of the Tasmanian Child and Youth Wellbeing Framework: 'being loved and safe', 'material basics', 'being healthy', 'learning', 'participating' and 'culture and identity'. Each domain represents an aspect of the child's life that the care team must consider. For each domain, the care team identifies the following for the child: current goals, 'what's going well?', 'what needs to improve?' and 'what are we going to do?'.[553]

We understand that several policy and procedural documents guide Child Safety Officers in developing care plans. The Care Teams and Care Planning Procedure requires Child Safety Officers to establish a care team within six weeks of the 'first legal order' for a child. The care team must then meet every six weeks for the first year. The care team must develop the child's care plan within the first two care team meetings and review the plan at least annually, as well as whenever there is a significant change in a child's circumstances.[554]

Care teams should also complete an agreement that states the role of each team member in the child's life, the objectives of the team and how the team will work together. The care team agreement should be reviewed each year along with the care plan, or more frequently if circumstances change.[555]

The child's care team appears critical for developing a thorough care plan. Ms Lovell said the ideal care team has the right people in it, develops and follows a care plan that is effective and child-informed, and shares power between team members.[556]

In June 2022, Ms Lovell told us that some children in out of home care had a minimal care team and some children did not have a care team at all. She said that the Child Safety Service was 'working toward' the goal of every child having a comprehensive functioning care team but could not report on progress due to 'data quality issues'.[557]

We have received vastly different figures from the Department, a non-government provider and the Commissioner for Children and Young People about how many children in care have care plans.[558]

We conclude that, while many children in out of home care may have an approved care plan recorded, a good proportion of those care plans will not be current, and many have not been created and implemented by a functioning care team. We infer it is unlikely that children without an allocated case worker will have an up-to-date care plan or active care team—such as children on 18-year guardianship orders.

It is not clear to us whether the care plans are structured in a way to undertake 'specific risk management and safety strategies', as was recommended by the National Royal Commission. If a child's assessment indicates that they are at risk of child sexual abuse, child exploitation or harmful sexual behaviours, the care plan should include specific strategies to manage these risks.

Care plans should also be informed by the multidisciplinary health assessments we recommend above (refer to Recommendation 9.23).

Addressing risk in relation to child sexual exploitation and harmful sexual behaviours is considered in Section 10.

Recommendation 9.26

The Department for Education, Children and Young People should ensure:

a. each child is involved in developing their care plan

b. each child's care plan is informed by the holistic assessment (Recommendation 9.23) and the interests and aspirations of the child

c. care plans include strategies to address identified risks of child sexual abuse, including the risk of harmful sexual behaviours and child sexual exploitation

d. the care team reviews any risk assessments and management plans for child sexual abuse at least every six months, or more frequently if incidents occur or circumstances change such as when a new child joins the household.

9 Children on out of home care orders involved with youth justice

In this section, we identify the specific needs of 'crossover children'—children who are in out of home care and who are also involved with youth justice.[559]

We discuss the specific risks of sexual abuse for children in Ashley Youth Detention Centre at length in Chapter 10. Those risks are unacceptably high.

Children in care can be particularly vulnerable to child sexual abuse in youth detention for a number of reasons, including their over-representation, their experiences of previous trauma and because 'many children in youth detention are disconnected from families, community and culture and may not have even limited access to an adult they trust'.[560]

In this section, we recommend measures to prevent the sexual abuse of crossover children by:

- actively advocating for children in care to not enter youth detention, except when absolutely necessary
- providing active case management when a child in care does enter youth detention.

9.1 Reducing over-representation

The National Royal Commission found that children in out of home care are 16 times more likely to be under 'youth justice supervision' than the general population.[561] The correlation between out of home care and youth detention is not surprising considering that children in both settings are likely to have experienced abuse and trauma.[562] Brett's experience, described in Chapter 8, showed us how being placed in care can lead to a child entering youth detention.

The relationship between children living in out of home care and involvement in the youth justice system is well established but not straightforward.[563] Being in care does not automatically mean a child will go on to youth detention.[564] Between 2007 and 2022, only 3.3 per cent of Tasmanian children in care had ever been sent to Ashley Youth Detention Centre, with yearly rates ranging from 1.2 per cent up to 7.1 per cent.[565]

Conversely, many children in youth detention have been in out of home care. Between 2007 and 2022, the average percentage of young people in Ashley Youth Detention Centre who had ever been in out of home care was 27.9 per cent, with yearly percentages ranging from 18.2 per cent up to 42.6 per cent.[566] These rates are similar to those in other jurisdictions.[567] Also, while the total number of detainees in Ashley Youth Detention Centre steadily declined between 2007 and 2021, the percentage of those who had ever been in out of home care increased, suggesting that children in out of home care have become increasingly over-represented in youth detention in Tasmania over time.[568]

Aboriginal children in Tasmania, particularly younger Aboriginal children, are over-represented in care and further over-represented in youth justice.[569]

Children in care can end up in youth detention more frequently for several reasons:

- residential care homes are more likely than a family of origin to call police for assistance in response to property damage or theft[570]
- youth detention is sometimes seen as an alternative placement for difficult-to-place children in care[571]

- children may be remanded or kept in detention longer than their sentence due to difficulties finding them a placement.[572]

Child protection veteran Jack Davenport told us that he thought some within the Child Safety Service saw youth detention as a means of effectively delegating their guardianship responsibilities:

> There was no doubt in my mind that [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] was often seen by [Child Safety Service] staff as a de-facto placement option. It was felt that incarceration often solved problems once a child was in [Ashley Youth Detention Centre]. This was principally on the basis that children couldn't leave [Ashley Youth Detention Centre] and there were other people responsible for them (rather than [the Child Safety Service]). Because of this, workers were happy for children to go to [Ashley Youth Detention Centre]. This attitude was partly driven by workload, but primarily by the sense that the responsibility of carrying risk for the child was relinquished.[573]

Our recommendations in other sections of this chapter address some of the reasons children in care are over-represented in youth detention. For example, introducing a trauma-informed therapeutic model in out of home care (refer to Recommendation 9.18) should reduce the need for residential care staff to involve police because they will have other ways of approaching challenging behaviours. In Section 5, we make recommendations for reducing the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out of home care.

We also consider that the Department, as guardian, should advocate for a child in care to not enter youth detention, unless it is unavoidable. We discuss the mechanisms for preventing children entering youth detention more generally in Chapter 12 but recommend here that a representative of the Department with knowledge of a child in care advocates, at all times, for that child to not enter youth detention, including in the Magistrates Court.

9.2 Active case management

According to the 2017 Visiting Children and Young People on Orders procedure, when a child is detained at Ashley Youth Detention Centre, Child Safety Officers must follow a minimum visiting schedule.[574] We received no information to satisfy us that the Department monitors compliance with this requirement.

Andrea Sturges from Kennerley Children's Services told us that when she worked for the Department, she noticed children in care who were admitted to youth detention were recorded inappropriately and incorrectly by their Child Safety Officers as having left care.[575] Consequently, active case work was suspended while a child was in detention.[576]

We found it difficult to assess the level of case management a crossover child receives while in youth detention but, given the closed institutional setting of youth detention and the associated risks of child sexual abuse, we are compelled to be prescriptive about the Department's responsibilities to children in care who enter youth detention. These children need more support, not less, from their guardian. We recommend that the Department ensures Child Safety Officers undertake and report on specific case management tasks while a child is in youth detention, including visiting them frequently, ensuring their needs are being met and planning for their release.

Ongoing case management will show the child that their guardian is actively involved in their care, even when they are in custody. Regular visits by Child Safety Officers will provide opportunities for a child to disclose if they have been victimised.

Recommendation 9.27

In its role as statutory guardian of a child in care, the Department for Education, Children and Young People should:

a. ensure a representative of the Department with knowledge of the child appears for a child in out of home care in the Magistrates Court (Youth Justice Division) and in the new specialist children's division of the Magistrates Court (Recommendation 12.15), in order to

    i. support the child in court

    ii. inform the court of all relevant considerations to the court, including the child's child protection history

    iii. make submissions to the court on behalf of the child with arrangements in place for this to occur in out-of-hours bail hearings as well as those that occur during normal business hours

b. take actions that may address any causes contributing to child offending, including changes to care plans

c. ensure, when a child in care is admitted to youth detention or another residential youth justice facility, that the child's Child Safety Officer

    i. arranges an immediate review of the child's care plan with their care team, which includes developing a transition plan for when the child leaves detention

    ii. visits the child as soon as practicable and regularly thereafter, with a minimum of one visit during their admission in line with the child's revised care plan

iii. notifies the Commission for Children and Young People of the child's admission to youth detention

d. report to the Quality and Risk Committee on the number of children in care in detention and on the activities listed above.

10 Addressing other risks of sexual harm

In previous sections on supporting quality care and carers (Sections 6 and 7), we consider measures that focus primarily on reducing the risk to children in care from adults within the out of home care system, as well as the risks posed by children not having their needs met. In this section, we focus on the risk of children in care experiencing harmful sexual behaviours from other children or sexual exploitation from adults outside the care system, and how the Department can address these sources of abuse.

10.1 Harmful sexual behaviour

Harmful sexual behaviours are a known risk for children in care.[577] Research commissioned by the National Royal Commission suggested that children in out of home care were at greater risk of sexual abuse by peers than by adult staff members.[578] The research suggests that children living in residential care were more likely to have engaged in or experienced harmful sexual behaviour than children in other care settings.[579]

Research indicates that children who engage in harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care settings are more likely to be older, male, biological children of carers; children who have received inadequate or no sex or relationship education; and young males who have themselves experienced sexual abuse.[580] Other research shows children who have experienced family violence or been exposed to sexual activity such as pornography, are at heightened risk of displaying harmful sexual behaviours.[581]

Research conducted for the National Royal Commission also found that certain organisational features common to out of home care settings, particularly residential care, appeared to increase the risk of children engaging in harmful sexual behaviours. These features include:

- where there are attitudes that 'boys will be boys' and that normalise force as part of male sexuality[582]
- where there is the attitude that girls are responsible for defending themselves against such abuse[583]

- where there is a 'culture of silence' on discussing sex and child sexual abuse with children in out of home care services, which may inadvertently normalise sexual aggression or abuse as part of normal sexual exploration or experimentation[584]
- where abuse is used as a way of asserting power and establishing 'pecking orders'[585]
- when out of home care staff are poorly or inadequately trained to differentiate between what is age appropriate and what is abusive sexual behaviour between peers[586]
- where those who have experienced sexual abuse and those who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours are placed in the same living arrangement[587]
- rostered care settings with a higher ratio of young men to young women[588]
- sometimes the sexual abuse histories of the children in a placement can create a 'hypersexualised culture', which may lead young people to cross the boundaries of acceptable sexual behaviours.[589]

The case example of Orson and Ivan described in Chapter 8 highlights the risk of harmful sexual behaviours for children in care, and how prevention and responses need to be improved.

10.1.1 Prevalence and examples

In our file analysis of 22 cases of children in Tasmanian out of home care, we identified that harmful sexual behaviours occur frequently (refer to Chapter 8). Half of the 22 cases involved at least one concern about harmful sexual behaviours and most of those concerns were raised in relation to multiple instances of harmful sexual behaviours. The severity of alleged harmful sexual behaviours ranged from developmentally, socially or culturally inappropriate to coercive and/or violent sexual behaviours (refer to Chapter 21 for more on the spectrum of harmful sexual behaviours). All the children involved were known to have a history of sexualised or harmful sexual behaviours before being moved to the placement where the alleged incident(s) took place.

We also heard directly from providers and victim-survivors about harmful sexual behaviours in care.[590] For example, Brett Robinson told us that he had experienced abuse from an older child at his respite care.[591] He said that when he disclosed the alleged abuse, his foster carers did not believe him. He later told his father, who took him to police to make a statement. Brett said he found it too difficult to finish his statement to police. He told us that he did not know if there was an investigation in response to his allegations because he was never asked further about it.

Caroline Brown, an experienced out of home care provider quoted earlier in this chapter, told us about an investigation into allegations that a child had been raped by their foster brother. Ms Brown told us that, at a meeting with the Department about the investigation, the Senior Practice Consultant did not believe the younger child's account, instead determining that the child had self-injured their genitals.[592] Ms Brown stated that the Senior Practice Consultant placed responsibility for any abuse on the younger child, stating that the child needed help because of their 'perpetrative behaviours towards older boys' and that the older boy needed to 'learn how to say no' when a younger child jumped on him.[593] It appeared to Ms Brown that the Senior Practice Consultant thought that the older boy could not have abused the younger child because of his intellectual disability.[594]

10.1.2 National Royal Commission recommendations

The National Royal Commission made two specific recommendations to decrease the risk of harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care. Recommendation 12.12 focused on identifying, assessing and providing appropriate interventions and support for those children who had engaged in harmful sexual behaviours, as well as 'rigorously' assessing and managing the risk that such behaviours would continue.[595] Recommendation 12.13 required the Department to ensure carers and staff understood harmful sexual behaviours and provided them with guidelines and advice about how to prevent and respond to these behaviours.[596]

10.1.3 The Department's response

Prevention Assessment Support and Treatment program

The Tasmanian Government's response to the National Royal Commission's multiple recommendations about harmful sexual behaviours, including those related to out of home care, primarily involves its funding of the Sexual Assault Support Service to provide a statewide primary and secondary prevention and therapeutic intervention program for children and adolescents engaging in harmful sexual behaviours.[597]

The Sexual Assault Support Service's Prevention Assessment Support and Treatment program is discussed in Chapter 21. For the purposes of this section, the main components of the program are:

- limited professional development in harmful sexual behaviours that departmental staff have the option to access[598]
- assessment, treatment and intervention for children with harmful sexual behaviours, to which Child Safety Officers regularly appear to refer children for assistance[599]
- advice for staff who can call the Sexual Assault Support Service for guidance when they are faced with alleged harmful sexual behaviours.[600]

The Prevention Assessment Support and Treatment program appears to be based on principles of best practice.[601] However, the program is limited in what it can provide because the funding is not enough to meet the need.[602]

We consider that funding a community service to provide limited access to education, expert consultation and therapy for children who have engaged in harmful sexual behaviours is an insufficient response to children in the care of the State. The Government must go further and develop a comprehensive policy for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours in the out of home care sector.

Harmful sexual behaviours policy

The Department does not have a policy to guide staff and out of home carers in identifying, preventing and responding to children who display harmful sexual behaviours, victims of harmful sexual behaviour and other affected parties. We heard that the only resource available to staff to help identify harmful sexual behaviour is the 2006 Traffic Lights tool.[603] This tool has some limitations, primarily that it does not assist the user to decide how to respond.[604]

We were told that the Department's care concerns process (refer to Section 11) would not necessarily apply in instances of harmful sexual behaviours because the alleged abuser is not a carer but another child.[605] If there was some indication that the carer did not act to prevent the harmful sexual behaviours, then a Child Safety Officer could raise a quality of care concern—the less serious of the two care concern options. As discussed in Section 11.4, a quality of care concern focuses on the behaviour of the carers and not the impact on the child. We could not identify any other policy that outlines how to respond to and manage harmful sexual behaviours, and the Department does not provide mandatory training to Child Safety Service staff or out of home care carers and staff about harmful sexual behaviours.[606]

10.1.4 A new whole of government harmful sexual behaviours framework

Other jurisdictions have invested heavily in a whole of government coordinated approach to preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. For instance, in response to National Royal Commission recommendations, New South Wales has publicly released Children First 2022–2031. Children First is a whole of government shared framework for preventing and responding to problematic and harmful sexual behaviours by children and young people, which 'sets the vision and priorities for how [New South Wales] can and will work together to support children and young people who have displayed, or been affected by, problematic and harmful behaviours by applying a sector wide, multiagency public health approach'.[607]

The Western Australian Government contracted the Australian Centre for Child Protection to develop the Framework for Understanding and Guiding Responses to Harmful Sexual Behaviours in Children and Young People, released in June 2022.[608] The Western Australian framework 'is a conceptual map of research evidence, relevant theoretical underpinnings, general practice principles and practice wisdom' to assist 'practitioners, policy makers and carers to provide responses that are safe, effective and trauma informed'.[609] The framework outlines what is known about harmful sexual behaviours, how to interpret sexual behaviours at various developmental stages, and key principles of practice. It also has a section dedicated to responding to harmful sexual behaviours in residential care.[610] The framework is publicly available.

We note that the New South Wales and Western Australian frameworks are not limited to out of home care; instead they aim to provide a common, whole of government framework for understanding and responding to harmful sexual behaviours, and are supplemented by more nuanced guidance for specific contexts, including out of home care.

We recommend the Tasmanian Government develops a statewide framework and plan for preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours that provides a common understanding of harmful sexual behaviours, high level guidance on how to respond and a clear articulation of the roles and responsibilities of different government provided and funded agencies within the response in Chapter 21 (Recommendation 21.8).

10.1.5 A Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit

The Department for Education, Children and Youth is responsible for out of home care, youth justice and schools. We have concluded that these are the three institutions in which there is the greatest risk of children displaying or experiencing harmful sexual behaviours. Additionally, the Department is responsible for the Advice and Referral Line and the Child Safety Service, which are responsible for receiving reports from the public and mandatory reporters regarding child sexual abuse. The Department for Education, Children and Young People must be equipped to provide high quality, best practice responses to harmful sexual behaviours displayed or experienced by children in its care in schools, out of home care or youth detention.

As outlined in Chapter 6, Secretary Bullard described departmental initiatives to prevent and respond to harmful sexual behaviours in Tasmanian schools including employing four additional full time-equivalent senior support staff—two psychologists and two social workers—'to provide further support for children and young people affected by harmful sexual behaviours or child sexual abuse' and additional Student Support Response Coordinators.[611] We were encouraged by these and other developments in school settings to enhance responses to harmful sexual behaviours. We did not see parallel initiatives to enhance responses in out of home care or youth justice but conclude there is a profound and urgent need for this to occur.

We have concluded that a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit should be established within the Department for Education, Children and Young People located within the Office of the Chief Practitioner (refer to Recommendation 9.17). The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit should support all child-facing services in the Department to manage harmful sexual behaviour through the provision of advice, guidance and support and context specific policies. The Unit should have specialist advisors who can:

- support staff to identify whether an incident constitutes harmful sexual behaviour
- assist in the development of appropriate and proportionate local responses to inappropriate and problematic sexual behaviour
- support and guide a critical incident response to persistent, abusive and/or violent harmful sexual behaviours
- help develop tailored risk mitigation plans that are the least restrictive possible and balance the needs of all children
- assist in advising on when and how to communicate with other affected parties (where appropriate)
- assist in arranging access to counselling, and support children displaying harmful sexual behaviours, victims and other affected parties, where required
- advise on appropriate notifications, reporting and information sharing, and follow the child while the risk remains
- ensure accurate and appropriate records are created and appropriately stored.

The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit would likely benefit from having access to the detailed response guidance in the Child-Related Incident Management Directorate, which could be used to inform the detailed policies, protocols and guidance for responding to harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care, youth justice and schools that we recommend.

The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit would also work closely with the Quality and Risk Committee (refer to Recommendation 9.5) to ensure systemic risks, practice issues and opportunities for improvement are identified.

The Department's new senior support staff mentioned above could form part of the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit. The Tasmanian Government will need to allocate additional funding to resource the Unit to also support out of home care and youth justice responses to harmful sexual behaviours.

Detailed specific policies, protocols and guidance for out of home care

Responding to harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care, where the Department may be the guardian of the child displaying the behaviours and children harmed by the behaviours, requires careful consideration and specialist guidance. This guidance would include the initial response to the incident, but also consider issues such as placement suitability; carer support; the safety and therapeutic needs of the child displaying the behaviours; the safety and therapeutic needs of other children impacted by the behaviours; appropriate information sharing; the role of police; and communication with birth parents. Detailed, specific out of home care policy, protocols and practice guidance are required to support best practices responses to harmful sexual behaviours displayed or experienced in out of home care, including:

- correctly identifying and distinguishing developmentally appropriate, inappropriate and harmful sexual behaviours
- supporting Child Safety Officers, non-government out of home care providers and carers to implement proportionate local responses to inappropriate and problematic sexual behaviour in placements
- balancing the safety, treatment, support and connection needs of the child displaying harmful sexual behaviours with the safety needs of other children in the child's life, including siblings, and encompassing safety planning guidance for the out of home care context
- considerations for placement matching and decision making, and conditions under which placements would be temporarily or permanently changed as a consequence of harmful sexual behaviours
- the safety, treatment and support needs of other children in care harmed by or who reside with the child displaying harmful sexual behaviours
- strategies to ensure that appropriate support and referrals/reports occur in response to a child displaying harmful sexual behaviour
- what information should be recorded and the circumstances in which it should be shared with external authorities, affected parties, other services and supports engaged with the child
- guidance about communicating with families and affected parties
- review processes for safety and participation plans, recognising that risk is not static.

We consider this guidance should be proceduralised where possible and used by Child Safety Officers in conjunction with advice, support and guidance from the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit.

Guidance should direct staff record all incidents of harmful sexual behaviours as a concern about the safety and wellbeing of a child in care and respond in accordance with this policy. Guidance should also advise staff on when and how to seek assistance from the new Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit.

Minimum and advanced education and training in preventing, identifying and responding to harmful sexual behaviours

As identified in Section 4.6 of this chapter, Child Safety Officers, including those providing case management to children in out of home care, receive little professional development on sexual abuse or harmful sexual behaviours as part of their mandatory induction. We recommend mandatory minimum and advanced continuing professional development and education for Child Safety Officers providing out of home care case management (refer to Recommendation 9.11). Advanced professional development should include tailored professional development offerings for Child Safety Officers and carers in understanding and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. Staff working in the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit must be suitably experienced or undertake additional professional development to advance their knowledge in responding to harmful sexual behaviours. This may be internally developed and implemented or be accessed through specialist external providers. Advanced professional development in harmful sexual behaviours should also be made available to relevant staff in schools and youth justice, such as psychologists or social workers working within these settings.

Power to Kids

As discussed elsewhere in this volume, children in out of home care have heightened vulnerability to displaying harmful sexual behaviours, and to experiencing child sexual exploitation—particularly those living in residential care. They may have experienced child sexual abuse or displayed harmful sexual behaviours (or both) prior to coming into care.

While children in out of home care are more vulnerable to sexual harms, they are also more likely to experience school absences and educational disengagement, which means they miss out on school-based sexual health, respectful behaviours and sexual abuse prevention curriculum. They may not have experienced conversations with parents or carers about sexuality, particularly those in residential care with rostered staff. Residential care staff are often inexperienced with limited qualifications and training. Research for the National Royal Commission showed that residential care staff struggled to have appropriate sexual health conversations with children in their care and to respond to harmful sexual behaviours and risk of sexual exploitation.[612]

Recognising the unique vulnerabilities and needs of children in residential care, Dr Robyn Miller told us that MacKillop Family Services had developed and implemented a prevention and intervention model for harmful sexual behaviours (and child sexual exploitation) called ‘Power to Kids’, across all MacKillop Family Services’ residential care homes in Victoria and New South Wales.[613]

Power to Kids is a whole of residential unit, multi-faceted program aimed at ensuring that identified risks are managed, escalated and responded to appropriately by residential carers, the Child Safety Officer, senior managers and the clinical team.[614] It has been proven to reduce the risk to children in residential care of sexual abuse in the form of harmful sexual behaviours, child sexual exploitation and dating violence.[615]

Dr Miller described the three prevention strategies of the Power to Kids model: respectful relationships and sexuality education for the whole house, including staff; the missing from home strategy (primarily relevant for child sexual exploitation); and the sexual safety response.[616] A key element of the Power to Kids approach is to upskill all residential carers within a household to equip them to have 'brave' but appropriate conversations about sexuality and risks of sexual harm.[617] Education for children is not formal or structured, but occurs in the moment; for example, as children and a residential carer are travelling in a car or in response to sexualised material a child may have accessed or been exposed to in an online gaming environment. Power to Kids is a supplementary strategy tailored specifically to the high-risk residential care context and was designed to be implemented in residential care contexts with a trauma-informed therapeutic model of care (MacKillop uses the Sanctuary model).

We recommend the Tasmanian Government facilitates the adoption of Power to Kids or another program or approach with comparable common elements in government funded residential care homes. Any response should contain key elements evident in models such as Power to Kids, namely:

- Education—the approach must educate all roles across the sector in identifying, preventing and responding to harmful sexual behaviours. The education must also involve children in care, so that they understand boundaries in relationships and what is unacceptable. Education in this context is not formal class-based education. Education is individual and responsive to the context in the moment where carers are equipped to have 'brave conversations' with children in care about sexual abuse and harmful sexual behaviours.[618]
- Prevention strategies—specific strategies and guidance about actions that carers and staff can take to reduce the risk of harmful sexual behaviours for children in care. These strategies should be informed by the available evidence.
- Intervention guidance—clear practice guidance for all those involved in the care of each child when harmful sexual behaviours occur. This may involve practice principles, procedures and tools to guide an appropriate response.
- Therapeutic intervention—ensuring sufficient evidence-informed therapeutic resources are available to intervene with children who engage in, or experience, harmful sexual behaviours.

- Whole of workforce knowledge and skill building.

In Chapter 12, we also suggest that Power to Kids or a comparable program or approach may be of benefit in Residential Youth Detention facilities, which share many of the same risks as residential out of home care.

Access to treatment and support for children affected by harmful sexual behaviours while in out of home care

In Chapter 21, Recommendation 21.8, we recommend a sufficiently resourced therapeutic service system for children displaying harmful sexual behaviours. Without an appropriate response, harmful sexual behaviours can escalate and become entrenched and they can seriously compromise the safety, wellbeing and life outcomes of the child displaying the behaviours. Where a child in out of home care displays persistent, abusive or violent sexual behaviours and no timely publicly funded service is available to meet their needs, the State should engage a private service. Similarly, where a child who is sexually harmed in out of home care requires treatment and no timely publicly funded response is available, a private service should be engaged by the State.

Recommendation 9.28

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People should establish a Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit to support best practice responses to harmful sexual behaviours across the Department, including in schools, Child Safety Services, out of home care and youth detention. The unit should:
    a. provide advice, guidance, and support across the Department
    b. develop context-specific policies for all settings informed by the Tasmanian Government's statewide framework and plan to address harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 21.8)
    c. work closely with the Quality and Risk Committee (Recommendation 9.5) to ensure systemic risks, practice issues and opportunities for improvement are identified.
2. The Tasmanian Government should allocate additional funding to support responses to harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care and youth justice.
3. The Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit should develop detailed out of home care-specific policies, protocols and practice guidance to support best practice responses to harmful sexual behaviours in out of home care.

4. The Department should ensure the advanced professional development for departmental staff in understanding and responding to harmful sexual behaviours (Recommendation 9.11) includes tailored professional development for both Child Safety Officers and carers, and is available to staff in relevant roles in schools and youth justice.
5. The Department should ensure staff working in the Harmful Sexual Behaviours Support Unit are suitably experienced or undertake additional professional development to advance their knowledge in responding to harmful sexual behaviours.
6. The Department should ensure Power to Kids or another program or approach with comparable components is implemented in government funded residential care homes as a supplementary strategy to address the heightened risk of harmful sexual behaviours (including child sexual exploitation and dating violence) in out of home care.

10.2 Child sexual exploitation

The National Royal Commission defined sexual exploitation of children in care as children being 'manipulated or coerced to participate in sexual activity by an adult outside the placement in exchange for, or for the promise of, an incentive'.[619]

In its 2015 report on sexual abuse in residential care, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People stated that 'external predators posed the greatest risk to children in residential care'.[620] In 2016, Victorian data suggested that 63 per cent of sexual abusers of children in care were other adults (external to the placement) who were sexually exploiting children they had targeted in residential out of home care.[621]

In this section, we examine the Department's response to the sexual exploitation of children in its care and the role of Tasmania Police in preventing and responding to these crimes. We consider the multiagency initiatives in Victoria that have reduced the incidence of, and improved responses to, sexual exploitation of children in care.[622] Our recommendations build on these effective interstate responses and require the Department and Tasmania Police to work with other agencies to adopt more coordinated, strategic and proactive responses to the sexual exploitation of children in care.

10.2.1 Increased risk for children in out of home care

While child sexual exploitation occurs across the general population, there are adults who actively target children in out of home care, particularly in residential care.[623] Children in care can be particularly vulnerable to manipulation and grooming by these predators due to their trauma history, previous experiences of sexual abuse and disrupted attachments.[624] Moreover, according to a researcher in this area, Dr Gemma McKibbin, children are increasingly grooming and recruiting their peers for the purposes of child sexual exploitation, particularly via online means and social media.[625]

Dr McKibbin told us about six models of child sexual exploitation that occur in the out of home care setting, as described in the Victorian Government's 2017 publication, Child Sexual Exploitation: A Child Protection Guide for Assessing, Preventing and Responding:

- inappropriate relationships model—a significantly older person uses inappropriate power ('physical, emotional and/or financial') over a child to sexually exploit them; the child believes the adult loves and protects them
- boyfriend/girlfriend model (also called the 'loving relationship' model)—the adult befriends the child and grooms them into a 'relationship' but then manipulates or forces the child to have sex with others
- trusted friend or other peer model—a child is encouraged into sexual exploitation by a peer
- organised/networked model—a child is coerced into sexual activity with multiple men; children may be used to recruit others to 'sex parties'; sometimes associated with organised crime
- online model—this model may be used with other models to initiate or maintain contact and exploitation; can be used to target younger children; once children share images, they can be used against them to coerce them into further activity
- betrayal model—the child is befriended by a trusted adult who then organises the child to be sexually exploited by others for their own personal gain.[626]

We heard about or identified many of these models being used to sexually exploit Tasmanian children in care. For example, as described in Linda's case example (Chapter 8), Linda (a pseudonym) was groomed online by an adult male. He convinced her to send him sexually explicit pictures of herself and, once he had them, he used them to coerce her into trying to recruit other, younger children in care. In another example, we heard that a child had a series of 'boyfriends' aged in their 20s or older who were all known to each other and who supplied her with alcohol and drugs. A non-government provider told us about a girl in care who they believed was being trafficked by her 40-year-old 'boyfriend' to his associates during parties at his house.[627]

Several children in our commissioned research indicated that they were aware that children in care were vulnerable to child sexual exploitation. They thought that sometimes children in care were seeking a loving relationship with an adult or could not identify an abusive relationship.[628] One young person said:

> I think it's more with kids in care that they're willing to do … If someone reached out, had no idea who the kid was, and was like, 'Hey, do you want to meet up?' I feel like a kid in care … I don't know if this is true, but I feel like a kid that's in care would be more likely to agree to that because … They want to make connections and they possibly aren't … They probably don't have that many friends. I hate to say it, but I know a lot of people in care that are very isolated. And if someone that is kind to them via social media and looks like a nice person, why wouldn't you go physically?… I feel like if you're in care, you're going to want to talk to more people and be able to let them know about what's going on in your life. And sometimes people that reach out to you, aren't the best people to talk to.[629]

Some children in care interviewed for our commissioned research could identify grooming behaviours—for example:

> I think it's where you slowly build up to doing things to a younger person, and it's more sexual things. And it can sometimes lead to it feeling OK. And if not, a lot of the time, it can end up that they're too scared to do something about it and they think, 'Oh, well, if it's happening this much, it must be normal'.[630]

However, the researchers found that most children they interviewed did not know what grooming was and could not describe it or how they might respond to it.[631] Children said they thought this was important information to know and would like adults to talk to them about it.[632]

Children in care who are being sexually exploited often do not view the exploitation as abuse because they have believed the lies of the abuser, and because they do not always have a good sense of what makes a 'healthy' or 'appropriate' relationship.[633] Instead, they may consider the abuser to be their 'boyfriend' or that they are a willing participant in the abuse. Children who are being sexually exploited often present as 'hostile, aggressive, involved in low-level criminality … under the influence of drugs or drunk and disorderly', making it difficult to engage with them.[634] These children are often unwilling to cooperate with police or child protection officers to facilitate their own protection.[635] Consequently, those in the out of home care system may believe they are powerless to stop the abuse and take little, or no, action.[636] We heard evidence of this attitude in Tasmania, which we discuss below.

10.2.2 National Royal Commission recommendations

The National Royal Commission made specific recommendations to protect children in care from child sexual exploitation:

- Recommendation 12.14—governments implement strategies that identify and disrupt activities involved in child sexual exploitation and that encourage children to cooperate in investigation of the offences.
- Recommendation 12.15—governments align their definitions of child sexual exploitation and report on child sexual exploitation as a form of child sexual abuse.[637]

10.2.3 Identifying child sexual exploitation

The National Royal Commission noted that it is difficult to estimate the prevalence of child sexual exploitation in out of home care in Australia because it is largely 'hidden', possibly due to a lack of awareness of what sexual exploitation is or a lack of reporting by those working with children in out of home care.[638]

The National Royal Commission observed that child protection staff, out of home care workers and police can struggle to recognise child sexual exploitation, instead misidentifying it as adolescent sexual experimentation, normal behaviour for a young person in residential care, a free 'choice' being made by the young person, or engagement in prostitution. Another common misunderstanding is that nothing can be done to protect a child if they are unwilling to make a sworn statement to police.[639] In Victoria, reporting rates increased after steps were taken to raise awareness of child sexual exploitation among child protection and out of home care workers.[640] This suggests that, without an understanding of child sexual exploitation, workers may fail to recognise that a child is being sexually exploited and know how to respond.

In our review of 22 children's case files from Tasmania, we found evidence of child sexual exploitation in four cases, all of whom were females in their teens. All were exploited by more than one adult outside the placement (refer to Chapter 8). Three of these girls had a known intellectual disability, which may have increased their vulnerability to exploitation.[641]

Despite the National Royal Commission raising awareness of these issues more than five years ago, we observed that poor attitudes and misunderstandings remain in some parts of Tasmania's out of home care system. Child Safety Service staff and police often do not recognise child sexual exploitation for what it is, instead describing such behaviour as prostitution or as the child 'self-selecting' a placement or relationship.[642] We heard that some workers feel powerless to intervene when a child is being sexually exploited or worse, do not see intervention as a priority.[643]

10.2.4 Tasmania's response

The two government agencies primarily responsible for preventing and responding to child sexual exploitation are the Department and Tasmania Police.

Department responses

We heard from providers that the children who were missing from placement—'self-selecting' or 'self-placing' as the Department sometimes termed it—were often those being sexually exploited.[644]

During his time with the Department, Jack Davenport formed this view of the Department's ability to respond to child sexual exploitation:

> [Child Safety Services] demonstrated a limited ability to manage complex networks of offenders, notably sexual offenders targeting children. There was no mechanism to manage social media being used to target children, including those in care. The police had little involvement if no criminal activity explicitly took place. There was no capacity for undertaking complex assessments for [child sexual abuse] where there were multiple abusers.[645]

Non-government providers told us they had each developed their own ways of responding to child sexual exploitation, despite the Department not requiring them to do so.[646] Some non-government providers said they addressed the risk of child sexual exploitation by working with carers and children on enhancing protective behaviours.[647] They informed us that current funding levels meant they did not have enough carers available to respond effectively to exploitation when it occurred.[648]

Non-government providers also told us that when they reported instances of child sexual exploitation to the Department, responses were variable. Sometimes reports were not registered as quality of care concerns and no action was taken; on other occasions, Child Safety Officers would visit the child and conduct a safety assessment.[649]

The Department's possible guidance for staff about child sexual exploitation appears to be limited to two documents:

- the Missing Persons Response Children in Care Practice Advice and an associated flowchart, which describes the response to missing persons generally[650]
- the Keeping Children Safe Handbook, used by the Department and Tasmania Police, which includes a section on responding to children who are absent from placement by filing a missing person's report (discussed below).[651]

However, neither of these documents discuss the risk of child sexual exploitation, nor do they allude to it. Other than these documents, we could not find any other explicit references in the online Practice Manual to preventing or responding to the sexual exploitation of children in care.

Secretary Pervan said the Department does not have a 'general rule or practice' to guide practitioners' responses.[652]

Claire Lovell, Executive Director, Children and Family Services, acknowledged that the Department should be engaging in preventative measures for child sexual exploitation, such as making sure a child in care has secure relationship networks so they can access safe people to disclose to, who can then take action.[653] Ms Lovell also said that Tasmania Police should take more responsibility to prevent and respond to child sexual exploitation.[654]

Tasmania Police responses

Police responses to concerns about child sexual exploitation were described as variable.[655] Providers expressed grief and frustration over situations where they knew a child was being exploited, but because the child would not lodge a complaint, police and the Department took no action.[656]

In one of the 22 cases we reviewed, we read notes from an interagency meeting about a girl who was being sexually exploited—Tasmania Police did not consider it a priority to retrieve the girl because of a perception that she was consensually living with the abuser.[657]

However, in another case we reviewed, where a teenager in care was being exploited by adult males in exchange for alcohol and drugs, police and the Department actively worked together to disrupt the sexual exploitation. Although the girl was unwilling to make a statement, police applied pressure to the abusers through repeated visits and ensuring that minor offences (such as driving violations) were responded to. Where possible, they returned the girl to her care home each time they visited. The Child Safety Officer sought and obtained a restraining order on behalf of the child against one of the men, her 'boyfriend' in his late 20s, and out of home care staff continued to make regular contact with the girl, encouraging her to return home.[658]

To explain how Tasmania Police approach child sexual exploitation, Jonathan Higgins APM, then Assistant Commissioner of Operations, Tasmania Police, told us about police involvement in national online child sexual exploitation initiatives—the Australian Centre to Counter Child Exploitation and the Joint Anti Child Exploitation Team—which enable police to track and interrupt the online component of child sexual exploitation.[659] However, he was less clear on how Tasmania Police could be involved in preventing child sexual exploitation that moves from online to face-to-face interactions with children in care.[660]

Assistant Commissioner Higgins agreed that Tasmanian Police, and the State as a whole, could do better in preventing the sexual exploitation of children in care.[661]

10.2.5 Missing persons and 'self-placement'

Research for the National Royal Commission identified that a child 'missing from placement' is a key 'red flag' indicator of sexual exploitation for service providers and child protection authorities.[662] In its 2021 Out of Sight report on children who are absent or missing from residential care, the Victorian Commission for Children and Young People found that an 'alarmingly high number' of such children were 'sexually exploited, abused and assaulted, often by adult men', with devastating and long-term consequences.[663]

Several non-government providers told us that Child Safety Officers regularly referred to children who had gone missing from a placement as having 'self-placed', and that if a child was older than 13 or 14, the Department has not always prioritised assertive outreach to ensure their safety.[664] We heard that sometimes the Department considered children as young as 12 to be able to 'self-protect'—that is, to be able to recognise grooming behaviour and remove themselves from an unsafe situation.[665] As one provider rightly pointed out:

> … the idea or notion that young people (some as young as 12), would have the ability to make fully informed, safe decisions for themselves without a safe and protective guardian or adult around to help them was and is something I find incredibly difficult to comprehend. I do not know how that label can be applied to vulnerable children, especially children who have suffered trauma, when it is not a label we would apply to our own children.[666]

Dr Miller told us that the practice of allowing children in care who were around the age of 15 or older to choose where they live is not followed in Victoria.[667] She said she was aware that this was allowed in Tasmania and New South Wales but described it as a 'dangerous practice' because of the risk of exploitation and poor outcomes for the child.[668]

As indicated above, section 9 of the Keeping Children Safe Handbook outlines the conditions under which Tasmania Police would respond if a child went missing from a placement.[669] The handbook includes the following:

- a missing person's report should only be made to Tasmania Police when the child's 'whereabouts are unknown, and where there are concerns for the safety and welfare of that person'—the handbook acknowledges that 'a child's age or vulnerability may put a child into this category' [bold emphasis is ours][670]
- the police require the Department to apply for and obtain a warrant under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 'if it is assessed that intervention will be required to take the child into safe custody', otherwise a missing persons report 'does not provide police with any power to apprehend, detain or return the child to their placement'[671]
- the missing person's report remains 'live' on the police system until the missing person is found.[672]

Section 9 does not mention that a child missing from placement is at risk of child sexual exploitation but treats the child as any other missing person who 'may' fit criteria for a missing person's report. The guideline does not appear to cover the circumstance in which a child is missing from placement and their location is known but they are considered at risk of sexual exploitation.

There is no discussion in the handbook about the option for police to charge adults involved in child sexual exploitation with specific offences under sections 95 and 96 of the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act (refer to discussion below). In fact, child sexual exploitation is not addressed in the handbook at all.

10.2.6 Intervention and disruption

The term 'disruptive policing' refers to lawful police action that may interfere with, delay or complicate criminal activity. As indicated above, when describing disruptive policing methods employed by Tasmania Police, Assistant Commissioner Higgins primarily referenced police responses to online child sexual exploitation identified by the Australian Centre to Counter Child Exploitation and the Joint Anti Child Exploitation Team.[673]

Assistant Commissioner Higgins also identified actions available to Tasmania Police that could disrupt child sexual abuse including:

- mandatory reporting obligations for children suspected of being abused in their family
- automatic information sharing between police databases and Registration to Work With Vulnerable People
- the management of serious sex offenders
- red flags on the police intelligence system for child sex offences
- automatic numberplate recognition
- closed-circuit television coverage across metropolitan areas.[674]

Counsel Assisting our Inquiry asked Assistant Commissioner Higgins to explain how police might respond to a common scenario of child sexual exploitation involving a child in care—that of a 15-year-old girl reported missing by her residential care provider and believed to be staying with a 40-year-old male who gave her alcohol and drugs in exchange for sex.[675] Assistant Commissioner Higgins talked about the difficulty of extricating a child from this situation if she does not want to leave and suggested that a warrant under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act for her retrieval could be counterproductive. He thought that police might be able to use their 'powers of persuasion' to negotiate with the child to return to her placement, they could interrogate the male involved and there were 'certainly avenues that would be followed to bring [the young person] back'.[676]

In some circumstances, police could charge those exploiting children in care with specific offences under the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act—section 95 ('Harbour or conceal a child') and section 96 ('Remove a child without authority'). Assistant Commissioner Higgins told us that since 1 January 2000, Tasmania Police had only charged four people for offences under these sections of the Act.[677] He agreed that these provisions are available to police but he did not offer a reason for their infrequent use.

10.2.7 Preventing and responding to child sexual exploitation in other jurisdictions

Some young people interviewed for our commissioned research indicated that prevention strategies directed at addressing the risk of child sexual exploitation would be helpful. One young person said:

> So, I know that sometimes people … their parents might have been sexually abusive, so they … Even if your parents are horrible, you still associate that with love, so I think then children go on to sort of associate that abuse with being in a relationship with somebody. So, I think that that might be one of the ways that we can help children and young people help themselves to stop being taken advantage of is helping them relearn that love and a relationship doesn't have abuse in it, and any … If a relationship has abuse, it's not a loving relationship. It's a manipulative one. I think that helping them learn that and relearn that is probably an important way or a good way, because people sometimes tend to go back to that, subconsciously, or sometimes even consciously.[678]

Child sexual exploitation policy approaches from other jurisdictions may help inform change in Tasmania.

The Victorian Government's Child Sexual Exploitation: A Child Protection Guide for Assessing, Preventing and Responding ('Victorian guide') outlines how and why multiple agencies work together to prevent, detect, disrupt, intervene and assist children 'known to child protection' to recover from child sexual exploitation.[679]

The Victorian guide summarises the research and practice knowledge available about child sexual exploitation, such as indicators of risk and protective factors, as well as push and pull factors, that lead children into child sexual exploitation.[680] It then lays out the 'five elements of effective practice in response to child sexual exploitation': prevention, detection, disruption, intervention, and recovery and connection.[681] Finally, the Victorian guide details the legislation for sexual crimes against children involved in child sexual exploitation.[682]

As mentioned above, Dr Miller told us the 'Power to Kids' program is used in MacKillop Family Services' residential care homes in New South Wales and Victoria to prevent, disrupt and respond to harmful sexual behaviours, child sexual exploitation and dating violence.[683] All three prevention strategies relate to child sexual exploitation, namely:

- ‘whole-of-house respectful relationships and sexuality education’—educating carers and staff to recognise and respond to child sexual exploitation, and educating children about safety, respectful relationships and sexual health—which enables staff to have ‘brave conversations’ with children in care about sexual safety[684]
- ‘missing from home strategy’—establishing protective relationships between children and their carers to counteract grooming, safety planning with children and assertively maintaining contact with children when they are missing from home[685]
- ‘sexual safety response’— ‘proactively supporting exit strategies for child sexual exploitation’ and working with child protection and local police.[686]

Dr Miller told us that in addition to these preventative strategies, MacKillop Family Services has developed partnerships with Victoria Police that have helped identify perpetrators of child sexual exploitation and kept children safe.[687] In relation to the Victorian approach, Dr Miller stated:

> This focus on safety and disruptive policing and a multi-agency, ‘joined up’ response is a key aspect of keeping young people safe. The system needs to focus on the perpetrators much more in order for boundaries and safety to be gained.[688]

Dr Miller said that policing of child sexual exploitation in some jurisdictions was moving away from ‘success equalling a criminal conviction’ to considering success to be the child’s safety and disruption of the sexual exploitation (which may or may not end up in a charge or conviction of a sex crime).[689] Such a cognitive shift might allow Tasmania Police to act more protectively for children in care who are being sexually exploited.

The final component of the Power to Kids model is strong partnerships with mental health, allied health services and education or schools to meet the needs of children in care.[690]

An evaluation of Power to Kids showed it to be effective in reducing the risk of child sexual exploitation. The evaluation found that children subject to this model were missing from home less often, and carers were better able to identify those who needed help and to then help them out of sexually exploitative situations.[691]

10.2.8 Our observations

We consider that the Department and Tasmania Police could greatly improve their responses to sexual exploitation of children in care by developing a framework for preventing and responding to child sexual exploitation based on the example and experience of other jurisdictions. We recommend that the Department and Tasmania Police work with relevant stakeholders to develop such a framework.

Recommendation 9.29

1. The Department for Education, Children and Young People and Tasmania Police should work with non-government providers and other relevant stakeholders to develop a framework for preventing and responding to sexual exploitation of children in care that is informed by best practice and evidence from other jurisdictions. The framework should:
    a. acknowledge the responsibility of the Department to lead the protection of children in care from child sexual exploitation
    b. outline the prevention strategies to be used and each agency's role in delivering those strategies
    c. outline the detection, disruption and intervention strategies to be used and each agency's role in delivering those strategies
    d. outline how children in care who have been exploited will be supported to heal and recover
    e. describe how agencies will work together
    f. implement a reporting framework about the incidence of sexual exploitation of children in care, which is reported to the Quality and Risk Committee.
2. The Chief Practitioner should lead the development of the framework.
3. The Keeping Children Safe Handbook and Tasmania Police operating guidelines should be updated to reflect the role of police in responding to child sexual exploitation in the new framework.

Recommendation 9.30

Tasmania Police should more fully utilise the offences in sections 95 and 96 of the Children, Young People and Their Families Act 1997 (the offences of harbouring or concealing a child and of inducing a child to be absent without lawful authority) to deter behaviour by adults that puts children in out of home care at risk of sexual abuse.

11 Responding to complaints and concerns about child sexual abuse

